About the monument itself there exists a simplicity of design and beauty of execution that places it quite outside of and beyond anything heretofore seen in the streets of this city. It is really a matter for San Francisco people to be proud of, and one has to thank Mr. Phelan not only for the generosity of the gift, but also for causing a new note to be struck in the world of Western art. Besides this, Californians may congratulate themselves upon the fact that every ounce of stone, and metal, every square inch of decoration, every penny given to defray expenditure came from this State. The monument was given by a Californian, was designed by a Californian. Its stone was dug from California quarries at Rocklin, its bronze was melted and cast in California foundries, while its figures, that of the angel holding the book, and that of the Native Son waving the flag, were from the hands of the sculptor, Douglass Tilden, himself a Native Son.

Apropos of these figures, it may be said that beyond their mere appropriateness and excellence, they are full of symbolical meaning. The figure at the base is that of a California miner waving the banner that contains the new star, and shouting to the country that a new State has been added to the roll. The angel on the top of the Doric column carries in his upraised hands a book upon whose blank pages is to be written the history of the new State, but which, nevertheless, as upon a ledger, is inscribed the date, "September 9, 1850,' the date of admission. Upon the base is a bear's skull, typifying the bleak Sierra Mountains, while on the reverse surface of the base is carved a quotation from the speech of W. H. Seward: "Unity of the empire hangs upon the decision of the day." There is, perhaps, a particular significance in this phrase, for, if California had not been admitted in 1850, she might have become a State of Southern sympathizers and have joined herself to the South in the civil war with results that might have been disastrous to the Union.

California, and especially this city, has a crying need for more of such public monuments as this; more, no doubt, will follow; already the "Stevenson ship" is under way. As Mr. Bruce Porter pointed out in a speech at the banquet following the unveiling, the time should come when California will be to the United States what Italy was to Europe, and when San Francisco will be to California what Florence was to Italy—a home of a new school of art and architecture. There is much in Mr Porter's words that may prove prophetic. Certainly such monuments as that of the Native Sons' will go far towards bringing about its fulfillment.

EL SALVADOR.

A crescent bay, and crested peaks on high,
With wooded flanks, which seaward slope between,
Embossed with fold on fold of deathless green,
And over all an arch of turquoise sky.

Thus I recall with half-regretful sigh,
The sights and sounds of that exotic scene—
Its wealth of tint and tone, its airs serene,
Which erstwhile charmed my wistful ear and eye.

A dreamy land of indolence and ease—
With budding boughs and vines, and fruited trees,
Where birds on gold and scarlet wings flash by:
Beside a reed-thatched hut nude children play,
While to and fro the palm trees idly sway,
And spent waves swoon upon the shore and die.
—Lucius Harwood Foote.

The performances at Bayreuth this year are said to have fallen below their usual standard of excellence. This difference is noted in the direction of the opera and also in the singers themselves, the only artists escaping the general censure being Van Rooey, Brema, Gulbranson and Schumann-Heink. Van Rooey has a noble voice, admirably suited to Wotan. He sings and acts the part with much majesty and pathos, and altogether seems to have been the success of the festival. Brema's Fricka is full of charm and Schumann-Heink sings the music of Waltraute in 'Seigfried" with considerable passion. A great impression has been renewed by Frau Gulbranson as Brumhilde, a performance at once beautiful and pathetic. But these four singers were not sufficient to save the season, and the general impression is that neither four times four or four times any number could rescue it as long as young Siegfried Wagner is conductor. It seems that the young man is running things with insufficient discretion, and as a result the ablest Dutch, German and French critics are crying out with the proverbial one voice against the inartistic state of affairs. With infinite labor Wagner the first built his magnificent theater, the most perfect machine in the world for the reproduction of great art works; and now Mrs. Wagner has given it to her son, and like a baby when it gets a toy Siegfried is breaking it to pieces to see what there is inside, and herein is the cause of Bayreuth's decadence.

Professor Edoe, of the Institute di San Lorenzo, recently repeated, for a wager, in twenty-four hours consecutively, without prompting or aid, the entire "Divina Commedia" of Dante. This remarkable achievement was not the result of life-long study, but of short preparation begun for the purpose of winning a wager.

MRS. LESLIE CARTER
Gowned for the excursion to the windmill

MISS ANNIE IRISH
Who is now supporting William H. Crane

ANGELA McCAULL
Whose brightness assists the final act of "The Heart of Maryland"

LADIES OF LIGHT AND LEADING

Photographic studies by Thors

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I wonder, Diary, I am not a creature of moods, a capricious being as variable as the coloring of the chameleon? Now everything is bright and glorious, tomorrow life seems one long grey day, the sky heavy with clouds, guiltless of even a silver lining. This week fortune has greeted me with a smiling face and I have been utterly, absolutely and absurdly happy. You know Aunt Sybil, whom I left luxuriating at Del Monte, sent for me last Thursday, and I flew as if on Love's own wings or Mercury's if you prefer it. I found the girls revelling in action—swimming and boating, races, tennis tournaments, and such gaieties. All won cups which Mr. Oelrichs, like a beneficent fairy godmother, dispensed on the slightest occasion. Marie Wells carried off two beautiful, I might almost say, poems in chinaware—little Sevres affairs, too delicate for aught but fill a niche in one's cabinet. We all enjoyed Mr. Oelrichs—he was simply the life of Del Monte.

On Monday I returned to town to find Papa still speculating in wheat. He and Arthur almost laid me in Tophet when they commenced discussing this all-absorbing topic, and I am beginning to understand a few of the technical terms. Papa is still holding on. I hope he won't do so too long, for then my golden dreams will be dissipated with unjustifiable violence. On Wednesday I went to the first affair given to the season's debutantes—a lunch at Menlo by Edna Hopkins. It was a very jolly affair and we all speculated as to who would be belle. As a jury we did not agree. Some of the girls say Therese Morgan will carry off the laurels, while others insist that Marie Wells is the coming belle. Then, there is Ethel Keeney, who I hear is to entertain a lot and make things hum this year. She has ordered lovely clothes, too, which certainly add to one's chances of success. For my own part, I admire Leontine Blakeman very much; she is so reposeful and has what the French call l'air. Mrs. Morgan and Therese are back from Santa Barbara. Therese is a splendid-looking girl, plays golf, tennis, rides like an Amazon, and is altogether an outdoor girl. She does not intend sacrificing herself on the altar of social whimsicalities and is just going to have as much fun as she finds agreeable, but is determined to keep up her open-air existence. Ella Morgan will be back from the East early next month.

That, for a commencement—well, I went with the Oelrichs to the Tivoli on Wednesday night, and they've asked me to go with them to the circus Friday. You know Mrs. Oelrichs has arrived, and Birdie Fair. On Saturday the final paper chase takes place We are all going and it is to be The Event (with capitals) of the season. Poor Mrs. Hagen has been so ill they were quite alarmed about her and telegraphed to Los Angeles for her son, Frank Hicks, to come at once immediately. She is, however, improving. There has been a perfect mania for auctions in our family of late. You know Leila anticipates making her Harry happy in November, so is gathering in household effects. She and dear Aunt Caroline went to the Caret auction last week and picked up a few things. They say it is great fun—much more exciting that any social function and infinitely more alluring. Aunt Caroline says that an auction will henceforth be to her a Delphic Oracle as to which of her acquaintances are real ladies and which merely have a veneer. Some apparently charming and well-bred women become perfect termagants at an auction. They haggle and quarrel and, as for the poor auctioneer, he is certainly one whom the Lord loveth. The Carets had some really fine pieces of furniture, which were sold at a very moderate price. Then there was the Townsend sale, on Friday and Saturday, when many things were sacrificed. Leila bought all sorts of dining room accessories—glassware which was excellent English cut crystal, much more solid than American. Then the ornaments went at nominal figures. Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels picked up some odd things which Leila said she would have given a little fortune to purchase. She is going to build, I hear, and does not intend having a "furniture-store" house. I heard recently from Mrs. Casey and Miss Dillon, who have taken a beautiful country place in Hertfordshire, England, for the months of July, August, and September. They asy it is simply glorious, and they are surrounded by country places, parks, etc., belonging to the English nobility. All their neighbors are titled, so they feel quite distinguished in being simple Americans—without handles to their names. Miss Dillon is studying singing with Shakespeare and progressing famously. I hope Papa will send me over as he has promised, though many of the girls want me to wait till 1900, when all expect to go to the Yankee Paradise.

The Louis Parrotts have rented their house to some people named Schwartze. Mr. Parrott's health has been wretched for some time past, so they are going South to try the effect of change of climate. Then they anticipate a trip eastward, and possibly to Europe, where the girls will complete their education. Leila went to the Alma Miller Wood concert on Saturday afternoon. It was a great success from the social as well as the financial standpoint. Miss Wood showed much patriotism in the selection of her programme. All the songs were American. In fact, they were more settings than absolute songs. Everyone in town was there and all in their best bib and tucker. Mr. Heine played very pleasingly on the violin, and now I fancy you are in touch with all my doings as well as with my intentions.

Your friend,
MISS CRICKET.

***

The wedding of Miss Craven and Mr. Koehler was an interesting event of last week—interesting beyond the ordinary because of the prominence of the bride and groom. Miss Craven has proved a boon to the journalists who have been making copy out of the Fair case, and has figured oftener in the papers than Queen Victoria. She is a pretty and talented young woman, whose loyalty to her mother is beyond praise. Mr. Koehler is a brewer, and is better known by his beer than by his name—in this part of the world, at least. He makes the A. B. C. beer, and, incidentally, that brew has made his fortune. He is an able, forcible and decidedly good looking native of St. Louis, and he is bound to grow richer and more prominent as time goes on. This was a case of love at first sight, for Mr. Koehler saw Miss Craven when she was acting at St. Louis with the Frohman Company. He sought an introduction then and commenced an assiduous wooing, which was ended by Miss Craven's acceptance some eight months ago. The happy pair celebrated their honeymoon at Del Monte and are now at the Palace, where they gave a dinner to their friends Wednesday night last.

Dr. R. S. Breyfogle and Mrs. Breyfogle, who recently returned from Europe, have left the Palace and are now residing at 2018 Franklin street.

***

The fears that have for some time past caused such dire distress among the young people in Oakland with regard to the reorganization of the dancing clubs are without foundation. The lady patronesses have decided to once again assume the reins of office and have sent out invitations. There are but few changes in the regime of younger Deux Temps set—I noted the addition of a few names to the list of patronesses, viz: Mrs. Havens, Mrs. Sharon and Mrs. Gorrill, and Mrs. Selby no longer figures among them. This is a matter of regret, for she was among the most energetic and popular last season. Then the young people are to meet on Saturday evenings instead of Fridays, as has hitherto been their custom. The season commences on Saturday, October 9th, at 8 o'clock.

And still comes news of impending departures for the East. Miss Florence Sharon and Miss Grace Gorrill are among the latest to announce an intention of spending the winter on the other side of the Rockies. Mrs. Little has gone on to New York to visit her daughter, Mrs. Ketchum. Mr. and Mrs. I. L. Requa are still at Paso Robles. Mr. Requa has been much troubled with rheumatism for the past year and is taking the cure. Mr. L. A. Booth has passed some little time there and has derived much benefit from the waters.

A few farewell receptions are the sole social happenings in the past week. Miss Grace Gorrill and Miss Florence Sharon were entertained by Mrs. E. B. Beck on Friday evening at a jolly little dinner. Then Mrs. Campbell gave a reception in honor of her daughter, Mrs. C. A. Carmine, who is on a visit here from Galveston, Texas. About two hundred guests were invited.

The Ebell Society is planning some very intersting afternoon lectures. The series is to be introduced by M. Henri Fairweather, who will talk upon Wagnerian art. The ladies who have special charge of these lectures are Mrs. Sharon, Mrs. Hay, Mrs. Guerson and others.

Gradually even the latest among the summer laggards are returning to their homes, back from Santa Cruz, Mrs. English from a visit to New Westminster, British Columbia, where she has been with her daughter, Mrs. Arthur Malins.

For the most complete line of summer shirtings and hose, J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st.

Maillard's Chocolates, half and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

S. Strozynski, 24 Geary street. Expert European hairdressers and cutters employed; no apprentices; prices equal to others. Artistic hair work and shampooing by a modern process. Telephone Main 5697.

After a night with the boys—Bromo Kola

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market Street

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents
Sold only at 102 Eddy street

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

STARS IN DESHABILE

The "Leading Boy" and the "Romantic Lead" at Home.

The journalist caught Caroline Rudolph and Miss Sisson—who play the leading roles in "The Twelve Temptations" now at the Columbia—in an unguarded moment. He had seen them before, across the footlights, at a time when they were very much on their guard. On this particular afternoon he came upon them unheralded. There was a difference. One might go so far as to call this interview "Miss Rudolph and Miss Sisson seen 'at home.'"

They "are stopping" in a "flat," these two, and when discovered were in negligee and were mending costumes. The approaching dinner, the gentle aroma of a cleaning fluid, and the memories of a past salad blended effluently in the atmosphere.

"Hoh!" says Miss Rudolph as the journalist came in. "I thought it was Mister Bil-asco for a moment! Say, ain't he just like Bil-asco, Josie?"

Miss Rudolph is called "Hubert the Valiant" on the Columbia programmes, and Miss Sisson "Prince Bright Eyes." Prince Bright Eyes was in a flannel wrapper and curl-papers, and was cutting out patterns on the bed. She does "Romantic Leads."

Miss Sisson's line is "Leading Boys."

"The star is at work," said Miss Rudolph, holding out a strip of cambric that bore evidences of sewing, and she laughed again. I'm sure I don't know why. Then Prince Bright Eyes laughed, and the journalist laughed, too, from force of association.

The journalist thought the moment had come to interview. He began bravely on burlesque.

"Well, you see, I don't do burlesque," said Miss Rudolph. "Look-a-here, don't you go and say I was fair, fat and quarter past forty, like the evenin' paper did."

"I won't," said the journalist.

The evening paper was wrong. Miss Rudolph is not fair.

"Burlesque ain't our line," said Prince Bright Eyes from the patterns, her mouth full of pins. The journalist gazed mournfully at a basket of withered flowers, and then started on acting. But this, too, failed.

"Acting ain't my line, either," said Miss Rudolph.

"I see," said the wretched journalist; "you do a dance turn."

"Dance nothin'. Say—I was a costume reader once. You can put that down in your interview."

"She's got a great voice,' put in Prince Bright Eyes. Here was something at least. The journalist asked about singing as applicable to extravaganza.

"Oh, she meant speakin' voice," said Miss Rudolph. "I don't never sing."

"Well, what—what can you do?" gasped the journalist.

"Oh, I do 'Leading Boys.'"

"An' I do 'Romantic Leads,'" said Prince Bright Eyes.

"What are they?"

"Costume, mostly," said Miss Rudolph.

"The costume's the least part of it!" shrieked the bright-eyed Prince, and thereat they became hysterical. After awhile the journalist said:

"What are the qualifications for a romantic boy?"

"You're a dead farmer," said Prince Bright Eyes by way of answer.

"She's all the time joshing," said the Prince, consolingly.

"Do you mean a romantic lead?"

"Or a leading boy?"

"Yes," mumbled the unhappy man; "both of them, either of them," he wailed despairingly.

"Well, you've got to have a good figure, and you musn't be too stout."

"Well, Mister Yale would take a girl even if her limbs" (she said 'limbs') "weren't good if she had a pretty face."

"You can always use 'symmetries,'" said

MISS MADELINE BOUTON
Thors, photo

Miss Rudolph to the journalist in so confiding a tone that he almost thanked her.

"I suppose," he said, "you like—ah—being a 'leading boy' better than being a 'costume reader'?"

"Well," said Miss Rudolph, reflectively, "costume reading is more refined, but you don't get engagements. It's a long time between drinks, just as Mr. Riddle told me once. If you've got a society pull you're alright. But it ain't such fatiguing work."

"I was a reader once, too," put in the Prince. "I read 'In a Balcony,' by Mister Browning, and 'Laska.' I did 'em in costume, too, 'same night. Laska's a female cowboy makeup, and I used to put on a fifteent' century court dress—jewels an' wig to match, right over it. I'd have 'In a Balcony' first, you see, then I'd do an exit, and shunt that makeup and come on with thunder noises 'off' as Laska. That was the best turn in my repertoar, and I always could count on a call. But there's more money in 'romantic leads.'"

"Just t' think of my taking you for Mister Bil-asco," said Miss Rudolph, dreamily.

"Yes, just to think," said the journalist. There was a pause.

Just then a man with his hat tilted like the tower of Pisa put in an appearance and was presented to the journalist.

"Say," exclaimed this one, "ain't you girls ever goin' to get property baby fixed?"

The journalist struggled to his feet and jammed his hat down upon his ears.

"You ain't going yet," exclaimed Hubert the Valiant and Prince Bright Eyes in a breath.

"The press waits," exclaimed the journalist.

"Don't forget to say I was a costume reader once," said Hubert.

"An' me, too," said the Prince.

The journalist hasn't forgotten, and he never will. CLAVERLY, JR.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

The Requisite of Ladies of Fashion.

Ladies know the comfort of using good toilet water when taking a bath, and the difficulty of finding preparations that leave an agreeable feeling to the skin with a pleasant odor. To meet the demand for such an article the Pacific Ammonia Bottling Company, of which Mr. George Herrmann is president, supply Greer's Table Ammonia, with violet or lavender perfume, which is unexcelled for toilet and bath purposes. This water is rapidly coming into general use by ladies of fashion and all who appreciate the elegancies of life. At the same time its use is beneficial to health, invigorating to a tired body, and refreshing to the senses. The preparation is for sale by all druggists and grocers, and the price has lately been reduced to the very moderate price of 85 cents per bottle.

Bank Stock pads and tablets are made from pure stock, and are of high value from an oculistic standpoint. The Mitchell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay street.

THE THEATRES

Temptations That Do Not Seduce — The Orpheum Exhibit.

Few apologies for its existence are offered by "The Twelve Temptations"—not more than half a dozen, a clever premiere, an amusing boxing match, a taking tough song, and two capable acrobats. There is almost nothing else in the entire show worth even passing attention, save a ballet or two and a commendable smoothness of action. The premiere, Signorina Ferrero, or is it Mlle. Basscozis?—uncertain is programme precedence, but, one or the other, she is truly nimble and good looking as well. She flits about and pirouettes in a most delightful manner, and in her pretty pink skirt looks as crisp as a new-blown rose. Rosaire and Elliott are clever acrobats—their work is really good, and at the same time unique. Their boxing match in the last act is amusingly done. Miss Rose Kesner sings a tough song about as well as has any one else of late. Her dancing and her make-up are both excellent. The costumes are bright and the scenery fair, but what the play needs is more life and dash, some up-to-date comedy, a lot of taking songs and a few people to sing them. As it is, there is not a voice in the company, barring Miss Kesner's, and hers is essentially burlesque.

Some good work has been given at Morosco's this week in "The Dandy Fifth." The piece, it is true, is old and rather worn by this time, but it is still interesting and thrilling enough to claim attention. It gives Landers Stevens a chance as Adirondack Joe; he takes full advantage of it. This young man is clever and attractive, an actor in a real sense of the term, and worthy of better lines than those of melodrama. Mortimer Snow has a familiar part as the dandy officer, and Fred Butler another as the Southerner. Bert Morrison is good as Colonel Danger, Maud Edna Hall arouses sympathy and tears simultaneously, and Julia Blanc as Aunt Chloe develops considerable comedy.

MISS ALICE J. FRIEDLANDER
Whose engagement to W. H Lauer was recently announced

The Hungarian Boys' Military Band continues to be the leading item in the Orpheum bill of fare and grows in popular esteem as time goes on. Too much credit cannot be given to Mr. Gustav Walter for his enterprise in introducing this model aggregation of youthful musicians to the San Francisco public. As we said last week, the cymbals badly need moderating in fervor. The singing of Lillian Leslie and Don M. Cann, who are new comers this week, is much above the average of variety stage vocalists, and it is easy to see the audience appreciates the fact. The latter artist has an exceedingly pleasing, natural voice, while her style is entirely free from affectation of any kind. In Lillian Leslie she finds an efficient helpmeet, the two figuring in the bill of the play as "California's Fairest Daughters," a designation that ought to satisfy the most ambitious of their sex. The talking comedians, Smith and Campbell, are masters of their part and seem to have an endless string of patter. It takes little observation to see that Little Leola Mitchell, the living doll, is a curio in feminine ware, though hardly thoroughbred as to the understandings displayed by her scanty frocks. Brisk and pleasing enough in manner, she has considerable knack in managing her voice. Van Auken, McPhee and Hill, the gymnasts, are a crack trio on the horizontal bars, with specialties in the way of turns and twists well worth study.

The Occidental Restaurant, 337 Bush street. Headquarters for tourists. Separate rooms for families. Meals a la carte. Lunch 50c. Best French Dinner in the city, 75c. Dan Ieuch, proprietor.

DRAMATIC NOTES

The grand opera season at the California will be of four weeks' duration, and at least six operas, entirely new to San Francisco, will be presented.

The Channing Auxiliary announces a course of Thursday afternoon French lectures, commencing September 16th. The readings to be given by Professor L. D. Ventura will be selected from modern French, Italian and Russian authors.

The Columbia has been having large houses all through the week to witness "The Twelve Temptations." The second week of the engagement opens Monday evening. On September 20th the Frawley company returns for a three weeks' season, presenting "One of Our Girls," "The Wife" and, for the first time in this city, "Sue" and a new comedy by Augustus Thomas.

At Morosco's next week the play will be "The Engineer," an interesting American drama full of comedy and action. An amusing feature will be a Fourth of July celebration in a Southwestern Missouri town, introducing a comic military village band. The third act shows an ore mill with practical working machinery. In this scene the hero's live is dramatically saved by the heroine.

The phenomenal equilibrist El Zobedie opens at the Orpheum next Monday. Zobedie has just closed a successful engagement at the Arcade, St. Petersburg. Mr. George Evans, "The Honey Boy," and Adrienne Ancion, the aerial artist, complete the list of new people. Fox and Allen play a return date in their sketch, "The Flat Next Door." Van Aucken, McPhee and Hill have made a big hit and will continue.

In her piano recital in Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Hall this afternoon Miss May Lucine Potrin will give a number of carefully selected compositions. Among them are Liszt's Polonaise in E, Andante with variations, Haydn; Five Preludes, Waltz and Berceuse, Chopin; Fantasie op. 17, Schumann; Intermezzo, Brahms; Rondo a Capriccio op. 129, Beethoven, and Magic Fire (scene from "Die Walkure"), Wagner-Brassin.

At the Baldwin Monday evening W. H. Crane opens in his new play, "A Fool of Fortune." The piece is by Martha Morton. The plot deals with doings in Wall street, and in Elisha Cunningham Mr. Crane is said to have a part that is especially suited to him. The supporting company includes Percy Brooke, Boyd Putnam, William Boag, Miss Percy Haswell, Miss Frances Stevens and Miss Kate Lester. Mr. Crane's second play will be "A Virginia Courtship."

Still another week of "The First Born" at the Alcazar. From all appearances it would seem as though the litle play could run indefinitely. This week the theater has been filled, and the attendance for next week promises to be equally large. H. Grattan Donnelly's drama, "The American Girl," will precede the Chinese piece, George Osbourne assuming the original role of Ross Bolter. The balance of the cast will be filled by the regular company.

Next Monday the sixth week of the Tivoli grand opera will open with Thomas' beautiful romance, "Mignon." Katharine Fleming Hinrichs will assume the title role, a part in which she is said to excel. Elvia Crox will be Filina; Michelena, Wilhelmeister; Alviramoff, Lothario, and Bernice Holmes, Frederic. "Mignon" will be sung Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday evenings. The balance of the week will be given to "Faust," with Tillie Salinger as Marguerite; Bernice Holmes, Siebel; Rhys Thomas, Faust; William Mertens, Valentine, and Signor Viviani, Mephisto. "The Flying Dutchman" and a repetition of "Lohengrin" are announced as the next productions.

$2,000.00

Any baking-powder will lighten your cake, if that's all you want. Some are stronger than than others, some more wholesome.

Schilling's Best is both and more too.

A. Schilling & Company
San Francisco

PROVINCIAL NOVELISTS

A Comparison of the Literary Methods of Hamlin Garland and Miss Mary Wilkins.

Had Hamlin Garland the exquisite skill and certainty of phrase which so distinguishes the style of Mary Wilkins, what masterpieces his "Wayside Courtships" (Appletons) would have been. Had the author of "Jerome" (Harpers) some sense of the breadth of the prairies, some intuition of that broader life which is lived by the world outside of the narrow environment of her New England village, that book would have been a great work of art rather than an extremely clever tale. "Jerome" is much more than clever, however—within its limits it is a chef d'oeuvre. Its characters are clear cut and fully realized; its movement is easy and fluent; the story is told with a beautiful simplicity; the episodes are as natural as the facts of one's own existence. The milieu in which the Squire, Doctor Prescott, Ozias Lamb and Aunt Camilla move is inimitably rendered—the point of view of each character and the attitude of the village to all of them is expressed with the same admirable certainty that their personal attributes, passions, manners, are painted. Something of the quality of a Meissonier is in this scrupulous workmanship, and yet something of the puppet maker who excites your admiration at the verisimilitude of his liliputians.

Hamlin Garland has neither the grace of style nor the extraordinary capacity at developing an individuality that characterizes the work of Miss Wilkins. His greatest virtue is an ability to suggest the atmosphere of a prairie town—the mushroom villages of the Mississippi valley. The aspirations and hardships of the farmer of the plains he knows and can paint; he can express the icy cruelty of the Western winters, the burning heat which descends on the plains in July and August. In the life of the middle West there are huge forces to be dealt with—the forces of storm and terrible cold, of drought and disaster, which try men's souls and wear their bodies to the bone. Over the life of the New England village there is the restraint of tradition; precedent is the rule and safeguard of these Puritan communities whose relationship with the ebb and flow of the life of the world is so vague, so distant. Mary Wilkins' style has something of the delicate neatness of her own Aunt Camilla, while Hamlin Garland's method gains its power from the loose strength of these men and girls of the new West. Both are provincial, but the difference between the exquisite refinement of Aunt Camilla and the rough, hearty freedom, the frank boldness of Mattie in "A Preacher's Love Story" is the distinction between their results. In the one instance you have a minor and unsympathetic subject, wrought with infinite skill and delicacy; in the other a big human theme allied to the progress and movement of the world.

A comparison of the stories which make up "Life's Little Ironies," by Thomas Hardy, or the short sketches of De Maupassant, with such tales as those of Miss Wilkins and Hamlin Garland, emphasizes this provincialism of effect. There one finds village tragedies fully and elaborately depicted, but infused into them is an air of the great world of men—there is here an all pervading human nature, which envelopes individual idiosyncrasies and makes of them details of the life of our human kind. This sense of the world's perspective, combined with accuracy of drawing, make a Balzac, a Zola, a Tolstoi, an Ibsen, whose characters are human facts, not village personages.

"Jerome" is certainly a book to be read with interest and admiration. No one else could so admirably render such a theme. There is really no comparing Miss Wilkins' style with that of any other American, save, perhaps, Miss Repplier, whose firmness and lucidity of phrase render her essays distinguished contributions to literature. It is a more perfect medium than even the manner of Ella D'Arcy, whose style is notable among the younger English story-tellers. It is more truthful if less elegant than that of Wilkins could render such a picture as this more truthful if less elegant than that of Henry Harland. Indeed, no one but Miss Wilkins could render such a picture as this of Aunt Camilla:

Camilla Merritt was far from young, being much older than her brother, Lucina's father; but she was old as a poem or an angel might be, with the lovely meaning of her still uppermost and most evident. Camilla in her youth had been of a rare and delicate beauty, which had given her fame throughout the country-side, and she held the best of it still, as one holds jewels in a worn casket, and as a poem written in obsolete language contains still its first grace of thought. Camilla's soft and slender body had none of those stiff, distorted lines which come from resistance to the forced attitudes of life. Her body and her soul had been amenable to all discipline. She had leaned sweetly against her crosses, instead of straining away from them with fierce cramps and agonies of resistance. In every motion she had the freedom of utter yielding, which surpasses the freedom of action. Camilla's graduated flounces of lilac silk, slightly faded, having over it a little spraying mist of gray, trimmed her full skirt to her slender waist, girdled with a narrow ribbon fastened with a little clasp set with amethysts. A great amethyst brooch pinned the lace at her throat. She wore a lace cap, and over that, flung loosely, draping her shoulders and shading her face with its soft mesh, a great shawl or veil of fine white lace wrought with sprigs. Camilla's delicately spare cheeks were softly pink, with that elderly bloom which lacks the warm dazzle of youth, yet has its own late beauty. Her eyes were blue and clear as a child's, and as full of innocent dreams—only of the past instead of the future. Her blond hair, which in turning gray had got a creamy instead of a silvery lustre, like her old lace, was looped softly and disposed in half-curls over her ears. When she smiled it was with the grace and fine dignity of ineffable ladyhood, and yet with the soft ignorance, though none of the abandon, of childhood. Camilla was like a child whose formal code and manners of life had been fully prescribed and learned, but whose vital copy had not been quite set.

The most characteristic of "Wayside Courtship" is "A Stop-Over at Tyre." It lacks the exaltation of "A Preacher's Love Story" or the romance of "A Meeting in the Foothills," but the two men and the girl who are the factors in the situation are intensely typical of the new West. The life of the little bare, cold Wisconsin town, its democracy, and absence of social distinctions, its opportunities, the aspirations of its residents, and the manner and style of their living are all admirably rendered. How much cleverer is the gay young book agent Hartley than Herman, a character of the same type in the first story. The girl Maud, whose college career has been cut short by the death of her father, and is compelled to do menial service in her mother's boarding house, with all her yearnings, her patience and conscientiousness, is essentially of the soil. Then, the conclusion—the young man settling down bravely with the woman he loves, to face the difficulties of a future but dimly realized—has something of the broader tragedy which made notable the tales in "Main Travelled Roads."

"A Preacher's Love Story" tells of the coming of young Stacey to Cyene, and what he wrought there. Stacey, a weary, conscientious young man, a farmer's son who has worked his way through college and emerged a teacher with ministerial aspirations, is directed to this little prairie town and given a school there. The condition of religious affairs in the village are set forth for him by Herman Allen, who has taken his career in hand and directed him to the place:

"Oh, it's quiet now. The calmness of death," said Herman. "Well, you see, it came this way. The church is made up of Baptists and Methodists, and the Methodists wanted an organ, because, you understand, father was the head center, and Mattie is the only girl among the Methodists who can play. The old man has got a head like a mule. He can't be switched off, once he makes up his mind. Deacon Marsden he don't believe in anything above tuning forks, and he's tighter'n the bark on a bulldog. He stood out like a sore thumb, and dad wouldn't give an inch.

"You see, they held meetings every other Sunday. So dad worked up the organ business and got one, and then locked it up when the Baptists held their services. Well, it went from bad to worse. They didn't speak as they passed by—that is, the old folks; we young folks didn't care a continental whether school kept or not. Well, upshot is, the church died out. The wind blew the horse sheds down, and there they lie—and the church is standing there empty as an—old boot—and——" He grew too sleepy to finish.

Suddenly a comical idea roused him again. "Say, Stacey—by Jinks!—are you a Baptist?"

"Yes."

There is a collision first between the young minister and Deacon Allen, who orders him out of his house because he is a Baptist. Then the Godless condition of the region is borne in upon him and he begins a revival, which enkindles the spirit of piety in the community. The last to succumb to the fervid oratory of the impassioned young man is Deacon Allen:

At last the great day came—the great night.

In some way, perhaps by the growing mass of rushing emotion set in action by some deep-going phrase, or perhaps by some interior slow weakening of stubborn will, Deacon Allen gave way; and when the preacher called for penitents, the old man struggled to his feet, his seamed, weather-beaten face full of grotesque movement. He broke out:

"Brethren, pray for me; I'm a miserable sinner. I want to confess my sins—here—before ye all." He broke into sobbing terrible to hear. "My heart is made—flesh again—by the blessed power of Christ * *

He struggled to get his voice. One or two cried, "Praise God!" but most of them sat silent, awed into immobility.

The old man walked up the aisle. "I've been rebellious—and now I want to shake hands with you all—and I ask your prayers." He bent down and thrust his hand to Marsden, his enemy, while the tears streamed down his face.

Marsden turned white with a sort of fear, but he rose awkwardly and grasped the outstretched hand, and at the touch of palms every soul rose as if by electric shock. "Amens!" burst forth. The preacher began a fervent prayer, and came down toward the grizzled, weeping old men, and they all embraced, while some old lady with sweet quavering voice raised a triumphal hymn, in which all joined, and found grateful relief from their emotional tension.

Allen turned to Mattie and his wife. "My boy—send for him—Herman."

It seemed as if the people could not go away. The dingy little schoolhouse was like unto the shining temple of God's grace, and the regenerated seemed to fear that to go home might become a return to hate and strife. So they clung around the young preacher and would not let him go.

Of the others, the "Owner of the Mill Farm" and "Before the Low Green Door," touch on the eternal enigma, but one cannot help realizing how Miss Wilkins' pen would have transformed and illuminated the latter tale, though it has its own deep significance as stated in these pages.

C.

LATE VERSE

Sonnet.

That fiction in thy face is not a blush,
Do I not know thy glowing beauty well?
'Tis passion's rosy herald, as I crush
The ripe grapes of thy lips, and doth foretell
A richer vintage than did ever crown
Bacchante's brightest beaker, though that flood
Hath often lit with laughter sorrow's frown,
It never lent such longings to my blood.

Thy kisses shake my pulses, till my heart,
Lured by the murmuring music in thy veins,
Panteth with passion's painless pangs for thee;
Who taught thy lips to link with such sweet art,
These soul-ensnaring and flesh-fettering chains,
Thy tongue this soft Circean sorcery?
—Louis A. Robertson.

Quatrains of Idleness.

When angels walk across the sky
On God-sent errands, near or far,
To keep their golden sandals dry,
They merely step from star to star!

There is a grove where every breeze
Is made of tender lovers' sighs,
And kisses blossom on the trees,
And every leaf has loving eyes.

The magic gardens of the night
I know are very, very far;
Because their dews are tears of light
Shed by a mourning widowed star.

If it had been my lot to be
A moon to light the summer air,
I think you would have been the sea—
I would have seen my image there!

You must have climbed the sky last night,
And reached the moon and sat you there,
And bathed your soul in silver light—
So pure you look, so white and fair!

The moon must be a well profound
Whence flow the floods of limpid beams
That, as they spill upon the ground,
Make bathing-pools for souls of dreams!

If all the stars should fall some night
Upon a beach where I might be,
I'd build with them a road of light
For you to walk across the sea!

The moon is but an icy jar
Where angels cool their wine, I think.
In lieu of cups each has his star
To use in case he has to drink.
—Edwin Lefevre, in The Chap Book.

Bank Stock paper relieves, strengthens and saves the sight. Made in five different qualities. The Mysell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay street.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

Nervous headaches from over-fatigue and exposure to the sun are quickly dispelled by Murray & Lanman's Florida Water. Dip a handkerchief in a mixture of equal parts of cold water and Florida Water and bind it tightly around the temples. Pour some of the pure perfume on another handkerchief and apply it to the nostrils. Lie down for a quarter of an hour. This is safer and better than drugs.

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co, Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from ten drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address:

F. J. CHENEY & Co., Toledo, O.

Sold by druggists, 75c.

The Choir Invisible

By JAMES LANE ALLEN

Cloth, $1.50

If you have not read the most popular novel of the season, do not let it pass any longer. There have been sold thirty-five thousand copies in about two months of

The Choir Invisible

Yet it is no ephermeral sky-rocket in the literary sky. It is the work of a man whom the critics place (see the "Boston Evening Transcript," May 8, '97) as "one of the first of our novelists to-day," and is, according to the "Chicago Tribune," "the longest, strongest, and most beautiful of Mr. Allen's novels."

Then, too, if you are at all interested in the history of your country, you should by all means read

The Choir Invisible

"It is American to the very core," the "Outlook" says, and it gives a picture of life in the period just following the Revolution, out in the frontier districts, which makes the conditions of society then as plain to us as those among which we move to-day. "No more thoroughly original and typical American work has appeared in many days," says the "New York Times."

The Choir Invisible

should be read by every one who is making any study of style with a view either to teaching or to writing English. Miss Gilder, editor of the "Critic," writes: "What impresses one most * * * is the author's marvelous power of drawing word-pictures. * * * Mr. Allen's descriptions of nature are genuine poetry of form and color."

It is praised at home and abroad. The London "Academy" calls it "a book to read, and a book to keep after reading * * * a fine achievement." Why not add to your library as the cream of the season's stream of fiction

The Choir Invisible

By JAMES LANE ALLEN

Cloth, 12mo., $1.50

PUBLISHED BY

The Macmillan Company

66 Fifth Avenue, New York

ALL THE WEALTH OF THE KLONDYKE
CANNOT BUY A .....

SALAD DRESSING
EQUAL TO DURKEE'S

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS THE STANDARD!

PACIFIC COAST AGENTS
Sherwood & Sherwood
SAN FRANCISCO
PORTLAND LOS ANGELES

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA ELECTRICAL WORKS
409 MARKET STREET

Bids for Concessions and Privileges in Yosemite Valley.

OFFICE OF THE YOSEMITE COMMISSIONERS,
San Francisco, August 10, 1897.

In accordance with Rule XXXIV of the Rules and Regulations governing Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove, adopted July 13, 1896, sealed bids are hereby invited for the following concessions and privileges in the Yosemite grant, for the year beginning November 1, 1897, and ending October 31, 1898, viz.:

First—For keeping a livery stable and conducting a general livery business in the Valley, and also for the rental of the Royal Arch Farm and Stables.

Second—For rental of stable and coachhouse on Georgia Avenue (stage headquarters).

Third—For rental of hotel, out-buildings and grounds at Glacier Point, and privilege of conducting a hotel business at that point.

Fourth—For rental of store building and privilege of conducting a general merchandise business in the Valley.

Bids must be presented to the Secretary on or before Monday, October 12, 1897, at 12 o'clock m., at the office of the Commissioners, San Francisco.

Bids must be accompanied by sufficient guarantee that contract shall be carried out by bidders to the satisfaction of the Commissioners. The Commissioners reserve the right to reject any and all bids.

JOHN F. SHEEHAN,
Secretary and Treasurer.
Room 25, Tenth Floor, Mills Building, San Francisco.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Miss Adie's Boarding and Day School

2117 California street. English, French and German. Calisthenics and Dancing. Kindergarten in connection with the school. Reopens August 2, 1897.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

Trinity School, Accredited

3300 Washington street, S. F. Christmas term August 2, 1897. Prepares for College, University, and Business. Rev. Dr. E. B. Spaulding, Rector.

"FIGHTING PHIL"

How Sheridan Led His Forces at Five Forks.

Despite the strictures of Ambrose Bierce on the too reverential attitude of General Porter to his chief, General U. S. Grant, the series of papers comprising "Campaigning with Grant," in the "Century," have made entertaining reading. The point of view has been personal and one has gathered from the narrative a vivid idea of the great Commander's individuality and the impression it made on his subordinates and contemporaries. It is interesting to know how an important individual is viewed by his own household, for its members have the advantage of close perspective and realize the man as he is. Besides Grant, one learns much in these memoirs of Sherman and Sheridan. There is a spirited description of the latter's manner in the battle of Five Forks, which the General, not only directed, but led at the head of his men.

Receiving a sudden and heavy fire, the skirmish line halted and seemed to waver. Seeing this, Sheridan immediately put spurs to his horse and dashing along in the front of the line of battle, shouted words of encouragement, saying something cheering to every regiment. "Come on, men," he cried. "Go at 'em with a will. Move on at a clean jump, or you'll not catch one of 'em. They're all getting ready to run now, and if you don't get on to them in five minutes they'll every one get away from you! Now go for them!"

Just then a man on the skirmish line was struck in the neck; the blood spurting as if the jugular vein was cut. "I'm killed!" he cried, and dropped to the ground. "You're not a bit hurt," cried Sheridan. "Pick up your gun, man, and move right on to the front." The effect of these words was so great that the poor fellow snatched up his musket and rushed forward a dozen paces before he fell, never to rise again.

As the battle continued and the fire and confusion deepened, Sheridan all the time was dashing from one point of the line to another, waving his flag, which he had taken from a sergeant, shaking his fist, encouraging, entreating, threatening, praying, swearing, the true personification of chivalry, the very incarnation of battle. When the lines with fixed bayonets and a rousing cheer, dashed over the earthworks, sweeping everything before them, Sheridan spurred his famous horse Rienzi up to the angle, and with a bound went over the earthworks and landed among a line of prisoners who had thrown down their arms and were crouching close under the breastworks. Some of them called out: "Whah do you want us all to go?" Then Sheridan's rage turned to humor and he had a running talk with the "Johnnies" as they filed past. "Go right over there," he said, pointing to the rear. "Get right along, now. Oh, drop your guns; you'll never need them any more. You'll all be safe over there. Are there any more of you? We want every one of you fellows."

An orderly here came up to Sheridan, saluted and said: "Colonel Forsyth of your staff is killed, sir." "It's no such thing," cried Sheridan. "I don't believe a word of it. You'll find Forsyth's all right." Ten minutes later Forsyth rode up. He had been mistaken for General Winthrop, who had fallen in the assault. Sheridan did not even seem surprised when he saw Forsyth, and merely said: "There, I told you so." A peculiar trait of Sheridan's character which never allowed him to be disturbed by camp rumors, however disastrous.

In the battle of Five Forks Sheridan fought one of the most interesting tactical battles of the war, admirable in conception, brilliant in execution, strikingly dramatic in its incidents, and productive of extremely important results, and throughout all his own personal bravery and daring was everywhere conspicuous. In speaking of his remarkable energy, General Porter remarked of Sheridan that he though he had exposed himself in a manner hardly justifiable on the part of a commander of such an important movement. Sheridan's reply gave what seems to be the true key to his uniform success on the field. "I have never in my life taken a command into battle," he said, "and had the slightest desire to come out alive unless I won."

When Grant received the news of the Five Forks victory he was sitting with most of his staff about him before a blazing campfire. He wore his blue cavalry overcoat, and the ever-present cigar was in his mouth. When the word arrived, all but the imperturbable General-in-Chief were on their feet in a moment giving vent to boisterous demonstrations of joy. For some minutes there was a bewildering state of excitement, and officers fell to grasping hands, shouting and hugging each other like schoolboys. General, then Colonel Porter, who bore the news, rushed up to Grant and clapped him on the back to the chief's no little astonishment, and to the evident amusement of those about. Grant received the message with his familiar complacency and as might have been expected, asked his usual question: "How many prisoners have been taken?"

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

DOINGS AT NEWPORT

Mrs. Potter Palmer's Social Success and Mrs. Astor's Dinners.

When Mrs. Potter Palmer took a cottage at Newport last summer she achieved quite a favorable impression. In fact, she made her way with typical Western energy, into the very centre of society and closed the season with a ball, the memory of which still liveth. This triumph was received by Chicago with much relief, and now that Mrs. Palmer has again asserted herself the porcine burg is again elated. This recognition is a tribute to Mrs. Palmer's managerial resources. Last season her guest of honor was Miss Julia Dent Grant, the lovely daughter of Colonel Fred Grant, an attraction sufficiently strong to call out each and every notable worth having. This year Mrs. Palmer's cards are the Earl and Countess of Aberdeen, and at the bal poudre shortly to be given at Arleigh, the vice regal pair will likely make a profound impression. Arleigh is the Newport cottage of the Palmers—the property of the Pratts. It is a finely built villa, with hanging vines on the veranda and evergreen plants on the front lawn. Invitations to the ball are already the sources of much anxious conjecture—so firmly are the Palmers holding Newport. And why not? It is right enough when you pause to consider. Real royalty—the Infanta Eulalia—Spanish royalty at that—has come to Mrs. Palmer—why should not the descendants of ferrymen and fur dealers?

The Palmer ball will not end the Newport season—there are to be a couple of very smart weddings—notably the Brown-Dresser affair. The bride is Miss Natalie Dresser—and the groom Mr. John Brown—plain John Brown, but with a bank account of $15,000,000. The handsomest girl at Newport is generally conceded to be Miss Elsie Hoffman. She is a tall, brilliant brunette, with jet black hair and a superb complexion. Miss Julia Dent Grant is noted everywhere for her fine carriage and unusual height. Miss Katharine Duer, whose sister is a poetess, is another brilliant brunette with a dash and style said to be something bewildering. Miss Duer will be remembered as one of Conseulo Vanderbilt's bridesmaids. Miss Virginia Fair is pronounced one of the athletic girls, while Miss Struthers of Philadelphia is a typical Gibson girl, with a complexion like the rose leaf. The only debutante of the season has been Miss Goelet, niece of the late Ogden Goelet. She is a pretty young woman and charming as well. The dowager Mrs. Astor is still in the lead with her dignified dinners. These funeral spreads are really impressive—the very summit of epicurean magnificence and superlative dullness. One feels after a function of this character like Prince Luigi, on Mt. St. Elias—cold but important. However, in dinned-giving lies Mrs. Astor's peculiar, if rather ponderous, faculty. In direct contrast to it are the jolly dining parties to which the John Jacob Astors treat their friends on the Nourmahal.

Newport picnics are elaborate affairs, full of punctilious preciseness. The merry-makers set forth on gaily-painted drags, inside of which are the liveried attendants looking after the wines, the silver plates and the trifles to eat thereon. The luncheon is generally spread at Vancluse, a magnificent deserted place about five miles from Newport. It is a house with a history an age of a century and is the property of Barclay Hazard, now in California. When the spread is finished, and the plate and the flunkies stowed away, the gaily-dressed crowd climbs to the top of the traps and with the blowing of horns roll back into Newport. The buckboard is rather in vogue, but a much lighter and more fanciful affair than the wagon of that name in use at Bar Harbor. In Newport it is yellow and shiny, with a narrow seat for the tiger behind. Mr. Palmer uses one of these when he drives to the landing or the telegraph office. The young Mr. Palmers ride in it also, but they prefer bathing to anything else, and after that golfing or sailing.

Tattaugraphing, commonly called tattooing, is again a fad of the time, and on many an aristocratic back and arm have appeared of late designs both wonderful and strange. A great number of European royalties bear curious devices, notably Princess Waldemar of Denmark, who has a crown and anchor worked upon her left arm. Grand Duke Alexis of Russia and the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha are both more or less elaborately hieroglyphed, and also is the Duke of York. The young Earl of Craven, who married Mrs. Bradley-Martin, carries his coat of arms upon his back, and Lady Randolph Churchill has a snake with its tail in its mouth just above her wrist. At least, I am so told. In this country, tattooing is not as prevalent as it is in Europe. Lombroso says it is a criminal tendency, and also an indication of latent insanity, but this is not likely the reason. More likely it's because there have yet been no great ones to set the practice. The fad is general among the women rather so than with men, and the designs in favor are many and varied. Some of them are crests, others flower designs, initials and photographs. A pretty conceit is a ladder upon which cupids are climbing. A large idea is that of a New York society man, who has a big American eagle with wings outstretched, almost entirely covering his back. In San Francisco there are few, barring the soldiers and sailors who are in line with the Eastern and European notables in the cult of the tattoo. But there are some rather striking designs on different well-known cuticles, principally among the bohemian element.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. bottle.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters

"GOLD SEAL"
"BADGER"
"PIONEER"
Rubber Goods
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION
GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.
MANUFACTURER OF
OIL CLOTHING
R. H. PEASE
Vice-President and Manager
573-575-577-579 Market Street
SAN FRANCISCO
73-75 First Street, Portland, Or.

SOHMER PIANOS
BYRON MAUZY
AGENT
308-314 Post Street, S. F.

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

BALDWIN THEATRE — AL HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS

Beginning Monday, September 13th

WM. H. CRANE

And his Admirable Company, direction of JOS. BROOKS presenting

"A Fool of Fortune!"

By Martha Morton

September 20th, Mr. Crane in "A Virginia Courtship"

Columbia Theatre

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO. LESSEES AND MANAGERS

Next Monday, September 13th, Second and Last Week
Charles H. Yale's Fairy Spectacle

The Twelve Temptations

With its endless array of Scenery, Ballets, Specialties and Premiers
Forming in its entirety a show for the masses!
September 20th, THE FRAWLEY CO.

Orpheum

O'FARRELL STREET, BETWEEN STOCKTON AND POWELL

Week commencing Monday, Sept. 13

El Zobedie, direct from The Arcade, St. Petersburg Russia, a Phenomenal Equilibrist
George Evans, the Honey-Boy
The Graceful Aerial Artiste, Adrienne Ancion
Return, by request, Fox & Allen, in the Flat Next Door
Great success of Van Aucken, McPhee & Hill
Barton & Ashley, Leola Mitchell, and Stanley Whiting
New selections by the Knaben-Kapelle

Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House

MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager

Commencing Monday, September 13th
Sixth Week of the Grand Opera Season under the direction of Mr. Gustav Hinrichs
Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday, Thomas' Romantic Opera, MIGNON
Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, Gounod's Immortal Opera, FAUST
Reappearance of the Favorite Prima Donna
Miss Tillie Salinger
Next week: Lohengrin! The Flying Dutchman
In preparation: The Huguenots

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : : : : : Manager

Prices, 50, 35, 25, 15c. Including Reserved Seat
Week of September 13th, with usual Saturday Matinee
FOR ANOTHER WEEK!
The enormous demand for seats compels the management to continue for another week

THE FIRST BORN

To be preceded by H. Grattan Donnelly's Domestic Drama, An American Girl
Presented by an intelligent and capable interpreting cast
Have your seats Reserved: Phone Black 1106

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last performances of Frank Gassaway's Elaborate Military Drama, The Dandy Fifth Commencing Monday, September 13th, the Great Comedy-Drama by Bertram & Willard

THE ENGINEER

A Fourth-of-July Celebration in Southwest Missouri!
The Plumberville Comic Band!
The Great Ore Mill Scene!
Mechanical Effects, Comedy and Specialties!
Evg. Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

SHERMAN, CLAY & CO. HALL

223 Sutter Street

This Saturday Afternoon at three o'clock

PIANO RECITAL

BY

MAY LUCINE POTVIN

OF CHICAGO

Admission, including Reserved Seat, $1.00
General Admission, 50 cents

Engraved Visiting Cards
STYLE HAS CHANGED
HARTWELL, MITCHELL & WILLIS
Successors to Dodge Bros.
STATIONERS, ENGRAVERS, BOOKSELLERS
107 Montgomery and 225 Post Street

TURF TOPICS

Futurity Winner of 1897—Galtee More Wins the Leger and a Triple Crown.

In this issue is presented a striking photograph of Messrs L. S. and W. P. Thompson's filly L'Alouette, the winner of the Futurity Stakes at Sheepshead Bay on August 24th. The picture was taken in front of the judges' stand just as the jockeys were about to dismount for weighing-in after the race. Unfortunately the names of the other horses that appear in the picture have not been supplied, and only the winner can therefore be identified. She is evidently as breedy and racy looking as she has been described, and it is certainly a matter for regret that her breeders and owners should have decided to dispose of their stud, more especially as they have succeeded in breeding two Futurity winners, Requital and L'Alouette, in the last three years. It takes a rare good youngster to win a Futurity, but at the same time there is much in the argument, often put forward of late, that the proper destination of so large a stake, the most valuable on the American turf, would be as a prize for older horses. Many crack two-year-olds fail to train on and mature into animals that assist in improving the breed of horses, the true aim and end of all turf policy.

The State Fair racing, which opened this week, is bringing out fairly good fields, both in the running and trotting events, and the class of horses is quite up to the usual standard. The gallopers are most in favor, and save for two or three recent arrivals from the East consist of well-known performers on this coast. Nothing has so far occurred calling for extended remarks.

Everything points to a better season of racing at Ingleside and Oakland in 1897-8 than we have ever had, and owners should carefully study the lists of stakes published for both tracks. The first series of Oakland events close on September 20th, and the first of the Ingleside list on October 15th. Racing will commence on the latter track, the opening day being November 1st. Several stables belonging to Eastern owners who strive to have only good animals, and have yet to visit California, are expected to put in an appearance, and there is little doubt that pretty nearly all of those who have previously campaigned on our shores will resume their efforts to capture some California gold under the wire.

On Wednesday last the St. Leger Stakes—2 miles, 6 furlongs, 132 yards—was run at Doncaster and won by Mr. J. Gubbins' colt Galtee More, Lord Rosebery's filly Chelandry second, and Mr. James R. Keene's American-bred colt St. Cloud third.

The result of the race has been a foregone conclusion since the Derby was won by Mr. Gubbins' horse, who has thus secured the triple crown as the winner of the Two Thousand Guineas, the Derby and St. Leger, which entitles him to rank amongst the greatest of all thoroughbreds. This feat has become more frequent of accomplishment in recent years, for since imp. Ormonde did the trick in 1886 Common, Isinglass, and now Galtee More have followed in his footsteps. Previously the intervals between such striking successes had been much longer.

From the breeding point of view it should be noted that the first and second in the race are by sons of Bend Or, and that imp. Goldfinch and imp. Candlemas, the sires of the second and third, are now in the stud at Rancho del Paso in this State.

What is now denominated the "Scully plan" for ridding the turf of worthless horses, as referred to in previous notes, was inaugurated at Newport, Ky., on August 28th, and a horse called Simple Jack, the property of Henry McDaniels, achieved pioneer honors by winning the race and so falling into the hands of the Queen City Jockey Club for confiscation. It is not easy to see how so fanciful and far-fetched a scheme can have any practical result, glad as one may be to welcome any plan for reducing the immense number of worthless wretches that are kept in training to the detriment of the turf and the impoverishment of their owners.

BENEDICT.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms, banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

DR. H. G. YOUNG—Bridges and teeth without plates a specialty. 1841 Polk street.

LA GALLIENNE'S SUIT

Certain Sartorial Disadvantages of the Poetical Reputation.

M. Le Gallienne has his own ideas about dress, says L. F. Austin in the London Sketch. Evidently he believes that the poet, above all men, should be clad in a manner somewhat suggestive of his calling and profession and has gone so far as to ridicule and condemn the signs of convention that compel a man to wear a dress suit. So M. Le Gallienne compromises. Says he: "I wear black knickerbockers simply because that is my taste in clothes—or rather, a compromise between my taste and the social convention. What man with any sense of beauty can approve the ridiculous code which rules our garments? Look at your evening dress. So far as grace of form is concerned, you might as well go out to dinner in a piece of iron piping! You are not allowed to wear court dress, which would at least distinguish you from the waiter. You stick a fence around your neck and call it a collar. There is no individuality, no freedom, no true harmony—nothing but a stereotyped rigidity, as if man were cut out of cardboard!"

But the poet cannot burst these bonds of convention, for all that. Because the code has special rigors for him. Let him wear his neck free and flowing, and he is charged with aping Byron. Let him have hair which is not cropped close to his head, after the fashion of Portland or Piccadilly, and whenever he rides through the wood of newspaper gossip, some aspiring twig tries to snatch him up like Absalom!

Then he goes on to say the poet is dogged by a cynical world. The poor man is really driven to disguise himself. "I am thinking of giving out that my hair is a wig. Stay—there's another bard who wears a wig. The Press would say I was aping him! But I have had some photographs taken with the idea that they may conceal, or, at any rate, subdue, my personality."

Thereat he showed the interviewer a picture of himself in the pose of an early Victorian statesman. "If I publish this, some American paper will come out with headlines—'Richard Le Gallienne's Latest Freak. Thinks he is Dan O'Connell.' Here's another; does it remind you of anybody?"

"Seems to resemble a poetess of bygone renown," the interviewer said.

"Just so. More head-lines: 'Le Gallienne Mimics the Illustrious Dead. Is He Jealous of Eliza Cook?' So, you see, the poet is not allowed to be himself; and if, in that plastic mood one has at the photographer's, he should catch an impression of Disraeli, Darwin, or any other type of beauty, he is promptly accused of designs upon the laurels of the great departed! Here's a picture of me and the bicycle. What do you suppose will be said of that?"

"Le Gallienne cycles up Parnassus. Guesses he is geared to Walt Whitman."

Old Age.

It may be, when this city of the nine gates
  Is broken down by ruinous old age,
  And no one upon any pilgrimage
Comes knocking, no one for an audience waits,
And no bright foraying troops of banuit moods
  Ride out on the brave folly of any quest,
  But weariness, the restless shadow of rest,
Hoveringly upon the city broods;
It may be, then, that those remembering
  And sleepless watchers on the crumbling towers
Shall lose the count of the disastrous hours
Which God may have grown tired of reckoning.

—ARTHUR SYMONS, in The Athenaeum.

Epitaphium Citharistrae.

Stand not uttering sedately
  Trite oblivious praise above her!
Rather say you saw her lately
  Lightly kissing her last lover.
Whisper not, "There is a reason
  Why we bring her no white blossom":
Since the snowy bloom s in season
  Strow it on her sleeping bosom:
Oh, for it would be a pity
  To o'erpraise her, or to flout her:
She was wild and sweet and witty—
  Let's not say dull things about her.

—VICTOR PLARR.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, S. E. corner Grant Avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Tel. 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

Bookkeepers, students, and business men generally use Bank Stock paper. It preserves the sight. The Mysell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay st.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE
SAME THUS
Stowe & Hartshorn
ON LABEL AND SET THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

ANDES SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 1st day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 44) of Ten Cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the offices of the company, rooms 20-22 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 4th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 25th day of October, 1897, at 1 o'clock p.m., to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOHN W. TWIGGS, Secretary.

Office, rooms 20-22, Nevada Block, 509 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING COMPANY—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey Co., Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 18th day of August, 1897, an assessment (No. 113) of twenty cents (20c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 14, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 22d day of September, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday the 12th day of October, 1897, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

E. L. PARKER, Secretary.

Office, room 14, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—In the matter of the application of the SITES SANDSTONE COMPANY (a corporation) to dissolve: Notice is hereby given that the Sites Sandstone Company, a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, has presented to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco an application praying to be allowed to disincorporate and dissolve, and that Monday the 11th day of October, A. D. 1897, at 10 o'clock a.m. of said day, has been appointed as the time, and the Courtroom of Department No. 7 of said Superior Court, New City Hall, San Francisco, California, as the place, at which said application is to be heard.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said Superior Court this 8th day of September, A. D. 1897.

C. F. CURRY, Clerk.

By Joseph Riordan, Deputy Clerk.

VAN NESS & REDMAN, Att'ys for Petitioners.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of JOHANNES A. H. STOCKFLETH, deceased—Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, at room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. A. C. FREESE, Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, August 24, 1897.

J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Alta Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 57
Amount per share, 10 cents
Levied Sept. 3, 1897
Delinquent in office Oct. 6, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Oct. 27, 1897

J. E. JACOBUS, Secretary.

Office, room 33, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

The Lion Fire Insurance Co. Limited of London. Total Cash Assets in United States, $885,797.09

The Imperial Insurance Co. Limited of London Established on Pacific Coast in 1852

WM. J. LANDERS, Resident Manager

PACIFIC COAST BRANCH

205-207 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.

UNDERTAKERS

641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb

Telephone Main 43

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC

14 Montgomery St., S. F

Telephone 301

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

---

THE STATE FAIR
1897
SEPT. 6TH TO 18TH
AT SACRAMENTO
CALIFORNIA'S ANNUAL EXHIBITION
Of Agricultural, Mechanical and Industrial Products
12 DAYS RACING.
GRAND MUSICAL CONCERTS
EXCURSION RATES ON ALL RAIL ROADS.

---

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. September 3, 8, 13, 18. 25, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. Septt. 3, 8. 13, 18, 25, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Stmr. Pomona, 2 p.m. September 1, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 27; October 1, 5, 9, 13, 18, 22, 26, 30; November 3, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 29.

For Newport, Los Angeles and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Sept. 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, Redondo--Los Angeles--and Newport, at 11 a.m. Sept. 5, 9, 13, 17, 21, 25, 29 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, Stmr. Orizaba, 10 a.m. the 2d each month.

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

---

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Sept. 7, 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.

S. S. "Mariposa," for Australia, Thursday, Sept. 16, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO., General Agents

---

In photo-engraving, as in other lines of trade, you sometimes pay superior prices for inferior work. We guarantee superior work at moderate prices.

WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
24 MONTGOMERY STREET

---

THE LATEST STYLES IN
CHOICE WOOLENS
H. S. BRIDGE & CO.
Merchant Tailors
623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel
Bicycle and Golf Suits

---

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD LANE

LANE & LANE
Attorneys and Counselors
Room 202
Crocker Building, San Francisco

---

---

BAJA CALIFORNIA
DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

---

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

---

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

---

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bath houses, billiard tables, brewers, book binders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.
TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST
BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

---

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Guarantee Capital and Surplus | - | $2,040,201 66 |
| Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash | - | 1,000,000 00 |
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | 27,730,247 45 |

OFFICERS

President, B. A BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS

B. A Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | $22,885,377 |
| Paid Up Capital and Surplus | - | 1,594,503 |

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS

GEORGE W. BEAVER — ROBERT WATT
THOMAS MAGEE — GEO. C. BOARDMAN
W. C. B. DE FREMERY — DANIEL E. MARTIN
ALBERT MILLER — GEO TASHEIRA
E B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee

California Safe Deposit and Trust Co.

Cor. California and Montgomery Sts.

Capital Fully Paid - - One Million Dollars

Transacts a general banking business and allows interest on deposits, payable on demand or after notice.

Acts as Executor, Administrator and Trustee under wills, or in any other trust capacity. Wills are drawn by the Company's Attorneys and are taken care of without charge. Safe Deposit Boxes to rent at prices from $5 per annum upward, according to size, and valuables of all kinds are stored at low rates.

DIRECTORS: J. D. FRY, HENRY WILLIAMS, I. G. WICKERSHAM, JACOB C. JOHNSON, JAMES TREADWELL, F. W. TOUGEE, HENRY F. FORTMANN, R. B. WALLACE, R. D. FRY, A. D. SHARON, J. DALZELL BROWN.

OFFICERS: J. D. FRY, PRES.; HENRY WILLIAMS, VICE-PRES; R. D. FRY, SECOND VICE-PRES; J. DALZELL BROWN, SEC. AND TREAS.; E. E. SHOTWELL, ASST. SEC.; GUNNISON, BOOTH & BARTNETT, ATTORNEYS.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid Up Capital . . . | $250,000 |
| Cash Reserve Fund . . . | 25,000 |

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary.
A. J. CARMANY, Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1720

Capital Paid Up, $5,000,000 Assets, $21,584,115
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

B. J. SMITH, Assistant Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
301 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFIEST, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

NEW STORIES R-T OLD

When General Robert Toombs of Georgia was young, he organized a regiment and joined General Scott, who was then directing a campaign against the Florida Indians. Toombs was noted for self-confidence and audacity, but was at that time without military training. It is not surprising that he failed to realize the wisdom of the cautious tactics of General Scott, who held back from attacking the Indians in positions of their own choosing. The bold Georgian fumed and fretted at the delay, and finally, one night dashed into the General's tent where the latter was entertaining a crowd of Colonels and Majors, and they all looked up as Toombs entered. He was a magnificent man, the handsomest American of his generation, and he gazed defiantly at Scott, who asked him to sit down. "General Scott," said Toombs in a stern tone, "I desire to know whether the army will march against the enemy within the next few days." "I am not ready yet to answer that question," replied the general, with a smile. "Then, sir," continued the youthful captain, "I will notify you that unless the army marches tomorrow I propose to go forward with my company into the very heart of the Indian territory!" To the astonishment of the officers, who expected a wiltering rebuke, Scott never changed his genial expression. "Very well, captain," was his quiet answer, in a soothing tone. "Very well, captain, use your own pleasure, by all means. Take your company to-morrow and march into the Indian country. We may follow you a few weeks later. But don't wait for us. Take your company and go ahead. Good night, captain!" Toombs blushed and withdrew. During the rest of the campaign he was the most obedient officer in the brigade.

In an article on the "Longest Reign," Mr. Justin McCarthy recalls an anecdote of Lord Brougham. At a dinner-party a lady once asked him who was the best speaker in the House of Lords. Brougham was silent for a moment, and then replied, "Lord Stanley, madam, is the second best." But a similar story is also told of Bismarck. At one of his Parliamentary soirees the Chancellor was asked by one of his guests which plenipotentiary who had attended the Congress of Berlin he deemed to be the best. "I don't know about the best," replied the Prince, with a humorous smile, "but I am quite certain that Lord Beaconsfield was at least the next best."

William Waldorf Astor recently entertained a company of aristocratic people at tea in his offices on the Thames embankment. The Duchess of St. Albans, the Duchess of Buckingham, Lord Iveagh, the Bradley-Martins, and other notables, including the Duchess of Cleveland, were present. Mr. Astor was showing the Duchess of Cleveland the principal features of the building, and pointed out with great pride the marble-and-malachite staircase which leads to the second floor. "Ah, yes," said her Grace, "it is very fine—far finer than mine at Battle Abbey, where the steps are so dreadfully spoiled by the marks left by the spurs of the old knights!"

A country laird bequeathed his property in equal shares to his two sons, who, after his death, continued to live most contentedly together for many years. At last, however, one of them said to the other, "Tam, we're getting to be auld men; you tak' a wife, and when I die you'll get my share o' the land." "Na, na, Jeems," said the other; "you're the youngest and the maist lively—you tak' a wife, and when I die you'll get my share, mon." "That's always the way wi' you, Tam," said the younger brother; "when there's any fash or trouble, I must tak' it all—you'll do naething."

A well-known Roman Catholic lady wrote to the Duke of Wellington asking for a subscription of one hundred pounds towards the restoration of a Roman Catholic church. The Duke replied—"Dear Lady X., I shall be happy to subscribe the sum you ask for to the admirable work in question. At the same time I may mention that I myself am about to undertake the restoration of the Protestant church at Strathfieldsays; and I have not the least doubt that you will assist me with a like sum. Only I think in that case no money need pass between us."

The King of Siam has a quaint humor, and though a most civilized person on the whole, occasionally develops tokens of orientalism. While in Rome recently, he went driving with King Humbert, and noticed that the various ecclesiastics and students who passed never saluted the King as other people did. He asked his royal host the reason. "They belong to the Vatican," replied the King. The Siamese monarch looked slyly at his companion and inquired, "Haven't you any gallows?"

Janet, with a flush, has just announced her engagement with the family chimney sweep broken. Her mistrees expostulated: "Why, Janet, I thought it was all settled!" "So it was, mum," said Janet, "but the fact is I saw him with a clean face for the first time last night, mum, and I can't marry him! You've no idea how ugly he is when he's washed, mum!"

The late Canovas de Castilar had a sharp wit. Montiro Rios, a prominent lawyer, had the courage to oppose him, and he remarked at a party in the palace at which his opponent was present: "Have you noticed, madam, those fine gloves that Montero Rios wears? The skin is of human bodies." "What!" retorted the lady, frightened. "Yes, madam, skin of his clients."

MATCHLESS IN EVERY FEATURE

THE CONSENSUS OF OPINION REGARDING

The Ladies' Grill-Room

..OF..

The Palace

Direct entrance from Market Street. Open until Midnight.

Hotel Rafael

SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Society Resort, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Climate Unexcelled!
Magnificent Scenery!
The Sanitarium of the Pacific Coast
Otis Elevators Electric Lights

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments

R. H. WARFIELD & CO.
Proprietors

Pacific Congress Springs

HOTEL

SANTA CRUZ MOUNTAINS
SANTA CLARA COUNTY

Remodeled and Under New Management

Only Two-and-a-half hours from San Francisco

6 miles from Los Gatos 10 miles from Santa Clara
12 miles from San Jose

For rates and printed matter, address
JOHN S. MATHESON, Manager.

The best people from everywhere, bent on business or pleasure, when in New York, stop at

The St. Denis

The cuisine and comforts of the hotel have become so well known that its name is now a household word in thousands of homes in this country and Europe

Central Location
Broadway and Eleventh Street
Opposite Grace Church
New York

Hotel Bella Vista

1001 PINE STREET

Elegant Furnishings and Apartments

DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED

MRS. A. F. TRACY.

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.

PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO

HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Butter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets

Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

THE SMOKER'S TIP

Have you a friend who a smoker is,
Tell him there is just out a Smoker's Tip
Which will prevent a cancer lip.

Mailed on receipt of three 2-cent stamps, by

ELASTIC TIP CO.

Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties

735 Market Street, S. F.

BOSTON CHICAGO

YEARS may come, and YEARS may go, but THE

CHICKERING PIANO

goes on forever

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents
16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

Ask Your Druggist and Take No Substitute

In 10c., 25c., 50c. and $1 bottles

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.

Price, One Dollar.

Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Beware of Imitations

This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea

Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.

208 California St., S. F.

For sale by all grocers

ANHEUSER BUSCH'S

Original Budweiser Beer

THE FINEST BEER IN AMERICA

THE E. G. LYONS CO., Agents
508-12 Jackson Street.

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS ELECTRICAL CO

523 Mission St., San Francisco

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company Pacific Coast
Baltimore Sole Agents

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

THE WAVE—SUPPLEMENT

MECHANICS' FAIR EDITION

San Francisco, September 11, 1897

The Thirtieth Industrial Exposition of the Mechanics Institute, largely illustrative of Home Industry and Pure Food.

The Mechanics' Fair of 1897, the thirtieth of a series of industrial expositions, compares most favorably with its predecessors, and seems to be endowed with merits that are likely to render it of much benefit to the trading and manufacturing interests on the one hand, and the general community on the other. The old Pavilion building, brightened up externally and internally a couple of months ago for the meetings of the Christian Endeavor Society, is a far more cheerful and attractive place for visitors than it was for many previous years, and the efforts of the trustees of the Mechanics' Institute to remove the worn and almost neglected look which the building had taken on have been well seconded by the exhibitors, who have as a general rule spared neither pains nor expense in making their stands not merely neat, but even elegant in structure and decoration. In fact, in some few instances the setting and display of exhibits are worthy of an international exposition.

The undertaking necessarily partakes to some extent of the nature of an old-time fair, and, thus, while the industrial and mechanical arts form the solid foundation of these annual exhibitions, scope is afforded for the lighter attractions which appeal to so large a proportion of the public. While, therefore, the student of mechanics, the importer, exporter, or dealer in manufactured articles can find much that will be of interest to him in his business, the pleasure-seeker, whether of tender years or more mature experience, can derive enjoyment and instruction from a visit to the overflowing aisles and galleries of the enormous building. By way of adding to the attractions, which are in position there, a nightly function of some sort or another is specially provided to amuse and edify the vast number of visitors that pour in through the doors on Larkin street.

It would not be practicable to accord in these columns full credit to all those who have been chiefly instrumental in contributing to the results of the Fair this year, but we can safely say that to Mr. Ernst A. Denicke, the President of the Mechanics' Institute, a large measure of praise is due. For the past two years he has occupied that position and by his efforts and tact the present success has been greatly brought about. In the work of organization Mr. Denicke has been well seconded by Professor E. P. Heald, who holds the important office of Recording Secretary.

F. P. HEALD

E. A. DENICKE

RODNEY KENDRICK

To meet the requirements of the times and to foster an important branch of trade, a subsidiary field of work has been added to the exposition this year. This is the Pure Food Exhibit, to which it will be found a large section is devoted, and nearly all the leading manufacturers and dealers in food articles, particularly those put up in special packages, are extensively represented in the Pavilion.

Judging by the considerable showing made by the manufacturers of stoves and ranges, the exhibition is of great advantage to those who have to make or deal in these useful adjuncts of a comfortable home, and which more than one exhibitor is particular to urge upon public attention are locally made and therefore to be preferred to goods which are produced beyond the borders of the State, thus requiring the purchase-money to be withdrawn from local circulation, which is not the case if the cost goes into the pockets of the artisan and store keeper who make and handle the goods here. Home production is therefore a loud slogan at the Fair, and one that the public are never tired of listening to.

To deal with all the interesting features of the exhibition in one week is not possible, but we are enabled to present many of the leading subjects with a series of illustrations in this supplement.

Before passing on to the individual exhibits, we must not omit to give credit to the management for their excellent musical arrangements, which are under the special direction of Mr. Rodney Kendrick, the chairman of the Music and Decoration Committee. The band is composed of picked artists under the leadership of Mr. W. B. Rogers, the well-known cornetist, who came here specially from New York for the purpose.

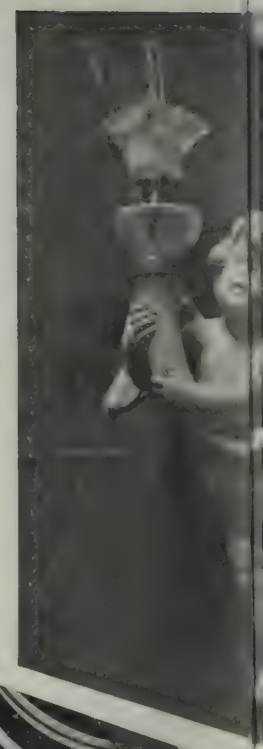
One of the best exhibits in the machinery department is that made by the Simonds Saw Co. of Marsh Steam pumps, which those who are interested in pumps should not fail to see during the coming week. They have five different pumps in operation, consisting of two boiler feeders, the smallest of which is used for a 20 H. P. boiler and the larger one having a capacity for 1,500 H. P. boiler. The deep well pump has no superior in its class and is used quite extensively in irrigating fruit lands in the Santa Clara and San Joaquin valleys. The tank pump also in operation is used for irrigating purposes, while the yacht pump as a boiler feeder for high pressure boilers is said to have no equal. Two of these are in use on the famous yacht Illide of New York which is the fastest yacht afloat. By a recent test in Chicago it was found that these pumps use only two-thirds as much fuel as the best duplex pump. Compressed air may be used for the running of these pumps as well as steam. The Simonds Saw Co. also manufacture air compressors, one of which is in operation in their exhibit; the same company's saw exhibit in the main hall is also one of the principal attractions of the Fair.

A CENTER PIECE FROM NATURE

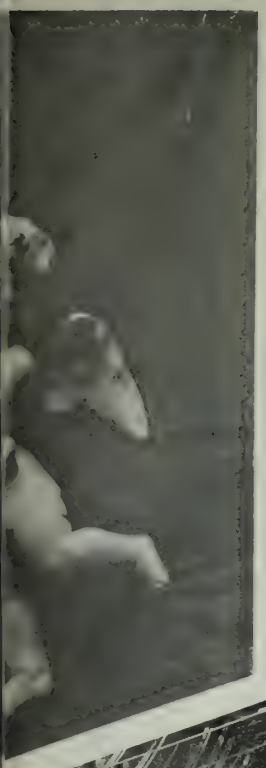
A specially interesting item of home industry is the exhibit of the California Art Glass Company, which includes the memorial window for the Maria Kip Orphanage produced by that firm, whose work is used extensively in many of the leading edifices in this State.

Among the many varied products of art and manufacture, Stoves are extensively exhibited and the S. & K. ranges of Steiger & Kerr, made here, are well worth inspection. Whether a plain range or a first-class six-hole, large oven model is desired, this firm of local manufacturers, who make a great point of being members of the Manufacturers' and Producers' Association of California, can show goods that are really serviceable, well finished and up to date.

The stand of Mangrum & Otter includes an extensive exhibit of Magee ranges and Peninsular steel ranges. Amongst their specialties elegant mantels and tile work call for notice by reason of the excellent quality of their make and the artistic designs employed. The firm's hot-air furnaces are also on show, and likewise exceedingly well-constructed with all up-to-date improvements.



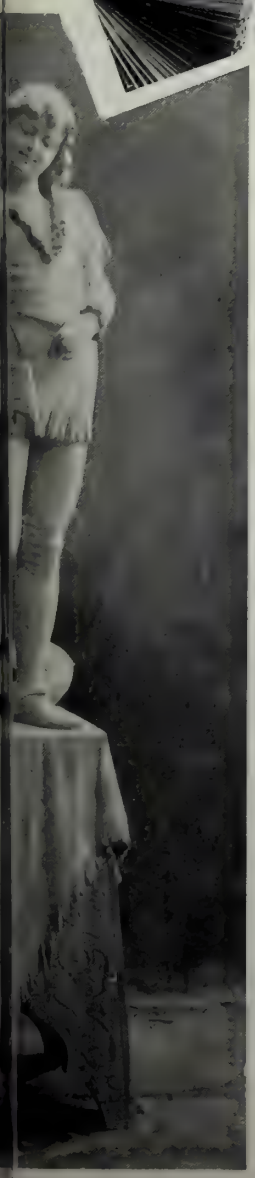
OLD GRIST MILL WHEAT COFFE

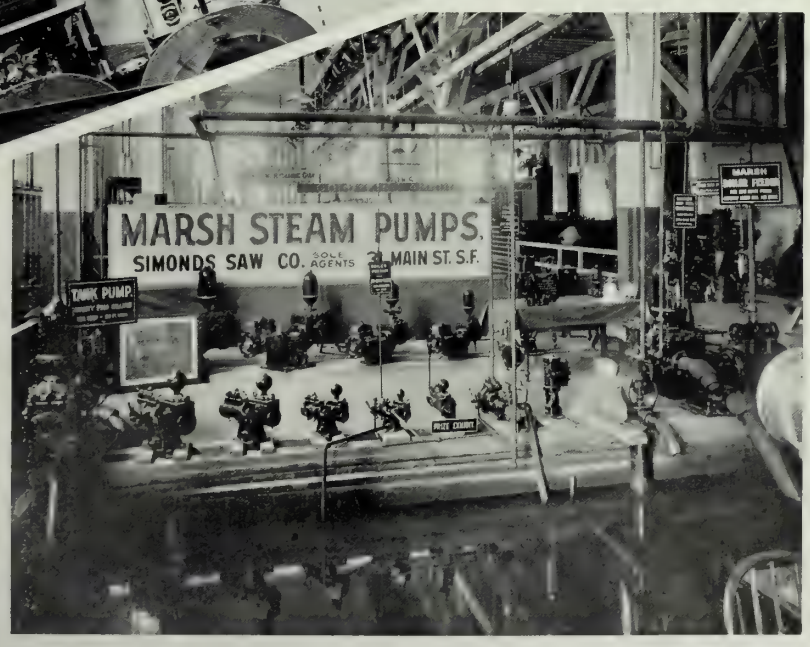


IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF PURE FOOD PRODUCTS
BIBO, NEWMAN & IKENBERG.

JOHN H. SPOHN

QUEEN LILY SOAP
S.F.C.





MARSH STEAM PUMPS.
SIMONDS SAW CO. SOLE AGENTS MAIN ST. S.F.
TANK PUMP.

QUEEN LILY SOAP
WHY BUY EASTERN SOAP WHEN YOU GET TWICE THE VALUE FOR YOUR MONEY HERE
NEW ENGLAND SOAP CO.

PAYOT, UPHAM & COMPANY.
THE KING OF TYPEWRITERS, THE NEW HAMMOND

E. & J. BURKE.
SHERWOOD

Messrs. N. Clark & Sons have a striking exhibit of their wares, consisting of every form of terra cotta work and high-class California stone, for which they are the general agents. With the growing demand for terra cotta in the construction of fine buildings this is another home industry that is satisfactorily developing.

The very complete display of Washburn & Roen in wire goods needs little more reference than is required to record the fact that it is the prize exhibit in that line, their manufactures being well calculated to maintain the standing and repute of California home industries.

J. E. GRANLY

The show made by the Sterling Cycle Works, represented on this Coast by A. C. Nichols & Co., 400-404 Battery St., is well worth seeing. Here are exhibited some fifteen different models of this famous wheel, and judged by the crowds that surround the booth the public approval of these is beyond question. The motto, "Built like a watch," has been well selected for the "Sterling." The makers are especially proud of the testimonial of Prof. R. C. Carpenter, of Cornell University, who says: "So far as the perfection of mechanical details and finish of the Sterling wheel are concerned, I can say safely that I have not seen anything equal to it."

The booth representing the Typewriter Department of Messrs. Payot, Upham & Co. is one of the prettiest in the Pavilion. Tastefully furnished and decorated, it contains a complete display of Typewriters, Mimeographs, Neostyles, Office and Typewriter Desks, and last but not least the new Model Hammond Typewriter. Those remembering the old Hammond of five or ten years ago would not recognize the latest machine. Its chief features are permanently perfect alignment and interchangeability of type, whereby forty-six different styles of type, including fourteen foreign languages, can be inserted at a moment's notice; the great advantage of being able to insert in the machine any width paper, and the great speed of 206 words a minute, a record which has never been surpassed. We understand one of these beautiful machines is to be given away as a first prize in a guessing competition at the close of the Fair. The second prize will be an Automatic Neostyle, value $50.00. The contestants have to guess the receipts of the Clearing House for the week ending Sept. 18th, 1897.

Sherwood & Sherwood have a large exhibit near the entrance, consisting of a number of their principal specialties in groceries, wines, liquors, Belfast ginger ale and mineral waters. The Crosse & Blackwell display with a background of the royal coat of arms is very tasteful. Occupying separate sections also are The James Schlitz Brewing Co., whose illuminated barrels, backed with pyramids of bottled beer and large stained glass transparency are always a center of interest. Other sections are composed of the manufactures of Curtice Bros. of New York, showing their Blue Label Tomato Ketchup, canned vegetables and preserved fruits; Schramsberg Vineyard, with fine California wines; E. & J. Burke, bottlers of Guinness' stout, Bass's ale, Irish and Scotch whiskies; Rosskam, Gerstle & Co., Philadelphia, Keystone Monogram and Old Saratoga whiskies; Durkee & Co., spices, extracts and salad dressing; Chalmers' transparent gelatine; J. & J. Colman of London mustard; Holbrook & Co.'s genuine Worcestershire sauce; Fry & Sons of Bristol cocoa and chocolate; Ross' royal Belfast ginger ale; Dewar's Old Highland whisky; Heublein's club cocktails; Meinhold & Heineman's cider; Henk's Waukesha water; Evans & Sons' India pale ale; Gooderham & Worts' Canadian whiskey. Altogether a collection of first-class articles greatly esteemed by connoisseurs or good housekeepers.

The tasteful erection of carved cherry wood and plate glass facing the music platform on the southeast is conceded to surpass any structural booth ever seen at the Fair. The transparent lettering in the surmounting turret informs us that it is "Tillman's." The exhibit comprises coffees, teas, spices, mustard, flavoring extracts, toilet waters and other specialties for which the firm of Tillman & Bendel is famous, all put up under the uniform brand of "Tillman's." Trophy baking powder shares the honors of the display. Attractive as the style of all the packages is, it is secondary to the intrinsic merits of the goods, while the handsome booth itself serves as an elegant frame to a striking picture.

The varied productions which are displayed by Bibo, Newman & Ikenberg, the well-known grocery firm, are an object lesson in the pure food line. Everything speaks for itself, and the representatives of the firm are prepared with every guarantee and assurance that each article is as good as is made.

How many people who have not only heard of, but like to cut pancakes, which have been made of Aunt Jemima's Flour, realize that this worthy colored lady is the subject of a biography, but if you look in upon the stand devoted to this production of the R. T. Davis Mill Co. of St. Joseph, Mo., you will be presented with a copy of her life history and see specimens of the product, which carried off the honors in its line at the great World's Fair. And of more practical importance still you can be served with her excellent pancakes red hot and as good as they make 'em.

A novel production on show at the Fair is the Old Grist Mill Wheat Coffee, a specialty of F. S. Greenlee & Co. of 203 Front street, which is manufactured by Cotter & Wrightington, of Boston. This article has been introduced as a substitute for the ordinary coffee and is said to be free from the deleterious qualities which make the coffee bean unwholesome for persons of bilious and nervous tendencies. At the same time the makers claim that Wheat Coffee is highly nutritive and tonic in its effects, as well as agreeable to the taste.

One of the most practical and seasonable exhibits is that of Smith's Cash Store. Perhaps no firm has fitted more Klondykers than this well-established house, and a division of their booth at the Pavilion is devoted to the display of miners' supplies. There is everything from evaporated potatoes for the inner man to great mackinaws for the extreme outer covering. Their Pure Food exhibit should not be without significance. Their jellies, jams, and candied goods are put up with a strict guaranty of purity, the label in every case saying just what the package contains. Doing business on a cash basis the firm claims to save a customer 20 per cent. and to use exceptional dispatch in executing orders, often a great point with travelers.

The exhibit made by the New England Soap Company of their Queen Lily Soap is really a marvel, the whole fixture being entirely constructed of that excellent product. But few persons know that San Francisco has so extensive a plant for the manufacture of soaps as that of this company. The outside walls of the soap house at the Fair are made entirely of cakes and blocks of Queen Lily and the roof alone contains over two tons of soap shingles, some fifteen tons of soap being used in forming the building. As a lady visitor was heard to remark, "You could tell it was soap with your eyes shut, for it all smells so nice and clean." The Queen Lily Soap is made from vegetable oils and borax, floats in water, and is very pleasant to the skin. The makers claim that it is superior to all other brands, local or Eastern, and being distinctly a home product there are good reasons beyond its own excellence why it should receive public patronage.

The dainty Cupid in carved wood which graces our page is from the art rooms of the P. Rossi Co., whose exhibit is among the finest at the Fair.

Another elegant piece of similar character to be seen in the art gallery is "The Little Page," an example of wood carving from the studio of M. Potte, and only one of many of the admirable works from this well known establishment.

E. P. Heald, Recording Secretary Mechanics' Institute, is President of Heald's Business College, an institution well known throughout the Pacific Coast for the past thiry-five years. Primarily a school for turning out accomplished business men and lads, a course is also provided in civil, mining and electrical engineering. There is in addition a department of assaying and mining, including blow-pipe analysis, mill construction, geology, chemistry and metallurgy. Navigation is among the other practical sciences taught at this institution. It will thus be seen that the work of Prof. Heald places him in full sympathy with the object and aims of the Mechanics' Institute and renders him a useful man on the Board of Trustees and as Recording Secretary.

EDGAR J. ARNOLD

The Mechanics' Fair owes much of its success to judicious and effective advertising, prominent in this line is Mr. Edgar John Arnold, one of the youngest and most successful exponents in this city of modern advertising systems. Mr. Arnold was born in London, England, in 1871—educated at Rugby—graduated from Kensington with high art honors—came out to the World's Fair to conduct some extensive advertising for English firms, and later was traveling advertising representative for "The Call." After a short visit to England he returned to the Coast and now holds the position of advertising representative for the largest grocery house west of New York—Messrs. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., of this city and Oakland. In carrying out his duties, Mr. Arnold employs artistic tone as an aid to effective wording—distinctive type and paper being adjuncts to his efforts, thus appealing to the brain through the eye. In these days advertising is a science requiring skill and education, and only men possessing these qualifications can succeed in the work. As one who is producing some of the most effective advertising on the Pacific Coast, we present Mr. Arnold's photograph in our special supplement.

A representative commercial traveler, well known on this Coast, is John C. Graney, General Export Agent for James Everard's extensive New York breweries. Noted for his genial character, as well as business ability in his line of work, his popularity extends to the mining districts, where he has acquired interests in some of the best gold prospects in California. Mr. Graney has been conspicuous at the Fair, and his features will be familiar to most of the visitors to the pavilion.

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 38 SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 18, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

CLAUS SPRECKELS

PRESIDENT OF THE SAN FRANCISCO AND SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY RAILROAD

Photo by Taber

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at THE WAVE Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address THE WAVE, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 18, 1897

CONTENTS

| | |
|---|---|
| Editorials | 2 |
| Things and People; by Boswell Jr. | 3 |
| Features of the State Fair | 4 |
| The World Abroad | 5 |
| Thomas on Tendencies; by F. N. | 5 |
| Thumb-Markings in Crime | 5 |
| "His Single Blessedness;" by Frank Norris | 6 |
| Sonnet to Austin Dobson by L. A. Robertson | 6 |
| Seventh Power of Europe | 6 |
| The State Fair at Sacramento; by Etc. Jr. | 7 |
| Life-Saving Stations Around the Harbor of the Golden Gate | 8-9 |
| In Society | 10 |
| The Theatres | 11 |
| Bohemia in London | 12 |
| The Frivolous Gyp | 12 |
| Crane in London | 13 |
| In the Current | 13 |
| Turf Topics; by Benedict | 14 |
| New Stories Re-Told | 16 |

THE OAKLAND WATERFRONT.

The litigation which involves the title to the Oakland water front has been at last decided by our State Supreme Court, and that tribunal has practically awarded to the Oakland Water Front Company all of the property in controversy which the city of Oakland was most anxious to recover. It is the general policy of The Wave to avoid discussing legal questions in controversy before our courts; but keeping strictly within this rule one may now, at least, define the unfairness and unwisdom of our sister city across the bay in this connection.

The position of Oakland in this legal controversy has not been one that an honorable man would readily assume, for it has been one of deliberate repudiation of its solemn obligations. If a private individual who had bargained away his property for a valuable consideration should, after he had received all the accruing benefits of the trade, demand that his property be returned to him upon the ground that he had no right to make the bargain, he would lay himself liable to be called hard names, and, what is more, would be justly deserving of them. To paraphrase a homely saying, Oakland could not eat her pie and have it, too.

The people of Oakland do not fully realize the position their city assumed in the courts in this proceeding, and perhaps they never will. The masses are inert, individuals active; and communities are easily persuaded to follow the man who noisily declares his willingness to protect them against real or imaginary fraud or wrongdoing.

The town of Oakland was incorporated in the early fifties, and concurrently with its incorporation the Legislature granted to it the water front lying at its door. Shortly thereafter the Town Trustees ceded the entire property to Horace W. Carpentier in consideration of a small schoolhouse and a wharf which he erected. It has been repeatedly charged that this proceeding was tinctured throughout with fraud, and that the Trustees exceeded, beyond measure, the scope of their powers. These charges were on the public tongue before the ink was dry on the documents consummating the transaction. Let us admit the gravest charge ever made against Carpentier to be true. Let us admit his original title was one that would not, for a moment, stand the test of fair judicial examination. Such an admission would not in the least affect the standing of the present holders of the property, whose claims to ownership are based upon another and entirely new proceeding. In the spring of 1867 the feeling against Carpentier was most intense, and, determined to resist his "outrageous presumption," the city employed that eminent attorney, John B. Felton, to institute legal proceedings for the recovery of the property. Oakland then was a mere straggling village, no more promising than a dozen other villages scattered about the bay shore. Its advantages and future outlook were not superior to those of its neighbors and friendly rivals. But at the close of the year 1867 the Western Pacific Railroad was nearing completion. Its surveyed line did not touch Oakland, but continued in a westerly direction from Niles Canyon to Dumbarton Point, where the bay was to be spanned by a short bridge. From there the proposed line extended up into San Francisco by way of the beautiful suburban towns located in San Mateo County, and Oakland was to receive no benefits from its construction. Had this route remained unchanged, there is no doubt the present population of Oakland would to-day be located on the peninsula in San Mateo County, and the city across the bay would have remained a village like unto San Rafael. Very wisely and with keen foresight, however, that city stood willing to tender unusual inducements to the railroad builders to alter their route. The municipality could not offer what was most necessary to the railway, i. e., water front and terminal facilities, for all available property of that character was hopelessly involved in a controversy with Carpentier that promised to be interminable. The construction of the railway could not be suspended until the controversy was legally determined. The railway builders had no interest in Mr. Carpentier or his title. They were not parties to his fraud—if there was fraud. They were simply interested in building a line of railroad, and if the village of Oakland could offer adequate inducements, they stood ready to resurvey their route and make Oakland the western terminus of a great system of overland roads. In this predicament the future of Oakland was threatened. There was no remedy for the situation but to compromise with Carpentier so that the railway builders might be given a clear title. Such an agreement was reached in 1868. Carpentier, doubtless, gladly availed himself of the opportunity to perfect his title, and the city of Oakland quite as gladly entered the arrangement, and by ordinance and otherwise ratified, confirmed, settled, and finally adjusted all of its differences with Carpentier on condition that he should convey terminal facilities, etc., to the railway builders. Upon the faith and credit of the solemn obligation of the city then made, the railway has built into Oakland, and with this immense advantage that city at once dashed ahead of all its rival sisters in the race for population. The people of Oakland met in mass meeting to celebrate the settlement of the water front controversy and the coming of the railroad. Amid great enthusiasm and rejoicing they were addressed by such men as Henry Durant, afterwards Mayor, and John Dwinelle and John B. Felton, afterwards Mayor; all eminent and honorable citizens. Had any individual arisen in that meeting and declared the trade just consummated to be a fraud and the water front controversy to be unsettled, he would in all likelihood have received a sound and well-merited drubbing at the hands of an indignant populace. Years afterwards, upon the faith and credit of this settlement, the railway builders, at an outlay running into the millions in hard gold coin, purchased the stock of the Oakland Water Front Company held by Mr. Carpentier and his associates, and so came into the possession of the remainder of the property. These are the facts briefly, but fairly stated.

In the suit just decided Oakland sought to recover the water front it had given to the railway as an inducement for it to come to Oakland, and all of the water front confirmed to Carpentier which had subsequently been sold to innocent third parties. It sought this recovery chiefly upon the ground that it had no right to sell it or trade it away. The court has held the bargain binding and Oakland gains nothing.

It may be just as well to consider what Oakland has lost through the influence of the agitation of this hopeless cause. After the railway corporation was defeated in its effort to secure Goat Island as a point for bringing ship and car together, its owners began to purchase the outstanding interests in the Oakland Water Front Company. In 1880 it had acquired the greater portion of the stock and had formulated definite plans for the construction of warehouses and the dredging of canals along the western portion of the water front for the purpose of handling the great wheat output of the interior valleys. They had proceeded so far as to draw plans and make surveys, when a blackmailing Oakland newspaper began a "water front agitation" that was greedily taken up by the Oakland agitators, and as a result the City Council employed A. A. Cohen to commence legal proceedings for the recovery of the property. This put a period on all plans for the improvement of the water front, and if the Oakland property-owner will take the pains to look at the immense warehouses strung along the Straits of Carquinez and the thriving town of Crockett and other neighboring villages clinging to the Contra Costa hills, he may gather some idea of the advantages lost to Oakland by that insane agitation.

It seems, unhappily enough, that the agitation which provoked the suit just determined, began at a time when the holders of water front stock had determined to sell the land owned by them and attempt to encourage manufacturing enterprise in that vicinity. This was in 1892, five years ago, but no sooner had the directors of the company announced their intention to sell than the agitation was renewed, the land withdrawn from the market, and several large manufacturing plants, which by this time would have been in full operation, were lost to that city. Oakland, under unwise leadership, has blundered badly in this affair. There are evidences that it will blunder again. The individuals who stand responsible for the past agitation are anxious to cover their defeat and mislead the people into a belief that they have gained a victory which now only needs a little more agitation and a little more litigation to bring final and complete success, but they have prophesied falsely before, and it will be little short of criminal if they are permitted to formulate gubernatorial booms at the expense of the city they pretend to serve.

THE PRESS AND JUDGE VAN FLEET

The bitter and unreasonable attacks of the press upon Justice Van Fleet, of our Supreme Court, because of the opinion written by him in the case of one Loren Fox cannot possibly disturb that gentleman's confidence in the settled rules of law which he simply reiterates, though they may be calculated to disturb his peace of mind.

The case of Fox runs about as follows:

Fox, who is a laborer, unfortunately poor and needy, brought suit against an Oakland street railway concern to recover damages for the killing of his infant son by one of the defendant's cars. The jury held the corporation to be negligent and awarded Fox six thousand dollars damages. From this judgment the defendant appealed, claiming, among other things, that the damages awarded were excessive, inasmuch as there was not even a remote probability that the deceased would ever have been able to contribute that sum to the family fund, or to have performed, during his minority, services of that value. The court agreed to this contention of defendant and held the damages to be excessive.

This ruling moved the press to hysterics, and to declare the court had held "that the poor man's child was not as valuable as the rich man's child," and much more of similar nonsense. The truth is, Judge Van Fleet did little more than reiterate doctrines as old as the law which permits the recovery of damages for the death of a son. At the common law, the right to maintain such action was unknown. It is a creature of modern legislation. The damages to be recovered in such an action are compensatory, not exemplary. The general rule is that the surviving relative may only recover such actual pecuniary loss as he may establish by proper proof. Sentiment, love and affection, grief, mental pain and anguish, may not be considered as elements going to make up the sum of damages recoverable. If the trial court instructs the jury that they may take these things into consideration in determining the amount of damages to be awarded, the Supreme Court must set aside the verdict upon the ground that such instruction was error. This is clearly established and definitely settled law. There remains nothing upon which one may base his claim to damages except his actual pecuniary loss. If the defendant in such a case is found to be wholly responsible for the death in question, he may be mulcted in damages for medical atendance of deceased and for his funeral expenses. In addition to this the jury may take into consideration the probable value of the services of the child during his minority, but so nice is the law in this particular that it contemplates the deduction from this amount of the probable cost of his maintenance and support. It is a recognized rule in these cases that such damages are limited to the actual pecuniary loss to the surviving parents. Upon this basis, the father of an incompetent could not legally recover a dollar more than the actual cost of medical attendance and funeral expense, for he could not show that such incompetent had any earning capacity or that his death had resulted in pecuniary loss to himself. He could not recover solace money for wounded feelings. His child may have been just as dear, just as lovable and just as sacred to him as any infant in the land, but the law fixes his right to recover at his actual pecuniary loss, and in such cases it would be difficult to see how any court could award the father of such an incompetent any more than the amount of medical attendance and funeral expenses. In fixing the sum of these damages, it is not only pertinent, but necessary, for juries and for courts to inquire into the surrounding circumstances, and base the damages awarded on the probable earning capacity of the child according to his environment and condition in life. There is no fixed value upon a child's services. No rule that can be applied to every case surrounding conditions, which vary with every case, determines or at least should determine, the amount. Such is the only safe rule for arriving at a fair estimate of the probable earnings of deceased minor, and this is what our Supreme Court has reiterated, nothing more, nothing less; and the press that has seen fit to attack Judge Van Fleet for his decision simply indicated its ignorance of the law to those who understand it, and awakened unjust and unfair prejudices in the minds of those who do not understand it.

GUATEMALA AND ITS PRESIDENT.

The press of this city has, of late, devoted an unusual number of columns to the affairs of the republic of Guatemala and to its President, General Reyna Barrios. If the space devoted to this subject was unusual, the sensational and untruthful character of the news was not. Peculiarly enough, the temper of the articles were so violent as to seem inspired by something akin to hate. The financial situation of the country has been sadly misrepresented, and business houses sound from every financial point of view were accused of nearing bankruptcy. So totally at variance with the facts were the charges made that an impartial observer could only infer that there was no desire to do justice to Guatemala or its President, but that behind the reports lurked a spirit of malice and political opposition to the administration of the country.

The exports from California to Guatemala amount annually to two millions of dollars, and one must confess that this method of procedure is not calculated to enlarge that trade or inspire the people of our southern neighbor with a desire to increase or even maintain present trade relations with a community that permits its press to treat it unfairly.

The countries of Spanish America are more or less small, new, and are not yet firmly established in their political existence. They are in the period of formation and are, in the nature of things, subject to frequent upheavals, now unknown in the older countries of the world. Guatemala, like all of Spanish America, is badly affected by the great depreciation of silver. At no time have these countries been entirely free from the evil effects of this shrinkage of money values, but never has its effects been so keenly felt as now. The country, however, is not approaching bankruptcy. In coffee alone its exports amount to twenty million dollars annually, in gold, not to speak of its other productions. The country is rich in natural resources, and has a chief executive with brains, courage and a powerful will. By popular vote General Reyna Barrios was elected President of Guatemala in 1892. On taking office he found the country financially, politically and socially in a most miserable plight. Discord and distrust were in the air, and radical measures were necessary to secure the perpetuity of peace and restore good feeling.. The new President, with an energy peculiarly his own, dedicated himself to re-establishing harmony and confidence, and with it the credit of the nation. The countrty responded to his intelligent treatment, and Guatemala entered upon an era of prosperity never before equaled.

The President undertook the construction of the Northern Railroad, which is the pride of all Guatemala. It was prosecuted as a Government undertaking, and is now not far from completion.

In Spanish-American countries private enterprise is dormant. The Government must inaugurate great undertakings. Paternalism rules down in that zone. The welfare of the country and its development is largely bound up in the progressive spirit of the administration, and realizing this, recognizing the great executive abilities of Barrios, and to insure the completion of the railroad enterprise, the last National Assembly unanimously prorogated his term of office four years more.

General Barrios is not the sanguinary monster he has been represented by one of the dailies. He is a quiet, studious, inoffensive gentleman, with whom the writer had some personal acquaintance while he resided in this city. It would be interesting, to say the least, to ascertain who the individual may be who is inspiring the attacks upon General Barrios, for they are unreasonable, malicious and manifestly untruthful.

---

One fact the decision in the Fair case settled is the futility of the advisory jury in equity cases. The Judge's decision is the ruling factor, and he is empowered to pronounce the verdict. The jury is a fifth wheel and rather an embarrassment than otherwise. Whether the cause in question was really an equity case is a subject for the Supreme Court, but whether or no the conclusion is a blow at the time-worn palladium of our liberties. The life of the jury system in civil cases, at least, is doomed. As confidence grows in the integrity and intelligence of Judges, and the idea that a mind trained to estimate evidence and weigh motives is better able to decide between opposing contentions becomes more generally acceptable, it will fall into disuse. Of the civil cases tried in England last year in only three hundred was the services of a jury requested. The assistance of a jury in an equity case is there unheard of.

---

Year by year the position of the Chinese tea trade with Great Britain seems to be on the decline, while our importations of the leaf from India and Ceylon are going up by leaps and bounds. The first of the new season's tea from China arrived the other day, but dealers generally exhibited very little interest in the importation, and the price realized at auction was only about 4½d. per pound—of course, that being the bona price, not duty paid. This is a great falling away from 1894, when fine Chinese teas commanded as much as 2s. 6d. per pound.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The oratory in the Fair case was not remarkable. It was abundant, certainly, and highly inflammatory, but the leaders have been heard to better advantage. Mr. McEnerney devoted himself to the legal aspects of the case, argued broadly and lucidly and reasonably. He is always safe to make a clear and intelligent exposition of law points, and is really at his best before the Supreme Court. His impressive presence and fine voice are factors in the effect he makes, and it may be added that he has a fine sense of logical form which renders his arguments shapely in composition. In Mr. Delmas' speech there were magnificent passages, but the body of the argument was hardly up to his best efforts. It was a powerful appeal, however, passionate, strenuous, but rather more garish in coloring than is the wont of this speaker, whose style is notable for clear, concise, compact phrasing and a fine clarity of statement. There are occasions when Mr. Delmas' oratory is great—on this occasion it was brilliant and clever and subtle—the means to the end, addressed to the jury rather than to the jurist. Mr. Wheeler certainly made a strong impression, and showed a power and vitality and audacity which his friends hardly credited him with possessing. He spoke freely and boldly; bitterly, too, and the flow of his argument carried the attention of both audience and jury. This, quite apart from the controversial portions of the speech. Mr. Wheeler is a young man comparatively, and has by no means arived at the zenith of his career. Certain characteristics of his style are open to criticism. For instance, he sweeps along too swiftly from point to point rather than impressing the strong factors of the argument into the mind by repetitions and recurrences as Delmas does. But he interests and has real force, which are the things that count in the long run. It is regretable that there should have arisen the degree of feeling that was manifested, but it was inevitable from the clash of forces and the unusual circumstances of the cause.

***

The Olympic Club is in a sorry pickle. It does require a strong hand at the helm and the services of a reorganizer and reformer. There is an impression that some rich figurehead of a man is needed to lead the club out of Egypt and into the Land of Promise, but I believe any capable and intelligent individual with a good executive faculty and a strong allowance of tact and sense might easily restore to the institution both its prestige and prosperity. Just now the club has a floating indebtedness of over $40,000, and its membership from 2,300 has fallen to some 1,300. It is still strong, and certainly is admirably equipped for the purpose of its organization, but the proper spirit is not at work in it, and until the solution of the situation is found the Olympic will languish. The predicament of the club seems to be that it has lost tone. Expelled from the Amateur Athletic Association it has got itself into an invidious position by managing and abetting prize-fights. The interior direction has neither the manner nor sternness requisite for firm administration, and the general air is of looseness and decay. It is necessary, first, that the club identify itself with the modern spirit in amateur athletics, which grows stricter rather than laxer in its rulings against professionalism. There must be no dallying with professionalism in any shape. It must be stamped out of the Olympic Club ere there can be any resurrection. Identified with true amateur sport it would not take long for the institution to revive, and the old esprit de corps would spring up again stronger than ever. Then it would be an honor to belong to the club. Just now no one esteems it even a privilege, and most of its members forget the innumerable benefits and pleasures the institution confers.

***

In one of its recent issues the "Monarch" has taken occasion to speak of the abundance of excellent statuary and public monuments that adorn the streets of the city. This is lamentably, pathetically untrue. Three weeks ago the best the city could boast was the group of statuary by Hapersburger, out at the City Hall, and Lotta's fountain. Since that time, however, the Native Son's monument has been unveiled and San Franciscans have had opportunity to note what really can be done by means of granite and bronze. Now comes news of the Mervyn Donahue fountain to the effect that Mr. Douglass Tilden, the deaf mute sculptor is to model the figures, while Willis Polk is to design the shaft. No better combination could be selected for the business than these two California artists. Mr. Tilden has shown himself to be the possessor of extraordinary talent, and Mr. Polk, as an architect and designer, is really clever, and can always be relied upon to be simple, artistic and genuine. It was his hand and judgment that succeeded so admirably with the shaft of the Native Son's monument, whose excellence we can be assured is but an earnest of what he will accomplish with the greater opportunities afforded by the Donahue monument, whose cost, I am informed, is to be not less than $25,000. There is also a rumor going the rounds to the effect that Mr. Phelan is about to donate another large sum for an imposing monument in Golden Gate Park. So, if all tales are true, San Francisco may expect in time to possess public statues and fountains worthy of the name. The "Examiner," as usual, has been only a little hasty.

***

The decision of Judge Wallace in the Supervisors' case was a foregone conclusion. It was one of the opportunities by which that jurist demonstrates his impeccable integrity. Really it made little difference what could be said for or against the Board, the spirit to expel was so willing and active that the law figured as an excuse rather than a cause. At the turn affairs have taken, however, no one seems particularly put out, save the victims, though it is a question whether the decision of expulsion will hold. There has grown up a great disgust at the actions and attitudes of such men as Devany, Haskins, Sheehan and Delaney, of whom better things were expected. Many honorable men assisted in electing them, imagining that they could be trusted, but the results have shown the contrary. However, if the Supreme Court pronounces Judge Wallace's conclusion bad law, the occurrence will go as a warning and prove an assistance in the direction of decency. Of course there will be an appeal at once, though it is yet a question in what shape the case will be taken before the Appellate Court. Attorney Pillsbury is competent, however, to make a good showing for his clients.

***

It was clever work that prevented a clash of authority between the Governor and Mayor in the appointment of the new Supervisors. There is no question but that Mr. Budd sought in this connection an opportunity to further his political aspirations, but the combination of forces at this end was too strong for him, though he fought bravely for his interests before resigning the struggle. His one representative is William Dresbach, who had the support in his candidacy of the Spreckels interests. Mr. Phelan is to be congratulated on his selection, for it is quite the strongest Board the city ever had. Charles Ashton is in real estate, and came into prominence through the great fight over the Dashaway steal, which he waged single-handed. Judge Heydenfeldt appointed him the executor of his estate as a testimony to the fine integrity he displayed in that affair. He assisted at the organization of the first non-partisan convention, and has participated at its gatherings ever since. He may be depended upon to look out for the best interests of the city. James H. Barry, who declines to serve, is the editor of "The Star,' and is certainly a thoroughly honorable man. Dr. Dodge and Dr. Clinton have been reappointed. Both have demonstrated their competency in the public service. John Lackmann, who is also reappointed, is animated with that regard for official dignity which is characteristic of the European rather than of the American citizen. William Dresbach is prominent on California street, and is notable for having engineered the Mackay-Flood wheat deal, and for some reason seems to have wanted the office. Henry Fortman is manager of the Alaska Packers' Association, and is associated with ex-Mayor Pond. He is able and conscientious. W. J. Biggy is in the laundry business and is one of the few San Franciscans who ever returned from Sacramento with reputation intact. Against Dr. Rottanzi the worst that may be urged is his friendship with Dr. Ragan of the School Board. James Danman is a man who is honored by his associates, made a legitimate fortune in real estate, and may be trusted to find the clean side of any public proposition. The same may be said of F. W. Dorhman, who is President of the Merchants' Association, and is a business man who really has a business. Joseph Britton has been prominent in reform movements for many years past, and is very wealthy. It is quite a strong association this new Board; is dowered with lots of executive ability, and may render distinguished service to the city. But the best men do not always make the best public servants, as has been proved. The light of publicity shines bright on the Supervisorial chamber, and it is not every man who can sustain its glare.

***

The return to this port of the steamer Excelsior has brought us fresh intelligence from the Yukon district. This has come in the shape of personal reports obtained from miners and others who have returned to enjoy the comforts of civilization, and also in the form of dispatches from press correspondents who had just established themselves at Dawson. The men who have reached here are practically unanimous in confirming the reports that have recently been coming to hand as to the probability of short supplies of food in the district during the coming winter. Mr. W. Ogilvie, the Dominion surveyor, was amongst the pasengers by the boat, and he has expressed grave fears that the influx of population has rendered the situation extremely dangerous from the food supply point of view. Mr. Louis Sloss, Jr., who has lately been up in the district in the interests of the Alaska Commercial Company, having left Dawson on August 18th, and broken his journey at several points on his way down the river, states that stores are depleted at all depots, though there is a large stock at St. Michael's, whence the goods cannot be transported owing to the want of water in the stream. In this respect there is unusual difficulty this year. Mr. Sloss is, therefore, a sharer in Mr. Ogilvie's apprehensions of the distress that must befall the immense number of people who have been flocking to Dawson from all points without providing themselves with sufficient supplies. Both these gentlemen are trustworthy authorities on the point, and it is impossible not to feel anxious at the situation. In the meantime the arrivals of treasure are not up to expectations, and the total which has reached here by the Excelsior on this trip will probably not exceed $500,000, and may not prove to be more than $300,000.

***

From the advices of the members of the "Examiner" expedition the first of the party appears to have reached Dawson in twenty-two days from San Francisco, having gone in by way of Juneau and the Chilcoot Pass. Some of the writing that has since been forwarded, per Excelsior, is highly sensational, especially that of the member of the party who lays claim to large experience of mining camps. His effusions would give the impression that the riches of he Klondyke are inconceivable. On the other hand, the local dailies have been considerably occupied during the last few days in declining responsibility in any way for the mad rush.

BOSWELL JR.

---

Ex-Secretary Carlisle is in favor of the nomination in every State at all elections of tickets by the Sound Money Democrats. Mr. Carlisle thinks this is the only way to preserve what he calls "simon-pure Democratic principles." He is still uncomprisingly opposed to the Bryan platform, regarding it as altogether undemocratic. Mr. Carlisle will speak in Kentucky in support of the gold Democratic nominee for Clerk of the Court of Appeals.

A Heavyweight Sire

Searchlight, the Great Pacer

Entrance to the Pavilion

Jerseys and Herefords

Three of a Kind (Jerseys)

Horse Parade

Pavilion Interior

The Blacksmith Shop

A FEW OF THE FEATURES AT THE STATE FAIR

From photographs by Capt. T B. Hall and W. G. Woods, of the Sacramento Camera Club

THE WORLD ABROAD

Some of the Leading Topics of the Day in Many Lands.

We have had the Venezuela incident, likewise the undiplomatic handling of the seal question in the "shirt-sleeves dispatch" of Secretary Sherman, and now there are signs in the sky that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty may create fresh difficulty should the policy of assuming national control of the Nicaragua Canal be definitely pursued. The report that Japan is raising a side issue on the same question hardly needs serious consideration.

The uprisings on the northern frontier of India seem to be melting away under the vigorous assertion of military power by the Government. The Ameer of Afghanistan has given the strongest assurances that the action of the tribes has not been prompted by him, and the idea, somewhat prevalent at the outset, that the Sultan of Turkey was encouraging the movement does not seem to have been justified. The interests of the former ruler are so obviously in the direction of friendliness with the Indian Government, from whom he receives a subsidy of 1,800,000 rupees a year, probably about one-fifth of the entire revenue of his kingdom, that he is well advised to use his influence in keeping the turbulent tribesmen in order. The idea that he is disposed to risk his independence, at present absolute except that under his agreement with the Government of India he is forbidden to have relations with any other foreign power, is altogether a mistake, and as the revolt of the tribes of which he is suzerain injures his standing with his great ally, he is exerting himself to the utmost to minimize the present difficulties.

Such sedition as has shown itself in India proper of late is chiefly due to the vaporings of the low section of the native press, several members of which have already been punished in an exemplary manner.

The Belgian expedition to the Antarctic, which sailed from Antwerp in the middle of last month in the steamer Belgica, headed by M. de Gerlache, will endeavor to penetrate the region of the South Pole, and, whatever may be the result, its efforts should furnish a fresh stock of scientific information regarding that quarter. The ultimate point so far reached was latitude 74 degs. S., touched by the sealer Waddell seventy-four years ago.

The Belgian Government are about to expend one million dollars in extending the dock accommodation at Antwerp, now the largest port in the world. This is only the prelude to still further improvements.

Reports have come to hand of discoveries of great mineral wealth in Newfoundland, which for centuries has remained until recently a neglected country, so far as the development of its internal resources is concerned. Gold has been found near Cape Broyle in the south, and near Cape John in the north, while there is an abundance of copper, silver, nickel, lead, asbestos and other minerals. A coal seam thirteen feet wide has also been discovered in the Codroy Valley, close to the railway, forty miles from Port au Basque. There are altogether good grounds for a boom in that locality.

Owing to the fall in silver there is general depression in the import trade in China. The great firm of Jardine, Matheson & Co. are establishing cotton factories on a large scale in South China.

Queen Victoria has knighted Chang Yen Hoon, Special Embassador from China on the occasion of her jubilee, and Chen Tung Liang Cheng, Secretary of the Special Embassy, appointing them Honorary Members of the First and Second Classes respectively of the Order of St. Michael and St. George.

It is understood that the difference between President Kruger and the Transvaal Judges has been practically adjusted, and the authority and independence of the judiciary is to be finally established beyond all interference. This result is a fresh tribute to the clear perceptions of the President, who, autocratic though he is, does not wish to maintain the ground that he is a power above the law.

The report of the Transvaal Industrial Commission states that the Commissioners ascertained that, during 1896, out of the hundred and eighty-three gold mines in the Transvaal, seventy-nine produced gold to the value of $43,019,105. The remaining hundred and four produced no gold, most of these being in a state of development. Only twenty-five companies declared dividends, amounting in the aggregate to $8,593,905.

An ice-breaking steamer, built in Denmark, which can cut through ice twenty-eight inches thick at the rate of four knots an hour, arrived at Vladivostok in the beginning of June, and not only the Russians, but also the Japanese, are looking forward to its performance with the keenest interest, since, if it really does what it professes to do, Vladivostok harbor can be kept open all the year round—a matter of great commercial and political importance. The Russian Admiral Makaroff has gone to North Siberia to study the hydrographic conditions there, in order to ascertain whether the rivers, especially the Yenisei, cannot be kept open considerably longer by means of similar ice breakers. Why not try it on the Yukon?

Mr. Beerbohm Tree's first campaign at his new house, Her Majesty's Theater in London, came to a close in the middle of August. His great undertaking has met with entire success, and in his address to the public after the last performance of the season he expressed himself satisfied with the results of his work and enterprise. He remarked that while the cry in London at present is "Down with foreign importations," he, personally, was disposed to think that the public cares very little where the play comes from so long as the entertainment is good. For the moment, he said, the romantic drama, the drama of our youth, is in the ascendant; in fact, the older generation has been knocking at the door. For next season Mr. Tree has projected quite a Shakespearean revival.

Sir Herbert Kitchener is carrying his advance up the Nile with the same steady determination and absence of fuss that have characterized his action in Egypt from the very first. Sir Herbert's remarkable quality is that he has achieved amazing success with the most unpromising materials. An instance of this was last year's advance on Dongola, which was carried out with the most absurdly inadequate means. It is for this unusual power that General Kitchener is peculiarly noted—he is literally a man who commands success, and his black 10th battalion believe in him as the tenth legion believed in Caesar. Sir Herbert, who by the way is an Irishman, is generally disliked by special correspondents, a feeling he cordially returns.

THOMAS ON TENDENCIES

The Author of "Alabama" Believes in the Problem Play.

The author of "Alabama" and "In Mizzouri" was writing at a ridiculously inadequate table when I came in, and by a light that should have been quite out of the question. He was a large blue-serge gentleman with a smooth face and looked enough like an actor to be a clergyman, while at the same time I knew him to be a first-class playwright. I say first-class because in the course of the interview Augustus Thomas found occasion to call himself a "second-class," man which was good only because it was false, and palpably so.

We began upon "Don't Tell Her Husband," Mr. Thomas' new play, which the Frawleys now have under rehearsal.

"It's a problem comedy," said Mr. Thomas.

"Rather an unusual departure, isn't it?" I asked.

"A problem does end in a tragedy oftentimes, but for all that this is to be comedy in the sense that it is somewhat light."

I asked him what was to be its motif.

"Whether or not a man's chum should tell him of his wife's unfaithfulness."

"Problem enough," said I. "Do you solve it?"

"Remember the title," answered Mr. Thomas.

Mr. Thomas had a good deal to say about the problem play when I asked him if it was going out of vogue with the public.

"These things are matters of action and reaction," he said. "A little while ago and the public would not listen to melodrama. You couldn't so much as feed it to them with a spoon, but you see for yourself how 'Secret Service' and 'Maryland' have taken. The problem play is perhaps a little unpopular now, but the taste will come around again in time, for the reason that the best kind of work is done in plays of this character, and good, strong work will always tell in the end and find its place."

"When I write a play," continued Mr. Thomas, "I go into it, as it were, by inches, step by step. You know I consider the most important parts of a drama to be the parts that are not spoken—the thousand and one little looks and gestures, little poses and motions."

"I didn't know the playwright took notice of that," said I. "I supposed that he left those for the most part to the actor or actress."

"Rather the contrary," observed Mr. Thomas. "I write a play practically in novel form, filling in the gaps in the dialogue with explanatory directions. Of course the 'business,' such as the crossings and the like, is done after the piece is put on rehearsal."

"What should you say," I asked him next, "was the great requisite for a playwright?" and just as I expected Mr. Thomas answered "Truth."

"Yes, but truth on the stage, where a painted tree looks more real than a real tree, where an actor demands a strong line upon which to make his exit? How can you always be true there?"

"There are big fundamental truths that lie deeper than mere painted scenery and exit lines. Must you use green ink when writing of a landscape or red when describing a fire? And, besides that, demand for a strong exit line is true to life."

"As, for instance—"

"At your club, for instance, when you leave a group of men. Don't you always think of some little parting shot with which to signal your departure?"

I reflected.

"Or at a function. It is really a most dramatic situation from your point of view when you must say goodbye and face a whole roomful of people who are listening to what you are saying to your hostess. It is quite a little crisis. You do rack your brains for something appropriate to say and a 'strong exit line' is a veritable godsend. You see such situations occur often upon the stage, and in reproducing them you are true to life after all."

For a man who has accomplished so much Mr. Thomas is rather limited in his working hours. He calls himself a lazy man, which would be true if hard work was measured by mere lapse of time. But Mr. Thomas can do more by means of his daily four or five hours' stint than you or I could achieve in years. He is up at 6 (when a play is in hand), works till breakfast, is back in his study an hour after breakfast, and writes steadily till noon. Never works afternoons or evenings except when under pressure, and then he works all night.

"But the best work is the deliberate, careful work, well thought over and slowly worked out."

"And how about the journalist working at his desk in the midst of scurrying office boys, clashing shears, and all the small pandemonium of a newspaper office?"

I didn't wait for Mr. Thomas' answer. I thought it was a strong exit line and left. F. N.

THUMB-MARKINGS IN CRIME

The Ball of the Thumb Considered as Evidence.

It is an old saying that art is always ahead of science, the imagination of the poet, author or painter always running ahead of and out-stripping the plodding investigations of the laboratory and the dissecting-room. When Jules Verne invented—for in a way he did invent—the famous submarine craft "Natuilus" the public smiled at the conceit as an entertaining and amusing project of a visionary writer of fiction. A few years later the Holland torpedo boat, constructed upon almost precisely the same lines as the one in "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," was an established, an actual fact.

So it may be with our own Mark Twain. The story of "Pudd'nhead Wilson" turned upon identification by means of thumb marks. We who have read the book and seen the play perhaps took our enjoyment with a half-smile of toleration at the humorist's fancy. Five years have not gone by, and already staid and grave scientists, men of hard facts and cold, unemotional reasoning are bestirring themselves and limbering their stiffened joints in their efforts to catch up with a writer of funny stories.

Very shortly, perhaps within the year, it is most likely that thumb-print evidence will be admitted in all the law courts of this country, and may even come to be the adjunct of signed documents, wills, checks and the like. The main advantages of this method of identification are that the markings of the cuticle upon the ball of the thumb, the little creases, whirls, loops and arches never change, and that the chances of two human beings possessing the same marking are less than 1 in 64,000,000,000—small enough for all practical purposes, surely. Already treatises have appeared upon the subject, experts in the matter have arisen, and men in positions that imply dealings with a multitude of people have been making exhaustive researches, tests and examinations. Thus it has been proved beyond the preadventure of a doubt that a man of eighty possesses precisely the same thumb-markings that he did when a child. His face may change so that his own children or his nearest relatives will fail to identify him, his character, the very man himself may alter beyond recognition (as happened in the well known case of Theophilus Young), yet the print of the ball of the thumb upon wax is as changeless as identity itself.

As an illustration of the efficacy of this theory of thumb-markings, no better instance can be cited than the experience of Sir William Herschel, Registrar of Hoogly, in India, who caused all people executing public documents in his office to leave with him impressions of the balls of their thumbs. This impression, precisely as in the case of "Pudd'nhead Wilson," he filed and kept for reference. This was in 1878. A few years ago his successor in office, one Mr. Duke, made an attempt to look up some of the people whose thumb-marks had been preserved. He found eight of them, took a second impression of their thumbs, compared them with those taken nearly twenty years previous, and found that in every case they tallied exactly.

It is hardly necessary to dwell upon the efficacy of thumb-marking as a means of criminal identification, and, indeed, two cases are now being prepared for the courts where the jury will be asked to compare the imprint of bloody finger and thumb with those taken from the hands of the accused prisoners.

Francis Galton, an Englishman, is the head of the new school, and has but recently issued two books, one called "Finger Prints" and another, more practical, entitled "Finger Print Directories." Already his system has been adopted by prison authorities in India and parts of England. Mr. Galton, however, believes that thumb-marks will be of far more practical benefit to business men than to officers of the law, since the addition of the thumb-print to each signature would make forgery impossible. In his "Finger Print Directories," Mr. Galton says:

The method of taking finger prints for police purposes is as follows: The official squeezes a few drops of printer's ink on a copper plate and works it with a ruler till it forms an even layer over the surface. The layer of ink must be so thin as to allow the copper of the plate to show through it.

He then takes the prisoner's right hand and lays the bulbs of the four fingers flat on the inked plate, pressing them gently but firmly. He then lays the inked fingers on a card.

He next takes the thumb of the right hand, rolls the bulb slightly on the inked plate and rolls it again on the card. He obtains a second impression of the fingers alone, this time rolling each one. The same process is gone through with the other hand.

For business purposes a small, neat and handsome apparatus would be devised for inking the thumb. It would include some preparations for removing the ink. It would be out of the question for a man to make eighteen finger marks on a check or public document, as is done by the prisoner on his card. The thumb-print would be ample.

Once this system becomes established, it will of course be probable that professional criminals will sear or scarify their finger and thumb tips. However, it will be necessary for them to perform the operation on every finger tip, a process that would involve the most exquisite torture, the finger tip being only less sensitive than the tongue, while an impression of the resulting scars would be even a better form of identification than the original unmaimed cuticle.

The Russian photographers have a strange way of punishing those who, having received their photograph, do not pay their bills. They hang the pictures of the delinquents upside down at the entrance to their studios.

His Single Blessedness.

By FRANK NORRIS

Be pleased to consider how small are the beginnings of things—big things. When he was yet a very young fellow, say seventeen or eighteen, and spending a sweltering August at a summer resort down the coast, Doychert made the remark that little children bored him and that he hated them. This was more or less true, for a boy of eighteen hasn't the moral right to hate anything, 'specially children. Young Doychert had fired off the remark for the sake of effect, with one eye cocked at the gallery. Some girls were about and he wanted to astonish them. Doychert didn't hate children at all; quite the contrary, as events proved. But once having made the remark, he had to live up to it. So he went about that resort saying, "I hate children, I hate children," till he made people believe him, and ended by believing it himself. A lie never seems so true as when it has been crystallized into words. Doychert had very arbitrarily chosen his hatred of children as his fad, and he wore this nasty fad conspicuously, as some African tribesman might wear a hideous ornament, until it grows into his flesh and becomes almost a part of him. Doychert's "pet aversion" became almost—I say almost—a part of him, and he nursed it and fostered it until it developed hugely, so that he actually believed he could not stay in the same room with an active little, noisy little child, boy or girl.

"I can't help it," he would say. "It's an instinct, like some people's aversion to cats. Let 'em be old enough to take care of themselves, and I don't say; but a nasty, mewling, salmon-pink, smelly, baby, all head and red dough, that makes sucking noises and drules milk—B-r-r!" Thus Doychert with a shudder of horror that he believed was genuine. And all the while, way down in the secretest heart's heart of the man, he was a kindly, lovable fellow, with no more dislike for babies than you or I or all the rest of us.

Three years after he was married his first baby was born—a girl.

Doychert loved his wife—no man better. They two had a delicious tiny little rabbit-waren of a house, all brown shingles and small paned windows, way out at the end of Pacific aveune, near where the Government Presidio reservation begins. It was far enough removed from the end of the world of San Francisco to be near enough to heaven for all practical purposes, and for three years Doychert lived out the dearest period of his life there, wallowing in happiness, as one might say, fairly miring himself in the pure delight of being alive—and married, married to Mrs. Loychert. For she was a dear, beautiful girl, and the pair loved each other better than most people.

When the little girl was born Doychert said to me, across his smoking-table (we were in the billiard-room and the wheels of the doctor's coupe were just grating off down the street), Doychert said, or rather whispered, because Mrs. Doychert's room was just above:

"I can't help it, Sturgis, it's an instinct. I suppose I was born with an aversion to children (he really believed he was honest), and I'll die with it. I'm that baby's father, but till it gets old I shall hate it, I know I will. I don't want to see it"—he made a squirming movement with one shoulder—"I'd rather have a blind kitten crammed down my back than have the touch of that child on me. You can't understand that, can you?"

"No, I can't," says I, "and I think you are a horrible, filthy brute, that should be manhandled—you beast."

"That is all quite true," he answered, "I am a brute beast, and worse, for even a brute beast cares for its whelps; but give me time. When she grows up I suppose I shall like her."

"Suppose you shall like your daughter? Now that sounds fine. Where's my hat?"

"Going?"

"Sorry I came."

"Well, you know how it is," said he at the door. "It's an unreasoned instinct. I can't help it. I hate children, and all's said. Think of feeling it clawing at your nose and ears. Lord!"

Here I swore at him and went away.

If you know anything of men friendships, you will have understood from the preceeding conversation that Doychert and I were the best chums in the world. That is why, five years later, when I came back to San Francisco again I went straight to Doychert's little house out on Pacific avenue. I had heard a good deal about him during those intervening five years and was prepared for changes. But even at that, the difference was poignant. The little brown-shingled house stood waist deep in weeds, the gate was gone and the small panes of the windows smashed.

Doychert opened the door for me. Evidently he had not shaved that week. He was in his stocking feet. His eyes looked at me out of saucers of brown skin. The place reeked of stale tobacco smoke, and it did not need the sight of the unmade bed nor the cigar stumps in the card tray to tell me that Doychert was living there alone.

Towards 2 o'clock that night, over his tenth brandy and water and his last cigar, Doychert told me the tale of the things that had happened.

"It began all of a sudden on one day," said he, his hands on his chin, glowering into the grate fire. "Jack" (that was Mrs. Doychert) had been up about a week. I hadn't so much as seen Emmie yet, and Jack and I had almost quarreled about her. Jack had begged me just to look into the room while she was asleep, but I couldn't—I mean I wouldn't do it. One Sunday afternoon when Emmie was about three weeks old, I was stretched out on the sofa here sort of half asleep, when Jack came up to me very softly, and before I knew it put Emmie into my arms.

" 'Joe,' she says, 'look at her now, your little daughter, how can you help loving her—' She was going to say something else, but she never got further than that. Emmie snuggled down into my neck and put her little fists into my face. I jumped up and pushed her, almost threw her, from me, recoiling as though a snake had touched me.

"Take it away," I cried. "For God's sake take it away, I hate it and loathe it, and I always will hate it."

Jack was only a week out of a bed. I don't need to tell you how delicately poised a woman is at such times as that, how tangled and jangled her nerves are. The doctors have got names for it all. She heard what I said, and saw me thrusting my little daughter away from me. Then she looked at me once in—I say she gave me—she—you see'—Doychert cleared his throat—" she gave a sigh and went down softly into a little heap on the floor."

" 'She was in the sanitarium about a month, and for a time we thought she never would be right in the head again. I wasn't allowed to see her, and her folks took Emmie. After a month's time, though, the doctors brought her around all right; said she had pulled through sound as a nut, and that I might see her. She knew I was coming. They had her propped up in a big sea chair by a window. I had sent her a lot of flowers and she wore some of them. When I came into the room I saw her leaning back there in the sea chair. She looked up at me and smiled, happy as could be to see me. And then all at once her expression changed to one of the most abject horror and revulsion. She put up her hands to shut out the sight of me and cried out, "No, no, I can't. Take him away, oh, somebody take him away." It was no use reasoning with her, she got hysterical, screamed and fought from me as though I was a leper or a murderer. I had to go, and as soon as I was gone she was quiet again. Couldn't understand herself how it had happened. The doctors said I could come the next day, and as soon as Jack heard my foot on the stairs she fainted with the pure horror of the thought of seeing me. She had forgven me my brutality with Emmie, loved me as much as ever, mark you, longed to see me as much as I longed to see her, and yet went insane with loathing as soon as I came near. This was the one point of insanity of which the doctors could not cure her. They never have been able to cure her. We have tried everything. She can't even see my handwriting without that horrible revulsion seizing upon her. But she can write to me and she does, and that's how I know she is suffering as much as I. What we two have gone through with, God only knows. Can you imagine the horror of the situation? We are as dear to each other as ever—more so, my God," he cried, digging his nails into his temples, "more so. We are here, here in the same town, where I can see her every day, and yet we are worlds apart. It's a death in life, a death in life," and he rocked himself to and fro in his place. "Every Sunday we have arranged that she shall go to church. She tells me where she sits, and I go up in the gallery and peep at her from behind pillars. Even that is bad for her, but she can stand it for an hour once a week. Once she caught sight of me and—" he broke off suddenly and closed his eyes.

"And Emmie," said I.

"Emmie will be eight to-morrow. Here's a lot of pictures that Jack has sent me from time to time. Isn't she the finest little girl you ever saw, and bright, bright as a dollar?"

"How about her?" I asked him. "'You manage to see her when her mother's not by, I suppose."

I saw the knuckles of Doychert's fist suddenly whiten.

"Emmie is—is like—Emmie takes after her mother," he said. "By the way, you have some little nieces, haven't you? What do you give 'em on Christmas, and—and on their birthdays and such like? Emmie's eight to-morrow. Books wouldn't do, would they, hey? Is she too old for toys—or too young? Here's what I got her. I thought I'd take the chances on toys." He turned to the table and undid a few packages. "There's a little doll," he said, "an— you see," he added proudly, "she closes her eyes when you lay her down, and there's a doll house; ain't those little chairs and tables out of sight? I guess Emmie would like those, all right. I can just see her eyes stick out when she undoes the package. I think I'll get a big doll house like that for my kindergarten—I've got a kind of a kindergarten going, down on Minna street, that you must see. And here, look at this. Here's another thing I am going to send to Emmie. Catch on to this. Here's a little pump, and, by Jove, you can pump real water in it, see" and he showed me how it worked. "I wonder if Emmie will know that you can pump 'truly' water with it? Tell you what, you write it on a card and put it in, will you?"

"Why not you?"

"Well—you see, they might recognize my handwriting."

"Shan't I say," said I, pen in hand, "that it all comes form you, with many happy birthdays?"

"Not that, above all things," said Doychert.

SONNET TO AUSTIN DOBSON.

Priest of Art's inner temple; have no fear
  That thou wilt be forgot in after days;
  Look in Time's testing palace, where he weighs
A thousand singers of the past, who wear
The living leaves. Doth it not grate thine ear
  To listen to the weak discordant lays
  Of those, whose brows unworthy of their bays,
Still live, to make Art blush, from year to year.

But in thy graceful numbers, one would think
  That words were drugs, and all as potent too,
    Weighed well with apt apothecary's art,
The which in dainty dreamy draughts we drink,
    Then swoon with pleasure, till the thirsting heart
  Waketh again the rapture to renew.

LOUIS A. ROBERTSON.

Sarah Bernhardt has acquired for her own property the old castle of La Belle Isle en Mer, and, having restored it, has betaken herself there to exchange the roar of the waves and the shriek of the gulls for the roar of the Paris streets.

SEVENTH POWER OF EUROPE

Personality of Some Members of the Rothschild Family.

Way back in the middle ages, about the time when the Black Prince was fighting King Philip of France to a standstill at a place called Crecy, a certain Jew went to Frankfort to live and was assigned a house in the Jewish quarter of the town (called the Judinpasse), distinguished by a red shield over the door. According to custom, this Jew had but one name, Anslem, but to separate his name from the hundred and one other Auselms of his name from the hundred and one other Anslems of the town, called himself Anslem of the Red Shield House. Red Shield is Rothschild.

In 1849 Anslem Rothschild dealt in old coins and curios and was glad when he could make a dozen marks in a day. (These very marks are "old coins" now). To-day Auselm's descendants, "the Rothschilds," are the Seventh Power of Europe, and a combination of their half dozen banking houses, acting in unison, could dictate terms to any nation of Europe. Indeed, it is told of the present Lord Rothschild that, on the occasion of the last war scare, when interviewed by a journalist upon the possibility of war, he tapped his forehead reflectively and remarked:

"No, there will be no war. Just at present I hardly think I can afford it."

About the time of the American revolution an Auselm Rothschild founded the great bank, and the fortunes of the family at Frankfort and under the patronage of a Baron Von Eskoff, he who lent the Hessian troops to George III, prospered. In dying Auselm left the business to his five sons, with injunctions that none of them should undertake any great scheme without consulting the other brothers and their mother, that they should be satisfied with moderate profits and that, as far as possible, they should make it a rule to marry into their own family. This last custom has been rather rigorously adhered to, and, in spite of the ban of medicine upon the marriages of cousins with cousins, uncles with nieces and nephews with aunts, the great family shows no signs of debilitation.

Nothing is more curious than the old original Rothschild Bank in Frankfort, an institution of such vast resources that it is out of the question to even attempt to put a figure upon its capital. For all practical purposes its wealth is actually limitless. However, an air of rigorous plainness and frugality overhangs the place. It is furnished with pine desks and tables, dim candles and splint bottomed chairs, instead of with the Oriental extravagance that generally characterizes the modern banking offices of England and America. This office is the training school of the younger members of the family, who pass the term of their apprenticeship here before going on to the great branch offices of London and Paris.

Curiously enough, defaulting is an almost unknown occurrence with the Rothschilds and is seldom punished by them. The most absolute secrecy surrounds the business of the family, and rather than open their books in public court the heads of the branches preferred to lose the sum and permit the offender to go unpunished. The present head of the family, Lord Rothschild, is the oldest great-grandson of Mayer Amschel Rothschild, and is a well-known figure about London. He is especially familiar with the passengers on the railway line between Tring and London, for he rarely takes a holiday, and Stock Exchange opens. He is very unassuming in his travels up to the city upon almost every day that the manner, and is never seen apart from an inseparable black bag, out of which, however, he has never been known to take a solitary thing. The seat of Lord Rothschild at Truig is an old, well-built manor of the time of the Stuarts, and the park in which it stands is stocked with deer, ostriches, emus, and even kangaroos. This singular taste in animals is very apparent in Lord Rothschild's little son Walter, who drives daily in a phaeton drawn by a well-matched span of zebras. The casual visitor may even occasionally be met by a prodigious tortoise, the especial pet of the estate, who has slowly promenaded its walks and terraces time out of mind.

One of Lord Rothschild's hobbies is the free Hebrew school in Whitechapel, towards whose support he has contributed several small fortunes. It has an attendance of nearly four thousand children, to each one of whom hot milk and bread is served every morning. At Passover each pupil receives a suit of clothes, while an interest of ten per cent. is allowed on all moneys each pupil can legitimately earn.

Lord Rothschild's town house in Piccadilly, near Hyde Park corner, two doors below the residence of the Duke of Wellington, is a veritable palace. In its main hall, however, a portion of an exquisite marble cornice forever remains unfinished, in harmony with the custom of orthodox Jews, who must regard their earthly homes as temporary and in consequence incomplete. There is about Lord Rothschild none of that deprecatory and retiring humbleness which often characterizes the Hebrew. On the contrary, he is proud of his race, and firmly believes in its destiny and mission.

When speaking in the Chamber of Deputies in Paris M. de Mun refreshes himself with pure water, M. Ribot with coffee well sweetened, and M. Jules Roche coffee with coffee well sweetened, M. Juares coffee well watered, and M. Jules Roche coffee with sugar and cognac. M. Henri Brisson takes sweetened water and cognac, M. Poincare lemonade, and M. Meline rum punch.

Sir Herbert Kitchener, commander of the British advance up the Nile, has been pacing newspaper correspondents following the expedition under severe restrictions. They are not allowed to mess with the officers, but are forced to take with them six months' supplies. Nor are they allowed to go to the front, being kept well to the rear, and furnished only with whatever information it may please the authorities to give.

THE STATE FAIR

Impressions of a Casual Visit to Agricultural Park, Sacramento.

The harvest is over; the wheat has been garnered and thrashed, hop-picking is finished, and the fruit crop has been shipped, dried or canned. Throughout the great interior valleys of California it is the season of rest after labor, the period of estimating profits and settling accounts—above all, the time of recreation when the rancher, his wife, and their children, may leave their broad acres to the hired man and go holiday making to the State Fair at Sacramento. It is at the Fair that the State recognizes the agriculturalist. An appropriation of $30,000 per annum is devoted to encouraging the production of big pears. luscious bunches of grapes, huge peaches, fine cattle, thoroughbred horses, well-bred pigs, sheep and chickens, by way of premiums, awards and diplomas. There is a State Society and a big Agricultural Park and a huge, ugly Pavilion with a glazed roof—not to mention a permanent Secretary at so much per month, together with a President, directors, assistants and other machinery and paraphernalia, all for the exaltation of farming. So, just at this time, the rancher is a hero at Sacramento, and subserves a fitting purpose by appearing before the assemblage of cows and prunes, Percherons and big green apples, merinos and Frue concentrators, ovens and bantams gathered there for his delectation and instruction. If he has contributed to the show some of his own productions he is the more welcome, for then he has paid for the honorable opportunity of competing against his brethren, and is in line for a diploma and a prize.

Here are the ranchers then. It is during State Fair time that the student of types and styles should visit Sacramento. The capital of California is built at the confluence of the American and Sacramento Rivers, in the very center of the greatest and most fertile valley in the world, surrounded with orchards, hop fields and asparagus beds. Tributary to it are the great fruit regions of the northern valley, the early fruit belt of Vacaville and Winters, and the citrus plantations of Oroville. At Sacramento the fruit trains are made up for Chicago and New York, and it is really headquarters for the leading industry of the State. A flat, rather commonplace country town, redeemed by the pillared Capitol standing amidst its lawns and palms, and by the broad reaches of the river flowing silently within low banks covered with willows, it is the scene of the genesis of California. Here were laid the foundations of the great fortunes and the great names whose deeds and misdeeds have made the State's history. The city teems with associations and traditions of early days, when it was veritably the entrepot of the Pacific Coast—headquarters for supplies of food, clothes and implements for the miners in the Sierras and the settlers through the plains. Then San Francisco was little better than sandhills and a wharf—a mere dumping-place for goods destined for the capital. A good Sacramentan will show you the homes and gardens of the founders of the Commonwealth; trace for you the domestic evolution of its personalities from hovel and villa to mansion and palace. But all that is another story. It is the Fair that concerns me.

After wandering through the Park and visiting the assemblage of cattle, sheep, horses and pigs penned and stabled there, admiring the fine Jerseys and the prize Herefords and the big Percherons, one reverts naturally enough to the grand stand, where the feminine element of town and country is gathered, looking down upon its husbands, brethren and sweethearts playing the races. For the State Fair is more a race meeting than an agricultural performance. The speed of the horses, it is true, is an element of equine quality and to be discussed by judges in the distribution of diplomas, but that consideration is hardly the cause of the supremacy of the racing feature. In bygone days horticulture and agriculture were the predominant factors; now they are merely the excuse for the State's appropriation. The crowd is collected by the events on the track, not for the stock parade. Each year canvassers are sent out among the ranchers to drum up exhibits, for the active interest in the competitions is slight and diminishes each year. Maybe this is due to the dullness and depression which has so long prevailed, but it is easier to believe it is because of that inertia which characterizes the California farmer, who apparently has only energy enough to produce a staple, be it wheat or fruit, and feels that labor in other directions is unnecessary. It may be said, also, that the Associations form of classification under which the stock is judged is obsolete; the point system of decision is unknown, and the administration is in the hands of a governing clique which has held office rather too long for the good of the institution. However popular President, Secretary and their friends may be, a change of government subserves the same purpose in an organization as a change of air does for an individual—quickens his faculties, enlivens his energies and alters the point of view. We all know the charm of variety.

One race meet is as like another as two fashionable marriages—the performances have leading features in common, and it's only the personalities tnat are different. At Agricultural Park last Saturday, after traversing the betting quarters and visiting the saddling paddock, where the horses and the jockeys assemble, I ascended the grand stand and devoted myself to inspecting the array of women in summer apparel clustered in hundreds along the pyramids of seats. It was a great matinee audience. Surely there were two thousand girls and young women there all garbed in light colors. Never have I seen such an abundance of shirt waists, white cotton, lace and muslin gowns. It was a charming spectacle—quite the feature of the affair. They displayed a genuine interest in the races and hung thickest over the low balustrade which overlooks the betting ring. Of this feminine throng the predominant characteristics were slenderness of physique and sallowness of complexion. But few fine figures or brilliant faces disengaged themselves. A similar concourse in San Francisco or in Oakland, or in San Jose, even, would be distinguished by the multitude of plump and rounded forms, and plentifully punctuated with handsome, if not beautiful, faces. In this Sacramento assemblage the typical California girl, with her blooming cheeks and abundant vitality, had but few representatives. It was such a crowd of maidens as one might see in Iowa, in Illinois—in the Western States—pretty, but thin, colorless, uniform, unpicturesque. A similar condition was observable in the gathering at the Pavilion at night, though the percentage of bright faces was higher. All this is due, of course, to climate—the perennial sunshine and warmth of the great interior valley, the absence of variety or extremes of temperature they boast. The abounding physical exuberance and the fresh charm of the San Francisco woman may be attributed to the influence of the sea fogs which waft their humid influences over the peninsula and along the shores of the Golden Gate—moist effluences which soften and develop and beautify beyond the power of chemical or other artificial stimulant.

Apropos of the Fair and its audiences, where do the men go? For neither at Fair or Pavilion did they forgather with the ladies. There were hundreds of unescorted maids wandering around in their delicious pink and white and pale blue gowns, listening, I suppose, to the music. The spectacle was brilliant and full of bright color, but sadly lacking in the contrast which is only afforded by the male costume. Alone and unacquainted the writer could only gaze and dream which was proper but not diverting. Incidentally, he wandered among the exhibits, looked at the butter-making, the apples, the biscuits, the pyramids of stoves and the gorgeous furniture—even the pictures—but whoever has been at a State Fair knows what all that means and the deep, surpassing excitement it induces.

MISS SELENE JOHNSON
The New Member of the Frawley Company

ETC. JR.

DAGO CONSPIRATORS

Two Worthies Who Waylay Citizens and Sell Them Bad Cigars.

I know now how a conspirator feels. The next time I read of the adventures of a spy, penetrating into the enemy's stronghold, his life in his hands; now observing and taking mental notes of his surroundings, and now exerting every faculty to preserve his disguise and maintain appearances, I will be able keenly to appreciate his position, and to sympathize with the tension of his nerves.

At the present moment, while I write these lines, there is a portly gentleman, of extremely affable demeanor, waiting for me on the corner of Market and New Montgomery streets. He has with him a box of five hundred Chinatown cigars, which I have told him I would buy from him. But I have told the portly gentleman the thing which is not. I am not going to buy his cigars. I am not going to keep the appointment, and when the portly gentleman (he is of Mexican persuasion) reads these lines—and I devoutly hope he will—I am quite sure he will make remarks unavailable for publication in this magazine, and say the word which is not to be mentioned to ears polite. Follows the explanation of these things. The next time you have occasion to be on the corner of Market and New Montgomery streets, the corner where the S. P. ticket office is located, look for a very stout man, who wears, amongst other things, a white felt hat with broad brims and a little black moustache. A Mexican beyond all doubt. Then if you want to have your fun for your money (or more accurately speaking, plenty of fun for no money at all, and the present of a good cigar into the bargain) act as herewith directed. Assume an air degagee, and pause aimlessly on the corner and look up the street as if waiting for a car. Then light a cigarette, smoke a mouthful or so, and then chuck it away as if in disgust. Even before you have arrived at this stage it is a thousand dollars to a paper dime that you will be approached by the portly gentleman, always supposing that he has not read this article.

I had been told of the portly gentleman and his little scheme, and so on a certain afternoon of this week brought the photographer along and stationed him a near as was safe, and with half the office on the othe side of the street looking on and pretending not to do sc began to play the game.

He needed a good deal of coaxing, and in the reflectio of a plate glass window I could see him conferring wit his pals (he has two of them), sizing me up. I looke reflectively at the cigarette, and plucked from it a threa or two of the tobacco. He shuffled forward a step o two and hesitated. I filipped the cigarette away, an looked at it smouldering in the gutter with a dejectio which I trust was not overdone, for I did not know m man at the time, and it was hard to say whether the act ing should be for the gallery or for the proscenium boxes Then all at once I saw him before me and heard hin ask me first in Spanish and then in English if I spok his language. I did not. Next, would I like to look a some very choice cigars just from Havana. The photo grapher had begged me to stand in the sunlight and giv him time, so I moved out from the shadow of the build ings and stood on the curb, as if to be out of the way o the passers by. With the tail of an eye I saw the grou from the office across the street begin to smile appreci atively. Cigars, cigars; no, I seldom smoked cigars, t tell the truth I found a good cigar something expensive I preferred the pipe. Aha, that was just the point. Goo cigars were usually very costly, but he, now, had som marvellous weeds that he would be glad to sell me a half the regular price. They were right from Havana. H would call them the choicest of the choice. Indeed, h would have no hesitation in declaring this a veritabl opportunity, would that debonnair gentleman. Would go with him and have but one look at these wonderfu Havanas? They were hard by. Just down here a fe steps, and he made a vague gesture towards the littl alley back of the Grand Hotel. I demurred for the sak of appearances and the photographer, and asked him ho he could afford to sell good cigars so cheap. I could n quite make out his reasons, and even now after long re flection, I cannot be quite sure that he advanced any tha were seriously calculated to deceive. He enwrappe himself in a mist of words, put on volubility as it were cloak. The difference in the value of a Mexican and a American dollar it would seem had a good deal to d with it, but as I was deceiving him into a belief tha he was deceiving me, it did not make much differen whether his reasons were good or not, so I finally a lowed myself to be persuaded.

"Well," says I, "I'll have a look at them anyhow, bu of course, you know I don't promise to buy any." H scorned the idea of so much as expecting a promise. W went down Montgomery avenue and a man, anoth Mexican, passed us on the run. That was the confede ate, I knew that much; he dived into the carriage e trance of the Palace Hotel and came out and joined u a huge package under his arm. Then the three of went into the alley behind the Grand Hotel and t package was opened on a window ledge. Such cigar

In the matter of cigars I am "No critic; but I kno what I like." But it seemed to me that the veriest litt messenger boy that ever shot a snipe could not ha been imposed upon by that reckless array of half-cur doctored leaf. Of course, I went prepared to see a frau and this may have been why I was so impressed. B the fraud was so palpable, but the cigars were so shin but they were so black, so brittle, so clumsily rolled, th I began to wonder how the affable Mexican could ke his countenance. He did, though, and worse. He select out a bunch apparently at random, and apparently random picked from it one of the cigars and handed it me with a graceful bow. His pal lit a match and light for me. The cigar was excellent—at least it so seem to me, who only "know what I like," and the tw watched me with grave concern for a moment, while pretended not to notice that the ribbon about that pa ticular bunch was frayed and worn by much handlin and that it was the only ribbon in the box that was.

Says the pal: "You could smoke that cigar in th parlor in the presence of ladies," adding: "Notice th aroma of it," and he actually made a hollow of his han to catch the smoke, that I might smell it. He bade n notice the fuzz on it while he told me that the ordina cigars were made in a mould—he did tell me this san monstrous thing—and that this was rolled by hand. Th he offered to sell me the contents of the entire box for twenty dollars and we came to haggling.

I told him I would not think of taking more than hundred at most, and that as I had not the money abo me, would he call at my office?

No, he would not. Most certainly and decidedly. Th in a burst of confidence the portly one said: "You se I must tell you quite frankly, that we are without license, and—well, you know." This with an intellige look.

"Yes," says I, "I know," and I did. None better. Th he must have his money right away because he was g ing to leave on the steamer, he was, but—here he b came confiding again—he would wait half an hour f me on the same corner where we had first met. I to him that I did not wish to trouble him to that exten and I tried to say it in a manner which would imp that I did not know he had been standing on that corn all that day, and the day before, and the day befo that. That he had, in fact, been wearing out his sho upon that spot of asphalt for the least year or mor Then I think they suddenly became suspicious of me, a least I fancied they acted as though they had. For th began doing up the boxes again in a great hurry, an the pal said he would have to go back to work and di appeared. The portly, affable gentleman and I parte company with the understanding that if I did not me him again at half an hour from that time it would mea that I had decided not to invest.

The Mexican was, of course, an awful, unmitigate fraud, but he was the most courteous and well-behav tradesman I have ever had dealings with, and I belie I felt, in a way, mean about the whole matter. B what I should really like to know is this: How far the policeman who has that crossing mixed up in th affair? He has, of course, seen my man standing on his corner every day, and has seen him approach an lead away his victims by the score. He must know wh is going on, and why doesn't he stop it? That is wha I should like to know.

JUSTIN STURGIS.

The Fort Point Station

Ready for Action

Firing the Mortar

Life-line Practice

Down the Runway—to the Rescue

Home Again

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS AROUND THE HARBOR OF TH

The Ocean Beach Station

Recreation

Business

The Work of Resuscitation

LIFE-LINE AND SURF-BOAT

Daily Routine of the Life-Saving Station at Fort Point.

One doesn't like to imagine rescuing the perishing and saving life and all that, reduced to a science, a mere matter of drill and discipline systematized and unemotional. And yet after you have considered a life-saving station, above all after you have seen the splendid, efficient work, and the boat itself—a very marvel of building and ingenuity—you see, of course, that it's the best and only way. Just as the professional and unmoved calmness of a trained physician is better than any amount of unpracticed sympathy and pity and bungling efforts at relief.

These men at the stations don't often get into the papers. It's only when a big ship is wrecked that you hear them mentioned incidentally as saving the lives of the crew and passengers. But the surfmen's duty is quite as much the prevention of a wreck as it is that of taking off the survivors.

I visited one of these stations the other day—Fort Point station, in the twelfth life-saving district. It is one of thirteen such stations up and down the Pacific Coast, and it will suffice as a type of all the others. The life-saving stations are a part of the civil service, and under the control of the Treasury Department at Washington. They are officered by a general Superintendent (Maj. Blakeney) and an assistant Inspector. Each station is manned by a crew of eight surfmen and a Captain, also called a keeper. In each station there are two boats, sometimes more, but two at least; the little life boat for quick, nearby work—it can be manned and run out in thirty seconds—and the big surf-boat, which is perhaps, the best sea-going boat ever devised by a builder. The surf-boat at the Fort Point station is quite thirty feet long, is manned by the entire crew of eight surfmen and the Captain, and at a pinch could carry fifty people. This boat can neither sink, nor fill, nor be stove in, nor capsize, nor turn turtle, nor ship a sea, nor do any of the evil tricks common to boats in a gale. If she should ship a sea she bales herself out; if a comber should succeed in capsizing her she will come right side up in a twinkling, and if a rock staves her in the fifty water-tight compartments keep her afloat. Once get her out in the open sea and there is practically nothing that can hurt her. The only difficulty is with the huge combing breakers that bar the way. These can roll high enough to keep her shorebound. The men know the signs well enough. For instance, when the combers swash solid and green over the lowest Seal Rock without breaking into spray, then they know that they are helpless. Helpless, that is, as far as the boat is concerned, for if the wreck is not too far out she can be reached then by the beach apparatus. Three hundred yards is as far as this apparatus can be used with any certainty. It has been effective at five hundred, but this is an unusual case. The stations at Fort Point and by the Cliff House often use both the boat and the apparatus. The beach apparatus is the cart that carries the little canon used in shooting the line over the wreck. Once the outside end of the line is fast the breeches buoy is run back and forth between the wreck and the shore till every one is landed. But wrecks don't come every day, and as often as not there is nothing for the crew to do but spend their time in the daily hammer-and-tongs routine. Monday they drill with the beach apparatus, Tuesday with the surf and life-boat, Wednesday with the signals, Thursday with the apparatus again, Friday is the practice in resuscitation, Saturday is a general cleaning day.

Between whiles the beach—their section of it—is patrolled night and day, and a lookout kept for distressed vessels and those ships that are unacquainted with the coast and are coming in too close. East the surfman has to be expert in the use of the international code of signals, by means of which he can talk to a ship as by a telephone, waving her away from a dangerous coast, asking her what is the matter, telling her, perhaps, in case of threatened wreck, that the boat is to be put off or the line shot, or, when the storm is violent enough (when, for instance, the combers dont break as they go over the lowest seal rock),, signalling the ominous message, "No boat can live in such a sea."

In foggy weather this patrol is doubled, and at night each patrolman carries a torch instead of a flag. There are observation stations here and there along the beach and from these the surfman can sweep the horizon easily enough. It is his duty on the discovery of a ship flying the distress signal to report her to his Captain, who thereupon takes the whole responsibility of the situation, deciding whether the shot line is to be used or the boat, or whether the boat can go out at all. Never have the men thus far failed of their duty. Whenever it has been possible to go they have gone. Even when the Elizabeth went down—one of the most heartrending wrecks that ever occurred—the boats would have gone out had the tugs given them a tow.

There is something—much, in fact—about a life-saving station that suggests a fire-engine house. There is the same discipline, drill and organization; the same watchfulness; the same readiness in case of emergency; the dispatch in getting out ("rolling," as the fireman would call it); the same danger to be met; the same chance for pluck and perseverance, and last of all, there is the enemy to be watched and waited for at every hour of the day or night. But the preponderance of danger is on the side of the surfman. The fireman often fights the enemy from a safe point, and only once in a while does a really great fire occur. But a storm heavy enough to warrant bringing out the boat at all is always big with danger, and the surfman must invariably go right out upon the same sea that is thrashing the wreck to death, must trust himself to the very elements that are clamoring for the lives on board the ship.

It is all very splendid, but one fancies the real reward must be the work itself; wages can't pay for it, and the surfmen do not receive medals to any noticeable extent, but the idea of having dared those thundering green combers and the churning, open sea beyond, beaten and outwitted the enemy, gotten the lives from under its grip, wrestled and fought a way back to shore, that must be the real reward—a thing better than gold medals and "mentions in dispatches."

A DAUGHTER OF JERUSALEM

MADAME MOUNTFORD IN HER REPRESENTATIONS OF SCRIPTURAL SCENES AND PERSONAGES

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I fear, dearest Diary, I have been enjoying life too much this week to give you a really entertaining description of my experiences. I have simply been satiated with pleasure and feel more like a bumble bee who has drunk too deeply of a subtly seductive honey than a sportive cricket. You know, I told you that Mr. and Mrs. Oelrichs have invited me to go with them to the circus on Friday evening. Well, there were a merry party of us—Birdie Fair, Ethel Patton, Marie Wells, Miss Smith and myself. We had four boxes and enjoyed the full measure of the entertainment provided. I don't think I saw much of the circus. I was too much engaged listening to the fun. Afterwards we went to supper at the Zinkand and then a weary cricket went home to bed.

Early next morning I started for San Rafael to participate in the paper chase. It went off splendidly and the course through Marinetta Park was unusually pretty. Miss Crowley and Baron A. von Schroeder won the cups. Miss Crowley is a superb horsewoman—rides astride—and possesses that degree of pluck without which no one can attain genuine success. I only wished I had a better horse, as I should liked to have shown what mettle there resideth in me, but, alas, my old plug shied at the smallest suspicion of an incline and regarded a fence with so much disfavor that I did not dare attempt even the lowest. After the chase Mrs. Warfield invited us all to a "campfire" in the Coleman tract. It was an eminently jolly affair. The fire was built and the dinner prepared in view of all of us. Little tables were arranged under the trees and we soon made short work of the delicacies provided. Afterwards Dr. Shiels made a smart little speech on behalf of the guests, in which he thanked Mrs. Warfield for the pleasure she had given. Then Mr. Crooks arranged some athletic sports, which were great fun. There was an imitation cock fight, a wrestling match and an exciting game of leap frog.

On Sunday I returned to town and went in the evening to a dinner at Mrs. Oelrichs'. We were pretty nearly the same crowd as on Friday, with the addition of Mr. Greenway, Mr. Phelan and Fred Webster. The menu was capital. Mr. Oelrichs has a genius for devising unique dishes and relishes them accordingly. Then on Monday night I went with Aunt Sybil and a party of young people to the Baldwin to see Crane in "A Fool of Fortune." I was rather disappointed for various reasons. In the first place, though the house was full, I hardly saw one familiar face. I don't think first night performances can be hallmarked "fashionable" any longer. The play was not wildly interesting and possibly I may have been a trifle tired. In any case, I was distinctly bored, a most unusual state of mind in Miss Cricket. On Tuesday Uncle Harold and Aunt Caroline took some Eastern friends up Mt. Tamalpais for a two days' trip and invited me to join their party. We were more than usually fortunate. We had clear weather, a bright moon and could hardly complain of the larder. I saw several people I knew—Mr. and Mrs. L. A. Booth, Mrs. Phelps, Miss Phelps, Miss Booth and Dr. P. L. Sherman were there, and on Wednesday evening the Oelrichs brought up a crowd and we all joined forces and had a jolly night of it. Then on Thursday morning we returned to town.

Every one is coming home at last, and we hope in a week or two to have brighter times. The invitations are out for the Howard-Adams dancing class, which has been reorganized. I have not yet received a bid to Gertie Bates' class, but expect one during the next week or so. Mamma does not want me to join so many of the clubs, but one is agreeable for the girls, another on account of the dancing, a third because of the prestige attached, so it is hard to discriminate, is it not? Frank Hicks and Mrs. Hicks are up from Los Angeles, and are in San Rafael; they were all much worried about Mrs. Hager, but are beginning to feel more encouraged. I hope she will soon be well as she intended doing some entertaining this winter, and from the point of view of a Cricket that is the one thing needful.

Oh, I had so much fun on Thursday. Mr. and Mrs. Osborne invited a few of us to come and see the "First Born" from behind the scenes. You have no idea how attractive a front view of an audience is, and then to see the actors from the point of view of the stage, it was marvellously impressive. But I am glad I am not a mummer after all. The best part is what is seen from the front. All the gilding is just plain gold paint from the rear, and there are draughts and narrow, stuffy dressing rooms. No, we audiences have the best of it. Miss Buckley is so sweet and pretty even when you see the make-up close by, and as for Mr. Powers and Mr. Osborne, I really thought they were genuine Chinese—their make-up is remarkably well done. Still, I do not want to be an actress as much as I used to, but I always was rather pleasure-loving, and I detest drudgery. Work has no wondrous fascination for Miss Cricket, and so adieu until another week has given me more wit or wisdom.

AN ISRAELITE MOTHER

Yours,

MISS CRICKET.

* *

The marriage of the week was that of Miss Sadie Samuels and Isaac S. Foorman, which was solemnized at the home of the bride's parents, 1624 Octavia street. Really it was a very handsome affair, and the bride looked charming. This comment is so often extended by way of courtesy that it is not always received with credence, but there are agreeable exceptions in which the facts are as stated. Miss Samuels wore white satin, shrouded in an overdress of tulle. A bertha of point lace ornamented the corsage. She was attended by her sister, Miss Jennie Samuels, and Dr. Voorsanger solemnized the ceremony in the bay window of the drawing room, converted into a floral bower for the occasion. A first-class supper, with Moet & Chandon in abundance, followed. The presents were magnificent, as well they might be, for the Foormans are millionaires and the Samuels are wealthy. Mrs. Foorman presented her daughter-in-law with a magnificent necklace of solitaire diamonds—the stones being large and of the finest water—really a beautiful ornament. A lovely jeweled watch came from the groom, and there was silver and crystal for the new household. In honor of the occasion Mr. Foorman sent a check for $1,000 to the Pacific Orphan Asylum.

Save for entertainments in which the Oelrichs are the moving spirits, there is precious little happening in town. It is generally quiet in San Francisco at this time of year, but society has seldom had so little to gossip about as at the moment. The wherefore of this is hard to guess, though it is presumable every one has been good, husbands devoted, mothers careful and wives correct.

Over the Maria Kip Orphanage there is soon to be a little excitement. The institution is largely supported by private contributions and requires coin, and some entertainments are being given to consummate that result. The Givins have one affair in hand and Miss Jennie Moore, of 2024 Jackson, has another arranged for the 18th, at which there should be some fun.

Mrs. Salisbury has gone to New York on again and is installed at the Hobart mansion, business, but will return as soon as possible. Mrs. Winthrop E. Lester is back in town on Van Ness avenue.

A jolly dinner party and reception was given by Mrs. Stern, at 621 Leavenworth street, in honor of the birthday of Miss Heller. It was quite an elaborate affair.

Quite an interesting wedding was that of Miss Lesley Tilden and Mr. O. D. Bidwell, which was celebrated at St. Luke's Wednesday evening. Miss Tilden is the daughter of Joseph Tilden and is petite and exceedingly pretty and dainty. She has light brown hair and beautiful eyes and made a charming bride. Mr. Bidwell is from Northern Virginia and is wealthy. At the wedding Miss Edith Howland was maid of honor; Miss Kate Gunn, Miss Franenholz, Miss Turnbull, Miss Kirby and Miss Brastow were bridesmaids.

At the Bohemian Club on Saturday night there is a dinner in honor of the playwright Augustus Thomas, who is here to superintend the production of his new play.

Miss Bradford, daughter of William B. Bradford, of the Alaska Packers' Association, and Dr. W. F. Sharp were married at San Rafael on Wednesday afternoon at the home of the bride's parents. Miss Bradford has long been regarded as one of the belles of San Rafael, and on this important occasion was admirably gowned and looked her best. The house was beautifully decorated with flowers, ferns and palms, and the parlor, where the ceremony was performed, was strung with white satin ribbons. Supper was served in a big tent erected on the lawn, and the health of the happy pair was drunk in champagne.

Mr. and Mrs. Oelrichs took a party of friends to the summit of Mt. Tamalpais on Wednesday afternoon. They ascended on a special train, accompanied by Huber's orchestra, had a fine dinner at the Summit Hotel, and the evening was spent charmingly with music and singing, for Donald Graham accompanied the party and was in admirable voice. There was an early adjournment to bed, for the special consideration of the ascent was to witness the sunrise. Sol put in an appearance at the accustomed time and was welcomed with music from the orchestra. It was a delightful morning and the outlook was magnificent. Of course invidious comparisons with European scenery were then properly and patriotically in order. Subsequently breakfast, and then the party descended into Mill Valley and returned to town. Mr. and Mrs. Oelrichs' guests were Miss Fair, Miss Marie Wells and Miss Blair, H. O. Bax-Ironsides, Fred Webster and Donald De V. Graham. The Oelrichs talk of spending some day at Del Monte. The return of Mr. Oelrichs there will undoubtedly attract back to the caravansary a crowd of young people, as it is admitted he made the region gayer than it has been since the days of the late Charles Crocker.

* *

Since the advent of the various Dancing Clubs in Oakland the debutante as such has been to a great degree eliminated from society. In former days a maiden burst from the chrysalis existence of the school girl whose horizon was bounded by books to the butterfly life of the society girl—to-day we have a gradual evolution. The school girl, when she lengthens her frocks and coils up her hair, joins a dancing club in which the ages of the members range from sixteen to twenty. Then she is invited to informal parties, and, as the years pass on, she tastes the various phases of social existence without being formally introduced. The fact that about a third of the maidens of to-day consider a college education essential is probably at the bottom of this new order of things. Formerly, after a girl had graduated from a fashionable seminary she considered her education complete. Now she deems herself very old-fashioned and frivolous unless she takes up some course of study. The fin de siecle miss must have some ultimate aim in life besides matrimony. If not especially gifted, she must develop a fad or a pet charity—something that will direct attention toward her. As our ancestors trained their daughters to make good housekeepers and mothers, our mammas bring us up to fill any niche in life into which an untoward fate may call.

Unusually enjoyable was the card party given last week by Miss Bessie Palmer to the prospective wanderers in the East—Misses Vrooman, Wellman, Hush, Miss Grace Gorrill, Miss Florence Sharon and Miss Ethel Valentine were the guests of honor. The game played was "Hearts." Miss Bertha McElrath proved the fortunate winner of the prize. The Haywards Club House appears to retain its popularity and hardly a week passes without a few Oaklanders making up dinner or bicycle parties to this resort. Among the most recent affairs given there were the Edson Adams dinner on Thursday evening, in which a half dozen or so young married couples participate, and this week, when Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Kittredge, Miss Holt and Miss Barker gave a jolly party there. A sort of reunion after their summer at Castle Crags.

One of the more recent fads is the clambake. Mrs. Robert Knight is the author of the latest achievement in this direction, and her party at Lake Chabot on Thursday evening was worthy of repetition. She was especially fortunate in having a clear night and a full moon. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. Egbert Stone, Mr. and Mrs. Will Meek, Mr. and Mrs. Allen and others.

Dr. and Mrs. Edwin Boyes entertained Hon. H. C. Cargill, Mrs. Cargill and the Misses Cargill of Canada at dinner on Tuesday evening. The Misses Cargill are rather pretty types of the Anglo-Canadian, possessing somewhat of the esprit of their American cousins. Mr. Cargill is a member of the Canadian Legislature.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market Street

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

Rubber heels: Easy walking, no fatigue. At Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

THE THEATRES

A Poor Play Redeemed by a Good Act —Coming Dramatic Events.

"A Fool of Fortune" is a strikingly peculiar piece of dramatic work and one may be forgiven for believing that the programme is in error in crediting its authorship to one person, for the third act is as unlike the two preceding it as gin is unlike water except in general appearance. The play is made up of three acts, two of which are thin, watery, commonplace, weak and somewhat tiresome, while the third is muscular enough dramatically to have been written by "some other fellow." No dramatist or detective could comb Wall street with a fine-tooth comb and discover among its brokers an Elisha Cunningham such as the dramatist has given us. He is a weak, light-headed, silly, impossible sort of a fellow wholly out of harmony with his environment, and is dominated by a species of wit that probably accompanies Lew Dockstadter and a dozen other minstrels in private life. The Elisha Cunningham type of Wall street broker is an unreal and imaginary personage, who would be out of place in Wall street and really has no business anywhere else on earth among a polite and civilized people. This refers, of course, to the Elisha in the first two disappointing acts; the Elisha of the third act is worth while. I should like to see more of him, in a prologue and three acts. There is a basis for a play in that wrecked and shattered stock broker which strongly appeals to me. He is an interesting, pathetic figure, and if the author of "A Fool of Fortune" had possessed a master mind she would never have frittered away the aspiration which created that broken down old man, in one act of an otherwise very mediocre play.

There are unfathomable peculiarities about certain dramatists. Drew was here a while ago with "Rosemary," a better written play than "A Fool of Fortune," but lacking in one feature that is a redeeming characteristic of Crane's comedy. I pointed out at the time where an otherwise strong piece of dramatic work was bungled by a prolonged monologue and an unnecessary clown. The delicate touch of sentiment that clings to you, was not there; it was painfully absent; but you will find it in "A Fool of Fortune." The general exit L. U. E. in the scene is objectionable, for it involves the entire family passing the dead man unnoticed, but this is hypercritical, for the few moments of silence in which Lloyd and his stricken partner are left upon the stage are to me impressive, and are to my mind the best moments of the play. The discovery by Lloyd that Cunningham, his old associate, is dead, the slow movement toward him with the tape of the stock ticker still in his hand, the falling by his side without a word of exclamation, strongly appeal to the writer's sense of decent dramatic arrangement. If the author had put a single word in Lloyd's mouth during this scene, if she had made him utter his grief in words, she would have ruined everything and one would have been justified in throwing something at Lloyd. The touch is there. It is the real thing. Mr. Crane is entitled to a great deal of credit for his really clever work in this act. It was admirable. Curious, is it not, that the time should ever come when Crane's wit begins to tire one and his serious work interest?

If the first two acts were thin, they gave us Walter Hale as Count de Cluny and William Boag as Cornelius Green of New Jersey. When Cornelius came upon the stage I shuddered for fear the author had willed it that he should perform all the customary monkey tricks usually assigned to the countryman visiting his metropolitan friends, but Cornelius and the author wisely refrained from cheap nonsense, and Mr. Boag was amusing and natural besides. Walter Hale is gifted with a fine presence and his Count de Cluny was well sustained and gracefully done. The company is evenly good, but not strikingly so. Aside from the closing scene there was no place for any one to distinguish himself or herself, so one may not fairly measure the merits of the troupe by this programme.

B.

---

The last week of "The First Born" was more successful than the first, from a point of attendance as well as of applause. The next thing anent the play is its reception in the East. It will of necessity lack the local interest that made it go here, but it should attract attention because of its novelty and dramatic value. The play this week is H. Grattan Donnelly's gallery affair, "The American Girl," a piece full of mawkish sentiment and impossible juvenile precocity. The children seem to claim most of the attention, little Venie Wells in particular. The tough song and business of this little one is a bit of the real thing—as good as anything of Ada Lewis or any of her contemporaries. Mr. George Osborne has made Ross Bolter peculiarly his own, and this week is renewing a pleasant impression. Miss Gertrude Foster, the new leading lady, is charming at times, and periodically displays commendable emotion, but her general work is too stagey to be altogether agreeable. As Twister, May Buckley is pretty and pleasing, and Juliet Crosby and Gertrude Tidball are both well cast.

DRAMATIC NOTES

Xavier Scharwenka, the brilliant pianist and composer, will appear at the California Theater early next month.

Wright Huntington, who is said to be a competent actor, has been engaged by the Alcazar management to play leading roles.

The Harmony Choral Club, Prof. Robert Lloyd leader, will have charge of the next "Musical Evening" at Byron Mauzy Hall, Thursday, 23d inst. The admission is by invitation.

There is to be a concert for the benefit of the Young Men's Christian Association at the Association Auditorium on Tuesday evening next, at which the Philomel and Knickerbocker Quartettes, Mr. Lucy and Mr. C. B. Newton will assist.

"A Serious Tangle," by Sidney Grundy, precedes the Chinese play at the Alcazar next week. Mr. Osborne will play Uncle John and Miss Foster will represent Mrs. Featherston. May Buckley, Juliet Crosby and Hugo Toland are also in the cast. "Hazel Kirke" is in preparation.

Mr. Otto Bendix has arranged for a series of classical concerts to be given at Byron Mauzy Hall, commencing October 19th. Mr. Bendix will be assisted by Mr. Marquardt and Mr. Landsberger, violinists, and Mr. Von der Mehden, 'cellist. Admission, 50 cents and $1. Special arrangement for the series.

The young pianist May Lucine Potvin, is to give a second recital at the Sherman-Clay Hall on Wednesday evening next. She rendered Rondo a Capriccio, Op. 129, by Beethoven; "Les Etincelles," by Moszkowski; "Magic Fire," by Wagner-Brassin, among other selections. Miss Potvin's first recital was a decided success.

Senor Antiolo Aramburo, who has just arrived from South America, will give a concert at the Sherman-Clay Hall next Tuesday evening. From his press notices it is possible that there is a musical treat in store. Miss Anita Casals, who accompanies Mr. Aramburo, has a fine soprano voice. Miss Ida Valerga and Mr. Carlyle Petersilea are also mentioned upon the programme.

Owing to the illness of Mr. Francis Carlyle, "Sue," the play adapted from Bret Harte's novel, will not hold the boards of the Columbia next week. In its place "The Wife," Belasco and De Mille's familiar play, will be produced. This is really a pity, as "Sue" cannot fail to be interesting to Californians. It is curious the perennial popularity of "The Wife," which is able to stand innumerable revivals and yet attract large audiences.

The Women's Educational and Industrial Union is to hold a historical carnival at Odd Fellows' Hall throughout next week. There will be four hundred participants, who will appear in the typical garb of the various nations. There will be booths, of course and each night three nations will give a series of tableaux. The Women's Educational and Industrial Union is a worthy organization, devoted to assisting women to become proficient in work, and as its entertainment is in aid of their building fund.

At Morosco's next week "The Slaves of Gold" have the stage. This play is by Emil Grandin and has had great success in the East. It will be elaborately mounted, of course. The hero, Richard Bartley, an old tradesman who has grown wealthy, learns of his daughter's death and vows that the remainder of his days shall be devoted to the accumulation of gold. The manner in which this vow is kept and the crimes committed because of it make the story. The scenery includes the interior of a mine, a fire and explosion, a flood of real water and many other sensations.

The seventh week of grand opera at the Tivoli will be signalized by a series of Wagnerian productions. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday we are to have "The Flying Dutchman," and on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights "Lohengrin" will be repeated. William Mertens plays the Dutchman, Abromoff is the Norwegian Captain, Rhys Thomas the huntsman, and Tillie Salinger enacts Senta in the "Dutchman." Considerable work has been done on the chorus, and Director Hinrichs promises a thoroughly effective production. It is something to look forward to.

"A Virginia Courtship," by Eugene Presbrey, is the play at the Baldwin next week. It is devoted to illustrating the customs and manners of old Virginia in the early days of the century. The action is set during the war between France and England, and the comedy comes in over the antagonism between Major Fairfax and a French widow, who live near one another. There are some excellent situations, no little sentiment and lots of swing, we are told. Mr. Crane will be the Major Fairfax and Miss Irish the French widow. This is Miss Irish's first appearance with Crane. Mr. Hale and Miss Haswell have the other roles. The following week "The Senator."

MUSIC

The Attitude of San Franciscans Towards Visiting Musicians — Miss Potvin's Playing.

Musical life in San Francisco does not take the form of a passion for pianoforte recitals. Long lines of advertising, loud puffings of the players' personal friends, only end in an echoing hall. When the widely vibrating names of Pachmann, Paderewski and D'Albert sound upon the public ear, the case is different; large audiences and enthusiasm grow to the bursting point, but when an unknown pianist ventures forth, the desire to assemble and hear confines itself exclusively to a small and niggling band of specialists. Some opine that the piano is not a gracious instrument in public esteem, and that only a reverberating reputation will gather together the curious or confiding. Yet the piano is everywhere, and players there are in clouds thicker than any Egyptian plague of locusts. Though not out of the range of contradiction, it may be hazarded that our musical public has some of the caution of the canny Scot, and prefers the demon it knows to the monster it has not been presented to. Ten years' experience of local musical event does not tend to prove the fallacy of this gingerly attitude —rather the reverse, for most of the novelties imported might have been allowed to maintain their pristine obscurity without bereaving our public of many estatic moments. Still, in the main, no public loses by being generous and wide awake, and though enthusiasm now erupts more profusely than it used to, the towering musicians unknown to local fame are not buried under avalanches of genial recognition.

Only a sharply defined talent, after all, makes any recital, whether dramatic, vocal, or instrumental, interesting for a whole evening. The individuality dowered with the qualities of power, intensity and endurance is not to be met with everywhere. Perhaps out of all the aspirants for fame among pianists, there are fewer instances of fitness to hold, unassisted, an audience than amongst any other class of musicians. In general, pianists are personages of tenacity unrelieved by imagination. The times are responsible, because in compelling all pianists to cover the whole field of composition the effort put out crushes, in most cases, possible individuality. All styles are not to be made to fit every artist.

Miss Potvin had the usual fate of pianists on a first appearance here; empty benches were her principal audience, with a sprinkling of musicians to make the emptiness the more pronounced. Why so great a point appears to be made of the teacher and celebrities with whom a musical aspirant has studied, is not to be very readily understood, for that no teaching will give talent is evident. A local audience apparently quires a list of celebrated names of teach for its performers before it can recognize ability of any kind in them, although our most able 'cellist owes nothing to celebrities, and proves that in the arts, as a great American has said, "A true man never acquires after college rules." The mania for studying with celebrities carries away all judgment, it seems, and long after the period of senility has advanced any European celebrity may count upon hundreds of American students, who in the end owe their best success to their native powers. Returning to Miss Potvin, it was at once to be felt that the young lady belonged to the large army of students who rely greatly upon the reputations of their instructors. The programme, though not a simple one, was chosen with modesty, a quality which, with sincerity, appeared to be a characteristic of the pianist herself. Acknowledging the years of conscientious mechanical labor, the unflagging memory and the freedom from fuss and small mannerism, as well as the evident appreciation of the musicians, there was no ground to raise enthusiasm upon. Much finger work, none of it particularly neat, excepting in a Chopin prelude in G, and a general, somewhat sticky, denseness of tone spread monotonously through the playing. The redeeming faults of extremes did not express themselves, and the droning rythmic quality proved the presence of musical temperament of the skin-deep kind. As far as could be judged by the numbers heard, Miss Potvin would make a better impression in a concert of mixed numbers, where such ability as she evincedd would be in relief, but for the long strain of a recital there was not that power of interesting and that wide flux of sympathetic emotion which is the property of almost all successful recital-givers. Objective playing, like objective acting, has had its day; the artists of the times all more or less conform to the subjective attitude, and for the pianist who is not a tone artist pure and simple there can be no very brilliant future.

LESLEY MARTIN.

---

Madame Mountford, known as the Daughter of Jerusalem, is to give a series of tableau lectures at Golden Gate Hall from September 17th to 25th, inclusive, illustrative of scriptural subjects. The entertainments are changed each evening, consisting as they do of different scenes and events. In that illustrating city life in Jerusalem the costumes are particularly striking. The sketch representing the Bedouins of the Desert is especially romantic, while on the last two evenings of the series, when the subject to be dealt with is entitled "Ecce Homo, or Bethelem to Calvary," the masterpiece of the whole creation will be presented.

Although her lectures are subjected to scriptural illustrations, they extend outside the somewhat rigid limits of scripture itself.

Gyp's new book, a review of which appears in another part of this paper, is out and is attractin some little attention. It is a curiously bound and illustrated affair and rather cheap for the money. It is for sale by J. Tauzy & Co., on Post street, above Montgomery.

Arrivals at the St. Denis Hotel, New York, to September 9th: A. Koenig, Mrs. G. F. Weeks and two children, San Francisco; Arthur Lerts, G. A. Andros, Los Angeles.

The Occidental Restaurant, 337 Bush street. Headquarters for tourists. Separate rooms for families. Meals a la carte. Lunch 50c. Best French Dinner in the city, 75c. Dan Ieuch, proprietor.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoiseurs.

Bookkeepers, students, and business men generally use Bank Stock paper. It preserves the sight. The Mysell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay st.

$2,000.00

Schilling's Best tea is the best you can get for anything like the money it costs.

Schilling's Best baking powder is the best you can get at any price.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

Experts Say

Where Finest Food Is Required Royal Baking Powder Must Be Used.

Miss Suzy Tracy, the cooking demonstrator in the Model Kitchen at the Mechanics' Fair, says:—

"In the practice of my profession as a teacher of cookery I have tried the different brands of baking powder, and I find that Royal Baking Powder gives the best satisfaction. I can accomplish the best results with a smaller quantity of Royal Baking Powder than of any other kind, and I find it always to be perfectly uniform in its action."

Suzy Tracy.

Bank Stock pads and tablets are made from pure stock, and are of high value from an oculistic standpoint. The Mysell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay street.

For the most complete line of summer shirtings and hose, J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st.

QUEEN LILY SOAP

Will not shrink Woolens, Flannels or the finest of Fabrics. The Best and Most Economical Soap Made. Washes Without Rubbing . . . .

PATRONIZE HOME INDUSTRY

Notice.—On receipt of 25 Queen Lily Soap wrappers, we will mail to any address a handsome picture, 15x20, free from all advertising matter.

NEW ENGLAND SOAP CO.
307 Sacramento St., S. F.

BOHEMIA IN LONDON

The Strange Ways of Duchesses and Others in Search of Amusement.

A writer in the "Atlantic Monthly" asserted recently that Society in England was less exclusive than society in America, because in the old country aristocracy is founded on an official basis, whereas in New York it is only an association based on wealth or family. In England, government functionaries have a recognized position in the social scale—in America, society and politics are poles apart. The consequence is that in London any one who is interesting is entertainable, whereas in New York the smart set considers exclusiveness its crown of glory. Actors, artists, literatures are distinguished guests in London drawing rooms. A fondness for literary people is regarded at Newport as a dangerous weakness.

The tendency of London to exalt the Bohemian and to feast the celebrity is amusingly treated in "The Folly of Pen Harrington" (D. Appleton & Co.), by Julian Sturgis. The heroine, Pen, is an extremely swell young person, something after the manner of "Dods," who has earned the freedom of a personality and is the head of the gayest clique in London. Its members call each other by their Christian names and walk hand in hand in the gardens of Duchesses. The book opens with an informal luncheon at the house of Miss Harrington, where the clique gathers daily to decide on its doings. In the midst of the meal Pen rushes in with news of the capture of a fresh lion, Peter Ward, a great African explorer and sportsman, whom she has snatched out of the grasp of Lady Carroway, the head of a rival set. Here is Lady Linda Russell, Otho Pharamont, the most correct man in London; Mr. and Mrs. Bobby, who are "little brothers of the rich," and for dinner invitations entertain their hosts with songs and dances; the Duchess of Buckland, large and stolid, who declares: "I adore talent. It is all that really matters," and sundry others. Peter Ward asks Lady Linda if Mr. Fussell in the government is any relation. She replies: "A connection—in fact, my husband," and asks, "What can you know about him?" "I've letters to him; he is well known where I came from," explains the explorer. Lady Fussell answers: "Well known—my poor old Fuss. He'll bore you to death." Miss Harrington declares here: "You should have had letters to Linda. Besides, you must not talk about husbands; it's not done, you know." There is much bright babble of this character interspersed through the book.

The scene changes subsequently to the magnificent country house of the Duchess of Buckland. The Bobbys are there; Pen also, and Otho Pharamont. The latter has just begun the publication of a literary review, and Mrs. Bobby has the honor of engaging him in conversation:

"I don't believe," she was saying eagerly, with her eyes upraised to the enigmatic orbs of Mr. Pharamont—"I don't believe that we are half so wicked as people say."

"We?" asked Otho with suavity.

"Society, I mean."

"Society isn't wicked," said Otho—"only vulgar."

"Oh, oh!" cried Letty, shocked but amused.

"That is what I count on for my review," said Otho. "All my contributors will have handles to their names." His eyes rested on some light chairs, which had been brought out to the green, and he offered one to Letty, who perched upon it with a flutter of gratification. He sank into a more comfortable one himself, and resting his head on the back of it, stretched his long straight legs out before him.

Letty turned eagerly towards him, sitting up very straight, eager to please. "Do go on," she said: "I'm dying to hear about the review. Shall you really edit it yourself?"

"My name will be on the cover," he replied.

"All titles!" she cried with a little ecstasy: "how clever! And of course you won't have to pay them for writing!"

"They will charge extra for their titles," said Otho, lighting a cigarette.

"Oh," she said, with round mouth and eyes, not knowing if he were in jest or earnest; "Oh!—Isn't the dear Duchess to write in the first number?"

"Yes. On society."

"And you don't mean that she will take money?"

"She has consented," said Otho, tipping off the ash with the nail of his little finger, "to take it out in advertisements of the Duke's coal. We shall give him a page."

The cleverest characterization in the book is that of the Bobbys. No one has so neatly caught the points and features of this type of the social "hanger-on" as Sturgis, who has created here two amusing personalities, who might be converted to stage purposes at a moment's notice. They always travel together, which is in itself a feature and gives them a cachet, and, as Lady Linda explains to the Duchess, "they are most useful in a country house; they do little things after dinner, imitate pigs and chickens and all that." They appear "slim and elegant and agreeable to the eye, and nothing could be more correct than their dress and bearing." They had paused to stable their bicycles in the hall. They went everywhere on wheels; it was at once fashionable and economical. It's the ambition of the Bobbys to be invited to Plymley, the Duchess' country house, and Lady Linda mischievously tries to assist them:

"Jane," she said turning amiably to the Duchess, "you have no idea how clever and amusing the Bobbys are."

Bobby beamed and purred upon the Duchess; he addressed her with impetuous frankness. "We are a success," he said, aren't we, Letty?"

"A succes fou," she said; "at least Bobby is."

"Oh, Letty!" he cried, and shook a finger at her, "it's you, it's really all you—almost all you!" He purred at her and she faintly echoed the sweet sound.

After this pause eloquent of mutual affection, "Duchess," said Bobby, with eager candor, "I do wish you could see Letty do little things after dinner. We just get up, Letty and I, just as we are, and we do a little thing, a little nothing, light, 'fin,' just a touch—like that." And he gave a little peck at the air with a delicate finger and thumb.

"What do you mean?" asked the Duchess; "do you act plays?"

"Plays, playets, scenets, trifles, morceaux. We make them ourselves; that is, we take them a little from the French, but they are really all ours—all Letty's, really." He cooed and she responded, and "Oh, Bobby," she said, "it's really all you."

"She has a touch," said Bobby to the Duchess; "you wouldn't believe it; a touch, a delicacy, a finesse; you know. So different to professional actresses; and she sings—little chansons." He kissed his fingers, graceful, ecstatic.

"Oh, Bobby," said his wife, "you know I haven't any voice."

"No, no, dear, of course not. How should she have a voice?" he asked of the others. There was a suggestion of grossness about a voice. "Letty murmurs," he added; "she warbles like a little mouse, or a little bird, a tomtit." He pecked at the air with his slender finger and thumb.

"And we do them for charities, too. Oh, we are charitable. I do wish, Duchess, that you could see us in some of our little things."

"Would you mind, began the Duchess, slowly, and paused in thought.

"Anything for you! We should like to do anything for you."

"Would you mind," continued the Duchess, "finding the butler, and asking him when luncheon will be ready?"

Bobby had hoped for better things; he looked on his little wife with comical expressive eyes; but she nodded sharply; she was the more practical.

"Yes, of course, Duchess; certainly," said Bobby. He purred once more and hastened to the door. Lady Linda laughed her gayest laugh. The Duchess was descending to the depths of a tragic gloom. "Were you asked to luncheon?" she inquired of little Mrs. Bobby, who was still seated at her side.

"Oh, yes; at least I think so; oh, yes."

"Think so?"

"Pen is so kind; she so often says——"

C.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

THE FRIVOLOUS GYP

The Follies of the Moment Satirized in "En Balade."

There are some books that are called books of the year—solid, sober, serious affairs, dubbed such to distinguish them from the lighter weight books of the day and the very light books of the hour. But what shall one say of "Gyp's" latest vaporous ephemera, "En Balade"? It is not a book of the minute or even the second. It is kinetescopic in its rapidity of transition. There will be no second edition, for even if it were now being pressed, the allusions in "En Balade" would be stale ere it could be got upon the book stands.

It is a strange, silly book, read with Anglo-Saxon eyes, and its silliness, its miserable shallowness, its reflection of a jaded, exhausted and effete society are more repulsive than otherwise.

"En Balade" is the doings and dialogues of such characters as these, all brought together into one company and promenaded in the fashionable high places of modern Paris: Louis XIV, Bayard, Alcibiades, Thois, Hercules, Saint Louis, Richelieu, Monsieur Citoyen Moses, Madame de Maintenon, Cato, Noah, Vespasienne d'Argentan (a Parisienne of to-day), Jeanne d'Arc, Mercury, Socrates, etc., etc., etc.

These people fore-gather in the Champs Elysees and decide that they will make a little excursion into Paris—Louis XIV for mere distraction, Richelieu to see M. Hanoteaux, Diogenes to find an honest man, Saint Louis to arouse public opinion in favor of the Christians in Armenia, Noah to become drunk, Thais and Madame de Maintenon to enjoy tete-a-tetes with an Hungarian gypsy Rigo (a very palpable allusion to the affair of the Princess of Chimay). They visit the race course of Auteuil and the opera, where a charity ball is being given for the Protestant refugees in the flooded districts along the Mississippi River.

At Auteuil "Gyp" finds occasion to caricature the athletic fever which it seems has pervaded Paris, in this fashion.

Flor d'Epreflеury, a companion of Vespasienne d'Argentan, a very up-to-date Parisienne, appears upon the scene:

Louis XIV, ogling Flore—Pretty little woman.

Diogenes, moving away discontentedly—I'm not looking for that sort of thing.

Socrates—Nor I.

Napoleon (to Flore)—What's your name? (She glances at him over her shoulder).

Flore (calling Sansgeyne)—Monsieur de Sangeyne, you, whose great, very great-grandfather was squire to the Great King, will you present me to Hercules?

Louis XIV to Napoelon—She knows how to live evidently.

Sangeyne (presenting Flore)—Hercules, this is Flore d'Epreflеury; Flore, this is Hercules.

Buckingham (to Flore)—Madame, I am Monsieur Fouquet, of whom you certainly must have heard.

Flore (without noticing Fouquet, to Hercules)—You must be a great lover of outdoor exercise.

Hercules—Of course.

Flore—I believe you have beaten every record.

Hercules (flattered)—Every one.

Flore (admiringly)—That is very chic.

Louis XIV—I, mademoiselle, I am the King Louis XIV, he who—

Flore (to Hercules)—You were saying—

Hercules—Nothing. I didn't open my mouth.

Buckingham (to Flore)—Madame, I am George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. I formerly enjoyed a certain celebrity—

Flore (taking Hercules' arm)—Let's go look at the horses.

However, Gyp, speaking through the mouth of Hercules, does not approve of what she chooses to call the modern "athleticisme."

Bayard (coming back in company of Hercules)—He's not pleased with football, Hercules. He expected something very different. It left him rather cold.

Sangeyne—That was a good match with the English team, though.

Bayard—The captain had some hot words with Hercules.

Vespasienne d'Argentan—Ehbien you don't find it chic, this football.

Hercules—Ah, no. That a sport? Never; no more than the bicycle. Skating, horses, swimming, arms—those are what you call sport. Things that make a man fine-looking. But that! It's the sport that deforms the young men of to-day and makes their faces repulsive. They batter each other, knock each other down, smash-in each other's chests. They bring over young heroes from England and America and make matches with them against the French for no other evident purpose than to batter our young fellows to death, and we call it fun. Bah!

A great deal of Gyp's drivel in this senseless book is directed against the Jews (the real war- or peace-makers of Europe, if all tales are true).

Bayard—Look at the children in the Paris parks; they are nearly all little Jews. In thirty years there will not be a single Frenchman left. Look at them; they are the hope of the country, these little Jews.

Richelieu—The Jews, ah yes, the Jews. They have everything in their power nowadays. Their hand is upon the government, backing up their friends' enterprises or checking and humbling some rival. The political world is fairly grovelling at their feet. The nobility welcomes them—

Sangeyne—Is welcomed by them especially.

Saint Louis (indignantly)—Is it possible?

Sangeyne—It is very humble nowadays, the nobility. It submissively begs for invitations at the houses of the Jews.

Moses—Pecause it's only der Jews who gives der finest receptions. Id's natural dey should go dere.

Sangeyne—So you see, of course, they are not to blame. It's the Jew in this case who has the whip hand.

Again Gyp calls her readers' attention to the fact that France—modern France—is forgetting its ancient ideals and does so in this manner:

Vespasienne d'Argentan—Have you seen Jeanne d'Arc?

Saint Louis (loftily)—Jeanne d'Arc is not here, madame. (They are at the opera ball, by the way). This kind of a place would ill suit her holy character.

Vespasienne—I don't know whether it harmonizes or not. I know she is here.

Fouquet (on his tiptoes)—That's a fact, she's here. (To Jeanne d'Arc, who comes up pouting). What's the matter, my little Jeanne d'Arc? Come now, tell us what's the trouble.

Jeanne d'Arc—All my friends have left me. They're off having a good time somewhere, while they leave me to twirl my thumbs behind at home. It's not nice of them.

Vespasienne—They gave you the go-by, is that it?

Jeanne d'Arc—You say madame?

Talleyrand—The fact is, she is not much amused, this poor Jeanne d'Arc. They left her to languish in her hotel.

Jeanne d'Arc—I passed the day looking out of the window. The night came, and when I saw the stars I was less timid.

Bayard—I, I am never afraid.

Louis XIV—This great man is full of vanity.

And so it goes—a little endless trickle of drivel, sparking on the surface, perhaps, but so shallow that you can see at once to the bottom—see that there are only stones there and never a twinkle of gold.

The illustrations are strange, contorted, colored affairs, the work of that picture-maker who signs himself "Bob," and who imitates the style of the schoolboy with slate and pencil.

N.

Bank Stock paper relieves, strengthens and saves the sight. Made in five different qualities. The Mysell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay street.

When over-tired by the day's sports, the nerves are unstrung and sleeplessness ensues try a sponge bath liberally perfumed with Murray & Lanman's Florida Water. A delightful sense of repose will come over you, closely followed by sound, refreshing sleep. This is the natural method—it is better than sedatives or narcotics.

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co, Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from ten drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address:

F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O.

☞Sold by druggists, 75c.

A Rose of Yesterday

BY

F. MARION CRAWFORD

Cloth, 12mo., $1.25

THE latest novel of the leading novelist of the day. Have you read it? Do you fear that it may not be equal to your favorite among his books? Yet "he has never displayed greater deftness in telling a simple, straightforward story in such a way as to rivet the reader's attention," says the "Ledger."

The "Literary Era" says: "Mr. Crawford is continually producing a surprise."

A Rose of Yesterday

is one. "It is one of the strongest books Mr. Crawford has ever written," says another.

Have you heard that it is a "problem novel," and do you hate to be preached at? So does Mr. Crawford, and "his purpose is not forced down the reader's throat, but is so gradually unfolded as the interests of the intensely dramatic story develop that one recognizes the truth, force and helpfulness of it without boredom."—Augusta "Herald." In Chicago the critics say: "It is brief, but beautiful and strong * * * as charming a piece of pure idealism as ever came from Mr. Crawford's pen."—The "Tribune." Then, too, is a refutation of the saying that in its author's novels the women are inferior to the men, and of the inference that his opinion of women is not of the highest. Such an opinion could not be held by any one who can imagine, much less understand to the inmost, as he does, the character of Helen Harmon. Another critic writes that the book "leaves the feeling that we have met good and true friends." The New York "Herald" describes it as "well worth reading * * * the characters are wholly lifelike, and though the arena on which they play their parts is rather restricted, we watch them and their doings with interest from the beginning to the end of this strange drama."

A Rose of Yesterday

You cannot be fully acquainted with Mr. Crawford's versatile work without reading this book, and you will miss a story of very timely bearing if you miss

A Rose of Yesterday

By F. MARION CRAWFORD

Price, $1.25

PUBLISHED BY

The Macmillan Company

66 Fifth Avenue, New York

YOU WANT TO CURE YOUR DYSPEPSIA

TO DO SO DRINK

SCHLITZ Malt Extract

EXQUISITE FLAVOR

INVIGORATING NOURISHING
DIGESTIVE

Free from Nauseating Effects !

PACIFIC COAST AGENTS

Sherwood & Sherwood

SAN FRANCISCO
PORTLAND LOS ANGELES

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Satndard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.

Telephone Main 5697.

THE LATEST STYLES IN

CHOICE WOOLENS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel

Bicycle and Golf Suits

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Miss Adie's Boarding and Day School

2117 California street. English, French and German. Calisthenics and Dancing. Kindergarten in connection with the school. Reopens August 2, 1897.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

Trinity School, Accredited

3300 Washington street, S. F. Christmas term August 2, 1897. Prepares for College, University, and Business. Rev. Dr. E. B. Spaulding, Rector.

The Lion Fire Insurance Co. Limited of London. Total Cash Assets in United States, $885,797.09

The Imperial Insurance Co. Limited of London Established on Pacific Coast in 1852

WM. J. LANDERS, Resident Manager

PACIFIC COAST BRANCH

205-207 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal

WEDDING INVITATIONS

New Style Visiting Cards

HARTWELL, MITCHELL & WILLIS

Successors to Dodge Bros.

STATIONERS, ENGRAVERS, BOOKSELLERS

107 Montgomery and 225 Post Street

CRANE IN LONDON

The American Novelist Investigating England with a Microscope.

Stephen Crane, novelist, journalist, war correspondent, special writer, analyist, pschycologist, short story writer and all has descended upon London and is telling what he has seen to the Saturday Review.

No doubt the Review is a good, solid paper, and we hope that it will continue to appear for a long time, but if Mr. Crane keeps up his record of impressions at the rate upon which he started, and if the Review publishes the same in weekly installments, the collection of its volumes will atttain to the size of the Alexandrian Library before Mr. Crane is through describing his impressions After reading these "impressions" you are firmly persuaded of one salient fact. Mr. Crane is proceeding with the slowness and the sprightliness of a German professor compiling a Greek lexicon. A picture is suggested to you. You see Stephen get off the train at Waterloo station, a microscope in one hand, a photograph in the other, while a train of shorthand writers follow in his wake.

Mr. Crane is looking at London through a microscope; he is down on his hands and knees crawling toward his hotel decimeter by decimeter, looking, searching and peering through his microscope the while. There is nothing like thoroughness. In order not to let a good thing escape him, Stephen is going to try and see everything and describe everything he sees, and the public is going to read everything he describes. Well, possibly. Some eight chapters of this Greek lexicon have appeared, and so far we have got a London cabman, a porter, a "lift," a horse sliding down hill, a man in a top hat and a few ad-signs.

Stephen's method of story-telling puts one in mind of that chap in the "Arabian Nights" who was compelled to tell an endless story. So he told of a grain elevator full of corn, husked corn and a cloud of locusts. In the top of the elevator was a tiny hole, big enough to admit the passage of one locust at a time, "and one locust," said the chap, "came in and carried off a grain of corn, and another locust came in and carried off another grain of corn, and another locust came in and——"

Thus Stephen in London. Stephen is a locust in a grain elevator; in each chapter of his impressions he comes in and carries off another grain of corn. In three weeks he has carried off eight grains, but where there's a will there's a way, and keeping everlastingly at it brings success. Eight grains out of an elevator in three weeks! C'est toujours un commencement, pardi Monsieur Crane. Houp la! If you only can live long enough you'll get to the bottom. Think of it, centuries may go by, dynasties come and go, nations rise and fall and pass away, new geological eras come and go, and still Stephen Crane will be doggedly describing his impressions of London. Mr. Crane speaks of a "lift" at his hotel that ran so slowly that the elevator boy grew to be an old man between trips. That is very fine. Mr. Crane has started in with his descriptions at the railway depot. The best that I can wish for him is that he may live long enough to reach his hotel.

What a little world does this Mr. Crane live in, or rather what a very big world made up of what very little tnings. Mr. Crane never soars—a bird's-eye view would smite him blind. Mr. Crane observes and observes and observes—always through a microscope; to him life is a play seen tnrough reversed opera glasses. On his wonderful way from the depot a horse falls down. This is an event, a horrible formless catastrophe. Out with the microscope; everything stops; what else matters now? Barney Barnarto commits suicide, Salisbury bullies the United States, the Government is interrupted by the Indian rising, events big with destiny gather like a thunder cloud. Never mind, a horse has fallen in the London streets. Stephen calls it a great tning that has come to pass, and says he was singularly blessed by the sight, enlarges upon the calamity throughout some three thousand words, and goes away to Tin Can in Nevada to bring an anecdote of one Jim Cortright to illustrate his point.

And this is journalism; and this the Saturday Review pays coin to secure and sells it on the streets of the world's cities for a sixpence.

JUSTIN STURGIS.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

IN THE CURRENT

Ladies Who Smoke—A League to Abolish the Marriage Ceremony.

A young woman, the owner of a cosy little smoking room, who makes no secret of her enjoyment of an after-dinner pipe, was questioned the other day as to why women use tobacco. She was seated in the cosy little room and with a special friend was enjoying a pull. "Well," said she, "American women who smoke can be catalogued in three classes, namely, those who do it for the love of the weed itself, those who do it to be sociable, and those who wish to appear sporty. I belong to the first class, my friend over there to the second class, while the third class—oh, well, they are the girls one sees and reads about as smoking in cafes, on the street cars, and other public places, though I must say women who smoke in public places do not always do it to attract attention. The majority of women, I'm sure all my friends do, prefer mild Turkish tobacco. Some are fond of the long cut, others of the short cut. For my own use I like both, the short cut for my pipe, the long cut for my cigarettes, and I don't allow any one to handle it, either. I don't care to have the shreds disturbed. One good point about the mild Turkish tobacco is that it has less nicotine than any other kind. I have been told that it contained opium, and maybe it does, for it is certainly soothing, and I would forgive my worst enemy after my second pipe. But, as I said before, I belong to the class who smoke for the love of it. Those who smoke only to be sociable do not as a rule experience any such effects. They do it simply because others around them do. As to the third class, the girls who wish to appear sporty, they use it only as a means to attract attention, and I doubt very much whether they ever give the flavor of their cigarettes a second thought."

* *

About twenty-five men and women in Boston are trying to establish a branch of the English Legitimation League. The object of the league is practically to abolish the marriage ceremony and substitute for it a contract dissoluble at will by which the man and the woman shall agree to live together as husband and wife and to recognie as legitimate any children that may be born of the union. Among the members of the society are two middle-aged women of socialistic tendencies, two Boston bluestockings, a young English girl, and elderly anarchist, and a young Russian of good family, but an unpronounceable name, who works in Boston and resides in one of the suburbs. Of these, perhaps the young English girl, by reason of her recent association with the founders of the league in London, Oswald and Gladys Dawson, is most thoroughly imbued with the principles of the movement, and it has only been by energetic work on her part that the society or league has obtained even the foothold it has in Boston. The parent of the league, Mr. Dawson, in explanation of his peculiar views of marriage, said recently: "I disbelieve in the promise for life. I do not believe that the State has any concern in the relation of the sexes, in the first place, and, in the second place, I don't consider, even if it were right for the State to interfere, that it should make the contract binding for life. If the State made divorce as easy as marriage and as inexpensive, then I don't think I should say that I objected to the institution of marriage. I do not expect to be popular in this generation, nor do I expect that Legislatures will recognize us in this generation. I am not so much attempting to alter the law, at present, as to ripen public opinion in the matter until it is time to move.

* *

The fashion of having married men as best men and ushers, which originated in New York two seasons ago, seems to have taken deep root in Newport, for Mr. Thompson had his married brother, Lewis, as best man, and next Thursday, when Mr. John Nicholas Brown marries Miss Dresser, his best man will be his cousin, Mr. Horace Binney, a well known benedict, who lives in Paris, and among his ushers will be Elisha Dyer, Jr., and De Forest Danielson, who, as everybody knows, are model husbands.

* *

The hum of the electric carriage has now become so common on Bellevue avenue that even the most ecstatic of horses fails to kick up his heels as the automobile glides along. The campaign of this vehicle at Newport has been an immense success. Were not the price, $3,000, prohibitive except to the rich, Newport's streets would be full of them. Even small boys are now permitted to drive their papa's carriages, and even the boys handle them with legs crossed in a most nonchalant manner, just to show how easy it is.

* *

If the Newport correspondent of the New York "Herald" is correct, Miss Virginia Fair, who is now in San Francisco, is still heart whole. He writes: "It may be truthfully said that while Miss Fair has received her very fair share of attention she has dispensed her smiles and appreciation with absolute impartiality, and there is not the least foundation for the stories of her preference for any swain, while rumors of an engagement are absolutely false."

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. bottle.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms, banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

GET THE GENUINE ARTICLE!

Walter Baker & Co.'s Breakfast COCOA

Trade-Mark.

Pure, Delicious, Nutritious.

Costs Less than ONE CENT a cup.

Be sure that the package bears our Trade-Mark.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

(Established 1780) Dorchester, Mass.

"GOLD SEAL"
"BADGER"
"PIONEER"

Rubber Goods

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.

MANUFACTURER OF

OIL CLOTHING

R. H. PEASE
Vice-President and Manager

573-575-577-579 Market Street
SAN FRANCISCO

73-75 First Street, Portland, Or.

SATISFACTORY TO THE EYE AND EAR

BYRON MAUZY PIANOS 308-314 POST ST.

BALDWIN THEATRE (AL. HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS)

Next Monday, Sept. 20th, Second Week

WM. H. CRANE

First time on any stage, the Comedy by Eugene Presbrey

A Virginia Courtship

Monday, September 27th, THE SENATOR

Columbia Theatre.

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & Co. LESSEES AND MANAGERS

Monday Evening, September 20th

THE FRAWLEY COMPANY

In DeMille & Belasco's Greatest Dramatic Triumph

THE WIFE

The drama that had the longest run of any play ever presented by the Frohmans.
Sept. 27th, first production on any stage of Augustus Thomas' New Comedy, "Don't Tell Her Husband"

Orpheum

O'FARRELL STREET, BETWEEN STOCKTON AND POWELL

Week beginning Monday, September 20th
Nichols Sisters, Unrivaled Burnt Cork Impersonators
Emil—The Original Girards—Kate
Grotesque Comiques
Pitrot, the Greatest Mimic of the Age
Irene Franklin, Precocious Character Impersonator
McCarthy & Reynolds, Irish Character Sketch Artists Tremendous success of El Zobedie
George Evans, "the Honey Boy"; Adrienne Ancion; Van Aucken, McPhee & Hill, and Fox & Allen
Fifth week and New Selections by the Knaben-Kapelle
Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House

MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager

Commencing Monday, Sept. 20th
Seventh week of the Grand Opera Season under direction of Mr Gustav Hinrichs
GRAND WAGNER FESTIVAL!
Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday Evenings the Romantic Opera, The Flying Dutchman
Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday Evenings, the Music Drama, Lohengrin
Great Casts! Appropriate Accessories!
Symphony Orchestra of Thirty
Next week, The Huguenots

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : . : : . : Manager

Prices, including Reserved Seat, 50, 35, 25 or 15c
ANXIETY UNABATED!
The advance demand for seats is so large that it is imperative to continue for another week
The First Born
Another Farce-Comedy from the facile pen of Sidney Grundy, A Serious Tangle
To insure seats for any performance have them reserved for you—Phone Black 1106

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last performances of the Great Comedy-Drama by Bertram & Willard, THE ENGINEER
Commencing Monday, September 20th, first production of Elmer Grandin's Great Scenic Melodrama
SLAVES OF GOLD
Battle for Life in the Flooded Mine!
A Great Mine Explosion!
Romance! Pathos! Tragedy!
Beautiful Scenic and Mechanical Effects!
Evg. Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

SHERMAN, CLAY & CO. HALL

223 Sutter Street

Wednesday Evening, September 22d, at 8:15

PIANO RECITAL

BY

MAY LUCINE POTVIN

OF CHICAGO

Admission, including Reserved Seat, $1.00
General Admission, 50 cents
Box office opens at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Store Wednesday, September 22d, at 9 o'clock

GOLDEN GATE HALL

MADAM MOUNTFORD

THE GIFTED WOMAN FROM JERUSALEM

in Costume Recitals of Biblical Orientalisms

Friday Evening, Sept. 17th, 8 o'clock
Village Life in Palestine
Saturday Evening, Sept. 18th 8 o'clock
Village Life in Palestine
Monday Evening, Sept. 20th, 8 o'clock
City Life in Jerusalem
Tuesday Evening, Sept. 21st, 8 o'clock
The Bedouins of the Desert
Thursday Evening, Sept. 23d, 8 o'clock
The True Life of Jacob
Friday Evening, Sept. 24th, 8 o'clock
Ecce Homo, or from Bethlehem to Calvary
Saturday Matinee, Sept. 25th, 2:30 o'clock
Ecce Homo, or from Bethlehem to Calvary
Tickets, Fifty Cts. Course of five lectures, Two Dollars. For sale at Sherman, Clay & Co. and at hall.

TURF TOPICS

State Fair Events—The Eastern Cracks—Turf Congress Notes.

The racing at the State Fair has been fully up to the standard of the Sacramento meetings, both in the running and trotting events.

The Burns & Waterhouse filly Duckling (imp. Brutus-Decoy Duck) has landed the Sunny Slope Stakes—5 furlongs, $500—and the Nursery Stakes—6 furlongs, $3,105. In the latter, Duckling carried 115 pounds, beating Rosormonde, 120 pounds, by half a length, after a hard tussle down the stretch, in which Sniuer, on the former filly, outrode E. Jones, on Mr. Naglee Burk's daughter of imp. Ormonde.

It is to be noted that the latter race was more richly endowed than any two-year-old event that has ever been run in this State, and it is satisfactory that it should have produced a pretty good contest, confirming the form shown in the Sunny Slope Stakes, when Duckling beat Rosemonde with ten pounds' pull in the weight, as against five pounds in the later essay. Duckling is a fairly useful sort, and, though not a winner, snowed speed in one of the three races she ran in last spring. When owners realize that such a valuable stake is offered at Sacramento for two-year-olds, the general class of the animals running will probably show improvement another year.

---

Hamburg, the premier two-year-old of the season, is reported to have been retired for rest, after a succession of severe contests, and his owner, Mr. J. E. Madden, though generally regarded as a shrewd and capable turfman, is not considered to have shown the best of judgment in his recent management of so exceptional a piece of horseflesh. That he should have continued to push the colt until his legs suffered to an extent that has compelled a complete stoppage of his work may possibly have endangered his prospects of maintaining his pre-eminence as a three-year-old, which would be a matter for much regret.

There has been some hint of Mr. Madden bringing his stable to California this winter, and possibly Hamburg has been laid by early with this object in view.

---

The performance of the three-year-old Ornament, in the Twin City handicap, 1¼ miles, at Sheepshead Bay, on the 6th inst., when carrying 118 pounds, he won with the utmost ease in 2:05 2-5, was a remarkable one and leaves the impression that he could have beaten the record of 2:05 held jointly by Salvator and the dead Morello, had he been allowed by Taral to have his head. The field was composed of high-class horses, the five-year-old Flying Dutchman, 121 pounds, being second; Havoc, five years, 114 pounds, third, and Requital, four years, 128 pounds, fourth. This is probably Ornament's best race to date and he is certainly entitled to be regarded as the best three-year-old on the American turf to-day, although it is said the owners of The Friar are not prepared to concede the point.

---

Ben Brush has proved to be a great handicap horse this season, and his win in the Omunium handicap, 1⅛ miles, at Sheepshead Bay, carrying 120 pounds, in 1:55, beating Hastings, 123 pounds, and Clifford, 127 pounds, was a fine performance. Clifford pulled up lame after the race and has been retired to the stud, where the good son of Bramble should make a name for himself.

---

The reports of the racing at Harlem are favorable. On the other hand, the Turf Congress has refused the application of the association for membership.

---

The Crescent City Jockey Club of New Orleans has published its intentions for the coming season's racing at that city. The meeting will begin on November 13th and extend over one hundred days. The first list of stakes consists of fourteen events, one of $4,000, two of $3,000, one of $1,500, and the rest of $1,000 each in value. The Turf Congress has recently refused to sanction purses of $250 at that track, placing the minimum at $300.

---

In last week's notes an error crept in when alluding to the result of the St. Leger. The distance should have appeared as 1 mile 6 furlongs 132 yards, not 2 miles 6 furlongs 132 yards.

At the risk of being wearisome, it may be well again to remind readers that Monday next is closing day for the first list of stakes at the Oakland track.

BENEDICT.

The Requisite of Ladies of Fashion.

Ladies know the comfort of using good toilet water when taking a bath, and the difficulty of finding preparations that leave an agreeable feeling to the skin with a pleasant odor. To meet the demand for such an article the Pacific Ammonia Bottling Company, of which Mr. George Herrmann is president, supply Greer's Toilet Ammonia, with violet or lavender perfume, which is unexcelled for toilet and bath purposes This ammonia is rapidly coming into general use by ladies of fashion and all who appreciate the elegancies of life. At the same time its use is beneficial to health, invigorating to a tired body, and refreshing to the senses. The preparation is for sale by all druggists and grocers, and the price has lately been reduced to the very moderate price of 35 cents per bottle.

LATE VERSE

Cheyenne.

I.

Have you been to Cheyenne?
There's the loneliest place,
The dreerest and searest
You'll find on the face
Of the earth. And hard by Lieth Laramie town,
Once a camp of renown
As the home of Bill Nye.

Empty bottles and gravel,
And cactus and cans,
Broken vows and old hoops
Scent the hot wind that fans
The parched plain. Going back
To the bottle and can—
I was broke in Cheyenne.

II.

Years after I sat
In the manager's car
As it slipped o'er the steel
Trail with never a jar,
And out train orders ran
Us by way of Cheyenne.

What a wonderful change
Had come over the place!
Oh, the women were fair.
There was one who had eyes
Just the hue of the skies;
And the low winds were soft,
And the things that were quaffed—
Well, we laid over there.

"Ah, so much depends,"
I said, with a sigh,
As the hours flew by,
"On a friend and his friends.
Say, Deuel, how can We go away from Cheyenne?"

—Cy Warman.

The Long Hard Hill.

They were standing in the sunlight
Of the summer time of life;
She was still without a husband,
He was waiting for a wife.
And her cheeks were rich and rosy
And her lips were luscious red.
So he pressed her dimpled fingers
As he looked at her and said,
As they stood there in the heather
Where the road had crossed the rill:
"May we not fare together
Up this long, hard hill?"

Now her hand began to tremble
And her eyes were full of tears
As she trained them on the road that Wound away among the years;
But she had no voice to answer
Him; she could not understand,
For the future lay before her
Like a far-off fairy land.
There was sunlight on the heather,
There was music in the rill,
As they went away together
Up the long, hard hill.

Oftentimes the way was sunny,
Other times 'twas full of lures,
But the love that had come to them
Was the true love that endures.
Though the bonny brow is wrinkled,
Though the raven lock be gray,
Yet the road might have been rougher
Had she gone the other way.
Now the frost is on the heather
And the snow is on the rill,
And they're coasting down the short side
Of the long, hard h'

—Cy Warman.

Trinity.

A burst of airy wings outspread,
Rosettes (she calls them choux).
A bit of lace, a fluff of tulle,
An artful bud or two
To match the pinky bloom that sweeps
Across her cheek, and that,
The essence of simplicity,
Is Peggy's Sunday hat!

When bravely down the aisle it goes
In time for morning prayer,
What envy pouts upon the lips
Of every rival fair!
And who can wonder that the chants
Are sung a trifle flat,
With all the choir looking straight
At Peggy's Sunday hat?

I, sitting in the pew behind,
Through sermon, psalm, and hymn,
Am baffled by the curve and droop
Of that provoking brim.
I long to brush my finger tips,
In one audacious pat,
Across the rippled hair half hid
By Peggy's Sunday hat.

But patience! When the bells ring out
To set the crowd astir,
And in the porch a flock of lads
Waits for a smile from her,
For me she has a glance so shy
My heart grows warm thereat,
And homeward walks my London tile
With Peggy's Sunday hat.

—M. E. W., in Life.

Maillard's Chocolates, half and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

After a night with the boys—Bromo Kola.

DR. H. G. YOUNG—Bridges and teeth without plates a specialty. 1841 Polk street.

Mrs. Maud Maynard Noel, of Chicago, has come out with an idea. She wants all invalids, criminals and other mental incapables put out of existence. Mrs. Maynard wants the thing done quietly and solemnly, with all the consideration for the relatives and for the incapable. To the unfortunate there is no friend like death, thinks Mrs. Maynard; it is the only panacea for their ills—a gentle, kindly blessing, and, therefore, why not give it to them? Imagine the simplicity of the idea. You have, for instance, the child of a criminal. If it shows the inherited viciousness, you put it out of the way, gently and kindly. There are no prisons, nor reformatories, nor gibbets for that urchin. Thus, Mrs. Noel points out, you eliminate sickness, suffering and misery. The world would become much more endurable—sort of utopian in truth. There is a vague assumption that even criminals have a right to life—but let us hope no more vulgar sentiment will be permitted to interfere with Mrs. Noel's brilliant theory.

Dr. Thierry, of the Paris Charity Hospital, has by happy chance made a discovery which may prove of immense benefit in the treatment of burns. Having been in the habit of using picric acid in solution, as an antiseptic, he found one day, when some sealing wax fell on his hand at a time when it was impregnated with this acid, that he scarcely felt any pain, and the same immunity showed itself when he let a burning match fall on his hand. He has since found that all pains from burning cease soon after bathing the part affected in a solution of this acid.

Five men formed themselves into a lynching party and strung up a negro who had stolen a horse. In their haste they failed to tie his hands, and, hearing a noise as of a party approaching, they decamped and left the negro swinging. That swinging motion brought him in close proximity to the tree, which he encircled with his arms, climbed to the limb from which he was suspended, cut himself down and went home to supper. He subsequently said to his wife: "'Mandy, while I wuz a-swingin' dar I saw heaven wide open, wid Moses en' de prophets en' de res' er dem, en now I'm gwine off en quit stealin' en preach de gospel!"

Poodle Dog Restaurant, S. E. corner Grant Avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Tel. 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

THE STATE FAIR
1897
SEPT. 6TH TO 18TH
AT SACRAMENTO
CALIFORNIA'S ANNUAL EXHIBITION
Of Agricultural, Mechanical and Industrial Products
12 DAYS RACING.
GRAND MUSICAL CONCERTS
EXCURSION RATES ON ALL RAIL ROADS.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE NAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND SEE THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.

UNDERTAKERS

641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb
Telephone Main 43

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. September 3, 8, 13, 18, 25, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. Sept. 3, 8, 13, 18, 25, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Stmr. Pomona, 2 p.m. September 1, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 27; October 1, 5, 9, 13, 18, 22, 26, 30; November 3, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 29.

For Newport, Los Angeles and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Sept. 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, Redondo--Los Angeles--and Newport, at 11 a.m. Sept. 5, 9, 13, 17, 21, 25, 29 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, Stmr. Orizaba, 10 a.m. the 2d each month.

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Sept. 7, 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.

S. S. "Mariposa," for Australia, Thursday, Sept. 16, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO., General Agents

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—In the matter of the application of the SITES SANDSTONE COMPANY (a corporation) to dissolve: Notice is hereby given that the Sites Sandstone Company, a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, has presented to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco an application praying to be allowed to disincorporate and dissolve, and that Monday the 11th day of October, A. D. 1897, at 10 o'clock a.m. of said day, has been appointed as the time, and the Courtroom of Department No. 7 of said Superior Court, New City Hall, San Francisco, California, as the place, at which said application is to be heard.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said Superior Court this 8th day of September, A. D. 1897.

C. F. CURRY, Clerk.
By Joseph Riordan, Deputy Clerk.
VAN NESS & REDMAN, Att'ys for Petitioners.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Alta Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 57
Amount per share, 10 cents
Levied Sept. 8, 1897
Delinquent in office Oct. 6, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Oct. 27, 1897

J. E. JACOBUS, Secretary.
Office, room 33, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of JOHANNES A. H. STOCKFLETH, deceased—Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, at room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. A. C. FREESE,
Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, August 24, 1897.
J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

POTOSI MINING COMPANY—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Storey County, Nev.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 8th day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 48) of Twenty-five Cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 13th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 4th day of November, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the cost of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. CHAS. E. ELLIOTT, Secretary.

Office, room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

ANDES SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 1st day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 44) of Ten Cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the offices of the company, rooms 20-22 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 4th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 25th day of October, 1897, at 1 o'clock p.m., to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOHN W. TWIGGS, Secretary.
Office, rooms 20-22, Nevada Block, 509 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F.
Telephone 305

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING COMPANY—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey Co., Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 18th day of August, 1897, an assessment (No. 113) of twenty cents (20c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 14, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 22d day of September, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday the 12th day of October, 1897, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
E. L. PARKER, Secretary.
Office, room 14, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

Bids for Concessions and Privileges in Yosemite Valley.

OFFICE OF THE YOSEMITE COMMISSIONERS
San Francisco, August 10, 1897.

In accordance with Rule XXXIV of the Rules and Regulations governing Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove, adopted July 13, 1896, sealed bids are hereby invited for the following concessions and privileges in the Yosemite grant, for the year beginning November 1, 1897, and ending October 31, 1898, viz.:

First—For keeping a livery stable and conducting a general livery business in the Valley, and also for the rental of the Royal Arch Farm and Stables.

Second—For rental of stable and coachhouse on Georgia Avenue (stage headquarters).

Third—For rental of hotel, out-buildings and grounds at Glacier Point, and privilege of conducting a hotel business at that point.

Fourth—For rental of store building and privilege of conducting a general merchandise business in the Valley.

Bids must be presented to the Secretary on or before Monday, October 12, 1897, at 12 o'clock m., at the office of the Commissioners, San Francisco.

Bids must be accompanied by sufficient guarantee that contract shall be carried out by bidders to the satisfaction of the Commissioners. The Commissioners reserve the right to reject any and all bids.

JOHN F. SHEEHAN,
Secretary and Treasurer.
Room 25, Tenth Floor, Mills Building, San Francisco.

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD LANE

LANE & LANE

Attorneys and Counselors

Room 202
Crocker Building, San Francisco

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty.

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, book binders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.
TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST
BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Guarantee Capital and Surplus | - | $2,040,201 66 |
| Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash | - | 1,000,000 00 |
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | 27,730,247 45 |

OFFICERS

President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS

B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | $22,885,377 |
| Paid Up Capital and Surplus | - | 1,594,503 |

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS

GEORGE W. BEAVER, ROBERT WATT, THOMAS MAGEE, GEO. C. BOARDMAN, W. C. B. DE FREMERY, DANIEL E. MARTIN, ALBERT MILLER, GEO. TASHEIRA, E. B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

California Safe Deposit and Trust Co.

Cor. California and Montgomery Sts.

Capital Fully Paid - - One Million Dollars

Transacts a general banking business and allows interest on deposits, payable on demand or after notice.
Acts as Executor, Administrator and Trustee under wills, or in any other trust capacity. Wills are drawn by the Company's Attorneys and are taken care of without charge. Safe Deposit Boxes to rent at prices from $5 per annum upward, according to size, and valuables of all kinds are stored at low rates.

DIRECTORS: J. D. FRY, HENRY WILLIAMS, I. G. WICKERSHAM, JACOB C. JOHNSON, JAMES TREADWELL, F. W. TOUGEE, HENRY F. FORTMANN, R. B. WALLACE, R. D. FRY, A. D. SHARON, J. DALZELL BROWN.
OFFICERS: J. D. FRY, PRES.; HENRY WILLIAMS, VICE-PRES.; R. D. FRY, SECOND VICE-PRES; J. DALZELL BROWN, SEC. AND TREAS.; E. E. SHOTWELL, ASST. SEC.; GUNNISON, BOOTH & BARTNETT, ATTORNEYS.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid Up Capital . . . | $250,000 |
| Cash Reserve Fund . . . | 25,000 |

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary.
A. J. CARMANY, Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.
We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,446,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
B. J. SMITH, Assistant Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
501 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFIEST, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Years ago there lived in a Massachusetts town a justice of the peace known as "Square" Simmonds, a man noted for the shortness of his memory. He carried about him a slip of paper, on which was written the brief marriage form which he used when called upon to unite a pair in the bonds of matrimony. He never trusted himself to begin the ceremony without reference to this document. One day, at a county fair, in a neighboring town, he was approached by an elderly couple, who expressed their wish to be married then and there. After some conversation "Square" agreed to perform the ceremony on the spot, and the three stepped into a convenient horse-shed. "Square" began to search for the important paper, growing more and more perturbed as each succeeding pocket played him false. At last he abandoned the search. "Are you willing to marry this woman?" he asked the man, who replied with a prompt "Yes." "And you want to marry him?" asked the justice, turning to the bride. "I do," said she, with promptness equal to the bridegroom's. "Then," said "Square," in his most impressive tone, "I hereby pronounce you married, according to the memorandum left at home in my other trousers pocket."

M. Paulian, author of "The Beggars of Paris" (Paris qui Mendie), having compassion on a man who represented that he was dying of cold, gave him a coat and dismissed him. A few days afterwards he met the man begging with the same coat on; it was hardly recognizable, however. Puzzled at the rapid decay of a garment which he had worn himself the day before giving it away, he took the beggar to dine with him. During the meal a further examination of the coat only increased the mystery. He questioned the man, who at last confessed, "People would not have believed, sir, that I was destitute, and I had to pay a woman two sous to alter it for me." "And who is that woman?" I asked. "Oh, she is a woman who leads a blind man about, and who, when she has time, arranges garments for beggars!"

A student much interested in birds and their ways found hanging up in a barber's shop where he had gone for a shave a canary bird which, in spite of pouring rain, was singing gleefully. "Nice bird that!" remarked the student. "E's a champyun!" replied the barber. "One thing I notice about cage birds is," the student went on, as he sat down in the armchair, "that a good many of them do not seem to mind their captivity, and sing as sweetly as if they were free." "That bird there is a philosopher," said the barber; "'e ain't got to go out in the world an' find 'is own living; an', being thankful that it is so, 'e rejoices according."

Daniel Webster and his brother were in boyhood once permitted to go together to a fair in a neighboring town. When they came home the mother questioned the boys. "Daniel," she said, "what have you done with your money?" "Spent it," he answered. Then she turned to the brother. "Ezekiel," she asked, "what have you done with yours?" "Lent it to Daniel," replied the brother. They both became lawyers, and naturally Daniel succeeded better than the other.

Sergeant Robinson, in his Bench and Bar, relates that, in a case of nuisance, the judge summed up at portentous length, giving an elaborate definition of the offence and the various elements that were required in proof of it, and concluded by expressing a hope that the jury had understood the points he had submitted to them. "Oh, yes, my lord!" said the foreman. "We are all agreed that we never knew before what a nuisance was until we heard your lordship's summing-up."

Bismarck is very proud of his ability at speaking Russian, and is noted for his linguistic acquirements. A friend was discussing with him about this, and remarked: "I can understand your English and Italian, but how did you acquire Russian?" "Well," answered the Prince, "I had unusual advantages when I was learning the language at St. Petersburg—I lodged in the house with a Russian and a bear."

The eccentric millionaire Neeld invited Alvanley to dinner at his manificent mansion in Grosvenor Square. The host with the vulgarity of the nouveau riche, was expatiating on the sumptuous decorations of the apartments, letting the dinner cool as he talked. "I don't care what your gilding cost," remarked Alvanley bluntly, "but I am most anxious to make a trial of your carving, for I am famished."

A miner was visiting a friend of the same occupation as himself. After the usual remarks had been made anent the weather, and the customary inquiries as to the health of the household, the family cat appeared on the scene. "Hoo thin that cat o' yors is, Bill!" remarked the visitor. "Wey, no, man—dis thoo think se?" says Bill. "Anyhoo, he shouldn't be, becaas he boards hisself!"

A man started in the livery-stable business the other week, and the first thing he did was to have a big sign painted representing himself holding a mule by the bridle. "Is that a good likeness of me?" he asked of an inquiring friend. "Yes—it is a perfect picture of you; but who is the fellow holding you by the bridle?"

Edgar Saltus inquired of a pretty girl at Narragansett if summer resorts are conducive to matrimony. "Why do the leaves turn red in September?" she replied. "Maybe," replied Saltus, "because of what they have seen in August."

MATCHLESS IN EVERY FEATURE

THE CONSENSUS OF OPINION REGARDING

The Ladies' Grill-Room

. . OF . .

The Palace

Direct entrance from Market Street. Open until Midnight.

Hotel Rafael

SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Society Resort, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Climate Unexcelled!
Magnificent Scenery!
The Sanitarium of the Pacific Coast
Otis Elevators Electric Lights

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments

R. H. WARFIELD & CO.
Proprietors

The best people from everywhere, bent on business or pleasure, when in New York, stop at

The St. Denis

The cuisine and comforts of the hotel have become so well known that its name is now a household word in thousands of homes in this country and Europe

Central Location
Broadway and Eleventh Street
Opposite Grace Church
New York

Hotel Bella Vista

1001 PINE STREET

Elegant Furnishings and Apartments

DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED

MRS. A. F. TRACY.

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.

PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO

HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. . ALSO . .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company . . Pacific Coast
Baltimore Sole Agents

GEO. GOODMAN

Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone

in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

24 Montgomery Street
SAN FRANCISCO

THE SMOKER'S TIP

Have you a friend who a smoker is,
Tell him there is just out a Smoker's Tip
Which will prevent a cancer lip.

Mailed on receipt of three 2-cent stamps, by

ELASTIC TIP CO.

Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties

735 Market Street, S. F.

BOSTON CHICAGO

Ask Your Druggist and Take No Substitute

In 10c., 25c., 50c. and $1 bottles

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin. Price, One Dollar.

Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored
E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

ANHEUSER BUSCH'S
Original Budweiser Beer
THE FINEST BEER IN AMERICA
THE E. G. LYONS CO., Agents
508-12 Jackson Street.

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS ELECTRICAL CO
523 Mission St., San Francisco

THE WAVE—SUPPLEMENT

San Francisco, September 18, 1897

VISALIA WELCOMES THE VALLEY ROAD

The Capital of Tulare County celebrates the opening of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railroad to that city — Admission Day was chosen as a fitting occasion for the ceremonies— Some account of the past history, present condition and future prospects of the district, which now looks forward to an era of further and more rapid progress based upon its magnificent natural resources and the enterprise of its people, assisted by improved transportation facilities.

Five and forty years ago, under the guidance of Nat Vise, the spreading oaks on the borders of a little stream in Tulare County were chosen as the site of a camping ground by a band of hardy adventurers, who, naming their little settlement Visalia, in honor of their leader, founded the city which is to-day the county seat. During the intervening period the surrounding country has passed through three distinct stages of development. In its early days up to about the year 1870 its fine natural resources were availed of chiefly for the raising of stock, vast numbers of cattle, sheep and hogs roaming over the best watered parts of the lowlands and foothills. Then came a change with the building of the first railroad into the county by the Southern Pacific Company, followed by the construction of irrigating canals for the purpose of bringing the waters of the rivers into the plains, which were then converted into some of the finest wheat fields in the State. Ten years ago a further step was taken on the road of progress by the establishment of what is now the leading industry of the neighborhood, and extensive plantings were made of fruit trees in the vicinity of Visalia, where the soil has since produced the most astonishing results and earned for it the title of the "Prune City of the Plains." The fruits mostly cultivated in addition to prunes are peaches, apricots, nectarines, pears and plums, while raisin grapes are also grown to some extent, though not so largely as in some other parts of the San Joaquin Valley. The citrus belt extends over a considerable area of the valley and back into the foothills some twenty miles, while olives and mountain apples of choice quality are also grown in the same district. Excellent granite, marble and chrysoprase are amongst the products of the district, the lumber industry of which is also important. Altogether the grain, fruit, live stock, dairy and timber shipments of the country are estimated at 10,000 carloads annually.

For close upon half a century Visalia has passed its existence off the main lines of railroad and only now finds itself "on the map." Progressive as it has been, notwithstanding the drawbacks of the past in respect of transportation aids, what must be its prospects in the immediate future, with ample railway facilities right into the heart of the city?

From September 9th, 1897, a new era in the life of Visalia and neighborhood may be said to have begun, representing the fourth stage of its development, and dated from the time when the San Joaquin Valley Railroad extended its service to the capital of Tulare County.

There was well-chosen significance in the selection of Admission Day for the opening of the line to Visalia. The anniversary of the day that California was admitted into the Union became the day that Visalia was admitted into extended communication with the world at large. By way of an appropriate allegory for the occasion, the committee of arrangements, of which Mr. J. C. Ward was chairman, adopted a design on their stationery, etc., representing a chick just hatched from its shell and chirping out, "Free at last." The day itself was one long ovation, inaugurated by the arrival of the first train —made up of twenty-six cars—from Fresno and intermediate stations, which reached the depot an hour before noon and was greeted by the maximum of noise that could be produced by all the resources of the city in the shape of bells, whistles and anvil salutes. Barbecue feasts, sports, parades and general jollification were shared in by some 12,000 people, upwards of two-thirds of whom were visitors.

Included amongst the celebrants were a large number of Valley Road officials and their guests, as follows:

Robert Watt, vice-president; Captain A. H. Payson, second vice-president; J. D. Spreckels, J. A. Hooper and Charles Holbrook, directors; Lovell White and O. D. Baldwin, trustees; Frank H. Power and Donald J. Campbell as guests. Then there were the officers of the operating department: Alexander Mackie, secretary; W. B. Storey, Jr., chief engineer and general superintendent; John Moss, traffic manager; W. C. Edes, principal assistant engineer; A. D. Schindler, division superintendent, and J. T. Williams, division engineer.

In the evening at a gathering in front of the Court House a formal exchange of compliments and congratulations was made between the Valley Road officials and the people, under the presidency of Judge Gray. Mr. W. H. Alford occupied the position of orator of the occasion and Mr. Frank H. Powers of the law department of the railroad, made a speech in reply which was both trite and effective.

The San Joaquin Valley Railway has now constructed 201½ miles of road, its present starting point being Stockton, and its terminals to the south Hanford and Visalia, the intended ultimate terminal point of the line in the valley being Bakersfield. Plans have also been matured for an extension from Stockton to San Francisco. As every one in California is aware, this enterprise really owes its accomplishment to the staunch support of Mr. Claus Spreckels, whose subscriptions to its stock have reached the enormous figure of $700,000. Incorporated some two and a half years ago with a capital stock of $6,000,000, of which $1,746,500 had at that time been actually allotted, the undertaking has been pushed on stage by stage with remarkable vigor, and the line is in the exceptional position of being entirely free from any bonded debt or charge whatsoever, and therefore the absolute property of its stockholders. Not only have Mr. Spreckels and his colleagues on the board been liberal backers of the road with their pecuniary resources, but they have given freely of their time and energy to the promotion of the work, "influenced, to use the words of the president, "to become interested in the enterprise because the good of the country demanded it." At the same time they have felt satisfied that the road is capable of affording a good return as an investment, and everything at the present time points to the correctness of their judgment.

MR. W. H. HAMMOND

The Valley Road has been worked for and welcomed by the inhabitants of Visalia with perhaps more enthusiasm and determination than in any other town which it serves, and there seems to be little reason to doubt that in a very short time the impetus given to business by this new extension will become very marked in the returns from the district.

It is the general feeling amongst the citizens of Visalia that no man has done more towards carrying through all the arrangements for bringing the Valley Road into Visalia than the Mayor, Mr. W. H. Hammond, who, it may be noted, is a brother of Mr. John Hays Hammond, of South African fame. Mr. W. H. Hammond also acts as County Clerk and has at all times devoted himself heart and soul to the work of securing this important new railway connection, which the S. F. & S. J. V. R. R. obtained without the expenditure of a single nickel for right of way from the Fresno County line, or for yard room in Visalia itself.

The railroads in the county of Tulare are now the main line of the Southern Pacific, running north and south, nearly through the center; the east side branch of the same, paralleling the main line; the Hanford and Huron branch running west from the main line at Goshen, the Visalia branch, connecting with the main road at Goshen (this short line was recently purchased from the Visalia Railroad Company); the Visalia branch of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railroad, just completed; the Visalia and Tulare road, a short line connecting the two cities named. Of these roads three terminate at Visalia at present. Over the short road to Goshen, now a part of the Southern Pacific system, a through train runs to San Francisco daily, and is known as the Visalia and Hanford Flyer.

So fertile is the soil and favorable the climate of the district that crops of prunes are obtained from the trees at three and four years old fully as large as in other parts of the State at six and seven years, a fact that has attracted the special attention of growers in other parts. This is a most important consideration with people of small capital, who find it necessary to invest where early returns can be secured. There are upwards of a hundred separate orchards in the Visalia district, comprising fully 7,000 acres, amongst the largest concerns being the Visalia Fruit and Land Company, 440 acres, of which 240 acres are in prunes and 130 in peaches; the Cain Fruit and Nursery Company, 231 acres, 130 in prunes, 50 in plums and 40 in peaches; the Mineral King Fruit Company, 500 acres, 330 in prunes and 120 in peaches; T. Jacob & Brother, 161 acres in prunes, plums, peaches and pears; the Crocker estate, 40 acres; John Tuohy, 280 acres, 115 in peaches, 60 in pears; California Prune Company, 156 acres, 106 acres of which are in prunes, the balance in plums, peaches, pears and apricots; the Fleming Fruit Company, 350 acres, 207 in peaches, 125 in prunes; A. C. Kuhn, 655 acres, 320 in peaches, 180 in prunes, 100 in apricots, 55 in plums, nearly the entire orchard having been planted two years ago; the Evansdale Fruit Company, 100 acres, 80 in prunes; and the S. Sweet Company, 50 acres, 30 of which are in prunes.

It will be understood that only the immediate neighborhood of Visalia is dealt with in the foregoing remarks. There are outlying districts, such as Orosi, about sixteen miles north of the city, with about 1,500 acres of fine orchards, which also contribute to the wealth of the surrounding country.

Amongst the most important concerns established at Visalia are the following:

The Visalia Fruit Exchange, owned by the J. K. Armsby Company, Chicago, erected during the summer a packing establishment alongside the Southern Pacific track. The building is 50x200 feet in dimensions, and is equipped with the latest improved machinery for grading and processing fruit. This is the only packing house owned by the J. K. Armsby Company in California, Mr. George Nunnemaker being the manager. It is a model establishment in every respect, and is fitted with every convenience for the successful handling of dried fruit. The exchange expects to handle about 300 carloads of dried fruit this season and will ship 200 cars of dried prunes and 50 cars of peaches.

The Visalia cannery, operated by the Sacramento Packing and Drying Company, gives employment to over 300 people. During this season it was difficult to obtain all the help needed to handle the fruit. Last season 1,000,000 cans of fruit were turned out, but that quantity will be exceeded this year. The Visalia brand of canned fruit having made a name for itself is now in demand among the Eastern jobbers. W. C. B. de Fremery, of San Francisco, is president of the company, and Mr. Charles H. Bentley manager on the spot. All fruit shipped from the district is now branded "Visalia."

There are two telegraph lines in operation at Visalia, the Western Union and the Postal Telegraph; two telephone systems, the Sunset and the Mt. Whitney. There are two ice companies, the Visalia Manufacturing Company and the Union Ice Company. The Visalia Gas, Light and Heat Company have the field to themselves at the present time, but it is thought the Kaweah Power and Water Company will have their system completed to Visalia by the beginning of next year. This company will transmit power for a distance of twenty-five miles and furnish it to consumers in Visalia at rates that will permit of manufacturing on a large scale.

In every other line of business there is the liveliest competition, which shows that the people are awake to the importance of having their wants supplied in the cheapest and most expeditious manner.

The most conspicuous public buildings are the handsome Court House of Tulare County, a well-built jail and two schools, one of which ranks as amongst the best high schools of the State. Visalia has always been noted for its efficient Fire Department, which is provided with a fine engine house.

A good deal of building has been undertaken since the Valley Railway extension was decided upon, and there is more to follow. The business streets are well paved with asphalt, and in the residential quarter fine ornamental shade trees line the roads.

There are three newspapers published in the town, namely, the "Delta," daily and weekly, a journal of nearly forty years' standing; the "Times," daily and weekly, and the weekly "News."

To the firm of Robinson & Churchman, photographers, of Visalia, we are indebted for the originals of the pictures reproduced in these pages. The firm is composed of Miss Robinson and Mr. S. E. Churchman.

Copies of this paper can be obtained at Harry Levison's Store, Visalia.

Arrival of the First Train

Sacramento Packing and Drying Company's Cannery

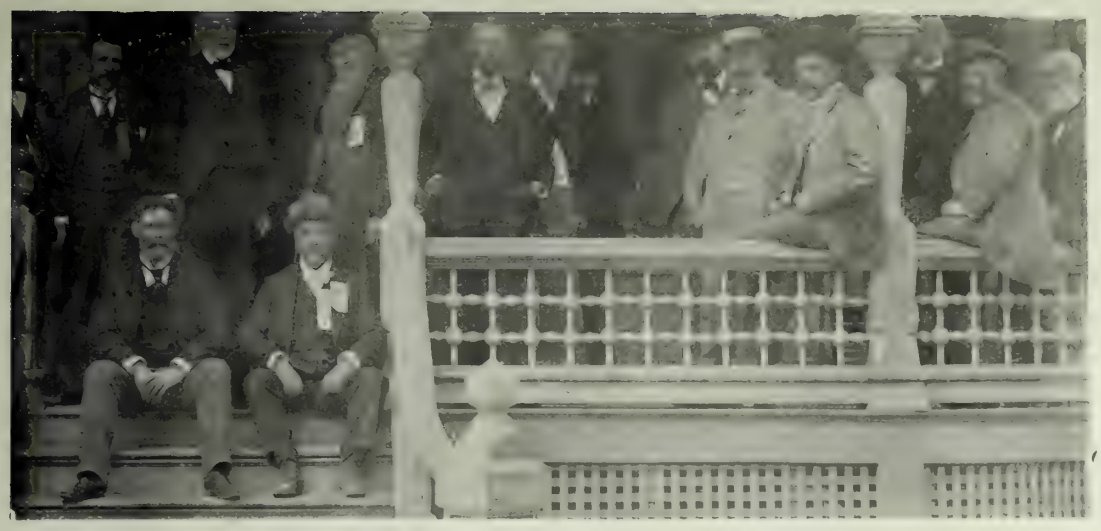
Tulare County Court House

Cooks Preparing the Barbecue Feast

Crowds at the Scene of the Barbecue

THE CITY OF VISALIA EN FETE ON ADMISSION DAY

Photos by Robi



Some Railroad Officials and Reception Committee

Near View of the First Train

The Ice Factory of the San Joaquin Valley

Visalia en fete

The First Train Running In

The Little Ones' Corner

Street Scene

Gathering near the Depot

Temporary Depot

EBRATION OF THE OPENING OF THE VALLEY RAILROAD.

irchman, Visalia.

MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

...THE...

Mutual Life Insurance Company
OF NEW YORK

RICHARD A. McCURDY, Pres.

is the only Eastern Life Insurance Company that has invested its funds in its building and land in California, virtually establishing it as "a home company." It is the best company, affording the best and most approved form of policies with the most perfect security. The estimation and favor in which The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York is held in California is shown by the very large amount of insurance in force in this State, being on Jan. 1st, 1897, over twenty six millions of dollars ($26,000,000), as reported to the Insurance Department of the State of California.

STATEMENT

For the year ending December 31, 1896, according to the Standard of the Insurance Department of the State of New York

INCOME.

| | |
|---|---|
| Received for Premiums | $39,593,414 20 |
| From all other Sources | 10,109,281 07 |
| | $49,702,695 27 |

DISBURSEMENTS.

| | |
|---|---|
| To Policy-holders for Claims by Death | $12,595,113 39 |
| To Policy-holders for Endowments, Dividends, etc. | 12,842,456 11 |
| Total to Policy Holders, | $25,437,569 50 |
| For all other Accounts | 10,781,005 64 |
| | $36,218,575 14 |

ASSETS.

| | |
|---|---|
| United States Bonds and other Securities | $110,125,082 15 |
| First Lien Loans on Bond and Mortage | 71,543,929 56 |
| Loans on Stocks and Bonds | 11,091,525 00 |
| Real Estate | 22,767,666 65 |
| Cash in Banks and Trust Companies | 12,680,390 00 |
| Accrued Interest, Net Deferred Premiums, etc. | 6,535,555 06 |
| | $234,744,148 42 |
| Reserve for Policies and other Liabilities | 205,010,633 72 |
| Surplus | $ 29,733,514 70 |
| Insurance and Annuities in force | $918,698,338 45 |

From the surplus a dividend will be apportioned as usual.

I have carefully examined the foregoing statement and find the same to be correct; liabilities calculated by the insurance department.—CHARLES A. PRELLER, Auditor.

ROBERT A. GRANNISS, Vice Pres.

WALTER R. GILLETTE, Gen. M'g'r., ISAAC F. LLOYD, 2nd V. Pres., FRED. CROMWELL, Treas., EMORY McCLINTOCK, Actuary.

A. B. FORBES & SON, Mutual Life Building

222 SANSOME STREET, S. F., CAL.

MISS IDA ROBINSON

MR. S. E. CHURCHMAN

Robinson & Churchman

THE PHOTOGRAPHERS

Headquarters for Crayons, Water Colors, Frames, Etc.

DUPLICATES FURNISHED ON SHORT NOTICE

HOLT BLOCK . . . . . VISALIA

FOUR-YEAR-OLD PRUNE TREE AT VISALIA

Subscription to THE WAVE, $3.00 per year; six months $1.50
Sample copies free on application.

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 39 SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 25, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

MARKET-DAY AT PALMIRA

Palmira is in the State of Cauca, in the Republic of Columbia, and there are two days a week when the residents may supply themselves with food and clothing

Photo by O'Connor

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at THE WAVE Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address THE WAVE, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 25, 1897

CONTENTS

| | |
|---|---|
| Editorials | 2 |
| Things and People; by Boswell Jr. | 3 |
| Yacht and Barge Racing on San Francisco Bay | 4 |
| Yachting in California | 5 |
| About Personages | 5 |
| In Colombia | 5 |
| Love and Parenology; by Gabriel Standish | 6 |
| The Hawaiian Senate | 6 |
| Scenes in Colombia | 7 |
| The Disadvantages of Nagging; by Geraldine Bonner | 7 |
| Art Education in San Francisco; by Justin Sturgis | 8–9 |
| The Comity of Nations; by G. L. B. | 9 |
| In Society | 10 |
| The Theatres | 11 |
| Miss Bell vs. Beaux; by H. B. | 12 |
| Cheiro at Home; by P. H. | 12 |
| Muller's Memories | 13 |
| Turf Topics; by Benedict | 14 |
| The Tale and the Truth; by Frank Norris | 14 |
| New Stories Re-Told | 16 |

MUNICIPAL INTEGRITY AND THE RIGHTS OF CAPITAL.

The performance now going on in the legislative department of our municipal government is novel, to say the least. With the legal side of the controversy we have nothing to do. Upon the questions of law involved in the affair there is manifestly room for an honest disagreement, among men equally wise in such matters. This is amply in evidence.

For the benefit of readers who may not have followed the subject closely we may say, briefly, that the Constitution of the State directs that rates of compensation for the use of water supplied to any city or town in this State, or the inhabitants thereof, shall be fixed annually by the Board of Supervisors or other governing body, by ordinance, which shall be passed in the month of February of each year. The Constitution further provides that "Any Board or body failing to pass the necessary ordinances or resolutions fixing water rates, when necessary, within such time, shall be subject to peremptory process to compel action at the suit of any party interested, and shall be liable to such further process and penalties as the Legislature may prescribe."

The Supervisors are by law required to give the company to be regulated a fair hearing, before fixing rates, and this the old Board commenced to do in February. As the hearing promised to be prolonged, a question arose as to whether the Board was compelled to finally fix the rates in February. The City Attorney was consulted in the matter, and that gentleman advised the Board that inasmuch as it had commenced proceedings in February it might—keeping within the law—continue the investigation, if necessary, into the succeeding month. This ruling was received with delight by the Examiner, and the same elements that are now rejoicing most over the directly contrary ruling of Judge Wallace which ousts the Board for following the advice of the City Attorney. However, this is a touch of human nature to which probably all mankind is liable. The Board finally fixed a new schedule of rates, satisfactory to the water company, by a vote of eight to four; whereupon suit was brought at the instance of George K. Fitch, for the removal of the Board for failing to fix the rates in February. Judge Wallace held that the provisions of the Constitution, above quoted, were mandatory, and removed the entire Board. There being some question as to whether the law delegates to the Mayor or Governor the right to fill the vacancies, both the officials joined in appointing the new body. Members of the old body who favored large reductions in rates were re-appointed and others were not; but in their stead eight gentlemen were taken from the body of the county.

A comparison of the personnel of the two Boards must result vastly in favor of the new. It is certainly made up of honest men. Perhaps we would not feel inclined to give blind adherence to the various views that might be held by each on affairs governmental, but at the moment we would not deny them honesty of purpose. In the new Board there will be no cliques of schemers bent of robbing the taxpayer or the city. There will be no jobs or steals to fatten the purses of predatory politicians. A seat in the Board of Supervisors has been variously estimated as being worth from ten to thirty thousand dollars. A diligent and persevering rascal by thrift and economy, might, as a politician has put it, "go in with a shoestring and come out with a tannery." The majority of the ousted men are presumed to be men of this character, the members of the new Board are credited with being the reverse. The ousted Board, it is charged, represents the type of public officer desired by corporations; and the newly appointed Board the type not desired by them. Such is the general impression, and the mere fact that this impression has existence is a constant menace and danger to corporate rights that should never be questioned or imperilled. Of course the primary reason for seeking their removal lay in the fact that the old Board had refused to materially reduce water rates. That the three members favoring reduction were re-appointed, coupled with the fact that the balance of the Board is made up of gentlemen who are most likely to be in harmony with that sentiment, puts this statement beyond question. We will not say the Board is packed, but in all fairness, would any individual citizen, if he owned the Spring Valley Water Works, be willing to have his property rights determined by a body of citizens so constituted. Suppose upon investigation of the facts it is shown to a large number of the new Board that the rates now charged are reasonable, taking surrounding circumstances into consideration; must it be inferred that it would require a rare quality of bravery and moral courage for one of these new Supervisors to announce such a conviction? It is not improbable that an investigation will explode many rumors now accepted as facts. If this be so, what will the new Board do? Whatever action may be taken with respect to rates, the plain letter of the law may not be violated, and it may be as well that this interminable contention be settled and each party become acquainted with the rights of the other.

Behind all this question of rates, however, is a matter of paramount importance, and the new Board stands in a position to perform a great and a better service for this community than punishing the corporations. For years it has been openly, repeatedly and continually charged that corporations, against popular will and public interests, have brutally dominated the politics of this city, and have persistently favored and elected to office conscienceless rascals and notorious bribe-takers, to our everlasting shame and great discredit. Let us say that the newly appointed Board of Supervisors represents the quality and character of officials who would get into office if the corporations did not interfere in politics. Let us say that "popular will is typified in this Board. The "bugaboo" then has come at last. The "catastrophe" concerning the coming of which the corporate politician has whispered into the frightened ear of Capital is here. Corporate capital has not entered politics for the mere pleasure of lust of it. It was there to do one of two things: protect its just rights against unjust assaults, or to perpetrate wrongs and prevent interference with continued wrong-doing. It has not spent great sums of money for the mere purpose of seating a public officer who must be bought after he is seated. Every man may reason this thing out for himself, for it is very simple. To the tail of every quasi-public institution in this State there hangs a gang of greedy, lying, keen-scented politicians, who make it their particular business to prey on corporations. They are a thrifty, plausible and resourceful lot, who live on the strife they are presumed to allay. For years they have dinned it into the ears of capital that public opinion was a thing to be feared and hated, fought and beaten; that danger lurked in hiding with the people, and that unless they were employed to manipulate primaries, conventions and elections and so defeat popular will, corporate property rights would be invaded and destroyed, and their concerns rendered unprofitable, if not bankrupt. Capital is notoriously cowardly, timid and fearful of assault. There was abundant justification, however, for fear in this connection, and the corporate leech was not above surreptitiously inaugurating hostile movements to accentuate the necessity for his employment. Other communities have attempted to perpetrate just such outrages as he depicted, and one must confess there is a spirit of socialism and agrarianism abroad in the land that is most threatening to corporate property rights. Indeed, one San Francisco daily makes no concealment of its desire to wreck, but we have never believed, nor do we yet believe, that this community is prepared to employ the legislative guillotine to destroy just rights, and we so assert. The newly appointed Board of Supervisors probably represents every evil thing that corporate capital has been warned would ruin it, and these gentlemen have it fairly in their power to demonstrate that an honest Board of Supervisors does not mean a "sinch" Board, bent on destruction or unfair regulations. They are in a position to give the lie to every slanderous tale told by politicians to terrorize Capital. They have it in their power to completely destroy the class of wretches who have fattened on the fears they have created, and leave them discredited and without occupation by simply pursuing a perfectly fair, manly and independent official course. On the other hand, if the new Board choose the more radical course, they will simply fortify the corruptionist, will verify every prophecy he has ever made, and accentuate the necessity for his being. The situation is one of supreme importance, and the suggestion here made one that a man who looks only to the permanent betterment of our political condition might strenuously advocate in all honor. But he must be a brave and honest man, indeed. The question is, would it be better for the material interests of the community and wiser for this Board to proceed with sword and pruning knife in hand, and, while they have the power and opportunity, cut and slash rates right and left, or would the best permanent interests of the community be served by a course of action that would indubitably prove that honestly conducted corporations have nothing to fear at the hands of honestly elected Boards of Supervisors. We commend the thought to Mayor Phelan and the Board.

---

The withdrawal of Professor Holden from the position of Professor in charge of the Lick Observatory will not awaken regrets among his associates. From all accounts the personality of this gentleman is most intolerable. Two clever astronomers have already unwillingly resigned their posts on Mount Hamilton, and both have given their reason for withdrawing to be an inability to tolerate the unbearable manners of their superior. Professor Holden's kindliest critics credit him with marked ability in the line of his profession, but even this is marred, so it is charged, by an obstinacy that refuses to recognize the merits of discoveries or theories advanced by those about him. The daily press has amply aired the character of the man, but probably he has been more thoroughly and intelligently discussed by persons familiar with the condition of affairs on Mount Hamilton. The Regents of the University have, very much to the detriment of the observatory, sedulously been deaf to complaints directed against Mr. Holden and consistently or inconsistently upheld him on all occasions. It is one thing for principals to "back up" a superior officer in their employ whose line of endeavor demands at his hands the exercise at times of a vigorous policy that may bring him enemies, but it is quite another thing to be indifferent to the personality of such men when they are notoriously insulting, overbearing and afflicted with a stubborn egotism and a total disregard for the common civilities of life. No private institution, however stormy or otherwise generous it may be, can look for esprit de corps among its employees or expect to attain favor with the public if it tolerates such men in its service. Our public institutions which are supported by contributions levied on the tax-payer should be even more jealous of public approval in this respect, and we therefore feel constrained to congratulate our State University upon the retirement of this most unfortunately constituted person.

---

The "Examiner" is complaining because the sale of the Union Pacific Railway under foreclosure will result in a loss of twenty-five million of dollars to the Government. Yet "foreclosure" was what that journal most desired a year ago when it was quite as evident as it is now that loss to the Government was inevitable if it pursued such a course. "The compromise scheme" with the Fitzgerald syndicate, which the "Examiner" warmly denounces, amounts simply to this. As we understand it the first mortgage bond-holders instituted a suit in foreclosure against the Union Pacific Railway. If the mortgaged property had been sold under their decree the Government would probably not have received a single dollar of the vast sum of money due to it. President Cleveland, recognizing the danger of the situation threatened to intervene and employ dilatory tactics—and the only thing he could possibly accomplish was vexatious and interminable delay—unless the syndicate which stood ready to bid in the property for an amount equal to the face of the first mortgage would also bind itself to make an upset bid for an amount in excess of the first mortgage sufficient to give the Government at least a fair proportion of its debt. This, after some negotiation, the syndicate agreed to and the Government will by the arrangement then made by the President receive twenty-eight million dollars on account of its mortgages. There is nothing in the world as far as we can see to prevent any other capitalist from bidding higher than the syndicate and taking the property. The "Examiner" complains because Mr. McKinley "gives his consent to the compromise scheme," but if he should refuse to continue the arrangement commenced by his predecessor the syndicate would be absolved from its obligations to the Government, and probably would not peg its bid up a single notch beyond the bare amount of the first mortgage. In that event the Government would get nothing. What course would our contemporary suggest under the circumstances?

---

The press intelligence from the Spanish capital with respect to the interviews of Minister Woodford and the representatives of Spain is highly contradictory, and must be unusually imaginative. It is not in the least likely that the Duke of Tetuan, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, would permit newspaper correspondents to obtain information as to the purport of his meetings with Minister Woodford, and the dispatches state distinctly that the latter is deaf to all entreaties for enlightenment. The wise course, therefore, is to content ourselves with the assumption that, beyond the definite expression of the views of his Government, Minister Woodford will not proceed, until the Court returns to Madrid for the winter. In the meantime the field will be left to the jingoes of this country, who are always ready for interference with anyone. That the climax in Cuban affairs is rapidly approaching is perfectly evident, and the difficulties of the mother country in other directions are growing in an ominous manner at the same time. The Carlists are showing signs of renewed activity, and the Socialists are a cause of much annoyance to the Queen Regent and her Cabinet. The situation of Maria Christina is one that cannot fail to stir the sympathy of everyone for a woman placed as she is, who possesses a righteous sense of duty and is consumed with an ardent wish to see her boy succeed to his royal inheritance. Should any concession be made to American sentiment there is the probability to be faced of a revolution that would sweep away the present dynasty, and yet leave the Cuban problem open.

---

A noteworthy transaction in local finance during the past week was the marketing of the 5 per cent. bonds of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railroad. The entire issue of $6,000,000 was placed with a local syndicate composed of leading bankers and capitalists, the terms of the deal providing that pending the completion of the extensions of the line from Stockton to San Francisco and from Fresno to Bakersfield such funds as are required for the work shall be supplied by the syndicate as against the deposit of the bonds. It has been freely represented in the press that the placing of the bonds in San Francisco ensures the retention of the securities here, and is a proof that California can provide capital for the development of its own resources. This view is erroneous, and has evidently been prompted by that provincialism which is far too prevalent within our borders. Those who indulge such an idea must be strangely ignorant of the ways of financiers. In the case of this particular group the markets of London, Paris and Berlin are well represented, and there is no doubt whatever they will be fed with the holdings of the syndicate as openings arise. And surely it is better for every interest concerned that the stock markets of the world should be open to our securities, created in the course of commercial expansion, than that we should be limited in our progress by the rate at which home absorption can proceed.

---

A London press dispatch reports the tailors of that metropolis as considerably exercised by the new tariff law, which limits travellers to a one hundred dollar wardrobe, as the tradesmen are losing American custom thereby. The cablegram alluding to the subject says the establishment of the famous Poole looks like an obscure chop-house. This is somewhat severe. Poole's place is hardly as imposing as our own "Call" building, but for all that it has unmistakable style and an unequalled position for its trade. The building is an old-fashioned affair, with a long, low facade, which is always a feature when London is illuminated. On those occasions everybody feels it a duty to see Poole's elaborate devices illustrating in gorgeous colors the emblems of his royal customers. First class London tailors do not revel in many storied frontages with vast expanses of plate glass—that is the privilege of the hand-me-down order of the fraternity.

---

The first division of the Boston electric sub-way was opened for traffic on the 1st of September, and upwards of one hundred thousand people availed themselves of the route. The section extends from the Public Garden at Boylston street to Park and Tremont streets, where the cars pass around a loup for the return trip. The Boylston-street branch has two tracks, and there are four tracks on the main line under Tremont street. At present the line runs on the surface along the Common mall, but on the completion of the sub-way all tracks are to be removed from the surface. The second division, from the corner of Shawmut avenue, under Tremont street, will shortly be opened for traffic, and other sections will be opened within a few months. The whole scheme affords immense relief to the congested roadways of the city, and an agreeable means of rapid transit.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

A high compliment was the tribute paid to David Starr Jordan at the recent turbulent meeting of the Regents of the State University. There Arthur Rodgers, advocating the retirement of the Administration Committee, which for so many years has ruled the University, advocated that power be vested in President Kellogg so he may demonstrate such executive ability as he possesses, without obstruction. He drew attention to the influence which the President of Stanford University had attained through his participation in the affairs of the community and attributed to the strength of his individuality the growth and development of the institution at Palo Alto. The office carries with it responsibilities which require the shoulders of a strong man to sustain, and the interposition of "buffers" between the executive and the board weakens the man in the estimation of his subordinates and prevents the development of such policies as he may conceive. As a matter of fact one hears little of the Trustees of the Stanford University because President Jordan is the head and front of the institution and does well and boldly what must be accomplished, whereas President Kellogg is a mere figurehead at Berkeley and certain superannuated celebrities have all the power. It was a concession to the ancient mariners of the Regency that Kellogg was selected to preside at Berkeley, whereas the man for the place was Professor Moses, who has the capacity and ambition to rejuvenate the institution. From appearances, however, it is safe to believe that the end of the regime of superannuation is at hand. The dethronement of Director Holden is a tremendous step in advance, but much remains to be done at home.

***

It often happens in life that the barrier a man raises for his protection proves an obstruction to his progress. The original provision of the law by which an appeal acted as a stay of proceedings in the case of officials deprived of office by the courts was repealed by the Legislature years ago at the instance of Sam Rainey, who was inspired by a desire to wreak vengeance on Fire Commissioner Frank Whitney. This was in the days of Buckley, and Rainey, who had not then the powers he now enjoys, devoted himself to the Fire Department. Whitney, it seems, had developed so much activity in the execution of his duty that he became obnoxious to the powers, who swore to his undoing. An illegality was discovered in his appointment on which a Superior Court Judge ruled him out of office. Whitney appealed at once, gave the proper bonds, and was allowed to execute the duties of the Commissioner until the Supreme Court was heard from. This turn of affairs disgusted Rainey, who declared there was a way to prevent the recurrence of such embroglios. "Wait till the boys go to Sacramento," he said to a friend. "I'll see to it that when the Judge says a man is out he's got to quit then and there. The Supreme Court can put him back if it wants to, but he must go under between times. This thing has made me sick." The following Jaunary the lobby at the Legislature worked through the amendment which made Judge Wallace's decree of expulsion immediately operative and sent out into the cold world not only the Rainey Supervisors, but the Rainey "push" which had been fattening at the public crib. What an expensive happiness an immediate vengeance often proves.

***

The vicissitudes of fortune are once again curiously illustrated in the case of an aged but very active personage, Dr. Joseph Holdsworth, who for many years has figured as a character of Sierra County. In pioneer days Holdsworth was the physician of a dozen mining camps in that environment and grew rich. The talk of the district was gold, and it is not extraordinary that he was affected by it. Prospecting became his mania. He retired from medicine and devoted himself to gold hunting. Though apparently well versed in mineralogy he made locations in the most preposterous places, and was regarded by the county as a harmless eccentric whose activity, if it did no harm, worked no injury. In the course of time the old doctor descended upon San Francisco intending to dispose of some of his claims. Being an earnest talker he succeeded in interesting capitalists, and many expeditions were made into the mountains after his alleged prizes. For the most part these wonderful prospects proved unavailable except a claim called the Red Top, high up in the Sierras away beyond Graniteville. A company of Colorado capitalists took hold of this property, and being pleased with the appearance of the rock set about development, and built on the mountain side a large boarding-house for their men. The old doctor, who is habituated to the region, laughed at this proceeding, prophesying that the winter snows, which up there are eighteen and twenty feet deep, would inevitably sweep the house into the ravine thousands of feet below. Despite his warnings the structure was finished, and a few months later an avalanche dashed it and its seven occupants to eternity. The catastrophe acted as a bar to proceedings at Red Top, but more recently certain San Francisco men took hold of the property, discovered its richness, and on the strength of the gold and quartz developed capitalized it for a million dollars. The corporation is known as the Jackson Lake Mining Company, and there is no doubt but that a great property has been discovered. The doctor has now reached the ripe age of eighty-seven, is as sound of mind and limb as a boy of twenty, and cares as little for snow or ice as a duck for rain.

***

Andrew McCreery, the well-known millionaire, lives at the Bohemian Club, and is not averse to participating in the discussions of the younger men, for whom the joys of the moment are more important that the profits of the morrow. He was invited one night to a round-table dinner in the Red Room, and was seated next to Dan O'Connell, the well-known poet, prose writer and yachtsman. After the meat there was oratory, and when it came Mr. McCreery's turn to make a speech he begged Mr. O'Connell to speak for him. Dan bowed gravely. "Shall I speak as Mr. McCreery or as O'Connell?" he asked. "As McCreery, by all means," replied the millionaire. Dan rose. "Waiter," he said, addressing the attendant servitor, "be good enough to bring at once a case of wine and a hundred cigars." He finished abruptly and sat down amid thunderous applause. The millionaire signed the card without a murmur.

***

Interest in the proceedings of the Charter Convention, now in session, will be accentuated by the action of the Election Commissioners, who are soon to announce a special election of Freeholders to whom the making of a charter will be entrusted. The necessity for a new municipal constitution has never been so apparent as at the moment. It will be indeed a poor instrument which is defeated at the next election.

***

The disclosures of the Bell case, which far exceeds in intrinsic romantic interest the Fair case with all its advocacy and oratory, exhibit in a remarkable light that extraordinary woman, Mammy Pleasance. She is the heroine; her black shadow is over the piece like a spirit of evil. The absolute subordination of Mrs. Bell to this colored woman is not surprising when one remembers the excessive will power, subtlety and audacity of Mrs. Pleasance. Engaged in the early days in the business of "railroading" runaway slaves, she developed that quickness of perception and decision which distinguishes her. She is a daring operator, certainly, but age seems to have increased her rapacity at the expense of her intelligence. As to the affairs of the Bell estate they are in a pretty mess. It seems the family allowance has been diverted to the pockets of Mrs. Pleasance, but to what purpose no one knows. If, as so many people believe, she has money in a stocking, she permits herself to be harassed needlessly with small judgments which would be satisfied at a greater economy that permitting the holders to levy on her property. Quite the strangest of the revelations evoked by this inquiry is the story of the genesis of Mrs. Bell which the "Chronicle" had Thursday morning. In view of the fate of Saville, the terrible experience of Perry is not surprising, but it is another instance of what wickedness may be accomplished in a civilized community by a desperate and unprincipled woman.

***

That Barrios is to be deposed as easily as some of the dalies would have us believe is not credible. He is bold and resourceful far beyond the average of Central Americans, and must have realized the possibility of just such a contingency as has arisen. Depend on it he is well prepared. The army is his; he has the capital, and the important financial interests of the State are all interested in maintaining his supremacy. There has been a vigorous propaganda on behalf of the opposition here recently, and the advertising given Morales' revolt has been due rather to coin in San Francisco than victory in Guatemala. The story that Barrios has behaved with brutality to Americans is apocryphal, of course, as the predeliction of the Dictator for the United States is well established. The little man is brave and competent, and it will be curious if he does not come out victor. Then his friends will be rewarded and his enemies will doubtless be quartered at the Occidental awaiting a new deal.

***

The friendship which Governor Budd evinces for the Spreckels interests is doubtless a consequence of the relationship which has always existed between him and Manager W. S. Leake of the "Call." It is taken by those on the inside to indicate that the Governor, seeing the strong Republican drift of politics in California, has not only abandoned the ambition to succeed himself, but realizes the improbability of electing a Democrat to succeed Senator White. He knows also that a declaration of candidacy would bring joy to the hearts of the innumerable enemies he has created for himself throughout the State, whose one desire is to revenge broken pledges by political extinction. This being the situation, Budd proposes to have friends in the ranks of the enemy, and hopes, by his combinations with the Spreckels and by doing favors to his opponents to obligate them so he may have a voice in the next Republican Convention. Thus he will extend his power into the administration of his successor and be able to protect his personal appointees from untimely dismissal, while his enemies will find him still a factor to contend against. In this way Budd will preserve the nucleus of an organization for future operations, and evidently does not anticipate retirement from the politics that he loves.

***

The mass meeting at Metropolitan Hall to celebrate the overthrow of the Supervisors was badly organized. Why such an important opportunity to celebrate the victory of pure righteousness was entrusted to the Iroquois Club is hard to guess. What identification has Mr. Jim Flynn—for so many years a Buckley lamb—with pure politics? And who is Mr. Hugo Asher that he should be prominent on such an occasion. Mr. Van Duzer showed a malignant ability at uttering tactless stupidities, and the only speeches were those of Gavin McNab and Congressman Maguire, which were rational expression of the situation. Mr. McNab was, as usual, epigrammatic and forceful, and was generously applauded by one of the most earnest congregations of serious and sober-minded citizens I have ever seen gathered at a ratification meeting.

BOSWELL JR.

Bismarck's brain, according to the estimate from external measurements made by Herr Ammon, an anthropologist, and the sculptor who made the Iron Chancellor's bust, probably weighs 1,897 grammes, in which case it is the heaviest on record. Cuvier's brain weighed 1,830 grammes, Byron's 1,807, Kant's 1,650, and Schiller's 1,580. The average weight of the brain of an intelligent European is 1,380 grammes.

YACHT AND BARGE RACING ON SAN FRANCISCO BAY

The "Æolus" winning the Macdonough Cup, and the Senior Barge Race at El Campo

YACHTING IN CALIFORNIA

Conditions of Wind and Weather Within the Harbor of the Golden Gate.

It is not necessary to be a statesman to trace the connection between products and pleasure. The relationship between buggy-riding in the country and the price of pears is apparent to the mind's eye of a blind man. A trip to New York has often followed a rise in the price of prunes. Bryan to the contrary, the communion of silver and French dinners is more intimate than the sympathy between the white metal and wheat. As the value of the latter product increases, however, there is visible a revival in yachting, which is one other proof of the same great principle. Yes, yachting in the waters of San Francisco bay has, during latter years, been in the condition which Cleveland called "innocuous desuetude." To the fleets but few additions were made. The men who owned schooners or cutters raced, toured and entertained their friends, it is true, but with no particular enthusiasm nor spirit. Now the change hath come. The interest in the pursuit has developed during the season of '97 to a degree which promises splendidly for the summer of '98. Between the several clubs there begins to be a recognition of mutual interests, and conditions seem to favor the gathering of the Pacific and San Francisco Clubs under a single roof-tree.

There is an immense expanse of water—for San Francisco bay is almost an inland sea—subject to conditions of wind and weather that make sailing a joy. It is sheltered from the Pacific swells and guarded from sudden squalls by the hills of Marin County and the high lands of the Coast range. During nine months of the year the skies are blue and the air full of sunshine, yet the sailor is seldom troubled by a calm and a drifting match is a rare experience. Indeed, a twenty-mile breeze is the average, and thirty-mile zephyrs are not extraordinary. In such circumstances yachting should flourish. The conditions are ideal for brief tours to Benicia, Vallejo, up the estuaries of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, or south towards San Mateo. The wide stretch of waters makes an inimitable race course. Of course, there are the disadvantages of these blessings. One tires of the confines of the bay, but cruising outside is unpleasant, and often hazardous. Harbors along the Pacific are few, and the western wind with us is an onshore current, instead of off-shore, as on the Atlantic Coast. Experts will tell you what that entails. The New York yachtman may set sail south and make, each night, a new port. If the California yachtman would sally out of the Golden Gate he must head for Santa Cruz or Monterey—excursions calling for no slight knowledge of seamanship and an acquaintance with the currents and devious channels of the rock-bound littoral. There are currents, too, within the bay, and shallows, and they have made good sailors of our yachtmen, who more than hold their own with their compatriots in Atlantic or British waters.

There are now five yacht clubs—the Pacific, with one hundred and sixteen members and twenty boats, and the San Franciscos, one hundred strong, with thirty boats, at Sausalito; the Corinthians, at Tiburon, with one hundred and twenty-five men and forty boats; the Encinal, at Alameda, one hundred members and twenty boats; the California, of Oakland, on the estuary, one hundren and twenty men and twenty boats; and the South End, a club formed at San Jose, which controls perhaps ten craft. The figures in each instance are approximate. There are, I believe, two hundred yachts of various kinds and designs owned here altogether, including El Primero, a fine and swift steamer owned by Mr. Ed. Hopkins. They are small craft for the most part, sloops and yawls in abundance, graduating into cutters and schooners. In most instances the owners are their own navigators and follow the pursuit, seriously, as a sport rather than as a form of entertainment. Indeed, yachting has had but little encouragement from society, so-called. Cruising parties, since the death of Mervyn Donahue, are seldom recorded, and the Spreckels brothers invariably have male guests when the Lurline is in commission. This condition will change under the impetus recently given the Pacific Yacht Club by the administration of Commodore Herbert E. Law, who has infused into that institution some of his own energy and enthusiasm. He it was who organized the round-table dinner to the clubs at the Pacific yacht house and founded there the sense of community interest which has since borne fruit. Another ally to the interest is tne upbuilding of Belvedere and the popularity of Sausalito. The villa residents of both burgs are driven by the precipitousness of land to the water below for relaxation. Now, the great gathering place for the fleet is the cove of Belvedere, and the navigators divide themselves between the life of the cabin and that of the house boat, to which they have developed an extreme partiality. If they are of the Corinthians the clubhouse of the organization is within hailing distance. The good cause will surely be assisted by the amalgamation of the San Francisco and Pacific Clubs, who trench upon each other's usefulness. A single strong organization with no divided purpose would be a potent adjunct in encouraging a sport whose need is direction rather than rivalry.

The expense of yachting is much the same the world over. It depends on the character of the craft and on the hospitality of its owner. I presume the Lurline costs Mr. Spreckels at least $250 per month, which is not extravagant for the pleasure his friends derive from her. But she is an exception. It is hardly an economical pursuit, for the appliances and appurtenances are all costly. Yet many poor men manage to own yawls and have as much fun on the interest of a few hundred dollars as the millionaire out of his superb "two sticker." An impetus will be given to sailing by the action of the Pacific Club, which will soon have the use of six "half-raters," now under construction. This type of craft is immensely popular in Eastern waters, and in the regattas, contests for supremacy in the class are among the exciting events. What is better, being non-sinkable and non-capsizable, the amateur may learn the way of wind and current and rest easy in the assurance that his errors cannot precipitate anything worse than a ducking.

The illustrations here exposed are from the photographs made at the annual championship regatta of the Pacific Interclub Yacht Association, which was won by the sloop Aelous. The race was for the Macdonough cup and was a close contest. There were also races for the 44-foot, 36-foot, and 25-foot classes, which were won by Pride, Edna, and Alert. The rowing races, also pictured, were contested at El Campo on Sunday, 19th. This was the rowing regatta of the P. C. Amateur Athletic Association. This was a great day for the South End Rowing Club, which was victorious in five out of the six events. Our illustrations show the course, the winning crew and the senior barge race, which was the event of the day. Both affairs were thoroughly successful and aroused general public interest.

ABOUT PERSONAGES

Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria-Este, who, now that he is recovering from consumption, has again assumed the position of heir to Emperior Francis Joseph, is said to be the richest royal personage in Europe. The last Duke of Modena bequeathed $15,000,000 to him.

One of the chief subjects for gossip in the English country houses is a romance of the peerage by which a naval cadet, after shipping as a common sailor, serving as a fire laddie in London, mining in Cheshire and roaming in South Africa, has become, after a life of adventure, the Earl of Egmont.

Carl Browne, who accompanied Coxey's army to Washington, was in Columbus, Ohio, on Labor Day, and appeared made up as the Goddess of Liberty, with a casque on his head, yellow hair hanging down his back, his face clean-shaven and powdered, his arms bared and the American flag draped in great folds around his majestic figure.

Mark Twain did the Jubilee procession for the "New York Journal," the remuneration being £500. Dean Farrar helped to do it for the "New York World." Directly after the Queen had left St. Paul's he went straight to the Athenaeum Club and "knocked off" his column or so of copy in one of the quiet rooms there which the Bishops love.

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett is endeavoring to reduce her weight and figure to an ideal standard, and for this laudable consummation has rigged up in her Washington home a massage machine. Mrs. Burnett has been so frequently interrupted in desirable trains of novelistic thought that she finally determined to be her own masseure.

Tamagno, the tenor, has lost 1.700,000 francs in a real estate speculation at Rome, according to the Figaro. He bought a building and the adjoining land at a high price on a tip from an Italian Deputy that the government wanted the property for a new Ministry of Commerce building, and found that the Deputy had unloaded his own comparatively valueless land on him.

Judge John Jay Jackson, who issued the famous injunction against the West Virginia strikers, is the oldest District Judge in the country. In 1860 he opposed the secession of Virginia, took sides with the Union, and when General McClellan marched into Virginia was the first to meet him and offer assistance. General "Stonewall" Jackson was a cousin of Judge Jackson.

Li Hung Chang is going to have a model American farm, and for this purpose has engaged Mr. Gerom D. Brill, a Dutchess County New Yorker, to superintend the work. Mr. Brill graduated from the Agricultural College of Cornell University in 1888; and immediately took up farming as a profession. In view of Li's knowledge of the model farms of Europe, his selection of an American to go to China is of special interest.

Emperor William of Germany, known in England as "William the Witless," refuses to play cards with French packs, and uses cards printed at Altenberg with old German patterns. Their backs are devoted to eagles, Prussian and Austrian, with the silver cross of the House of Savoy on a red field, surrounded with ivy and surmounted by the imperial crown. Similar designs are introduced in the corners, and the picture cards are of corresponding style. The king of diamonds is a family likeness of the great Kurfurst, the queen of hearts is a simple Gretchen and the knave of diamonds is a Knight of St. John.

For many years Prince Bismarck has neither drunk claret nor smoked cigars. The ex-Chancellor's favorite drinks are beer and champagne, and a quite exquisite hock which throws every connoisseur into raptures. The veteran statesman does not despise a glass of whisky or old Cognac, but, above all, he loves at table his long-accustomed pipe. Coffee is seldom seen. The Prince's memory is still amazing. He often dwells upon his early life, and, speaking of his great skill in pistol shooting, he said: "To shoot five bullets running into the crossbars of a window, at thirty paces, was a feat I could always trust myself to perform."

Moses P. Handy, who was appointed by President McKinley Special Commissioner of the United States for the Paris Expositon, is peculiarly suited for the mission, having been in 1876 United States Commissioner at Philadelphia, and in a similar capacity at Vienna in 1893. The appointment is made under the clause of the general deficiency bill by which the United States accepted the invitation of the French Government to participate in the exposition. At its next session Congress will pass the bill provding for five permanent Commissioners and appropriating three-fourths of a million for expenses. Mr. Handy's salary is $5,000, with an additional $25,000 for preliminary expenses.

IN COLOMBIA

Life and Conditions in a Central American Republic.

A Presidential election will be held in Colombia next November, and as one of the candidates proposes to assume the office whether he is elected or not, lively times may be expected. In 1895 civil war was waged between Governor Rosas of Cauca, the recognized chief of the radical wing of the Liberal party, and President Cavo, the head of the clericals, and the insurrection was not suppressed till many battles had been fought, and some blood spilt. In the matter of revolutions, the Colombians are to the manner born, and no one will be surprised if armies are in the field next Christmas.

Our illustrations will give people some idea of the natives of the State of Cauca, which is the largest and one of the most populous sections in the confederacy. Its inhabitants are divided into three classes: the upper class, who claim to be of pure Castilian descent, and who are in fact white, or nearly so; the lower class, consisting of a blend of the native Indian and the negro; and the aborigines, who live in the mountains and preserve their native tongue and their primitive habits.

Both of the two first named classes are pleasant people to live amongst simple, hospitable and honest. The men of the lower class are idle, and let their women do all the work. The upper class, who constitute nearly one-third of the whole, are educated, intelligent, desirous of progress, courteous to strangers, patriotic and sensible. Their women are beautiful, and the men fairly familiar with the literature and science of the day. Their capital—Bogota—is a Paris in minature, in which fashion, music and social diversions flourish. Foreigners are well received there, and fully protected in their rights. Hawthorne's sneer was undeserved. When President Pierce was inaugurated, he telegraphed to his old friend:

"Dear Nat, have appointed you to Bogota."

To which the author of the Blithedale romance replied:

"Dear Frank, where in ——— is Bogota?"

It is a fact, however, that owing to the isolated position and its difficulty of access, few people know anything about Bogota or Colombia either.

The people of the lower class are conspicuous for their religious and their sporting proclivities. They throng the churches, but they would not miss a cock fight for the world. On the plains they wear nothing but a shirt and light drawers, a straw hat and bark sandals. They ride bareback and live wholly on beef. In every stream emptying into the Amazon, or the Guaviar, or the Magdalena, the gravel shows color in the pan; but the work of washing the dirt is left to the women, whom the men watch lying on their backs on the bank. Several of the States are fertile, and with proper cultivation will grow fine crops of coffee, cocoa and sugar; but it is so difficult to obtain labor among the three and a half millions of people that the subject of inducing Chinese immigration is being seriously considered.

The traveler will find in Colombia any climate to suit him. On the coast extreme heat prevails, as might be inferred from the latitude; the equator runs through the State of Cauca. But nearly the whole territory of the confederacy is an elevated plateau, with a mild, temperate climate; and as the mountains are climbed, the winds are sometimes cold and sharp. Bogota, in 4.30 north, is constantly enveloped in fog. Population has naturally collected in the river valleys on the plateau. In these a score or more of fine cities, such as Zipaquiva, Chiquinquiva, El Socorro Velaz, Bucave Manga, San Jose de Cutuca, Neiva, Honda, Medellin, Cali, Cartagena, have grown up, and rival Colon and Panama in importance. In all these cities the foreigner can be hospitably entertained, and in most of them he can make money if he knows how to deal with the Spanish Americans.

If he could be sure of a supply of labor, he would profit more by purchasing a coffee or cocoa plantation. Land is very cheap and is admirably suited for the cultivation of coffee. It s said that the berry grown in Colombia is superior to any berry produced in Central America except in parts of Costa Rica. Excellent tobacco is grown in Ambulema for export to Germany. All these products labor under the disadvantage of slow and expensive transportation. Including the Panama line, there are only about 250 miles of railroad in the whole country, and there are little local lines. A road which is much needed is the one between Buenaventura and Cali, which was begun in 1893; it is far from completion. Colombia will not realize its agricultural development till it has access to distributing markets.

It seems strange to speak of a region so primitive as ancient, but Colombia antedates the oldest State of our Union by a long stretch of years. It was discovered by Columbus; it was from its shores that Balboa first saw the Pacific. According to Mr. Prescott, Panama was founded just a century before the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers. In the eighteenth century the Spaniards wrested the region which is now Colombia from its original occupants, and set up their churches and convents; but they were so molested by buccaneers that they filled up the mines with dirt, and blockaded the roads so that their location is now unknown.

In the insurrection which led to the independence of the Spanish colonies in South America, Colombia bore her share. Bolivar gave her name to the whole northern portion of South America. It was not until 1829 that Venezuela withdrew, and Ecuador signified her intention of following the example in the next year. The subsequent experience of the United States of Colombia has been troubled; civil war has been chronic; and the wise and patriotic citizens of the valley of the Magdalena have often regretted that petty sectional jealousies prevented the fulfillment of the sagacious plans of the Liberador.

France must face the question whether women may practice law. While degrees have been conferred before on women, a woman doctor of laws now for the first time applies for admission to the bar at Paris.

LOVE AND PHRENOLOGY

The Science of Mating by Bumps — Is Love a Mania?

Just as we have all settled back into our old, pleasant ideas of ourselves and have adopted a tone of lofty pity for the phrenologists, amateur and otherwise, who fifteen years or so ago wounded our vanity and made even our mothers regard us doubtfully—just, I say, as we have learned to be comfortably contemplotous, there springs up in Chicago an arch financier who has so dextrously blended phrenology with matrimony that he has raised the feeling of bumps almost to the dignity of a profession again. Of course, the ungenerous maid will immediately suppose Professor Vayhts' "Human Nature Club" to be nothing more than a vulgar "matrimonial agency." The worthy professor, without doubt, lays himself open to such suspicions. He begins nobly with, "The object of the 'Human Nature Club' is to study human nature in all of its phases," etc., but presently we read, "One of its principal studies is marriage," and "The proper study of mankind is—matrimony." Then there is the invitation:

MATRIMONIAL MATCHES.
Who Wants a Wife?
THE CHICAGO HUMAN NATURE CLUB
Will give a
CABLE PARTY TO JACKSON PARK.
Several matches will be made. Here is your chance. Come and bring a friend.
SATURDAY EVENING, SEPT. 4, 1897.
Start from Wabash ave. and Madison st.
7 p. m.

Isn't that purely and healthfully Chicagoan? Could it have been born in any other city of the United States? It is delightfully typical; it might have come out of Hamlin Garland's "Wayside Courtships," but it doesn't put the dear professor in the prettiest light. It does not dwell enough on "the study of human nature" to be either dignified or delusive. Neither does the professor; he even goes so far as to define the principles of marriage—"five equalities," he says, "and five differences." The parties to marriage should be about equal intellectually, morally, socially, aesthetically and qualitatively. They should differ temperamentally, lineally, complexionally, selfishly and nationally. In accord with these principles a marriage can be made with the certainty of health and happiness. The Human Nature Club teaches, besides the principles, the fundamental causes of all attractions and antagonism not only between sex and sex, but also between members of either sex, and in this way makes all kinds of human association intelligent, prudent and pleasant."

It may, professor, it may; but all the same, most of us had rather pick out our own wives, and I think we'll keep on doing it for a few thousand years yet. Though the methods of the learned match-maker may be thought embarrassing by some, they have at least the merit of directness. Read this description of his first seance:

The professor swept his cold, calculating eye about the room for a moment and then beckoned Dr. F. B. Jacobs, who has an office in the Rookery building, to step forward. The doctor, although plainly embarrassed, responded. The professor felt his head carefully and studiously. Then he let his eye rove over a host of pretty girls in the background. Finally he beckoned Miss Anna Reiss, of Prairie avenue, to come forward, and he gazed at her with interest as she approached. The bump feeling proceeded. Dr. Jacobs had a large bump of combativeness. Miss Reiss had none at all. This was the proper thing, according to the professor. So it went, through the cranial bumps and hollows of each, from memory to mirth.

When the professor had finished, he said: "This couple are suited by their physiognomy, phrenology and temperament to be husband and wife. Dr. Jacobs is a brunette and Miss Reiss is a blonde. The man is of strong mental calibre and the woman is of very domestic tastes. They would make an excellent couple." Then a clamor arose. "How about it, doctor; is it a go? Let us hear from you," cried the crowd. "If Miss Reiss is willing I am," said the doctor. "I don't see any reason why I should decline," said Miss Reiss. So the troths of the newly acquainted couple were plighted, and they made their way through the crowd and out to a secluded spot in the park, where they talked the matter over.

Of course all this is very business-like and perhaps, from a Chicago standpoint, nice, but isn't it even a little more risky that the ordinary way of becoming engaged, which, heaven knows, is risky enough? For my own part I had rather choose a girl for her feet or her finger nails than for her bumps. Perhaps every one, however, has not such a distaste for phrenology as I have, nor one so well-grounded. It dates back to the day I went with my aunt and uncle and my big cousin to a particularly hateful expounder of this very exact science. In the first place, I did not want to go—the other boys were going a-fishing—but my aunt, who was honestly trying "to be a mother" to me, said it was quite time I was thinking of my calling, and that perhaps the phrenologist (accenting phrenologist) could discover a talent or two. It has always seemed to me that the plan of these persons is to flatter the more formidable and paying portion of a family group and then even up on the rest. This particular one selected me (because I was the smallest, I like to believe) to vent his pent-up terms of opprobrium on. I was lacking in veneration; I had no love of home, no agreeability and mighty little benevolence. On the other hand, he discovered a regular ridgepole of self-esteem, and my bump of combativeness nearly cut his hand, it was so acute; continuity was a canyon, and restlessness like a boil. As for my aunt (to whom he hoped to sell books), though I had always believed her to be the best aunt in the world, still even I was a little surprised when I heard the list of her virtues. She had just the right amount of firmness. Now I had never been struck by that; there had been times when she had seemed to have a shade too much—but then I have never really appreciated castor-oil. She had all the "ideality" and "sublimity" that any woman could stagger around under and put up first-class brandied peaches, and she had "love of children" abnormally developed—yes, God bless her, I knew that. She also had order and "spirituality" to a disagreeable extent that simply astounded me, and uncle, too, I think, though he said little. A few nice traits were discovered sticking out of my uncle; enough, you know, to vindicate my aunt in her choice of a husband.

For years I suffered from this visit. If my uncle suggested the ministry for me, my aunt would look at him pityingly and, and I would know she was thinking of those arroyos in my head where veneration and benevolence, according to the phrenologist, were not. If I came home from school with a bloody shirt and a black eye, it was because I was "so combative," no matter if the boy who did it had "swiped my taw." If I evaded pulling up the weeds in the vegetable garden Saturday when I had worked there Friday, my aunt invariably murmured "'No continuity,'" as she reached for her slipper.

Yes, it is true, I do not care for phrenologists. Still, it must be admitted they sometimes do good. I once knew a young girl who made herself into a very tolerable imitation of a phrenologist's description of her. It took several years, but she did it. He gave her a little thin book containing a chart marked something like this: "Conscientiousness seven, continuity six, veneration seven, love of children seven," and she believed it. She used to sit looking at that chart until she knew it by heart, and I've often seen her struggling between her natural inclination to avoid children and her belief in "love of children, seven."

Nevertheless, I believe more in affinity than I do in phrenological signs when it comes to matrimony, even if M. de Fleury is right and "love is a human malady." Apropos of this, M. de Fleury states that the symptoms of "l'amour maladie" are similar to those of alcoholism and morphine mania. In his chapter on "La Medicine des Passions," he says: "Love is a physiological phenomenon which enters the domain of pathology the moment it assumes the sentimental form. Do we not habitually say: 'So-and-So is madly in love?' This passion, which is beyond the control of sense, in face of which reason loses her rights and powers, is incontestably a human malady."

Well, well. On with the love bacillus; let us all be innoculated, and oh the blessed balm—and calm of stagnation.

GABRIEL STANDISH.

THE HAWAIIAN SENATE

From a photograph made immediately after the body had ratified the Treaty of Annexation with the United States
Photo by the Davey Photo Co., Honolulu

Ploughing a Sugar-cane Field

A Native Village at La Manuelita

Palm Sunday at Palmira

Native Water Carriers

SCENES IN THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA

Photos by J. R. O'Connor

THE DISADVANTAGES OF NAGGING

By GERALDINE BONNER

Solomon must have been crushed and flattened from an encounter with a nagger when he wrote that meaningful sentence, "It is better to dwell in the corner of the housetop than with a brawling woman in a wide house." Indeed, the preacher seems to have had some disillusioning experiences with nagging wives, which is natural enough, as among the six hundred that he maintained there must have been many varieties of temper. All through his writings one sees that the aggressiveness of "the brawling woman" occupied his mind. "A continual dropping on a very rainy day and a contentious woman are alike," he says, somewhere in Proverbs. The Sage had not found in all women the gentle sweetness of the Shulamite to whom he wrote the greatest love-song in the world.

In the present day men do not seek relief from the nagger in a corner of the housetop. They prefer the divorce court. For night time comes and the housetop is cold, or the nagger is always at the foot of the skylight stairs waiting to take up the burden of her song. "Incompatibility of temper," the divorce laws call it, with an elaboration which makes it sound better. It would not be sufficiently imposing if it read simply plain "nagging." And yet it would be a word which would appeal more to the average intelligence. For we have all either had a nagger on the domestic hearth, or seen one on some else's domestic hearth, or given sympathy and counsel to some desperate naggee who could no longer lock his sorrows in his own breast.

The nagger, however, is a creature over whose faults the law has little control. She does not resort to throwing missiles, or using a stick no thicker than her thumb. She knows that her sex protects her from the curses and cuffs she ought to receive. Like that lady in Daudet's story, she often sets to work to provoke a blow from an exasperated husband that she may remind him of the shame of it forever after. Daudet's heroine, in the fury of her failure to elicit the blow, struck it herself. She was not a nagger. Naggers never fight with weapons or hands. They fight with their tongues, and there is but one escape from that weapon—flight! The King of Israel when nagged fled to the corner of the housetop and wrote aphorisms on the subject. The Puritans tried more vigorous methods. They ducked the scold, as they called her, in the water till they washed all the fighting spirit out of her for the time being—and in the Great Pie Belt there was peace for a space.

The man who is doomed to live under the same roof with a nagging woman is not the most unfortunate of her victims. He can seek refuge in flight. He has a business or profession which takes him away from her for eight or ten happy hours. Fancy his feelings if he had to stay at home and sweep, or run the sewing machine, or cook, under the basilisk glance of her all-seeing eye! That's the servant's side of the story which they will tell on the dreadful day of judgment, when all secrets will be known.

Dr. Cyrus Edson, who has written a serious paper on the evils due to the power of nagging women, says that the husbands of these harpies are divided into three classes. The first class are incited to violence and brutality. They beat their wives, and their wives go to court vociferating, and talk about their bruises. The second class avoid their homes and seek solace in clubs and saloons. These neglect their wives and their wives go to their friends weeping and telling of their desolate homes. The third class retain a sort of despairing afterglow of affection for the naggers and stand by them and bear with them and try to be patient and forgiving. These are the men of sensitive, nervous temperament, and, not infrequently, the learned doctor says, they break down or go mad from the tension under which they live. For the strain of enduring silently and patiently the maddening attacks of the nagger's temper is said to be more trying to the nervous system than the strain of overwork or overworry.

The greatest sufferers, however, are the children. The man gets away from his tormentor, finds a refuge in his office and solace and diversion in his business and his friends. He may come home tired and sick at heart to the sour face and carping tongue of the woman he has made the partner of his life, but he has had a respite from her and can summon up enough philosophy to turn a deaf ear and an indifferent eye to her biting tones and her frowning brows. But the children! The unfortunate children—who pass their youth, cowed and cowering, in her blighting presence—who shall say what they suffer?

There have been people who have risen up and, in timid voice, said that they thought the blissful estate of childhood was an overestimated one. Certainly the child of the nagger must look back upon its earlier ye[ars] with a shudder of horror. From the dreary prison th[e] its mother's temper makes of its home it has no hope escape. It is too young to foresee a day when it will r[ise] in its wrath and despair and fly into the world, anywh[ere] anywhere, for peace, as the Great Sage fled to the corner of the housetop. The hopelessness of the grown-up is bad enough, with its full understanding and its ripened powers of action and resistance, but the hopelessness of the child, dark, despairing, overwhelming, is one of the grimmest of tragedies.

Learned people say that children who grow up under this grinding regime show the effect of it in ruin[ed] nerves that darken the rest of life for them. The tai[nt] of a bad heredity works its way through generation[s] Here is the fault of a merely ill-tempered woman—t[he] common "Scold" of the Puritans, the "brawling woma[n] of ancient Israel—that throws a long shadow over th[e] future of her offspring. And don't believe any of th[e] nonsense she may talk about not being able to contr[ol] it. Most of the bad tempers that sour the joy of th[e] world are only restless egotisms and the froth of u[n]occupied hours.

AN IDYL.

As I went down where grazing herds
Had sought the sylvan shade;
I caught the notes of nesting birds
In all the leaf-lined glade.

I walked knee-deep amid the bloom
And fragrance born of spring;
While flush of spray and flash of plume
Illumined wood and wing.

Entranced with all I saw and heard,
As home I fared elate,
I hummed the self same air the bird
Was singing to his mate.

Ah, could we hear, when meaner things
Enthrall us day by day,
The wondrous song the glad lark sings
In fields not far away.

—LUCIUS HARWOOD FOOTE.

The Great Hall

The Modeling Class

The Life Cla

Studying from the Antique

The Portrait Cla

CLASSES AT THE MARK HOPKINS INSTITUTE OF ART

Mark Hopkins Institute of Art Taber, photo

Photos by Weldner

THE HOPKINS INSTITUTE

Art Education in San Francisco—Men Who Have Emerged.

There are one hundred and sixty students up at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Arts now, and from year to year the number increases. It is rather surprising and gratifying to know that their average work in drawings from the nude is quite as good as the average work turned out in Julian's, the great atelier of Paris. Students leave from the Art Institute of this city every year whose names figure afterwards on the walls of the Salon or on the pages of the great illustrated magazines of this country. Alexander Harrison, the famous marine painter, came from this organization, and at one time Toby Rosenthal was a student in its midst. Then there are such artists as Earnest Peixotto, Eric Pape, and Guy Rose, who are as good magazine illustrators as any in the country.

The Hopkins Institute is doing great work in bringing out native talent, and not only bringing it out but developing it to a very high degree. In the old school its students used to be drilled and drilled and drilled in drawing from the antique, and a great deal of time wasted in consequence. Mr. Arthur F. Matthews, present head of the school, has changed all that, however, and has made the life classes—that is to say, the classes that work from nude models—the all important part of the course. Other classes there are, however, such as the portrait class, the still life class, the night class, and a small class in the antique, all of which are merely preparatory classes for the life work. Besides the mere practical work of drawing and painting, however, there are three or four secondary courses, such as anatomy, perspective, composition, and the like. Dr. Hay lectures on the skeleton and muscular formation once a week. Mr. R. D. Young is the instructor in perspective, while Mr. Matthews gives occasional talks on composition. The other members of the corps of instructors are Douglass Tilden, instructor in modeling; Mr.Stanton,, who has the night class; Miss Chittenden, who superintends the Saturday class, and Mr. Harry Fonda who has charge, alternately with Mr. Matthews, of the life classes. Mr. Matthews is also the general director of the school and dean of its faculty. In addition, Mr. Fonda conducts a costume sketch class.

The artists in general are well satisfied with the Hopkins house as a headquarters for the school, and there is no doubt but what the students will long continue to occupy it as such. The light is admirable, the rooms spacious, and the arrangement of the house affords first-class opportunities in the way of galleries for exhibitions. The school offers three medals yearly for which the competition is very keen. The most desirable medal of all is the painting medal, given for the best color study made in the life class. After this in order of importance come the drawing medal and antique medal, which latter is given or not at the option of the instructor.

When the life class of the school originally opened the instructors found themselves at first involved in an unexpected difficulty, that of obtaining models. There were only one or two professional models known to the coterie of local painters, and the life class soon knew them by heart. For a time the directors were hard put to it to satisfy the demand, but after the first year the wants of the school became known in the "Latin Quarter," and the Italians, as usual in every art center, began to recruit the corporal's guard of those who earned their living by "posing for the figure." However, the artists who have studied in Paris and worked from all of the famous models there are a unit in declaring that the California-bred model, especially the female model, is the best that can be found the world over, in the matter of color, proportion, modeling, and, as the painters say, "skeleton." That the Hopkins Institute of Art and the work done by its students is having its influence is indubitable. Painters and draughtsmen whose early education was gained in this city are returning one by one from the great European ateliers, settling down and pursuing their vocation in San Francisco and its surroundings. While as yet there are not many of them, they nevertheless are quite capable of turning out work easily comparable with the best that is being done in the East. Portrait and landscape seem to be their strong points, and their work along these lines has just begun to attract attention. Formerly it was only very well-to-do people, the "patrons," who bought pictures. Now the middle classes are buying, and are more and more willing to pay good prices for good pictures.

JUSTIN STURGIS.

THE COMITY OF NATIONS

Franco-Russian Entente and the Jaunts of Emperor William.

What Prince Bismarck in a recent interview aptly, though perhaps somewhat cynically, styled the "decorative element in politics," has recently engaged much attention. The old statesman is not impressed with the value of the highly theatrical proceedings of the heads of the continental nations during the last few weeks, and has not failed to warn the public against attaching too much importance to the various functions which have been carried through. It must be recognized, however, that below the surface there is an under-current of purpose in these meetings of the great continental monarchs, presidents and ministers. Most significant of all these journeyings is that of President Faure to St. Petersburg.

Of all the great royalties, the German Emperor has been the most active. He has paid his respects to the Czar of Russia at the Russian metropolis, has received King Humbert of Italy at Hamburg, and been entertained by Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria-Hungary. Emperor William's doings and the ministerial interchange of views which took place were in strong contrast with the open expression of sentiments between the Czar and the French President, for they have been carefully surrounded with the inevitable secrecy of diplomatic proceedings. This being so, the chief item of public comment has been the French and Russian entente. Let us see how this has been brought about and what is its present position.

That a definite alliance exists between France and Russia no longer admits of doubt, inasmuch as it has twice been proclaimed, first by the Czar and then by President Faure. The connection, supported as it presumably is by a formal treaty, must, therefore, receive official recognition. The first association of the kind dates back to the Treaty of Tilsit, entered into between Napoleon and Alexander in 1807, England being then the bugbear of the two nations. That treaty continued in force for four years, sufficiently long to show Alexander that the apparently all-conquering power of the great French captain was weakening and could not be depended upon to assist in accomplishing the designs of Russia upon the Ottoman empire. With the reign of Alexander III of Russia came a military treaty between the two nations, the nature of which remained unknown, and it was generally believed that this was in the later years of the same reign supported by a diplomatic alliance, which was one of understanding, no written protocol being recorded. It has remained for the visit of President Faure to the present Czar to disclose the existence of a documentary basis of international agreement. In the language of the historical toasts on board the Pothuan, the alliance makes for peace, though, be it noted, conditionally, that, as proclaimed by M. Faure, such shall be in accordance with "civilization, justice and the rights of man," and by the Czar, "with law and justice."

The reception accorded to the announcement of the treaty has been far more enthusiastic in Russia than in France, a fact that is probably due to the careful avoidance by the Czar of any encouragement to the French desire for revenge upon Germany. That the union of Latin and Slav is to be used as the lever to wrest the lost provinces of Alsace and Lorraine from the grasp of the Teuton, while dearly hoped for by the entire French nation, is far from the thought of the Russian monarch. In this respect he has been as careful to not commit himself as he had previously been to dispel the notion of Emperor William that he was at all disposed to join France and Germany in a coalition directed against England.

From a military point of view the Franco-Russian alliance must be treated as a powerful factor in European politics, and that it is so regarded by all the subordinate and non-Russian Slav races, the Bulgarians, Servians, Croatians and Czechs of Bohemia, was made evident by their rejoicings on a scale not one whit less enthusiastic than those of the Russians themselves. All these peoples have felt the iron despotism of Germany, and they see in the publicly declared alliance between Russia and France sufficient warrant for believing that in the future they will be freed from German tyranny. The relations of Germany and England, which have lately been subjected to much strain, should also be tempered with more discretion on the part of Emperor William, who will have to reflect on the fact that the French and Russian entente will probably tend toward benevolent neutrality on the part of those two powers toward Great Britain in case of any serious dispute between her and Germany. In the far East the reciprocity existing between France and Russia must inevitably have an important influence, and the extension of the power of both countries on the eastern side of the Pacific is undoubtedly to be expected.

In this latter direction the compact between the Czar and the French republic is chiefly interesting to us here, for in its commercial and territorial expansion in the neighborhood of China and Japan we shall find increased competition in the markets of those countries. From time to time allusion has been made in these columns to the progress of the great Siberian railroad and the connected steamship routes, which will bring us into closer touch with the Asiatic border and Eastern Europe, and it will be well for those interested to watch events in that direction.

G. L. B.

EL ZOBEDIE

THIS CLEVER EQUILERIST IS NOW PERFORMING AT THE ORPHEUM

Photos by Marceau

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

Do you know, Diary, dear, that if there e aught in prognostications I shall have he time of my life this winter. At present am living like the heir apparent—on my ex-ectations. You see, the debutantes of this eason have resolved to make this a sort f "jubilee" year, so to speak, a time to be emembered in the annals of San Francisco ociety. I understand that the Blandings re to entertain a great deal. Mrs. Bland-ng has added a ballroom to their home, and usie expects to make her initial appearance ith sounding of trumpets and flying colors. hen, Edna Hopkins is to be ushered in at a ig "At Home." She is not tall and strik-ng looking, like Helen, but is a bonny, win-ome little thing, with a rather unusual face nd fetching eyes. Marie Wells, too, is to ake her formal entry at a tea given by her other. Mrs. Alvord promises to give Ethel eeney and Leontine Blakeman entertain-ents innumerable. One of the handsomest ebutantes is Lillie Follis, who is a tall londe, rather a Gibson type, and has the urther charm of real novelty. Unlike the reater number of the girls she has never ttended any of the half-and-half parties herein she hath displayed much wisdom.

Then, to add to the pleasure of the season, here is to be a really smart new cotillion lub formed by the debutantes. It is to be sort of a continuation of Miss West's erpsichoreans," only on a particularly well scale. Ed. Greenway is to manage he dances and attend to the minutiae, and hey are to be the Events, with large capi-als, of the season. The girls intend having our altogether, beginning early in Novem-er. I hear they are to be as exclusive as he Monday Evening Dancing Class, and as olly as the Saturday Fortnightlys. The in-itations will be exceedingly difficult to ob-ain, which will further enhance their de-irability. To the uninitiated who remem-er the number of dancing clubs now in ex-stence this new one may possibly seem su-erfluous, but such is not the case. You ee, a number of the jolliest of the girls for ome reason did not receive invitations to ne or more of the Fortnightlys, so they de-ided to become independent and form their wn club. I hear that there is to be more han one storm in the teacups ere this sea-on closes, and when the Terpsichoreans issue heir invitations the first will burst. The nvitations to the Saturday Fortnightlys are ot. The dances are to begin early in No-ember. By the way, speaking of these articular dances, I hear that Laura Bates s quite seriously indisposed. Is it not too ad, as she is certainly the flower of her irmly.

I went down to Burlingame on Saturday to [illegible] with [illegible] It was rather quiet, though a few of us went to a campfire that the officers gave at San Mateo, and had a pleasant time. I quite like wo of the soldiers, Dr. Eads is an unusu-lly nice chap, and Lieutenant Nolan is cap-l company. I am going down again this eek. You know they are to have concerts Saturday and on Sunday at the clubhouse during the dinner hour on Saturday and at luncheon on the Sabbath. A large crowd is expected, and if the affair prove enjoyable the concerts will be continued during the fall. I am sure they will, as somehow mu-sic has a wonderfully inspiriting effect even upon the staidest among us. I never knew even quiet Aunt Lucinda to remain silent while a waltz was being rendered

Oh, I must tell you what a glorious time I had on Thursday last, a whole day of it. Mrs. Oelrichs invited some fifteen of us to go on a cycling party to the Cliff House. We started at an early hour, and on arriving went for a swim in the Sutro Baths. It was the most refreshing bath I think I ever had You see, we made pretty good time and were warm and slightly fatigued. Afterward we lunched at the Cliff House, and when the afternoon became sufficiently cool we wheeled home. Was not that a day of it! The menu, too, was capital. Mr. Oelrichs possesses that rarest of ability, the intelligence to select food of a delicacy to charm the palate of the most fastidious and yet not one that causes you to feel lament-that may be enjoyed in no terror lament-continue shockingly quiet. No one seems willing to commence. I hope they will soon, as the Oelrichs leave about the middle of next month, and I shall be stranded. Well, Diary, dear, adieu for another week. Your own MISS CRICKET.

* *

The Sketch Club has moved into its new quarters in the Martin and Ingalsbee Building on Sutter street, and is to give a big house-warming to its associated members and their friends on Saturday, September 25th. This is to precede a series of events for mutual improvement in the fine arts. The members purpose having series of illustrated lectures during the fall. The first will be about Leonardo de Vinci, to be followed by the early Dutch painters and one upon Primitive Pottery. The rooms are large and well adapted to the exhibition of pictures. Several of the collectors have promised to lend their paintings for exhibitions during the winter. Mrs. Francis Sleeth is the new president of the club, and is most ambitious with regard to its progress.

Mr. and Mrs. William J. McCloskey will receive this afternoon at their studio on Montgomery street. Mrs. McCloskey's portrait of Frederick Paulding as Romeo is to be on exhibition.

On Wednesday at the Church of the Advent Mr. Harry W. Morosco and Miss Florence E. Jackson were married by the Rev. J. A. Emery. The wedding, which occurred at noon, was very quiet, attended only by immediate relatives and friends. Mr. Morosco is well and favorably known, and for some time has been associated with his brother in managing the Grand Opera House. Miss Jackson is an Australian, but has lived in this city several years. She is an attractive young lady, and has already received much attention as a pianiste. Mr. and Mrs. Morosco will travel for several weeks in the south.

As far as social events be concerned this year, Oakland seems to have taken the initiative. Whereas in San Francisco we are still in the depths of the silly season, in Oakland teas, luncheons and dinners follow one another with almost clocklike precision. Our debutantes are still in their embryonic stages, while theirs have begun to make their initial bow. The first event of interest was the tea given on Friday by Mrs. Taft to introduce her daughter, Miss Chrissie Taft. About one hundred and fifty invitations were issued. Miss Taft is a tall, slim girl, with a rather interesting personality. She was gowned in white. All those who assisted in receiving were this year's buds, namely: Misses Gertrude Allen, Jennie Crellin, Claire Converse, Elsie Gregory, Bessie Palmer, Pauline Fore and Florence Shannon. The house was decorated from garret to cellar, and the music furnished by the California Mandolin Club (which has for the nonce caught the popular favor).

Mrs. Harry Thomas entertained Mrs. G. C. Carminel of Galveston, Texas, at a charming at home on Tuesday evening. The house was decked in roses and carnations. It was quite a large affair, and the girls who assisted looked exceedingly well. Among them I especially noticed Miss Georgie Strong, Miss Kittredge and Mrs. Gaskill. What made the occasion of even greater interest was the fact that it was Mrs. Ernest Folger's first formal appearance since her marriage. She looked more than usually pretty. Mrs. Carminel was also entertained by Mrs. T. C. Hampton on Saturday, at an informal tea.

Among the luncheons of the week the one that evoked the greatest degree of interest was given by Mrs. Edward von Adelung in honor of Miss May McLean. It was a girl's affair, and rarely enjoyable. Miss McLean, who has lately returned from Europe, and is an instructor at Stanford, described the more interesting events of her trip. Among those bidden to meet her were Miss Pringle, Miss Moore, Mrs. Mark Requa, Miss Minnie Bailey, Miss Olney, etc.

A pretty home wedding occurred in Oakland early last week at the residence of the bride, Miss Sarah Ford. Mr. W. L. Garnett, the groom, is well known across the bay, through his connection with the Oakland Savings Bank. Mr. and Mrs. Garnett are honeymooning in the south, and on their return will reside in Oakland.

Among the events of the future is the wedding of Dr. James Ackerly and Miss Anna Beck, which will be celebrated on September 30th. It is to be an exceedingly quiet affair on account of the recent death of the father of the groom, Rev. Benjamin Ackerly.

Any number of less formal affairs were given during the week, among them Mrs. Collins' farewell gathering to Miss Wellman, who left for the East on Monday. The bicycle party given by Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Hampton in which Miss Mary Barker, Miss Mary Whitney, Miss Helen Bell, Mr. Cook, Mr. Gaskill and Mr. David Painter participated. A "spider web party" given on Thursday last by Miss Mattie Eades of East Oakland and the progressive euchre party given by Mrs. P. A. Blake to about seventy people are also on my list. Mrs. T. Hoyle carried off the first prize.

Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Jacobs gave a smart little dinner on Thursday. The table looked charming in its decoration of pink carnations. Among those invited were Rev. and Mrs. R. F. Coyle, Mr. and Mrs. Homer Craig, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Ames, and others.

How to Serve Champagne — Some Important Hints.

Mr. Jerome K. Jerome once gave a dinner and discussed the matter of wine with the head waiter—a kindly, fatherly old man—before the guests arrived. He was a man of experience and knowledge, and they went over the wine list together.

"Well," said the waiter, "if you take my advice you will give them a very good champagne to start with, let's say Deutz & Geldermann, 1889, and let that go round twice.

"After that, sir—well, here's a very good wine that I always recommend, at five shillings the bottle; and then if I were you, sir, I would finish up with this," and he pointed to a modest little brand at three and six.

"And don't you think," said Jerome, "that they will notice the difference?"

"Lor' bless you, no, sir," said the man; "we generally do it that way. I wouldn't undertake to tell the difference myself between champagne at sixteen shillings and champagne at five after the first two glasses."

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market Street

THE THEATRES

Crane's "Virginia Courtship"—A Perfect Villain at Morosco's.

"A Virginia Courtship" relates an inoffensive, pleasant, little story—rather commonplace perhaps, but amusing enough and quite evenly played by "Wm. H. Crane and his admirable company."

Once upon a time a lady friend confided to me that in her younger and less discriminating days she had read nearly two dozen of the novels of Bertha M. Clay—may she be forgiven the sin of it—and added that though remembering the plots of several of the stories, which were very similar, and most of their names, for the life of her she could not fit the names to the stories or say which was which. It may happen in the course of events that I may desire to recall the name of the play presented by Crane at the Baldwin during the second week of his engagement. I shall remember there was an irascible, good-hearted old chap who married the widow living neighbor to him, and that his son married the widow's daughter. I shall remember too that it was the play that had an ungrateful adopted son for the villain. There was a lover's gate in it, and the boy ran off and married the identical girl his father wanted him to wed, believing at the time he was going directly contrary to the parental will. But the name will be lost, and the story will, most likely, be jumbled up with a half dozen others of quite the same character. Yet "A Virginia Courtship" is not bad; on the contrary it is rather interesting. It is, however, distinctly commonplace. Bright enough for all purposes, doubtless; but after the curtain rings down one feels about the same degree of satiety that would be yours after a dinner of omelette souffle. It is not "filling." You find yourself wondering why under the canopy an author who handles dialogue so admirably as Presbrey does in this trifling connection, should not exercise a nicer discrimination in the selection of his material. There is not a single strong scene or a virile situation in the performance.

Crane was at his best in the second act, when decked out in all the splendor of pink satin knee breeches and waist-coat he practiced before the glass the airs and graces of a courtier preparatory to paying court to the widow. He was light and pleasing, and neatly avoided the over-absurd. Before departing to offer his heart and hand he calls into consultation his overseer and business manager to determine the character and amount of the marriage settlement he may make upon the widow, and then to his great amazement the ancient lover discovers he is a bankrupt. His pride is hurt, his heart almost broken. The widow is rich but no Fairfax ever married for aught but love; now that he is poor he will have none of the wealthy neighbor. This is the dilemma when the lady herself, who is determined to marry him, puts in an appearance. In this scene Crane's best work is discovered. Pride and love battle for supremacy! Pride conquers and manfully but sorrowfully he faces the situation and withdraws his suit. You cannot help sympathizing with the old gentleman, for Crane infuses into his personality a great deal of naturalness and pathos. The other members of the cast were evenly good, and the audience correspondingly appreciative.

B.

* *

Truth crushed to earth in the first act rises triumphantly in the last in "Slaves of Gold," this week's play at Morosco's. The drama is all the title suggests—a tale of greed and avarice and all its attendant train of ills and villainy, accompanied with more or less comedy and emotion and a realistic mine explosion. Mentioning villainy, the wicked man at Morosco's, John T. Nicholson, possesses two essential qualities—very black eyebrows and an equally black voice. As Leonard Monckton, the dishonest clerk, he uses both with effect sufficient to call down the hisses of the gallery. In pleasant relief is Mortimer Snow as William Hope, the hero father, and Sanders Stevens as Walter Clifford. Fred Butler makes a study of the old banker, and a really well drawn character is Fred Fairbank's Colonel Clifford. Maud Edna Hall is sympathetic and lovable in everything she plays—this week she has little to do, but does it well. The comedy, which is rather quiet, is given by Leslie Morosco and Julia Blanc.

The third act is the great scene of "The Wife," the only bit in the play that has retained its interest after all the seasons. The clownings of Major Putnam are antique and inane and the jealous rantings of Lucille Ferrant as well. Even the juvenile love scenes are beginning to pall, but the lines in Rutherford's library are as telling now as they ever were, and as effective. In this scene the Frawleys are at good advantage—or rather four of them, Frank Worthing and Wilson Enos noticeably. As for Major Putnam, if such a man ever existed his proper place was an asylum, not a drawing-room. Mr. Clarke is clever and comical, but withal an absurdity.

Helen Truman is one of the few characters particularly suited to Blanche Bates. There is not too much of Miss Bates in it—just enough, just a satisfying sufficiency. Selene Johnson as the jealous creole plays on her own lines and also in two fetching gowns. And Gladys Wallis—on the programme she is Kitty Ives, but on the stage she pleasantly continues her season's character of that very pretty, very dainty and well dressed young person, Gladys Wallis. A good word should be given Eleanor Robson as Agnes. Her presence is agreeable and her manner promising.

DRAMATIC NOTES

In Augustus Thomas' new play "Don't Tell Her Husband," to be given its premiere at the Columbia Monday evening, Harry Corson Clarke will play the principal role, a bright and eccentrically comic character. The lines of the comedienne will fall to Blanche Bates, and the emotional ones to Miss Johnson. Frank Worthing and Francis Carlyle play the remaining leads. As for the play it is Mr. Thomas' first attempt at comedy, and for that reason if for no other peculiarly interesting. It is on the problem plan, depending entirely for effect upon the art of the players and not upon the tricks of mechanism. The Frawleys will present "Sue" during the week of October 4th.

The eighth week of the Tivoli grand opera season commences Monday with a presentation of "The Huguenots," with Michelena as Raoul; Mertens, di Nevers; Effie Stewart, Valentine, and Anita Casals as Margaret of Valois. Mlle. Casals is a lyric soprano who has sung with great success at La Scala and throughout Italy, Spain and Mexico. "The Huguenots" will be sung Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday. The balance of the week will be devoted to the last performances of "The Flying Dutchman." The ninth and last week of the season will be devoted to Verdi's "Rigoletto," with Mlle. Casals as Gilda.

The Alcazar announces for next week a revival of the old-time favorite "Hazel Kirke," a play that has drawn rather more tears than most of it contemporaries. The production at the Alcazar bids fair to be satisfactory. Two new members of the company make their first appearance, Mr. Wright Huntington and Miss Florida Kingsley. Miss Kingsley, who will play Dolly Dutton, is a capable and attractive soubrette. Miss Foster is cast for the titular role, and Mr. Thompson for the character part of Barney.

Another melodrama of the popular sort is announced for next week at Morosco's. It is Charles Gayler's "Lights and Shadows," a piece well supplied with scenic and mechanical effects and an abundance of comedy and emotion. All this promises well for the play, and as the company is capable, and will be carefully cast, a satisfactory production may be expected.

"A Virginia Courtship" will be continued at the Baldwin for another week. The next attraction will be the comedy success "My Friend From India," the original New York company appearing in the production.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. bottle.

MUSIC

The Tivoli's "Flying Dutchman"—An Ineffective Tamagno.

Opera of the serious kind appears to be growing in popular favor. And if the work of the army of teachers of music supported by San Francisco is of any value, the growth should reach double the proportion during the next ten years. Such influence as the local musical pedagogues possess must necessarily be in favor of spreading a taste for something better than the drivel of average comic opera. That there has been a distinct gain in taste for this second season of opera seria at the Tivoli is sufficient proof. Herr Scheel's return with a symphony performance is also a sign of the interest in vocal musical art. Symphony is not calculated in modern times to draw a purely popular audience, and opera has claims upon the "divine average" with its variety of associations which no power of art can lay claim to. Never in the history of musical art has the personality of singers and virtuosi been so valued and paid such homage. All the trend of interviewing is to increase and feed the curiosity of the public as to the vagaries of its idols. Opera stars take topmost place. No dramatic artist, however great, can hope to rival the actor-singers, the voice still stands as the greatest magnet. Though pure singing has ceased to be the main attraction, the voice of the singer is everywhere to be reckoned with.

MRS. HARRY MOROSCO

Nothing can be a better sign than the large and interested audiences gathering for the Wagner performance. The Tivoli management evidently hit upon the right temper and it is to be hoped will follow each year in the same lines. Of course better performers are a desideratum, and the presence of some members of the casts was to be regarded as 'welcome trumpery,' but the higher the ability the higher the price, and the price of seats in their reasonableness always has been a distinct charm in the Tivoli. Still, to expect a San Francisco audience to take Miss Salinger seriously in grand opera is to show a melancholy lack of humor. Even the aspirant herself good-naturedly acknowledges having arrived at the point of well-ripened chestnuthood in third-rate trash comic opera, where the merry jumble of tights and shrieks and adequate plumpness is all that is asked. But as Marguerite, as Senta, the impossible was reached by Miss Salinger; those gestures of the rule of three kind, those sounds tied in sailor-knots were something to haunt the bravest.

In the "Flying Dutchman" Wagner was his several selves. The self which every master wishes to forget, the self which is built up on the works of the older masters sympathetic to him in youth, is strikingly advanced in this opera. Those extensions of Weber and Gluck through which Wagner developed the real Wagner melody, everywhere express themselves, reminiscences of that hated school of Italian opera float through the score, lighting up some of the scenes with conscious humor, while the mysterious terror and elder world sense so purely Wagnerian begin in this romantic work to evidence their power. In the voice parts the influence of the bel canto is strong, and unconsciously the master asked his interpreters to sing, while his orchestra merely supported them. The later works reversed the methods unhappily, for opera singers are to become in his works merely brass instruments constructed on the plan of the trombone. Every kind of emotion outside humor or [illegible] tender stream through the "Flying Dutchman" as they do in any of the works following it. Excepting that the action is less electric than in "Tannhauser" and "Lohengrin," this opera should be the most popular of the popular Wagner works, for the melody is more robust and in simpler forms than in either of those creations. The performance came up to the average standard of the season. Mr. Martens making all manner of successful exertion as the Dutchman.

Senor Aramburo is remarkable for the tales told of him by Colonel Mapleson chiefly. His singing in concert is not to be expatiated upon. All the flat, nasal quality of Spanish singing done in the operatic venture let loose upon us hurtled over his audience. Tamagno made his hearers think of Chinatown reed instruments and the nasal vowels in California French, but Senor Aramburo outshone him in the latter quality without in the least trying to. A robust voice is painful when there is neither beauty of timbre nor musical style. Herr Schott had at least the "divine frenzy" and that supreme Teutonic emotion found only in the countrymen of Wagner. For programme Senor Aramburo gave the weakest numbers of weak Italian music.

LESLEY MARTIN

Mme. Mountford's lectures on the Holy Land have been attracting unusual attention. The idea is interesting but it is seldom illustrated in as complete a manner. Mme. Mountford has a taking delivery, a number of good ideas and a specially clever way of expressing them. The costumes and groupings add much to the general effect. The last lecture will be given this afternoon.

Married people live longer than the unmarried, the temperate and industrious longer than the gluttonous and idle, and civilized nations longer than the uncivilized. Tall persons enjoy a greater longevity than short ones.

Mr. Frank Davey, who will be remembered in this city from his long connection with Taber, has already succeeded in attracting the attention of Honolulu by his successful work. Bas-reliefs and iridium effects in photography are something new in the islands, and have caused a sort of mild sensation. The photographs of the Hawaiian Senate, which appear in this week's "Wave," are from the studio of the Davey Photo Co.

Shakespeare says truly:

"That which we call a rose
"By any other name would smell as sweet."

But the reverse is also true. The simple fact that so many wretched perfumes are called Florida Water does not impart to them any of the sweet fragrance of Murray & Lanman's Florida Water. Beware of these counterfeits and make sure of obtaining the genuine article, which has become an indispensable requisite for every well-appointed dressing-table.

The Occidental Restaurant, 337 Bush street. Headquarters for tourists. Separate rooms for families. Meals a la carte. Lunch 50c. Best French Dinner in the city, 75c. Dan Jeuch, proprietor.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

Bookkeepers, students, and business men generally use Bank Stock paper. It preserves the sight. The Mysell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay st.

$2,000.00

Schilling's Best baking powder makes the biscuits right.

Schilling's Best tea would make them seem right if they weren't.

Bank Stock paper relieves, strengthens and saves the sight. Made in five different qualities. The Mysell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay street.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

Experts Say

Where Finest Food Is Required Royal Baking Powder Must Be Used.

Miss Suzy Tracy, the cooking demonstrator in the Model Kitchen at the Mechanics' Fair, says:—

"In the practice of my profession as a teacher of cookery I have tried the different brands of baking powder, and I find that Royal Baking Powder gives the best satisfaction. I can accomplish the best results with a smaller quantity of Royal Baking Powder than of any other kind, and I find it always to be perfectly uniform in its action."

Suzy Tracy.

QUEEN LILY

SOAP

Will not shrink Woolens, Flannels or the finest of Fabrics. The Best and Most Economical Soap Made. Washes Without Rubbing . . . .

PATRONIZE HOME INDUSTRY

Notice.—On receipt of 25 Queen Lily Soap wrappers, we will mail to any address a handsome picture, 15x20, free from all advertising matter.

NEW ENGLAND SOAP CO.
307 Sacramento St., S. F.

SOHMER PIANOS

BYRON MAUZY
AGENT
308-314 Post Street, S. F.

MISS BELL VS. BEAUX

Inadequacy of the Man Under Thirty-Five — Males as Lovers.

Light-hearted, daintily impertinent criticism of other people's male accessories—brothers, husbands and such like—is always very amusing reading for a woman; it is a safety-valve, too, for her accumulated irritation against the sex and that particular fragment of it which oppresses and supports her. There are some things you know which she can't quite bring herself to say, yet it is soothing, very soothing, to read them and underscore savagely with a large pugnacious carpenter's pencil. Looking at this factor of the thing, it will really pay any man to give his wife or sweetheart a copy of "A Girl's Point of View" (Harper & Brothers), that is, if he is good natured enough to stand having it read at him without talking back or sneering, for it fills a woman with a large, vague, pitying toleration for men and their stupidities—temporary, alas! but most oiling while it lasts, to the nerves. It leaves her feeling superior and uplifted. She agrees with the writer, Miss Lillian Bell, that it is quite absurd to quarrel with so gauche an animal as a man. Moreover, it is written in so crisp and nervous a style that with its insousiance and humorous overstatement it makes very excellent reading for even a husband.

There is little or none of that quinine-like bitterness which underlies most women's thoughts on man and love (the main theme of these little articles)—in fact, there is a very obvious determination not to be more than half serious about anything, and the point of view is maintained with a considerable degree of success. Sometimes, however, truth takes the bit between its teeth, and, if Miss Bell isn't serious she comes perilously near making us so. Notably in "Lovemaking as a Fine Art," ushered in as it is by this acute analysis of "men as lovers." "Men seldom make perfect lovers," she begins, rather tritely. "I do not pretend to say why this is so. I suppose it is because a man never dwells upon the sentimental side of life nor understands the emotions unless he is either a poet or a Miss Nancy, and it is almost equally dangerous to marry either of these. Pray do not be offended, my friends the poets, at being mentioned in the same paragraph with a Miss Nancy until you discover the exact meaning of that effective term of opprobrium. A Miss Nancy is a poet without genius, one who has a talent for discovering the fineness of life, but who lacks the wit to keep his views from ridicule." * * * "I suppose there is not a man in the world who would not be surprised if he knew that:

"We do not consider men good lovers. We have accepted them, and been engaged to them, and married them, and pretended to them, and, what is worse still, pretended to ourselves that they were satisfactory, but the truth is they were not, and they are not, and this is the first time we have dared to say so.

"Now don't expect, if you go to your wife or your sweetheart and ask her if this is so, that she is going to tell you the truth about it. I wouldn't either. I would pretend that the others might be unsatisfactory as lovers, but that you—well, you just suited me, that's all. I would have to, you understand, to keep you going. And that is what your sweetheart will do. If she did not, you would get cross and sulky, and there would be a week of unhappiness for both of you, and then the girl would apologize and back down from her position, and then you would go on exactly as you did before.

"No, if you are going to profit by this at all, do not talk it over with any woman you love. Talk it over with some clever woman who will tell you the truth because she has nothing to lose."

The worst of all this is that it is true. It may be that women don't encourage and accept the men who would make perfect lovers. On the whole, I've a notion that is the solution. Women, as a rule, are attracted by the animal, masterful, bumptious, aggressive man and this kind is not so well fitted to be a poetical lover as he is to be a champion heavy-weight. If they will go on confusing the desirable qualities for a husband with those of a prize-fighter they will always, I'm afraid, have to supply the poetry and bloom for their betrothal days. However that may be, it is certain most married women have very little to set life aglow. It is hard, as Miss Bell says, to "keep thinking that he looked at you last night as if he thought you were pretty, when he did not say so. It is—

"It is hard to receive a telegram, when you are looking for a letter, saying, 'Have not had time to write. Shall be home Sunday. Will bring you something nice.' It is harder still to get a letter telling about the weather and how busy he is, when the same amount of space, saying that he got to thinking about you yesterday when he saw a girl on the street who looked like you, only she did not carry herself so well as you do, and that he was a lucky man to have got you when so many other men wanted you, and he loved you, good-bye—would have fairly made your heart turn over with joy and made you kiss the hurried lines and thrust the letter in your belt, where you could crackle it now and then just to make sure it was there."

On the whole, Miss Bell considered the supreme test of lovers, and indeed every one else, to be the apology. After jeering at the people who never apologize and are pitiful enough to be proud of it, she concludes with a very pretty little eulogy of, "Dear, forgive me."

"Men will go to any trouble, any expense, any personal inconvenience, to heal it without the simple use of those simple words. A man thinks if a woman begins to smile at him again after a hurt, for which he has not yet apologized, has commenced to grow dull, that the worst is over, and that, if he keeps away from the dangerous subject, he has done his duty. Besides, hasn't he given her a piano to pay for it? But that same man would call another man a brute who insisted upon healing up a finger with the splinter still in it, so that an accidental pressure would always cause pain.

"If you do not believe this, what do you suppose the result would be if you should apologize to your wife for something you said last year. If you think she has forgotten, because she never speaks of it, just try it once.

"I honestly believe that the simple phrase, 'I am sorry, dear; forgive me,' has done more to hold brothers in the home, to endear sisters to each other, to comfort mothers and fathers, to tie friends together, to placate lovers; that more marriages have taken place because of them, and more have held together on account of them; that more love of all kinds has been engendered by them than by any other words in the English language."

It is safe to wager that every girl in town knows several men who could browse over "From a Girl's Point of View" to great advantage, both to themselves and the women who see most of them. There's the "too accurate" man, "the dyspeptic," and, first of all, "the untrained man under thirty-five." They are all of them as amusing in the book as they are deadly in life, that is, except the too accurate man, who cannot be painted so black as he is. Nevertheless the outlook Miss Bell gives must be rather depressing to—well, say the girl under twenty-five. Listen to this cheerful little bit about the man under thirty-five:

"You can do little to help him, if you are the first girl to take a hand at him. You can but prepare him to be a little more amenable to the next girl. His mind is not on you. It is centered on himself. You are only an entity to him, not an individual. He cares nothing for your likes and dislikes, your cares or hopes or fears. He only wishes you to be pretty and well dressed. Have a mind if you will. He will not know it. Have a heart and a soul. They do not concern him, because he cannot see them. He likes to have you tailor-made. You are a Girl to him. That's all.

"The eyes of the untrained man under thirty-five are never taken off himself. They are always turned in. He is studying himself first and foremost, and the world at large is interesting to him only inasmuch as it bears relation to himself as the pivotal point. He fully indorses Pope's line, 'The proper study of mankind is man,' and he is that man. Join in his pursuit if you will; show the wildest enthusiasm in his golf record or how many lumps of sugar he takes in his coffee, and he will evince neither surprise nor gratitude for your interest. You are only showing your good taste."

Really, this is alarming, particularly when one remembers how very seldom men over thirty-five propose.

CHEIRO AT HOME

Together With an Househunting Expedition and Some Adventures.

London is positively reeking with rain just at present. One lives, moves and has one's being to the constant accompaniment of "the heavens are telling." No waterproof, be it ever so well advertised, is impervious to a London shower, and the degree of courage necessary to house-hunting under such conditions may be well imagined. We had become ennuied of hotel life in London and thought we should like to rent a real English mansion. Feeling very much like Howells' people in "A Hazard of New Fortunes," we started forth on a journey that, to us, was ripe with adventure. When you want to accomplish aught in London, from the simple purchase of a handkerchief to the weightiest speculation in stocks, the first move is to secure a a ransom. We then visited the various agents and received lists of houses and prices and accounts of the occupants. The first was a rather imposing looking mansion, and in response to our ring a neat maid in the regulation black frock, white cap, collar and cuffs opened the door. She speedily conducted us to her mistress, a well preserved Irish woman about forty with a tendency to verbosity, who informed us that some of her guests had but just departed, so their rooms were not arranged. She added that another guest, Lord Dombrey, was in the smoking-room, but would not object to our looking through.

We went into the dining-room, a spacious apartment, the walls hung with family pictures in the costumes of bygone times. Back of it was the smoking-room, a cosy little place full of inviting armchairs. Lord D. was there reading the "Morning Post," the paper par excellence of the English aristocracy.

"These ladies wish to see the house," remarked our cicerone. "Ah, indeed," said his lordship, removing his cigarette and slowly inspecting us, "I can recommend this as a smoking-room." Recognizing the intended brilliancy of the remark, we smiled. I then inquired was there a bathroom, and his lordship assented, remarking that he could recommend the tub also.

Thence we went to a superb house in which there were eighteen bedrooms, nine reception-rooms, all furnished in the most luxurious fashions. The walls were hung with a veritable profusion of really elegant ancestors. These old-time dames and cavaliers were gowned in antique brocades and hung against a background of red curtains. The men seemed all to suffer from a plentitude of neckwear, and must frequently look with envious eyes at the soft shirts and low collars of their posterity. In this house were sixteen servants, who rather awed us. Then we went to several less pretentious but horribly stuffy little places, none of which boasted a single bathroom. One belonged to a colonel's family who had spent many years in India and had collected all sorts of cheap prints, which were draped over mantels, chairs and tables with a disregard of all idea of congruity or harmony. Then, to a charming looking house belonging to a Mrs. Blakemont (whose husband owns one of the great china manufactories).

This was no regulation English house. The door was opened by Mrs. Blakemont in a costume of deep black heavily trimmed in crape; on her hands were tan suede gloves. She had dismissed her servants that morning. The first sight that greeted us was an immense china hat-stand, on which ran the inscription, "Out of debt, out of danger." Then, to a cool-looking breakfast-room, oval-shaped with moss-green carpets and hangings and a mantel bearing the words, "Economy is the household mint." Next we found ourselves in an immense dining-room, with a glorious old mahogany table, crested leather chairs and sideboard thirty feet in length. At either end were large placques. One bore the words "The healthiest feast costs the least." On the other was, "For the light of the day you have nothing to pay." This completed the lower story. We ascended a cerise-covered staircase to a white and gold drawing-room paneled in brocaded satin, with inscriptions in gold thread. One ran, "If you are in debt, some one owns part of you." Another, "Strive to be honest, even if you remain poor." Then through charming bedrooms, and at length we arrived at a black door—Mrs. Blakemont's own room. Carpets, hangings, draperies, bedspread and pillow slips were in black; mantel ornaments, and even the monogram on the towels, were in sage wisdom's hue. We knew she had lost none of her kith and kin, and asked for an explanation. She told us that her pet spaniel had shuffled off this mortal coil last November and "life had no joy for her since." In a corner in this mortuary room was a sort of ebony altar, and under a black canopy, with candles burning in front and quantities of fresh flowers in vases, was the stuffed body of the departed canine. His picture, by Sargent, was the only spot of color in this ghastly apartment. On our commenting on this fine canvas, and remarking that we did not know Sargent ever painted animals, Mrs. Blakemont said, "Mine was no ordinary beast; it had a soul." The picture cost Mr. Blakemont seven thousand pounds.

This was too much for even us, so we decided to consult Chiero, the famous palmist before hazarding further ventures. Accordingly we repaired to his apartment and were ushered into a large room furnished in Turkish fashion with rugs and lamps. The secretary gave us a book of autographs to look over, and we saw the names of all sorts of notabilities—actors, authors and painters; even George Meredith had consulted the sorcerer. In a few moments the door opened and I walked into the inner sanctuary. Chiero rose as I entered. He is a thickly-built, rather handsome man, about five feet ten in height, and wore a Prince Albert coat, light trousers and patent leather shoes. He facetiously remarked, "I fancy we shall have more rain," in a soft, slow, rather Irish voice. I smiled at him and said, "The deluge occurred over nineteen hundred years ago." "You are not English," he said. "That is for you to find out," I replied. Then he laughed and remarked, "Why did you not come to me before? We should have had a nice talk, but now I have to rush." He took my hand and said, "Poor circulation and a weak heart." "Do you tell that from palmistry?" I enquired. "No; from the little I know about medicine. By the rules of palmistry you are a very practical young lady and have lived in America. You are one person who does not stand under a type." He then went on to tell me my life at length. With marvelous accuracy he described my earliest years, my environment and so on. He gave me a glorious future, and finally asked me what I really was. He was much interested in the fact that I lived in California. Strange to say, he had never met a daughter of the Golden West before. His father was Irish, his mother half Grecian and half Italian. He was clever, so studied palmistry, and has made a fortune in it. He has a charming place outside Athens, and showed me several pictures of it. He is just off to America, so may visit California. He goes to all the Bohemian houses, and is what might be termed a charming fellow. He also told my friends remarkable facts about their lives, and so we decided to finish our house-hunting another day.

P. H.

Bank Stock pads and tablets are made from pure stock, and are of high value from an oculistic standpoint. The Mysell-Rollins Co., 22 Clay street.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

For the most complete line of summer shirtings and hose, J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st.

On Many Seas

The Life and Exploits of a Yankee Sailor.

By FREDERICK BENTON WILLIAMS

(HERBERT HAMBLEN),

And Edited by his friend, WILLIAM S. BOOTH.

Cloth, 12mo., $1.50

The New York Tribune says:

"It is even more remarkable than "Two Years Before the Mast." It paints life in the forecastle — not as something experienced for a comparatively brief period — by a man of gentle birth and assured position at home, but as the very bread and butter of one born to its hardships, and developed from start to finish under its iron discipline. This narrative is unmistakably genuine. . . . Every line of this hits the mark, and to any one who knows the forecastle and its types, the picture appeals with the urgency of old familiar things. All through his four hundred and more pages Mr. Hamblen is equally unaffected and forcible, equally picturesque."

Unmistakably Genuine.

On Many Seas

The book was enthusiastically received, went into a number of editions unusual for any book but a popular novel, and has now been brought out in an English edition. One journal in a seaport town printed an enthusiastic notice, calling it "a picture of the sailor's life as it never has been drawn before." Such phrases as "wonderfully interesting," "realistic, pathetic, dramatic and interesting," "there is not a dull page in it," "the author is a born story-teller," appear in nearly every review.

The San Francisco Chronicle describes it as:

"One of the most readable books of adventure that has been written in years . . . depicted in a way that no romance writer has ever equalled. He gives all the technical details which any sailor wants, but at the same time these particulars are never tiresome. The story is told with great spirit, and the tragedy is always relieved by amusing incidents. Any one who takes up the book will be sure to read it through to the end, and from no other book will he get so perfect a picture of the typical sailor."

Immensely Attractive.

PUBLISHED BY

The Macmillan Company

66 Fifth Avenue, New York

In press by the same author:

The General Manager's Story

Old-Time Reminiscences of Railroading in the United States.

By HERBERT E. HAMBLEN.

Cloth, Crown 8vo. Nearly ready.

The Prince of Wales

Grows the Barley from which

JOHN DEWAR & SONS

Make the Malt To Distill Their

OLD HIGHLAND WHISKEY

AWARDED FIFTY MEDALS FOR SUPERIORITY

PACIFIC COAST AGENTS

Sherwood & Sherwood

SAN FRANCISCO
PORTLAND LOS ANGELES

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA ELECTRICAL WORKS

409 MARKET STREET

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

Ask Your Druggist and Take No Substitute

In 10c., 25c., 50c. and $1 bottles

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS ELECTRICAL CO

523 Mission St., San Francisco

DR. WARD'S MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin. Price, One Dollar.

Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package
Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored
E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, book binders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.

TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST

BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F
Telephone 305

MULLER'S MEMORIES

The Oxford Professor Divulges Reminiscences of Royalties.

"Only cads, liars and sycophants write amusing reminiscences, gentlemen never," an explosive old friend of mine used to say, and, in truth, it seems so to one reading "Royalties," published in "Cosmopolis." That a man before whose eyes have passed five reigns, those from Frederick William III to Wilhelm II, should be driven, in the space of two magazine articles, to renearse with much flatness and seriousness how he won sixpence from the Prince of Wales, is, to say the least, surprising and not to be accounted for except as testimony to Professor Muller's kindliness and loyalty. "Through all my life," he says, "I have tried to follow the rule that Ruskin lays down for himself, 'In every person who comes near you look for what is good and strong, honor that; rejoice in it and, as you can try, to imitate it.'" Throughout, one feels the simplicity and directness of the scientific mind, a simplicity which I find hard to reconcile with the exceedingly shrewd and somewhat worldly, though fine, face, which passes here for Max Muller's. Neither can I quite understand, in so great a man, his reverence for everything royal. Perhaps it may be best accounted for by the fact that, as he says, he "imbibed it with my mother's milk for my own Duke and my own Duchess of Anhalt-Dessau." Dessau—his father's birthplace and his own and the home of his grandfather.

Perhaps the most interesting part of the articles is where he speaks of this little German principality. He comments on how little is said of these small principalities and states that "without them German history would often be quite unintelligible and Germany would never have had so intense a vitality, would never have become what it is now." It was in Dessau that he had his first acquaintance with royalty, and it was there his admiration for "royal personages" first took root. "They have," he says, "the great advantage that they are to their business born. They have not become, they were born royal. I was much struck by the extraordinary power of observation of a French friend of mine, who, when in 1855 the Queen and the Empress Eugenie entered the Grand Opera at Paris together and were received with immense applause, turned to his neighbor, an Englishman, and said, 'Look at the difference between your Queen and our Empress.' They had both bowed most graciously and then sat down. 'Did you not observe,' he continued, 'how the Empress looked around to see if there was a chair for her before she sat down? But your Queen, a born Queen, sat down without looking. She knew a chair must be there, as surely as she is Queen of England.'"

Royalist as he is, Professor Muller fancies but little the people who have "become" something: Most of them, he says, are quite unaware that "even in becoming something there ought always to be or to remain something that becomes or has become." He admits, however, a little further on, that he has known "Bishops and Archbishops, too, who to their friends always remained Hinlwalls or Thompsons and in the second place only Bishops of St. Davids or Archbishops of York. My friend, Arthur Stanley, never became a Dean. He was always Stanley. Dean of Westminster, if necessary. If he had been what he ought to have been, Archbishop of Canterbury, he never would have ceased to be A. P. Stanley; his chuckle would always have been just the same, and if his admirers had presented him with a mitre and crosier he would probably have put the mitre on sideways and have said 'Thank you, my friends, but a new hat and an alpaca umbrella would have been more useful.'"

Still Muller reserves most of his admiration for Princes and Kings, nearly all of those with whom he was brought in contact were, as he says, "eminent among their peers, and were I to say what I think of them I should at once be called courtier, flatterer, etc." Frederick William IV was "a man of exceptional talent, nay, even a man of genius." He tried to help Muller in publishing his edition of the "Rig Veda" in Germany and furthermore, had the good taste to ask the Professor to dinner, but says the latter, "a curious intermezzo happened. While quietly sitting in his room a young lieutenant of the police entered and began to ask Muller a number of 'extremely silly questions' and finally requested him to leave Berlin in twenty-four hours. Muller produced his passport, and explained his reasons for wishing to remain, all to no purpose. Finally he said very gently, "Please tell the police authorities that I shall, of course, obey orders and leave Berlin at once, but that I request them to inform His Majesty the King that I shall not be able to dine with him tonight at Potsdam." Muller continues: "The poor young man thought I was laughing at him, but when he saw I was in earnest he looked thunderstruck, bowed and went away."

The dinner enjoyment was not again interrupted, but Muller was not permitted to add much to the King's knowledge, inasmuch as the monarch elected to do all the talking himself.

At the dinner table of King Frederic William of Prussia, Muller met Alexander von Humboldt, who was then in his eightieth year. The veteran sustained the fatigues of the evening cheerfully and Muller remarked on his great vitality. Humboldt replied sorrowfully that he could no longer work as hard as in former years. "As I get old," he said, "I want more sleep, four hours at least. When I was young, two hours were quite enough." To this Muller apologetically expressed his doubts. "It is quite a mistake," the old man continued, "though it is very widely spread, that we want seven or eight hours of sleep. When I was a young man I simply laid down on the sofa, turned down the lamp and after two hours' sleep was as fresh as ever."

One of the most amusing reminiscences in the article is apropos of the suspicion of Prince Albert—Queen Victoria's consort—generally entertained in England. "It seems now," says Muller, "a most extraordinary hallucination to imagine that he who was the consort of the Queen should exercise no influence with his wife. Human nature is, after all, superior even to the English constitution. One can imagine a political philosopher indulging in so Utopian a theory as a marriage without influence, but that English statesmen should have imagined that a wife, because she was a Queen, would never be influenced by her husband will hardly sound credible to future historians. I remember only one analogous case. When Lord John Russell was proposed as a Secretary for Foreign Affairs several members of the Cabinet objected, fearing Lady Russell's influence and pointing out the danger of Cabinet secrets oozing out through her indiscretions. Lord Palmerston listened for a long time, and then turned to his colleagues and said: 'Well, I see one remedy only—one of us must always sleep with them.' When he saw blank consternation in the faces of his colleagues, 'Well, well,' he said, 'we shall take it by turns.'"

While the Crown Prince Frederic of Prussia was at Oxford he carefully kept to his incognito, although it was rather difficult to restrain his attendants from the customary salaaming. All went well till the day of the departure, when one of the Prince's A. D. C.'s, forgetting himself, made a low bow before the door of the hotel and stood bareheaded. The host immediately recognized his royal patron and his bill at once assumed regal proportions. The Prince took much pleasure in his stay at Oxford—what struck him most being the historical continuity of the University. This point he frequently discussed with Herr Muller. In intercourse with his friends the Crown Prince liked to forget his royal rank. He spoke freely and unguardedly and was as ready as another to laugh at a good joke. He allowed his associates to do the same, but if one of them said anything that displeased him he immediately drew back, and it took him some time to recover himself.

Herr Muller has much to tell in favor of the late Duke of Albany. On one occasion he was to dine at Windsor, but on arriving at the castle found his portmanteaus missing. After much telegraphing and trouble it was located at a way station and could not be got to Windsor before dinner. The professor was in despair, but the Duke, to whom the trouble had been confided, insisted on him appearing at table. "If the Queen asks you to dinner," he said, "you must dine." He then made a grand collection of clothing, and when fitted out Muller looked, in his own words, "a perfect guy." Feeling his appearance unfitted for the royal presence, he was about to pen an apology when his luggage fortunately arrived, and, getting into it in a very short time, appeared at dinner as if nothing had happened. Whether or not Victoria heard of his dilemma Muller never knew, but what impressed him even more than his threatened misfortune was the attitude of the young Duke to his mother. In spite of all his devotion, he had evidently for her a feeling of awe.

The late Emperor of Brazil took a great interest in the "Rig Veda," and in discussing it with Muller the talk in some manner drifted from the metal values in ancient Greece and Egypt into financial questions. Here Herr Muller made some remark savoring rather of bimetallism. Immediately the Emperor became rather angry. "I know all about that," he said, "and have studied the question for many years. Let us return to the Veda."

The late Queen of Holland was a most charming woman and extremely popular in society. She once lunched with Dean Stanley at the deanery and had asked him to invite a number of literary men—among them Tennyson, Monckton Milnes (Lord Houghton) and Huxley. The dinner hour arrived, but not Tennyson. At last Stanley suggested to proceed without him, but the Queen refused. Finally he came and was placed next to Her Majesty. She was particularly gracious, but could get nothing out of the poet more than "Yes, ma'am," "No, ma'am," and finally, with a great effort, "Ma'am, there is a good deal to be said on both sides of the question." At last he turned to Muller, who was sitting next to him, and said in a rather loud whisper, "I wish they had put some of you talking fellows next to Regina."

On the whole, Miss Bell considers the suare readable, they will add nothing to Muller's towering reputation. They make one begin to calculate his age and say, "74 or 75—um—I thought so," and quietly the old proverb, "let the cobbler stick to his last," raises up its head.

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from ten drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address:

F. J. CHENEY & Co., Toledo, O.

☞Sold by druggists, 75c.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms, banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

"GOLD SEAL"
"BADGER"
"PIONEER"

Rubber Goods

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.

MANUFACTURER OF

OIL CLOTHING

R. H. PEASE
Vice-President and Manager

573-575-577-579 Market Street
SAN FRANCISCO

73-75 First Street, Portland, Or.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

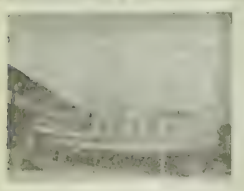
Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

Trinity School, Accredited

3300 Washington street, S. F. Christmas term August 2, 1897. Prepares for College, University, and Business. Rev. Dr. E. B. Spaulding, Rector.

24 Montgomery Street
SAN FRANCISCO

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS



Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

BALDWIN THEATRE (AL HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS)

Next Monday, Third and Last Week

WM. H. CRANE

AND HIS ADMIRABLE COMPANY

And the last nights of the Charming Comedy Success

"A Virginia Courtship"

By Eugene W. Presbrey

Monday, October 4th, MY FRIEND FROM INDIA

Columbia Theatre.

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & Co. LESSEES AND MANAGERS

An Extraordinary Event!

Commencing Monday, September 27th, One Week Only
First production on any stage of Augustus Thomas' New Comedy

Don't Tell Her Husband

Interpreted by the ever-popular FRAWLEY CO.

October 4th, The Frawleys' Farewell, in a repertoire of their Popular Successes!

Orpheum

O'FARRELL STREET, BETWEEN STOCKTON AND POWELL

Week beginning September 27th

Direct from Australia, the Celebrated Smith Family
Bicycle Experts
Clayton, Jenkins & Jasper, introducing their Great Performing Mule
Nichols Sisters, Burnt Cork Impersonators; Irene Franklin, Precocious Character Artiste; Pitrot, the Mimic; the Original Girards; El Zobedie; Adrienne Ancion; and the Knaben-Kapelle; positively last week of George Evans, the Honey Boy.

Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House

MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager

Commencing Monday, Sept. 20th
Eighth week of the Grand Opera Season under direction of Mr. Gustav Hinrichs

Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday Evenings, Meyerbeer's Tragic Opera, The Huguenots
Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday Evenings, Wagner's Romantic Opera, The Flying Dutchman
Great Casts! Enlarged Chorus! Augmented Orchestra!
Next, Rigoletto

Look out for the opening Comic Opera Season

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : : : : : Manager

Prices, including Reserved Seat, 50, 35, 25 or 15c
Week beginning Monday, Sept. 27. Matinee Saturday
The classic of the drama—the play that has been a standard of all that is powerful and magnetic for fifteen years

Hazel Kirke

Special Scenery! Appropriate Accessories! Select Cast!

Have your seats reserved by Telephoning Black 1106

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last performances of the Great Melodrama
SLAVES OF GOLD

Commencing Monday, September 27th, Grand Production of Charles Gayler's Grand Scenic Melodrama

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS

Great Battle for Life in the Flooded Underground Den!
Great Steel Room Scene!
Romance! Pathos! Tragedy!
Beautiful Scenic and Mechanical Effects!

Evg. Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

WEDDING INVITATIONS

New Style Visiting Cards

HARTWELL, MITCHELL & WILLIS

Successors to Dodge Bros.

STATIONERS, ENGRAVERS AND BOOKSELLERS

107 Montgomery and 225 Post Street

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. Pacific Coast Sole Agents

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.

UNDERTAKERS

641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb

Telephone Main 43

TURF TOPICS

Close of the State Fair—Future Plans for Local Sport.

The State Fair was brought to a close at Sacramento last Saturday, the last afternoon's racing affording visitors much enjoyment. In the Favorite Stakes, 1¼ miles, there was a grand tussle between Grady, 4 yrs., 105 lbs. (Cole) and Installator, 5 yrs., 120 lbs. (Freeman) in the run home, the former downing the Boots' horse by a short head in the good time of 2:07½. The two-year-old Los Prietos, by imp. Clieveden, carrying 107 lbs., and Padre Jose, the full brother to Scarborough, winner of the first California Derby, carrying 105 lbs., had a tremendous race in the Autumn handicap, one mile, which was landed with a few inches to spare by the former in 1:42. On the whole the racing was good and the management satisfactory.

The circuit has removed to Stockton this week, and next week the Pacific Coast Trotting Horse Breeders' Association will hold their autumn meeting for harness horses only at the Oakland track.

---

The decision of the Trotting Horse Breeders' Association not to include any running events in their programme is well taken for more reasons than one. In the first place, they have the privilege of using a track that belongs to the California Jockey Club, which holds its own meetings for running horses and does not wish to have any running races in this immediate locality except during what has come to be regarded as the legitimate season, namely, from November 1st to May 15th. In the second place, the Trotting Horse Breeders' Association is a society for dealing with trotting concerns, and does not possess the necessary machinery for the proper handling of running races. Over and above all this it is never quite satisfactory to use a track for running and trotting at the same meeting.

---

The California Jockey Club have made arrangements for holding meetings at Sacramento in the spring and fall of next year, and have also secured the Woodland track with the object of holding a meeting there next summer. The idea is to have a series of country meetings under their management at places where there are track facilities, and probably other race-courses will be secured shortly. This is a new departure of course in connection with running races, and, if properly directed, it should be productive of developments beneficial to the racing and breeding interests of the State. Small owners in the country districts will increase in numbers and the taste for sport may be cultivated apart from gambling. If the latter element is allowed too much latitude, however, the result will be disappointing from the genuine turfman's point of view.

---

The report that Mr. J. E. Madden had retired Hamburg for the season has proved incorrect, and there is no likelihood either of that gentleman's stable coming to California this winter. That Hamburg is an exceptionally good colt is beyond question, and it is to be hoped he will have care and develop into a good three-year-old. Really first-class horses seem to be getting fewer and fewer as time goes on, possibly owing to excessive two-year-old racing.

---

At the Doncaster sales in England this month Messrs. Tattersalls disposed of fourteen yearlings belonging to Sir Tatton Sykes for a total of 13,710 guineas, equivalent to an average of $5,141 per head. Two colts by St. Simon made 3,400 and 2,200 guineas respectively, and a filly by Bend Or 1,650 guineas.

---

The Dublin Horse Show this year is said to have surpassed all previous ones in every respect. From first to last it was a brilliant success, added eclat being given to the event by the visit of the Duke and Duchess of York. The Royal Dublin Society, under whose auspices the show is held, have greatly improved the grounds and buildings since last year, and they were rewarded by the largest attendance ever seen at Ball's Bridge. During the four days of the show 66,167 people passed the gate, as against 58,728 the previous year. There were 1,434 horses entered, the most important section, as usual, being the hunters, which are classified according to their weight-carrying powers. Before the show closed a large number of the animals changed hands, and the standard throughout was considered above that of former displays. The largest classes in the show were hunters up to 196 lbs. with 241 entries, and up to 182 lbs. with 228 entries.

The horse-breeders of California have yet to realize the necessity of having at regular intervals well-conducted, up-to-date horse shows. With the breeders must rest the reproach for the failure to repeat the annual San Francisco show this year. The Horse Show Association was able and willing to proceed with the preliminary work, but the breeders in general failed to show any interest in having an exhibition. The question of having another show has therefore gone over for this year.

BENEDICT.

Maillard's Chocolates, half and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

THE TALE AND THE TRUTH

No Romance in the Life of the Variety Star.

But she never is at home, this poor variety actress, though it is the cherished end of all her labors, and shows at the end of every vista of ambition like the picture of the Capitol building on a cigar advertisement. You remember the outcast in the dear old melodramas when the solicitous leading heavy asks her where is her home. "Home," says she, with a throat quaver, "I have no home." Thus the variety actress. She has no home, but she looks forward to the time when she will have. It is the goal towards which she "sings and dances, or "high wires," or "lofty tumbles," or "serio-comiques," or "Swiss bell rings," and the like.

One likes to think that after her turn is over the songster and dancer dashes off her garden hat and black stockings, or sombrero and red stockings, and meets an effete youth or two of the "gilded" variety and goes away with him and knocks off some of his gilding and drinks champagne and smokes cigarettes at his expense. You like to think that the strong woman is attacked on her way home from the theater and gets a half-Nelson upon an adversary and very nearly breaks him in two. And you demand it as a right that the serio-comic sings at a man's club, and gets on the table, and drinks strange drinks out of her slipper. This would all be very fine if it were only true. But it is not true; it is hideously, lamentably untrue. Why, these variety actresses are not even bad. This may be the fault of their education, or maybe it's only a matter of intelligence; but some way or another they are not even bad, and off the stage they are uncouthly unpicturesque. Do you know what they first think of when they first arrive? Not where are the best restaurants, but where are the cheapest lodging-houses. Fancy, they don't even live in hotels. They live in lodging-houses; worse than that, they "stop with friends on Ellis or O'Farrell streets," and the house invariably—I say invariably—reeks with the smell of cooking, onions, stale upholstery and bad tobacco smoke. There is no more romance in them than in a carrot, no more gaiety than in an undertaker's assistant, while forever in the background lurks the invidious husband, or the more invidious brother, or the cousin most invidious of any. You will always find him to be a pale, preoccupied man, who puts his head in at the door at intervals and interrupts your interview on the pleasures of life behind the scenes with questions as to "low Irish wigs" or "toreador make-ups," or "symmetries"—whatever dreadful things these may be.

Who was the man, I wonder, who first started that pleasant little fiction about "chappies in evening dress loitering about back of the scenes in earnest conversation with chorus girls or "leading boys?" I've been behind myself often enough, and I have diligently looked for the chappie, but never have I seen so much as the shine of his silk hat. What theater does Mr. Archie Gunn go to for the pictures that he paints so well in "Truth"—always with a gas jet burning in a bird cage in the background and a ballet girl sitting in a white froth of tulle in the foreground.

They are not bad, these poor variety actresses, not dissipated, only hopelessly sordid and overworked and matter of fact. A glass of beer and a cheese sandwich after their turn is done is for them a champagne banquet, while a cable car ride stolen in the intervals of darning the invidious cousin's socks or mending their own "toreador make-up" must take the place of the bacchi revels with which the colored weeklies have made us so familiar.

Its amusing to interview these variety people, and to watch them strenuously putting their best foot forward and airing all their pretty little professional graces. They are really acting then, acting more cleverly, or at least with more of an effort, than when doing "their turn." Some of them have been interviewed so much that they know, or suppose they know, in advance just what questions are to be put to them, and so talk in that vein. As for instance, Papinta. She at once began to declaim upon the originality of her dance as opposed to Fuller's. Then she started off—always without a word from the interviewer—upon her fads. Wheeling, it seemed, was one of them, and she wheeled for nearly ten minutes consecutively until I punctured her tire and she began over again upon her pets. When they had all been killed off from the Scotch collie to the Angora cat, she actually sat up and told me that Shakespeare was her favorite poem, and that she always travelled with a volume of the sonnets. They all have a shy at the Bard of Avon. Josephine Sabel reads "Romeo and Juliet" three times every month, and Alcide Capitaine, the strongest woman in the world, can recite passages from "Hamlet" with one hand tied behind her. And invariably, invariably and invariably do they assure you, or at the very least lead you to infer that they come from an aristocratic family. Adgie, for instance, the lion handler; why, she did not dare to mention her real name! Why, it involved one of the greatest Spanish families known to the college of heralds! Why, she was almost a Countess, was this debonaire handler of lions, a Countess who mended property skirts and basted spangles.

And so it goes. Poor, pretentious, sordid women, verging on forty, doing "turns" and specialties in the costume of sixteen-year-old girls, their faces hardened with much rouging, their eyes tired and glazed with facing the footlights, their hands calloused and their voices jaded, faded and cracked with shouting songs to drown an overture. Variety actress! Chee? Say, rather, old, broken-down women, not fascinating in their weaknesses, not gay in their vices, and as often as not too irretrievably stupid to have either weakness or vice. Commonplace is the word best applicable. Hopelessly, hopelessly commonplace.

FRANK NORRIS.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, S. E. corner Grant Avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Tel. 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

The Redwood Tree.

See where it stands in undiminished splendor,
The giant sentinel of Pan's retreat;
Man's genius doffs before it, fain to render Homage, and lay due reverence at its feet.
No airy spire, no soaring dome tremendous,
Declares God's glory like this tree stupendous.

Man's labors vanish; temple, palace, tumble;
And bronze, and marble, tarnish and decay;
The greatest monument e'er reared shall crumble
Ere this proud tree shall bend before Time's sway.
The rosy morn its royal crest can greet,
While darkness spreads her couch about its feet.

The fairy myths of Greece that figured Naiad,
Housed airy Echo, gave the stars a name,
Apportioned to each Oak its proper Dryad,
Could find for this no genius of like fame;
God's angels, Gabriel, Abdiel, and their kin,
Alone might dwell such noble fanes within.

—C. W. Doyle, in "Land of Sunshine."

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

After a night with the boys—Bromo Kola.

DR. H. G. YOUNG—Bridges and teeth without plates a specialty. 1841 Polk street.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS

NOTICE SAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND ON THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.

Telephone Main 5697.

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets

Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE LATEST STYLES IN

CHOICE WOOLENS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel

Bicycle and Golf Suits

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD LANE

LANE & LANE

Attorneys and Counselors

Room 202

Crocker Building, San Francisco

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY
SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas..... | 4 00 am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City ..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Stmr. Pomona, 2 p.m. October 1, 5, 9, 13, 18, 22, 26, 30; November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28.

For Newport, Los Angeles and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Oct. 1, 5, 9, 13, 17, 21, 25, 29 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, Redondo--Los Angeles--and Newport, at 11 a.m. Oct. 3, 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27, 31 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, Stmr. Orizaba, 10 a.m. the 2d each month.

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Sept. 7, 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.
S. S. "Moana," for Australia, Thursday, October 14, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO., General Agents

POTOSI MINING COMPANY—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Storey County, Nev.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 8th day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 48) of Twenty-five Cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 13th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 4th day of November, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the cost of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. CHAS. E. ELLIOTT, Secretary.

Office, room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

---

ANDES SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 1st day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 44) of Ten Cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the offices of the company, rooms 20-22 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 4th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 25th day of October, 1897, at 1 o'clock p.m., to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOHN W. TWIGGS, Secretary.
Office, rooms 20-22, Nevada Block, 509 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

---

SIERRA NEVADA SILVER MINING COMPANY—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey Co., Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 18th day of August, 1897, an assessment (No. 113) of twenty cents (20c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 14, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 22d day of September, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Tuesday the 12th day of October, 1897, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

E. L. PARKER, Secretary.
Office, room 14, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

Bids for Concessions and Privileges in Yosemite Valley.

OFFICE OF THE YOSEMITE COMMISSIONERS,
San Francisco, August 10, 1897.

In accordance with Rule XXXIV of the Rules and Regulations governing Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove, adopted July 13, 1896, sealed bids are hereby invited for the following concessions and privileges in the Yosemite grant, for the year beginning November 1, 1897, and ending October 31, 1898, viz.:

First—For keeping a livery stable and conducting a general livery business in the Valley, and also for the rental of the Royal Arch Farm and Stables.

Second—For rental of stable and coachhouse on Georgia Avenue (stage headquarters).

Third—For rental of hotel, out-buildings and grounds at Glacier Point, and privilege of conducting a hotel business at that point.

Fourth—For rental of store building and privilege of conducting a general merchandise business in the Valley.

Bids must be presented to the Secretary on or before Monday, October 12, 1897, at 12 o'clock m., at the office of the Commissioners, San Francisco.

Bids must be accompanied by sufficient guarantee that contract shall be carried out by bidders to the satisfaction of the Commissioners. The Commissioners reserve the right to reject any and all bids.

JOHN F. SHEEHAN,
Secretary and Treasurer.
Room 25, Tenth Floor, Mills Building, San Francisco.

---

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—In the matter of the application of the SITES SANDSTONE COMPANY (a corporation) to dissolve: Notice is hereby given that the Sites Sandstone Company, a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, has presented to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco an application praying to be allowed to disincorporate and dissolve, and that Monday the 11th day of October, A. D. 1897, at 10 o'clock a.m. of said day, has been appointed as the time, and the Courtroom of Department No. 7 of said Superior Court, New City Hall, San Francisco, California, as the place, at which said application is to be heard.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said Superior Court this 8th day of September, A. D. 1897.

C. F. CURRY, Clerk.
By Joseph Riordan, Deputy Clerk.
VAN NESS & REDMAN, Att'ys for Petitioners.

---

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Alta Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 57
Amount per share, 10 cents
Levied Sept. 3, 1897
Delinquent in office Oct. 6, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Oct. 27, 1897

J. E. JACOBUS, Secretary.
Office, room 33, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of JOHANNES A. H. STOCKFLETH, deceased—Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, at room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. A. C. FREESE, Administrator of the Estate of Johannes A. H. Stockfleth, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, August 24, 1897.
J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

---

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Belcher Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 56
Amount per share, 20 cents
Levied September 18, 1897
Delinquent in office, October 21, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Nov. 11, 1897

C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.
Office, room 37, Mills Building, San Francisco

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

Guarantee Capital and Surplus - $2,040,201 66
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash - 1,000,000 00
Deposits December 31, 1896 - - 27,730,247 45

OFFICERS

President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN.
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS

B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

Deposits December 31, 1896 - $22,885,377
Paid Up Capital and Surplus - 1,594,503

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS

GEORGE W. BEAVER ROBERT WATT
THOMAS MAGEE GEO. C. BOARDMAN
W. C. B. DE FREMERY DANIEL E. MARTIN
ALBERT MILLER GEO. TASHEIRA
E. B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

Paid Up Capital . . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . . 25,000

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary.
A. J. CARMANY, Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.
We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,446,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
B. J. SMITH, Assistant Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
801 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFIEST, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

The Lion Fire Insurance Co. Limited of London. Total Cash Assets in United States, $885,797.09

The Imperial Insurance Co. Limited of London Established on Pacific Coast in 1852

WM. J. LANDERS, Resident Manager
PACIFIC COAST BRANCH
205-207 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Jefferson De Angelis, the actor, is given to practical joking. He was at Santa Cruz once and posed as a minister of the Gospel. An eminent citizen of the burg, noted for his penurious habits, met the supposed minister and invited him to dinner the following Sunday. When they were seated at the festive board the host said: "Times are mighty tight, parson, an' we ain't got nothing much to set before you, but such as it is you are welcome. Will you ask a blessing on what you see?" The supposed parson, observing the scant repast, lifted up his voice in the most solemn tones and said: "Lord, make us thankful for what we see and may we be able to find it when we reach for it. Let it not escape us nor prove a snare and delusion. Amen!"

When Virginia Earle, the well-known actress, was in Pueblo, some years ago, there was a feud on between the urban and the suburban residents. Having occasion to go to the mountains she tried to find a horse, and was offered a fine black mane belonging to the leader of the town faction. Gallantly his owner offered Miss Earle the use of his stud, but, much to his disappointment, she refused. "If I ride your horse, she's going to make me more or less dust, and when some of those fellows along the road see her and can't see me they'll take me for you and shoot me full of holes. That's why I don't take her." Indignation flashed all over the leader's face in an instant. "Don't let that worry you," he said, with the most intense earnestness. "You take her, and if any one of them kills you, I'll kill them!"

A certain drill sergeant, whose severity had made him unpopular with his troop, was putting a party of recruits through the funeral exercise. Opening the ranks so as to admit the passage of the supposed cortege between them, the instructor, by way of practical explanation, walked slowly down the lane formed by the two ranks, saying as he did so: "Now I'm the corpse, pay attention." Having reached the end of the party, he turned round, regarded them steadily with a scrutinizing eye for a moment or two, then remarked: "Your 'ands is right, and your 'eads is right, but you 'aven't got that look of regret you ought to 'ave."

An enthusiastic Stockton clergyman, in order to abate a tendency toward gossiping in his parish, preached a severe sermon on the eternal fate of the wicked, and afterward sought to "improve" the lesson by personal admonition. Meeting one day an old woman who was noted for her gossiping disposition, he said to her: "I hope my sermon has borne fruit in your mind. You heard what I said about that place where there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth?" "Well, as to that," answered the dame, "if I 'as anythink to say, it be this—let them gnash their teeth as 'as 'em—I ain't!"

A collier who devoted his leisure to pigeon fancying travelled to London with a carrier pigeon confined in a bag. He was about to toss the bird up in the air, opposite the Town Hall, when a policeman interfered and threatened to arrest him if he attempted to fly the pigeon there. The collier carefully took the pigeon out of the bag, set it on the ground, stroked its wings and said: "Aw corn'd toss thee up here, so thou mun walk whoam; dost yer? thou mun walk whoam." The bird, of course, rose in the air, leaving the policeman petrified with astonishment.

At a country cricket match in Lancashire a local farmer's boy was put in to keep score, the duties of the place having been carefully explained to him. When the last man on the side had been caught, the fielders darted in to see the score, and they found the book blank. That was the condition, too, of the "scorer's" face. "The truth is," he said, deliberately, "I was sae eenteristed in the wee sport that I quite forgot tae mak' the crosses. But it disna matter—that wee laddie wi' the red face is the smartest runner among ye!"

Two precious youths of the London swell world—sons of a well-known peer—went to a ball at a big hotel in Brighton. It was a terrible crush and corridors, staircase and dancing hall were black with people. The Hon. Henry succeeded in mounting the stairs, whence he could see into the ballroom and fixed the dancers with a discriminating eyeglass. "Anybody there?" drawled the Honorable George from down below. "Not a d—— soul!" replied his brother.

Beaconsfield, in his younger days, was noted for the sarcastic quality of his wit. He was extremely quick at characterizing his associates. Sir Charles Gavin Duffy asked him once if Lord M—— was not a stupid ass. "No, no," replied Disraeli; "not at all; he is a clever ass."

When Beau Brummell, harassed by Jewish usurers, made his celebrated midnight flitting to Boulogne, Lord Alvanley, a wit of the Regency, remarked, "Brummell has done quite right to be off. It was Solomon's judgment."

MATCHLESS IN EVERY FEATURE

THE CONSENSUS OF OPINION REGARDING

The Ladies' Grill-Room

. . OF . .

The Palace

Direct entrance from Market Street. Open until Midnight.

Hotel Rafael

SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Society Resort, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Climate Unexcelled!
Magnificent Scenery!
The Sanitarium of the Pacific Coast
Otis Elevators Electric Lights

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments

R. H. WARFIELD CO.
Proprietors

Hotel Bella Vista

1001 PINE STREET

Elegant Furnishings and Apartments
DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED

MRS. A. F. TRACY.

The best people from everywhere, bent on business or pleasure, when in New York, stop at

The St. Denis

The cuisine and comforts of the hotel have become so well known that its name is now a household word in thousands of homes in this country and Europe.

Central Location
Broadway and Eleventh Street
Opposite Grace Church
New York

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.

PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO

HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Money In Your Pocket

THE OLD FIVE-CENT PIECE

The price of

PIPER HEIDSIECK

PLUG TOBACCO

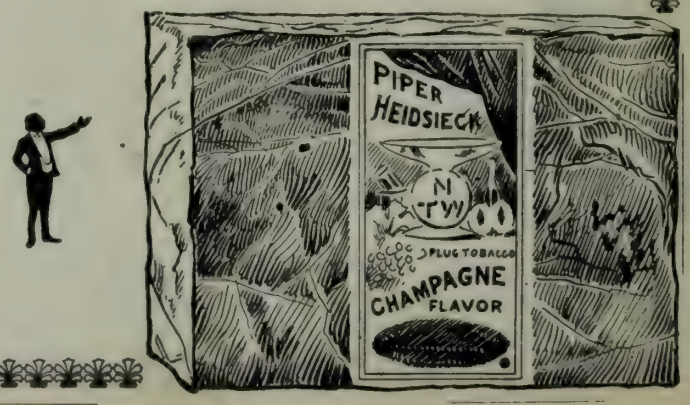
(CHAMPAGNE FLAVOR)

has been reduced forty per cent. These cuts show exact increase in size in the five-cent piece. Quality—always the best—unchanged. Ask for

THE NEW FIVE-CENT PIECE



CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

This Paper not to be taken from the Library.

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 40 SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 2, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

THE REBELLION IN GUATEMALA

SCENES IN THE CAPITAL OF DICTATOR REYNA BARRIOS

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 2, 1897

CONTENTS

Editorials ..... 2 3
Things and People: by Boswell Jr. ..... 3
A California Frog Ranch: by John Bonner ..... 4
"Execution Without Judgment": by Frank Norris ..... 5
In Case of War ..... 5
Militarism in Germany ..... 6
Interviewing Mdlle. de Merode ..... 7
An Afghan Hero ..... 7
By Wheel to San Rafael; photos by B. D. Bent ..... 8
Studies from Life Among San Francisco's Street Urchins ..... 9
A Debutante's Diary ..... 10
The Theatres ..... 11
Return of a Wanderer ..... 11
The Real Cowboy: a Review by H. B. ..... 12
Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter ..... 13
Turf Topics; by Benedict ..... 14
Financial Review ..... 14
A Triple Ballade by L. A. Robertson ..... 14
New Stories Re-Told ..... 16

THE LANDING OF ANARCHISTS.

The tardy, but none the less welcome, determination on the part of the United States Commissioner of Immigration to prevent the landing in America of known anarchists will not beget a murmur of disapproval outside of the dens of the depraved and the haunts of conspirators. Immigration Inspectors have been instructed to exercise diligence and special watchfulness that the European anarchist be not permitted to land in America. The prohibition runs now chiefly against two notorious mischief breeders who contemplate "lecturing" in America—Joseph Ventre and Louise Michel. That instructions to deputies will be made more comprehensive and eventually include within the prohibition all persons known to be anarchists, seems as necessary as it appears inevitable. Thinking men of America have wondered much that our laws were so lame and our officers so impotent as to permit, unchallenged, the landing of these common enemies to government. The self-satisfied country that opens wide its doors and with indifference permits these mischief-breeders to intermingle with its people and disseminate their disjointed and destructive doctrines, takes grave risks. They breed hatred, disquiet and lawlessness. Peace and contentment wither under the hot breath of anarchy, and the ignorant and unlettered are taught to regard as airy nothings the property and sacred rights that others more industrious have toiled to maintain and preserve.

America was set up as an asylum for the down-trodden and oppressed of other lands. The spirit of our institutions would not for a moment tolerate the idea that an unfortunate charged with political offending in another country should be denied entrance to a country the very conception and foundation of which was built upon dissatisfaction with the monarchies of Europe. But the asylum is crowded, and never was intended as an abiding place for those afflicted with a malignant, dangerous and contagious political disease. Heretofore, under a most kindly construction of our all too generous laws, the criminal anarchist departing under police surveillance from the country of his birth, has been with sickly sentimentality regarded as an exiled political offender, and unchallenged has been permitted to land. His occupation of murder and his creed of destruction have been dignified as a "political offence." Under the only code recognized by him the chief executive of this country, elected by the ballots of the people, is a person as much to be hated and cursed, and perhaps murdered, as is the royal ruler, for conspiring against whose life, he may have been violently ejected from the unfortunate land of his birth. Anarchy's hand is raised, not against monarchies and empires alone, but against all governments, kind or unkind, ancient or modern, republican or royal. The mere existence of these political perverts is a political offence against every civilized government on the globe.

The Commissioner of Immigration finds warrant for his present action in the Federal law which forbids the entrance to our country of criminals, or persons likely to become paupers. There is no strained construction here, and if there was, a contented and an orderly people would heartily sanction it. The wretch who plots to murder rulers and destroy government, does not dignify his criminal purpose or intent above that of the ordinary law-breaker for the mere reason he has selected big game for his knife and bomb. He is not a "political offender"—he is a criminal—and a most dangerous criminal at that. Any other view of the matter would permit the foreign burglars and house-breakers to organize for the purpose of robbing all government officials and confining their depredations to these functionaries, claim to be "political refugees" deported for political reasons. The country at large, and the Immigration Commissioner particularly, are to be congratulated upon this wholesome innovation.

THE DUTY OF THE SUPERVISORS.

A reader of The Wave, who also has the honor of an intimate acquaintance with one of the best known members of the newly appointed Board of Supervisors, informs the writer that he has discussed and considered the suggestions offered the new Board in The Wave of last week; and, in that connection, he propounded a dozen inquiries of more or less relavancy to the article in question, which it may be worth while to discuss.

Concisely put, we advised the newly appointed Board, if it should succeed before the Supreme Court, to make haste slowly in its dealings with our quasi-public institutions and to take infinite pains to prove that an honest Board of Supervisors is not synonymous with a "cinch" Board, and so demonstrate to corporate capital the lack of necessity for its interference in politics. The benefits that would follow corporate retirement from politics are inestimable—no one will deny this, and if it is within the power of the newly appointed Board to contribute to its retirement, then, regardless of the right or wrong of it, every one but the political tricksters will rejoice over the ousting of the old Board, if the new will but take advantage of the opportunity that seems to be presented.

But our friend asks, what rule we would lay down for the guidance of the Board? Which are the honest and which the dishonest corporations? What assurances have the public these people would eschew politics hereafter? What would you consider unfair? etc. These are not all the inquiries put by him, but all that he did make, may be disposed of in one broad answer. He would not reduce his queries to writing. They all confessed a total lack of knowledge of the elementary principles involved, and he no doubt reflected the wisdom of his friend, and many another equally respectable and equally intelligent man. It is one thing to understand the rules of trade, the laws respecting commercial paper and the ins and outs of mercantile life, but it is quite another to sit as an arbiter between the public and a private corporation and equitably regulate and reduce the compensation the one shall receive and the other shall pay for the thing purveyed and consumed. Be it water, gas, electricity, or what not, a certain element of the community will always demand lower prices. That is to be expected. If the law permitted Boards of Supervisors to reduce the prices which Mr. Dohrmann sets on his delf ware or his bric-a-brac, or that Mr. Barry sets on his printing or his weekly paper, or that Dr. Rottanzi exacts for feeling a pulse or examining a coated tongue, then annually before our Supervisors would appear an array of complainants demanding that these gentlemen reduce their rates. If the Supervisors had this power with respect to callings and professions followed by these gentlemen, then Messrs. Dohrmann, Barry and Rottanzi would demand the privilege of a hearing, which under the law must be conceded them. Messrs. Dohrmann. et al., would have their rights, which a complaining army of patrons might not howl down or shout away into thin air. They would have a right to charge for their wares, prices adequate to insure a profit sufficient to operate their several establishments, pay interest on their indebtedness and interest on invested capital. This is the limit of corporate profit, as laid down by the law, below which point you may not reduce rates for transportation, for water or for any other thing furnished by quasi-public corporation. Messrs. Dohrmann, et al., would consider it a hardship if the Supervisors were to reduce their scales of prices below the point of operating expenses and bare interest on money invested; and it would be an imposition, which the courts would not tolerate for a moment. The basis of all regulations must be reasonableness, and comparison with rates prevailing in other communities cannot, in the nature of things, form a basis for such regulations, any more than the price of china ware in Germany, of printing in New York, or physicians attendance in Venice should determine the rates to prevail for similar services in San Francisco. We, as a community, have not yet learned the cardinal principles that govern in such matters. We are still a new community that has not settled down to accepting things almost axiomatic in older commuties. The law does not tolerate unreasonably high rates fixed by the corporation, nor will it sanction or uphold unreasonably low rates fixed by the municipality. This is a controlling principle that should be indelibly impressed upon the public mind. "Reasonableness" is determinative of the rate, whether fixed by the corporation or by the State. In a community twenty miles away the householder may pay $5 per month for a given service; while in San Francisco he may pay $10 for the same service, yet, under the law, the lesser rate may be exhorbitant by reason of the cheapness and facility that such service may be performed, and the greater rate may be held to be reasonable in view of the greater attending difficulties and expense. There is no hard and fast rule that can be applied except one that is recognized by the law. Capital invested cannot be pillaged of a fair return for the amount invested.

Our friend was also of opinion that as these corporations are permitted to tear up our streets to lay pipes and erect disfiguring poles on our thoroughfares, the public had a right to regulate them. He seemed to consider that these privileges extended to the corporations by the municipality, constituted the foundation upon which rested the right of the Supervisors to regulate. Nothing is further from the truth. It is the character of the business itself, that determines the right of the Board to regulate, and under the guise of regulating rates, the Board may not squeeze rent or license money out of the licenses for the privileges mentioned by our friend. Presumably the Board might, as to all future comers, exact a compensation for such concessions, but then it must be a matter of agreement into which both parties have duly entered.

If the new Board is recognized by the Supreme Court, we would again advise them to consult the Golden Rule and act up to it. The influence of money is only one of the methods of bribery; and the public officer who surrenders his conscience and his judgment to the clamor of the press or of the public, whether it be to secure his own peace or his popularity, is just as bad, just as dangerous, and just as false to the great trust reposed in him, as the official who corruptly acts contrary to his own judgment and the public welfare for money. All men are not brave, few men are willing to stand up against the assaults of an agitating press. Here we have a Board certified to us as composed of honorable men. They need no whipping in, no lashing of the press, no cartooning, no driving, to induce them to be honest. Will the Examiner and the rest of the press agree then to attempt no intimidation of its members, but permit this Board to proceed in its own way, at its own time, to investigote and regulate our quasi-public corporations; and will it agree further to avoid all personal criticism of members who may fail to agree with its side of the case? If the Examiner and the rest of the press have the confidence they pretend to feel in these gentlemen, there should be no hesitation in accepting this suggestion, and this Board could proceeed without fear or favor to measure out justice as they saw it.

Our friend asks what assurance would anyone have that the corporations would keep out of politics, if after an investigation the Board decided to make but minor changes in rates, and impose duties, restrictions and burdens only where the corporations were grossly and willfully imposing upon the public? Probably our friend can only have the assurances that common sense would suggest. That should be sufficient. His question may be answered, however, by asking another. What earthly intrests would the corporations that had stood the test of an honest investigation, have in defeating honest men in the future? What use would they have for politicians or politics, any more than has Messrs. Dohrmann, et al.? Honest men would probably then implore them to enter politics against dishonesty and political rascality, for no one is more interested than they in honest government and no individual interests are so open to the assaults of knavish politicians as theirs.

The trouble with our corporations is, they have started in wrong, politically. It will require an intervening era of disquieting and perhaps even threatening times, to them while they are emerging from one kind of politics into another, but come the time must, or something will overtake them that cannot be easily turned off.

FARMING IN THE ASCENDANT.

For the first time in several years the wheat crop affords a profit to the average California farmer.

It may be assumed that at one cent per pound wheat pays barely cost of production, including of course labor and a very moderate rental for the land employed; it now sells at one and a half cents per pound, and so soon as the total number of tons produced is approximately ascertained the profits of the crop may be calculated in a general way; for the present it is sufficient to say that they are to be counted by millions of dollars. That this is reality and not fiction is shown by the fact that the wheat producers are paying interest in arrears as well as that for current year; that many of them are reducing the principal, while others are extinguishing their loans altogether. It is not alone the wheat growers who are to be congratulated; the fruit producers have done or are doing equally well. This condition of affairs is very gratifying, for the prosperity of any class in a community is really prosperity for all.

Large as the profits of wheat and fruit culture for the harvest year now closing will be, the indirect gains are still greater. New life and hope has been infused into the tillers of the soil recently despondent, and faith has been revived in farming as an industry. The enhancement in market value of land in the agricultural counties as a whole probably equals the net profits on the crops for this year. Not only this, but lands are now salable, and they whose choice or circumstances do not permit them to remain tillers of the soil may retire from their vocation at will.

Just at this time attention is directed, and the emigration is large, to the Klondike and other points whence come fabulous reports of the yield of mines; the rainbow chasers who are seeking these localities do not seem to be aware that the instances are many in this State where the grain or fruit crop raised for the now closing year would pay the full purchase price of the land on which it grew. It cannot be asserted, nor can it be hoped, that every year in the future will be as favorable as respects crops and prices as the present. but still the fact remains that for any series of years farming in this State pays and pays abundantly. The question of farming in California should not be discussed from the single stand point of the possibilities of wealth to be derived therefrom. There is no profession, trade or occupation in the civilized world that secures wealth to even a majority of those who follow it, but with industry, prudence and economy a situation of comfort and of comparative independence may be reached in most vocations of life, the chances with the farmer being greater than with others. The tiller of the soil has one advantage over persons of other occupations; owning even a moderately good farm free from lien he can, if need be, support life on its productions, while the mechanic or professional man with a house and lot not subject to incumbrance must go into the market with his labor or starve. The chief value of a farm does not consist in its capacity for piling up money for its owner, its main worth is in its value as a home, as the center of a family circle, and on this basis a farm in California is worth two elsewhere for the reason that the conditions of life here are relatively easy.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The hold Director Holden had on the Regents of the University was due to the form of administrative ability he possessed. It was not because of his scientific standing. Of all the men on Mt, Hamilton, its director was slightest in effort, weakest in achievement and least in reputation. Such distinction as he enjoys is based on the fact that he is head of a great observatory and has had as his subordinates such men as Schaberle, Burnham, Cambell, Burnard, Perrine and Hussey. Once out of Mount Hamilton, astronomy will never hear of him again, and unless some new mistake is made, will there be any further discord among the wardens with the great telescope. An important duty now before the Regents is to place the observatory in the right hands. Three at least, and perhaps four, of the astronomers now on Mount Hamilton have been, one after another, directors of the Observatory of the University of Michigan. Each of these men is young, vigorous, affable, courageous. Each has a high and growing reputation in science, and all stand bound in close relations of personal friendship. Any one of these is as well qualified as any man who could be brought from the East, or who is likely to be considered in this connection. Professor Schaberle is the senior in age and service, and for that reason at least would naturally be in line of promotion. His appointment would give confidence and strength. Should the Board elect to choose by lot it could make no serious mistake. What is wanted at the Lick Observatory is scientific training, common sense, integrity and personal courtesy.

***

President Jordan should be gratified at the sensation the press makes out of his most casual utterances. From the interpretations placed on his phrases one might suppose him a species of wild-eyed and hair-brained theorist instead of the sane, sagacious, conservative administrator he really is. When he is reported as having given voice to some radical sentiment it may be taken for granted that the journalist is really responsible. The limitations of space prevent American newspapers from utilizing the shorthand system of reporting and though Dr. Jordan is not rapid of speech it is hard for even a clever writer to condense and yet preserve the exact sense of an orator's phrases. Words are full of shades and a term misapplied often make a salient difference of meaning. It must not be forgotten that the dailies are on the watch for sensational headlines which are to the press what the day's specialty is to the department store. It often happens that there is a huge distinction between the startling announcement of the headlines and the matter of fact utterances of the article for which the editor rather than the reporter is generally to blame.

***

Time and again I have assured gentlemen who claim to have been misrepresented by an interviewer, that it is unfair to blame the newspaper for the mistake or impertinences of an individual. The city editor who assigns a reporter to perform a certain duty is animated only by a desire to gather news. He has no motive in making enemies for his journal and is as much outraged by a "faked" interview as the victim. The rational course to pursue when such a trespass occurs is to write at once to the editor who will thank you for the intimation and see to it that reparation is made.

***

There was a certain grim irony in the spectacle of a squad of policemen ejecting the solid eight Supervisors from their chamber in the City Hall. When the Legislature was in session and Boss Rainey was engaged lobbying through the bill reorganizing the fire department and increasing the salaries of the officials he approached Chief Lees to enlist in the cause of advanced emoluments, the powerful influence of the Police Department. It was promised in return the assistance of Mr. Rainey in keeping the License Collector, Fred Lees in office—the idea being that the Board failing to agree on a candidate, the incumbent would remain in charge. The obligations of the morrow are never permitted by Rainey to interfere with the triumph of the moment and the pledges required were acceed to. Result, the success of the measure and the jubilance of all concerned. When it came to the fulfilment however, it was another story. A fine showing was made but Bonney was elected. Chief Leee is not the man to express chagrin or lament defeat, but his memory is excellent. The Rainey forces must adhere at the next election to the letter of the law for there will be no sympathy for them among those possessing authority.

***

If the story of Mrs. Dora Russell of Stockton be true the condition of affairs in the Preston Reform School certainly requires rigid investigation. Young Russell was accused of theft, and was beaten because he refused to acknowledge it. According to the Call the boy was given eighty lashes with strap under which he fainted. As he was still obdurate in his determination, he received fifty additional lashes, when he again fainted. The attendant who inflicted the punishment is said to have declared there was no occasion for it, and for this he was dismissed. It may be the fact that the boy committed the crime of which he was accused, but this does not excuse the brutality of the flogging. Many reports have come out of Ione alleging that cruel punishments are frequently inflicted under the superintendency of Mr. O'Brien. If this be the case it should afford a great opportunity for the sensation-loving dailies to perfect a real reform. All over the world flogging as a punishment has fallen into disuse, being regarded by the authorities as degrading and brutalizing. There would have been a terrible outcry had Warden Hale lashed the convicts who so lately rebelled at San Quentin, yet had he done so he certainly had a better excuse than could possibly be offered by the superintendent at the Ione School. There are other ways of punishing refractory boys than by flogging them until they faint.

***

The development of a subsidiary wife on the death of any wealthy man is so regular a proceeding in California that it suggests the existence of a ring of conspirators engaged rigging up claims of this character. Stranger plots have been perpetrated, and in the cause of crime there is never lacking boldness and ingenuity in the matter of contriving evidence and pushing claims. We learned a few weeks ago that there had arisen unto the late Captain Wilson of Oakland a lady who claimed the conjugal relation, and now a wife has been found for young Mr. Nolan who had departed this life apparently a bachelor. Of course these curious conditions may be attributable to the lax life of this environment, but it should be remembered also that it is rich men alone who are subjected to these post mortem revelations. Virtue apparently to be permanent must have a foundation in poverty.

***

At the moment of writing, the fate of the Supervisors is in the air—or rather in the judicial balance, as the Supreme Court has taken them under advisement. However good the cause of the new Board is, it was most indifferently expressed to the Court. However excellent a personage Attorney Baggett may be, he lacks that eloquence and grasp the occasion demanded of its exponent. In comparison with the speeches of McEnerney and Garber, his oratory sounded futile. He lost himself in side issues and had to suffer those impatient interruptions from the bench which every lawyer dreads. This is not written with any desire to disparage Mr. Baggett, who is an honorable gentleman. He was outmatched, however, the fact was apparent. Still the opportunity was his by right of conquest. Shortly after the water rates were fixed, Dr. Salfield, a Police Court interpreter, and president of one of the local improvement clubs, hit upon the point of law by which the ejectment of the Board was consummated. He consulted several law firms and offered to bring suit if he could obtain free legal service. The attorneys saw nothing in the cause, and the subject drifted until George K. Fitch took it up and engaged Messrs. Baggett & Schell to press it before Judge Wallace. It seemed at first a mere flash in the pan, but as the trial proceeded the Solid Eight and their friends realized their predicament. The decision came like a thunder-clap and upset a hundred well-laid plans. Before the lower tribunal Mr. Baggett and his associate found themselves in the current, but pleading a cause in the upper Court is a different situation.

***

The source of the reports about the Guatemalan rebellion which the dailies have published, is purely local. They proceed for the most part from a disreputable hotel runner, who has them from certain Guatemalan revolutionists whose interest is in the downfall of Barrios. Of the actual condition of affairs in the Central American Republic no one in the States is informed. A rigid cenorship is exercised over all telegrams and even the merchants who have most extensive business interests in those parts have not received a word from their correspondents, though it is well known that millions of dollars hinge on the result of the conflict. The Pacific Mail, Schwartz Brothers and Louis Hirsch of Castle Brothers who are all deeply interested in Guatemalan affairs, have had nothing either denying or corroborating the stories of the local press, and their facilities are infinitely superior to those of either the dailies or their extraordinary informants. That some sinister influence is at work through this affair is sadly evident and the consequences are liable to prove costly to San Francisco. When the trouble is ended and Barrios realizes how cordial and kindly the expressions of the press towards his government have been, he is not liable to assist the further development of trade relations between California and Guatemala. He is a clever and competent man, and the army is at his command. The present condition of affairs he must have foreseen as liable to happen, and, as I stated last week, he is undoubtedly prepared. Central Americans will tell you that, though Barrios has been rather more enterprising than the condition of the country justified, he has certainly been a wonderful factor in its development, and has exhibited a fine patriotism. As to the charges of cruelty made so positively, there seems slight evidence to support them, and it must be remembered that all statements circulated are prejudicial to the cause of Barrios.

BOSWELL JR.

A REBELLIOUS PROBLEM PLAY

The warmest place in the Columbia Theatre is just under the edge of the balcony in the dress circle—there do Messrs. Friedlander and Gottlob like to put the critics, and there the critics do not like to be put. For not only is it warm, and not only do they, at the Columbia, always put The Press in the middle of a row, but the acoustics are bad, and one only hears the play in a sporadic sort of way—when people quarrel and raise their voices, or when Mr. Corson Clarke vociferates in a penetrating nasal treble, or Mr. Frawley denounces in a deep, rumbling bass.

This is all by way of a sort of apology to Mr. Thomas, who, in a neat speech, said the people of San Francisco only thought as the critics told them; to be thus regarded as the shepherd of a meek and well-trained flock is subtly flattering to the critical mind. One feels an obligation to be only complimentary and effusive, but it was so warm under the balcony, and the seats were so cramping, and it was so hard to hear! Mr. Thomas must be forgiving if a drop of bitterness is filtered into this article.

When a play is tried on the dog in San Francisco, San Francisco has doubts. Mr. Thomas, who wrote A Great American Drama, sounds as if he ought to have only metropalitan debuts. But a prophet is not without honor saving in his own country. And we ought not to doubt the excellence of his play because Mr. Frohman chose to try it on us. Have we not, through much more suffering, grown to dread "New York Successes" as the worst plays we ever see here? A drama of which a New York manager is too doubtful to produce in the metropolis ought to inspire us with much more hopeful anticipations than a drama which has run all winter at one of Gotham's biggest theatres.

"Don't Tell Her Husband" is curiously indeterminate. Mr. Thomas has said that he meant it to be a problem play, but it turned upon its creator, and willfully and disobediently became a comedy, He who runs may read this. The first act is inspiringly problematic. Shades of Pinero and Jones darkened the atmosphere, and cheerful anticipations of thrilling and scandalous complications beguiled the auditor. It hardly seems probable that a play in which a married lady and a bold, unscrupulous rake have a scene like that between Mrs, Bancroft and Lawrence Chandler in Act I can turn into a farcical, purposeless, stringy comedy. This piece of dialogue is quite Frenchily callous, cold and bad. Yet in the end of the third act the same lady is the heroine of a series of ridiculous opera-bouffe situations. which amuse her as much as they do everybody else.

Like the sentiment of the piece, Mrs. Bancroft evidently revolted against Mr. Thomas' idea of her. He meant her at first to be the foolish, repining, neglected wife who plays with fire through two acts, and comes back in the third neither sadder nor wiser, but feeling that, on the whole, honesty is the best policy, and that a husband whose business it is to pay your bills, and upon whom you can have the law if he is in the least neglectful or unkind, is preferable to a lover who is cruel, capricious, and selfish. For one act Mrs. Bancroft was consistent to her characterless character. In the second act she began to show strong inclinations towards breaking away for the joyous realms of comedy. In the third act both the actress and the author gave up any attempt at characterization, and Mrs. Bancroft swept through the scenes in the insouciant freedom of an unclassified type.

For two acts Miss Johnson struggled with the obstinate creature as Mr. Thomas must have struggled when he was trying to write her down consistently, In the beginning, in the weak, yielding, alarmed stage, Miss Johnson was successful. She paced about the stage and fell into chairs and on sofas in lovely attitudes, while the tempter, Mr. Worthing, was the tempter and tempted in a cold, majestic, British way—said cool, wicked things to her, and the whole scene took on the dark air of the problem play. But in Act II Miss Johnson began to lose her grip on Mrs. Bancroft. That stiff-necked and rebellious heroine revolted against problems. She began to grow frivolous — signs of comic opera proclivities broke out upon her — she did frisky, silly things. It was plain that neither Mr. Thomas nor Miss Johnson could hold her back. She was making straight for farce-comedy. Her stampede, though demoralizing, and affecting the whole play, was not followed by the rest of the company. The tempter died out of the piece after the first act. There was no room for him, for he was a real person, grimly natural and in a rollicking laybrinth of absurd situations had no place. Mr. Worthing, with his grey hair and his large, enfolding hand-grasp, was genuine where he could be, and where he couldn't said his lines and shook hands with people and leaned against door-posts or sideboards in the distinguished, gentlemanly way he knows so well.

The most fortunate people in the cast were Mr. Clark, Miss Bates, and Miss Wallis. They started fair and did not go through any disturbing changes of temperament. In the first act Mr. Clark had a very Pineroish scene with the two other men, where they discuss the ethics of telling Mrs. Bancroft's husband that the serpent is upon his hearth. This piece of dialogue, which was crisp and smart, was relieved from the imputation of serious realism by Mr. Clark's treatment of it. Knowing the burlesque that awaited him, he determined to inaugurate it as early as possible, and not let it come upon people with a crash. In fact, it was only by Mr. Clark's efforts that the first act, with its realistic comedy and drawing-room gentility, managed to maintain any connection with the rest of the piece.

The two ladies cast in comedy roles had the two most consistent characters in the play. Miss Bates was a gay divorcee, who smoked cigarettes and was witty and skeptical. It is a type that Miss Bates plays well. She has just the hard, flashing cleverness necessary for these soulless society figures. which are rendered interesting by a caustic spirit of humor. She is an entirely mental type, emotional by imitation, not by intuition, lacking sympathy from lack of feeling, with an intensity of nervous power, and that absence of magnetism observable in women who only observe and learn through the brain instead of the heart. In characters that are dominated by a gay spirit and a biting, practical shrewdness, she is excellent—full, as she is, of an up-to-date frankness and a boyish good nature. It is in the sentimental, the romantic, the emotional side of human nature that she is weak. All her persuasive brightness cannot make us take her as an actress who realizes the full richness and depth of life, the charm of its mystery, the majesty of its despair.

Miss Wallis, on the other hand, is not an actress at all. But she is a charming little creature, with an elfin magnetism all her own. Miss Wallis has thought out a very good plan. If you have not got it in you to be a great actress, it is a very good idea just to be yourself. Miss Wallis is always herself, and in consequence is never affected, or silly, or unattractive. She is American, too—tartly and trimly American—with underneath all her dapper little ways and airs, her neat preciseness, her crisp self-reliance, a foundation of that sweet, simple honesty which is the American girl's birthright. She knows how to be independent without being masculine, and how to speak her mind without being pert. Take her for all in all, she is as successful an ingenue as we have on our stage.

This trio fit into the comic part of the play excellently; in fact, they are the comic part of the play, and the comic part is the play. It swamps the problem. It buries under the ruins of the first act the Tempter and Mrs. Bancroft and Tom Bancroft and all the desperate, deadly things that they were going to do and be. Comedy, farcical, rampant and untiring, takes the piece for better or worse, and marks it for its own. The last act is burlesque, and pretty well mixed up burlesque. Mr. Thomas ought to make it a little more lucid and ought to vary the humor of the situations. These by their sameness tend toward monotony.

GERALDINE BONNER.

HOW SAN FRANCISCO LIVES

The Froggery at Stege, together With Notes on Croaking.

The illustrations of Mr. Richard Stege's froggery at West Berkeley, which are given in this number of The Wave may surprise some of our readers. It is not known to all consumers of frog's legs, that the cultivation of the toothsome batrachian is an industry which is conducted with assiduity and profit within eyeshot of the halls where higher education is or ought to be persued under the auspices of the Regents of the University. Mr. Stege's frog nursery is believed to be the only one in the state. In France such institutions are in existence in many of the southern departments; frog growers make a fair living by supplying the Paris markets; but in the United States gastronomy has only lately been educated to appreciate the delicacy, and it has never been fully developed in our beloved mother country, though Englishmen have got over the habit of calling Frenchmen Johnny Crapauds, so low down in the scale of civilization as to be frog-eaters.

Mr. Stege breeds his frogs in four large ponds, which are carefully drained so as to guard again at overflow. He has crossed his California frogs with frogs from Denver and Florida. He feeds them nothing, but lets them forage for themselves among the worms, insects, and fish spawn; when he wants to collect a lot for market, he catches them with small nets or scoops as they do on the Chesapeake or the Potomac, or he draws off the water and takes them by hand in the mud. His chief market is in this city, though he has supplied a few for breeding purposes in California and Oregon. In summer the ordinary frog, not the bullfrog, is worth from $1 to $2 a dozen; in winter from $2.50 to $6. At the present time Mr. Stege's stock is from 15,000 to 20,000 batrachians.

The idea of eating frogs must have been abhorrent to the races for whom St. John in the Revelations drew a picture of "three unclean spirits like frogs," nor can they have been a popular dish in Egypt, or Milton would not have described them as "A race obscene

Spawned in the muddy beds of Nile."

But an obscure passage in Lucian implies that in his day advanced gourmets relished a roast frog or a fricassee of frogs, and, as everybody knows, the original device of the city of Paris which was afterward transformed into the Fleur de Lis, was three frogs rampant, which signifies that they were not regarded with loathing.

In fairy tales, the poor frog fared badly, the wicked girl spat out frogs whenever she spoke, and the disobedient daughter was doomed to marry a great bullfrog, while her better-bred sister got the Invisible Prince for her share. Grimm made an effort to rehabilitate the frog when he introduced the fashion of transforming him into a gay cavalier at the critical moment, but children have never got over shuddering at his cold, clammy skin and his goggle eyes. This is an unjust prejudice. The frog is a beautiful, symmetrical creature. He is the best swimming teacher a child can get, and he is the only animal except man which has a calf to his leg. He has rendered the greatest services to anatomy and physiology; being the only animal known which, when you cut out his heart, can walk away as if nothing had happened, and die at its leisure, not from the wound, but obviously from grief at man's inhumanity. Finally, the meat of frog's legs is more delicate and nutritious than chicken. Surely it is shameful to disparage such a creature. It would be more becoming to grant a bonus to the enterprising froggers who stimulate its production.

As to the music of frogs, opinions differ. Most people object to the bre-ke-ke-kex-koax-koax,which rises from swamps in springtime. One of the pleasing usages of the French seigneurs was to keep a peasant beating the swamp with a branch so as to frighten the frogs into silence in order that the seigneur could sleep:

"Lest the choir of frogs still croaking
Made him wish them choaking;"

But there have been poets who found music in the chat of the frogs:

"Marshy offsprings of the fountains they,
Raising voices in harmonious hymn,
Bre-ke-ke-kex;
In sweet sounding song,
Koax-koax."

The poet Moore, whose soul was ever attuned to affliction, fancied that the croak of the frog was a cry of pain. He melted in grief over the moist and quereulous reptiles:

"Those frogs whose legs a barbarous cook
Cut off, and left the frog in the brook
To cry all night, 'till life's last dregs,
'Give us our legs! Give us our legs.'"

A story is told of a pair of lovers who sat them down by the side of a lake to consummate their wooings, having reached the point where the gentlenan must speak, or forever hold his peace. Said he:

"I asked you to come out this evening in order to tell you how much I
"Bre ke-ke-kex," from a big bullfrog near by,
"I wanted to say to you—"
"Koax, Koax,"
Stuffing her handkerchief into her mouth to stifle her laughter, the lady stammered:
"I think I understand what you—"
"Bre ke-ke-kex."

This was too much for the gravity of the couple. They exploded. And despairing of telling his tale in words as long as the bullfrog had the floor, the gallant just seized the lady round the waist, and imprinted on her lips a kiss more eloquent than phrases, and an engagement, followed by a happy marriage, ensued in due course.

It must not be supposed, however, that the frog is an enemy to honest love. On the contrary. It is a matter of record that

"Froggy would a wooing go,
Whether his mammy would let him or no."

He is indeed to the manner born. A female frog of good intentions will present her spouse with a thousand little tadpoles in the course of a season, each of whom at the proper period will swallow its tail—and if not devoured by papa or mamma, will disport itself on the edge of a puddle in search of a bride. They increase and multiply so rapidly that if it were not for the storks, they would render the valley of the Nile uninhabitable.

Luckily for mankind they are not as big as they were. According to Owen, the frog of the carboniferous period who disappeared just about man's advent into the world, was ten or twelve feet long, and croaked in the ancient marshes with a voice like a bull of Bashan. A sportsman who met such a creature—if there were any sportsmen in those days—must have had a bad quarter of an hour. In our day a big bullfrog will eat a duck, that is, if the duck does not anticipate him in the devouring business. But ducks are rarely civilized enough to be frog eaters. They leave such aliment to snakes, who cover the frog with slime, and slowly swallow him, sometimes consuming an hour in the operation, during the whole of which the wretched frog writhes and struggles visibly as he passes down the esophagus.

JOHN BONNER.

Though lecturing is more general now than in former years, it has lost much of its old-time prestige, undoubtedly due to the influence of the theatre. Twenty-five years ago a lyceum was a necessity in every city in the country, a sort of beacon light for genius, reform, and entertainment. Lectures are now given on a different plan, principally in Summer assemblies and University Extensions, both of which systems have become extremely popular. This popularity of the cheaper courses has done much to impair the business of the so-called legitimate platform. But notwithstanding this, there is a constant demand for people who have something to say and know how to say it. An illustration of this was the Rev. John Watson "Ian Maclaren." A practical idea of his success may be instanced in a single day's work. He lectured on morning at the Waldorf to over $1,600, in the afternoon in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music to more than $2,000, and in the evening at Jersey City, took in a little less than $700, making $4,100 for the day. Of the lecturers to visit America this season Anthony Hope is likely to make a leading sensation. With the exception of Henry M. Stanley and Dr. Watson, more applications have been made for him than for any speaker in the last two decades. Another visitor will probably be S. R. Crockett, who, by the way, is the champion golf player of Scotland, a fact likely to interest some people more than his writings. Sir Lewis Morris, Queen Victoria's favorite poet, is also coming. Of American lecturers, Marion Crawford is the most popular this season. Mr. Crawford has decided to devote himself entirely to the platform for a time. His subjects are "Early Italian Artists" and "Italian Home-life in the Middle Ages." John Fox, Jr., with his dialect readings, is another strong attraction, and also Hamilton W. Mabie and Lieutenant Peary, who goes on the platform early in October. Mrs. Ballington Booth is one of the most popular talkers of the day. Major Pond considers her the greatest woman orator living and claims she could make a fortune at speaking if she preferred it to her work.

The Town Council of Vienna has suddenly announced that the placing of tables and chairs on the sidewalks in front of cafes forms an obstruction, and has ordered this practice to be stopped. To those who are familiar with Vienna, and for that matter, with nearly all continental cities, it is almost unnecessary to add that the indignation of the Vienesse at this brushing away of one of their most popular sources of relaxation and enjoyment is unbounded, and their anger is not in any way soothed by the fact that the Burgomaster of Vienna is the anti-Semite leader, and that the principal cafe proprietors are Jews.

In the Consular reports for September there is published a series of reports on the paper trade in various countries. Information is supplied by the Consular officers of the United States in Australia and Central and South America that should be of great value to the trade, as it is specific and at the same time full. We have had occasion now and then to allude to the insufficiency of Consular reports, and are glad to be able to draw attention to good work.

THE PROPAGATING POND

TWO OLD CROAKERS

THE FIRST STEP IN PREPARING A DISH A LA POULETTE

A CALIFORNIA FROG RANCH

FROM PHOTOGRAPHS MADE ATT HE FROG RANCH OF RICHARD STEGE, AT STEGE, CONTRA COSTA COUNTY

THE SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA

THE COURT IS NOW ENGAGED IN SETTLING THE FATE OF TWENTY RIVAL SUPERVISORS

Execution Without Judgment.

By FRANK NORRIS.

It was Miller who told me the yarn that follows. May be you recall Miller, the Australian journalist, who gave me the story of "The Strangest Thing." Miller had this tale through Canavan, an English pal of his, who had a mountain ranch in King's county in California. Miller tells only what he saw. I tell all that comes before. What comes afterward you must tell yourself.

This is the part that comes before. Canavan had been setting out trees for his hunting preserve. Canavan was an Englishman who had come to California with a consignment of English ideas that the Dingley tariff should have taken knowledge of. One of these ideas was a hunting preserve. This hunting preserve would have been well enough had he been content to merely preserve it. But Canavan wanted to improve upon it, wanted to have it like the preserves of his wife's people at Lowe in Northern England. So he started in to put long alleys into it, and to landscape-garden it, and to rearrange the trees in it, pulling up some and transplanting others, and generally improving it according to his transplanted English ideas.

But Canavan is not the hero of this yarn. The hero is one of the trees that he so shamefully mishandled, a huge Black Pine, that was already old when Canavan's ancestors went a-hunting with William Rufus in that other piece of landscape gardening called in the histories the "New Forest."

This much introduction is needed to explain how it came about that this Black Pine was stretched out upon its trunk and ready to be set up in its new place at the time when Estorijo dirked Ramon Sabichi. These two men were Mexicans. Estorijo was the boss of a gang of Chinamen that was working on Canavan's preserve. Sabichi was a sheep herder.

It is not necessary that you should know why they fought. Sabichi was the first man that Estorijo had ever killed, and the sight of him thrashing about on the ground in the throes of violent death became in consequence a matter of considerable interest to him.

Estorijo believed that he had done the trick rather neatly for a first attempt, and was sure that Sabichi would die in a short time. This trick Estorijo had learned from a Mexican sub-lieutenant at Libertad. He had come up to Sabichi, and while walking along beside him, had thrown his left arm affectionately across Sabichi's neck, had next taken a firm grip of the shoulder and suddenly spun his man about like a turn-stile, till his back was toward him. To dirk him then in the soft part of the body between the hip bone and the ribs was an easy matter. The advantage of this Mexican trick lies in the fact that the man dirked is altogether perplexed by that spinning about, and don't know what is happening nor where to look for the blow.

But the manner of Sabichi's dying was a surprise to Estorijo. He had seen representations of stabbing on the stage, and had read of some in novels, and had entertained preconcerned ideas as to how a dirked man should behave and how he should die. He had imagined that Sabichi would throw up his hands and fall at full length and die gracefully and with his eyes properly closed.

Instead, Sabichi sat down abruptly and hard, and his hat canted to one side. There was no sign of blood. He looked up at Estorijo, winking his eyes and exclaiming: "What—what—what—you swine—you've knifed me—you've done for me. What—why——" and here he began to cough.

Estorijo stood in front of him, his knife ready, in case Sabichi should get up again. He did not deem Sabichi's remarks worthy of an answer, and Sabichi's position sitting there on the ground with his legs wide apart and his hat tilted rakishly over one eye struck him as ridiculous. All at once Sabichi vented a sharp "Oh, I pain!" and tried to get up. Then he began to die rapidly. Somehow he couldn't get up, but thrashed about helplessly on the ground, rolling over and over, now on his face, now on his back and now on his hands and knees, running his head stupidly against the tree trunks, and scrabbling at the fallen leaves and pine needles with his hands. His coughing was incessant, and his eyes were wide open. Then he fell flat with his arms doubled under him, fetched a deep sigh and lay inert and wondrously still. Estorijo had never seen anything quite so still before. "You're done for now," muttered Estorijo; "I guess you——"

"U-ugh!" said Sabichi, burying his face in the leaves that covered the ground. This persistency in living annoyed Estorijo beyond expression and he took certain radical measures to the effect that Sabichi should cease from living finally and definitely. "Now, will you, now," said he, as he rose to his feet. Estorijo never had a greater respect for himself than at this moment. "I've got to hide you somewhere," said he as he slid his knife back into the hip pocket of his overalls. "It won't do to let those Chinamen get a sight of you, no, it won't do at all, my son." At first he thought he would carry Sabichi up into the arroyo and hide him under a pile of rocks. Then his eye fell upon a great circular pit that his Chinamen had been digging that day, Canavan's Black Pine had been dragged near to it and would be set up in it to-morrow. "An idea," murmured Estorijo, "you're going to be buried in that pit, my son, and to-morrow there'll be a hundred and fifty feet of Black Pine on top of you to hold you down." His Chinamen's picks and shovels were lying about where they had left them upon quitting work. Estorijo swung himself into the pit and dug down into its bottom some five or six feet. Then he buried Sabichi there, and walked away from the place with great strides, his head in the air.

Next day the pine was planted in its destined place and grew and flourished for five, ten, fifteen years.

Here is the part that Miller saw. "Canavan's wa'nt any hand at ranchin', said Miller, "I've seen ryce-track touts, knee high to nothin', could 'ave wiped his eye when it cyme to knowin' horse and sheep and the like. Canavan busted in two years' time, and his ranch went to rack. He spent too blyme much time shootin' at things in his blyme preserve and he came out into God's country fair sick of the whole shop, but says he: 'Miller, there's more gyme there in the square inch than anywhere on this ball of dirt.' He let me have his rifles—double-barrelled expresses they were, straight from Sheffield—and his splatter gun and his maps and his blessing, and I went into the plyce to see what I could see. Mind now, this was full fifteen years after he'd busted. I outfitted at Fresno and, among other things, began asking for a guide, philosopher an' cook. This chap, Estorijo shows up. Fairish guide he turned out to be, but with a face on him to frighten babies with. He was old, by fifty, I'm thinking, but he knew the country like the palm of his hand, but the way he'd fry mountain trout—but this yarn now. We fetched up at Canavan's old plyce three weeks out. The ranch house was still there but so badly used up by weather that we dared not camp in it, so we made camp in what was the corn bin, and for two weeks shot and and shot and fished, and fished and shot, till five-pronged buck and three-pound trout became regular tiresome. Back in Fresno they'd told me of the Sabichi affair and how, if all tales were true, Estorijo should have copped off in his boots, but most Mexicans are murderers when they're not maudlin plyers, and it was all one with me so long as my man could find me buck to shoot an' cook 'em when they were shot.

Well, one night, while we were watching by a salt lake for deer, a thundering', blundering, snoring gyle of wind jumped out of the East, puff! quick as that, 'strike me straight how she blow, with the ryne flogging down like millions of whip lashes, and the lightning slithering in, and the thunder booming like the ordnance practice at the Aldershot manoeuvers. We cut for the camp dizzied with the noise and whirl of things and of course went wrong in the dark and brought to standing in a bit of clearing—the end of one of Canavan's alleys—blowing like porpoises and a clean knocked up.

"Not here, not here," says Estorijo, in his broken lingo, "not here, but further, we go on further, hey? I do'n like deesa place."

Just then the lightning winked, like God's eye opening, and I saw my man squatting on the far side of the clearing as far awye as he could squeeze from the trunk of a big pine that stood just there. Then there was a smash and a slam-bang hell-roaring explosion, like the thunder of twenty Krupps, and that big pine tree began to sway. I could see it plain enough, for the lightening was winking twenty to the minute. I could see it sway and could see Estorijo, squatting down there on the ground with his shrivelled old hands above his head. Over she went, over and down and down, smashing and crushing and crushing and grinding down through everything, roaring the whiles like Niagara, all her stretched fibers howling like witches, all her boughs and branches crackling and grinding and snapping. My word, it was dreadful and it was grand. Everything shook, the ground under me rocked like jelly on a jarred table, one big final boom, then—silence, only the whining of the wind and the whip-whipping of the ryne. She was down, and under her trunk was Estorijo, down there under a broken tangle of branches, dead, dead and dinted deep into the ground, buried in it as I might say, and in the roots of that fallen tree—you listed to me—in the roots of that fallen tree, gripped there and held there as if in some tremendous fist. There was—something. Can you guess what?

IN CASE OF WAR

How the Navy Department Will Equip Its Auxiliary Squadron.

The moblization of the torpedo fleet has lately engaged the attention of the Navy Departmedt, and it is claimed that plans have been completed which will make it possible to transport boats, crews and armaments from the Atlantic to to the Pacific shores of the continent, or vice versa, within two weeks. In this way the whole or greater part of the torpedo resources of the navy could be concentrated at a given point for the purpose of meeting and repelling threatened attack. Not only would such a scheme be available for the sea coasts, but it can be made applicable to the great lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, transportation to those points requiring of course, less time.

In order to perfect the entire working arrangements for such a service the Navy Department has been in communication with the railroad officials, who would be called upon to lend their aid in furnishing the means of transportation. As a result the naval authorities have determined to construct trucks for the conveyance of the torpedo vessels, the largest to be provided for being the 140 feet class, which have a beam of 12½ feet and a mean draught when loaded of 4¾ feet. The weight of these craft, exclusive of stores and movable fittings, will be 35 tons, and the displacement, with all stores, coal and water on board, 105 tons. These boats are not to be hoisted directly out of the water, but will be hauled up an inclined railway on trucks belonging to the department, and will then pass on to the tracks where the railroad company's engines take them in tow.

In order that the boats might not be liable to any injury on curves, the trucks are to be fitted with pivots, and the frame for the reception of the boat will be supported by live rollers. Thus the frame will be free to move transversely across the truck. Up to the present time the heaviest piece of transportation work done by the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department was the conveyance, on specially built trucks, of the two 50-ton guns sent from the Washington Navy Yard to this post for the coast defence vessel Monterey.

The Naval Intelligence Bureau has also completed its plans for the equipment of twenty-five of the largest merchant vessels of the American marine as regular cruisers for service in case of need. Eighteen of these are at present employed in the trans-Atlantic trade and the remaining seven on the Pacific Ocean, and the understanding with the owners provides for their being placed at the disposal of the Government on demand. It is believed that within four weeks, at the outside, every one of the selected vessels could be equipped with the needful batteries, armament and necessary supplies, and that when fully found, the ships would be the equal of any of the unarmored cruisers of the navy.

Plans for the alterations of the merchant steamers have to do mostly with the arrangements for gun platforms, constructing magazines and store rooms, protecting the engines by improvised bunkers, tearing off all superfluous house work and piercing the hulls for gun and torpedo ports. The crews of the merchant crusiers will be filled, according to the plans, both from the regular details and from new enlistments. The number of officers required will average ten per vessel. In all there would be needed 250. Of this number about seventy-five will come from the regular navy. The others will be made up of volunteer officers after the practice followed during the civil war. The engineer officers will be secured almost wholly from the men who are now engaged on board the various steamers. The crews of the twenty-five steamers will number, in all, over 7,000 men. It is proposed in the general plan to send 3,000 regular men-of-wars men aboard these improvised cruisers. By this arrangement trained gun captains can be secured for each gun and in addition there will be a nucleus of a regular crew for every piece. The regular men-of-wars men will also fill the billets of petty officers. The vacancies created on board the regular warships will be filled by details from the naval militia and by drafts on the merchant marine. As many as 1,500 naval militiamen can, it is thought, be counted upon.

At the recent copyright performance of the dramatized version of Hall Caine's novel, "The Christian," the actors for the occasion were recruited from Mr. Caine's family and friends, the author speaking the lines of John Storm, with Mrs. Caine and his son and daughter reading other parts.

CHURCH OF THE CARMEN, GUATEMALA

POST OFFICE, GUATEMALA

PALACE IN QUEZALTENANGO

CHURCH OF SANTO DOMINGO

THE PENITENTIARY

RAILWAY DEPOT

IN GUATEMALA

MILITARISM IN GERMANY

Government by Soldiers for Soldiers — Rampant Paternalism.

No Irishman arriving at Berlin would have time to ask "Is there a government in this country?" He would be confronted with the government wherever he turned. The railways are government institutions, and the station masters wear gorgeous uniforms. The telegraph department is a government monopoly, and its agents, servants of William the Witless. The omnipresent policeman has an air and a power of summary arrest that would inspire a New York constable with envy and delight, and besides, has the backing of a standing army of superlative dimensions. Not deeds alone but words in Berlin are criminal.

A funny story is told about two Englishmen who were walking together on Unter der Linden, discussing, incidentally the Kaiser's policy. "The Emperor's a d——n fool," exclaimed one of them. Whereupon an English-speaking police officer tapped him on the shoulder and said: "You must come mid me to ze police station." "What for?" asked the Englishman. "Mein herr did call ze Kaiser a d——n fool," replied the man. "No, no," urged the cute Briton, "it was the Russian Emperor I was talking about." "Dat vill not go," went on the constable, "dere is no Emperor a d——n fool except the German Emperor."

This naive sentiment expresses public opinion throughout the Empire. The extraordinary course William has elected to pursue must ultimately drive the country to revolt. There is less personal freedom throughout Germany than there is in Russia. The form of administration, it is true, is representative, but in name only. The will of the Kaiser is the law of the land, and it is far safer to break the second commandment than to take in vain his name. As we have learned from Heine, the German citizen is long suffering, but there is nothing so irritating, so galling, as the perpetual and unnecessary interference of authority. No one is safe from the impertinence of the police. Espionage is general, bureaucracy supreme. Poultney Bigelow in "Harpers" tells of a little German maiden, daughter of a distinguished member of the Reichstag who had become the proud possessor of a bicycle. The first day she attempted to ride a demand was made on her for a police permit. Formality No. 1. Next day, after waiting an hour in the police office, she was admitted for examination before the magistrate, to whom she had to state her name and age. A certificate of baptism, a formal written application from her father certifying she was not liable to prove a dangeorous element in the community, were demanded. Her own deposition and that of the father were formally taken, and that evening a police agent encased in uniform, sword and helmet called to enquire if the parent was the person referred to in the bicycle application.

All these matters being settled, the little maid set out to ride her wheel. She was promptly arrested because she had not yet received the corroborative sanction of the Imperial police authorities. That meant a trip to the Central Police Station, where she had to wait two hours until a policeman in uniform permitted her to appear before him. More questions, then her name was inscribed in a big book, with a complete description of her appearance, height, coloring, features, as though she were a China maiden about to return to Canton. However, the conditions had now been complied with, and she started out next day, bravely and gaily. Suddenly appeared the ubiquitous policeman with a demand for her certificate. It was at home. Whereupon the functionary inscribed her name and address in his note-book, and escorted child and wheel to the parental residence, where a police agent called at nine o'clock the same night to demand a fine of one thaler (about 75 cents) for the heinous crime of being unprovided with a police certificate. The poor maid was terribly distraught over her arrest, and had wept herself into a fever over the insults she had received from street urchins who had congregated around her at the various arrests. Yet there is no government tax on bicycles and all this formality is merely an instance of the manner in which the officials justify their existence.

Throughout the Empire, in every phase of life the same condition prevails. The fishermen complain that they are harrassed by petty police regulations, which prescribe where and when and how they may not ply their avocation. The banks of the Havel are plastered with signs ordering them not to do things and all round are functionaries and officials to see the rules are obeyed. It is veritably a mockery of constitutional government that prevails. One hears daily of unwarranted arrests, though the papers dare publish nothing on the subject. One sad story told of a young lady dragged to the Cologne police station under peculiarly brutal circumstances. She was innocent and her father threatened to bring action against the police, but the whole affair has been hushed up. Some Russian students underwent a similar fate recently. They were arrested, their rooms were ransacked—all with no process of law to justify the procedure. If a newspaper dares take up these affairs it is liable to suspension. The local police authorities have often taken upon themselves to suspend a paper which dares protest against their tyranny. Quite recently the Prussian agrarians, who comprise the aristocracy and form the ruling factor in the nation, concluded that the Produce Exchange in Berlin was the cause of their depression. The government, at their request, passed laws regulating brokerage in grain, which caused the dissolution of the Berlin Exchange. The brokers proceeded then to transact business in a room across from their old quarters, but this excited the displeasure of the authorities, and it was declared illegal. The triumph of the farmer was now complete; the hated middleman disposed of, surely meant the beginning of prosperity. The consequence has been the reverse of this anticipation. There are now no official quotations, and each farmer is compelled to accept for his produce the price current of his own neighborhood, and is at the mercy of the local dealer, who is bound by no rules save those of his own making. The broker, in the meantime, continues to transact business with his fellows by mail or telephone, and escapes the Government tax and police intermeddling. Of course the Government is enraged at the downfall of its plan.

The great difficulty with the German system is militarism. The worn out soldier instead of being pensioned, is provided with civil employment. Thousands of men are turned off each year and by law, there must be found some employment for them. They are pushed into positions as postmasters, railway clerks, express agents and tax collectors. Being diciplined to passive obedience they are of course iron bureaucrats and every regulation is a literal law. But they are the worst possible servants being without intelligence or resource. These men realize if they only behave with proper deference and diligence towards their chiefs that they need not trouble themselves about pleasing the people. Public sentiment has no weight compared with official favor, and the citizen who attempts to fight an official abuse is not opposing an individual but an organization of hundreds of thousands of officials. It is customary in California to complain of the railways. In Germany trains are run at the pleasure of the authorities and with no regard to the convenience of the public. When a German railway superintendent makes out a time-table he expects it to last three months and is chagrined if aught occurs to disturb it. A popular event that causes an immense increase in travel is to him a nuisance. His salary has no connection with the receipts of the road. It is a bold traveler who dares ask questions of a German station master. He does it with hat in hand and is prepared to be snarled at in reply. This I presume would be the condition of affairs in America if the Government should take possession of the railways, a consummation devoutly to be prayed against.

The worst phase of the situation is that men who profess liberal views are regarded with suspicion by the aristocracy and the government. Mommsen, the historian, one of the greatest men of the time, was driven from Germany, in '48, because of his political activity. Even now he is branded as "unpatriotic" by the official classes. Poultney Bigelow declares, too, that the great anthropologist Virchow, is all but boycotted in Berlin because he is liberal. The same authority announces that Germany in the past 100 years has not produced a single statesman who has not been ignominiously ejected from office by his monarch. He freely predicts trouble and perhaps revolution within the realm of the Kaiser if some steps are not taken to relieve the prevailing bureaueracy.

WINDOM.

INTERVIEWING MDLLE. DE MERODE

A French Danseuse Who Lacks Vivacity' Conversation and Curves.

Interviewing is really the art of writing imaginary conversations. Seldom does it happen that the talk of a celebrity fits her role. Yet, in print, it must express her individuality, and must interest and amuse into the bargain. The brightest star in the theatrical firmament cannot always shine on demand, and it behooves the journalist to put into her mouth the things she should have, but never thought of, saying. With the exception of Cissy Fitzgerald, no one has ever come to New York who left so much to the imagination of the journalist as Cleo de Merode. She has been boomed into Parisian prominence, and having come to New York at an immense salary, is at once a light in our own horizon. She is certainly the latest success. New York has flocked to her shrine, which happens to be the variety palace of Koster & Bial. She has been pictured in a thousand poses, and really is the heroine of the moment, this French ballet-girl, whose chief charms are a bank of hair and a pair of mysterious eyes.

Having twice had the honor of being received by Cleo, I may be accepted as a fair witness as to her charms. Really, she is not fascinating. If the King of the Belgians finds her so he must be a person of infinite patience. Maybe he is clever, and she — she has a pretty laugh. Certainly she knows how to dress, but then, Madamoiselle de Merode is French. When I met her first she was about to go out, and her gown was the quintessence of simplicity, but so dexterously designed that pride itself might ape it and still not have a fall. It was of linen, yellow in tone, with a sort of rumpled collar. I merely noted the lines, and they were perfect. Cleo is something between the French term, maigre, and our English, slight; has a low, well-shaped bust, a suggestion of hips, and some curves that might define well-rounded limbs. Otherwise, she has rather a spirituelle face, small features, mystic expression (due a little to her dreamy eyes and perhaps more to an exceeding delicacy of skin). The muchly-advertised hair, the fame of which is second only to that of Paderewski, is again rather a question of manner than of quality. It is rare neither as regards color nor texture, the long drawn-down banded effect making its originality and charm. Conversationally Cleo de Merode is stupid to a degree unusual in a ballet girl (whose brains lie, as a rule, in the tips of their pointed shoes). Then she laughs constantly—I might say she giggles, but it is more musical than that.

I started the conversation by inquiring what sort of a passage she had across the Atlantic.

"Oh, I suppose the usual kind, not long, not short, I did not notice."

"And you like New York?"

"I don't know, I have not thought much about it."

"Did you come alone?"

"Oh, no. My mamma accompanied me. I never travel without my mother—I should be lonely."

"Tell me about your dances."

"My dances? Well, they are just the same as other people's I suppose. I don't know—I wear short frocks, dozens of little tarletan skirts, you know." This with a comprehensive gesture.

"What should I say next? Oh, your clothes. They are charming."

"Yes, you like them? I have been told they were chic."

"Is not your hair rather trying in street fashion in these warm days?"

"My hair? No, that is to say yes—but I am accustomed to it."

I stared round and proceeded to ask her about her favorite books.

"Books? Well, I don't know. I have not much time for reading since I ride a wheel. Perhaps an occasional poem or one of Gyp's novels."

Then, as she looked more than usually bored, I thought I'd venture on another tack.

"I suppose you have seen Bernhardt, frequently?"

"Bernhardt? Well, not frequently. I don't very often go to the Renaissance—it is closed now you know."

"What do you do then?"

"I? Well, I rehearse. Then—oh, I don't know—I go to the dressmaker's. Shopping is absorbing. I have so little time."

"About this story of your posing in the 'altogether'?"

Then there was a faint suggestion of animated indignation, I had an acceleration of hope—perhaps I had at last found a topic.

"A canard—a stupid canard—you must not believe that. He wished to advertise himself so used me. I do not care—now," and with a shrug my hopes were again dissipated. I tried her on the Cafe Chantant singers, on Parisian gossip, on the latest fashions, on herself, and still she remained mute. I ventured to criticize her mode of dress, her figure, and still failed to elicit more interest than that vouchsafed by a shrug of the shoulders or her slight laugh.

In what does her fascination consist? In a style of beauty that is unusual, a daring coiffure and a Belgian Monarch. For these reasons she plays to the biggest audiences in New York and draws a salary which, if properly invested, will render her independent for the rest of her days.

GEORGE RAYMOND.

AN AFGHAN HERO

The Remarkable Personality of Abdur Rahman Khan, Ameer of Afghanistan.

A remarkable man is Abdur Rahman Khan, Ameer of Afghanistan. Termed the lion of Cabul, he has long since verified the name. "One must be a lion," he says, "if one would govern wolves." And in governing these wolves, the people of Afghanistan, Abdur Rahman has shown unusual qualities of mind and heart, notable enough to reckon him among the greatest rulers of the time. This man's father was Afzul the Virtuous, a son of Dost Mohammed the first Ameer of Afghanistan, and one of the greatest men of his time in Asia. Afzul had a brother, Azim, called the Dissolute, whose son Ishak Khan is now one of the foremost pretenders to the throne.

Abdur Rahman came into prominence when only nineteen as militant leader of the revolt started by Afzul and Azim against their younger half brother Shere Ali, then in power. He greatly distinguished himself in battle, displaying the valor of a hero as well as the skill and resource of a great commander. He finally took Cabul and seated his father Afzul upon the the throne, but Azim represented the real power behind it. Discontent soon waxed apace, and Shere Ali along with it. He returned to arms, was defeated by Abdur Rahman, who after his father death, gave his allegiance to Azim. Shere Ali again took the field—this time victoriously—Azim fled, and Abdur Rahman found an asylum at Samarcand, and a pension from the Russian Government.

Ten years after Shere Ali died and was succeeded by Yakoob, who seemed a friend of the British, while Abdur Rahman was deemed a protege of Russia. But the murder of Sir Louis Cavagnari quickly followed, and Yakoob was deposed. Here was Abdur Rahman's chance. He returned to Afghanistan with money and arms given him by Russia. Lord Lytton, then Viceroy of India, perceiving Russia's game, and knowing that Abdur Rahman was the only possible ruler of Afghanistan, directed the British agent at Cabul to welcome the prince and to recognize him as Ameer. This resulted in Abdur Rahman immediately placing himself on amicable terms with the British, at the same time retaining freindship with Russia. Since then his policy steadily inclined to the British side. He recognized the fact that Russia had an eye on India, and on India by way of Afghanistan. An alliance with Russia would naturally offend Great Britian and provoke her to war, and occupy Afghanistan in self-defence. And if he sided with Russia, and Russia won the battle and invaded India, it would surely take possession of Afghanistan on the way. The only safe course seemed faith with the British, trusting them to respect the independence of his realm. This course he adopted and has consistently maintained for many years, although it cost him some loss in the Penjdeh affair, in which instance the British hardly supported him as they should.

In consolidating the Empire Abdur Rahman's policy in Afghanistan has been very similar to that of William I. in Germany and Victor Emmanuel in Italy. He improved the general administration, and remodelled the army in regular European fashion. As for science and manufacture, with the assistance of Sir Salter Pyne, he started various enterprises at Cabul, and now there are workshops of all kinds in the capital turning out all sorts of things from candles to breech-loading cannon. The electric light is in use, and a short line of railroad has been constructed.

In personal appearance the Ameer is a man of middle stature, robust and broad-shouldered, with a complexion somewhat darker than the average Afghan. He wears a short thick black beard; his eyes are brown and his nose large and aquiline. He dresses plainly in semi-European fashion, lives in a plain manner and, contrary to Oriental custom, uses a knife and fork at table. He also smokes cigars instead of the Eastern "hookah." Abdur Rahman dislikes newspapers, but like many others of the same opinion, reads them carefully every day. His habits are temperate, and his morals above reproach. The only dark spot on his personality is the severity of his rule, but recalling the idea of the lion governing wolves, it may be assumed that stringent measures are often necessary. Abdur Rahman has five legal wives, by the third of whom he has two sons, Habibullah and Nasrullah. Habibullah was formally declared heir to the throne four years ago. He is a promising young man, having already acted as Ameer for fully two years during the absence of his father, suppressing the rebellion of Ishak Khan. Nasrullah, the younger brother, is the Shah-zada who recently visited England, where he was entertained with royal honors.

A Latin-Quarter Knife-Grinder: A Curious Interior off Montgomery Avenue

The long and devoted labors of Newman and Manning in no small measure brought about a revival which has obtained for the Roman Catholic Church in England, a solid foothold that contrasts strongly with the condition of affairs when the cry of "No Popery" prevailed. Changed indeed are the times since the period when Cardinal Wiseman was the foremost representative of the Roman Catholic power in that land. What would then have been thought of an open-air procession, headed by two Cardinals and seventeen Bishops in full canonicals, treated with every outward sign of reverence and esteem, such as paraded on the Kentish coast but recently? The occasion was a pilgrimage to the spot, near Minister-in-Thanet, where St. Augustine and his monks landed some thirteen centuries ago, a cross marking the point at which St. Augustine held a conference with Ethelbert. Not a great while since the Anglican Bishops made a similar visit to the identical spot and this circumstance alone rendered the Roman Catholic pilgrimage the more striking and called for the exercise of all that tact for which Cardinal Vaughan is so distinguished. In his address he delt judiciously with the change that has come over things in recent years and summed up the situation by saying that multitudes had so far oscillated that they were already half way to Rome.

The appointment of Henry Demas, a colored Southern politician, as Naval Officer of the Port of New Orleans, has drawn upon President McKinley considerable unfavorable comment. Demas possesses an unenviable reputation in Louisiana, one paper going so far as to term him one of the very worst representatives of his race, and another calls the nomination an undeserved slap in the face to the white people of Louisiana. The appointment is generally looked upon as the work of Senator Hanna, and in confirming it the President is merely discharging another ante-convention obligation.

The spread of religious tolerance throughout the realm and the gracious favor extended to the nobility and leading ecclesiasties of the Roman Catholic faith have been prime factors in aiding the work of the church, while the general drift of religious practice within the established Anglican church has tended to promote sympathy for the Roman Catholic cult.

Tha Sultan has invited Clara Ward Chimay Rigo to give in his minature theatre at the Yildiz Kiosk the entertainment prohibited in Paris, His Moslem majesty, when shown a photograph of the erratic American, expressed a desire to make her acquaintance.

The Governor of St. Petersburg has prepared a treatise on the domestic service question. It is in the nature of a servants' booklet, containing regulations which assign practically all rights to the master and all duties to the servant.

A London baby, three months of age, died recently, after being attended by six doctors, each of whom prescribed different medicines for it. The Coroner's jury returned a verdict of "death from natural causes."

The gold contained in the medals, vessels, chains and other objects preserved in the Vatican would make more gold coin than the whole of the present European circulation.

BY WHEEL TO SAN RAFAEL

A SABBATH RUN ALONG THE HIGHWAYS OF MARIN COUNTY

Photos by B. D. Bent

AWHEEL ON SUNDAY

To San Rafael by Bicycle, with Interludes at Larkspur.

Though the area on which the California yachtsman may sail is circumscribed by the limits of San Francisco bay, the range of the bicyclist is as wide as the State. That, perhaps, is an exaggeration, for there are spaces in the Sierras and through the Coast Range which would be precarious if attempted by wheel. However, the enterprising cyclist travels in California many hundreds of miles ere he can sigh for more worlds to conquer. Around the edge of the bay are charming resorts, delightful nooks well within the limits of a day's run. Marin County is full of such delicious retreats, attained by way of devious roads embowered in shrubbery, and overarched by the giant boughs of California live oaks.

One of the pleasantest of the Sabbath outings in Marin is by wheel to San Rafael via Larkspur and Ross Valley. The pictures, above, represent the adventures of a small party of young people who traveled from San Francisco via the Sausalito ferry and by rail to Corte Madera. They might, indeed, have wheeled it from the water's edge, but there intervenes a stiff bit of hill climbing near Corte Madera that is more easily negotiated by locomotive than by pedal. So off they started, down the pleasant road, through the beautiful wooded country which lies along the slopes of Mount Tamalpais. There is the greatest camping ground in the State. In summer time the groves of madrone and live oak are shelter for batallions of tents, and, literally, thousands of people pass June, July and August under canvas. Thence to Larkspur, set in a canyon which runs into the flanks of the mountain and there the party heads for the swimming place on the slough which widens into a lake of salt water, replenished twice a day by the incoming tide which rushes like a mill race up the broad shining reaches of the river. The joy of a dip after a swift run up hill and down dale is easily realized and the pictures represent most graphically the episode.

Refreshed and rejuvenated, the party moved onwards along the country roads, reaching Ross Valley studded with charming summer villas embowered in foliage, thence to San Anselmo, where the Theological College frowns down on the wayfarer. They might have run through the Dibblee place, surely one of the loveliest bits of road in the country, but they continued up the highway to the Hotel Rafael at San Rafael and there lunch awaited them.

En passant one might descant on the still and Sabbath loveliness of San Rafael—the most conservative of small towns. It is provided with a cycle club, however, and our party was made welcome there. Later, its members rode home, cutting off from the main line at the Kittle place and running up a bit of delightfully wooded hill country past the Mountain View Hotel with its unimitable view of Tamalpais, and thence back to Corte Madera. The recorder must not, however, forget to mention the club's visit to "Bohemia," the summer headquarters of certain Olympic men, who keep open house for friendly athletes passing their door on foot or on wheel. The charm of such a brief run as this lies not only in the exercise afforded the riders but in the knowledge thus obtained of the delightful country surrounding San Francisco which has never had accorded to it the distinction and notice it deserves.

B. D. B.

---

Eugene V. Debs, as President of the Social Democracy, receives a salary of $200 a month, but only draws one half of it, giving the other half to help the cause. For five years Mr. Debs was employed in the largest grocery house in Indiana, but he left, he says, on account of being too tender-hearted to refuse any one credit. Debs once used a railroad pass, when he was working on a paper. Now he would refuse one were it offered him. J. W. Sovereign, of Knights of Labor fame, also disdains the railroad pass. He never had one in his life, nor would he ask for one. As Master Workman Mr. Sovereign gets $1500 a year. Out of this he pays $600 for clerk and office hire, and the remaining $900 he is at liberty to keep. This, together with the profits of his fruit farm at Sulphur Springs, Ark., is what he lives on. M. D. Ratchford, President of the United Mine Workers of America, says his salary is sufficient to meet expenses; if it wasn't he would resign. In speaking of John Burns' salary, which is said to be only $200 a year, Mr. Ratchford thinks the labor-leading Scotchman ought to get at least $5000 a year. "I think he should have it," he says, "but I suppose he is in the work for love of the cause, and not from mercenary motives." Like Debs and Sovereign, Mr. Ratchford does not give the glad hand to railroad passes. They would make him very uncomfortable, he says.

---

Chicago claims the largest store in the world. It is called "The Fair," and was established in 1875 in a small one-story building, sixteen by eighty feet. The concern now occupies an immense steel and terra cotta structure, weighing in the neighborhood of 797,000,000 pounds. It contains eleven passenger and seven freight elevators, nearly six miles of counters, and 1587 windows. There is a stretch of 650 feet of plate glass show windows, and the corner window, on State and Adams streets, is said to be the largest in the country. Three thousand persons are employed in the concern, and sixty wagons and two hundred horses are used in the delivery of goods.

---

The probability of greater New York going Democratic may be fairly well gauged by the mayoralty pluralities of New York and Brooklyn in 1891 and 1892 and the Cleveland vote in both cities in 1892. Mayor Gilroy's plurality in New York in '92 was 75,587, Mayor Boody's in Brooklyn the year previous 7,464: Democratic plurality in both cities for both years 83,051. In 1892 New York gave Cleveland a plurality of 76,300, Brooklyn, 25,306; the combined result 101,606.

---

Lord Roberts says that the position of the English private soldier of to-day is much better than that of a mechanic, for at the age of thirty-nine he can retire on a pension of from 2s. to 4s. 6d. a day. There is no business that secures such a provision for a workingman.

OUR BOYS

STUDIES FROM LIFE AMONG SAN FRANCISCO'S STREET URCHINS

By Charles Weidner

MISS IRENE FRANKLIN

THE CLEVER COMEDIENNE WHO IS SINGING AT THE ORPHEUM THIS WEEK

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I am afraid, dear Diary, that after all has been said and done, we shall have at best a girly good time this winter, for so far as I can see, the scarcity of men is simply appalling. Not of men alone, but of youths. Everyone seems to have deserted us — the Klondyke has deprived us of several dancers, the East of the Bruguieres. The worst of it is I do not hear of any new men whom we may substitute for them. Take the Friday Fortnightly, for instance—there is Allen Wright, who is a host in himself, and will manage the cotillion for Mrs. Salisbury, but Larry Adams and Milton Latham, whom I always relied on for dances, are in Alaska. Life is full of trouble as the sparks fly upward. There are, of course, college boys, but they are a little callow as freshmen, and so awfully superior once they enter their Junior year. Really, I don't know what we shall do. For my own part, so long as Harry is stationed at the Presidio I shan't be lacking in partners, but I don't want to be altogether consecrated to regimentals, who are, as a rule detrimentals, too, and Papa says, to have one "child of the regiment" in the family is enough.

Cousin Barbara is out here from the East, and is positively wild over golf. She insists on dragging me to the links at the Presidio every day, and we are almost the sole representatives of the gentler sex there. I sometimes see Therese Morgan, but few of the girls are sufficiently athletic to go in for so apparently violent an exercise. But it is really not so much so as tennis, and is far more fun.

Arthur is a most ingenious youth. The other day he came home from the office and told me I might get up a little theatre party, and afterwards go to supper at the Palace cafe. He wanted to show Cousin Barbara some attention. "You know, Cricket," he said, "I want something downright smart — no plebian German restaurant for me, with sauerkraut and beer. We shall have champagne." I was staggered, and said, "But, Arthur, you're no Klondyke!" "No, my dear," he replied, "but they have reduced the price of champagne at the Palace, and we are all going there by way of showing our appreciation. Anyway you are certain not to jostle elbows with your sausage-maker." Arthur has always been in the habit of making a fuss if we went to any of the German restaurants, or "beer-halls," as he calls them. He says he can't understand how fellows will take their sisters or any nice girls to these places, inasmuch as they are not good style, and really the Palace is the place after all.

Fancy that pretty Florence Lucas, who was out here last year with the Hagers, is married. She was a rarely handsome girl, Southern in type, and just brimming over with mischief. She married a Mr. Walter Capon, of St. Louis, a millionaire, I am told, and a very shrewd business man. She wrote to Leila and told her about her charming new home, and seems very much in love, indeed.

Let me see what have I to confide in this week, Diary dear. I have been to teas innumerable for this time of the year. Edith McBean had one last week—a rather formal affair, where we all felt "prunes and prismy." She looked stunning in pale pink. Carrie Taylor assisted in receiving, and wore a soft gown of some filmy white material. Then Ethel Patton gave an awfully jolly affair in honor of Birdie Fair on Friday. We debutantes were there in full force, and had a glorious time. Ethel wore white organdie with blue ribbons. Helen Wagner was in pure white and looked lovely. Bessie Ames wore a delicate pink organdie and Marie Wells wore yellow. Birdie Fair was in street dress—dark blue with green trimmings and a big green picture hat. There was that conspicuous absence of men which is the usual case at teas. In the evening we all went to a hop at the Presidio, the first of the season, and had a capital time. There were four men to each girl, think of it, in these "Klondyke" days too. All the fellows came over from the Oregon, and they are all tip top dancers, you know. Nearly all of the debutantes were there. Charlotte Ellinwood looked so pretty in light blue organdie with pink roses in her hair. Here is the gipsy style, you know. Mamie Polhemus wore a stunning gown of pink satin. Leontine Blakeman was gowned in white organdie trimmed with black baby ribbons. Marie Wells made an effective picture in bright red silk veiled in point d'esprit. A girl I especially admired was Miss Berkheimer, whose father is stationed at the Presidio. She is small with big blue eyes and black curly hair, an almost purely Celtic type, and is most vivacious. What adds to the enjoyment of these Presidio affairs is their lack of formality. Each officer constitutes himself a host and sees that all the girls enjoy it. They end at 11:30 p.m., so that one need not lose all of the "beauty" sleep.

On Monday evening I went to a theatre party given to Birdie Fair by the Tobins, and on Tuesday we all were invited by Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Wells to see "Don't Tell Her Husband" at the Columbia — Mr. and Mrs. Oelrichs, Birdie Fair, Rose Hooper and half a dozen men. Afterwards we went to supper at the Palace. Lieutenant and Mrs. Main, who are here from Los Angeles, are being rather extensively entertained. On Wednesday Carrie Taylor gave them a jolly little tea, and on Thursday Mrs. Morgan gave them a capital dinner. There were about fifteen invited, nearly all older girls, Therese and I being the sole debutantes. Afterwards Mrs. Morgan had a colored fortune teller come and read our fates. It was great fun; she looked like that woman in Fergus Hume's "Devil Stick," and I almost felt as if I were "voodooed." Fortune telling is the latest fad, a number of us girls have been at the Gipsy camp on Folsom and Fourteenth. They tell you the most absurd rubbish you have ever dreamed. There is always a dark woman to look out for, a dozen or so men of diversified coloring who will propose to you, and so on. But it is fun and so we go. I dropped in to see Mrs. Darling at the Occidental, where she spent a few days this week. She has been to Coronado and about the southern part of the State for the last few months, and is now going up to her ranch. Mrs. Grinnell expects to come out here in January next. Mrs. La Montagne's small boy is quite an expert cyclist—think of it, and only five years old. Mr. and Mrs. Jimmie Robinson and their family go to Paris next week; they intend sending their children to school there. Rose Hooper is to go East for the winter and may go abroad next spring. Mr. and Mrs. Schwerin go to Japan, and now, dear Diary, I shall say farewell. Your own

MISS CRICKET.

There is to be no Horse Show this winter. That is decided. Henry Crocker, however, is not to be deprived of his enjoyment in that direction, and has gone East in a private car, accompanied by Mrs. Crocker and their family. The New York Horse Show in Madison Square Garden is the object of the trip, and it is safe to believe it will prove enjoyable.

In Oakland the weekly list of entertainments steadily increases until one almost fancies oneself plunged in the wintery vortex. Another debutante has made her formal appearance—Miss Martha Alexander—who was introduced by her mother on Saturday afternoon at a large reception. Miss Alexander is the youngest of three sisters, is fair and has rather an unusual type of face. She is one of the best cyclists in in Oakland. The Alexander house had quite a tropical aspect in its decoration of palms and exotics; with masses of pink roses placed in bowls about the rooms and trailing from the mantlepieces. Among those who assisted Miss Alexander were Miss Harriet Kittridge, Miss Abbie Clift, Miss Carmen Moore, Miss Bessie Palmer and Miss Greenwood. Miss Sadie Hale, the daughter of Warden and Mrs. Hale of San Quentin, gave a house party last week to a number of this season's debutantes, among them Miss Grace Baldwin, Miss Abbie Clift, Miss Florence Sharon and Miss Pauline Fore.

The Oakland girls seem to have developed a perfect passion for Eastern boarding schools, and at no matter what age they sally forth to complete their education at some fashionable seminary in New York or Massachusetts. The The latest additions to the list are Miss Ruth Adams and Miss Ruth Knowles, both of whom have entered Miss Ely's school. Prior to their departure several entertainments were given in their honor, namely: Miss Maybelle Campbell gave a pink luncheon to Miss Adams and twelve of her friends last Wednesday, and Mrs. August Schilling gave a farewell reception to Miss Knowles on Monday evening. Besides the maidens, however, quite a number of "grown-ups" among the Oaklanders have gone to pass the Indian summer in the East, among them Mrs. J. C. Tucker and Miss May Tucker, and Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Brown and Miss Florrie Brown. Miss Bernice Landers gave a smart luncheon last week at her home in San Leandro to about sixteen young people. It was a charming affair and all had a jolly time. The Landers home, "The Gables," is eminently adapted for entertainments of all sorts, and the grounds are beautifully laid out. Miss Mhoon, Miss Holt, Miss Rawlings, Miss Ethel Kittridge, Miss Jessie Glascock and Miss Ethel Moore were among those invited.

Preparations for the nuptials of Miss Myra Prather and Mr. Harry Miller proceed apace. The date for the wedding has been set for November 3rd, and the bridesmaids have been selected—Miss Mhoon, Miss Carrie Havens and Miss Glascock are among the number.

Miss Emma Wellman is still in Australia, where she is being entertained in right royal fashion. She has seen a number of the South Sea Islands and picked up unnumerable interesting curios. She will visit Tasmania and New Zealand before she returns to Oakland. Miss Rae Wellman proposes entering Vassar College in the near future.

Mrs. Charles Webb Howard entertained Dr. A. M. Beecher, Mrs. Mountford and Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin at dinner on Friday evening. Miss Maud Howard is still traveling in Europe. She is at present in Holland visiting the various points of interest.

Among the events of the future is the entertainment to be given by the patronesses of the Woman's Exchange on Saturday evening. An interesting program is to be rendered—Miss Mary Whitney, Miss Lee, Miss Cove and Miss Beyler are to take part. Mrs. Henry Wetherbee is to give a big garden fete on Saturday, October 16th, at her home in Fruitvale, for the benefit of the East Oakland Kindergarten Auxiliaries. Many attractions are being arranged and a great social success is anticipated.

The Hughes Concert, which took place on Friday evening, was easily the best of the series. The main feature was a cantata by Mr. Hughes, which was rather interesting. Miss Margeret Cameron, the president, gave a short address, at the end of which she presented on behalf of the members a baton to Mr. Hughes. The program was rather long—Mrs. Beatrice Priest Fine gave the solos and was in excellent voice.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

Arrivals at the St. Denis Hotel, New York, to September 23d: Dr. A. H. Ticken and wife, M. Murphy, San Francisco; Mrs. E. C. Brown and son, Los Angeles.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

RETURN OF A WANDERER

The Story of a Fashionable Luncheon at the Palace Cafe.

When Mrs. Fanny Allen returned to San Francisco, after an absence from this, her native heath, of two years, she had more curiosities to satisfy than even my information could cope with. Not that I, her sole surviving cousin, am much of a gossip, but one hears of things, you know, especially if one is regular in attendance at one's club. It was a Saturday morning that she arrived, and no sooner was she comfortably settled in the pretty suite of rooms I had engaged for her at the Palace than the inquisition began. Where was Mary, with whom she had gone to school? Was Jenny happy with her husband? Had Etta Francis ever recovered from the loss of her son? As long as I could I answered her interrogatories, and then broke into her stream of reminiscence to mildly suggest luncheon.

"Of course, Fanny," I said, in my kindliest way, "I appreciate your desire to be up to date but it is really important, my dear, that we have some refreshment."

"You will never forget your stomach, Tom," she commented, a bit irreverently, I thought. "But are you as great a gourmet as ever? Where are you dining nowadays? And where can one see most of one's friends at lunch?"

"Nowadays one goes to the Ladies' Grill Room at the Palace—downstairs, you know—and I have reserved a table where you can see and be seen."

She started into her bedroom without another word and half an hour later we were descending the elevator together, Mrs. Allen in a very smart gown, which set off her trig figure with the art of a New York modiste.

"What a contrast to the old diningroom," she exclaimed, gazing wonderingly at the magnificent apartment with its lofty ceiling and finely paneled walls. "I'd never imagine it was the same place—and such good taste—candles too, and what a lovely vista one has of that pretty window at the end there. But, Tom," she ejaculated, "I don't see a face I know."

"You have been away a whole decade, Fanny," I replied, "and many things have happened—deaths, changes and removals, but let me tell you the crowd to-day is about the most representative gathering of our best people that you will get outside a meet of the Friday Night Cotillion."

"Really, they are very presentable," she commented, patronizingly. "If it were not that so many of the girls are handsome and plump I might imagine for a minute I was lunching at Delmonico's."

This was a concession, so I did not stop to object to the patronage. Indeed, there was not time, for the waiter was lingerng for our order and she was scanning eagerly the menu.

"Let us have clams first," I suggested, "or an oyster cocktail. You know this is the happy home of the oyster cocktail. They compound them at the Palace better than anywhere else in town. And we'll have pompano and and an artichoke salad and—"

"I'm hungry," she interrupted, "order anything you want but let me have a steak, only a steak will satisfy my cravings. Now tell me," she went on, "who they all are. Why, I see Mrs. Hearst with some young people over across the room there, and Mrs. Oelrichs and Virginia Fair also—who are the young women with them?"

"They are the Tobins," I replied.

"I met a Mr. Dick Tobin in London two years ago—a brother, I suppose." This by way of an aside. "But who are those people at the table opposite us? What a pretty, graceful woman she is."

"They are the Kruttschnitts, and that is H. E. Huntington lunching with them—railway people, you know. He took Mr. Towne's place as general manager of the Southern Pacific; and Mr. Huntington, of course, you know about him?"

"I know Mr. C. P. Huntington quite well," Mrs. Allen replied; "but go on; don't ask me questions. Who is that dear old lady who is ao evidently entertaining all those girls?"

"That is Mrs. Martin," I replied, "and the girls with her are Miss Goad and Miss McKenna and Mrs. MacIntosh — belles of our younger set. They come here nearly every Saturday. At the large table to your left I see a crowd of debutantes who are evidently having a luncheon given them. There is Miss Blakeman, Miss Keeny, Miss Marie Wells and Miss Polhemus."

"Bright, pretty, stunning little girls," commented my cousin, taking them all in carefully. "I'm sure, they'll make a good time for themselves. But go on. There are some smart people over there—who may they be?"

"To your right, there, in the corner, are Mrs. Willie Crocker and Princess Poniatowski. You used to know Beth Sperry. On the other side are Mrs. Gus and Mrs. Rudolph Speckels—two of the handsomest of the younger matrons. The slim, graceful girl who seems to be eating grape fruit with so much relish is Mrs. Joseph Tobin."

"Can we have grape fruit," interrupted my cousin, eagerly. "Let's. I like it fixed with plenty of sherry. Why——" she stopped and stared; "there is Major Rathbone just behind you. I have not seen him since we were in Paris years ago, and the Jack Parrotts also. Why, I don't feel like a stranger any more. I do hope the Major will remember me."

"You used to know Mrs. Tim Hopkins, if I remember aright. She's over there with her husband. There also is Mr. Crockett of the Gas Company," I put in.

Mrs. Allen was not listening. For a moment she was ruminating on the joys of reminiscence. "Why, the Hopkinses? Yes," she said; "and that must be Mr. Ed. Hopkins, far over there. Who is the slim, graceful, golden-haired girl with him?"

"That is his daughter, who made her debut last year," I returned.

"How time flies," she murmured, with a touch of pathos. "It is really the younger generation that has the floor here—the same as it is in New York and Baltimore. Society never stops still," she went on.

Just at this moment the grape fruit arrived for my cousin. I waited ere beginning my oyster cocktail.

"It is delicious—just right," she said. "I must get the recipe. Now for the cocktail. One can live in California," she murmured.

"That is what Herman Oelrichs says," I remarked. "You can dine as well here as at the Cafe Anglais or the Riche in Paris. Chauncey Depew and Cornelius Vanderbilt, who were here last year, said the steaks were the best they had ever eaten. But I forgot, how do you like that Sauterne?"

"It's excellent—a French wine, I suppose?" said Mrs. Allen, who has learned through the exertions of her husband to know some little about brands and vintages.

"Not a bit of it—Californian. You need not look astonished. We have improved enormously in our wine making of late. Most people who come now drink the California clarets and white wines. Your friend Tim Hopkins, I know, has to have the rarest clarets and Major Rathbone insists on his wine being from over the water, but most people who care for a sound wine, and are not epicures, are satisfied to drink Californian."

My dissertation was interrupted by the arrival of the fish.

"Pompano. I love it better than the trout, and have had none in years," said Mrs. Allen, with an accent of affectionate tenderness. "It brings me back to me the season at Santa Barbara, when I first met John."

John, parenthetically, is well known on Wall street, and is devoted to the support of my cousin and their progeny.

"But they do know how to cook it," she continued. "Really, Tom, you are right, and I don't wonder that everyone comes here. Tell me, are the entrees as good as the other things?"

"They have a battery of cooks," I answered her; "men for everything. You can order any imaginable combination, and they'll make it for you. Many of the habitual guests have pet dishes, which, though not on the bill of fare, are served to them at the most moderate cost. The majority of San Franciscans prefer chops and steaks. The highest art of the institution is lavished on the broiling of porterhouses and tenderloins. Wait 'till yours comes and you'll realize what I mean."

At that moment the servitor appeared, bearing our steaks—thick, tender, succulent, inimitably cooked. A tomato salad and fried sweet potatoes accompanied them—veritably a plat fit for a goddess. Mrs. Allen was impressed into silence for a moment.

"No, not even at the grill in the Hotel Cecil in London, will you find better broiling," she asserted authoritatively. "I do wish John were here to try it. Tell me, though, are their rates high here? Considering the service and attention and the splendor of the room they must charge well for what they give you."

"Look over the menu," I said, "you will see the extreme moderateness of everything. Besides, if you know how to order—how to select half portions—you can have a better dinner, at less cost, than at any of the less pretentious places. Besides they'll humor your appetite to a degree no other restaurant dreams of. That is why the epicures come here."

My cousin had satisfied her hunger and was leaning back in her chair with the contemplative air of one who had eaten to advantage.

"You must have an ice and Turkish coffee in the court," I suggested. "They make excellent ices here and you'll find the coffee admirable."

So we adjourned to the beautiful court yard and finished our luncheon under the shadow of a palm tree.

"For dinner to-night," said my cousin, "I've asked some old friends and shall experiment with the entrees."

"Don't forget that the game season has opened and you can have a canvassback duck," I suggested.

"How delightful," she said.

"And of course you don't know that they have recently lowered the price of champagne here," I added. Quarts are only $3.90 per bottle and pints $2. Might as well drink 'fizz" as claret now, if you prefer it."

"That's a first rate idea," approved Mrs. Allen. "I shall encourage them by ordering two quarts to-night."

With this charming prospect in view we separated. FALKLAND.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street.

THE THEATRES

"Hazel Kirke" at the Alcazar — Comedy at the Orpheum.

In vaudeville, as in everything else, there is often too much of a good thing, and a little too much of two good people has the Orpheum this week in Frank Lawton and Irene Franklin. Mr. Lawton comes on in a light summer suit, and if memory faileth not, a pretty pink shirt—at all accounts he is a contrast to the average male variety star. His whistling is well done and his imitation of Corbett a good bit of action, but he continues with a railroad take-off that is very tiresome and long drawn out. Herein is Mr. Lawton's folly, he should leave the train business and its alleged comedy alone. Miss Franklin is unconventionally fetching, and possess a demure way which at once attracts you. Her song about Sadie is rather catchy and prettily sung, but the coon effect is altogether without rythm or reason—a disagreeable thing that makes one forget all about neat little Sadie. Richard Pitrot, the man of many faces, adds to his last season's success with a few new makeups—notably Dr. Rottanzi and Claus Spreckels. The Smith Family are clever bicyclists and, with some new evolutions, make quite a hit.

FLORIDA KINGSLEY
The New Soubrette at the Alcazar

* *

Emotional drama seems to be better suited to the Alcazar company than comedy. This is apparent enough this week in the performance of "Hazel Kirke." And a good, even performance it is, with favors equally divided between Miss Foster and Mr. Gleeson. As the miller's daughter, Miss Foster may be said to be quietly effective—she has an amiable, gentle way of doing things. As for Mr. Gleeson—his Dunstan Kirke is a really good bit of work. Another clever man is Wallace Shaw, who, as Pittacus Green, misquotes the bard and knits up the ravelled domestic sleeve with equal felicity. Mr. Wright Huntington, the new leading man, plays Lord Travers as well as most leading men do, but the new soubrette, Miss Florida Kingsley, is somewhat better than the average Dolly Dutton. A line of commendation should be given Miss Gertrude Tidball—a small part has she as Clara, the maid, but she plays it brightly, though burdened with the traditional duster. H. S. K.

DRAMATIC NOTES

For the last week of the grand opera at the Tivoli the works announced are "Rigoletto" and "Il Trovatore," with a special Saturday matinee perfromance of "Lohengrin" for the benefit of Gustav Hinrichs. In "Rigoleto," Mertens will sing the jester, Michelena, the Duke, Mlle. Casals, Gilda, and Katherine Fleming Hinrichs, Magdalena. In "Trovatore," which is to be sung Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings, the principal parts will be assumed by Michelena, Mertens, Effi Stewart and Mrs. Hinrichs. "The Bohemian Girl" comes next and then "The Geisha."

After much postponing "Sue" is definitely announced for next Monday evening at the Columbia. The play has all the hearty flavor characteristic of Bret Harte—it has human interest, simplicity and humor. The Frawleys will likely give the piece a careful production. "Sue" will be played up to Friday, when "The Railroad of Love" will be given to run the balance of the week. Digby Bell in Augustus Thomas' "The Hoosier Doctor" comes next.

"My Friend From India" opens at the Baldwin Monday evening with the company originally engaged in the production. This comedy had a run of three months in New York. It is said to make one of the brightest and jolliest of performances. In the combination are Frederic Bond, John F. Ward, John P. Maher, Nita Allen, Helen Reimer and May Vokes. "Under the Red Robe" follows.

For next week the Alcazar announces Bartley Campbell's famous comedy, "French Flats." As it is some years since the piece was last presented here it will likely prove a novelty to many. Wright Huntington will play Reffeardini, the Italian singer; Wallace Shaw, Blondean, the landlord, and Miss Kingsley, the stage-struck Baroness. "Too Much Johnson" is in preparation.

In "Monte Cristo" at Morosco's next week, W. H. Pascoe, the new leading man, makes his first appearance. Mr. Pascoe made a reputation in connection with James O'Neill, with whom he has been associated for some years. He is said to be handsome and magnetic. The play itself will be handsomely mounted and suitably cast.

The next "Musical Evening" at Byron Mauzy Hall will occur Thursday, October 7th. It is to be a song recital, the program selected from American composers. The affair will be given by the pupils of Mr. Willard J. Batchelder, assisted by Miss Ida Lee Chase, impersonator, Mr. John W. Metcalf, pianist, and Mrs. Batchelder, accompanist.

A song recital is announced for October 15th at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium by Mrs. Alfred Abbey, who recently arrived from New York, where she has been giving a series of recitals. She sang at the Waldorf musicales, at the Seidl concerts, and in conjunction with Mme. Olitzka, M. Lasalle, and others.

Mme. Camilla Urso, who is about to return to New York, will appear in two farewell recitals in Golden Gate Hall, Thursday, October 14th and Sunday, October 17th.

The registered trade-mark, "The Cat and Barrel Brand" of Boord & Son, London, has been in constant use by them since 1851 on their Boord's Old Tom Gin and Orange Bitters. All persons found printing or using the same will be duly proceeded against by their agents Messrs. Charles Meinecke & Co.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. Far particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

In our Mechanics' Fair supplement, published recently, we alluded to the exhibit of Aunt Jemima's Pancake Meal. Other exhibits which Mr. Spohn had charge of were Wool Soap, Hire's Root Beer, Souder's Flavoring Extracts, and Instantaneous Tapioca. The Wool Soap babes afforded much amusement at the Fair, and attracted the attention of all visitors to the excellent article they handled. Hire's Root Beer boy was kept busy preparing drinks of that wholesome beverage for the crowd.

$2,000.00

Schilling's Best baking-powder is concentrated activity.

Schilling's Best tea is concentrated delicacy.

QUEEN LILY SOAP

Will not shrink Woolens, Flannels or the finest of Fabrics. The Best and Most Economical Soap Made. Washes Without Rubbing . . . .

PATRONIZE HOME INDUSTRY

Notice.—On receipt of 25 Queen Lily Soap wrappers, we will mail to any address a handsome picture, 15x20, free from all advertising matter.

NEW ENGLAND SOAP CO.
307 Sacramento St., S. F.

SATISFACTORY TO THE EYE AND EAR

BYRON MAUZY PIANOS
308-314 POST ST.

THE REAL COWBOY

History of the Long Trail and the Development of the Great Cattle Industry.

It is seldom that a subject and a style are so well matched as in "The Story of the Cowboy," by E. Hough (Appleton & Co.)—the latest volume of the "Story of the West" series. The writer's manner breathes the very best spirit of the old West; it suggests breadth, oxygen and freedom; here is no niggling, no uncertainty: the "story" moves on with a sturdy, resolute sweep and has many, many pages of really superb beauty. It is highly vitalized, is sincere and unexaggerated, yet so graphic that one's memory of the book consists of a series of pictures.

The subject is most comprehensively treated. The author begins with the old Spanish cattle-owners, their customs, needs, growth, the gradual pushing northwards of the great herds and the blazing of the "Long Trail" through Texas over the Indian nations, over Kansas, Colorado, Nebraska, Wyoming and Montana. This narrative of the evolution of the cattle industry is clear, powerful and most interesting. Some of the finest pieces of descriptive work in the book are to be found in the chapters on the ranches of the north and south, but they are much too long to be given here whole, and lose too much of their beauty if condensed. The cowboy, his clothes, his bridle, his saddle and his horse make very entertaining reading particularly for one who knows how accurate and acute Hough's observations are. He tells of a gentleman of foreign birth, but observing mind, who was expressing his opinion of the cowboy saddle with its high pommel and cantle, "I say, you couldn't jump a fence in that thing, you know," said this personage. "Stranger," said the cow-puncher, "this yer is God's country, an' there ain't no fences, but I shore think I could jump more fences than you could rope steers if you rid in that postage stamp thing of yourn."

One of the many passages in the book which shows Hough's intimate knowledge and feeling for his subject is the chapter on the cowboy's horse. The breaking of the cow-horse to the saddle is very vivid, and as accurate as a photograph. "The horse of the Moor," he says, "became the horse of the Spaniard. The horse of the Spaniard became the horse of the Spanish-Indian or Mexican, which in turn became the horse of the cattle trade. The animal found an environment similar to that which had produced its type in Northern Africa." Then follows a remarkable description of the evolution of the broncho:

For generation after generation it lost flesh and gained angles, lost beauty and gained "wind" and stomach and bottom and speed, until at the time of the first American cowboy's meeting with it it was a small, hardy, wiry, untamed brute, as wild as a hawk, as fleet as a deer, as strong as an ox. It had not the fist line of beauty. Its outline of neck was gone forever, merged into a hopeless ewe neck which looked weak though it was not. Its head was devoid of beauty of outline, often Roman nosed, but still showing fineness and quality in the front and muzzle. Its head was very poorly let on. Its ribs seemed a bit flat and its hips weak. Its back was roached up forward of the "coupling" in a pathetic way, as though the arch were in sympathy with a stomach perpetually tucked up from hunger or from cold. Its eye was not good to look upon, and its fore legs not always what one would ask of his favourite saddler. But suppose the stripping of Nature had been followed out until the bony framework of this plains horse had been laid quite bare, and the skeleton alone left in evidence, this skeleton would be a worthy study. The quality of the bone of this forearm would be found dense and ivorylike, not spongy as the bone of a big dray horse. The hoofs and feet hips would be found durable and sound. The cat-hammered hips seen to supplement that despised roach in the back, and we should have offered that grayhound configuration which is seen in all speedy animals where the arch of the back is marked and the hind legs set under and forward easily in running. Such an animal "reaches from behind" well in running, and turns quickly. Moreover, these flat-bladed shoulders would seem to be set on obliquely, which again one asks of his speedy dog or racing horse, if he knows the anatomy of speed. The shoulders play easily and freely, and the hind legs reach well forward, and the chest, though deep enough to give the lungs and heart plenty of room, is not too deep to interfere with a full extension of the animal and a free and pliant play of the limbs. In short the pony of the range as first seen by the American cowboy was not a bad sort of running machine. It had, moreover, the lungs built upon generations of rare pure air, the heart of long years of freedom, and the stomach of centuries of dry feed. It stood less than fourteen feet high, and weighed not more than six hundred pounds, but it could run all day and then kick off the hat of his rider at night. In form it was not what we call a thoroughbred, but in disposition it was as truly a thoroughbred as ever stood on two or four feet.

This was the cow-horse of the Southwest. It never attained the dignity of a name, though it might for purposes of identification be referred to as the "wall-eyed cayuse," the "star-faced sorrel," the "white-eyed clay-bank," or the "O. Bar horse from Texas."

The cow-punchers were named after the same fashion—"Cut-bank Bill," "Straight-goods Allen," etc., and cool customers they were too. This is the quarterly report a cow-puncher foreman sent to his eastern boss:

"Deer Sur: We have brand 800 caves this round up. we have made sum hay—potatoes is a fare crop—that Inglishman yu lef in charge at the other camp got to fresh an we had to kill the son of a ——. Nothin much has happened sence you lef—Yurs truely Jim."

A more democratic form of society never existed, fortunately, and it was always, it seems, an English who illustrated the fact:

Perhaps no better instance of this curious independence in the genuine cowpuncher could well be found than in the story of a certain ranch foreman, whom we may as well call Jim, and his relations with his employer, who, according to the story, was a foreigner, an Earl of something or other, who had come to America to engage in the cow business. It seems that upon the first day they spent upon the ranch together Jim appeared at the dinner table without any invitation, and moreover without removing his hat. The Earl objected not only to Jim's hat but to his presence, saying that he was not accustomed to dining with his servants. This was an error on the part of the Earl, really a most unfortunate remark to make, but in extenuation it should be added that he was not to be blamed so much for it, for he was a newcomer in the cow country and had had very little time to become acquainted with its ways. But this fact Jim did not pause to consider. Without protest or parley, he drew his revolver, and so beat the Earl about the head with it as nearly to kill him, though not so nearly, so says the story, as to prevent his apologizing freely.

"Why, that feller," said Jim, in a surprised and injured manner, when later speaking of the occurance, "he put on more airs than a cook! . . But," he added later, "he was all right after that, an' after a while he got to be a pretty good sort o' feller, fer an Englishman."

As a rule the cow-puncher is a silent man—useless off of a horse, and full of contempt for all walking and driving men. The best way according to his notion to get a log of wood into camp is to drag it at the end of his lariat! His cure for all disturbances is a gun, not a scattering gun, but a six-shooter. "His creed is one of hardihood, his shibboleth is the law, his etiquette is not to complain." In summing up the cowboy's amusements, Hough speaks of chasing coyote and bears with greyhounds. Will a greyhound, I wonder, attack a grizzly as he says. I think not. Certainly a full blood greyhound will not, though I have seen a cross on a Scotch deerhound attack a coyote, who is a pretty good fighter when brought to bay.

Of course the greatest opportunities the subject of cowboys and the days of old cattle kings affords the descriptive writer is when he comes to tell of round-ups, drives, drifts and stampedes, and these Hough treats in a masterly style. There is nothing better done in the book than the description of winter on a cattle range—truly magnificent prose:

One can see it now, the great cold landscape of the cattle range in winter. It is a picture of scant lighting and low values. The monochrome of winter, the blue-gray of cold desolation, oppresses it all. The white hills set on the further edge are cold and bluish. The sky above is forbidding with its sunless gray. The dust-grimed snow in the coulees is gray, and the uncovered soil of the wind-swept hill is gray and cheerless. Not a rift of light falls any where, not a touch of sun to soften the hard metalic composition. All the greens were gone long ago. The ragged and clutching hand of a sagebush reaches up in despair from the uncompromising desert, but it, too, is gray—gray with the withered spirit of the iron earth and icy air. The sky is even in its colors, except that now and then there scuds across it a strange and ominous thing, a wisp of flying white, misplaced and unregulated. For the air is altogether still. No breath waves the mane of this pony which stands on the little ridge, its head up and its gaze bent fixedly upon the horizon. There is something strange in the air. It is not so extremely cold, but the silence is so deep, so startling. Back of the very silence there is something, something of portent, of warning. Now and again a long shivering moan goes across the plain, borne from no one knows what origin. The image of dread is stalking forth this day. All animate nature feels it. Whither are going these great gray wolves, slouching along, their tails low, their heads over their shoulders, looking backward at this unseen pursuing thing? They do not trouble the cattle now, nor do the cattle fear them as they pass through. What, then, is it that the cattle dread, so that they sniff and snort and toss their heads, looking wildly toward the north as did this pony now? Written on this inscrutable dull sky there must be some awful sight invisible to human eyes. These wild creatures of the plains see it. They feel the dread. They know their weakness to meet this coming thing. They moan, the note of despair in their voices. They start now and then and run swiftly for a short distance, then turn and come back, pitching their heads high and bellowing. They lower their heads and shake them, and mutter hoarsely, with their muzzles near the ground, emitting their breath in sharp puffs.

Look! The breath of the cattle has grown white. It shines like fresh steam in the air. A moment ago the air was warm. And now that weird white scud flitted again across the sky, across the earth rather, low down, flying like some wraith of the mountains. Back there, upon the horizon where the cattle have looked so long, there arises a tiny cloud of white, soft, fleecy, innocent as the garb af a babe. Alas! It is the shroud of the range. It is the vestment of death for thousands of these creatures here!

It comes, this little cloud, rising and growing and spreading as though it were some vast curtain drawn quickly up and forward. Before it run long, ragged hissings in the air, and on the edge of the hissings fly always these scuds of the sky, little venomous spirits of fury, as they may now plainly be seen to be. With the mutterings of the gathering cattle, which now crowd together in the blind wish for aid and comfort, there blends the first low voice of the storm, a far-off sighing wail, of cadence at first indicative of anything but malice. This voice rises and then falls and is silent for a moment. It rises again, nearer and changed in import. It dominates the mingled voicer of the herd, now crowded together, their feet scuffling, their heads thrown high and confusedly. Again the storm speaks, this time very near, and as it falls a great sigh goes over the breast of Nature, the sigh for that which is to happen. It is the last warning, as useless as the others.

* * * * * * * * *

The herd moves! It recks not human guidance now, for the storm alone is its final guide and master. The storm orders it to move, and it obeys. With low moans and groanings of suffering and of fear there ensues a waving movement of the long blanket of white which has enshrouded the close-packed mass of cattle. They stagger and stop, doubting and dreading. They go on again and stop, and again they sway and swing forward, the horns rattling close upon each other, the heads drooping, the gait one of misery and despair. The drift has begun!

Lost in the drift are the two boys, and they know they may as well follow as stop. Indeed, they dare not stop, for to stop is to die. Down from their horses they go and battle on foot among the dull-eyed cattle. Over their hearts creeps always the heavy, wondering helpless feeling. They freeze, but soon cease to know they freeze. Their stiff legs stumble, and they wonder why. Their mouths are shut fast by the ice. The eyes of the cattle are frozen over entirely by the ice that gathers on their eyelids, and their hair, long and staring, shows in frosty filaments about their heads and necks. Icicles hang upon their jaws. They moan and sigh, now and then a deep rumbling bellow coming from the herd. The cows low sadly. The little calves bawl piteously. But on and on goes the drift, all keeping together for a time. And with it somewhere are the two cowboys, who should have known the import of the blizzard of the plains.

This horrible icy air can not long be endured by any living being, and soon the herd begins to string out into a long line, the weaker oues falling to the rear. If the cattle be strong and well-fed, they can endure any cold, but starvation has here been long at work. The horrible and inexorable law of Nature is going on. The strongest alone may survive. Those which fall back do not at first stop. They stagger on as far as they can. A little calf falls down, sinking first to its knees, and then dropping stiffly, its head still down the wind. Its mother stays with it, pushing at it with her own frozen muzzle. It can not get to its feet. The mother looks after the indistinct forms slowly disappearing in the driving mist of white, but goes no farther on. In the spring they will find the mother and calf together.

The chief aim of this book is to remove the false impression about the cowboy and put him before us not as the blood-thirsty bully which ordinary fiction makes him, but as he was—a virile, courageous, skilled laborer, whose word was his bond, whose sense of justice was his only law and his gun the only upholder of it.

H. B.

BOOK NOTES

George Manville Fenn's new book, "Cursed by a Fortune" (Rand, McNally & Co.), suggests all sorts of strange straits, many of which things come to pass in the course of the tale. The afflicted one is a young girl, Kate Wilton, whose father dies and leaves her a lot of money and a fortune-loving uncle. This avaricious relative wishes her to his son, while she prefers a poor but promising young physician, who loves the heiress, though his pride prevents him from declaring it. Finally, on the very last page but one, Kate loses her money, the doctor proposes, is accepted, and, we presume, they lived happy ever after.

The Frederick A. Stokes Company has evolved a new idea—or rather, the credit belongs to Arthur H. Young. It consists of a number of selections from American writers, with illustrations representing the different authors in the act of reading them. Extracts are taken from James Whitcomb Riley, Hamlin Garland, Eugene Field, Opie Reed, Ella Wheeler Wilcox, and several others of equal standing. It is all interesting reading, and with the accompanying biographies, is instructive as well.

In her "Essays on Social Topics" (Roxburgh Press), Lady Cook complains that woman has been too long enslaved, and that she has been the toy and victim of man. "But," she goes on, "the dawn of her emancipation has come—a few have already seen the light. The bonds which have enswathed woman's faculties are being loosened; soon may they drop off." Glad tidings, truly, for the fettered sex! But about the essays. Lady Cook holds forth on such topics as "True Love," "Who Should Propose?" and the "Morals of Authors." In this last essay, Lady Cook says genius and moral purity should be inseparable, but when they are not, it is unjust to condemn good work for its author's personal shortcomings.

"The Lady Charlotte," by Adeline Sergeant (Rand, McNally & Company), is in no manner remarkable. Indeed, any one of Lady Cook's effusions is preferable reading. Her ladyship is a middle-aged society woman with a liking for literature and athletics. She doesn't do anything remarkable, save begging someone's pardon in the last chapter—an unusual proceeding for Lady Charlotte. But the book is readable enough, and at least as harmless as Mellin's food.

Something more exciting is "That Affair Next Door," by Anna Katherine Green, (G. B. Putnam's Sons). This is one of the novels in which Mrs. Green specially delights—an exciting tale of a great robbery and its attendant unravelling. In this sort of work she is highly accomplished, and in her latest effort has put her detective instinct to a very satisfactory test.

The scene of "Yermah the Dorado," by Frona Eunice Wait (William Doxey), is in the Llama city, Llamco, existing on the site of San Francisco over eleven thousand years ago. For this reason, if for no other, the book is interesting. Yermah is a sort of child of promise, a veritable sun-god, qualified from his very nativity with the benificence of Jupiter. He rules his people wisely and well and when the end comes and his beloved land is darkened with destruction flings himself in a volcanic chasm. The story is strangly weird but is novel and interesting.

Consumption Cured.

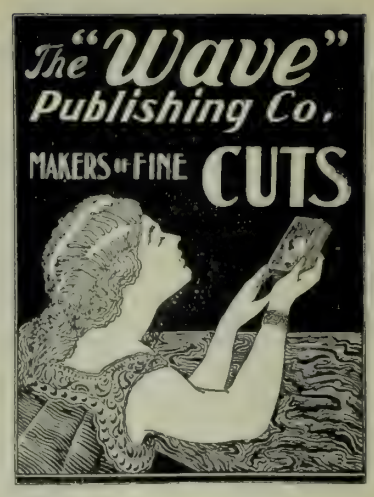
An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send, free of charge, to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

After a night with the boys: Bromo Kola.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

For latest styles in fall heckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.



24 Montgomery Street

SAN FRANCISCO

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. . ALSO . .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks

From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. . . Pacific Coast Sole Agents

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS ELECTRICAL CO

523 Mission St., San Francisco

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD LANE

LANE & LANE

Attorneys and Counselors

Room 202

Crocker Building, San Francisco

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, bookbinders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.

TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST

BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel

200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny

48 Eighth Street, or

St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets

Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

Trinity School, Accredited

3300 Washington street, S. F. Christmas term August 2, 1897. Prepares for College, University, and Business. Rev. Dr. E. B. Spaulding, Rector.

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.

UNDERTAKERS

641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb

Telephone Main 43

First Prize
Mechanics' Fair
FOR PURITY

CHALMERS' GELATINE

PACIFIC COAST AGENTS
Sherwood & Sherwood
SAN FRANCISCO
PORTLAND LOS ANGELES

CRESTA BLANCA WINES
AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT
THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION
OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA
Cresta Blanca Wines
OBTAINED THREE
WETMORE-BOWEN CO.
140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World
88,000 IN USE
SOLD ON EASY TERMS
BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents
16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE NAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.
S. STROZYNSKI
24 GEARY ST.
The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.
Telephone Main 5697.

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of
Artificial Stone in all its branches
Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty
Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS
Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.
Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package
Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored
E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

Football Prospects —The Recrudescence of the U. C. Team.

Disappointment is in store for the Reliance foot-ball team, I fear. Enrolled under its name and colors are some six or seven of last year's champion Olympic eleven. Should the P. A. A. follow the letter of the law these men will be debarred as the rules of the association deny a man the right to change allegiance without due notice, and the lapse of several months. That the club will be notified not to line-up the champions there is no doubt, but it remains to be seen if the association has the back-bone to enforce its ruling. If this order be made it will prevent the formation of any strong eleven outside the two colleges and rob us of an interesting preliminary season. Such a state of affairs would retard the development of the Varsity eleven, for the practice with strong outside teams is invaluable preparation for the Thanksgiving day game. It is to be hoped some way may be found out of this tangle that prevents the Olympic team from showing us more of the same good ball we had from it last year. But certainly this must not be accomplished at the expense of the amateur laws.

* *

All over the country on a hundred gridirons a thousand boys are being shaped into the teams that will bring joy or despair to their colleges. Here in California the season opened auspiciously. There seemed to promise a few months of good clean games, well fought, and moreover fought by elevens of gentlemen. California has taken the awful drubbing of last year to heart, and for the first time adopted a united, intelligent football policy, which if adhered to, will bring its reward. At Palo Alto they know that this year's game is not to be won so easily as last. They realize that California has awakened from her slumbers and know it will take the hardest work possible to win from the rejuvenated Berkeleyans. So Captain Cotton has taken his men in hand to make of them, what they were not last year, in spite of easy victory, a capable football team.

* *

The Olympic Club promised much, as its champion team of last year, undoubtedly the best eleven ever got together on the Coast, was almost intact, and the Reliance had an abundance of good men determined, under Frick's leadership, to win back their place at the top, from which the Olympians had forced them. To the delight of all lovers of the game, no unseemly wrangling marred the season's opening. A list of dates was drawn up and accepted as satisfactory. The usual squabble over players, the charges of professionalism and such unpleasantness as has disgraced the opening of so many seasons and dismembered so many teams, was absent. There was no airing of grievances in the newspapers, no talk of money. Altogether it did seem that better times had come and that both the ethical and playing standards were to be advanced. Just then the shadow of the Olympic Club fell across our hopes.

* *

How have the mighty fallen! The decadence of the Olympic Club is pitiful. Brought into existence to foster and advance amateur sport, it has become the hotbed of professionalism. The first born bartering his birthright for a mess of pottage is an edifying spectacle, compared to this elder brother trading glorious possibilities for the guidance and advancement of true sport for the thrilling delights to be gathered in a few evenings with professional sluggers. Once the winged "O" was an emblem of honor. Then the Olympic name stood for clean, capable athletics. Now that same emblem may be found posing as a tie-pin in the made-up cravat of some Potrero bartender, and the club's insignia has been seen decorating the bosoms of men with whom even a Potrero bartender might hesitate to associate. To-day every self-respecting member blushes for his club, and remains a member only because of what the club has been, perhaps in the vain, half-hearted hope that regeneration may come, but, under all, knowing that it will not until the inevitable happens and the institution is bankrupt.

* *

In this very bankruptcy lies the only hope of the Olympic Club, and if resignations are tendered as freely in the future as they have been in the past few months, financial failure lies not very far distant. I have it from the best authority that the present board has before it between two and three hundred resignations upon which it refuses to act, leaving the names on the roll that the discredit of so great a defection may fall, not on this board, but on the next. The vain attempt to have some respectable, responsible man accept the presidency of the club is public property. This repugnance to serve and this stream of resignations are signs of the coming revolt.

* *

The causes of this degeneracy are many, but they are rooted in the same will. The social element is a grievous thing, and the athletic club it attacks shall surely die. It has always been so—the cherry diamond of the old New York Manhattan Club was disgraced, and the club dismembered by it. Only prompt and radical action saved the New York Athletic Club; dozens of other examples might be cited if the Olympic Club were not a half dead demonstration at our doors, rendering other citations superfluous. The begining was a combination of ambition, carelessness and inadequacy. Ambition clamored for the finest club house in America, and—achieved it. The finest club house in America demanded money for its maintenance. Then came the first of a series of errors. The initiation fee was reduced from $75 to $25, but the influx was not rapid enough—down came the fee to $10. What an inducement! The social element saw its chance and carelessness allowed it. There was the rush of the narrow-chested sport and his friend "de bar-keep" for membership; then the card room and the billiard hall waxed at the expense of the gymnasium, and the Olympic minstrels became the public representatives of an athletic club that once had counted its champions by the score. Three out of five who paid ten dollars for admission to the club knew or cared nothing for true athletics. A sanguinary boxing-match, with one man "on the floor" at the end, was their ideal of physical culture. And for their edification was hired the amateur boxers who demand $75 for training expenses and guarantee a knockout. From this to the management of prize-fighters was but a step. So far as the honesty of it, a step in advance.

* *

The fact is the Olympic Club is no longer fish nor fowl, nor yet good red herring—neither an athletic club nor a social club. It is formless and void, has no policy, and is so governed that no board of directors is retained long enough to formulate one. They are crying for a moneyed Moses to lead them out of the wilderness of debt. Money? pshaw! that's what ails them. What they need is a man—one whose heart is in athletics and who has clean hands—a man who is honest, capable, shrewd and far-seeing. John Elliott or Wm. Greer Harrison could do more than all the money in the city to put the club back where it belongs, but it won't follow such men. The most heroic thing since the day Horatius held the bridge, has been John Elliott and Will Humphreys, battling, unaided, against professionalism, having to fight the very men who should have been their staunchest allies. Shoulder to shoulder they have battled, and the improving status of amateurism is due more to these two than to any other cause. Their names should be honored by every man who is proud of good fighters for a good cause.

* *

The club ignores Elliott and the men he represents—the only men who belong to it by right of athletic interest. By weakness of administration and lack of policy, Mr. Kennedy, the secretary of the club, is allowed to dominate and control it. Personally, Mr. Kennedy is a charming, affable gentleman. He knows his power, and intends to exercise it for the club's best interests—more—he believes that he does. Unfortunately, however, his early athletic training was confined to association with professional baseball players and his later, to the management of prize fights, both of which institutions he has since fostered under the Olympic Club's name and colors. When one stops to consider that Mr. Kennedy makes the policy of the club—no, I am wrong, is the policy of the club—its tendency to professionalism is explained. Carelessness let him gain this power in the club and inadequacy permits him to retain it.

* *

With a new deal, under other conditions, its magnificent club house ought to help the Olympic Club to be the antithesis of what it is—it ought to be—but of that, of what its founders meant it to be, and what its well-wishers hope to see it more next week.

ROBERT PORTER.

---

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

The great Vienese music-teacher, Leschetitzky, who is best known through the fame of his pupil, Paderewski, is a most excitable and irritable person. Two clever young pianists were waiting their turns in the Maestro's anteroom, and heard Leschetitzky shouting—almost screaming—over a third maiden, who was having her lesson. "Heavens!" said one of the maidens, "he is bad to-day, and must be tired. What shall I do, for I'm next?" The other replied gloomily: "And me? I'm still later!" Just then the door opened, and the third girl appeared, looking radiant. "Then you've not had a bad lesson?" the others chorused. "No, indeed," was the reply. "He was telling me how much greater Paderewski might have been than he is, if he had carried out faithfully all his master's instructions."

Among the Boers it is customary in periods of drought to pray for rain. The author of "On Veldt and Farm" tells of a congregation of Presbyterians who demanded of their minister that, in view of an impending dry season it were well to approach the Almighty on the subject of rainfall: "I will not insult the Almighty," replied the sturdy Scot, "by asking such a favor of Him after the way in which you have let His past mercies run away from you." The rebuke was leveled at the inadequacy of the water storage.

$100—Reward—$100

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.
Address F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.
Sold by druggists, 75c.

Do You Want Gold?

Everyone desiring to keep informed on Yukon, the Klondyke and Alaskan gold fields. Send 10 cents for large Compendium of vast information and big color map to Hamilton Publishing Company, Hamilton, Indiana.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

GET THE GENUINE ARTICLE!
Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast COCOA
Pure, Delicious, Nutritious.
Costs Less than ONE CENT a cup.
Be sure that the package bears our Trade-Mark.
Walter Baker & Co. Limited,
(Established 1780) Dorchester, Mass.

Trade-Mark.

"GOLD SEAL"
"BADGER"
"PIONEER"
Rubber Goods
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION
GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.
MANUFACTURER OF
OIL CLOTHING
R. H. PEASE
Vice-President and Manager
573-575-577-579 Market Street
SAN FRANCISCO
73-75 First Street, Portland, Or.

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

Baldwin Theatre

AL. HAYMAN & CO. (Inc) . . . . . Proprietors

Monday Evening, October 4th

Every Evening, including Sunday, Engagement Extraordinary, limited to two weeks, of the now Famous and Original

Smyth & Rice Comedy Company

Presenting the reigning New York Comedy sensation of the year, entitled

My Friend From India

From the pen of H. A. DuSouchet

Columbia Theatre

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers

Last performance Sunday Night of
Don't Tell Her Husband

Commencing Monday, October 4th, Farewell Week

THE FRAWLEY COMPANY

Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday Evenings
First production here of Bret Harte's Great Play SUE

Friday, Saturday and Sunday Evenings and Saturday Matinee .....By special request The Railroad of Love

October 11th, Digby Bell and Laura Joyce in
The Hoosier Doctor

Orpheum

Week beginning Monday, Oct. 4th

O'BRIEN & HAVEL, Comedy Acrobat and Soubrette Direct from Europe, THE ADOLPHI TRIO presenting their improved Flying Horizontal Bar Performance

MLLE. ALEXIA BASSIN, Prima Donna from Vienna Retained by request, FRANK LAWTON, Whistling Comedian

Great success of CLAYTON, JENKINS & "JASPER" and the SMITH FAMILY

Last week of Irene Franklin, El Zobedie and Adrienne Ancion. New selections by the Knaben-Kapelle

Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House

MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager

Commencing Monday Evening, Oct. 4th
Last week of the Grand Opera Season

GRAND VERDI FESTIVAL

Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday Evenings The Lyric Drama, Rigoletto

Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday Even'gs, Il Trovatore

Saturday Afternoon, Grand Opera Matinee Testimonial to GUSTAV HINRICHS

Next week, by special request, The Bohemian Girl An All-Star Cast!

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : : : : : Manager

Evenings at 8:15. Matinee at 2:15
Week beginning Oct. 4th. Usual Matinee Saturday

A Comedy! A Clever Comedy!
A Mirth-Provoking Comedy!

FRENCH FLATS

Version revised up to date
Has not been here in ten years
Twenty Comedians to act it

Prices, including Reserved Seat, 50, 35, 25, 15c

Have your seats reserved by Telephoning Black 1106

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last performances of the Great Melodrama
Lights and Shadows

Commencing Monday, October 4th, Grand Production of the Great Melodramatic Romance

MONTE CRISTO

With the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H. PASCOE, in the title role. This gentleman has been James O'Neill's leading support for the past six years.

Beautiful Scenery! Wonderful Mechanical Effects! A Perfect Production!

Evg. Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA
ELECTRICAL WORKS
409 MARKET STREET

WEDDING INVITATIONS
New Style Visiting Cards
HARTWELL, MITCHELL & WILLIS
Successors to Dodge Bros.
STATIONERS, ENGRAVERS, BOOKSELLERS
107 Montgomery and 225 Post Street

FINANCE AND TRADE

The Money Market — Corporation Stocks — Trade Notes.

Thursday evening.

It is the intention of this journal to devote a separate column each week in future to financial and trade matters of special interest. The improved feeling in commercial circles, now generally accepted as a proof of returned prosperity, makes the time opportune for this new departure, which is believed likely to be appreciated by a large number of readers.

The recent advance of the discount rates in London and the announcement by the Bank of England of its willingness to utilize silver to a certain degree for the purpose of its reserves have both been factors in directing special attention to the movements in the London market. The rise in silver has not been maintained—gold imports from Europe and Australia have in some measure aided in meeting the drain on Eastern centers for the needs of the harvest in the Middle and Western States. The impending foreclosure of the Union Pacific mortgage will make an unusual demand on the open market, however, and the prospects are on the whole in favor of dearer money in the immediate future. At the same time with the visible expansion of the resources of the country and the generally improved condition of trade, there need be no apprehension in regard to sufficiency of funds for legitimate enterprises.

The speculative tendency of the New York stock market has recently been corrected by the action of the banks in requiring holders dependent on them for support to reduce their commitments, with the result that a lower and safer range of values has been established. The further effect of this action is to loosen the banks' resources for employment in assisting harvest operations, which are, of course, entitled to the preference, when it becomes necessary to make a choice.

At the local Stock and Bond Exchange there has been but little doing. Prices have been well maintained, and bonds of the best class have been hard to obtain.

The purchase by a local syndicate of $6,000,000 5 per cent bonds of the San Francico and San Joaquin Valley Railroad, to which reference was made in our editorial columns of last week, will shortly lead to the listing of an important new security in this market, and when the bonds are made available for public investment there is no doubt they will be readily absorbed.

Owing to the case now before the Supreme Court the Spring Valley Water Company's stock has been subjected to unusual fluctuation, having fallen from 100½ to as low as 97 at one time. During the last few days the opinion has been pretty general amongst financial men that the decision of Judge Wallace is likely to be reversed by the Supreme Court, and in consequence prices have recovered somewhat and are now quoted 99¼ to 99½. Should this impression prove correct the stock will go to 101 or 102. If, on the other hand, the Court should confirm Judge Wallace there will be a decided break in the market for Spring Valley, which will assuredly be reflected in all leading corporation stocks.

The shares of all banks show decided improvement, especially the Bank of California, which has advanced from 236 to 240, with a prospect of a still further enhancement in value, owing to the assurance of increased earnings due to a prosperous year. Savings Banks shares have participated in the improvement also, and are bound to be influenced still further by the bright outlook throughout the State.

Market-St. Railway shares have been in good demand at 48¼ to 48½ a share, the highest price known for some time. Receipts have been growing, a position that has rendered shareholders sanguine of increased dividends, but these are hardly likely to be declared.

In the miscellaneous division Sugar stocks are looking well on annexation prospects in Hawaii. Should this eventuate a sharp rise will certainly ensue.

On the whole the general market is very firm and a higher scale of prices throughout is confidently expected.

The grain markets have been showing weakness after the recent period of excitement, but at the moment the feeling is stronger again.

Tonnage in port, loading and chartered, represents about the same total as last year, with an excess of 30,000 tons on the berth disengaged and a fleet of 209,000 tons to arrive as against 219,200 same time last year.

In the local live stock market prices are strong and advancing in sympathy with Chicago and other centers, being 25 to 35 per cent higher than those current last spring.

TURF TOPICS

Coming Race Meetings — Shipments of Yearlings to New York.

The autumn meeting of the Pacific Coast Trotting Horse Breeders' Association in now in progress at Oakland, and on Wednesday the 2:13 trot was won by Caryle Carne (McDowell), best time 2:13¼.

The weather changed on Thursday last making the track soft and lessening the attendance, which has not been any too good. Next week the circuit removes to San Jose.

There seems to be a fair prospect of a good meeting at Los Angeles from October 14th to October 23d. The events provided for are both running and trotting, and the management expects to draw better crowds than have ever been seen on their track.

---

As the time for the opening up of our legitimate season draws near the eyes of Eastern racing men are turned towards the West. While California has at all times attractions to offer which are superior to those afforded at New Orleans, the yellow fever at the latter point is likely to cause many of those who might otherwise have decided to winter there to turn their steps this way. One thing the racing public may feel sure of is that we are going to have the best sport at Ingleside and Oakland that those tracks have ever seen.

Horses are beginning to arrive here for the campaign, and as a rule proceed to Ingleside, as the Oakland track is not yet open for their accommodation. At the former place many improvements have been made, including the new steeplechase course, and the number of animals now being worked on the ground gives the place quite a lively appearance again.

---

On the 3d instant a special train will leave Rancho del Paso with thirty-two thoroughbred yearlings, the get of imp. Sir Modred, imp. Golden Garter, imp. Watercress and other prominent sires, for New York, where they will be sold by the Easton Company on the 14th instant. By the same opportunity Mr. W. O'B. Macdonough is having three Ormonde yearlings sent East, where they will be prepared for their two-year-old career. They consist of a colt out of imp. Countess of Langden by Kingcraft, a colt out of Jongleuse by Alarm and a filly out of Dizzy Blonde by Chillicothe. The trio are exceedingly promising.

The English-bred stallion Islington, brother to Isinglass, goes on the same train and on arrival at New York, will be shipped to his breeder, Captain McCalmont, M. P., to share the duties of the stud with Isinglass. The return of this horse to his native land is a loss to American breeding, as such stock as he has got here, that have had any chance at all, promise well. Captain McCalmont is pleased with the Islington youngsters that were shipped over to him, and will be glad to have the horse back.

---

The weights for the two great autumn handicaps in England are of unusual interest to American racing men. In the Cesarewitch (2 miles, 6 fur. and 30 yds.) run at Newmarket on October 13th. Winkfield's Pride is top weight 130 lbs., Galtee More 129 lbs., Masque II 119 lbs. and the two Americans, Keenan 103 lbs. and St. Cloud II 98 lbs.

In the Cambridgeshire (1 mile and 240 yds.) run at the same place on October 27th, Clorane is top weight 136 lbs., Winkfield's Pride 133 lbs., Galtee More 132 lbs., Count Schomberg 132 lbs, Masque II 120 lbs., and the Americans Diablo 116 lbs., Keenan 106 lbs., Sandia 106 lbs., Voter 105 lbs., Berzak 103 lbs,, St. Cloud II 98 lbs. and Mack Briggs 94 lbs. In this event this country is well represented and should make a good showing. According to the latest betting returns that have reached here Mr. Keene's St. Cloud II was second favorite in the betting on the strength of his showing in the St. Leger, in which he was third. Looking at the way the race was run and the weak field, that, however, is not much to go by.

---

It is reported that Mr. J. R. Keene has purchased from Mr. M. F. Dwyer the thoroughbred stallion, Kingston, by Spendthrift, out of imp. Kapanga, as an addition to his Castleton stud in Kentucky. The price is said to have been $25,000.

---

Amongst the high-priced lots at the recent Doncaster (England) sales were a colt by St. Simon out of Plaisanterie, $17,200; colt by St. Simon out of Mimi by Barcaldine, $11,500, and the following by Kendal, the sire of Galtee More: colt out of Pixie by Blair Athol, $9,250, and filly out of St. Marguerite by Hermit, $15,000.

BENEDICT.

TRIPLE BALLADE.

[A triple ballade is really a remarkable achievement in versification. This is rather an instance of verbal dexterity than an evidence of poetical sentiment, but is unique of its kind. There is not in the language another triple ballade. In this poem there are forty-eight rhymes of one sound and twenty-four of another. To find those and so weave them together as to make readable verse, shows unusual capacity.]

---

My Pegasus begins to shy
Already at this triple lay;
I've made him often soar as high,
But not by such a doubtful way,
As I intend he shall to-day;
It almost makes me hesitate
Myself, and fills me with dismay,
But everything must bend to fate.

A rather ancient saw, but I,
Whatever I may have to say,
Take up the words that nearest lie,
And as the potter molds the clay,
I try to make them fit, though they
Are sometimes slow to match and mate,
And often sadly gang a-gley;
But everything must bend to fate.

And yet there is no reason why
We should in senseless numbers flay
The willing words, which waiting by,
Stand ready always to obey;
It seems a pity to betray
Them thus, and with such folly freight,
When nobler thoughts they might convey,
But everything must bend to fate.

And yet she leads us oft awry,
And is elusive as a ray
Of sun in April (when the sky
Is hung with curtains dark and gray)
Which bursts upon us from the "blae:"
Methinks I'm in a sorry strait,
When thus to Scotland I must "gae,"
But everything must bend to fate.

And yet I would a moment sigh,
And rest beside the "Bank and brae
Of Bonny Doon" and linger nigh
Where Bobby Burns was wont to stray;
Where bird and stream and blossomed spray
With rapture he did contemplate;
'Twere sweet my homage there to pay,
But everything must bend to fate.

And Pegasus begins to ply
His pinions—he must smell his hay;
But homeward he will safely fly,
Not like those pigeons of Andree;
Poor fellow! when his last conge
Was said, and when he did inflate
That big balloon, he left for aye;
But everything must bend to fate.

For gold and glory men defy
The Arctic winter's rigid sway;
Or under tropic suns will fry,
Or mingle in the battle fray;
And though an angel said them "Nay"
They'd think she did but idly prate
Of death, disaster, and decay;
But everything must bend to fate.

I wish I'd not begun to try
Upon these rhymes so much to play;
I may for quarter have to cry,
Or voyage down to Paraguay,
For if with English I must stay,
The language is inadequate,
Like gown too much decollete;
But everything must bend to fate.

Now in this verse I do or die,
Ah no! the Envoy waits to slay
My hopes, and smite me hip and thigh;
Why should .. be a sine qua
In ballades always? Yet c'est vrai,
In it the rhyme we dedicate
Either to prince or popinjay:
But everything must bend to fate.

L.. .OY.

Prince! take this bad ballade, I pray,
Though on thy gracious ear it grate;
Thanks for that doubtful yawning "Yea"—
But everything must bend to fate.

—LOUIS A. ROBERTSON.

Helen of Troy.

I am that Helen, that very Helen
Of Leda born in the days of old;
Men's hearts were as inns that I might dwell in;
Houseless I wander to-night and cold.
Because man loved me, no god takes pity,
My ghost goes wailing where I was Queen;
Alas, my chamber in Troy's tall city,
My golden couches, my hangings green!
Wasted with fire are the halls they built me,
And sown with salt are the streets I trod.
Where flowers they scattered, and spices spilt me—
Alas, that Zeus is a jealous god!
Softly I went on my sandals golden;
Of love and pleasure I took my fill;
With Paris' kisses my lips were holden,
Nor guessed I, when life went at my will,
That the Fates behind me went softlier still.

—NORA HOPPER.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY
SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas..... | 4 00 am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Stmr. Pomona, 2 p.m. October 1, 5, 9, 13, 18, 22, 26, 30; November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28.

For Newport, Los Angeles and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Oct. 1, 5, 9, 13, 17, 21, 25, 29 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, Redondo--Los Angeles--and Newport, at 11 a.m. Oct. 3, 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27, 31 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, Stmr. Orizaba, 10 a.m. the 2d each month.

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Sept. 7, 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.
S. S. "Moana," for Australia, Thursday, October 14, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO., General Agents

POTOSI MINING COMPANY—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Storey County, Nev.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 8th day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 48) of Twenty-five Cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 13th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 4th day of November, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the cost of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. CHAS. E. ELLIOTT, Secretary.

Office, room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

---

ANDES SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 1st day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 44) of Ten Cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the offices of the company, rooms 20-22 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 4th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 25th day of October, 1897, at 1 o'clock p.m., to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOHN W. TWIGGS, Secretary.
Office, rooms 20-22, Nevada Block, 509 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

---

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—In the matter of the application of the SITES SANDSTONE COMPANY (a corporation) to dissolve: Notice is hereby given that the Sites Sandstone Company, a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, has presented to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco an application praying to be allowed to disincorporate and dissolve, and that Monday the 11th day of October, A. D. 1897, at 10 o'clock a.m. of said day, has been appointed as the time, and the Courtroom of Department No. 7 of said Superior Court, New City Hall, San Francisco, California, as the place, at which said application is to be heard.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said Superior Court this 8th day of September, A. D. 1897.

C. F. CURRY, Clerk.
By Joseph Riordan, Deputy Clerk.
VAN NESS & REDMAN, Att'ys for Petitioners.

Bids for Concessions and Privileges in Yosemite Valley.

OFFICE OF THE YOSEMITE COMMISSIONERS
San Francisco, August 10, 1897.

In accordance with Rule XXXIV of the Rules and Regulations governing Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove, adopted July 13, 1896, sealed bids are hereby invited for the following concessions and privileges in the Yosemite grant, for the year beginning November 1, 1897, and ending October 31, 1898, viz.:

First—For keeping a livery stable and conducting a general livery business in the Valley, and also for the rental of the Royal Arch Farm and Stables.

Second—For rental of stable and coachhouse on Georgia Avenue (stage headquarters).

Third—For rental of hotel, out-buildings and grounds at Glacier Point, and privilege of conducting a hotel business at that point.

Fourth—For rental of store building and privilege of conducting a general merchandise business in the Valley.

Bids must be presented to the Secretary on or before Monday, October 12, 1897, at 12 o'clock m., at the office of the Commissioners, San Francisco.

Bids must be accompanied by sufficient guarantee that contract shall be carried out by bidders to the satisfaction of the Commissioners. The Commissioners reserve the right to reject any and all bids.

JOHN F. SHEEHAN,
Secretary and Treasurer.
Room 25, Tenth Floor, Mills Building, San Francisco.

---

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California—In the matter of the Estate of Eudora A. Chambers, sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers, deceased.

Notice is hereby given that Monday the 18th day of October, A.D. 1897, at 10 o'clock a.m. of said day, and the Courtroom of Department No. 10 of said Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said Eudora A. Chambers, sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers, deceased, and for hearing the application of Robert C. Chambers for the issuance to him of Letters Testamentary thereon.

Dated September 23d, A.D. 1897.

CHARLES F. CURRY, Clerk.
[SEAL] By V. F. Northrop, Deputy Clerk.

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Attorney for Petitioner,
Crocker Building, San Francisco.

---

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Alta Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 57
Amount per share, 10 cents
Levied Sept. 3, 1897
Delinquent in office Oct. 6, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Oct. 27, 1897

J. E. JACOBUS, Secretary.
Office, room 33, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Belcher Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 56
Amount per share, 20 cents
Levied September 18, 1897
Delinquent in office, October 21, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Nov. 11, 1897.

C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.
Office, room 37, Mills Building, San Francisco.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

THE LATEST STYLES IN

CHOICE WOOLENS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel

Bicycle and Golf Suits

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

Guarantee Capital and Surplus - $2,040,201 66
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash - 1,000,000 00
Deposits December 31, 1896 - - - 27,730,247 45

OFFICERS

President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS

B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

Deposits December 31, 1896 - $22,885,377
Paid Up Capital and Surplus - 1,594,503

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS

GEORGE W. BEAVER — ROBERT WATT
THOMAS MAGEE — GEO. C. BOARDMAN
W. C. B. DE FREMERY — DANIEL E. MARTIN
ALBERT MILLER — GEO. TASHERA
E. B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

Paid Up Capital . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . 25,000

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary.
A. J. CARMANY, Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726

Capital Paid Up, $3,416,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

B. J. SMITH, Assistant Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
301 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

The Lion Fire Insurance Co. Limited of London. Total Cash Assets in United States, $885,797.09

The Imperial Insurance Co. Limited of London Established on Pacific Coast in 1852

WM. J. LANDERS, Resident Manager

PACIFIC COAST BRANCH

205-207 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

The publishers of this epistle, The American Field, declare it authentic, but it bears earmarks of humorous construction. It was received by a certain bicycle company from its Kansas agent:

"Deer sirz: I live on mi farm near Hamilton, Kan., am 57 years old, and just a little sporta My neffew in Indian bot hisself a new bisickle and sent me his old one by frate, and ive learned to ride sume. Its a pile of fun, but my bisicle jolts considerable. A feller came along yesterday with a bisicle that had hollow injun robber tires stuffed with wind. He let me try hissen, and mi, it run like a kushin! He told me you sell injun robber just the same as hissen. How much will it be to fix mine up like hissen? Mine is all iron wheels. Do you punch the hollow hole threw the injun robber, or will I have to do it myself? How do you stick the ends together after you get it done? If your injun robber is already holler will it come any cheaper empty? I can get all the wind I want out here in Kansas free.

"Eberneezer Y. Jenson.

"P. S.—How much do you charge for the doodad you stuff the wind into the robber with, and where do you start?"

Outside of McVicker's Theatre in Chicago hangs a picture of the comic vocalist, Andrew Mack, who sang with such great success at the Irish Fair in New York last year. It is a gorgeous lithograph, and represents the distinguished singer confronting an immense concourse of people, who crowd boxes, orchestra, gallery, and even the stage itself. Underneath the picture are the words: "Andrew Mack singing to ten thousand people." A small boy who failed to obtain ingress to the show stood outside one night taking in, with obvious disappointment, the surroundings. He saw the picture, gazed at it intently for several minutes, then sauntered over towards the box office, and remarked, with his finger pointed witheringly at the lithograph: "Dat's a skin." "Why?" asked the astonished treasurer. The small boy answered with magnificent contempt: "Ten thousand people nit! Dere's five hundred and tree. I've counted dem."

When John Drew and his brother were playing at Troy, many years ago, their manager, by way of experiment, sent the company to Cohoes. The preliminaries of hall-hire and advertising had been attended to, and at seven o'clock Frank Drew went to consult the doorkeeper as to the audience. "About fifty gents have gone in," he said, "but they didn't give me any tickets." "That's curious," said Drew. "Yes," said the doorkeeper; "each one came to the door, said Cataract, and walked past me. It must be raining dreadfully outside." "Not a bit of it," said Drew; "but I'll find out what the matter is." He stepped inside and said to the audience: "Gentlemen, you must excuse my ignorance, as I am a stranger in town, but will somebody inform me what is the meaning of the word 'cataract' which you have all used here to-night?" "Why, that's the name of our newspaper!" somebody spoke up.

Millais, the painter, was seated at dinner next a gushing maiden, to whom he had not been introduced. She finished her soup and dashed into conversation. "I suppose," she said to her neighbor, "you have been to the Academy?" "Yes," replied the painter. "Then you saw the Millais? What awful daubs! I can't imagine how such things get hung." There was a hush round the table, and an amused smile. The girl colored, and said to Millais: "For Heaven's sake, what have I said? Do tell me!" "Not now," replied the artist. "Eat in peace and I'll let you know later." She obeyed, silently. When dessert came he turned to her and said: "The fact is, I'm Millais. But let's be friends."

The Atlanta Constitution tells how a minister got even with a mean man, who had invited him to dinner. The mean man had plenty of money, but he didn't spend it on his table, which on that occasion showed but scant fare. "Parson," said the mean man, "times are hard an' groceries high; but, sich as it is, you're welcome. Well you ax a blessin'?" "I will," replied the parson; "fold your hands." And then he said: "Lord, make us thankful for what we are about to receive—for these greens without bacon, this bread without salt, this coffee without sugar, and after we have received it give Thy servant strength too get home for dinner."

A Western jurist, having been elected a Justice of the Peace, straightway forebore using the pronoun "I," and, save in the bosom of his family, spoke of himself officially. One day an inebriated youth was brought before the judge, who, with great impressiveness, thus addressed him: "Young man, when this court was about your age it sometimes indulged in drink, in consequence of which it nearly committed, on one occasion, the crime of murder upon one of the court's second cousins. But the court saw the error of its ways, reformed and in time was elected judge, as you now see.

Even at the period of his greatest glory, Murat's deep love for his mother, who had kept a small inn while her son was growing up, evinced itself. While King of Naples, he received a new order from Napoleon, and the investiture was made the occasion of a grand ceremony. Next day Murat repaired to his mother's home to tell her about the affair. The old woman listened in silence, and then said, with a sigh: "Yes, they'll put so much on the donkey's back that he will be crushed by the weight of his load!"

"Molly, said some one to the little daughter of a clergyman, "does your father preach the same sermon twice?" I think perhaps he does," returned Molly cautiously; "but I think he talks loud and soft in different places the second time, so it doesn't sound the same at all."

MATCHLESS IN EVERY FEATURE

THE CONSENSUS OF OPINION REGARDING

The Ladies' Grill-Room

..OF..

The Palace

Direct entrance from Market Street. Open until Midnight.

St. Denis

Broadway and Eleventh St. NEW YORK

OPPOSITE GRACE CHURCH

EUROPEAN PLAN

In a modest and unobtrusive way there are few better conducted hotels in the Metropolis than the St. Denis.
The great popularity it has acquired can readily be traced to its unique location, its homelike atmosphere, the peculiar excellence of its cuisine, and its very moderate prices.

William Taylor & Son.

Hotel Bella Vista

1001 PINE STREET

Elegant Furnishings and Apartments

DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED

MRS. A. F. TRACY.

Hotel Rafael

SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Society Resort, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Climate Unexcelled!
Magnificent Scenery!
The Sanitarium of the Pacific Coast
Otis Elevators Electric Lights

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments

R. H. WARFIELD CO.

Proprietors

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F.
Telephone 305

OFFICER—"A new case, your honor. This gentleman only wishes to tell you that a five-cent piece of Piper Heidsieck Plug Tobacco is now forty per cent. larger than it used to be."

Every Good Judge of chewing tobacco knows—and has known for years—that Piper Heidsieck Plug Tobacco is the best that has ever been produced. The only argument ever made against it has been its cost—but this argument is a thing of the past. The five-cent piece has been enlarged forty per cent. and every one can now afford this delicious luxury. Why use the ordinary brands?—when five cents will buy one of the new large sizes of

Piper Heidsieck

Plug Tobacco (Champagne Flavor)

THE WAVE

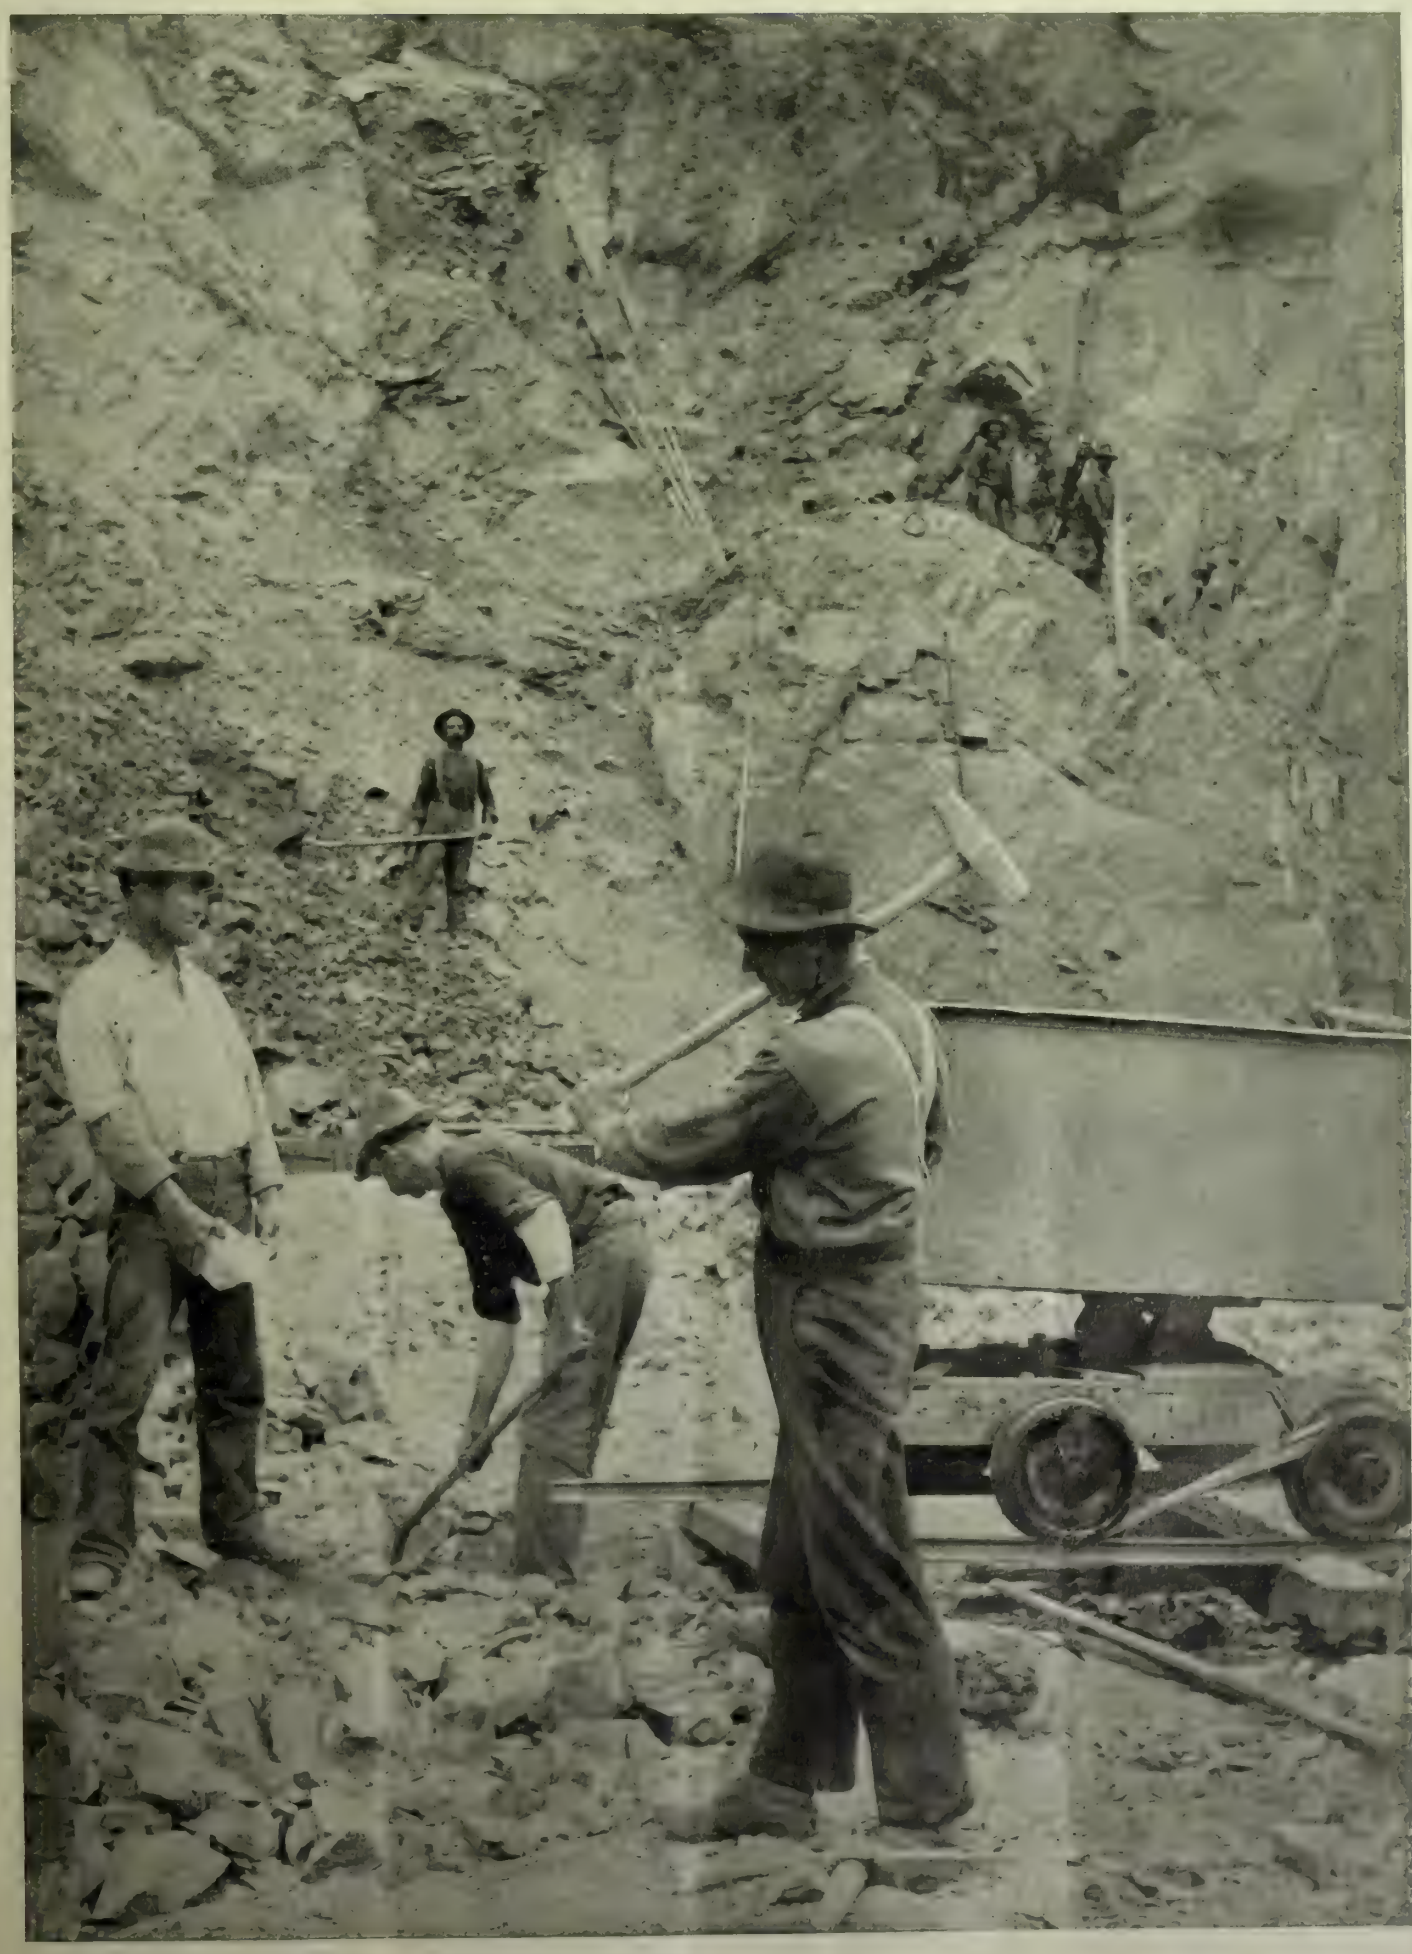
VOL. XVI. No. 41 SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 9, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS



A SAN FRANCISCO BLUE-ROCK QUARRY

See page 6

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 9, 1897

CONTENTS

| | |
|---|---|
| Editorials | 2-3 |
| The New Ostracism in Kansas; by David Starr Jordan | 3 |
| Turgenev's Letters; by William Henry Hudson | 3 |
| "Miracle Joyeux": a story by Frank Norris | 4 |
| Great Britain's Premier; by G. L. B. | 5 |
| Our Quarrying Industry | 6 |
| Things and People, by Boswell Jr. | 6 |
| How San Francisco Lives; by John Bonner | 7 |
| The California Camera Club's Outing | 8 |
| In Alameda | 6 |
| A Debutante's Diary | 10 |
| The Theatres | 11 |
| "The Federal Judge": a Review by C. | 12 |
| Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter | 13 |
| Turf Topics; by Benedict | 14 |
| Financial Review | 14 |
| New Stories Re-Told | 16 |

THE PRESS AND PUBLIC OPINION.

President Jordan, of Stanford, is certainly performing a distinct public service outside the line of his duties as president of a great college. He is gradually leading this rather headstrong, comparatively new and somewhat thoughtless community, into the habit of thinking. Whenever he appears in public print, or on the lecture platform he gives utterance to some terse, pointed, oftentimes startling, statement that is calculated to puncture a popular fallacy, or which effectively expresses a fundamental truth but half realized by the general run of men.

In an address recently delivered in Oakland he is reported to have said, practically, that if the democratic form of government was established for the purpose of securing the most efficient form of government, it has failed in its purpose, for it gives us the rule of neither the wisest nor the best, but merely of the average man, and has besides proven to be loose, expensive and scarcely efficient. The speaker was not opposed to democracies, he merely criticized the manifest faults of the system, and added: "For the people to know how to govern themselves is more important than for them to have the best possible government" without, of course, a stimulus or a tendency toward education.

The government of a democracy is an index to the character of its people. It mirrors the wisdom or the unwisdom that predominates among its freemen. Confessedly an intelligently governed democracy reflects the wisdom and intelligence of its voters, just as a loose, extravagant and inefficient democracy is indicative of a careless or an indifferently informed people. If in the foreground of our government there is a something sadly lacking, that wisdom would supply; or a something obtrusively present that prudence would put away, then the fault lies as much with the press as with any one factor in American politics. We have no quarrel with the press because they disagree with us or with themselves, upon broad questions of public policy or recognized theories of government. On questions of religion and politics mankind will likely never, in this generation, become harmonious. In this most natural and ineradicable disagreement is discernable the pollen that fecundated religious tolerance and political liberty. We would not abolish it if we could; but with respect to the cardinal principles determining that which is right and that which is wrong; defining honesty and dishonesty, and marking the boundaries between each, there should be no quarrel or disagreement among upright men.

If one were asked, What is most necessary and important to the stability and success of a democracy? the answer must be A healthy and rational state of public opinion, for upon that, and that alone, depends the character of its government.

If one were asked, further, to name the most important factor in directing, controlling and influencing that public opinion, he must answer, the Press.

Many doubtless would be inclined to credit this power to religion or to our public and private institutions of learning. While these two great factors are calculated to lay a broad and deep foundation upon which may be raised the superstructure of good citizenship, an analysis of the situation must accord to the Press a greater influence than either or both of these.

Conceding that a healthy and rational state of public mind is the one thing most important to the integrity and well-being of a democracy, and admitting that the Press is the most potent influence in directing, moulding and fashioning that public opinion, we must contemplate with alarm the unrestricted powers accorded to the man who has sufficient money to purchase type, presses and paper. Immediately he has acquired these tools of the trade he is licensed to disseminate, at his own sweet will, such wise or unwise sentiments as he may choose; and, in spite of our protests to the contrary, if he have but money enough and the knack of popularity, he may exercise a potent and a baneful influence in the community where he abides. The press of America, with some honorable exceptions, simply represents a body of citizens who have means sufficient to purchase the paraphenalia of a printing house. With these owners it is a consideration of business, not of sentiment; of profit, not of patriotism, that dictates the policy their journals shall pursue. Either this Press must mend its manners and its methods or the public must be taught to view it and its utterances in the proper perspective.

There is not a wild, unreasonable or dangerous doctrine firmly rooted in America, that does not owe its encouragement and continued existence to the open or covert support of the American press. The wildest and most monstrous proposition that can, by the subversion of reason, be distorted into a "people's right," is eagerly grasped at by the Press, and the ignorant are mislead into believing themselves defrauded when in truth there is no fraud and no invaded public right. From its very inception the thing proposed may be manifestly wrong to a temperate thinking man; the editor himself may be fully alive to the vice behind the agitation; but, hungry for the disturbance that brings subscribers, he urges the battle forward regardless of consequences. Success may attend him through a cowardly legislative body, and remain with him until the matter comes finally before the law for cold analysis. Here, thank providence, Justice cries a halt, and undertakes the thankless task of undoing the mischief proposed by Agitation. Defeated, as he knew he inevitably would be, the editor reports the decision as "Another Victory for the Corporation," or as "The People Defeated Again." To say that this character of damnable proceeding has not borne its evil fruits, is not to state the truth. It leaves a scar on the heart of ignorance. It fills the stomach of the unintelligent with an indigestible discontent. It breeds an unjustifiable distrust of the judiciary and, in the minds of those whose proper education should be our tenderest care, gives a coloring of plausibility to the false cry of the demagogue that "The people are robbed of their rights."

It is an unpunishable but unforgivable crime to so pervert public opinion. It should be seared into the public mind that the integrity of a sacred principle does not depend, in its application, upon the character or the standing of the individual invoking its protection. The principles of law that sentinel the rights of the rich and powerful, are the identical principles that guard and protect from the invasion of the strong the humble home of the husbandman and the cottage of the man of toil Destroy or imperil one, whittle down or impair the rights of either, and the mischief and untoward consequences fall with equal force on each. This is fundamental.

Corporations, in the eyes of the law, are simply artificial persons. Each represents an association of individual citizens, engaged in a common enterprise. They are governed and dominated by the same impulses that move ordinary human beings to action. Their faults or vices are neither more nor less than human, and, if noteworthy, are so, not because they are exceptional or unusual, but because corporate enterprise is conducted on such an extensive scale that its vices and its virtues become a species of public concern. Their rights are as sacred as those of the individual citizen. To encourage a community to disregard their rights and hold in contempt the law insuring them protection, is to prepare the way for the impairment and final disregard of all property rights. If you may legally destroy a single corporate property right, you immediately throw down the carefully constructed bulwark that modern civilization and liberty-loving hands have set up for the protection of all mankind. And it is on this point the public mind is woefully awry, thanks to an insincere and untruthful Press.

But this is not the only direction in which the Press has wilfully misled the public mind, It has adopted and approved the perverted and illegal notions of noisy and strife-breeding labor leaders, and has encouraged labor in the belief that a mere expression of its determination to enter upon a strike is sufficient in itself to suspend all the wise laws upon our statute books, intended to insure the public peace and to prevent and punish murder and arson. It has insistently and insiduously nursed and cultivated in the minds of the poor, a feeling of hatred for the very rich. It has encouraged and abetted the weak and impressionable to crime and wrong-doing. It has made heroes and heroines of libertine and courtesan, has blighted the mind of youth by familiarizing it with the most depraved and noisome side of life. It has upon the slightest provocation, and often without provocation, dragged honored and respected names through all the scandalous filth that pure devilishness could suggest. It has cast discredit upon our judiciary and blackened the reputations of honest men. It has degraded the legislative branch of our government by unjustly assaulting conscientious legislators who dared disagree with its propagandas. It has encouraged the demagogue who follows its mad leadership that he may fatten in popularity on its approval. It has made way in our legislative halls for the corrupt, who, fearing no criticism of his course, waxes rich upon the necessities of those whom the Press and demagogue would destroy,

It is, above all things, the most powerful instrument in the country for influencing public opinion, and ultimately the character of our government. It has the broadest and most comprehensive powers, and misuses the license generously given it more often, more openly and more to the detriment of the national welfare than does any other factor in the community. It is the only unbridled, irresponsible power in the land. It is a malicious mischief-maker, and for the welfare of the nation and of communities, for the good of the living and of posterity, needs to be disciplined into having a decent regard for the common decencies of life and the future welfare of the country.

A FORWARD STEP IN MUNICIPAL REFORM.

The "First annual conference of the Mayors and Councilmen of the United States, Canada and Mexico, held at Columbus, Ohio, last week, has uncommon significance for all friends of municipal reform. Irrespective of any results this initial gathering may accomplish. such a movement marks the opening of a distinctly new era in municipal administration. After some decades of crude empiric methods in city government, dominated by the party boss and the local spoilsman, the problem passed some years ago into the second stage of serious study at the hands of competent experts. Out of the wide-spread and emphatic recoil from the gross abuses existing in American cities, there arose a comprehensive discussion of the ends and means of city government; and through discussion, the theory of municipal government had an ample airing. The effect was wholly tonic. Serious-minded men came to feel the need of understanding local administrative problems, and of the conscientious discharge of public duties. Citizens of the better type found their way into municipal politics, not excluding at once the ward-heeler and his kind, but rendering their tenure of power henceforth uncertain and uncomfortable. There has been a decided gain in respect to the tone, the morale, of city politics in the last decade, largely traceable to this revived "civic consciousness."

The time is ripe for the further advance for which this convention of city officials stands. Such gatherings have come to hold an essential place in the promotion of great social reforms. Not to mention the meetings of educational and learned bodies, the conventions and associations of religious organizations, and the like, such annual assemblies as the Conference of Charities and Corrections, the Lake Mohonk Conference, and so on, accomplish much for the several interests they represent. The direct personal contact of workers with one another promotes fellowship and stimulates to larger endeavors. Each member carries away from such association fresh points of view, and new inspiration for his particular work,

When therefore the officers of our great cities begin to take themselves seriously enough to attend meetings of this nature, the outlook is hopeful. The exchange of views and experiences will be a most positive service to better municipal life. Practical men will not waste time and energy in declaiming on the need of good government, but will attack directly the great concrete problems confronting them. The first paper presented at the Columbus meeting dealt with the question of Street Lighting, and told the story how one city had fought its way, against corporate interests, to municipal ownership. Such an experience will multiply itself many fold through public presentation and discussion. Many mayors will go home to do for their respective cities what Mayor MacVicar has accomplished for Des Moines. And presently the consensus of public opinion will stand so strongly for municipal control of municipal services that any other plan will fail of a hearing. When such agreement has been reached, especially when the administration of our great cities has passed into the hands of conscientious and competent experts, a long step will have been taken toward better things. It is because of our conviction that the Columbus meeting points that way that we have brought it to the attention of our readers.

It is satisfactory to note that the attempts of company promoters in London to launch their Klondyke concerns have not met with success. Not that the British public is at all difficult to ensnare in the net of wild-cat speculation, but to catch their coin some basis, however intangible it may be, must be presented, for supplying regular dividends. Beyond being assured that there is gold on the Klondyke, that it is mighty hard to get there, and terribly difficult to live when you are there, the stay-at-home investor is without enlightment as to how he is to get returns on his capital. He therefore refuses to walk into the trap.

The King of Siam aroused adverse criticism in Paris by his persistent use of the English language instead of French. In direct contrast to Russia and England, France received the Siamese monarch with considerable apathy, though official effort was made to arouse enthusiasm.

THE "NEW OSTRACISM" IN KANSAS

By DAVID STARR JORDAN

A good deal has been said, of late, of the oppression of college professors and the limitation of their freedom of speech through the influence of the plutocrats who control College Boards of Trustees. Under the head of "The New Ostracism," Mr. Charles A. Towne has given in the Arena a full statement of all the facts of this sort. They need, as he says, "only to be brought sharply to the notice of the common sense and patriotism of the American people to be repudiated with scorn and laughter." Certain facts of this sort are now well known. The brilliant and, to readers of the daily press, popular, president of Brown University was rapped over the knuckles by his "plutocratic" board, but those responsible for the act have since properly apologized, and the incident is closed. A brilliant but perhaps hysterical instructor in Chicago University has failed of reappointment, and a well-meant attempt on the part of the authorities to give him a kindly send-off has made the grievance deeper. There have been, besides this, occasional cases of "plutocratic" criticism directed at free-spoken economists, but in no other case has it gone farther than words.

But the New Ostracism is not all on one side. The social reformers understand how to apply the screws quite as well as the plutocrats. The President of the State Agricultural College of Kansas has been dismissed, with twelve of his twenty-four professors, because they were in sympathy with the "Crime of 1873." The President of the College had conducted it admirably as "a school of industries." But it happened that he differed from the majority upon fundamental principles of distribution. For this reason he was removed. "The party in power had been twitted with being the party for the ignorant, and it was time to show the people that thoughtful men, leaders in education, could be found who would sustain the party movement from a State institution."

The story of this looting of a part of the State school system is simply but plainly told by Dr. George T. Fairchild in the Topeka Daily Capital for September 10th. In our indignation at the slight needlessly put on the President of Brown University, it may be interesting to glance at this case.

"The New Ostracism" at Manhattan began in 1892 by an attack on the State institutions of Kansas through the press "as giving no attention to political economy in the courses of study." Later the Board of Trustees found political economy in the course, but in the Senior year only. It was then insisted that this subject should come earlier, and that "the new ideas of finance and government ownership of industries had no fair presentation" in the college. Weekly lectures on these topics by leading economists, Mrs. Lease among the number, were then provided. After a while the course was discontinued because "the lectures were not well attended by students." Then a more elaborate course was provided for. "These lectures," it was said, "shall be nonpartisan, but shall not ignore nor unfairly treat the positions taken by what is commonly known as the new school of political economists. The principles maintained by the advocates of land nationalization, public control of public utilities, and the reform of the financial or monetary system shall be fairly stated and candidly examined, with a view to leading the student to grasp the principles involved of science, of production and distribution, without bias or prejudice."

In the further development of this subject a new Professor of Political Economy was selected, the choice having been left to Mr. B. O. Flower, a leader of the New Economics as well as of the New Psychology and of various other sciences lying before and behind the veil. To make room for the professor of the New Economics, the chair of Rhetoric was abolished. The work of the institution was readjusted by the Faculty, and the new professor at once began work on the "Crime of 1873" and the wicked motives of John Sherman in its commission. At the end of the campaign, in which the professor did valiant service in the cause of the New Economics, it was decided to reorganize the institution in the interest of greater usefulness in the cause of reform. On April 7th it was decided to dismiss the entire faculty of twenty-four persons, and to fill their places with men worthy of the "New Time" in which the agricultural interests of Kansas have fallen. Twelve of the old professors were re-elected. Twelve, including the president, were dismissed, and the Professor of Political Economy was made president.

"The new catalogue," says President Fairchild, "gives prominent places to four well-known contributors to the Arena and the 'New Time,' and shows the new course to make room for additional terms of required study in Economic or social science and history by consigning zoology and physiology into one term, and discarding mineralogy altogether. Industrial training in agriculture and horticulture are optional, and all the Agriculture of the fourth year is elective, thus carrying out the idea that social questions should stand first in the curriculum. The Industrialist (the college journal) is announced to be "an advocate of so-called reforms, instead of an exponent of scientific facts and principles, as in the past." Of the new faculty, the retiring president has this to say:

"I have no disposition to judge. These men can not be held responsible for the circumstances under which they were called. It is, however, strikingly noticeable from the extensive testimonials published, that not a single one of the twelve has won his repute by his teaching."

The new president, Mr. T. E. Will, seems to be sensitive on the subject of Academic Freedom. None have been more free than he, if we may trust the Topeka Capital, "in roasting Brown University and other institutions for their bigotry in retiring able educators for opinion's sake." But President Fairchild occupies the unique position of being the sole educational leader deposed for adhering to the teachings of common sense and to high ideals of the "liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life." He has not lost his manhood in the rush of the mob, and the folly of the mob is as dangerous to academic freedom as the tyranny of the plutocrats. I do not wish to prejudge the doctrines of the New Economics. Some of their doctrines are sound, and all may be. But they should make their way as other truths do, by their inherent force, not by political pulls or mob intolerance. I venture to say that Kansas is already much farther from conversion to the doctrines President Will represents, with all his teachings, than it was before the capture of the educational machinery by his associates.

TURGENEV'S LETTERS

By WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON

Among the most interesting of the literary documents recently given to the world, we must certainly reckon a number of the hitherto unpublished letters of the great Russian novelist, Turgenev, which have appeared during the last fifteen months in the French division of the international magazine, Cosmopolis. The editor of the series, E. Halperine-Kraminsky, rightly claims for these letters a two-fold interest and value, for they not only throw a good deal of light on the character and aims of the writer, but also help us to a better understanding of the intellectual relations existing during the last decades of his life between France and Russia. It is indeed true that only one aspect of such relations is here clearly shown, since the pontive influence of Turgenev over some of the masters of French fiction—an influence not denied by the leaders of the modern school—is, in the absence of the other side of the correspondence, hardly even hinted at. But though in this way, the record must be considered incomplete, the letters as they stand are so full of the writer's personality, and give us so strong a sense of the intimacy of his associations with some of the quartet of his French contemporaries, that students of modern fiction, as well as the growing number of admirers of Smoke and the Sportsman's Sketches, will find them well worthy of attention.

The letters are addressed for the most part to close personal friends, among whom may be mentioned the Viardots (through whom Turgenev first came into contact with the French literary and artistic world), George Sand, Sainte-Beuve, Gautier, Flaubert and his niece, Madame Commanville, Taine, Renan, Zola, Guy de Maupassant and Andre Theureit. In some cases we have nothing but a few hurried and casual notes on the passing affairs of the moment, though even these are often of unexpected interest in flashing a side-light, or revealing an idiosyncracy. But the Zola and Flaubert series are, the editor says, approximately complete, and in these, as well as occasionally elsewhere, the more purely literary side of Turgenev's friendships is prominent.

And, of course, it is on this side, after all, that such documents possess most lasting value. How far the private life of a great author should be made public property, may remain theoretically a delicate question, though in practice the reading would to its caterers seem, for the time being, to have answered it in their own way, and to their own satisfaction. But that we are justified in making what use we can of all materials that really aid us in the interpretation of a man's work, will hardly be denied. And these letters, together with the full editorial comments and the various miscellaneous extracts which accompany them, give us enough of Turgenev, critic and novelist, to save them from hasty dismissal as belonging to the category of mere personal gossip.

Here, for instance, we may light upon a few phrases which, though brief and merely incidental, contain as it were the very secret of Turgenev's attitude towards and feeling for his own art. "Their literature stinks of literature" (pure la litterature), he writes to a Russian friend, of the writings of Zola and the Goncourts. And again:—"Oh, this literature that smells of literature; the principal characteristic of Tolstoi's works is precisely this, that they smell of life." Such sentences carry us far. Life itself, in its breadth, strength and complexity, was what Torgenev aimed at; and he found life, along with a great deal of ostentatious erudition and bad psychology in Peace and War and Anna Karenina, as he came to miss it, amid all the brilliant technical qualities of L'Assommoir and La Fille Elisa. To portray the real world, with its humanity of flesh and blood, was first and last his object; but in more than one place in these letters he indicated his dissatisfaction with the narrow and one-sided results achieved by some of the extreme naturalistic writers, French and Russian, greatly as he might admire and respect the men personally, and fully as he was at one with them in many of the fundamental articles of their creed. It will doubtless surprise not a few readers of these pages to discover how completely Turgenev was out of sympathy with Balzac—the writer from whom it is popularly supposed that the continental school of modern realism is immediately derived, and in whom even so well-informed a critic as Melchior de Vogue would seek the literary sources of much of Turgenev's work. M. Halperine-Kraminsky tells us that he once asked Turgenev for a Russian translation of one of Balzac's tales. The answer pleaded lack of time, with the addition—"I would rather have translated some pages of Montaigne or Rabelais; but nothing of Balzac, of whom I have never been able to read ten consecutive pages, so entirely is this writer foreign and antipathetic to my nature." It may be worth while to remark incidentally that Turgenev speaks quite as strongly of another realistic novelist, of whom we have all read in Nordau, however little we may know about him—Sacher-Mazoch. The true literary ancestors of Turgenev were indeed his Russian predecessors in the field of the romance—Pouchkine, and perhaps even more particularly Gogol. For the latter writer—whose wonderful Dead Souls and A Madman's Diary are, I fear, only too little familiar to the English reading public—he expressed the highest admiration, going so far as to say that he had revealed the Russians to themselves. It was on the occasion of Gogol's death that Tugenev—a "born spectator" as he describes himself—for once came into collision with the Russian police; for an article of his on Gogol, published in a Moscow journal, caused his arrest and temporary detention, under imperial orders.

To understand Turgenev's attitude towards Balzac and certain of the more recent naturalists, we have but to remember how strongly the idealistic side of his own Slav nature was developed. We need only read the Sportsman's Sketches alongside of any portion of Balzac's work to realize that, in the matter of method and art, their similarities were beneficial, their differences, radical. What Zola once said of Daudet, may be said as truly of Turgenev:—realist as he was by temper and creed, he none the less looked at life through an imaginative medium; and, therefore, we may add, saw important aspects of it, to which, not only Balzac, but also Zola, the Goncourts and the whole tribe of their would-be imitators, are obstinately blind. That Turgenev was, at any rate, far broader in his literary philosophy than the majority of his associates, is unexpectedly shown by a judgment of his which, for English-reading people, must necessarily possess peculiar interest. Leaving contemporaries out of the account, Charles Edmond says, "He gave the palm in fiction to Dickens." This statement serves to accentuate one of the many points at which Turgenev and Daudet touch; for in Daudet's earlier work the spell of the English novelist is, it needs hardly be said, very strongly marked.

But, perhaps, the most important and suggestive fact brought into the clear light by these letters and their commentary, is that of the enormous influence exerted over Turgenev by George Sand. Flaubert he considered to be the most remarkable of modern French authors, and, like Taine, he regarded Madame Bovary as the most powerful book of the century. But for George Sand his feeling was not one of critical admiration or personal respect merely, it amounted to positive veneration. M. Halperine-Kraminsky in his concluding remarks has some interesting things to say about the parallelisms to be noted, by careful reading, between various characters of the two novelists. We may question the soundness of some of the results to which this detailed kind of inquiry may seem to point; but the fact at any rate remains, that Turgenev, himself, declared that George Sand had been "the master of my youth." The following extract from a letter, dated October 30, 1872, (when the writer was nearly 54, and the recipient within four years of her death), will show that Turgenev's early enthusiasm long outlasted the period of literary discipleship. The occasion of the letter was the dedication by George Sand of one of her novels to the Russian master.

"Dear Madame Sand:—You can easily imagine what I felt in reading the Temps yesterday. I cannot explain it myself as I should wish to do. My expression, spoken or written, remains always below what I feel, where personal matters are concerned. Is it timidity? Is it awkwardness? I do not know. For instance, on going to Nohant, I had promised to myself that I would tell you of the immense influence you have had over me as a writer. Well, I think I remained dumb! This time, however, I am determined to say that I was deeply moved, and very proud, on reading what George Sand said of my book, and happy that she should have thought fit to say it."

With these sentences before us, it is pleasant to recall what George Sand once wrote to Turgenev:—"Master, we must all go to school to you!"

Read through in the bulk, these letters leave us with a strong sense of Turgenev's character, a vivid feeling of the man himself; though it might be difficult to give brief formulation to our impressions. They help us at least to understand something of the personal charm, of which so many of his friends have spoken; something, too, of his modesty, his delicate taste, his critical acumen, his fastidious care in composition, the subtle melancholy that pervaded his later life. But of all these matters there is no space here to speak. A couple of points, having a different kind of interest, may be just touched upon.

In the first place, it is very commonly supposed, and sometimes definitely asserted, that Turgenev wrote one or more of his stories in French, which he used freely and with idiomatic vigor. But here we have his own emphatic protest against the notion. "I have never published anything that was not in Russian. Had I done [so, I should not be an artist, but the merest scribbler (ecrivailleur). How can one write in a strange language, when one already has such difficulty in expressing properly, in one's mother-tongue, the thoughts and images which haunt one?"

In the second place, M. Halperine-Kraminsky has been at great pains to settle once and for all the unfortunate Turgenev-Daudet difficulty, the main outlines, if not the details of which, will be within the recollection of all readers of these columns. Bitterly aggrieved over remarks alleged to have been made about him by Turgenev, and, after the Russian's death, published in certain sensational and practically anonymous "revelations," Daudet spoke of his dead friend's supposed disloyalty, severely, but with undue haste; for he did not wait to make certain that the "revelations" were worthy of credence. In point of fact, they were not, as the present editor clearly shows. Therefore, we may hope with him that, with the light of established fact thrown upon the entire incident, Daudet may come to think again, not merely with justice, but with the old affection, of his old friend and comrade of so many years' standing.

The citizens of Los Angeles would seem to be as little pleased with the condition of their municipal and county affairs as we of San Francisco. They bitterly complain of being burdened with taxation that in the aggregate is considerably in excess of two per cent on the valuation, while the tax-consumers are reaching out for more still. To meet the demands of the city government alone a contribution of $10 per head of the population is required, and it is urged that the total taxes of the city and county are at least fifty per cent higher than they should be under a proper system of administration, economically managed. It is further claimed that the Fire Department and the Street Department are too costly, and ineffective in addition, while the Police are continually demanding further appropriations, though the city is exceptionally peaceful. As for the District Attorney's office, its chief and no less than five assistants are represented as doing little beyond multiplying expenses and initiating useless proceedings. The State share of tax collections seems also to be a grievance with our Southern neighbors, it being argued that an average of $100,000 per year for the last twenty years has found its way to the State coffers in excess of the fair share of Los Angeles. And now, what do our Southern friends propose to do about it? It is not easy, as we know too well, to find a way out of the difficulty.

At the present time there are close upon $500,000 cotton spindles running in China, of which some 200,000 are working in Shanghai alone. When the mills now under construction are completed the total will be 800,000. The Chinese manufacture only the coarser yarns, which come into competition with the imports from Bombay and Japan. If this new industry is not throttled by taxation there is undoubtedly a great future before it.

A Parisian who suspects that the food or drink which he has purchased or adulterated, can have the article analyzed free of cost at the municipal laboratory. If impurities are found the city undertakes the prosecution of the tradesman, and after conviction the offender is not only liable to fine and imprisonment, but may be obliged to display in his window a sign reading, "Convicted of Adulteration."

Miracle Joyeux.

By FRANK NORRIS.

Mervius had come to old Jerome's stone-built farm house, across the huge meadow where some half dozen of the neighboring villagers pastured their stock in common. Old Jerome had received a certain letter which was a copy of another letter and so on and so on, nobody could tell how far. Mervius would copy this letter and take it back to his village, where it would be copied again and again and yet again, and copies would be made of these copies till the whole country side would know the contents of that letter, pretty well by heart. It was in this way that those people made their literature. They would hand down the precious documents to their children and that letter's contents would become folklore, become so well known that it could be repeated orally. It would be a legend, a mythas, perhaps by and by after a long time it might gain credence and become even history.

But in that particular part of the country this famous letter was doubly important because it had been written by a man whom some of the peasants and laborers and small farmers knew. "I knew him," said old Jerome when Mervius had come in and the two had sat down on either side of the oak table in the brick-paved kitchen. Mervius—he was passed seventy himself—slipped his huge wooden sabots and let his feet rest on the warm bricks near the fireplace, for the meadow grass had been cold.

"Yes, I knew him," said Jerome. "He took the name of Peter afterwards. He was a fisherman and used to seine fish over in the big lake where the vineyards are. He used to come here twice a week and sell me fish. He was a good fisherman. Then the carpenter's son set the whole country by the ears and he went away with him. I missed his fish. Mondays and Wednesdays he came, and his fish were always fresh. They don't get such fish now-a-days."

"I'll take the letter you have, said Mervius—the copy that is—and my wife will transcribe it, I,—I am too old and my eyes are bad. This carpenter's son now—as you say he set the people by the ears. It is a strange story anyhow."

Old Jerome put his chin in the air. "He was the son of a carpenter, nothing else. We all knew his people, you did and I. His father built the bin where I store my corn, and some stalls in my brother's barn in the next village. The son was a dreamer, anyone could have told he would have perished in the end. The people were tired of him, a mild lunatic. That was all."

Mervius did not answer directly. "I have read this letter," he said, "this fisherman's letter. The man who looks after my sheep loaned me a copy. Peter was not always with the man, the carpenter's son, one thing he has left out. One thing that I saw."

"That you saw," exclaimed old Jerome.

Mervius nodded.

"I saw this man once."

"The carpenter's son."

"Yes, once, and I saw him smile. You notice this letter never makes record of him smiling."

"I know."

"I saw him smile."

"As how."

Mervious wrapped his lean old arms under the folds of his blouse and resting his elbows on his knees looked into the fire. Jerome's crow paced gravely in at the door and perched on his master's knee. Jerome fed him bits of cheese dipped in wine.

"It was a long time ago," said Mervius, "I was a lad. I remember I and my brother used to get up early in the cold mornings and run out to the stables and stand in fodder on the floor of the cow stalls to warm our feet. I had heard my father tell of this fellow, this carpenter's son. Did you ever hear," he added turning to old Jerome, "did you ever hear—when you were a boy—did you ever hear the old folks speak of the 'White Night?' My father used to tell of it often. They called it the 'White Night.' At midnight it grew suddenly light, as though the sun had risen out of season. In fact there was a sun, or star—something. The chickens all came down from their roosts, the cocks crew, as though at daybreak. It was light for hours. Then towards four o'clock the light faded again. It happened in midwinter. Yes, they called it the 'White Night.' It was strange. You know the followers of this fellow claim that he was born on that night. My father knew some shepherds who told a strange story—however.

"There were in our village two men particularly detestable, one was the village miser, Simon was his name, and so grasping was he, so covetous of gain that he used to cut the copper coins in two and deal in the smallest fractions of money. He lived in a wretched hovel on the outskirts of the town, and starved himself, and denied himself till he was but the shadow of a man; he was a money-lender, a usurer, with only one desire, that of accumulating wealth, the wealth of others. To know that any man possessed more than he, was a veritable anguish for him. He was a bad man, a man without soul or heart, whom everybody hated and who hated everybody.

"The other man was the fuller of the village, who had a bleach-green in the meadow back of my father's sheep folds. After weaving, the women used to take their webs of cloth to him to be whitened, Many a time I have seen the great squares of cloth covering the meadow there, till you would have said the snow had fallen. Septimus was the fuller's name. He was a man as unlovable as was Simon, not that he hoarded wealth, but that he envied others the possession of anything good. He envied my father for his flocks of sheep. He envied my uncle for his vineyards. He envied the miller's daughter when her uncle, at his death, left her a little money. He would envy a man for a pair of new shoes, for a profitable sale, for a good harvest. From year to year this despicable man, this Septimus, went about our village, carping at the good fortunes of his neighbors or his friends, belittling and ridiculing their good luck, secretly chafing and raging the whiles at their greater benefits, and at best he hated and envied Simon the miser.

"Curiously enough these two men were seldom seen apart, though they hated one another. They sought each other's company. Septimus hated and envied Simon for his hoarded wealth, Simon coveted the lands of Septimus' bleach-green, and hated him because he held them in his possession. Both men were greedy according to their natures, and may be a common passion drew them together. At any rate, they boasted and pretended a great friendship. Well, both of these men had heard of the wonders that the carpenter's son had worked and the benefits and good fortune he could bestow on the deserving, and both, unknown to each other, had secretly determined that if ever the fellow should come into our country they would see what they could get from him.

"And at last one day he came. Usually a great crowd was at his heels, but this time he was alone. I was out in the fields beyond the village, pruning the vines in my father's vineyard. My brother was with me; we were at work on a bit of higher ground overlooking the road that runs from our village over toward the lake. The same where you say this Peter used to fish. Suddenly my brother touched my arm.

" 'Look quick, Mervius,' he said, 'there comes the man that father spoke about. That carpenter's son, who has made such a stir.'

"I looked and knew at once that it was he."

Old Jerome interrupted: "You had never seen him before, how did you know it was he?"

Mervius shook his head. "It was he. How could I tell? I don't know. I knew it was he."

"What did he look like?" asked Jerome, interested.

Mervius paused. There was a silence. Jerome's crow looked at the bright coals of the fire, his head on one side.

"Not at all extraordinary," said Mervius at length, "his face was that of a peasant, sun-browned, touched perhaps with a certain calmness, that was all, a face that was neither sad nor glad, calm merely, and not unusually or especially pleasing. He was dressed as you and I are now, as a peasant, and his hands were those of a worker. Only his head was bare. He had a fine brown beard, I remember. There was nothing extraordinary about the man."

"Yet you knew it was he."

"Yes;" admitted Mervius, nodding his head, "yes I knew it was he. He came up slowly along the road near where we boys were sitting. He walked as any traveler along those roads might, not thoughtful, nor abstracted, but minding his steps, or looking here and there about the country. The prettier things, I noted, seemed to attract him, and I particularly remember his stopping to look at a cherry tree in full bloom and smelling at the blossoms. Once, too, he stopped and thrust out of the way a twig that had fallen across a little ant heap.

"When he had come nearly opposite to us I said to my brother, 'Here comes old Simon and Septimus.'

"Sure enough the miser Simon and his inseparable Septimus the fuller had just come around the corner of the road some little distance away. They caught sight of the carpenter's son and—as every one did—recognized him at once. Simon hastened forward to meet him. Septimus did the same. Simon moved even quicker; Septimus broke into a run. Then the two wretched old men, decrepit and feeble as they were, raced one another like school boys, each trying to outstep his companion so as to be the first to ask the favor of the carpenter's son.

"Simon arrived a little in advance, and threw himself down on his knees in the road before the man, gasping for breath, and kissing his wooden shoes.

" 'Master, master,' was all he could cry at first. Then gasping and whining and coughing for breath he cried:

" 'You, who can do everything, do something for me, give me something, look at me, a miserable destitute old man, pinched with poverty in my old age.' Thus Simon, the richest man in all that part of the country. Then Septimus arrived, and pushing Simon to one side, grovelled almost on his belly, pouring out a torrent of supplication, actually weeping with the anguish of his desire. It was a sickening sight, those two horrible old men, wallowing in the dust of the road, clasping the man's feet, laying their lean cheeks against his wooden shoes.

" 'Listen to me, listen to me,' cried Septimus. 'Simon is a dotard and has money hoarded away in sacks, but I, I—just one little boon, sir, give me something, give me something! You have said that faith could remove mountains, look at me, have I not faith, reward me now, give me a blessing, bring me good fortune, bring me fortune!'

" 'No, no, listen to me,' shrieked Simon, clawing at his knees. 'A miracle, a miracle! do a miracle on me, look at my grey beard, help my necessity, me an old man, and poor, poor, poor!'

" 'He lies. You know everything, master; he lies, and you know it; he's rich, a thousand times richer than I.'

"So they howled and struggled before the carpenter's son who looked on silent and very calm. I wondered if they would in the end deceive him with their hideous protestations. For a long time he was silent, then:

" 'Yes,' said he, 'I will reward you both.'

,' I was disappointed and disheartened. They had deceived him after all. They grovelled again before him, vieing with one another in the excess of their humility. Then the carpenter's son spoke again:

" 'Each one of you may ask in turn for whatever he chooses, and it will be given him upon the instant, I promise.'

"The two old miserables whined and fawned a-fresh. The man continued:

" 'Only upon the condition that he who asks last shall receive twice the amount of him who asks first.'

"Simon and Septimus sat back upon their heels and looked first at the man and then suspiciously at each other. It was easy to see what was passing in their greedy minds.

"The miser Simon, though quivering with eagerness to take advantage of the man's goodness, would not for the mean life of him make the first request, lest Septimus should gain twice the amount. Was it for him, the miser, the hoarder of gold to enrich his companion by just twice the amount of his own possessions? Never, never; he would bite out his own tongue first.

"And Septimus, Septimus the Envious, Septimus who was fairly sick each time his neighbor prospered, would he be the first to ask, only that Simon would have twice as much he, no a hundred times, rather would he be dumb the rest of his life."

" 'Well,' said the carpenter's son, 'I am waiting.'

" 'Ask, then,' cried Simom fiercely to his companion, 'you've only to ask.'

" 'I will not,' shouted Septimus, 'ask yourself, miser that you are. You who are so greedy of wealth, here now is your chance.'

" 'Am I to enrich you, beggar, by double my own fortnne. You who have coveted and envied your friends and neighbors gains, gain now for yourself, you have only to open your mouth.'

"For a long while they quarreled and raged. Screaming abuse into each others faces. Their eyes flamed, their cheeks grew crimson, their lean and knotted fingers twitched and twisted together. The carpenter's son waited, watching them without a sign or word. Then at last in a fury Simon caught Septimus by the throat.

" 'Ask him then, swine that you are, ask or I will strangle you,' and with his free hand he struck the old fuller in the face.

"Septimus tore himself away shaking with rage.

" 'Ah,' he screamed, 'it has come to that, has it? Very well then, I will ask. I will ask the first of this good man, and instead of gaining you will be the loser. Sir,' he cried, turning to the carpenter's son, 'Sir, cause it to happen that I lose an eye.' 'So be it,' was the answer, 'as you have asked, so be it to you.'

"And we looking on, saw upon the instant, as it were, a film draw over one of Septimus' eyes. But on the same instant our ears were thrilled with a lamentable wail from Simon.

" 'Blind, blind, blind,' he yelled, tearing at his sightless eyes. 'Blind, blind, blind.' He rose from the ground and ran back along the road toward the town, stumbling and falling and colliding with tree trunks and the angles of the fences. And after him ran Septimus, jeering and hooting.

" 'Oh miser, oh swine, yes blind you are and blind you shall remain.' But Simon himself fell more than once, for upon one side of him all the world was dark.

"They turned the corner of the road and disappeared, but long after they were lost to view we could hear their wretched outcries.

" 'Blind, blind, blind.'

" 'Blind you are and blind you shall remain, and I, too, am but half as blind as you.'

"For a few moments the carpenter's son remained looking after them. Then, as they vanished around the bend of the road, I saw him smile. It was a smile partly of pity, partly of contempt and partly of amusement. Then he continued his road. And all that Simon the covetous, and Septimus the envious gained from the bounty of the carpenter's son was, the one to lose an eye and the other to become totally blind."

Mervious stopped and slipped his feet back into his sabots and rose. He took the letter from Jerome and put it in the pocket of his blouse.

"And you saw that," said Jerome.

Mervius nodded. But old Jerome shook his head in the manner of one unwilling to be convinced.

"He was a dreamer, with unspeakable pretensions. Why his people were laboring folk in one of the villages beyond the lake. His father was a carpenter and built my corn bins. The son was a fanatic. His wits were turned."

"But this thing I saw," said Mervius at the door, "I saw it, I who am speaking to you."

Jerome put his chin in the air.

"A dreamer, we were well rid of him. But I was sorry when Peter went away. He was a good fisherman. Mondays and Wednesdays he came, and his fish were always fresh.

SNAPSHOTS AFIELD

The Camera Club and Its Outing—A Trip to Altruria.

The California Camera Club owes its existence to an enthusiastic love of the art of photography, and is an excellent organization for providing rational enjoyment and encouraging a taste for beautiful scenery and the pleasures of an outdoor life. Its list of members embraces men of all trades and professions, and also many women who devote their spare time to making sun-pictures. The camera is the one interest that unites them all.

Among the many advantages which the club affords to members are its periodical outings. These are under the direction of a committee, who plan the route, negotiate for transportation—which is usually furnished at specially moderate rates by the railroads—and provide for the necessary entertainment of the parties at the destination selected for the trip. Last Sunday the first outing of the season was indulged in, the large sanitarium built and operated by Dr. Burke at Altruria, about three miles from Fulton, the next station beyond Santa Rosa, being the spot chosen for a halt. In that charming part of Sonoma county this temple of health is devoted to the recuperation of the sick and ailing, not by means of noxious drugs, but by the aid of sunshine, fresh air, electricity, peaceful quiet, good water and wholesome diet of excellent quality.

The scenery of Sonoma county furnishes endless subjects for camera work, and our illustrations give a few of the sketches which the club artists were able to put together on the occasion referred to. Their visit was a welcome relief to Dr. Burke's patients, whose appearance in the picture that is presented would seem to show that the regimen, to which they are being subjected, exactly suits their complaints, whatever these may happen to be.

The Camera Club is popular wherever it goes. The railroad companies offer special inducements in the way of reduced fares for its parties, the hotels aie likewise liberal, and the residents of the districts into which they penetrate are always ready to welcome the members. It is conceded by every one that they help to advertise the great beauties of California, and are therefore deserving of encouragement and should have all possible facilities for their excursions interiorwards.

The Annual Print Exhibition, which will be held shortly, is the great event of the year in the career of the club, and these outings afford an opportunity for members to fill their portfolios with sketches to represent them when the exhibition opens.

Mme. Dieulafoy, the French archaeologist, who received the Legion of Honor and the privilege of wearing men's clothes for discovering the ruins of the Temple of Darius, avails herself of the freedom. She is said to wear the most stylish trousers, coats and hats in Paris, and employs the same tailor as her husband. The couple are thoroughly congenial and have a salon where the savants assemble. Mme. Dieulafoy wears short hair and carries a cane.

Dr. Pinzen Geerlings, a Government official of Java, and formerly professor of chemistry at the University of Amsterdam, announces the discovery of a simple method of converting potato starch into sugar. He has secured a priority of the invention by lodging a description of the process with the French Academy of Sciences.

START FOR THE MILE OPEN PROFESSIONAL RACE

START FOR THE ONE-THIRD MILE AMATEUR RACE

RACING SCENES AT THE WIND-UP MEETING AT THE VELODROME

GREAT BRITAIN'S PREMIER

Personality and Career of the Marquis of Salisbury.

Recent events in Europe and America have done much to keep constantly before the public view the name and personality of the Marquis of Salisbury, chiefly in his capacity of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. True, he also holds the position of Prime Minister in England, but it is rather in the former office that he is conspicuous in the world at large. Seldom does one take up a leading journal that there is not to be found some disparagement of his judgment or skill in handling imperial affairs, even the Tory papers in London at the present time joining in attacks upon their leader. The burden of the cry is that he is lacking in backbone, deficient in diplomatic tact and devoid of statesmanlike capacity. Included in the indictment against him are charges of having given away Heligoland to Germany; allowed France to jockey him in the Siamese adjustment, and in regard to Tunis; France and Russia to outwit him in the Far East in regard to both China and Japan; and failed to maintain British prestige in the recent Greek and Turkish dilemma. In a measure too, his handling of affairs of State where this country has been involved, the Venezuelan matter and the Behring Sea controversy to wit, has also been condemned.

In all probability, however, the time has not yet come when a fair judgment can be formed as to the manner in which all these matters have been dealt with under Lord Salisbury's regime, and it is well to remember that political considerations prompt much that has been said and written by way of criticism. Some light on the subject can also be obtained by a reference to our knowledge of the character, temperament and career of Lord Salisbury himself.

Born in 1830, a younger son and marrying against his father's wishes, with a small income he was thrown mainly upon his own resources. Early in his career Lord Robert Cecil, as the Marquis was then called, spent some time in the gold fields of Australia, subsequently returning to England, where he found employment as an officer and director of the Great Eastern Railway, in which capacity he made a name for himself as a competent man of business. He was also one of the corps of able writers on the Saturday Review, owned and started by his brother-in-law Mr. Beresford Hope, and the excellent work he did for that journal, as one of the principal contributors, helped in gaining for the paper its former great reputation. The training and experience he then received as a man of letters have ever since exercised a powerful influence on his methods and style in dealing with affairs of State, and have tended to develop a caustic, satirical vein, which is generally regarded as inherent in the Cecil family.

Succeeding to the title at the age of thirty-eight he took his seat in the House of Lords, possessed of more practical knowledge of the world than generally falls to the lot of his peers, which, combined with intellectual qualities of a high order and excellent business acumen, soon placed him in a conspicuous position in that assembly. As a debater his speeches are keen, well-reasoned and choicely-phrased, but he seems incapable of producing the magnetic effect on his hearers which many a less sound and careful speaker is able to command. By instinct he contemns the arts by which popularity is gained, and finds all the satisfaction his conscience needs in an honest expression of his own views and the employment of all his powers in forwarding what he believes to be the best interests of his country at home and abroad. It will thus be seen that he is a statesman in the true sense of the word, and in no degree a politician. For this reason he enjoys the confidence, beyond any Englishman living, of the propertied classes, whether it be those possessed of vast landed interests or such as have their wealth invested in more tangible forms, such as stocks and shares and commercial undertakings.

As a representative of aristocracy Lord Salisbury is a fine example, for, while devoting his life to the service of his country, he maintains the state of his rank without undue ostentation; and, so far as it is possible, prefers to pass his time at his historical country seat, Hatfield House, which is situated in the beautiful county of Hertfordshire, not far from London. The tolerably frequent entertainments there given, and the receptions held at his town mansion in Arlington street by Lady Salisbury, are among the first functions of society, invariably graced by the presence of royalty and all who are distinguished, whether British or foreign.

In person Lord Salisbury, from being somewhat slim in his earlier years, has developed into a man of massive proportions, his head and shoulders, with full-bearded face, giving him a leonine aspect that is most striking. His brows are large, features regular and pleasing, with somewhat small, bright and penetrating eyes, and a mouth cynically curved. His voice is strong and clear, with an enunciation somewhat diffident, but well poised, even if a trifle monotonous in delivery. An auditor is compelled to recognize the speaker's convictions and a reader of his speeches cannot fail to admit the force of his arguments. Inheriting some of the most valuable property sites in London and extensive estates in the provinces, Lord Salisbury, by dint of good management, has greatly increased the family rent-roll, and is amongst the solid men of wealth in Great Britain. Of late years he has acquired a beautiful little estate in France, and usually spends a portion of the Parliamentary recess in his French home.

THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY

As Premier of England the Marquis of Salisbury is now in his third term. His first essay (1885–86) was but brief; during his second (1887–92) and during the present term, which began in 1895, he has also held the portfolio as Foreign Minister. Throughout the period of his ministries the country has been free from any large international complications, while at the same time, the growth of imperialism, the legacy of Lord Beaconsfield, has been most marked. Whatever may be the human faults and the weaknesses of the head of the house of Cecil, he has proved himself a man of distinguished ability, a true statesman and patriot, as well as a citizen of unblemished character, both private and public.

In accordance with time-honored precedent, the Premier will next loosen his tongue in public on Lord Mayor's day, November 9th, when he will no doubt be present at dinner at the Mansion House in the City of London, and it will not be surprising if he then scares away the crowd who are now barking at his heels.

G, L. B.

LAST DAY AT VELODROME

The Famous Bicycle Track Closes With Broken Records.

The Velodrome grounds are a thing of the past, the meet of the 3rd instant being the last that will be seen on that site. Much regret is felt at the disappearance of the fast track, and a very large attendance witnessed the final events, which proved most exciting and full of surprises. In addition to the four racing contests, a successful assault was made by S. B. Vincent, of the Bay City Wheelmen, on the Pacific Coast records up to five miles. In his first attempt at J. R. Kenna's mile record, 1:57, Vincent proved unsuccessful, but subsequently brought the figure down to 1:53 2-5, and negotiated the longer distances in the following time: two miles, 3:52 1-5; three miles, 6:03; four miles, 8:09 3-5; five miles, 10:17 1-5. The previous records, held by R. Mussen of Los Angeles, were as follows: 4:32, 6:51, 9:12 3-5, 11:33. Vincent was paced by a series of triplets.

The Mile Open Professional furnished some good racing in the preliminary heats, and finally went to Hardy Downing of the Garden City Wheelmen in 2:14 3-5.

The Two-thirds Mile Professional Handicap found Jones, scratch; Sharick, scratch, and Downing, 20 yards, pitted against each other in the final and a sensational finish it afforded, Downing getting up just on the tape by a squeeze in front of Jones, who beat Sharick by a few inches for second place. Time, 1:27.

The One-third Mile Amateur race brought out a field consisting of Fuller, Robinson, Cook, Mott, Wing and Russ in the final, all of them riders of reputation, noted for grit and speed. Russ, O. C. W., took the lead and keeping his field tuned up to top speed was never caught, and won by fully a couple of lengths. Robinson proved a stayer and came in second, with Cook third. The performance of Russ was the most dashing of any amateur during the day. The time made was 43 seconds.

The Mile Amateur Handicap was taken in the final heat by Wing, O, C. W., Fuller, 20 yards, second, and Robinson, 70 yards, third. Time, 2:28 2-5.

The Velodrome has been the scene of many exciting contests, has done much to foster interest in cycling, and will be greatly missed in the future. The accompanying illustrations will serve as a memento of the closing day of its career.

Miss Braddon, the novelist, has two distinct handwritings, one for her correspondence and business affairs and the other for her novels. The copy hand is smaller than the other. Neatness of manuscript is one of Miss Braddon's characteristics; she makes very few corrections, though writing with considerable speed, averaging, when the inspiration is on her, about fifteen hundred words an hour. She works in the mornings from 11 to 1 o'clock and then goes for a constitutional before lunch. In writing her novels she first makes extensive sketches of plot and characters before commencing actual work. Her suggestions and ideas come out of all kinds of places. She found the germ of her last book, "London Pride," forty years ago in an account of the trial of Lord Gray of Wark.

FINISH OF THE MILE AMATEUR HANDICAP

CUT FOR NEW STREET, JUNCTION OF THIRTEENTH AND MARKET STREETS

REAR VIEW OF DOUGLAS-STREET CRUSHING WORKS

LOADING WAGONS AT THE DOUGLAS-STREET CRUSHER

OUR QUARRYING INDUSTRY

How and Where the Material is Gotten and Utilized.

In San Francisco when we want to provide the footings for our buildings and roadways, the material for erecting a solid wall or military fortifications, we have nothing to do but look round the town for a bold bluff; blast its sides with powerful explosives and convert the broken debris by means of chisel and hammer into building blocks, or by the aid of crushing machinery into material for concrete purposes. Telegraph Hill, the most conspicuous land-mark on our waterfront, and the hills surrounding Noe Valley, are the chief sites of the local quarrying industry. Views of the works on the latter spot are presented with this issue.

The quarry at 26th and Douglas streets, operated by Messrs. Gray Brothers, furnishes blue trap-rock of the best quality, which they have been getting for the last six years. At present the face of the hill shows an area of 100 feet in working with a floor of say 250x175 feet, laid with several lines of truck rails leading to the crushing-house. The rocky face is attacked by means of a Burleigh drill penetrating to a depth of eighteen feet, followed by a charge of No. 1 Hercules powder, made up of twenty-five to thirty sticks eight inches long by one and one-quarter inches thick. The drill is driven by steam from the boiler which provides the power for the crusher, and three and one-half hours are required to complete the drilling operation. As the rock is broken up the bulk of it is removed by trolley cars to the crushing-house, put through the machines and reduced so that the largest pieces will pass through a two-inch screen. It then falls through chutes into wagons and is hauled to the place of final disposal. Some quantity of the larger and best pieces of the stone is shaped and finished by hand for building use.

Just at the present time the greater part of the broken material is being conveyed to the Presidio for use in the new fortifications and mortar batteries now in course of erection, twenty-two four-horse teams on the average being employed in hauling the material, and effecting a total delivery of about 100 tons per day. This work has been going for the last twelve months and will probably occupy four months more.

Large quantities of the material is used for concrete foundations and for underlaying the bituminous roadways of the city. The Douglas-street quarry also furnishes the stone for the boundary wall of the Presidio reservation now being constructed from Central to First avenue, and which has already added greatly to the appearance of the military quarter.

There are several red-stone quarries within the city limits, but the material is only of use for filling in and for the making of roadways where the traffic is light. A horse and cart and a few spades practically suffice for its handling.

---

The output of the Rand (Transvaal) gold mines continues to increase, the total for August last being 259,602 ounces, which is 9,000 ounces above the record. The Standard and Diggers' News, in estimating the reduction of working expenses in the Rand mines, which will follow if the recommendations of the Industrial Commission go into effect, reckons that at least from 125 to 85 cents per ton of ore milled, equal to 1½ dwt. per ton in the yield, will be saved. This gain would add from ten to fifteen per cent to the number of paying mines on the Rand. The return for the same month from the West Australian mines was 45,390 ounces of gold from 26,214 tons of ore milled. This is 2,624 ounces more than the record.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The war against President Reyna Barrios of Guatemala waged in the newspapers by a hotel runner and his fellow conspirators has come to an untimely end. Barrios has achieved victory and has routed the rebel forces at Quezaltenango. For once the sword has proved mightier than the pen. It was foolish to look for any other termination. The Dictator has a trained army, well organized and well equipped and is a capable administrator. He was thoroughly prepared for all that happened and had taken his own time to quell the insurrection. As for the talk of cruelty and injustice—for the most part it is nonsense. A man who undertakes to manage a Central American Republic cannot be too delicate in his methods. A strong hand is requisite and an unflinching purpose. Barrios has both. It may be, now that the little Dictator is victorious at home, he will apply himself to the solution of the Central American problem. It was the ambition of Barrios' uncle to weld the states of that region into a union and rule them with a firm hand. Diaz has made Mexico into a nation by the forceful strength of his personality, and it may be reserved for Barrios to do as much for Central America. Now that the cruel war is over and the journalistic warriors are convinced by the logic of events, it is time to consider what the cost of their campaign will be to San Francisco. From the tone of the press one might imagine that Guatemala and its ruler were our enemies, instead of being sources of a large and profitable trade. Our rivals will send to the Dictator copies of the papers in which he has been held up to public odium as a monster of cruely, and being a proud man he will resent them. The consequences to our commerce will probably be serious. The strong man in Guatemala is he who is at the head of affairs, and Barrios can easily make it unfashionable to spend summer in San Francisco, as most good Guatemalans have done of late. Then the "beats" who have made a living off these visitors by pandering to their desires and fleecing them whenever the opportunity offered, will be out of employment, but San Francisco will suffer more severely.

***

It is customary in certain European countries to allude to the manner in which our foreign relations are conducted as "shirt sleeve diplomacy." The criticism is undoubtedly well founded for there is a decided informality where ceremony is proper, but no American will find it in his heart to object to the manner in which Secretary Sherman communicated to the Spanish Minister, De Lome, the sentiment of the United States over the war in Cuba. The conversation occurred soon after Sherman had taken office. He sent for De Lome, who appeared in the regalia of his role. The Secretary with uplifted forefinger and impressive manner, said: "Mr. Minister, you have been shooting Americans down there in Cuba and it's got to stop. Now don't you shoot another American. The country won't stand it. Maybe you have got some fellows down there that you don't want—well, just gather them up and send them home, but mind you don't shoot another American for I tell you the country won't stand it! De Lome expostulated vigorously at this unconventional and undiplomatic form of address, but Sherman was not affected in the slightest. He merely repeated after De Lome had finished; "That's all right maybe but let your friends know they can't shoot any more Americans." Since then the persons of our American subjects in Cuba have been held sacred.

***

Senator Morgan will return here very shortly and it is safe to believe his blatancy will again be heard in the land. The Senator is right about Hawaii, but is the most unmitigated demagogue in the Senate. Sometime ago, during the Cleveland administration, there arose the difficulty between England and Nicaragua in which the former had to interpose to protect certain of her subjects who had been injured by the Nicaraguans. A claim for damages was put in and a warship sent to collect. At this juncture President Zelaya of Nicaragua invoked the aid of our State Department, and representation were at once made to England requesting clemency. The British Minister replied that reparation was demanded for injuries done an English subject, and that the claim was just. Zelaya agreed to this, and promised it would be satisfied if he were but given time inasmuch as the conditions in his republic were unsettled. Indeed, they were on the verge of rebellion, and he did not feel strong enough to enforce the law. This predicament was communicated by Washington to London, and the Secretary of State agreed, if Britain would hold her hand, to guarantee the required indemnity. An attempt was made at once to communicate with the British Admiral off Nicaragua instructing him to do nothing until further orders. Unfortunately the telegraph wires had all been cut and there was no means of enlightening him, Three days later when the lines had been restablished, it transpired that the Admiral had taken possession of the Custom House. Thongh pains were taken to inform Morgan of the miscarriage of the affair, he declared in the Senate that the State Department had been bribed to permit the landing of the English. A man who will so comport himself is neither a patriot nor a statesman, but a demagogue of the cheapest type.

***

A certain eminent jurist who suffered from gout, was asked, during the absence of the county judge to preside at the trial of a damage suit in Redwood City. At great personal trouble and at the cost of considerable anguish, he consented; and the calling of the cause brought into court as plaintiff, a small tenant farmer who was suing his landlord, a wealthy rancher of the district, for wages for services rendered, the amount involved being $179. The defendant had in the meantime sworn to a cross complaint demanding $199 for unpaid rent. After an acrimonious trial, which lasted all day, and during which the Judge squirmed and writhed in his chair, the jury brought in a verdict for $100 on behalf of defendant who at once entered into conversation with his lawyer. "May it pleasd your Homor," said that worthy rising to address the Court, "My client is a wealthy man and does not need this money and is satisfied with the justification of the verdict. He has therefore very magnanimously agreed to remit half the judgment." There was a murmur of applause. The Judge leant over his desk. "Mr. Clerk," he said, "have you entered up the verdict?" "Not yet, sir," was the reply. The was a grunt of satisfaction from the jurist. "This Court," he said, in his most impressive tone, "though suffering extreme pain has listened to the evidence in this important case, and has noted the magnanimity of the defendant. But this Court does not propose to be outdone in magnanimity by said defendant, and will remit the the other half of the judgment. You will therefore enter a decision to that effect, Mr. Clerk, and at the same time assess costs to defendant, whose magnanimity should be encouraged."

***

The law is an uncertain mistress and is often tangled up in the maze of her own precedents and technicalities. A situation that might furnish suggestion to W. S. Gilbert who loves what savors of topsy-turveydom was consummated recently by a decision of the Supreme Court. Sometime ago two youths were caught in the act of burglarizing a railroad car, were tried, convicted and sentenced each to one year's imprisonment. There was no question of their guilt but on account of their years the Judge sentenced them to the lowest term the law allowed. One appealed—the other was satisfied with the judgment. Both were sent at once across the bay and were formally released ten months later, having served their terms. Three months afterwards the Supreme Court had come to the appeal, examined the findings and ordered a new trial. So here is an instance of a prisoner who had been punished and suffered for his sin, being arrested for the same crime with every chance of a second conviction. Just what to do was not at first apparent, but the dictum of the Court had to be obeyed. The youth was arrested on a bench warrant and the case was duly called. Then the District Attorney explained the circumstances and the prisoner was released—which goes to show it is foolish to appeal when the evidence against you is irresistible.

***

Chief Lees is out of favor with the political push. Since his elevation they declare he has grown gruff and dogmatic and has lost the urbanity of manner which used to characterize him. Promotion, they argue, has been too much for his balance, and by way of revenge a scheme is on foot for his deposition. Commissioner Gunst, it is said, is willing to assist the malcontents and the idea is to bring such pressure to bear on Commissioners Tobin and Alford as will ensure the veteran Captain's retirement. When the community realizes that the hatred of the politician, is directed towards Chief Lees, he will be congratulated on the enemies he has made. The dislike of this class is won generally by enforcing the law against them, and their opposition is directed by a fear of consequences. That the Board will recognize this class as against Lees is highly improbable, and the conspiracy is doomed in advance to failure. The police department is in first rate condition now. There is excellent discipline and a capable alignment for all of which the vigorous leadership of the Chief is responsible.

***

One consequence of the Supreme Court's Supervisorial decision is the destruction of the increased salary scheme which Sam Rainey lobbied through the State Legislature for the benefit of the Fire and Police Departments, The legality of the measure Judge Seawall affirmed, but an appeal was taken which is yet undecided. The strictures of the Court bear directly on the case and terminate all the hopes of Rainey and his crew. Apropos of the Fire Department and its efficiency to which frequent tributes are paid, does it not occur to any one that San Francisco is paying more per capita for protection than any other city in the world, and double per capita what any other wooden city in America is taxed. Judging by its recent demands, the members of the Fire Department in their ardor to save San Francisco from burning, are really animated by the desire to save it for themselves.

***

Certain municipal officials in Oakland organized a baseball team, and being young, active and enthusiastic, carried off all the honors of the environment, They conquered whomsoever offered, were tremendously exploited by the papers, and then looked around for more clubs to defeat. A challenge was sent to the executive officials at the State Capital to meet on the diamond, but Sacramento politicians are not given to baseball or aught else that requires exertion, and replied saying they had no time for such an encounter, but would willingly shake dice with the Alameda team. This was melancholy, but not the worst. A few days later there came a challenge from the baseball team of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, offering to try conclusions, and since then the enthusiasm over baseball has waned in Alameda county.

BOSWELL JR.

In "Dod's Peerage" it is recorded that the second baronet of the line of Cumming, of Culter, the title of which was created in 1695, was chief of the Cherokee Indians. We presume there is pretty good authority for the statement, or it would not be made. At all events there should be enough foundation for a good Sunday supplement story. We commend the subject to the attention of the writers of Indian lore.

TERRAPIN POND AT THE INGLESIDE

HOW SAN FRANCISCO LIVES

II.

Terrapin and Their Ways, with Strictures on Mud Turtles.

The first epicures who endeavored to introduce terrapin to the Californian table ran foul of a deep-seated, popular prejudice against reptiles as an article of diet. Whatever their faith otherwise, Christians concurred in the Levitical precept, "Every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth shall be an abomination — it shall not be eaten." An old gentleman, who was a gourmand in his youth, says that he remembers a time when servants stipulated that they should not be required to eat terrapin or oysters. They got bravely over that nonsense when they heard that both were classed in the East among the choicest delicacies of McAllister's feasts, and ever since San Francisco became a rich city, terrapin stew has been served in good houses on occasions of state.

When Ludwig used to cater for the aristocracy, in his well equipped kitchens on Sutter street, he sold from five to six hundred gallons of terrapin stew monthly during the winter season. A gallon of the delicious stuff consumed eight large or ten medium sized terrapins; the former cost from $6 to $8 a dozen, and the stew was worth $12 a gallon. These prices would be considered very low in the East. Maryland diamond-backs are now so rare that they sometimes command $60 to $75 a dozen, and the stew is worth a corresponding figure. It is frequently remarked by Philadelphians and Baltimoreans that their terrapin are superior to ours. This is a mistake — the California terrapin is just as fine in flavor as the diamond-back of the Chespeake; but it must be properly cooked, or it will disappoint the gourmet. Ludwig says that it took him two years to learn how to cook a terrapin. It is a feature of the menu at the Ingleside and at the Trocadero.

As a rule terrapin does not figure on the bills of fare of our hotels and restaurants — it must be ordered beforehand. One restaurant on Sutter street makes a specialty of it, and serves an excellent stew at 75 cents a plate. The stew of the

A CONCLAVE OF TERRAPIN

Woman's Exchange, which is made by a lady well known in society, has acquired a deserved reputation. Ladies who give recherche lunches to their friends generally serve it as an entree. It is worthy of Apicius, but in houses where they don't keep a doctor chained up in the back yard, care must be taken not to get any of the small bones in the throat. When girls who are pretty and very good visit Baltimore they are invited to a lunch of gumbo soup, prepared by a negress to the manner born, a plate of terrapin stew, or a timbale of sweetbreads, with a reed bird and two glasses of Sauterne.

The Californian terrapin does not come from anywhere in particular. It is found in ponds and swamps from Siskiyou to San Diego. Among the half dozen kinds which are caught in California, there are wide differences. Unlike men, mud turtles are not born equal. A yellow-belly and red-belly are all very well for a shipwrecked mariner, but the fastidious epicure, with rings upon his fingers and a most delicious bouquet by his chair, will slake his appetite with nothing short of chicken terrapin. Among chelonians, as among men, there are patricians and plebeians. The Florida terrapin, which grows to a length of fifteen inches, is not to be despised when he is cooked with gumbo, red peppers, and sherry wine; but people who have been used to stew made of the deivocheleys articulata, turn up their noses at him.

Terrapin hunters are queer fellows, full of droll stories. They claim to be artists, whereas the hunters of the Chesapeake are so'jers. The latter go out in long rubber boots, with a spade or scoop in their hand and wherever they see a bubble on the slime of the marsh, they dig down in the hope of bringing a turtle to the surface. Our California hunters say that they hunt in pairs. One man carries a scoop, another a fiddle. When the hunting-ground is raided, the musician strikes up a seductive melody—probably the air which the siren tried on Ulyoses. At the strange sound, so goes the story, the terrapin rises to the surface, and pokes its long neck and brown head above the water, just to see what this disturbance of its repose means. Whereupon the other man swiftly scoops it into his net, and it realizes, with resignation, if not with pride, that it is about to fulfill its destiny as stew.

The English, who are apt to be gross in their feeding, prefer green turtle to terrapin. Heaven forbid that a word of disparagement should be said of the noble chelone which furnishes callipash and callipee! We eat turtle soup here; at some clubs and restaurants where they are have a g… cook, it is a favorite dish. There's an old eating-house … Clay street where great sprawling turtles, imported from the islands, are exhibited in the ridiculous position of lying on their backs, with a placard on their breastbone, "Soup tomorrow!" But it is safe to say that no Californian ever performed such feats of gourmandizing as are recorded of the turtle feasts of London. At one dinner, given to a Spanish Ambassador, six hundred guests are said to have consumed twenty-four hundred pounds of turtle, the flesh being distributed among the merchants who paid for the meal, while the callipee, green fat, and fins were reserved for the grandees. When these distinguished guests were served there was a scramble among the aldermen and plain citizens for any remains of the choice morsels.

"THE TROCADERO" WHERE EPICURES GO FOR TERRAPIN

The meat of the green turtle is said to possess medicinal properties, which is more than can be said for the flesh of the terrapin. Labat, the excellent Jesuit Father, says that the hunters remain three or four months on the islands in the pursuit of their calling, eating nothing during all that period but the fat and lean of the animals, and whatever maladies they may have had when they set out, even the most loathesome, they return perfectly cured. Another ancient mariner declared that "the flesh of land turtles is excellent for perfumes and fumigations, and it is as good as a countercharm to put by and repel all sorceries and enchantments; a genuine counter-poison also to resist any poison whatsoever. It will scatter wens, and its blood will clarify the eyesight and dispatch cataracts. Whosoever rubbeth the teeth with a turtle's blood, and continueth to do so for a whole year together, shall be free from the pain of toothache forever after."

Only to think that we have been eating green turtle soup all these years without suspecting that it might save us sending for a doctor!

JOHN BONNER.

The tenor of the news from the Yukon district is growing more and more serious as winter approaches. The failure of the large parties, which left this coast at the end of Juiy and during August for St. Michaels, to continue their journey up the river, owing to the want of water in the stream, will leave them frozen up in inhospitable places on board the various crafts already stuck in the river. The supplies destined by the same route for Dawson City will also fail of delivery, realizing which a hurried exodus is now being made for that place by many who cannot obtain provisions for the long winter. Moreover, typhoid fever, dysentery and scurvy are reported to prevail to a serious extent at Dawson, owing to the fact that the town is located on what is really a swamp. With famine and disease thus staring them in the face the residents are urging the transportation companies to turn their attention to providing facilities for exit, rather than to affording additional means for getting people to the Klondyke. One effeet of all this may be to distribute prospectors more than would otherwise have been the case, possibly resulting in gold discoveries in other parts of the Yukon district.

Inebriate retreats in England are not proving sufficiently adequate. An official report of these institutions recently issued shows that only about one-third of the inmates are entirely cured. The largest retreat, the Dalrymple Home, at Rickmansworth, reports that out of 442 cases discharged subsequent reports show that 149 are well doing, 24 have improved, 31 are dead, 4 are insane and 164 have not improved. The report also states that drunkeness is increasing rapidly among women of all classes, and that immoderate drinking, though frightfully common among the industrial classes, is still more prevalent in the higher planes of life.

GOBLE'S TERRAPIN CELLAR

Henry Rochefort is ready for a third marriage. The young woman is Mlle. Marguerite Vallois, and it is a love affair on both sides. Rochefort was married first while in prison at Versailles, his wife then being on her deathbed. His second wife, Mme. de Brede, has just obtained a divorce.

THE MAJORITY TOOK THIS

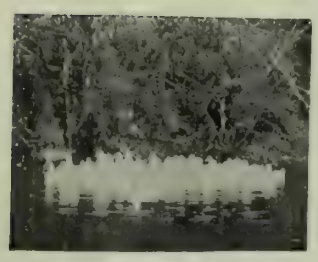
WHERE YOU CAN TAKE THE CURE

THE BOAT IS TAKEN

"TAKEN"

PUZZLE PICTURE: WHAT ARE THEY TRYING TO TAKE?

TAKEN ON THE JUMP



EVERYBODY TOOK THE DUCKS

TAKEN FROM OUR CAR WINDOW

"ARE WE TAKEN"

THE CALIFORNIA CAMERA CLUB'S OUTING

BY RAIL, SIX-HORSE CONVEYANCE, AND CYCLE, TO ALTRURIA, SONOMA COUNTY

Photos by Foucompre, Madison and Bent

THE SABIN HOME

MISS SUSIE DARNEAL

THE BAKER RESIDENCE

THE CITY HALL

MRS. DELLA KRUGER

MRS. OLIVER ELLSWORTH

MRS. CHARLES SEVERANCE

ONE OF THE ORIGINAL SETTLERS

MRS. OLIVER HAZLETT

MISS FLORENCE MASON

ALAMEDA LOOKING WEST FROM VERSAILLES AVENUE

MRS. GEORGE HELLMAN

IN ALAMEDA

See page 10

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I cannot say, dearest Diary, that I have had a wildly exciting time this week. To speak the absolute truth I have been bored to extinction. Of course there have been one or two things to vary the monotony. There was Mrs. Neville Castle's lunch on Friday given in honor of Marie Wells. We had a capital time. It was given at the 'Varsity Club; we sat at a round table decorated with those big African marigolds. Mrs. Castle is a love of a hostess, so bright and genial, reminds one of her aunt, Mrs. Monroe Salisbury. Mrs. Chauncey Boardman, Mamie McMullin, Florence Stone and Helen Wagner were there. We all wore tailor gowns and looked very sweet.

On Saturday we went to the football at Central Park and rather enjoyed it. I don't like the grand stand at all, though. It is too high, and one cannot see the fellows as they come in or talk to them, which is our principal object in going. A number of the girls were there; I saw Bessie Ames, Ethel Patton, the Oelrichs, Mrs. Jouett, Lulu Burton and Bernice Drown. Then on Saturday Mrs. Billie Whittier took a party of us to the Miramonte Club, where we dined and spent Sunday, returning in the evening. There were a dozen of us in all, Lillie Follis, Helen Wagner, Julia Crocker, Gertie Carroll, Walter Martin, Nat Wilson, Sam Buckbee and George de Long. We had great fun, and Mrs. Whittier is just the right sort of a chaperon. Aunt Sybil says it is absurd for girls to be chaperons just by reason of their being married, but I prefer the young ones—they let you enjoy yourselves, in fact have a fine time themselves.

On Tuesday I went with Arthur to the Columbia to see "Sue" and was surprised not to find more of the "crowd" there, as there was really nothing going on. The play was vastly entertaining, though I never have heard so many "swear" words, as Harry calls them. It was big big D's and again big big D's—I was a little bit horrified, or rather startled, as one is not accustomed to hearing cursing, even on the stage.

On Wednesday Mr. Phelan gave a big dinner at the Bohemian Club to the Oelrichs. It was a tremendously smart affair and the gowning was superb. I just love club dinners—there is an atmosphere of camaraderie that one has no where else. I can't explain it but it is there nevertheless.

The last Paper Chase is to take place on Saturday at San Rafael—I am so sorry they are over. You have no idea how much genuine pleasure and excitement there is in a paper chase. I am going there and Leila has been invited by Aunt Caroline to her place in San Mateo to remain until Monday. Leila is jubilant, as Auntie is to take her to the Club House at Burlingame to dinner and also to luncheon on Sunday. You know they are to have instrumental concerts on both occasions. They have added a new sitting-room for ladies, which adds materially to the attractions of the club. One can have meals served in there and we girls think it would be a lovely idea to arrange luncheons there during the fall—those dear feminine affairs which we so delight in.

Oh, I must tell you more about the Terpsichoreans. You know they have invited some of the nicest of the young matrons to be lady patronesses, and Mrs. Walter Hobart, Mrs. Charles Bent, Mrs. Oscar Long and Mrs. Whittier are among those who have consented. I am just wildly anticipating the first dance, have my german engaged, and all the extras, so, to quote Arthur, I am "right in line." We are bound to make them a success, especially since some of the older girls scoffed at the idea of "debutantes having the assurance to think they could form a club and run it—ridiculous!" Well, we shall see, and "who laughs last laughs best," you know. We are all going to wear the newest and prettiest of our frocks. I have a dream of a dress for the first. I hear of teas, small and otherwise, in the future, parties to Tamalpais, and of course the hop at the Presidio on Friday. But I think it foolish to anticipate, don't you, Diary dear. I wish some enterprising mother would give a big ball and so launch her daughter into the social vortex. I have been trying to persuade Papa that, since he has made so much money in wheat, he ought to do something of that sort. He says, "Wait, dear, I believe you would prefer a trip to New York," and I would, you know, infinitely, for a ball only lasts a single night and a trip East, phew!

Rose Hooper goes in two weeks to stay with Mrs. Green. She was that pretty Miss Delgardo, Admiral Beardslee's ward, you know. I quite envy Rose, as she is bound to have a capital time. And now I must fly, dearest Diary, so farewell for another sennight (don't you think that prettier than week?)

Your devoted MISS CRICKET.

* *

Things have quieted down this week in Oakland, owing partly to the fact that the maidens who were the recipients of farewell entertainments have departed for the East. The sudden death of Mrs. Cornwall, who was among the most popular of Oakland's matrons, has also added to the effect. Apparently in perfect health on Friday night, she had spent the evening in San Francisco, and on Saturday was dead from heart disease. Mrs. Kirkham's death, too, came somewhat unexpectedly, although she had been more or less of an invalid for some time.

There are really no important social events thus far to chronicle—informal affairs appear to be the order of the day.

Two quiet home weddings, a few card parties and at homes represent the doings of the week. Of future events, the first meeting of the Saturday Fortnightly, formerly known as the younger Deux Temps, or "Little Ducks," is to take place at Ebell Hall, on the evening of October 9th. There have been numerous complications with regard to the invitations. It appears that the lady patronesses appointed a committee of youths and maidens to take charge of the list, and they bungled it up in most appalling fashion. Many of the most desirable members received no invitation, while others who had hitherto been excluded were among the first bidden. Popularity superseded social prestige, and the lady patronesses are obliged to assume an apologetic air whenever they meet the relatives of the smart, but wallflower, element that has been omitted. The cotilion is to be led by Miss Florence Sharon and Mr. Harry Fair.

Of the weddings, exceedingly quiet, but none the less enjoyable for that reason, were the nuptials of Miss Anna L. Buck and Dr. James Akerly. It was a pink wedding, carnations and smilax forming the motif of the decorations. The bride wore the conventional white satin and lace. Miss McCarthy, Miss Alice Ludlow, of Denver, and Miss Olita Lunt were gowned in pink and white. After the honeymoon Dr. and Mrs. Akerly will reside in the old Akerly home on Adeline street.

Another quiet wedding was that of Miss Vibella Martin and Mr. J. C. Jenks. Miss Martin is the only daughter of J. C. Martin, the attorney, and is a very charming girl. Mr. Jenks is the assistant manager of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railroad. The ceremony took place on Wednesday at Trinity Episcopal Church, only the immediate friends and relatives being invited. Mr. and Mrs. Jenks purpose living in San Francisco.

A very jolly dance was given last week by Miss Helen Shafter in honor of her cousin, Miss Bertha Goodrich, who left for Vassar on Tuesday. There were about fifty young people present, chiefly belonging to the Deux Temps set. Miss Goodrich gives promise of becoming a very stunning young woman. She is tall, with large features and carries herself splendidly. All the young girls wore light organdies and swisses.

Miss Ethel Kittredge made her formal debut (as seems to be the recognized thing nowadays in Oakland), at an At Home on Saturday afternoon, and was assisted in receiving by Misses Mona Crellin, Louise Simmons, Lillian Strong etc. It was quite a large affair, about a hundred invitations having been issued.

Mrs. George Grayson entertained a number of ladies at a card party this week. She was assisted in receiving by her daughters, Mrs. Will Ralston and Mrs. H. Hinckley—seven-handed euchre was played. Among those present were Mrs. L. L. Bromwell, Mrs. Stolp, Mrs. Whitney, Mrs. Knight and Mrs. James Allen.

Sailing parties on Lake Merritt are quite popular with the East Oaklanders. A number went out on Monday evening and had a capital time. The party included Mr. and Mrs. George Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Hodges and a number of young people.

President and Mrs. Kellogg, of the University of California, held a reception on Friday evening. The members of the faculty, their wives and the graduate students were invited.

Miss Louise Simmons is to entertain the "21" Club this week.

* *

Judging by the number of supper parties at the Palace Cafe recently, that institution is to have a run of the supper patronage which has so long sought the German beer restaurants. In the beautiful diningroom of the big caravansary I have noticed a number of after-the-theatre gatherings during the week, and from all appearances, the fashionable set has had its fill of the sauerkraut sausage atmosphere of the beer hall. It is curious how people have so insistently patronized these institutions, in which both service and cookery are poor, when at a similar charge they could command the admirable service of the Palace and its excellent cuisine. Possibly there exists an air of Bohemianism about German beer places that for the time exerts a fascination, but no careful matron desires her daughter to mingle with the heterogeneous crowds which frequent such places. It is rather interesting to note in this connection that the reduction in the price of Chumpagne has made considerable talk among hotel men generally, who believe the move an unprofitable one. Already results point the other way.

The paper-chases at San Rafael have come to an end, and there is to be a hunt dinner at the Hotel Rafael this evening by way of celebrating the last chase. Quite a number of invitations have been sent out and there is prospect of a thoroughly jolly crowd being gathered in the big dining room.

Mr. and Mrs. Leopold Michels have returned from the Eastern watering-places, and are again stopping at the Hotel Richelieu. Mr. and Mrs. Wm. S. Tevis and family of Bakersfield, and Mrs. M. P. De Closticoe and Mr. F. A. Garbutt of Los Angeles are also at the Richelieu.

Autumn Days

Are never so beautiful as at Byron Hot Springs in the height of the fall season. Magnificent weather, lovely views, pure air and plenty of sunshine—neither fog nor wind to disturb or distress you. A bath in the Mineral Springs will tone you up—the mud baths will cure your Rheumatism and you will bless the day you saw Byron. Reduced rates, round trip tickets, Saturday to Monday, or to Jan. 1, 1898.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

IN ALAMEDA

A Happy Burg Where One Can be At Once in Town and at the Seaside.

Alameda is really a charming place to dwell in. It is sheltered by its shore line from the swing of the west wind, escapes the hot and boisterous northerners, and its residents have the happiness of living at the seaside and being within theatre distance of the Metropolis. Otherwise it is a burg of villas, quaint and fantastic of architecture, perhaps, but so covered with vines and creepers, that really the design makes but little difference. Each home has its individual patch of lawn and garden, which slopes to the sidewalk, with neither fence or hedge between. The impression one gathers is of general comfort and freedom of intercourse, which neither Berkeley nor Oakland convey. Then there are the streets, which some one has said are the best-paved and smoothest in California — smooth and flat, swept and watered, they make inimitable speed tracks lor cyclists. With such roads it is no wonder that wheeling has such vogue in Alameda. Everyone rides. They make calls on wheels, which is not so incredible when you think about it.

Considering that the water laps the edges of the municipality, and that few homes are more than a hundred or so yards from the bay, it is not surprising that Alamedans are great at swimming and boating. There are several sea baths and a beach, and what is better, the water is several degrees warmer than on the Marin or San Francisco shores. So there are yacht and canoe clubs and sundry other boating organizations in Alameda. The English colony, which used to make Sausalito its headquarters, is established now in Alameda, and varies its aquatic excursions with cricket and tennis. Indeed, the Alameda eleven is a strong quantity in California cricket.

But sport is not the most prominent factor in Alameda life. There is a free and most agreeable social intercourse. One hears little about cliques. There are organizations to which everyone is welcome of entrance provided they are respectable. The Adelphian Club is as yet in its infancy, but has shown real vitality. At its head is Mrs. Charles Severance, who is ambitious and possessed of real executive ability, and under her control great strides have been made. The younger set has a Friday Night Cotillion Club for the winter and manages to have a jolly time. Mrs. Oliver Hazlett, nee Gisela Kruger, one of the moving spirits in this organization, is a stunning looking young woman, tall and handsome, and is acknowledged the finest horsewoman in Alameda. Mrs. George Hellman is another of the promoters of the best interests of Alameda. She is very musical, having been, as Roberta Wright, a prominent member of the Young Ladies Orchestra; and her house is the center of the musical element.

Perhaps the prettiest of Alameda's matrons is Mrs. Charles Gibbs, wife of the young attorney. Recently by her marriage with Mr. Oliver Ellsworth the town has lost Miss Lillian Mastick, granddaughter of G. B. Mastick, who was one of the most popular girls in Alameda. But there are scores of pretty girls in the burg, and among them are Miss Susie Darneal and Miss Florence Mason. Miss Darneal is a tall brunette of the Gibson type, and Miss Mason is a charming looking girl, tall, fair with soft blonde curly hair and a fascinating manner. She is a grandniece of General Grant. There is also Miss Kruger, a sister of Mrs. Hazlett, a very sweet looking girl, who enjoys general popularity.

A lawyer, having some papers to be signed by an old Irish lady, went to her house one morning for her signature. On his arrival he requested her to sign here name "here" (indicating the spot). "Och!" said she, with a bland smile, "you sign it for me. For sure since I lost me glasses I can't write." "Well, how do you spell your name, Mrs. S.?" "Martha, dear," she cried to her daughter, "come here directly an' sphell me name for the gintleman, for sure since I lost me teeth I can't sphell a word."

The oldest shipping house at Port St. Mary's, Spain, is the well known one of Duff, Gordon & Co., shippers of the Duff-Gordon sherries, the most celebrated of any in the world, being specially noted for their superior qualities of character, style, delicacy and purity.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

THE THEATRES

A Jagged Play in Strident Tones at the Baldwin.

Some one, I cannot recall who, has told me that Mr. H. A. Du Souchet, the author of "My Friend from India," was, when he wrote that very remarkable comedy, a telegraph operator in New York City, with strong dramatic tendencies. This genial gossip, whoever he or she may have been, also informed me that this was "only the second play he had ever written;" that his first play, which was disposed of for a song, "took" in New York, and was so successful as to create a demand for a second, and, I am willing to imagine, a third and a fourth. But "My Friend from India" "is the second." I should like to see the "first." New York has the advantage of us, inasmuch as the theatre-goer there was prepared for the "second." To take kindly to some things requires considerable education. Few people can plunge into a wild enjoyment of terrapin a la Maryland on the initial introduction. Some individuals must cultivate a taste for asparagus, tomatoes, and a world of other dishes edible. It may be the same in things theatrical. In matters musical, one must achieve a taste for Wagner and the long list of sonatas and fugues that musicians rave over, the general public pretend to rave over, and paterfamilias, of the mercantile stripe, rave over in blasphemous English. Perhaps Du Souchet is a Wagner and "My Friend from India" is an Op. 36 with a violin obligato. Perhaps that is why it is distasteful to me.

A chap sat in front of me last Tuesday—and that he was a chap I say advisedly—who simply roared throughout the play. It was a question with me as to whether he adopted that means of clearing his throat and expanding his lungs, or whether he had been confined to a sick-room for a long period, and was therefore easily pleased, or whether the play indeed was very, very funny and I had failed to grasp the ludicrous side of it. A good healthy roar of laughter frequently came down from the gallery, but one must expect that with such a play. There was but one spot, but one brief span of time where a well ordered dress circle and orchestra could decently afford to give itself over to any demonstration of pleasure. In the second act, the scene in which Mrs. Beekman-Streete is soliloquizing in front of what she supposes to be a mirror, is amusing, and, what is more, is new. Behind the mirror-frame is A. Keen Shaver, whose dress and millinery are a counterpart of those worn by the rather giddy Mrs. Streete. The facial work intended to represent a reflection of Mrs. Street's face, was cleverly done by Mr. John F. Ward. Here, and in some of the situations quickly following, is where the lower portion of the house may with perfect freedom smile and laugh outright, if it chooses so to do.

The play opens with a "jag" and closes with a "jag." You are introduced to some young ladies who shout out their lines as though they were commanding a crew to "about ship" in a storm off Cape Horn. Miss Allen certainly gave every evidence that she need never fear a quarantine against consumption and weak lungs, should our State authorities put such a rule in operation, and the other members of the company evinced a spirit of fine rivalry, lest one should out-shout the other—an admirable proceeding, by the way, if the rear seats had been occupied, but they were empty.

"My Friend from India" is sadly and hopelessly out of place on the Baldwin stage. It is a rough-and-tumble sort of a performance, interspersed with more than a fair quota of horse play. Real comedy merit was painfully absent. The play is not to be compared to any one of Hoyt's farce-comedys, or anything else that can be recalled at the moment. I have no quarrel with the farce-comedy, but on the contrary, rather take to them, much as that lovable old lawyer, Joe Hoge, took to yellow-covered literature—as a diversion and a relief from the more serious side of life. Life will have to be very serious, however, before Mr. Du Souchet's work will carry pleasure to me.

B.

* *

Three clever and well muscled young men are the Adelphi Trio, the bright particular attraction this week at the Orpheum. They give a rather remarkable performance on the flying horizontal bar, as startling as it is unique. O'Brien and Havel, the other new people, are little more than acceptable, and at times hardly that. Their singing lacks voice, and their comedy humor. But Mr. O'Brien gets in some novel hand turnings and saves the sketch. Frank Lawton whistles "Ben Bolt" and a lot of other young things, but his work takes wonderfully well. His bone specialty is very good. Irene Franklin sings on about Sadie in the same green watteau. We can overlook the gown, it is very pretty, so is the song, but why not, in humanity's name, Miss Franklin, sing something new! Adrien Ancion has balanced on her little blue chair and her little blue globe for many nights by this, but her smile is sill as charming and her black eyes still as bright as when they first opened so wide upon the Orpheum audience.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

The doings at the Alcazar have been lively with the roaring farce "French Flats" on the boards. As old playgoers are aware the ludicrous situations crowd on top of each other without ceasing in the course of the four acts, and the characters are of many distinctive types. Wallace Shaw as Landlord Blondeau, Wright Huntington as Riffardini, the operatic star, John Torrence as the hairdresser, with Florida Kingsley and Wm. Bates in their respective parts, all do well. Huntington's rendering of his part is perhaps the feature of the piece. The work of the orchestra at this house is not what it used to be, and on the opening night of the week there were several crudities introduced that were not calculated to please any audience wishing to hear music as distinguished from noise.

As in last season Mertens is again the feature of the Tivoli production of "Rigoletto." His portrayal of the jester is excellent and satisfying throughout. Michelena as the Duke, sings "La Donna e Mobile," rapturously well and is recalled with enthusiasm. W. H. West as Monterone gives his curse effectively and Sig. Viviani as the Wizard Sparafucile is equally good. As Gilda Mlle Casals may be said to be very good—at any rate she receives cordial attention. She has an interesting personality, and in the third act, where she is at her best, makes a dramatic appearance with her long hair and flowing robes. As Magdalena, Mrs. Hinrichs has only a moment or two—in the great quartet, but her costume is bright and gaily Italian, forming a striking picture against a gruesome background. Another pretty figure is Anna Schnabel as the page.

A rather radical change is on at Morosco's this week in the production of Monte Cristo. Instead of a Bowery tenement and an East River pier there is the gloomy Chateau d'If and the duellistic Park of Fontainbleau, and, in lieu of some hero or other's virtuous remark, is the satisfied sentiment of Edmond Dantes. But radical or otherwise the change is made with reasonable success, and as it is a league or two from the melodramatic to the romantic, too much should not be expected from the Morosco people. But they all play well enough, in particular Mr. Snow, Miss Hall and, naturally, Mr. Pascoe.

DRAMATIC NOTES

At the Columbia Monday evening Digby Bell opens in Agustus Thomas' comedy success "The Hoosier Doctor." The piece was first produced in Chicago some months ago and received much favor. It is a story of domestic life in Indiana, simple and unaffected and full of humor and pathos. As the country doctor Mr. Bell is said to have the part of his life, playing it with deep feeling and discretion. In the company are Laura Joyce Bell, Mable Strickland, Margaret Owen, Arthur Hoops and Frank Monroe. Following "The Hoosier Doctor," Corinne comes in "An American Beauty."

Romance, adventure, patriotism and comedy are the four great points of "The White Squadron" next week's play at Morosco's. The scene is in South America and, like all well regulated melodramas, it contains several striking features, among them a congress of navies and a mechanical display of the warships of the world.

"My Friend From India" has been drawing large audiences at the Baldwin through the week. A regular performance will be given tomorrow, Sunday evening, and also on the 17th, when the engagement terminates. "Under the Red Robe" comes next, opening on the 18th.

In the revival of "The Bohemian Girl" at the Tivoli next week, Michelena will sing Thaddeus, one of his favorite roles with Emma Abbott. Raffael as the Count promises a good performance, and as Devilshoof Edwin Stevens will make the most of the comedy.

Mme. Emily E. Lassangue announces an invitation song recital to take place at Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 23rd. Mme. Lassangue is a graduate of the Paris Conservatoire, and in London was the founder of the Saturday Ballad Concerts at St. James' Hall.

Press Eldridge, the "commander-in-chief of the army of fun," heads the list of the Orpheum new people for next week. Provo, a juggler of European fame, makes his premier, and also John J. Welch, whose powers of eccentric dancing are said to be phenomenal.

That many seasons' favorite, "Pink Dominos," is the coming week's attraction at the Alcazar. Elaborate preparations are being made for Gilette's comedy, "Too Much Johnson."

Mrs. Alfred Abbey's song recital comes off at Y. M. C. A. Auditorium next Friday evening, October 15th. Miss Constance Jordan will be the accompanist.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

BOOK NOTES

The St. Nicholas for October has a pretty frontispiece, "The Little Princess," from the painting by Moreelse. There is a complete story, "The Two Victories," by Margaret Jackson, and a long sketch, "The Fire Patrol," by C. T. Hill. W. T. Ellis contributes an article on Helen Keller and Tommy Stringer, and Tudor Jenks has an interesting story, "A Magician for a Day."

A book of nature and of beauty, of bees and birds and flowers, is "My Studio Window," by William Hamilton Gibson (Harper & Bros.). It is written easily and with much simple grace, treating naturally of insect life, the birds of the air, and the lilies of the field, affording equally pleasure and instruction. The book is very prettily gotten up, and handsomely illustrated by Mr. Gibson.

Another late publication by Harper & Bros. is "Three Operettas," by Henry C. Bunner, with music by Oscar Weil, and illustrations the work of C. D. Weldon and C. J. Taylor. The first operetta is "The Three Little Kittens of the Land of Pie," the second "The Seven Old Ladies of Lavender Town," and the third "Bobby Shafto." From the titles alone much of Mr. Bunner's humor may be imagined—it is deliciously absurd, as well as rythmically clever. Mr. Weil's music is light and catchy, and the illustrations daintily appropriate.

We are indebted to the Minister of the Interior of the Candian Government for an official pamphlet just issued bearing upon the Yukon district. It is published from authorative reports, principally those of Mr. William Ogilvie, Dominion Land Surveyor. The work is quite complete, and aside from its reliability is interesting, because of a number of good illustrations.

The Dingley Tariff Bill has appeared in print and takes up just forty-five good sized pages of closely typed matter. The phamphlet also contains a comparison of the Dingley and Wilson Tariffs, and a complete index.

The October Book Buyer has for its frontispiece an engraving of S. Weir Mitchell, from the painting by Frank Holl. Dr. Mitchell is also the subject of a sketch by Sydney G. Fisher. The second part of Lincoln in caricature contains a number of cartoons reproduced from Leslie's.

From all accounts that come to hand it is quite evident that a rush has begun to get into the carriage-horse breeding business. As every one knows this has been almost entirely neglected for many years past in the efforts to produce harness horses for purposes of speed. The result is that most of the stock reserved for breeding purposes is unsuitable for the production of such animals as the market demands for carriage work. Breeders are therefore turning their attention to the selection of stallions and mares of the proper type for the purpose, and the dealing importers are getting ready to supply them with stallions from Europe of coaching blood. Similar movements in the past have not been attended with success on the whole, probably for the reason that such horses are not of pure blood and failed to stamp their own individuality on the underbred mares with which they were mated. The only road to success in building up a good American breed of coach horses will probably be found in the employment of thoroughbred stallions of the requisite size, shape and action. As to the last-mentioned quality—action—of all things the most important in the carriage-horse, the ordinary breeder in this country is not as a rule educated. Horse shows and European travel have done something to spread the necessary knowledge amongst a limited number, but until the niceties of the subject are better understood, the average horse-breeder cannot expect to meet with success in raising the class of harness horse now required. It is not a mere question of blood-lines, but the right sort of education and perception that is needed to achieve good results. Benedict.

The Fiend's Confession.

Unmoved, I saw her feather with the oar
And trim the scull when I was but a lad.
Unmoved, I followed her across the floor
On boxwood wheels, when skating was the fad.

I helped her bend the sturdy bow of yew,
Yet did not fear the arrows of her eye.
I saw her mount the bike—in bloomers, too;
Yet did not offer for her sake to die.

Croquet, lawn tennis, billiards came in season,
But never touched—serene my fancy dozed.
She shot, fished, ran—and still I kept my reason.
At last she took to golf—then I proposed.

Harvey Wickham, in N. Y. Sun.

THE MAGAZINES

A Running Comment on the October Novelties and Their Contents and Pictures.

Invidious comparisons are to be avoided but a cursory examination impresses the idea that the October magazines are rather better than their immedidate predecessors. Possibly the fine menu of the Atlantic Monthly, so widely announced, was instrumental in stimulating the general tone; yet it must not be forgotten that the monthlies are on the press at least thirty days prior to issuance. That rather detracts from the theory of a special competitive effort. A survey of the several tables of contents reveals the conclusion of two serials. The Century's Hugh Wynn and The Kentuckians in Harpers. St. Ives in McClures is on the verge of completion. Dr. Wier Mitchell accomplishes a natural and very happy ending for his manly hero and adds a notable portrait of cousin Arthur Wynne to the series of pen studies which has not been the least valuable feature of his novel. An excellent and well turned story, Hugh Wynne will be widely read, but will create interest rather than enthusiasm. It is not the great American novel some of the author's friends would have us believe though it be the best revolutionary war story yet composed. A re-reading in book form may alter the impression of the serial but the effect is literary, deliberative, studied. Though the erudition is infused into the story and is part of it, Hugh Wynne himself is self conscious and has but little free vital movement. The living, intensity and absorption you find in the really great novel are missing. "The Kentuckians" falls to pieces in the last installment. Though conceived and executed in a romantic vein, it presented such a fine suggestion of material and gave us such a powerful figure in Stallard, that the melodramatic attitude of the writer was excused. The trio, Marshall, Anne and the mountaineer, enlisted ones sympathies. The girl impresses one as being rather a make-shift—at least at the conclusion. It is hard to imagine so powerful a man as Stallard renouncing the realization of his love, and difficult to understand why, the girl having gone so far, failed to accept the logic of her feelings. In view of all the traditions that had been swept away, the final obstacle was indeed a trfliing barrier.

Passing onward to discriptive material—McClures and the Cosmopolitan have the most notable articles. The Phillipines in the latter and the Elephant Round-up in Siam, in the former, being deservedly worth turning to—for the pictures' sake if not for the prose. A third article that has more than a passing value is Grenfell's description of the finding of the new sayings of Christ in Egypt. Here are photographs of the region made by the explorers and a clear and tangible story of the discovery. The golf article in Harpers' is sui generis—the usual survey of the growth of a sport in the Casper Whitney style, with capital pictures by Frost and Pixotto. After Professor Libbey's later failure, one is inclined to regard his Kilaluea in Harper's with something of suspicion but the pictures are certainly first-rate. Apropos of illustrations there is observable a vast improvement in the Cosmopolitan's process work—due to the more careful printing and also to the re-engraving of the half-tone plates. Nowadays a half-tone plate as it comes from the etcher's hands is but partly finished. It is turned over to the engraver who practices his arts on it, heightening the lights and relieving the shadows, adding details and values, completely transforming the original impression.

In the direction of reminiscence The Cen. has most of the responsibilities. Miss Bi[illegible]nell tells of Marie Antoinette as Dauphine—a readable article, and General Porter concludes his reminiscences of Grant. I venture to predict a great success for this book. It makes one of the most entertaining and intelligent narratives of the war, for it enables the reader to obtain in clear perspective an impression of the actual operations of the great general, and to realize the degree of his genius. In the direction of war stuff, McClure's promises even a greater treat—the reminiscences of C. A. Dana of the New York Sun. Dana was the representative of the Government throughout the fighting with the title of Assistant Secretary of War. His role was that of a private reporter for the President and Secretary Stanton, and he wrote for them his impressions of generals and battles and plans of campaign. From these letters Lincoln derived most of his own information as to the progress of the war, and composed on the spot, by so vivid and brilliant a man, they should prove tremendously well worth reading.

The Atlantic is full of valuable literary material, but I have not space to give adequate notice of the literary essays of James Lane Allen or F. Brunetiere. Stanley's African contribution is historical, and rather by way of survey. Fuller's Chicago article is instructive. Kennan has a most interesting essay, the source of which is undiscoverable. It is not first hand information, I believe, as the return of this writer to Russian territory would hardly be countenanced by the Czar. Hopkinson Smith's new story, "Caleb West," should attract readers. It is the most promising of the later serials.

There still remains the monthly Outlook and the Review of Reviews, which are both valuable for their departments on current affairs. That in the weekly Outlook is excellent—being broad and intelligent and sane, while the value of the Review is too well understood to require fresh commendation. The femenine organization articles in this number are somewhat of a bore, being compendiums of events rather than clever articles, but Mrs. Crawford on Sir Isaac Holden makes a capital sketch—full of personality and interest.

Thus far and with no word for the short stories—they are not notable this month, but on that subject more later.

The Town of Nogood.

My friend, have you heard of the town of Nogood
On the banks of the River Slow,
Where blooms the Waitawhile flower fair,
Where the Sometimeorother scents the air,
And the soft Goeasys grow?

It lies in the valley of Whatstheuse,
In the province of Leterslide;
Thattiredfeeling is native there,
It's the home of the reckless Idon'tcare,
Where the Giveitups abide.

It stands at the bottom of Lazy Hill,
And is easy to reach, I declare;
You've only to fold up your hands and glide
Down the slope of Weakwill's toboggan slide
To be landed quickly there.

The town is as old as the human race,
And it grows with the flight of years.
It is wrapped in the fog of idler's dreams,
Its streets are paved with discarded schemes
And sprinkled with useless tears.

The Collegbredfool and the Richman's heir
Are plentiful there, no doubt,
The rest of its crowd are a motley crew
With every class except one in view—
The Foolkiller is barred out.

The town of Nogood is all hedged about
By the Mountains of Despair.
No sentinel stands on its gloomy walls,
No trumpet to battle and triumph calls,
For cowards alone are there.

My friend, from the dead-alive town Nogood
If you would keep far away,
Just follow your duty through good and ill;
Take this for your motto, "I can, I will,"
And live up to it each day.

Wm. F. Penny in the New Haven Register

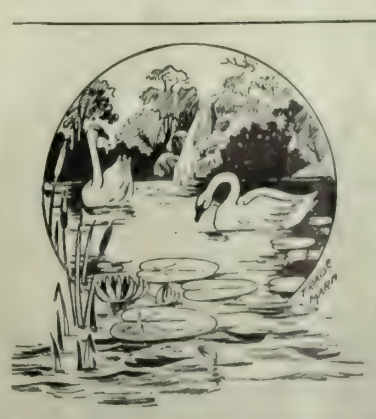
In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.



QUEEN LILY
SOAP

Will not shrink Woolens, Flannels or the finest of Fabrics. The Best and Most Economical Soap Made. Washes Without Rubbing . . . .

PATRONIZE HOME INDUSTRY

Notice.—On receipt of 25 Queen Lily Soap wrappers, we will mail to any address a handsome picture, 15x20, free from all advertising matter.

NEW ENGLAND SOAP CO.
307 Sacramento St., S. F.

SOHMER PIANOS
BYRON MAUZY
AGENT
308-314 Post Street, S. F.

"THE FEDERAL JUDGE"

An Interesting Story of Railroad Manipulation and Federal Interference.

There are certain great problems in American life that rarely engage the attention of novelists. The ordinary writer confines his studies to the men and women of his immediate environment and his drama is composed of their loves and disappointments. At intervals one finds some incident of contemporaneous history woven into a plot, or a tragedy made to turn on such an event as a great strike or a disaster. But the writer deals with the obvious aspect of the situation. Seldom are such affairs handled from the standpoint of the individual actor. It is true there are stories by the dozen in which characters labelled "politician," "statesman," "banker," "merchant" occur but their personality is not conveyed; we have no impression of their methods whereby we may guage their abilities. Balzac made heroes of business men and exposed the core of their individuality. We know how old Grandet made his millions and realize the very type of his mind, but how seldom in an English or American story do you find such powerful exposition. The great men of the day are the men who organize and control powerful corporations, who conceive and execute huge operations, who bend to their will all the forces of their community, and who amass as the spoils of victory, immense fortunes. Jay Gould was a great man; C. P. Huntington is; W. H. Vanderbilt was. There are many such magnates, managers of gas, water and land companies throughout this country developing in their own way, that capacity and diplomacy which in bygone days went to the making of great warriors and noted statesmen.

A book that attracted the attention of the men of America was Paul Leicester Ford's Peter Stirling. It treated of the problems of political life, with which every serious-minded man is familiar. It had a love affair as a secondary motive, but the man existed outside his feminine relationships, and figured as a factor in the world of politics, of which we all hear so much and know so little. There has just been published another novel which will be read by the same class as that which found Peter Stirling interesting. It is The Federal Judge, by Charles K. Lush, (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), and its plot turns on the manipulation of a judge by the head of a great railroad system. To say that judges are swayed, is but to admit that they are human. Mere bribery is a vulgar force but seldom resorted to by men of large undertakings, who achieve their ends by indirect methods far more potent. There is an immense force in personal relationship and social connection, and many a man does for friendship what no coin would tempt him to. The old saying which declares every man has his own price is recalled by a reading of the story of Judge Tracy Dunn and Eliot Gardwell, but the judge, though he does the bidding of the manipulator, is animated by motives as high and as holy as a Lincoln's. Butterflies are the instruments of his undoing.

The story introdnces Judge Tracy Dunn of the Circuit Court of Stallworth county. a granger jurist famed for rugged honesty, and a hatred of corporations—a strong, earnest, sincere man, loved and honored by his neighbors, set of purpose even unto obstinacy, and with but one weakness—a love of butterflies. He had the finest collection in the State, and his daughter had learned to supplement his riches with pictures of rare specimens. In his court the railroads have the worst of legal encounters, for the Judge believes there is a decided tendency on their part to assume powers beyond what the framers of the Constitution intended. That this shall not occur in his court he is determined and his persistence attracts the attention of Elliot Gardwell, the great financier and manager. who presides over the Trans-American Railroad. The Trans-American is one of the big land grant railways, and as the story opens, there is in progress a tremendous fight for its control between the forces of Gardwell and Willer and of Trine, a rival millionaire, whom the others have deposed, but who owns the majority of the stock. In order to recoup his friends for their expenditures, Gardwell must continue as president, but to make head against Trine he schemes to throw the road into the hands of a receiver. To achieve this requires a Federal Judge amenable to the plan of campaign. Gardwell's friend, Judge Frezett is to issue the decree. In the meantime, while these momentous affairs are maturing, the great manager goes to Bowerville and forms the acquaintance of Judge Tracy Dunn. He is a most ingratiating and charming man, this president of the Trans-American, and a master of deft and cunning ways of influencing the minds of others. He learns the Judge's weakness for butterflies, and before setting out cons over a work on the Lepidoptera, familiarizes himself with the various species, for he has a most retentive memory, turns the conversation with the country jurist on his hobby. It is the open sesame to Judge Dunn's heart. The fascinating visitor has found a subject he can talk on, and before Gardwell departs he has won the esteem and confidence of the incorruptible jurist who cannot believe a man so fond of butterflies and fishing could possibly be animated by a sinister motive.

The second act of the drama is precipitated by the death of Gardwell's tool, Judge Frezett, and it becomes necessary for the accomplishment of the scheme that a successor who will be amenable to his subtle influences, be appointed. There are several meetings of corporation managers to discuss the subject and at one of these Gardwell presents the name of his new friend.

"I believe I am as much interested as any one in the things that are coming up in this court," said Gardwell, looking around the room. No one disputed the assertion, and he continued: "I have picked him out because, first of all, he is a strong man; in the second place, he is a good lawyer; but the main point in his favor is that he is fearless, and will dare to do, under any circumstances, what he thinks is right. I am a great believer in what may be called the hypnotic force of environment. To be plain: Judge Dunn in Bowerville will not be the same man as Judge Dunn in Malton, after a residence here of several months. What we want is a man who doesn't care a snap for precedent, but who will follow the dictates of his conscience, and do what he thinks is right. I can pledge you, gentlemen, that that is the kind of a man Judge Dunn is. Let him once make up his mind, and no power on earth can swerve him. That is the kind of a man I want to tie to, and I think I have found him in the person of Judge Tracy Dunn."

In due course, after a bitter fight with other corporate associations, Judge Tracy Dunn, through Gardwell's influence, is appointed by the President to the Circuit Court, and the selection is applauded by the press as a rebuke to the moneyed power which that jurist has always opposed. Of course the new judge is absolutely ignorant of the forces that have compassed his selection and he comes to Malton (the capital) proud of himself and his unimpeachable record which he fondly imagines the president has recognized. Here begin the Machiavellian tactics of Gardwell.

The Yorkshire lad in London town, the Breton peasant 'mid the gayeties of Paris, or the Green Mountain boy on Broadway for the first time, never felt more of a thrill than did Judge Dunn during the first few weeks of his new life. Under other circumstances a man of his age coming to the city would not so readily have adjusted himself to the new conditions; but the way was paved for him, and Gardwell was the smoothest and most industrious of pavers. He seemed to have the faculty of turning up at the most unexpected moments, in the most unexpected places, and at just the time Judge Dunn was really in need of help. It was Gardwell who took him to the club and introduced him to the leading business and professional men of the city. It was Gardwell who talked butterflies to him whenever he felt lonesome. It was Gardwell who looked up a house, secured it all furnished at a remarkably low rate of rental, and it was Gardwell who in a hundred and one little ways performed services which no one else thought of, and without which the judge would have been put to considerable trouble and expense. At first the judge had been inclined to hold a trifle aloof from his friend; but he very soon discovered that Gardwell was held in the highest esteem by all those with whom he came in contact, no matter what their station in life. The editors of the great papers which thundered in their editorial columns against corporations, and sometimes directly at Gardwell, spoke of him in the highest terms, and greeted him on all occasions with the utmost affability. A fashionable minister who made a specialty of pleading the cause of the toiling masses in glittering generalities was never so happy as when basking in the sunshine of Gardwell's smile, and the Judge had seen him run half a block to overtake him.

The crisis has come in the affairs of the Trans-American for the annual meeting is at hand. Trine is prepared to take control. Gardwell goes to New York and unfolds his great plan to Bass, the representation of Willer. Here is t he conspiracy and the part allotted to Judge Tracy Dunn:

"Gardwell," he exclalmed, "you are a keener! I said almost as great. If you can show me a way by which to retain permanent control, your interests shall be as great as mine. But it must be proven first."

"Good enough," said Gardwell, quietly. "I would put the road into the hands of a receiver."

Bass smiled pityingly, as he continued: "I said permanent control. It would be easy enough, perhaps, to secure a temporary advantage, but how could we expect to hold it with both the law and the money on their side? With one or the other we might succeed, but without either, never."

"The law is as the human mind construes it," said Gardwell, "and the belief, in a man's mind, that one thing is right and another wrong, makes it so, so far as that mind controls it. As for their money, in this case they would be invincible if they were poor; but as it is, their money is their one vulnerable point."

"What do you mean by such talk?" asked Bass, in some surprise.

"I mean," replied Gardwell, "that I know a Federal Judge who will appoint a receiver, stand by him with the grim tenacity of one of Oliver Cromwell's Roundheads, and feel that he is acting as the agent of Right in frustrating the wicked designs of a grasping corporation. As for money—pah! he wouldn't look at it."

"If you have such a man," said Bass, thoughtfully, "you have indeed discovered a rara avis. But, pray tell me, how did such a man ever get on the Federal bench?"

"I put him there," returned Gardwell, quietly.

"Oh, ho!" cried Bass, with a low whistle; "that accounts for it. You certainly have a hold on him."

"No," said Gardwell, "he does not even know that I had anything to do with it. He is a free agent, or at least he imagines he is, although he is bound by a chain which he can never break, and which he has no idea binds him."

To mature and carry out the plans for this new move required no small amount of labor, but Gardwell and Bass bent their energies to the task, and at the end of three weeks nothing remained but for Gardwell to "go home and touch the button," as Bass expressed it. The application for a receivership was made out in the name of a trust company which had large holdings in the Trans-American road; and so complete were all the details that even the court's decree ordering a receivership was drawn and prepared, lacking only the signature of Judge Dunn.

Soon afterwards, the moment arrives for Gardwell to act and he goes to the Judge's home to ask his aid. How cunningly he manipulates the prejudices of the judge the following scene exhibits:

"Three years ago I could have crushed the very forces which now rise up against me, and which will show me no mercy, and, what is worse, wreck the immense property of the Trans-American road. I do not care so much for myself, but my heart bleeds when I think of the thousands of innocent bondholders whom we have induced to put their savings into the enterprise, thinking it a safe and profitable investment."

Gardwell paused, and a groan escaped him.

"Is there no way by which you can protect your rights?" asked the judge.

"Rights!" exclaimed Gardwell. "Might makes right nowadays, as you have often said, judge. What mercy can we expect from men who have millions at their back, and who are as unscrupulous as they are powerful? The situation is this: The forces of Trine have enlisted the money of the Rothschilds and other foreign capitalists, and have secured the controlling interest. The annual meettng will shortly take place, at which this faction will obtain full control of the great road. Their next step will be to repudiate those obligations, the payment of which does not enhance their own interests, and thousands of stockholders and bondholders will be robbed. Yes, sir; robbed, I say, in the most barefaced, and yet in a legal manner. Had I been as unscrupulous as they have been, had I proved myself the financial trickster that some suppose me to be, these fellows would not now be in a position to take this advantage. Why, I could have wiped them out, as they will now demolish me and my associates."

"Can you not apply to the courts for protection?" asked the judge, attempting to rise on his elbow. "Such a bold and wholesale robbery should never be allowed to be consummated."

"The courts!" cried Gardwell, dramatically. "What court will afford us any lasting protection where the preponderance of power is measured in millions? Even a receivership for the road, which is the most we could ask for, would be met with opposition as soon as applied for."

"There is one court," said the judge, suddenly rising and sitting bolt upright on the lounge. "There is one court, and it is the court over which Judge Tracy Dunn has the honor to preside. It has never been said that I flinched in the face of duty, and it never shall be as long as I am alive. Draw your paper, sir; and if the facts are as you have just represented them to me, you shall be placed under the protection of my court."

"Judge," said Gardwell, grasping his hand, "I thank you for your noble offer. But you have no idea of the influences which will be brought to bear upon you."

"What do I care for such influences!" cried the judge, his eyes flashing. "And I take exception, sir, to your use of the word 'noble.' I do not wish to be eulogized for doing a plain and simple duty. Draw your application for a receivership if that is what you want. I will give it a careful inspection, and act according to my judgment, come what may."

For the rest of the conspiracy and the final undoing of Elliot Gardwell, the reader is referred to the book. It is a remarkable story not so much for its literary qualities as for the knowledge of the methods of influence which are utilized, and the clever characterization of the Judge and the Machiavellian railroad man. It is easy to suggest that the power of this marvellous manipulator is exaggerated, but the history of railroading is made by such men, whose stupendous business capacity and mental power sets them as far above ordinary beings as Kipling is above a newspaper hack. Indeed, it may be said the genius of this country is in the services of its electric and railroad corporations, and manifests itself in magnificent schemes and great executive powers rather than in art or literature. C.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

$100—Reward—$100

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

Address F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.
Sold by druggists, 75c.

A MEMOIR BY HIS SON

Alfred, Lord Tennyson.

On the 6th of October, the Anniversary of the Poet's Death, appeared the Memoir upon which his son has been at work for several years. It is in

Two Volumes, Medium Octavo
Price, $10.00 net.

These volumes, of over 500 pages each, contain many letters written or received by Lord Tennyson to which no other biographer could have had access, and in addition a large number of

Poems hitherto unpublished

Several chapters are contributed by such men as Dr. Jowett, the Duke of Argyll, the late Earl of Selborne, Mr. Lecky, Professor Francis T. Palgrave, Professor Tyndall, Mr. Aubrey de Vere, and others, who thus express the

Personal Recollections of His Friends

There will be many Illustrations, engraved after pictures by Richard Doyle, Samuel Lawrence, G. F. Watts, R.A., etc., in all about twenty full-page

Portraits and Other Illustrations.

The Complete Works, Poetical and Dramatic, of Alfred, Lord Tennyson

Six vols., gilt top, $9.00

This is the standard Library Edition, convenient in size, cloth-bound with gilt tops, and containing all of the published work of the Poet-Laureate, including The Foresters and his last volume of poems, which are copyrighted in this country, and cannot appear in any other than Macmillan Editions.

Lord Tennyson's Works Complete in One Volume. Globe Edition

Cloth, gilt top, $1.75 net

This is the edition most convenient for the use of teachers, students, or any who find that a necessity for frequent reference to different poems, or any other reason, makes a single volume desirable. It is bound in the dark green cloth, with portrait medallion on the side, gilt tops, etc., so familiar as the uniform binding of the standard editions of modern poets known as the GLOBE Editions. It is the only complete one-volume edition of Tennyson's Poems.

For sale by all booksellers.

PUBLISHED BY

The Macmillan Company

66 Fifth Avenue, New York

WHEN GUNNING

For Quail or Duck

LOAD

Your bag with a bottle of

KEYSTONE MONOGRAM WHISKEY

It will steady your aim!

PACIFIC COAST AGENTS

Sherwood & Sherwood

SAN FRANCISCO

PORTLAND LOS ANGELES

The Emporium and Golden Rule Bazaar San Francisco Calif.

THE TWO GREAT STORES CONSOLIDATED

Grand Inaugural Reception

Monday Oct. 11.

BEAUTIFUL DECORATIONS—FLOWERS—MUSIC—WONDERFUL DISPLAYS OF NEW MERCHANDISE—NOVEL FEATURES NEVER BEFORE SEEN IN S.F.—

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.

Telephone Main 5697.

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS ELECTRICAL CO

523 Mission St., San Francisco

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

University of California and Reliance Football — Olympic Club Notes.

The street-parade is a glorious thing. To advertise the wonders of a circus or to boom a professional baseball match it is undoubtedly successful, and its propriety in such cases cannot be questioned. However, college football men are not circus performers, and it hurts the friends of both the U. C. and the Reliance Club to see the players making a display of themselves on the public streets. It is to be hoped, in the future, that the football management will hold the name and dignity of California dearer than to acquiesce in such another advertising scheme. Not only is it undignified—it is futile. Such a parade attracts no one to the grounds. People who attend football matches have a vital interest in the game, in the sides, or in the individual players. Such few as a street parade might draw would not understand the game, could have no interest in it, and certainly would not return to another. The only following football needs is the enthusiastic partisan lover of the game, and he is bred through years, not drawn by curiosity or the rattle of a brass band.

* *

There is a faint, far-off whisper of the old U. C. spirit of discontent — an ugly rumor of mutiny against Mr. Nott and Captain Haskell. So far as I can learn there are no disaffected players and but few students, who feel that their coach merit the entire confieence of the college. There are some, fortunately not many, who have failed to learn from the past. They still yearn for star players, and feel that the stars should be exempt from the discipline enforced upon those of less reputation. To these the firm stand of Holt in the matter of Sheehy's disagreement with him, was a direct blow to the team, and some other positive rulings he has made render him a tyrant. Let these men stop to consider that this sort of thing is traitorous to their college, that having acquiesced to the coach, loyalty is due him, and every chance and aid should be given to perfect his plan of development and action. If those who control athletics at California know a good coach when they have one, they will support Mr. Nott and give him absolute control. The trouble with us out here on the Coast is that we have no conception of the possibilities of the game, nor of the means necessary to bring teams to perfection. We do not even know our best players. The men we laud as such are far from being so. They are those whose spectacular work appeals to the grand-stand — men whose brilliancy is gained at the expense of team development. The player who devotes himself quietly and persistently to work, is always in the right place at the right time, and who represses a desire to shine as a star — this man is overlooked, his value to the team is unthought of. Let him get in one or two dodging dashes through an open field, or swing out well in an interference — any one thing that brings his individual playing into prominence, no matter what his sins of omission may be, will earn our plaudits. He becomes a star, and immediately his voice is heard clamoring in opposition to his coach, and the college demands that the coach listen and be swayed by him. Now, where half a dozen such men are on a team, each with a different idea of what policy should be adhered to, the position of their coach is not to be envied. Under such conditions football is bound to be a failure, and the teams are doomed to defeat. Yet, when defeat does come, the very men responsible are the first to heap reproach on the coach and decry his ability, as they did last year.

* *

His defection brings to mind that much unpleasant criticism was directed towards the football management when Sheehy entered college. The same kind of unpleasant comment was rife last year, when Kerrigan, Morgan and other notables entered Stanford. Demand of a man who has competed under the colors of any other college, or of an athletic club, a year's residence before he is eligible as an athlete, and the suspicion of importation is removed. Gentlemen of the colleges, your duty is clear. Make such a law. Eastern universities have proven its worth.

* *

I have every respect for the football ability of Sheehy, but I am glad he is out of the California eleven. He had no moral right on the team, and, despite his peerless playing, could not have strengthened the eleven. Undoubtedly he was in the University, but he was not of it. He had not the enthsiastic loyalty college men give to their Alma Mater that he had given to his own college—Santa Clara. Now, it is just the possession of such fealty that makes a man of value to his eleven. It gives him the determination to do for her to the utmost. By virtue of it, he takes the hard work of training, the rebuffs of the coaches, and the thousand and one unpleasant things that go with the winning of a place on the 'Varsity. On the Thanksgiving Day of reckoning it will go ill if there be even one man of the eleven who is not aflame with the enthusiasm of his college.

* *

More than this, Sheehy had been unfitted for college football by his work with the Olympic eleven. Necessarily, on college teams, where most of the men are green, the discipline exercised by the coach and management must be infinitely more severe than that enforced in an athletic club. Here the ideas of the players are considered by the coach, a state of affairs which obviously could not exist in a college. Sheehy had been taught a style of game differing entirely from Coach Nott's ideal. He found the discipline onerous, and he demurred at having to change his style of play. Very sensibly, Mr. Nott insisted upon being master of the eleven. Sheehy, who is also a level-headed young man, saw the right thing to do, and did it. He will probably displace Erskine as tackle on the Reliance eleven, and we will see more of the brilliant work he showed last year. Surrounded by his old familiars, he can do himself full justice.

* *

Since the above was written Haskell has resigned the captaincy of California's eleven, and Percy Hall has been selected to succeed him. I have no doubt that Hall will make a good leader, but I doubt his having the drive of Haskell. Now, just what this team needs, whether they like it or not, is drive. It is what every team from Berkeley has needed since the days when Benson nsed to hurry them along, irrespective of anyone's feelings. Changing captains in mid-season does not promise well for the team's future. However, the college was wisé enough to sustain Nott's policy, and if the men will give Captain Hall their unswerving loyalty, all may yet be well.

JOHN ELLIOT
Who stands for the true amateur spirrt in athletics.

* *

Their pluck and willingness to work were the chief characteristics shown by the U. C. men on Saturday. The softness of the ground rendered it impossible to determine if they promise speed enough to make up for lack of weight. They did well against such superior weight, especially as the loose foothold handicapped them infinitely more than it did the heavier Reliance men. It will take a lot of hard work and the strictest kind of discipline to make them a winning team; still they give promise. Much practice in kicking and the handling of kicks will be necessary to make the work in that department even passable, for here the backs are lamentably weak. The game showed that the line had not been taught to make holes. When their tackles and guards are more efficient at this, the backs are sure to make good gains, Hopper especially going in with a dash and accuracy that few California backs have ever approached. It is in lack of accuracy that the eleven shows its greenness. Inexperience is also evident at the snap-back. Excepting Griesberg, the men are not on their toes; they do not start with the snap of the ball, consequently the opposing line-men, being under way first, have the advantage either in getting through to ta[illegible] or making a hole for a runner on the offen[illegible] When it livens up, and each man learns to move exactly with the ball, the line ought to be very effective, for there are some strong, active men working for places on it.

* *

The Reliance men showed their lack of practice. Had they a better center, they should win all their games easily, for practice ought to mould them into a team that neither college could defeat. Certainly in Morse and Carter they have the two best, halves on the coast, and in Sheehy and Sexton the best tackels, while at guard, Smith and Hobbs are the equals, if not the superiors, of Stanford's giants. Fiehert and Carle. If Captain Frick can only develop unison of action among his line men he will have almost as strong a team as last year's Olympians. It is doubtful, though, if any athletic club here will have so good an eleven again. It will be a long time before we see ends like Nolan and McCormack or a center like Ames.

* *

The nominating committee of the Olympic Club has fonnd no one willing to serve the club, and, despairing of finding any, will ask to be excused from duty. In such event the present board of directors will continue in office. A number of gentlemen on this board are really interested in amateur athletics, and it is unfortunate that they should have been responsible for the club's defection. Undoubtedly the Olympians had grievances, but secession is subtraction, and subtraction never cures. The same energy directed to reforma tion would have effected good for the club and for coast athletics in general. As it is, athletics are harmed, and the position of the Olympic Club is ludicrous. There is only one sensible course. The club is powerless unless associated with the colleges. These, with the Reliance and Olympic clubs, are the only athletic organizations in California. The Acme, Sacramento, and Fresno clubs have no weight in the athletic world. The first two are boxing clubs, with no conception of or love for amateur sport. Their presence renders the new association farcical. The Olympians demand a higher standard of amateurism before they will apply for readmission. While they remain in such company as they now are their position is hardly tenable. The most hardened sinner sometimes becomes the best of exhorters, but in this case the audience worth exhorting is to be reached only when the club is once more in the fold.

* *

It is true, as the Olympic Club men claim, that the association is dominated by the rowing clubs. Rowing has been boomed at the expense of athletics. Field days have been few and regattas many, and the water men have overshadowed the sprinters and other athletes. This is so because the club's apathy allowed it. Time and again there was no one to represent the winged "O" at the association's meetings, even when these meetings were held within the Olympic building. Request after request was made to the club for a representative, and was ignored. Naturally those who attended the meetings came to control the body. Athletes had such feeble representation that their claims were practically ignored. Finally when the Olympians awakened to the situation and sent Howard Taylor to represent them, the conditions were of too long standing to be remedied at once. The situation seemed so muddled that Taylor advised secession, believing it the only way to secure justice. Time has shown that he was not mistaken.

ROBERT PORTER.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

For latest styles in fall heckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

Q.—What is Champagne?

A.—It is Moet & Chandon "White Seal."

N. B.—The accuracy of this answer is endorsed by all connoisseurs of Europe and also by those of America, as shown by recent Custom House statistics.

"GOLD SEAL"
"BADGER"
"PIONEER"

Rubber Goods

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.

MANUFACTURER OF

OIL CLOTHING

R. H. PEASE
Vice-President and Manager

573-575-577-579 Market Street
SAN FRANCISCO

73-75 First Street, Portland, Or.

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

Baldwin Theatre

AL. HAYMAN & CO (Inc.) . . . . . Proprietors

Regular Performance Sunday Nights

Next Monday, October 11th

Second and Last Week of the Immense Comedy Success

My Friend from India

By H. A. Du Souchet

Presented by the Smyth & Rice Comedy Company

Oct. 18th, "Under the Red Robe"

Columbia Theatre

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers

Event of Events!

Commencing Monday, October 11th, America's Favorite Comedian, Digby Bell, supported by Laura Joyce Bell and a Great Company, in a Domestic Drama by Augustus Thomas, author of "Alabama"

The Hoosier Doctor

A Cast of Twenty-three Artists!

Digby Bell's work in "The Hoosier Doctor" is worthy of the best efforts of Joseph Jefferson or Nat C. Goodwin.—Chicago Inter Ocean. A veritable triumph. Tribune. Can anything more be said?

Orpheum

Week beginning Monday, Oct. 11th

PRESS ELDRIDGE, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of Fun; first American appearance of PROVO, the world-renowned Juggler; JOHN J. WELCH, Phenomenal Eccentric Dancer; tremendous hit of O'BRIEN & HAVEL in the "Newsboy's Courtship;" ADOLPHI TRIO, Flying Horizontal Bar Performers; In addition to McCarthy & Reynolds, Irish Character Artists; Smith Family, Bicyclists; and Clayton, Jenkins & "Jasper," Eccentric Comedians.

Undiminished enthusiasm in the KNABEN-KAPELLE

Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House

MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager

Monday, October 11th. Every Evening

One Week Only, by universal request, Balfe's Romantic Opera, in three acts

THE BOHEMIAN GIRL

An all-star cast, including Sig. Michelena, Phil Branson, Tillie Salinger, Edwin Stevens, Jno. J. Raffael, Bernice Holmes. Superb Chorous and Magnificent Orchestra under direction of Mr. Max Hirschfeld. Splendid Scenery and Corroct Costumes

Next week, opening of the Comic Opera Season. the new Japanese Opera, The Geisha

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : . : : . : Manager

Monday, Oct. 11th. Usual Matinee Saturday

Pure and Unalloyed Fun! Pioneer of Farce-Comedy

PINK DOMINOS

The Up-to-date Version! Terse Dialogue! Subtle Situations! Appropriate Costumes and Effects

Prices, including Reserved Seat, 50, 35, 25, 15c

Seats now selling—Phone Black 1106

Positively next week—Too Much Johnson

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last four performances of the Great Romantic Drama, Monte Cristo

Commencing Monday, Oct. 11th, Second week of the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H. Pascoe, in the Great Patriotic Naval Drama

THE WHITE SQUADRON

Wonderful New Scenic and Mechanical Effects! See the Congress of Nations, showing the Warships of the World.

Evg. Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

SONG RECITAL

GIVEN BY

MRS. ALFRED ABBEY

(SOPRANO)

MISS CONSTANCE JORDAN

ACCOMPANIST

Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, Friday, October 15th

8:15 P. M.

Tickets, 50c., including Reserved Seat, on sale at Benj. Curtaz & Son, 16 O'Farrell street, and San Francisco Music and Piano Co., 225 Sutter street. Seats may be reserved at the latter place on October 13th, 14th and 15th.

TURF TOPICS

The Racing Outlook — Eastern Horse Shows.

The trotting meeting at San Jose has been a quiet affair, poorly attended, as usual in that town nowadays. Next week the scene changes to Salinas.

Everything points to a really good season on the Turf, and when the bugle blows for the first race on the 1st prox., it will inaugurate a period that is being looked forward to by racing men with the utmost hopefulness. Both at Ingleside and Oakland the management are sparing no effort to attract public patronage, and give satisfaction to horse-owners as well as to all who are connected with the sport of racing. The amount of money offered in stakes and purses will be greater than ever before, and, as far as can at present be judged, the class of horses competing at the tracks will show improvement. A larger proportion of long-distance events is certain to increase public interest in racing, while affording at the same time the best test of the real merit of the horses.

Several large strings of thoroughbreds have come in within the last two weeks, and with favorable weather training operations have been growing more lively every day. The prospects are that the condition of both tracks will favor improved records during the coming season.

As was only to be expected the first batch of entries for the coming racing season are mainly representative of stables which belong either altogether to this section of the country, or at all events partially by reason of their prolonged location here for the winter meetings year after year. The purely Eastern stables that we are advised of as coming to California have not filed any claim on the few stakes closed up to the present time. The eight events of the California Jockey Club, which closed on the 20th ulto. have received a total of 322 entries, the highest number in any one race being sixty-eight, in the Racine Stakes, six furlongs, for two-year-olds. The smallest number is twenty-eight, in the Athenian Club Cup (selling), two and one-quarter miles, for three-year-olds and upwards. As all of the events in question are to be run off before Christmas it is nntural that they should be side-tracked to some extent by stables yet to arrive here. The next list to be published will be that of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club events closing on the 15th instant.

The new rule of the Turf Congress requiring all racing associations within their jurisdiction to collect jockeys' fees from owners will come into effect from January 1st next. This should be most beneficial, and go a long way to put a stop to many of the evils which have arisen in the past for want of such a regulation.

Mr. J. S. Curtis, the South African turfman, who has lately got together a string of American-bred race horses, is reported to have made entries for some of the leading events in England in 1899 and 1900. Amongst the animals nominated is Method, the full brother to Ornament, purchased by Mr. Curtis as a yearling this season.

The Horse Show at Chicago, to be held in the Coliseum from November 1st to 6th, will be an immense undertaking, consisting of no less than 260 classes, with prize money aggregating $45,000. The list of judges who have been invited to officiate is largely made up of the names of men who have acted in that capacity at the New York, Philadelphia and other shows on the Atlantic coast, and all the arrangements will partake of the character which has contributed to the success of the New York event during many years past.

Cleveland, O., will hold a show immediately following the Chicago affair, and then the Eassern metropolis will have its show in the middle of the month. BENEDICT.

Do You Want Gold?

Everyone desiring to keep informed on Yukon, the Klondyke and Alaskan gold fields. Send 10 cents for large Compendium of vast information and big color map to Hamilton Publishing Company, Hamilton, Indiana.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

After a night with the boys: Bromo Kola.

FINANCE AND TRADE

Stock Exchange Notes — Grain, Livestock and Lumber.

Thursday Evening.

The general feeling in business circles continues to be hopeful. In almost every department an improved tone prevails, the range of values has considerably appreciated during the past few weeks, and the outlook points to a further spread of these favorable conditions.

Reports to hand from the East encourage the belief that, while money may be somewhat dearer in the immediate future, nothing like the sharp advance, which for a moment lately appeared probable, need be expected. The course of affairs in the New York Stock Market evidences that the general investing public have not been crowded out by the speculators, and the recent action of the banks in restricting their advances for stock exchange purposes has checked the bullish tone which showed a tendency to carry prices beyond safe limits.

Silver has recovered its position during the week, through the apparent failure of the negotiations of the United States Commissioners to arrive at any distinct understanding with European authorities chiefly interested in maintaining the value of the metal, will probably cause fresh weakness.

The readiness with which a $200,000 parcel of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railroad 5 per cent bonds was taken from the syndicate at 100½ bespeaks the ultimate success of the public issue. It is intended to place a limited quantity of the bonds on the local market each month, and, if the price is not too high, there is not the least doubt they will be readily absorbed by investors looking for high-class securities.

The decision of the Supreme Court in the Supervisors' case has had the effect, as we predicted last week, of strengthening the position of Spring Valley Water Company stock in the market, and the quotation has advanced to 99¾ to 101. Gas Company stocks also reflect the feeling of the market, and are perceptibly stronger since the announcement of the court's judgment.

The tendency in regard to Bank shares generally continues upward. Bank of California registers quite a sharp advance on the week, and the shares are to-day listed 240 to 243, with the market strong and showing an inclination to still higher figures.

In the miscellaneous department, Sugar stocks continue to be inquired for, and everything points to further enhancement of values, in view of Hawaiian annexation prospects. The buying orders are coming from the right quarter, and the market presents a strong front for this class of industrial investments.

Speaking generally, there has not been a great deal doing in the local stock market, and the Jewish holiday having caused some interruption of business during the current week, the volume of trading has been comparatively light. The market throughout, however, exhibits a good deal of buoyancy, and prices are well maintained.

In the local grain markets there has been considerable improvement, due chiefly to the strong enquiry in the East from foreign centers, Paris in particular. The result has been a daily gain of strength and an appreciable advance in values. Farmers had begun to fear they had many of them held on too long, and will now probably be ready to loosen up and take advantage of the recent advance in values.

In live stock the generally active and strong market throughout the country keeps local values at a higher level than they have been for a long time past, and the large holders of cattle, sheep and hogs are very firm in their demands.

In the lumber trade things are growing more and more lively. All the leading mills are fully engaged, and for the moment indisposed to accept fresh orders. The result is that rates are on the upward grade and are likely to advance steadily in the immediate future.

Arrivals at the St. Denis Hotel, New York, to October 1st: Mrs. A. H. Tickle, H. Locke, Geo. J. G. Marsley, San Francisco.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. For particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

THE WASHBURN-MOEN MANUFACTURING COMPANY AT THE MECHANICS FAIR
First Prize for the Best General Exhibit

$2,000.00

The sooner you begin using Schilling's Best tea and baking powder, the better your opportunity to get some of that $2,000.00.

And the more you will enjoy your cake and eating.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street

Under Occidental Hotel

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. . ALSO . .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks

From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.

Mount Vernon Company . . Pacific Coast

Baltimore Sole Agents

Beware of Imitations

This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea

Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.

208 California St., S. F.

For sale by all grocers

DR. WARD'S

MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin. Price, One Dollar.

Ward Medical Co., 330 Dearbon Street, Chicago

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.

PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO

HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.

UNDERTAKERS

641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb

Telephone Main 43

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY
SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas..... | 4 00 am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City ..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Stmr. Pomona, 2 p.m. October 1, 5, 9, 13, 18, 22, 26, 30; November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28.

For Newport, Los Angeles and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Oct. 1, 5, 9, 13, 17, 21, 25, 29 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, Redondo--Los Angeles--and Newport, at 11 a.m. Oct. 3, 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27, 31 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, Stmr. Orizaba, 10 a.m. the 2d each month

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov. 2 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.

S. S. "Moana," for Australia, Thursday, October 14, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO General Agents

Bids for Concessions and Privileges in Yosemite Valley.

OFFICE OF THE YOSEMITE COMMISSIONERS
San Francisco, August 10, 1897.

In accordance with Rule XXXIV of the Rules and Regulations governing Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove, adopted July 13, 1896, sealed bids are hereby invited for the following concessions and privileges in the Yosemite grant, for the year beginning November 1, 1897, and ending October 31, 1898, viz.:

First—For keeping a livery stable and conducting a general livery business in the Valley, and also for the rental of the Royal Arch Farm and Stables.

Second—For rental of stable and coachhouse on Georgia Avenue (stage headquarters).

Third—For rental of hotel, out-buildings and grounds at Glacier Point, and privilege of conducting a hotel business at that point.

Fourth—For rental of store building and privilege of conducting a general merchandise business in the Valley.

Bids must be presented to the Secretary on or before Monday, October 12, 1897, at 12 o'clock m., at the office of the Commissioners, San Francisco.

Bids must be accompanied by sufficient guarantee that contract shall be carried out by bidders to the satisfaction of the Commissioners. The Commissioners reserve the right to reject any and all bids.

JOHN F. SHEEHAN,
Secretary and Treasurer.
Room 25, Tenth Floor, Mills Building, San Francisco.

POTOSI MINING COMPANY—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Storey County, Nev.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 8th day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 48) of Twenty-five Cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 13th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 4th day of November, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the cost of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. CHAS. E. ELLIOTT, Secretary.

Office, room 79, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Alta Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 57
Amount per share, 10 cents
Levied Sept. 3, 1897
Delinquent in office Oct. 6, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Oct. 27, 1897
J. E. JACOBUS, Secretary.
Office, room 33, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

ANDES SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 1st day of September, 1897, an assessment (No. 44) of Ten Cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the offices of the company, rooms 20-22 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 4th day of October, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Monday, the 25th day of October, 1897, at 1 o'clock p.m., to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.
JOHN W. TWIGGS, Secretary.
Office, rooms 20-22, Nevada Block, 509 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—In the matter of the application of the SITES SANDSTONE COMPANY (a corporation) to dissolve: Notice is hereby given that the Sites Sandstone Company, a corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, has presented to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco an application praying to be allowed to disincorporate and dissolve, and that Monday the 11th day of October, A. D. 1897, at 10 o'clock a.m. of said day, has been appointed as the time, and the Courtroom of Department No. 7 of said Superior Court, New City Hall, San Francisco, California, as the place, at which said application is to be heard.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said Superior Court this 8th day of September, A. D. 1897.
C. F. CURRY, Clerk.
By Joseph Riordan, Deputy Clerk.
VAN NESS & REDMAN, Att'ys for Petitioners.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California—In the matter of the Estate of Eudora A. Chambers, sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers, deceased.

Notice is hereby given that Monday the 18th day of October, A.D. 1897, at 10 o'clock a.m. of said day, and the Courtroom of Department No. 10 of said Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said Eudora A. Chambers, sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers, deceased, and for hearing the application of Robert C. Chambers for the issuance to him of Letters Testamentary thereon.

Dated September 23d, A.D. 1897.
CHARLES F. CURRY, Clerk.
[SEAL] By V. F. Northrop, Deputy Clerk.
FRANKLIN K. LANE, Attorney for Petitioner, Crocker Building, San Francisco.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Belcher Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 56
Amount per share, 20 cents
Levied September 18, 1897
Delinquent in office, October 21, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Nov. 11, 1897.
C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.
Office, room 37, Mills Building, San Francisco.

BAJA CALIFORNIA
DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of
Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

THE LATEST STYLES IN
CHOICE WOOLENS
H. S. BRIDGE & CO.
Merchant Tailors
623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel
Bicycle and Golf Suits

BONESTELL & CO.
Dealers in PAPER
Fine Coated Papers a Specialty
401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, book binders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.
TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST
BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

Guarantee Capital and Surplus - $2,040,201 66
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash - 1,000,000 00
Deposits December 31, 1896 - - 27,730,247 45

OFFICERS

President, B. A. Becker
First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer
Second Vice-President, H. Horstmann
Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt
Assistant Cashier, Wm. Herrmann
Secretary, George Tourny
Assistant Secretary, A. H. Muller

DIRECTORS

B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

Deposits December 31, 1896 - $22,885,377
Paid Up Capital and Surplus - 1,594,503

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS

George W. Beaver — Robert Watt
Thomas Magee — Geo. C. Boardman
W. C. B. de Fremery — Daniel E. Martin
Albert Miller — Geo. Tasheira
E. B. Pond

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

Paid Up Capital . . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . . 25,000

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary.
A. J. CARMANY, Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1720

Capital Paid Up, $3,416,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

B. J. SMITH, Assistant Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
801 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD LANE

LANE & LANE

Attorneys and Counselors

Room 202
Crocker Building, San Francisco

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

There was a man named Watkins in a Confederate regiment during the war, who was well on toward middle-life; but when his wife came to camp one day he seemed young by comparasion. There seemed to be a century's difference between them; and the man, who was as ugly as a Georgia cracker usually is, was handsome beside his wife. "How did you ever come to marry such an old witch as that?" asked one of his superior officers, taking him aside. "Well, you see, said the man, rather sheepishly, "her mother kept a little grocery store down on the corner of the street where I lived, and I used to go in there to get what I wanted to eat. One day I found the old woman's ugly daughter all alone in the store. Just as I came in I heard the clink of silver in the loose rafters over head, and the old woman counting: 'One, two, three,' and so on. I sat down and made love to the girl, and the old woman upstairs kept on counting. By and by she was away in the hundreds—four hundred, four hundred and fifty, five hundred I courted the girl harder and harder as the old woman got higher. Finally she stopped at nine hundred. 'Great Scott!' I said to myself. 'Nine hundred dollars!' 'Beloved Sukey will you be mine?' She said she would, and we were married that same day." "Well, is that all?" "No; there was only thirty of those silver dollars; the old woman counted them over thirty times." Perhaps it would be well to investigate a little every time.

A good story is told of Lamartine, in the revolution of 1848. At the Hotel de Ville, Lamartine received the announcement that a deputation of Vesuviennes demanded an interview. These women strongly resembled the famous poissardes of the first revolution. The doors of his cabinet were thrown open, and the apartment was presently filled by these fierce-looking dames, whose disheveled locks and uncouth garb presented anything but an attractive spectacle. Monsieur de Lamartine bowed, and begged to know whether he could be of any service to his visitors. "Citizen," replied the foremost among them, standing with arms akimbo in front of her comrades, "the Vesuviennes have resolved to send you a deputation to express their admiration of your conduct. There are fifty of us, and in the name of all the Vesuviennes, we, fifty in number, have come to kiss you." The poet gave one glance at the forest of unkempt hair and the rubicund cheeks of the unwashed Venuses and thus replied: "Citoyennes, I thank you for the sentiments you inspire me with; but allow me to remark that patriots of your stamp are more than women—they are men! Men do not embrace each other. We shake hands." And they did, till he was almost sorry he had not made it kisses after all.

The Bishop of Worcester, England, once had occasion to travel through Banbury by rail. Being desirous to test and at the same time to encourage the far-famed industry of that town, he beckoned to a small boy and inquired the price of the celebrated buns. "Threepence each," said the boy. The Bishop thereupon handed him sixpence and desired him to bring one to the car, adding: "And with the other threepence you may buy one for yourself." The boy shortly returned, complacently munching his Banbury, and, handing the threepence in coppers to the Bishop, exclaimed: "There was only one left, guv'nor."

When the late Senator Taber, of Colorado, reached Washington to enter upon his thirty-days' senatorial career, he went to a well-known livery stable and said he wanted to hire for a few days the best team and carriage it could afford. "You shall have 'em, senator." "Put the nigger in livery, will you—bang up livery?" "It'll be as good as Brewster's," "And a new plug hat—shiny?" "Yes." "And put one o' them there red bugs on the side of the hat; that'll make it look toney." The livery man furnished them all, red bug and shiny hat included, and the statesman was happy.

In 1845, Lord Boyle, afterwards Earl of Glasgow, was making a political speech in Renfrewshire. He was a robust, plain-spoken man. Up from the back of the audience arose a workingman who desired to ask a question—a man with hair on his chest, sooty face, and grimy hands, who shouted: "Tell us what articles you would admit free of duty." Lord Boyle resented this leading question—one that he was taking particular pains to avoid, and shaking his fist furiously at the offender, he said: "You black son of Satan, the first thing I'll admit free of duty will be soap—soap, sir—soap!" The grimy person retired at once.

Mr. F. Litchfield, the well-known art-dealer, exhibited some panels of old tapestry at the Manchester Jubilee Exhibition. Wanting one of these returned he wired: "Please send panel eight by ten—Venus and Adonis.—Litchfield." The departmental head of the exhibition was away, and the clerk returned the message to the postoffice as "not understandable." The postoffice people struck with a bright idea, then transmitted the telegram to the city of Litchfield, and received the following reply: "No such firm as Venus and Adonis known here. Try Manchester.

A certain Western Senator who has but recently taken up cycling was wheeling in Washington through the agricultural grounds, when he met a man and two women whom he knew. Quite properly, the senator raised one hand from his wheel to raise his hat, and the next minute he had tumbled into a bed of flowers. "You did that very gracefully, senator," was the comment of the trio of bicyclers. "I always dismount in the presence of ladies," instantly replied the senator.

The famous Thad. Stevens had a colored servant in Washington named Matilda, who, one morning, smashed a large dish at the buffet. "What have you broken now, you —— —— black idiot?" exclaimed her master. Matilda meekly responded: "'Taint de fo'th commandment, bress de Lawd!"

MATCHLESS IN EVERY FEATURE

THE CONSENSUS OF OPINION REGARDING

The Ladies' Grill-Room

. . OF . .

The Palace

Direct entrance from Market Street. Open until Midnight.

St. Denis

Broadway and Eleventh St. NEW YORK

OPPOSITE GRACE CHURCH

EUROPEAN PLAN

In a modest and unobtrusive way there are few better conducted hotels in the Metropolis than the St. Denis.
The great popularity it has acquired can readily be traced to its unique location, its homelike atmosphere, the peculiar excellence of its cuisine, and its very moderate prices.

William Taylor & Son.

Hotel Bella Vista

1001 PINE STREET

Elegant Furnishings and Apartments

DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED

MRS. A. F. TRACY.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Hotel Rafael

SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Society Resort, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Climate Unexcelled!
Magnificent Scenery!
The Sanitarium of the Pacific Coast
Otis Elevators Electric Lights

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments

R. H. WARFIELD CO.

Proprietors

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F
Telephone 301

"Don't yer try to bunco me with something 'just as good' as Piper Heidsieck Plug. Gimme one of the big new five-cent pieces."

PIPER HEIDSIECK
PLUG TOBACCO

with its delicious champagne flavor, never yet failed to please the most fastidious tobacco chewer. Once tried, it is not forgotten. Once used, there is no satisfactory substitute. Hitherto the only objection to it has been its cost—but that is now reduced. A five-cent piece is more than one-third larger than it used to be. Try the new size, with the old flavor.

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 42 SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 16, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

This Paper not to be taken from the Library.

THE U. S. S. "MONTEREY" IN THE MARE ISLAND DRY DOCK

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 16, 1897

CONTENTS

| | |
|---|---|
| Editorials | 2-3 |
| Things and People, by Boswell Jr. | 3 |
| North Beach Development | 4 |
| Making a Charter | 4 |
| How San Francisco Lives; by John Bonner | 5 |
| Are they Spoiled? | 11 |
| The Navy of Japan | 6 |
| "Judy's Service of Gold Plate;" by Frank Norris | 6 |
| The Kingdom of the Czar | 6 |
| At the Playhouses | 7 |
| Types of the Warships of Japan | 8 |
| The Corinthian Yacht Club Regatta | 9 |
| A Debutante's Diary | 10 |
| The Theatres | 10 |
| New Books in Review | 12 |
| Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter | 13 |
| Turf Topics; by Benedict | 14 |
| Financial Review | 14 |
| New Stories Re-Told | 16 |

WHAT DOES THE SOUTH DESIRE?

The Southern end of our State is threatened with a piece of political jobbery that, if we are correctly informed, is calculated to defeat the reasonable wishes of the great body of its intelligent voters. Toward frustrating the machinations of the coterie of Northern politicians engaged in the not altogether savory proceeding, The Wave is inclined to lend a helping hand; for the plot, if successful, would breed an unwholesome and unnecessary political discontent in the South that might better be avoided, and while it might serve private ends admirably enough, would answer no good public purpose.

It is somewhat early to indulge in political speculation, but it is not too early to have settled and firmly fixed in the public mind certain political rights and wrongs, lest honest men being misinformed may thereby be misled into contributing to the perpetration of a rank injustice.

At the next election there will be chosen an entire State ticket, including a Governor and a Legislature—the latter body will, in turn, name a United States Senator to succeed Stephen M. White. Practically, these two high offices will be filled at the same election, and it is assumed, as a matter of sane politics, that the section of the State from which the Governor is chosen will not expect or be entitled to receive the Senatorship. Geography is a hard thing to overcome in politics—argument, it will not submit to—and it has come to be an unwritten rule in politics that the distributiou of offices should have some reference to geography.

The outgoing Senator is a resident of Los Angeles. Following along lines of naturalness his successor should be taken from that environment, and particularly should this course be followed if the body of the people there residing demand it. Mr. White is the first representative the State has ever had in the United States Senate from south of the Tehachapi mountains. If his successor is chosen from the same locality it will serve to establish a fixed rule in the politics of our State that Senatorial honors shall be divided, as near as may be, between the North and the South. For this and other reasons, we are told the intelligent voters of the South stoutly demand the privilege of naming the next Senator in preference to all else political.

But the meeting of the State convention which nominates a Governor precedes the session of the Legislature which chooses a Senator, and crafty politicians are already plotting to force the gubernatorial nomination down the throat of the South in hopes of tricking it out of its Senator. The conspirators then propose to profit by their own mischief, and set up the cry that "The South cannot have a Governor and a Senator too." Unless our Southern brothers definitely and in unmistakable terms announce their preference for a Senatorship, they will certainly find themselves—to use a vulgar term—"buncoed" out of a Senator. Providing, of course, their political preference be a Senatorship.

Fair-minded men who deal in politics and take note of public affairs, are willing to concede the Senatorship to the South if it desires it, and The Wave for one northern journal will vigorously support such a contention. The North, in all decency, owes this much to the South. During the last campaign the South did not question our rights in this respect, for county conventions in every county south of Tehachapi joined heartily in the support of Senator Perkins and without a murmur instructed their legislative nominees to vote for him. Common decency demands similar action on our part, and if the South can some time hereafter agree upon a man whose name will not sound strangely in our northern ears, county conventions in the north, where boss rule does not dominate, will certainly return the compliment, and defeat the conspiracy now hatching.

It is not necessary for either party in the South to agree upon given candidates at this time. It is only necessary for the South, Democrats and Republicans alike, to give voice to their preference in the matter. In case they are to be conceded one and denied the other, which would the people prefer—a Senator or a Governor? There should be no toying with this question. It should be settled decisively and at once, and if settled in favor of the Senatorship, then the Southern Gubernatorial aspirant who is being flattered and cajoled by northern politicians, and who threatens to sacrifice his people at the altar of his personal ambition, should have peremptory notice served on him, that he is treading dangerously near to the line that marks the boundary between local patriotism and base treachery.

THE SPANISH PROBLEM.

In spite of the efforts of the sensational press of two continents to demonstrate the fact, it has become apparent that the relations between the United States and Spain are approaching a crisis of unusual gravity. While it is highly improbable that our Minister at Madrid has presented to the Spanish government anything like the flat ultimatum from Washington, which the excitable correspondents professed to discover, and published soon after his arrival in Spain, it is probably true that he has been instructed to impress upon the government of the Queen-Regent the absolute necessity for a speedy settlement of the protracted disturbance in Cuba. Such an announcement from one government to another necessarily involves an alternative, and whether it is openly expressed or left to be understood diplomatically, is of no importance. In this case the Spaniards can have no room for doubt as to what the alternative will be.

The struggle in Cuba, which the Spaniards insist is not a war, but a mere civil disturbance, and which we ourselves have not yet recognized as conferring the character of lawful belligerency on the insurgents, has now continued for two years and eight months. During that time Spain has sent two hundred thousand soldiers to Cuba, and spent more than two hundred millions of dollars in the effort to re-establish Spanish rule throughout the island. The commerce of Cuba is extinct, its industries are ruined, its wealth is destroyed. Spanish blood and Spanish treasure have been poured forth lavishly, if unwisely, the arms of Spain have met disgrace that is worse than defeat, and the Spanish name has been stained by acts of atrocious cruelty committed in pursuance of a policy of poor statesmanship and poorer soldiership. And the result is that to-day the rebellion is as vigorous as ever, and more promising of success as the resources of Spain are more nearly exhausted. The Cuban forces are masters of three-fourths of the island, and the Spaniards are reduced to a precarious tenure of their stations on the coast and the country within a radius of a day's march of a few inland garrisons. The Spanish commanders have ceased to be aggressive, and their energies seem to be devoted entirely to the enforcement of the cruel policy of concentrating the non-combatant inhabitants within the small circles of Spanish authority, where no provision is made for them and where they are forbidden to provide for themselves. The only results of such a policy are to destroy those who submit to it, and to convert into active enemies of Spain all those who can escape from it. The result is a deadlock. All the resources of Spain, directed by such ability as her chosen commanders have displayed, have been proved to be unequal to the task of vindicating her sovereignty throughout the island. On the other hand, the Cubans, without recognition even as belligerents, and without the right to fly their flag on the high seas, are unequal to the task of reducing the large towns now held by the Spaniards, and wresting from them the control of the ports of the islands.

The government and the people of Spain seem to think that they have a right to maintain this condition of affairs for an indefinite time, and the Spanish press resents, with much vigor of language, the idea that the United States have any intersst in the matter which would warrant our interference in the quarrel between Spain and her revolted colony. The arrival in Spain of Minister Woodford, the tragic death of Canovas del Castillo, the succession of the ministries of Azcareaga and Sagasta—all these events have called forth expressions of Spanish opinion, from many quarters and from all parties of Spanish politics, from which it seems clear that the Spanish people would unite in a determined and enthusiastic opposition to American intervention in any form. Even an offer of the good offices of the United States in an effort to restore peace in Cuba without extinguishing the sovereignty of Spain over the island is so distasteful to Castilian pride that the very suggestion of it is emphatically resented. We are not at present concerned with the inquiry as to how far Spanish opposition to American intervention could be made effective. The important matter for present consideration is the fact that intervention of some sort seems to be a rapidly approaching necessity, and that, as a consequence, a war with Spain is within the bounds of reasonable probability.

In his last message to Congress, ten months ago, President Cleveland described the condition of affairs then existing in Cuba, and, while he believed it proper to wait a reasonable time to allow the Spaniards to restore, if possible, their authority over the island, he declared that unless this was accomplished we must find means to put an end to the strife. In that declaration Mr. Cleveland undoubtedly voiced the sentiments of a majority of American citizens. Since that time the Spanish cause has gone backward, and a peaceful solution of the struggle between Spain and her insurgents seems more remote than ever. There is no reason to believe that President McKinley and his advisers are at all inclined to recede from the position taken by our government under Mr. Cleveland—on the contrary, there is reason to believe that the present administration has advanced from that position to the point from which intervention is possible. There is absolutely no evidence of a desire on the part of the United States for a war of conquest, but public sentiment and sympathy in this country are favorable to the Cuban cause, and the public opinion is that we have been sufficiently patient and forbearing with Spain, and that now our duty and our interests require that there shall be an end of a strife on our own borders, the contiuuance of which can result only in further misery and destruction, without accomplishing any end for which war may legitimately be waged. The Spanish position is that the war may be continued indefinitely. The American position is that the war must cease. Should both parties stand firm in their present attitudes, another war, now only a rather remote probability, will soon approach within the line of reasonable doubt.

PRESS CENSORSHIP OF THE JUDICIARY.

A friend, familiar with the attitude of The Wave with respect to the Press and the Judiciary, has directed our attention to a decision of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in which that tribunal has upheld the right of the Press to criticize a judge who is a candidate for further judicial honors. The Wave has never questioned this right. It seems in the Wisconsin case, that a certain Judge Bailey—a candidate for re-election—had opposed to his election an attorney named Doolittle and an editor, Mr. Ashbaugh. In their efforts to defeat the judge, these gentlemen published various articles charging him with official extravagance, unfairness, partiality and "openness to corrupt motives." Grave and serious imperfections, by the way, in a judicial officer. Instead of availing himself of the adequate remedies, civil and criminal, which the law affords the libelled citizen, this very injudicious person cited his critics to appear before his court, to answer in contempt proceedings. The lawyer and the editor very properly sought and promptly secured from the Supreme Court an alternative writ of prohibition directed against the Wisconsin Jeffries. Whereupon that most resourceful judicial officer found the offenders guilty of a fresh contempt for the affidavits alleging the truth of their criticisms, contained in their application to the Supreme Court. The matter finally came up for a hearing before the higher tribunal and that court very sensibly held the judge had exceeded his powers, and forthwith made the writ absolute.

The conduct of the Wisconsin Judge was arbitrary, unusual, repugnant to decency, in violation of law, and without precedent. The very means he employed to silence criticism added the color of truth to the charges he would smother, emphasized his entire unfitness, and demonstrated that which his critics were attempting to prove.

We have no quarrel with the Press for charging specific wrongdoing against public officers—administrative, legislative or judicial; but we do insist that such charges should be specific and well considered. It is the broad, sweeping, meaningless, mischief-provoking insinuations, aimed at the judiciary that engage our hostility. It is the criticism leveled at the integrity of a court for holding to principles that do not dovetail with popular will, that seem to us outrageous and in bad taste. It is the criticism intended to influence and intimidate courts during the progress of a case that provokes our indignation. Good, sound, wholesome, criticism of a judge, who is a candidate for renewed public favor, is not only to be expected, but it is to be desired. Ill-considered, loose, haphazard charges, work not only a wrong to the assaulted judge but ultimate harm to our entire judicial system.

The Judge is situated as is no other public officer. Except in grave cases of malfeasance he should be exempt from the attacks to which our ordinary public officers are subject, for he may not at once maintain the dignity of his office and defend himself. It is cowardly and dishonorable to assault one rendered so helpless.

The Wisconsin judge did something more than attempt to defend himself. He tossed his robes of office to one side, threw dignity to the dogs, and, divesting himself of every attribute that should mark the conduct of a judge, descended to the level of an ordinary man, inflamed with all the ignoble passions in the category of hate. The judge who turns his court into a torture chamber for his enemies, and employs the decrees of his court as weapons to punish and belabor his opponents or lash his critics into silence, forfeits the esteem of honest citizens, and relinquishes the shield that generations of law-abiding men have set up for his protection. Human sentiments have no place in judicial decrees. Fear must not influence the judge, nor kindly affection for particular litigants move him to soften the asperities of the law. He is elevated above his fellows—so the presumption runs—not only because of his learning in the law, but because of his known impartiality. He is there to diligently serve a most jealous mistress. Departing from the well worn path that duty and honor have clearly marked out for him to follow, he brings discredit on himself, and works harm irreparable to that great branch of government which he disgraces.

GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION

By DAVID E. SPENCER.*

Many opponents of "Government by injunction," waste a great deal of energy because they do not realize that it is too late to turn or stem the current of judicial decision. It is time that the two questions involved in the consideration of the modern use of injunctions should be carefully separated. The practical question no longer is, have the courts transcended their powers, but rather, should the law be changed?

We ought first of all to recognize that the power of the courts are established beyond the reach of successful question. At the time of the establishment of our original State and Federal judiciaries, it was well recognized that equity had the power to intervene by injunction for the prevention of irremediable injury to property or rights, even though the acts enjoined might also be punishable under the criminal law. This function has, until the last ten years, been regarded without hostility. So far from that, it has universally been recognized that here is the only effective remedy for certain classes of wrongs, or rather threatened wrongs.

But of late we hear the cry that the law has been strained. We are told that there are no precedents for the recent use of the writ in conflicts between labor and capital. Now it should not be a matter for surprise to see the scope of principles of law expanding in their application to new facts and conditions. This is a common phenomenon. The fact, then, that the injunctions in question have little or nothing in the way of precedent to support them, should not lead us to deny the technical legality of this exercise of power. And it does not matter that formerly the remedy was employed where only private interests were affected, whereas the use complained of involves far-reaching public interests. The denunciations of "judge-made law," "usurpation of legislative functions," "attempts to fill gaps in the law," are without foundation.

What has just been said applies to the question of the powers of the State courts. The national courts, however, have of course been the principal object of complaint. But equally well established is the legality of most of the federal injunctions and imprisonments for contempt of court during the labor troubles of the last few years. Here the jurisdiction has been exercised largely in the enforcement of positive statutes recognized to be quite within the sphere of the central government. In their injunctions to enforce these laws, and in others issued in connection with federal receiverships of railroads, the United States courts have gone far beyond the State courts in the direction of restrictions on the acts of striking laborers. But the lawfulness of such exercise of power must be taken as established.

The most vital phase of this part of our subject is the question of the relation of the summary process for contempt of court to the right of trial by jury. Here the only pertinent question is, has the court power to issue the order? If it has, it may punish disobedience to that order in any way it could when the constitution was established. In other words, the right secured by the constitution is the right as it then existed. In fact it is only because the distinction between benefits of trial by jury and right of trial by jury has not been kept in mind that anyone could, from the legal standpoint, seriously maintain that Mr. Debs, for example, was deprived of a constitutional right.

The upshot of the whole matter is that the opponents of this use of injunction and process for contempt of court are on the wrong track when they urge objections on the score of constitutionality and legality. The drift of the decisions under the common law and the statutes is against them, and it may as well be frankly recognized that the courts will not and can not reverse themselves. It is too late to secure the desired ends through judicial decision in the application of old principles to new facts, and change must come, if it come at all, through legislation and constitutional amendment.

We may now turn to the second branch of our inquiry. Should the law be changed? Have the State courts, in applying old remedies under new conditions, gone further than is expedient? In this connection the dissenting opinion in a Massachusetts case is most worthy of study. The question was whether certain acts should be held to constitute an illegal boycott, and Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes said: "In numberless instances the law warrants the infliction of temporal damage because it regards it as justified. It is on the question of what shall amount to a justification, and more especially on the nature of the consideration which really determines, or ought to determine, the answer to that question that judicial reasoning seems to me often to be inadequate. The true grounds of decision are considerations of policy and of social advantage, and it is vain to suppose that solutions can be attained merely by logic and the general propositions of law which nobody disputes." Perhaps the words of Justice Holmes will in the long run be found to contain more wisdom than the technical pleadings of the lawyer and the technical decisions of the judges, sound as these are from the standpoint of the strict letter of the law. And the conviction may finally gain ground that, in view of the present relative strength of labor and capital, workingmen should have open to them wider means to put pressure upon employers than the law now permits. There is prevalent, besides, a well-founded idea that the courts have established for themselves a function that properly belongs to the executive, acting through the officers of the peace, the militia and the criminal courts with their juries. Hence the cry of "government by injunction." It must be admitted that it is properly an executive duty to deal with such general movements as those of 1894 and 1897, resulting in riot and virtual insurrection and involving danger to life and property, and that in such cases persons charged with crime ought to have the benefit of trial by jury. The great obstacle to the application of this view is the attitude of State or local officers with an intense hostility to capital and corporations. Tens of thousands. who on general principles, would agree that it is not properly a function of equity to do police duty, have welcomed the action of the courts as the only power that would deal effectively with disorder, violence and crime. We say advisedly would, instead of could. For it is certain that the State officers can do all that is necessary, if they only will. But some may say that the recent occurrences at Latimer, where the administrative authorities did take matters in hand, with a ghastly result that shocked workingmen even more than the action of the courts, indicate that we should only jump from the frying-pan into the fire. We must not, however, pass judgment on this affair with our present information. The investigations by Pennsylvania and the United States may put it in a different light. In most cases peace officers and militia would sympathize with laborers, and there is little danger that they would pass beyond the limits of what the law permits and the interests of public order demand.

It would be a great advantage to have measures affecting strikers placed squarely on the proper basis, that of enforcement of law and maintenance of order. Further, persons breaking the law would have all the securities of trial by jury, while at the same time administrative action would secure promptness and energy in the suppression of disorder and crime. No longer could the cry of "government by injunction" have any force.

But all this is on the assumption that State officers will do their duty. And if this assumption is unfounded, a majority of our people probably prefer that the courts should continue to exercise their established powers rather than anarchy should prevail. It may be pointed out to workingmen that public opinion in the long run will insist above all on law and order, and that the best way to secure the abolition of "government by injunction" is to aid in the election of State governors who, while they may sympathize deeply with labor, nevertheless realize that social reform cannot be advanced by a reign of terror and who may therefore be depended upon to suppress industrial riot and violence. When this confidence is secured, the people will willingly see the powers of the courts restricted by statute or constitutional amendment. Thus we may approve the injunctions so far as they have had a police purpose in view and may admit their technical legality, while we insist that a sound political system will secure the end in a way more compatible with individual liberty.

* David E. Spencer is Professor of Modern European History at Stanford University.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

Senator Stephen M. White, I am told, does not intend to offer himself for re-election next year. He has several excellent reasons. No one in California has keener political foresight than the southern Senator, to whom the signs and tokens of an approaching Republican victory have been clearly apparent for some time. A sense of the political situation would undoubtedly tend to diminish the Senator's aspirations if he had no other good reasons, He declares his financial necessities do not permit him to remain in the Senate or live in Washington. Though by no means poor, Mr. White is not a millionaire, and he finds it impossible to support Senatorial pretensions on the scale he desires on $10,00 a year. He has never pretended to do so, and has made inroads on his private fortune which his private time has not enabled him to repair. So he proposes now to devote some years to come to law practice with the determination to put himself where he will be able to give the rest of his life to politics. The Senator has an interest in a mine on the desert which looks well, and besides has some other good things in prospect. I sincerely hope his expectations may be realized. With White out of the Senatorial race a strong effort will be made to persuade Congressman Maguire into it, but the ex-Judge shows no favor for the idea, and declares he will be Governor or nothing. He is surrounded, unfortunately, by a set of impecunious friends who want offices, and being amenable to these influences, he is willing to devote himself to satisfying the ambitions of the Tracys and Gallaghers. In his fight he can count, of course, on the support of the Examiner, for Mr. Hearst is very grateful for the way Maguire came to his assistance when Grove Johnson attacked him in Congress.

***

If the disclosures in the Welburn case index the governmental method of inquiry, it is highly desirable that some patriot undertake the correction of the system. The effort to convict the unfortunate Welburn bears all the evidence of a conspiracy. What can the Secretary of the Treasury be thinking about to permit his agents to conduct themselves as Captain Thrasher has done, actually bolstering up his case by what is veritable subornation of perjury. The connection of Dillard, the colored messenger, with the trial, is proof of weakness and it is nothing less than disgraceful that this man who is a forger on his own confession, should receive for his services (evidence) an increase of salary. Welburn's carlessness and maladministration are inexcusable, but that the machinery of the government be utilized to convict one man while others equally guilty are unscathed, is a shameless proceeding and most un-American. I am certain it will not receive the approval of Secretary Gage. It was impossible, I am told, to bring out all the facts in the Welburn affair, but it is thoroughly understood that both Special Agent Thomas and Deputy Loup participated in the poker games in which Cashier Norton lost much of the money he had stolen from the government. In addition they were all in on the race-horse deals which Dillard and Thomas arranged and put through. The impression is now widespread that Welburn is being made a scape-goat for the protection of others who really deserve prosecution. For those who know something of this ugly case it is a satisfaction to know that Gavin McNab in his arraignment of Thrasher and his accomplices set clearly before the jury the entire conspiracy and stigmatized the actors as they deserved,

***

It seems fashionable at the moment to sneer al Mayor Phelan. Certain journals known to represent interests which the Supervisors sedulously served, have devoted themselves to abusing him, declaring his administration a failure, merely because he accepted Judge Wallace's decision in the recent case and took action accordingly. No right-minded citizen will condemn the Mayor on any such pretext. His good intentions are too well understood, his zeal for the public service too apparent to make such attacks of any destructive value. That Mr. Phelan, in his capacity as Mayor, is beyond reproach is impossible to assume. He has made mistakes and certainly has, on occasions, laid himself open to the charges of demagogy preferred against him, but he is young in the public service and has been unfortunate in mistaking the voice of the Examiner for the voice of the people. It is a loud voice, that of the Monarch, and its assumption of inspiration is so confident that one may forgive Mr. Phelan for being deceived. Some months ago The Wave suggested a plan by which the Mayor might share his responsibilities and promote the interests of the city. This could he achieve by appointing an advisory board as certain mayors in the East have done. He would then have secured the co-operation of several good minds to aid his own mental processes and there would be other shoulders to sustain the burden of his experiments. I believe, in spite of this temporary set-back, Mr. Phelan enjoys an abundant measure of public confidence and is pretty sure of a brilliant political career, unless, indeed, he should make some vital error which I cannot credit.

***

That remarkable person, Hetty Green, is about to have trouble with the Assessor of Amador county. It is not generally known that the richest woman in the world has the control of one of the great mines of the county, the Esmaralda, which in early days was a great producer of bullion. Early in her financial career, she became interested in mining, bought a big block of stock, and undoubtedly would be adding Esmaralda dividends to her income but for an irascible minority interest which insisted on differing with Mrs. Green's ideas of management. That doughty lady declared then that she would starve before a pound of quartz should be crushed until the minority parted with its interest and being as determined as a law of nature, she will not start up until the affair is settled her way. The suspension is felt severely in Amador county, and by way of coercion it is proposed to assess the property at its old valuation. Maybe Mrs. Green would then be induced to allow a little gold to be dug out of the shaft.

***

The long dry season has played havoc with the supply of the Tuolomne Ditch Company, and many of the big mines of the Mother Lode are closed down because of lack of water power. Though millions have been made out of this district the resources of the Ditch Company have never been increased, and now the production of gold must stop until rain falls. It is time that electrical power be substituted for water-works, but an enlargement of ditches is equally necessary. In the meantime, the Jumper, Rawhide, Dead Horse and Black Oak have suspended operations; hundreds of miners are out of work, and the dividend season is over until Jupiter Pluvius may again be heard from. This is really more of a catastrophe that it may seem on the surface.

***

Vain indeed is the Call's fight for a City Hall Park. It would cost at least five millions to realize such an idea, and while it might be compassed by the wealth of Claus Spreckels, the city of San Francisco will never, I fear, be rich enough to afford it. There are some 2,000 front feet worth, on an average, $2500 a foot, and there are the improvements and the other expenses on top. Much more reasonable and practicable would be a scheme to extend the Panhandle of the Park to Van Ness Avenue. That is an idea which might be achieved for three millions. There are some thirteen blocks assessed now at about a million and a half which could be purchased, I should think, for three millions. Many years ago Frank McCoppin suggested the extension of the Panhandle to Van Ness Avenue which might then have been put through at a cost of half a million, but that was twenty-five years ago.

***

The desire of Governor Budd to be kind to his friend Dr. O'Brien is costing the State the utility of the Preston Reform School. This O'Brien is a political physician, of Merced, absolutely without training or knowledge of reform methods and quite lacking in executive ability. He is pleasant and agreeable personally and doubtless good to know if you had to spend a week in Merced. The fact that he has been a boon companion of Mr. Budd is really no reason why he should be saddled on California. The institution has been going from bad to worse since he has had charge of it and is now absolutely disorganized. Besides, there have come out of the place stories of unnecessary whippings which demand explanation and should be taken up by the papers. Cnrious, is it not, that the press with all its claims to public usefulness does not demonstrate its value by taking cognizance of the condition of this institution. There are all the elements of several screaming sensations should they be followed up.

***

Curious as it may seem the demands of the interior in the direction of groceries and clothing are supplied almost exclusively from Sacramento. Our traders in San Francisco do not possess the enterprise which exists in certain big firms at the capital. For many years Weinstock & Lubin have been trying for this country business which is obtained by means of catalogues, extensively circulated, and their immense institution in Sacramento is proof of their success. Indeed, without permitting the element of advertisement to enter into this discussion, I cannot imagine a more interesting article than might be made out of a description of this big house, which is conducted on the co-operative principle and is run on a very broad and intelligent basis. To the Weinstock institution there has recently grown-up a rival in John Bruner, who has a big store on K street. Bruner has developed his business within the last few years, and seems determined to contest the supremacy of the older concern. They are bold advertisers, these Sacramentans, unlike their San Francisco competitors, and utiliize their two papers, The Bee and The Record Union, most extensively. Quite recently Bruner engaged Mr. Clement Wilder, of the San Francisco firm of Wilder & Co,, to take charge of his advertising department, and he proposes to enter into the struggle with a set of new ideas. Mr. Wilder has been a decided success in this field, for he had applied real intelligence to the profession. He has left as his successors Mr. Lombard and Mr. Farrell, who have studied the business with him and are well versed in the art of displaying type.

***

It is about time that golf came to California for in that direction we are behind the rest of the country. The game which has attracted such a degree of attention in the East is really not in it at all in San Francisco. The patronage of the links at the Presidio is confined to a few enthusiasts, whereas the old links at Burlingame were never used save by Mr. Parrott, Mr. Lawson and Mr. Dick. I am told they are now laying out new links on the grounds below the Clubhouse, and enthusiasm is promised as soon as they are completed. There was quite a gathering at Burlingame last Saturday, several parties having gone down from the city. It will soon be time for the hunting, and I am told the hounds will be followed by quite a number of men and girls who have had their appetites whetted by the paper chases at San Rafael.

BOSWELL JR.

TIDE LANDS AND SEAWALL OF THE FAIR ESTATE AT NORTH BEACH

NORTH BEACH DEVELOPMENT

Reclaiming Tide-Lands and Swamps for City Extension.

In the building up of great cities there have been numerous instances where extensive tracts of land appearing to the ordinary observer of no great value have been acquired by some far-seeing individual and eventually converted into a valuable building site. The most striking case of the kind in San Francisco is notably in evidence at the present time, although so far the property is still in an embryo state. On the North Beach a total area of about 125 acres is being graded, filled in and walled on the edge ef the bay in pursuance of contracts entered into by the late Senator Fair, the work having been begun about four years ago. The actual work in progress represents three separate divisions, first cutting down sand hills, secondly filling in swamps and thirdly building a wall and filling in what is technically known as the tide-lands between such wall and the formerly existing foreshore.

Roughly speaking the area of the tract extends from a block beyond what is recorded on the city map as Lewis street on the north to Lombard street on the south, and from Van Ness avenue on the east to Lyon street on the west, the last named street forming the dividing line between the Fair property and the Presidio reservation.

The eastern boundary of the Fair holding is formed by Webster street, from there out to Van Ness avenue being the property of various other owners. In order to obtain material for filling in his lots that were under water, Senator Fair entered into a contract with these neighboring proprietors to grade their lands. This has been practically accomplished, and some twenty-five blocks are now available on that site for building purposes.

The history of this property goes back to the days of '49, when a Frenchman named Raymond squatted there, and at his death some twenty-five years or so ago, the title he possessed was sold by auction and thereon passed into the hands of Mr. J. R. Spring. This gentleman subsequently was able to obtain an act of the Legislature granting him certain further lands in the neighborhood of the Raymond holding in consideration of his incorporating a company called the North San Francisco Railroad and Homestead Association, and undertaking to develop and build suitable homes for working men in that quarter. This seems to have been as far as they got, the agreement and plans were duly approved and there the matter rested. However, in later years the foresight and enterprise of the late Senator Fair led to his purchasing from the association the tide-lands portion of their property, representing an area of twenty-two city blocks. Subsequently he bought up all the stock of the association and thus became possessed of the whole of its property in fee simple. This being done he set to work to get the entire tract into shape for building and street-making, spending some $30,000 a month, so long as he lived, in labor and material. Since his death the Court has limited the outlay of the estate under this head to $12,000 per month.

The accompanying sketches afford a very clear conception of the big undertaking which Senator Fair embarked upon. The views show the condition of the property at the present time and will enable the reader to understand what has already been done and what remains to be done. In this latter respect the work will consist almost entirely of filling in and leveling. The space between the seawall and the existing water line, as seen in the upper photograph, has to be converted into dry land, a beginning having been made, as shown in the picture, at the eastern end, next the slip adjoining the works of the San Francisco Gas and Electric Company. It will then remain for the State to erect an outer wall to constitute the future shore line. The declivities which were originally swamp-lands have to some extent been filled in, such as still remain below sea level being rented to Chinese, who find profit in turning the bottoms into gardens and at the same time contribute the only item that is at all picturesque in the present surroundings of this immediate locality.

At present the scene no longer shows the life and activity which has been noticable for the past four years, with a large force of men cutting away the sand banks, loading trucks and hauling to the place of deposit for filling-in purposes. The change has been brought about by legal proceedings instituted by the Pacific Gas Improvement Company, who claim that the water-front rights have been encroached upon. They have accordingly obtained an injunction from the Court to stop the contractors employed by the Fair estate from proceeding with the work and pending the settlement of the suit all work has been stopped.

SWAMP-LAND AT PRESENT CULTIVATED BY CHINESE

The establishment of the two large gas plants in the neighborhood vitiates the pure ozone that sweeps in through the Golden Gate to a considerable extent, and precludes the idea of that part of the town ever being an agreeable place of residence. For the location of factories and commercial establishments it has many advantages, and the water frontage will no doubt be turned to account for coal, lumber and other yards, conveniently situated for serving the western portion of the city. With the shorter haul such concerns will be able to furnish supplies of heavy material much under the rates at present demanded by dealers who have the longer haul from the eastern front of the bay. Probably the entire outlay of the Fair estate represents at least a million dollars, equivalent to $2,000 per acre. Taking his investment at this figure it is not dificult to conceive that the late Senator secured for his heirs an exceedingly valuable asset.

The re-conquest of the Soudan for Egypt seems hardly likely to fail of accomplishment, though the retiring Dervishes may, no doubt, be depended upon to make a final stand before the advancing Egyptian troops, ere Khartoum is reached. The Khalifa, in the meantime, is evidently impressed by the excellent organization of the expedition and its fighting qualities, and has deemed it advisable to keep falling back, even to the extent of sacrificing large quantities of supplies,

The astonishing story of the almost complete annihilation of three thousand Abyssinian soldiers by Somalis seems to need confirmation.

MAKING A CHARTER

The Committee of One Hundred — its Personages and Proceedings.

The convention which is engaged now in preparing a charter that may represent the innumerable phases of public and private opinion in San Francisco, was called into being by a resolution of the Merchants' Association. This organization invited the Mayor to take steps for the creation of a municipal charter, for between the Consolidation act, the one-twelfth act, and the thousand and one conflicting amendments, grafted on the original instrument by private greed acting in the Legislature, the government of San Francisco is in a sorry fix. Under present conditions, reform is not only impossible, but extravagance and corruption are inevitable, and what is worse, the laws governing the powers of the various branches of the government are so confused by diverse interpretations, that there can be neither light nor intelligence until we have an instrument on modern lines settling for once the questions at issue. A new charter would define the jurisdiction of City and State, and put an end once and for all to the unnecessary interference of the Legislature with affairs of the municipality. In response to the request Mayor Phelan set about the selection of one hundred men, who should constitute a body that might really be called representative The fault of previous charters, and we have been charter making for two decades, has been the insertion of some discordant provision which neutralized the harmonious intent of the measure and arrayed against it citizens who ought to have been among its strongest supporters. A foolish misunderstanding killed the charter of '95, and it is to obviate such a contingency that this convention has so been created. All the schools are represented—radicals and conservatives, Socialists, bankers, Anarchists, business men, Single Taxers, landholders, upholders of the referendum and of the initiative—indeed here are apostles of the most conflicting theories and principles forming an extraordinarily interesting assemblage. Nor are these reformers of the humbug order. They are genuine and sincere in their beliefs and, for the most part, earnest and thoughtful men who in this instance are giving their best to the cause of good government.

The gatherings of a body representing such diverse phases of public opinion could not be harmonious. At first there was rather more dissension than was easily controllable but that has passsed now and there has been developed a cohesiveness and a comprehension of individualities which tends to the softening of asperities. This has been evoked by the desire of the one hundred men to perform the function for which they have been called together. The sincerity of the radicals is appreciated and humored by the conservatives and with this good understanding substantial progress is being made. Perhaps there is rather more oratory than is necessary. The very radical members number thirteen, and each one of them is heard on every question. Speeches, it is true, are limited to five minutes, but the reformers never abate a second of their allowance, and really are listened to with the utmost politeness and patience. Indeed these theorists never have had such a thoughtful audience to work upon and the capitalists are quite as responsive and interested as the men who have neither property nor possessions to hazard, by experiments in State control and communism. Mayor Phelan makes an excellent chairman and his sincere desire for the public welfare and the cause of good government is recognized and appreciated.

AN EVENING SESSION OF THE CHARTER CONVENTION: MAYOR PHELAN IN THE CHAIR

Among this gathering of able and intelligent men there are naturally some excellent speakers. Ex-Mayor Pond has always had the faculty of expressing his ideas clearly, and this ability is possessed also by F. W. Dohrmann. Both are successful business men, and have had considerable experience in public affairs. Their opinions on mooted questions are invariably listened to with attention and respect. The practical knowledge of Ex-Mayor Ellert is also of great value to the Convention, and his ideas are invariably elicited at some turn of the discussion. One of the most conspicuous factors in the Convention is Alfred Cridge, whose personal identification is that of a reformer. He is a firm believer in the efficacy of the single tax, and has at his finger's end all the "isms" and theories of economical innovation. Indeed, he is tremendously well informed about all that pertains to economics, and possesses a rare gift of lucid expression which renders easily comprehensible his exposition of the most complex of the new systems. Though advanced in years, he brings to the discussion of practical questions an extraordinary activity of mind and a surprising faculty at logical analysis which render his contributions most interesting and important. His influence in the Convention loses nothing from the fact that, though deep in new theories, he never attempts forcing them on the Convention. Joseph O'Connor is one of the members who commands the ear of the body. He speaks but seldom, but when heard from, is always to the point. He seldom loses a contention, and is notably sane. Franklin K. Lane is another valuable member who has both information and the faculty of imparting it. Several speeches of his have attracted the attention and modified the action of the convention at important junctures. Gavin McNab as chairman of the legal committee has exerted much influence on its deliberations. No man in the body has a more thorough knowledge of politics and of municipal affairs, and the epigrammatic manner of his speech invariably gives point to his objections and expositions, which are invariably sane and thoughtful. He ranks as one of the strongest men in the aggregation.

To pass on to the reformers who are always heard from. Perhaps it is not fair to class Senator Samuel Braunhart among these, but he is on his feet as often as any of them. Persistent and progressive, at first he was made fun of, but his sincerity has gained him the good will of the body, and he begins to be listened to with patience. It is erroneous also to include Mr. McCarthy in this connection, for the president of the Carpenters's Union is more conservative than any of the millionaires. His very antithesis is Mr. McArthur, president of the Coast Seaman's Union and editor of the journal of that organization. He is a radical, a reformer, a single-taxer and everything else. Another great single-taxer is Joseph Leggett, who is intelligent and well posted on economic theories, but whose influence in the convention is neutralized by a tendency to consider a general discussion of questions in which he has an interest as involving his personality. The president of the Socialists, Mr. Benham, is an easy and fluent talker, but is prone to take impracticable positions. Barney McKenna, who attends to the law business of Adolph Sutro, is also a man who is heard to advantage. The name of J. M. Reynolds is familiar to people who read letters in the newspapers. Mr. Reynolds has a perennial flow of language and overflows at every opportunity, wasting force and importance thereby. The convention hath one lady member, Mrs. Burke, a school teacher. She is one of its most regular attendants and a very sensible woman, whose ideas meet with great respect. She talks but seldom and then very much to the point.

Of course these are but a few of the individuals who compose the body. The charter when they have finished with it should be a document of real value, for never was an instrument put together with more attention to detail. The legislative section has about been completed, and it will not be long now until the others are finished. Then it will be time for the Election Committee to summon the freeholders who will adopt and amend the new charter to suit their own views. The photograph accompanying this was made at a meeting of the convention at Native Sons' Hall.

The great contest of the convention has been between the advocates of what is known as the Glasgow plan and those who favor the American plan of concentrating executive functions in the hands of the Mayor. In Glasgow the government is controlled by an executive council similar to our Supervisorial Board. This organization levies taxes, administers the departments of the municipalities, manages gas and water works and makes all appointments. The Mayor under this system is merely a chairman. The American idea is to make one man responsible to the people for errors and mal-administration. His office is of such prominence, such importance, that the selection of an honorable and experienced citizen is obligatory on the voters, and he has such extraordinary powers that the best class of men may be persuaded to aspire to it. Strange as it may seem it is the radicals who are the most opposed to the American plan, though they have lost much by the utter failure of the Supervisorial system as exhibited in San Francisco, whereas concentration has its strong adherents among the property holders and the conservative elements of the convention. The dissentions that have been most positively obtruded, however, have all been from this elementary contention, and its phases have been discussed to the advantage of all concerned.

In the midst of all her troubles the Queen-Regent of Spain has no more sincere sympathizer than Leo XIII, who is in constant correspondence with her, and in late years has given evidence of a desire to further the interests of Spain in every possible way. The Pope has recently instructed the Nuncio at Madrid to check the disposition of the lower clergy to support the Carlist propaganda, and to make them understand that it is their duty to uphold existing authority. Leo has before dealt with the same matter, and made his influence felt. As regards the insurrection in Cuba, Spain knows that in His Holiness she has a friend on whom she can count, and not improbably, when the time comes, his intervention may save her from awkward complications with foreign Powers.

HOW SAN FRANCISCO LIVES

III.

Solid Meat Alone Satisfies its Voracious Maw.

This city, far more than any part of England, is the home of deep-bosomed women and meat-fed men. We are above all things meat-eaters; we want beef three times a day, and large platefuls at each meal. Were it not that vegetables and fruit are cheap and abundant, so that we are able to throw into the body starch and sugar enough to balance the albumen and fat of animal food, we should starve from overfeeding on meat. Once a day is enough to eat the flesh of animals. That rule is generally followed in Europe; indeed, among the peasantry of England, France, Germany, Spain and Italy, beef is eaten at the Sunday dinner, and rarely on any other day.

Mr. Schweitzer, the wholesale butcher of Clay street, tells me that San Francisco eats four hundred head of cattle every day of its life. His partner, who is stern and self-contained, with no bigod nonsense about him, thinks this an exaggeration, and doubts if the daily consumption exceeds three hundred and fifty head. Even so, it is a wonder that we dare to look a steer in the face. More beef is eaten here than in any city of Europe except London, and more beef is wasted here than is eaten. Having to feed four people, who ought to consume among them sixteen ounces of meat at a meal, the San Francisco housekeeper will set on the table three pounds of steak, of which a pound and a half or two pounds, after passing through the kitchen, will be thrown away. The French or German housekeeper throws nothing away; what is left from the dinner of Sunday makes an excellent ragout or soup for Monday. But we are a prodigal people, and we scorn economy.

THE DRESSED PRODUCT

Our butcher meat is supplied by six or eight cattle-growers. First among these is the corporation which succeeded the firm of Miller & Lux. Its herds probably number 150,000, and graze on many a hill and plain in California, Oregon, Nevada and Arizona. Next in importance to them is James B. Haggin, who has something like 125,000 head of cattle on his ranch in Kern, without counting 10,000 or 15,000 on the ranches in San Luis Obispo and Monterey, which belonged to the late George Hearst, and are now managed by Mrs. Hearst. Haggin and Hearst had reduced the business to a science, and conducted it with characteristic skill. They bought their cattle, two or three years old, in Mexico, where they would not fatten, placed them on their ranches in this State, and fed them on grass and alfalfa. After holding them a year, they sold them when they weighed 600, 800 and 1000 pounds. Once in a while they would raise a stall-fed animal, which at five years old weighed 1500 or 1600 pounds. But a steer is at his prime at four years of age, when he weighs something like 800 pounds; past that age his muscles and sinews harden, and it is hard to find any tender cuts in him.

Other large cattle-growers are the Newhalls, whose herds probably number 30,000; Richard O'Neill, with about as many; the English syndicate, which took from the Nevada Bank the Chinchilly ranch in Merced, with about the same number; Cox & Clarke, who perhaps own half as many; George Bliss, the owner of 10,000 or so; and others whose herds are smaller, though running up in the thousands.

The price of these cattle varies with the condition of the times. A well-grown, three-year-old bullock will generally command $25 or $30; just now he would be worth something more. At retail his flesh will sell at all sorts of prices, from 6 to 20 cents. With his characteristic extravagance, the San Franciscan generally pays 15 to 20 cents for the beef he takes home for consumption in his family; he never buys the grade which butchers sell at 6 to 10 cents, though it is just as wholesome and nutritious, and if cooked with skill, just as palatable. Professors of cooking schools say that there is more nutriment in the tabooed portions of a bullock's leg than can be got out of a tenderloin steak; but the consumer scoffs at such theories. A true connoisseur rarely eats the Sunday side of a tenderloin; such meat is sweet, but for alimentary purposes its value is small; the parts of the beast which build up muscle and tissne and blood and fibre are the cuts which the retail butcher keeps on a hook in the back of his store and which he is only too glad to sell at a bit a pound. But the artist who presides over the cookstove and stewpan must know how to cook it.

It is so with mutton, which is so largely consumed here that Schweitzer reckons our daily consumption at two thousand sheep and lambs. Everybody wants a hind quarter, which is worth 15 to 20 cents. Nobody can be persuaded to purchase the neck pieces and other cuts from the forequarter, which can be bought for 5 cents a pound. Yet they can be made delicious. Delmonico—I mean old Lorenzo, who died several years ago—used to tell a story of a renowned gourmand who came to dine at his house, and was obsequiously served by the padrone himself and the head waiter. The great man studied the carte du jour with care and thoughtfulness; then, turning to the proprietor, he gently observed:

"I think, Mr. Delmonico, that I will dine on a ragout de mouton"—the cheapest dish on the bill.

We have, in this State, the best meat in the world. No more wholesome or more succulent beef can be bought in London, Paris or New York than is offered for sale at our city markets. Not one per cent of the animals designed for food are condemned by the inspectors. The excellence of the meat is due to the nutritious grass and alfalfa on which the beasts are fed, and probably to some degree to the bracing air they breathe. St. Louis, which used to be the great cattle centre before its glory departed to Kansas City and Chicago, is largely supplied by Hunter & Evans, whose ranches are in Colorado and New Mexico; their beef is of better quality than it was twenty years ago, but it will not compare with the beef from the Miller & Lux or the Haggin ranches.

It may be said frankly that the experiments which have been made to supply England with Australian meat have failed; and the causes of the failure must operate against refrigerated meats in this country. In the refrigerator, meat loses its flavor and juice. Instead of being allowed to flow off into the surrounding atmosphere, the animal heat is retained in the carcass, and it acts as blood poisoning does in the living creature. To preserve meat, it should be kept in a cold storage compartment, but the temperature should not be allowed to fall below the freezing point. Our wholesale butchers have such compartments, in which quarters of beef and whole sheep hang like Bluebeard's wives in his closet; but they have a corpse-like look, and their skin is dry and clammy to the touch.

JOHN BONNER.

Forbes Robertson has aroused the London critics to different degrees of enthusiasm by his recent portrayal of Hamlet. One old critic was so carried away by the actor's genius that he exclaimed in the theatre: "This man was born to play Hamlet!" Others were less enthusiastic, one of them terming the performance cold and restrained. But the presentment was generally conceded a remarkable effort of a scholar and an artist, original without any self-advertising attempts at new readings, and rendered singularly beautiful by an admirably controlled voice full of tender and pathetic tones. Mr. Robertson touched lightly upon Hamlet's madness, giving it very little prominence. A great innovation in the production was the entrance of Fortinbras and his warriors immediately after Hamlet's death. This was groaned at by the critics as an anti-climax, but it was none the less striking, bringing into remarkable contrast the tragedy of Hamlet's dreams and indecision with the young and vigorous life of Fortinbras.

The Comtesse de Martel, better known as "Gyp," the novelist, recently made a five-hundred-mile ride in an autocar, from Paris to her home, the Chateau de Mirabeau. Some time ago Mme. de Martel met with an accident in a railway tunnel, and since then will not travel on the cars where the line passes through a tunnel. Her sole companion on the autocar trip was a big, ferocious dog, whose life she once saved from drowning in a lake in the Bois de Boulogne.

AWAITING EXECUTION: A SCENE IN SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO

Judy's Service of Gold Plate.

By FRANK NORRIS.

She was a native of Guatemala, and so, of course, was said to be Mexican, and she lived in the alley by the county jail, three or four doors above the tamale factory. Her trade was something odd. The Chinamen, who go down to the sea in ships from San Francisco to Cape St. Lucas, off the coast of Lower California, and fish for sharks there, used to bring the livers of these sharks back to her. She would boil the oil out of these livers and turn over the product to a red-headed Polish Jew named Knubel, who bottled it and sold it to San Francisco as cod liver oil. Knubel made money in the business. She was only his employee. Her name, incidentally, was Lambala Largomarsini, which was no doubt the reason why she was called "Judy."

Knubel lived on Telegraph Hill, on the ledge of the big cliff there, and used to lie awake o' windy nights waiting for his house to be blown off that ledge. Knubel had always lived on Telegraph Hill. When he was forty he had had a stroke of paralysis, and had lost the use of his left leg. The result of this stroke was that Knubel was held a prisoner on the Hill. He dared not go down into the city below him, because he knew he could never get back. How could he, stop and think? No horse ever gets to the top of the Hill. The cable-cars and electric-cars turn their headlights upon the Hill and shake their heads and go around in the valley by Stockton street. The climb is bad enough for a man with two healthy legs, but for a paralytic—— Knubel was trapped upon the Hill, trapped and held prisoner. He never saw Kearny or Montgomery or Market streets after his stroke. He never saw the new Call building, or the dome upon the City Hall but from afar, and the "Emporium" was to him but a distant granite cliff. In the newspaper, he who lived in San Francisco read about what was happening there as you and I and all the rest of us read about what is happening in London or in Paris or in Vienna, and this with the roar of that San Francisco actually in his ears, like the bourdon of a tremendous organ.

Judy of course was wretchedly poor, for the salary that Knubel allowed her for boiling down the shark's livers would not have fattened a self-respecting chessy-cat. Knubel himself was a horrible old miser, he had made a little fortune in cod liver oil, but he kept it tied up in three old socks in a starch box underneath the floor of his cellar. He had a passion for gold, and turned all his silver and greenbacks into gold as fast as he could. He lived in a room about as big as a trunk back of an Italian wine shop where there was a "Bocce" court, and Judy used to come and see him here once a month and get her salary and make her report.

One day when Judy had come to get her orders and her money from Knubel she found him bending his red head over his table testing an old brass collar button with nitric acid.

"I found him bei der stairs on der bottom," he explained to Judy. "Berhaps he is of gold. Hey, yes?"

Judy looked at the collar button.

"That ain't gold," she declared. "Huh! you can't fool me on gold. I seen more gold in my day than you've seen tin, mister Knubel."

Knubel's eyes were gimlets on the instant.

"Vat you say."

"When I was a kid in Guatemala my folks had a set of gold plate, dishes you know, hundreds of 'em, all solid gold."

Here we touch on Judy's one mania. She believed and often stated that at one time her parents in Guatemala were enormously wealthy, and in particular were possessed of a wonderful service of gold plate. She would describe this gold plate over and over again to anyone who would listen. Why there were more than a hundred pieces, all solid red gold. Why there were goblets and punch-bowls and platters and wine-pitchers and ladles, why the punch-bowl itself was worth a fortune. Ignorant enough on other subjects, and illiterate enough, Heaven knows, once started on her gold plate, Judy became almost eloquent. Of course, no one believed her story, and rightly so because the gold plate never did exist. How Judy got the idea into her mind it was impossible to say, but it was the custom of people who knew of her mania to set her going and watch her while she rocked to and fro with closed eyes, and hands clasped over her knee chanting monotonously, "More'n a hundred pieces, and all red, red gold," and so on and so on.

For a long while her hearers scoffed, then at last she suddenly made a convert, old Knubel, the red-headed Polish Jew, believed her story on the instant. As often as Judy would come to make her monthly report on the shark liver industry, old Knubel would start her going, swallowing her words as a bullion-bag swallows coin. As soon as Judy had finished he would begin to ask her questions.

"The gold voss soft, hey? und ven you rapped him mit der knuckles now, he rung out didn't he, yes?"

"Sweeter'n church bells."

"Ah, sweeter nor der church bells, shoost soh. I know, I know. Now let's have ut egain, more'n a hoondurt bieces. Let's haf ut all eg-gain." And again and again Judy would tell him her wonderful story, delighted that she had at last found a believer. She would chant to Knubel by the hour, rocking herself back and forth, her hands clapsed on her knee, her eyes closed. Then by and by Knubel, as he listened to her, caught himself rocking back and forth, keeping time with her.

Then Knubel found excuses for Judy's coming to see him oftener than once a month. The manufacture of cod liver oil out of shark's livers needed a great deal of talking over. Knubel knew her story by heart in a few weeks and began to talk along with her. There in that wretched room over the "Bocce" court on the top of Telegraph Hill, the "Mexican" hybrid woman and the Polish Jew, red-headed and paralytic, rocked themselves back and forth with closed eyes and clasped hands sing-songing, "More'n a hundred pieces, all red, red gold"—"More den a hoondurt bieces und alle rad gold."

It was a strange sight to see.

"Judy," said Knubel, one day when the woman was getting ready to leave, "vy you go, my girl, eh? Stay hier bei me, und alle-ways you will me dat story ge-tellen, night und morgen, alle-ways. Hey? Yes?"

So it came about that the two were—we will say married, and for over a year night und morgen Judy the story of the wonderful gold plate ge-told. Then a little child was born to her. The child has nothing to do here, besides it died right away, no doubt its little body wasn't strong enough to hold in itself the blood of the Hebrew, the Spaniard and the Slav. It died. At the time of its birth Judy was out of her head, and continued so for upwards of two weeks. Then she came to herself and was as before.

Not quite. "Now ve vill have ut once eg-gain," said Knubel, "pe-gin, more dan one hoondurt bieces, und alle rad, rad gold."

"What's you talkin's about," said Judy with a stare.

"Vy, about dat gold blate."

"I don't know about any gold plate, you must be crazy Knubel. I don't know what you mean."

Nor did she. The trouble of her mind at the time of her little child's birth had cleared her muddy wits of all hallucinations. She remembered nothing of her wonderful story. But now it was Knubel whose red head was turned. Now it was Knubel who went about telling his friends of the wonderful gold service. But his mania was worse than Judy's.

"You've got ut, you've got ut zum-vairs, you she-swine," he would yell, clubbing Judy with a table leg. "vair is ut, you've hidun ut. I know you've got ut. Vair is dose bunch-powl, vair is dose tsoop sboon."

"How do I know," Judy would shout, dodging his blows. In fact how did she know.

Knubel went from bad to worse, ransacked the house, pulled up the flooring, followed Judy when she went out as well as his game leg would allow, and peeped at her through keyholes when she was at home.

Knubel and Judy had a neighbor who was also an acquaintance, a Canadian woman who did their washing. Judy was sitting before the kitchen stove one morning when this woman came after the weekly wash. She was dead and must have been dead since the day before, for she was already cold. The Canadian woman touched her shoulder, and Judy's head rolled side ways and showed where Knubel had—well, she was dead.

Late in the day the officers found Knubel hiding about the old abandoned "Pavilion" that stands on the top of the hill. When arrested he had a sack with him full of rusty tin pans, plates and old tomato cans that he had gathered from the dump heaps.

"I got ut," said Knubel to himself, "I got ut, more dan a hoondurt pieces. I got ut at last."

The manufacture of cod liver oil from shark livers has languished of late, because of the hanging of Mister Knubel at San Quentin penitentiary.

* * * * * *

And all this, if you please, because of a service of gold plate that never existed.

THE KINGDOM OF THE CZAR

Humane and Enlightened Rule of Emperor Nicholas II.

The eyes of the world are keenly directed upon Russia, where the young Czar is reversing the traditional policy of his predecessors by instituting a series of reforms, conceived in a spirit that proves him to be a ruler of humane and liberal instincts.

First and foremost of the important changes affecting his vast realm is the one that has been last decided upon — the abolition of the terrible punishment generally known as Siberian exile. With the view of providing for the home imprisonment of criminals that have hitherto been transported to Northern Asia, large numbers of whom were doomed to remain there for the term of their natural life, additional prison accommodation is to be set apart for the purpose of their detention in European Russia. Since the accession of Nicholas II to the throne, the development of Siberia has been pushed on with amazing energy, no doubt to a great extent in consequence of his conviction that the natural resources of that vast country can be made to add largely to the wealth of his empire. Some years ago the Czar formed this conclusion when journeying through the great province to the Pacific, and it is not unreasonable to assume he then realized for himself that one of the first things to be done towards opening up the country for colonization was to discontinue the system of pouring the criminal classes into the territory. So long as Siberia was utilized as a penal settlement, its commercial and social advancement was not possible.

Further measures of a liberal and progressive character have been taken by the promulgation of several important ukases quite recently. Labor in any form whatever has been prohibited, under severe penalties, on Sunday or on the chief feast-days of the orthodox church. Children of mixed marriages may be brought up in the faith of their parents — sons in the father's and daughters in that of their mother. The restrictions against the Roman Catholic faith in the province of Poland have been removed, and the general policy towards that portion of the Czar's kingdom is now based upon a plan of reconciliation. Municipal rights have been accorded to those towns which were deprived of them after the rebellion of 1863; the Polish press has been emancipated from arbitrary censorship; and the official censor of plays in Poland, who formerly could neither read nor speak the Polish language, has been superseded by the appointment of M. Sienkiewicz, the author of "Quo Vadis." Many other concessions have been made to the Poles, and it was therefore not surprising that when the Czar lately visited Warsaw he was received with an outburst of popular enthusiasm and evidences of spontaneous regard never before accorded to any Russian monarch by that hitherto downtrodden people.

Favored by fine weather, the Emperor and Empress entered the city amid the enthusiastic acclamations of the crowds, the music of the Russian hymn played and sung by orchestras and choirs, and the sound of the cannon firing an Imperial salute from the fortress. Throughout the route chosen representatives of all classes, in evening dress and top hats, kept excellent order. In front of every church stood Roman Catholic clergy and young girls in white veils and crowns of orange blossom, holding water lilies. The scene is described as "supremely grand and unprecedented."

The speech addressed to the Emperor by the Marquis Wielopski, chairman of the Warsaw Polish Committee, furnishes the clearest evidence of the great change of sentiment that has taken place. It expressed the heartfelt gratitude of the whole people, without distinction of birth or station, and declared that they were united in their love of the Czar and the Fatherland.

THE NAVY OF JAPAN

Its Proved Fighting Qualities and Increasing Strength.

In the China-Japan war of 1894, as is well known, the Japanese navy covered itself with glory. The naval battle of Haiyang in the Yellow Sea, off the Island of Talu, terminated in a decisive victory for Japan, and will always be memorable in the annals of naval warfare as the first engagement of the kind since modern warships were constructed. It was furthermore a revelation of the excellent personnel of the navy, which gained a reputation for cool intrepidity and daring that amounted to recklessness. To the nation itself at large this was in a measure a surprise, as not long before the efficiency of the officers and men had been called in question in Parliament, while doubts had at the same time been raised regarding the merits of the warships of their navy.

Of the vessels here illustrated the Matushima, which carried the flag of Admiral Ito, the commander of the advance and main squadrons, suffered most severely in the engagement, receiving on her battery two 30½ centimeter shells, one of which went clean through the ship, while the other struck a heap of more than 100 shells of the 12 centimeter quick-firing guns, causing a fire; one 26 centimeter shell penetrated the torpedo-room, and another struck a Hotchkiss quick-firing gun. Of the officers and crew 57 were killed or died from their injuries and 111 were wounded. The judgment of the experts is that her guns were grouped too closely. The Matushima was fully repaired by the Japanese Government within a space of four weeks, ample evidence of the efficiency of their dockyard service.

The Chinen was taken from the Chinese, by whom she was used as a battle-ship. In the Japanese service she is commissioned as a coast defence ship.

At the close of the year before the war the returns of the navy showed that it consisted of 4 battleships, 8 armored cruisers, 7 protected cruisers, and 13 other cruisers, in addition to 15 gun boats, 60 torpedo boats and a few miscellaneous craft; it was manned by 14,852 officers and men. Some thirty years ago the Empire acquired its first European type vessel, the oldest vessels now in the service being the Fuso, Kongo and Heiyei, the last-named of which was recently in this port and was fully illustrated at the time on these pages. Since the war active steps have been taken to add greatly to the strength of the fleet, a large portion of the indemnity payable by China having been appropriated to meet the necessary expenditure. The more important additions, now in course of construction and contracted for, are as follows:

4 first-class armored battleships of 14,500 tons each. To be built by the Thames Iron Works, Armstrongs and Thompsons in Great Britain, respectively.

4 first-class armored cruisers of 9,500 tons each. To be built by the Vulcan Iron Works, Stettin, Germany; the Forges et Chantiers de la Mediterranee, La Seine, France, and Armstrongs in England, respectively, and one in Japan.

2 torpedo depot ships of 6,500 tons.

3 2d-class armored cruisers of 4,750 tons each. To be built by Armstrongs in England, Cramps in Philadelphia, U.S.A., and the Union Iron Works, San Francisco, U. S. A., respectively. All of these vessels will be of identical model, armament, protection and speed (22½ knots per hour).

1 3rd class armored cruiser of 2,800 tons—building in Japan.

1 despatch boat of 1,800 tons—building in Japan.

6 torpedo boats of 1,200 tons each.

Besides the foregoing vessels there are to be built in England, France and Germany several torpedo boats with a guaranteed speed of 30 knots, and another series of 24 knots speed.

The two new first-class armored battleships, Fuji and Yushima, 12,800 tons each, are now on their way from England to Japan, the former built by the Thames Iron Works and the latter by Armstrongs.

It will be noted that the list given above includes three 2nd class armored cruisers, which will all be sister-ships. The one contracted for in England has been already launched, and part of the crew has started from Japan to bring her home. The others, now building in this country, are to be finished by the end of 1898, by which time it is pretty evident that Japan should be in a good position to maintain the independence upon which her people have set their hearts, and, if called upon to defend it, to increase the prestige which has of late accrued in so remarkable a manner to her ancient and extensive Empire.

What may be termed the modernization of Japan is one of the remarkable features in the history of nations during the latter part of this century, and one has to see very little of its people to realize the excellent foundation on which their astonishing progress in the arts of Western civilization has been built up. Individually, they are manly in character, thorough, painstaking and intelligent to a degree. Their Government in its civil administration is modelled upon the established lines of the leading nations. In naval affairs they follow English methods, and in military matters, while originally basing their plans on French examples, they have in recent years adopted German detail and tactics to a great extent. As an instance of their careful and businesslike way of proceeding, it may be mentioned that during the construction of their warship now on the stocks at the Union Iron Works, they maintain an inspection staff on permanent duty at the yard. Naval Constructor Captain Sigurai is the chief, with Naval Constructor Lieutenant Wadagaki as his deputy. The engineering department is the special province of the latter. As their assistants there are two non-commissioned officers employed as inspectors. The Constructors are highly educated experts, who have studied their profession in Europe, and have been engaged in designing and carrying out construction work for the imperial navy for many years.

---

The failure of crops in Ireland seems likely to form the basis for fresh agitation in political circles. The Nationalists are busy abusing Lord Cadogan, the Viceroy, for representing that the reports have been exaggerated. In order that the Government may be in a position to form a reliable opinion and devise plans for assistance to the sufferers, Mr. Gerald Balfour, the Irish Secretary, has been making a tour of the country.

"Hello Audience!" | You put you arm around her waist | She puts her arm around your waist | Now Maudie's name is mud | Johnny took the one I wanted | Johnny got the loaded cigar

PRESS ELDRIDGE IN FAMILIAR POSES

Photos by Thors

PRESS ELDRIDGE

A SCENE FROM "UNDER THE RED ROBE" AT THE BALDWIN

JENNIE DUNN, AT THE ORPHEUM

BABY RUTH AT THE ALCAZAR

AT THE PLAYHOUSES

YAMOTO ¶

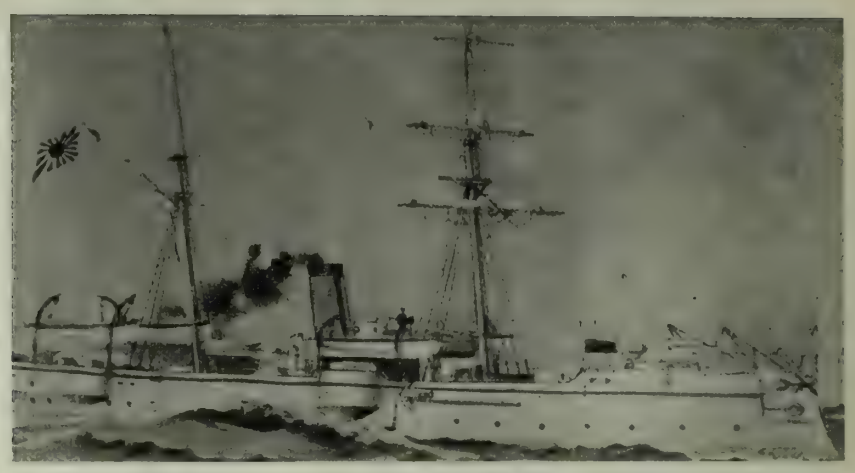
*TAKACHIHO, 3709 TONS ‡

AMAGI ¶

*MATSUSHIMA, 4278 TONS (Admiral's Flagship at Haiyang)

ATAGO ¶

*FUSO, 3777 TONS ‡



*AKAGI 622 TONS ¶

TSUKUSHI ‡

*HASHIDATE, 4278 TONS (Sister Ship to the Matsushima)¶

*AKITSUSKIMA, 3150 TONS ¶

*NANIWA, 3709 TONS ‡

CHINEN (Coast Defense Vessel)‖

TYPES OF THE WARSHIPS OF JAPAN

Vessels marked * were engaged at the battle of Haiyang, September 17, 1894. ¶ Built in Japan. ‡ Built in England. ‖ Built in France.

HALCYON

TRYING TO FIND EL CAMPO

TRUANT KITTIWAKE

A CHOICE LOCATION

THE COMMODORES'S FLAGSHIP, CLARA

TRUANT

LAIS. NAIAD

PRIDE

EL CAMPO IS FOUND

The photographs are impressions of the Corinthian Yacht Club's regatta, together with incidents of a tramp from Tiburon to El Campo last Sunday, rather than a formal record of the last event of the yachting season. The flotilla of sailing craft set forth for the scene of the races Saturday night and, as there is now no means of Sabbath communication between El Campo and San Francisco, the party of spectators whose peregrinations are shown among whom was the photographer, were compelled to undertake a tiresome climb over the Marin County hills. Just what is meant by such an excursion may be realized by any one who will attempt the ascent of Tamalpais by way of Bolinas. There are declivities steep as the side of a house, precipitous canons, young mountains whose slopes are clothed with chapparel. Here are quail in plenty and in other days this region used to abound in deer, but that is history. It is certainly wild and romantic, even though you can see the city from every ridge. A kindly hunter directed the party to a comfortable trail which led them finally, tired and travel worn, to destination and friends.

This Corinthian regatta was quite an affair. Some thirty yachts assembled under the cliffs of El Campo, and on Sunday morning there were swimming races and then races for yacht boats, and in the afternoon the contest of the small yachts. Really the flotilla had a picturesque effect, seen from the cliffs, and its animation and activity reminded one of the pictures in Eastern papers of entertainments at Newport. As for the races—the event of the day was won by the Kittiwake, sailed by John W. Pew and Oliver Eastwood, though she had gone out of her course to rescue "Venture" which had fallen by the wayside. Otherwise it was a pleasant outing, and the pictures serve to show what amusement may be had out of yachting in San Francisco Bay.

THE CORINTHIAN YACHT CLUB REGATTA

Photos by B. D. Bent

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I wish, Diary dear, that people who intend to entertain would consult one another on the subject, as it would be much more agreeable to all of us. This week, for instance, I have been perfectly satiated with pleasure; while last time, I had simply to dream my days as well as my nights away, and was bored to a degree. I wonder the matrons do not form a committee on entertainments; it would be an excellent scheme and I have no doubt that we should have a variety of affairs each week, regularly—so many teas, dances and theatre parties. What capital times we should have! As it is, I hear we are to be deluged in oceans of tea—teas, from now on, are to be the principal methods of dispensing hospitality.

Let me see how many are announced for the immediate future, all or nearly all debutante's affairs? The first large at-home is Bessie Ames' on the 23d. She is to be assisted by a number of the debutantes, among them Helen Thornton, Marie Wells, Mamie Polhemus, Ethel Keeney, Ethel Patton, Therese Morgan and Leontine Blakeman. Then Ethel Keeney is to have a coming-out on October 30th. Marie Wells will be ushered in at a reception on November 13th, and Helen Thornton on November 23d, I believe. Some of the girls loath teas but I enjoy them—the hustle and bustle, the talking against time and the fight for food all delight my soul. Arthur says girls have the instincts of barbarians and insists that in my case the veneer of civilization is exceedingly thin in spots. Nevertheless I am brave in owning that I enjoy teas and crushes of all sorts; it is the thing to be horribly blase about such affairs. I believe one is only permitted to enthuse over one's first ball, and to express a small degree of interest about a dinner.

Let me see, where have I meandered and what has been my course of action this week? On Friday of course I went to the Presidio hop. It was rather a small affair—about a dozen maids and a score of men. The music, however, was good, the floors excellent and the dancers! Well, you know Diary dear, that when it comes to a question of terpsichorean ability the army fellows occupy the first notch. There is that dear Mr. Haynes, for example—he is one of my special pets—dances divinely and makes the prettiest speeches. There were only a few of us debutantes present—Charlotte Ellinwood, Leontine Blakeman and your Miss Cricket. We all wore white aud looked as fetching as possible. We had the time of our lives and had to subdivide our dances. The men would say: "Please may I have a section of such and such a dance"—I wish I were always so popular, but alas, one is not frequently surfited with men.

On Saturday I was like the old woman of happy memory, who lived in a shoe and who had so many children she did not know what to do, but instead of being burdened with an embarrassment of children my surplus was invitations. There was the Spreckels Tug party; Mrs. Rudolph had particularly requested mamma to let me go. They had a capital time too. Cousin Barbara was there and said it was loads of fun. There were quite a number invited. Then there was the baseball game between the two teams of the Bohemian Club. Arthur went to that and said it was vastly entertaining. He saw a number of the girls there. Then, too, there was the Paper Chase and Hunt dinner in San Rafael. I could not miss that and did so hope I should carry off a trophy cup, but that was not one of my sunshiny days, perhaps it was because I forgot my rabbit's foot. I never succeed unless I wear it. Miss Bruce and Mr. Hume were the fortunate ones and really rode capitally. The other Miss Bruce met with an accident which marred her pleasure—she fell off her horse and had a nasty cut on the head—nothing serious, you know, but just disagreeable. It gave us quite a start. The dinner was very nice. A Hunt dinner, like a ball, suggests pink coats, but they were conspicuously absent. We all wore light frocks and were seated at a long table. It was a very San Rafaelese affair; few city people were there. I was the sole debutante and immensely popular of course. The meal was a capital one were I permitted to enthuse, but the ethics of the debutante forbid. Dr. Shiels gave a little talk in which he commented upon the success of the season and of the Hunt Club and so the affair ended.

Arthur went to the last night of "Sue" at the Columbia to bid farewell to the Frawleys until next season. He said half the town was there and dozens of theatre parties. It was more like a first night of the Daly's than a farewell performance. The Hagers, Mary Belle Gwinn, the Jolliffes, Colin Smith with Sallie Maynard and Marie Wells and loads of others were there. Blanche Bates received myriads of flowers, and the enthusiasm whenever Frank Worthing appeared was tremendous—altogether it was a gala night. Then a number of the girls went to the reception Miss Bates gave at the Columbia on Sunday afternoon. About 250 people were there. The Jolliffes, Helen Thomas and Leontine Blakeman were among those I especially noted. On Tuesday evening Rose Hooper entertained us at a farewell dinner prior to her departure for New York—you know she left on Thursday evening. Therese Morgan, Mamie Polhemus, Charlotte Ellinwood, Leontine Blakeman, Marie Wells and several of the older girls were invited. We sat at a square table in the main dining-room and had a very jolly time. I am so sorry Rose is going away, as I hardly know any girl so universally popular with both men and maids.

Leila as I told you spent Saturday and Sunday with Aunt Caroline at San Mateo. She said that there were ever so many people at the club house, and that the concert was exceedingly good. Carrie Taylor was there with the Colemans, and the Hoffman girls as well as the usual Burlingame crowd. Leila says she enjoyed every minute of it, and when one considers that her dear Harry was not there, the entertainment must have been of the first order of merit.

I think that is all I have done so far. I am going to a big dinner at the 'Varsity Club on Monday evening at eight o'clock. Walter Martin is to give it in honor of Birdie Fair, and I hear it is to be excessively smart. Leila is going to a theatre party at the Baldwin that Mrs. Thomas is to give in honor of Helen's coming out. Then Mrs. Charles Josselyn is to give a luncheon on Wednesday at her new home on Central avenue. You know she has taken that charming little house of Mrs. Bowers', one of the cosiest of homes, just outside the Presidio gates. Of big affairs in anticipation is a reception and dance of Charlotte Ellinwood in the early future, and a big ball by Mrs. Alvord in honor of Ethel Keeney. The first party of the Terpsichoreans is to take place December 8th.

And now, Diary dear, I am exhausted, so ere mamma discovers I am still "robbing a few hours from the night," I shall say farewell.

Your devoted MISS CRICKET.

* *

An unusually interesting wedding was that of Miss Jeannette Callaghan and Ensign Raby which took place at St. Mary's Cathedral on Tuesday at noon. Both the bride and groom are in their earliest youth which added to the attractiveness of the occasion. Miss Callaghan has not yet made her formal debut. Mr. Raby graduated within the past few months from Annapolis. Miss Callaghan is a daughter of the late Daniel Callaghan. She is a piquante looking girl, and is very vivacious. She was gowned in white satin, trimmed in chiffon and lace. Miss Lillian Davis, who was maid of honor, wore a green silk frock veiled in white tulle. She had on a white picture hat trimmed with white plumes. After the ceremony there was a reception held at the bride's home on Post street. Mr. and Mrs. Raby have gone to Santa Barbara on their honeymoon.

Very quiet were the nuptials of Mrs. Dollie Brown and Mr. William Woods which were celebrated on Thursday at the home of the bride's father on California street. Only the immediate friends and relations were bidden to the ceremony.

The Mystic Shriners reception on Wednesday night at Golden Gate Hall, was really a brilliant and elaborate affair, noticeable for the magnificent decorative effects, the sumptuous supper and the excellent music in evidence. Of course there are several temples of Shriners in San Francisco, but this was the particular affair of the Islam Temple and nothing was spared to make it a success. The stage looked particularly gorgeous, being banked with beautiful flowers handsomely arranged. Gilded bird cages containing canaries, hung among the foliage; electric lights glowed among the blossoms, and altogether, the setting gave one an impression of fairy land. There was music of course, and dancing and finally the guests went down to supper, which was served in the dining hall down stairs. A capital menu was discussed accompanied by plentiful libations of the new Champagne, Bouche "Sec."

* *

The first meeting of the Saturday Fortnightly was held in Ebell Hall on the evening of October 9th. The decorations were extremely simple—a few palms and potted plants being placed around the room. The reorganization of the club seems to have altered the general makeup. The extremely youthful element has been eliminated. A year ago a girl in gown of ankle length, with flowing locks, was a familiar sight, but on Saturday evening maidens who had not passed their eighteenth birthday were in the minority. This is undoubtedly due to the fact that the Deux Temps has not been reorganized, and the younger members of that club have joined the Fortnightly. There was the familiar predominance of girls, which seems so unnecessary when one remembers the proximity of the University. I noted many maids decorating the walls, some of them extremely attractive-looking, too. It is to be hoped that the lady patronesses will make more of an effort to introduce the strangers one to another. I heard many complaints from the boys last season about the difficulty they experienced in obtaining introductions, and it often happened that certain girls were glued to the walls throughout an entire evening when there were plenty of lads only too eager to dance. The cotillion was ably engineered by Miss Florence Sharon and Mr. Harry Farr. Miss Sharon is an effective looking girl and moves gracefully. The figures were in the usual marching order. Among the debutantes present I noted Miss Martha Alexander as one of the most popular. Of the girls whom I admired most were Miss Marietta Havens, Miss Barker and Miss Carmen Moore.

Last week entertainments were at a premium in Oakland, the gaiety of the latter days of September having been followed by an almost lenten-like quietude. On Thursday Miss Katherine Harrub gave a luncheon to the Misses Dunn of San Francisco, who have recently returned from abroad. It was a crimson affair—lights and flowers being in ruddy tints—carnations were used as decorations. The Misses Sherwood, Miss Robinson, Miss Gorrill, Mrs. Ernest Folger and Mrs. Fred Stolp were among the guests.

An exceedingly smart affair was the luncheon given on Wednesday by Mrs. Martin Kellogg in honor of Mrs. Phoebe Hearst. The room was very prettily arranged; in the center was a round table and around it were grouped smaller tables all decorated in cosmos. Miss Howison, Mrs. Bunnell, Mrs. Rising, Mrs. Carey Jones and Mrs. Msoes were among those bidden to meet Mrs. Hearst.

Several informal affairs were given during the week—among them, the most enjoyable being a tea on Saturday by Miss Belle Mhoon, and a luncheon on Thursday by Miss Jessie Glascock. Miss Mhoon was assisted in receiving by Miss Prather, Miss Fannie Baldwin and Miss Glascock. About thirty-five men and maids were invited. Miss Glascock's lunch was in honor of the Misses Stubbs of San Francisco. The decorations were pink carnations. Among those invited were Miss Mhoon, Miss Prather, Miss Landers, Miss Baldwin and Miss Marguerite Jolliffe.

An unusually pretty church wedding was that of Dr. Mason and Miss Rantzau, of San Leandro, which took place on Wednesday evening of last week. The church was decked in greens and white marguerites. Miss Elsie Horton, of Livermore, was maid of honor.

Mr. and Mrs. Edson Adams have taken the J. C. Martin house on Blackstone Hill for the winter. Senator and Mrs. Le Grande Canon Tibbets are expected from the East this week. They anticipate remaining until after Christmas with Mrs. J. A. Folger. Miss Amy McKee is at present in Portland, Oregon, visiting her sister, Mrs. Norman Lang. Mr. Isaac Requa has steadily improved since his return from Paso Robles. Captain and Mrs. Potts gave a big reception in East Oakland on Saturday evening to about two hundred people.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Rubber heels: Easy walking, no fatigue. At Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

LATE VERSE

Ballade of Thistledowns.

Lighter and whiter than a flying flake
Of winter snows through wan air winnowing,
The thistledowns their sudden journeys take
O'er meadows wide in vagrant wandering.
No more shall they to earth reluctant cling
As a moss-lined and slowly sinking stone,
Left lying in an outer waste alone
Beside the edge of some remote morass,
But high they toss above the fields new-mown
Like disembodied spirits of the grass.

Below, a striped and timid garter-snake
Glides through the morning mist-lace glistening
On trailing vines, that tremble half awake,
Then disappears in mist enveloping:
From weed to weed the agile spiders swing,
Their ropes of pearl in filmy tether shown,
The crickets lie, in utter silence prone,
And west and south the tall cloud-phantoms mass,
While here and there dim thistledowns are thrown
Like disembodied spirits of the grass.

The drowsy atmosphere in lines opaque
Leans to the sun, that fast is gathering
The last faint dews, his fiery thirst to slake,
While swallows dip, on ever restless wing;
Across a dusty road the robins sing,
And bumblebees upon the clover drone
While thistledowns in airy spaces lone
Along the skies in happy freedom pass,
Like disembodied spirits of the grass.

ENVOY.

Prince, so shall we in patient monotone,
Know life's dull ways, till, very weary grown,
We fall asleep as death inverts the glass;
The while our souls through endless time are blown
Like disembodied spirits of the grass.

—Ernest McGaffey in the Youth's Companion.

To the Death.

Traitor and fool to thy face, I,
Foe of all friends of thy race, cry
"Halt." Let us both, in this place, try
Which death has chosen for his own!
Lo, she sleeps, she thou hast slain,—sweet,
Peaceful, appeased of her pain. Fleet
I follow. Thou shalt, not in vain, meet
The sword I have sworn shall atone!

Crafty, with treachorous kiss, how
Tempt her to lecherous bliss! Thou
Whom I have sought but for this, bow
Now, for thine hour is past!
Think of that last smile she smiled! O,
Those eyes!—eyes thou fain hadst beguiled. So
Pierced they thy bosom defiled, know,
As my rapier shall pierce it at last.

Traitor, she sleeps in her grave,—fair,
At peace by the peace-lisping wave there
Where I laid her. Thou, that death gave,—where Shalt thou lie? Close follows thy fate!
Out with thy shuddering blade! Men
Shrink not. Wouldst cower afraid, then?
Clash! thus! Why totter dismayed, when
Thy skill alone holds off my hate?

One! Why, thy guard's a pretense! Can
Fear not better thy fence, man?
Ah, how thy face yearns intense,—wan
Dread of thy lips as I thrust!
Closer, nay, battle thy best. Lo
Here is the end! Like a jest! So
Smites the white steel to thy breast! Go
Fool, to thine ultimate dust!

Stretch the gray corse on the grass. Heap
The earth. Shall he—what he was—sleep?
Shall God not bring judgment to pass, deep
Now, in his nethermost hell!
Lady, whose pale face yet cries,—fair,
Piteous—for justice, replies there
No voice from the villain that lies where
I smote, to say vengeance was well?

—Herbert Bates in the Chap Book.

In the island of Ceylon systems of polygamy and concubinage obtain to a considerable extent amongst the native races and the Cingalese section of the population formerly indulged in polyandry, when so disposed. In consequence the matrimonial status is not easily defined at all times. On one occasion a petition was presented to a certain very able but eccentric District Judge for divorce, and when the case came on, he inquired whether he was right in understanding that the parties were natives. "Certainly, your honor," was the reply of the attorney for the plaintiff. "Then all I can say," said the Judge, "is that it is perfectly ridiculous. Why, everybody knows that these people simply live together like cocks and hens in a farm-yard. I won't listen to such a case." The attorney rejoined, "But I put it to your honor as a married man, if——" This was too much for the Judge, who was well known to be anything but an uxorious or even kindly husband, and he fiercely interjected: "The Court has no wife, sir! Case dismissed."

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

THE THEATRES

Impressions of the "Hoosier Doctor," with a Few Suggestions Thrown In.

After you have divested your mind of the kindly impressions which the clever things in "The Hoosier Doctor" has implanted there, and you come down to regarding the play—not the performance—critically, you must admit that it bears evidence of having been put together somewhat hurriedly. It is subject to the suspicion of having been written on a "rush" order. The central idea is full of human interest. The subject is admirable enough, but there are creases and wrinkles that need ironing out. The cloth hitches up here, sags down there, is too tight in one place and too loose in another. The material is excellent, it is only the "finish" of it that jars a little heavily upon me. Probably a really finished play has never left the hand of a playwright. It is only after a long drilling and a careful weeding out of the gaucheries developed by practical experience that results finally in a well-rounded, smoothly-finished play. Useless men and women in various conditions of awkwardness, together with the distraction they beget, are so removed. The unnecessary person, whom the author in his den has neglected to properly whisk off the stage, is by this slow process gradually blotted out from view. The actor is relieved of a world of annoyance and so too is the audience.

If the somewhat complaining criticisms appearing in this column over the attached initial have readers who are moved by the approval or disapproval here set down of things theatrical, they are advised to see "The Hoosier Doctor" at the Columbia, not that the play is great by any means. The idea of it is above the average, the handling of the idea somewhat below.

The play depicts a homely side of life in Indiana, the Hoosier State. It holds a kindly old homœopathic physician, Dr. Willow (Digby Bell), who rather appeals to the sympathetic side of your nature. He is poor—very poor. Starvation is almost his. He carries papers, sells books, and does a world of other things to earn a living for himself and his motherless daughters. Meanwhile he is diligently pursuing a medical course. Upon his own confession he is unable to earn money enough to support his family. For his groceries he is dependent upon a daughter who earns ten dollars per week as a typewriter. Sugar and tea are luxuries of which the Willow family frequently "run out" for days. This is the deplorable condition of affairs when the play opens. You forgive the old man for pawning the surgical instruments given him as a prize for passing a specially good medical examination, you forgive him for squandering practically all of the money on a pair of side combs for his youngest daughter, but when it dawns upon you that the old Jack has married the widow Bunce six weeks previous, while his exchequer was naught and his family was hungry, you are disgusted with him. The marriage was not the worst of it; "he had been seen coming out of the widow's house early in the morning," while the family believed him to be "sitting up with the sick Mr. Robinson." One is a little sorry the whitecaps who raid the Bunce house did not give the old doctor a well merited drubbing before assistance came. Your affection for the "good" Dr. Willow dissipates somewhat with the development of this marriage, and you wish it had not happened, for it might easily have been avoided.

Mrs. Bell as "grandma" shared the honors of the evening equally with the "Doctor," Many a "grandma's" camphor-wood chest must have been ransacked to fish out the capes and gowns worn by the scolding but after all rather common-sense old lady. The play is well put on, well staged and well performed. It needs smoothing out, that is all. B.

* *

Just what there is in "Pink Dominoes" to attract decent people is beyond the average mind, but laudable or not, there is something magnetic enough to draw an audience. At the Alcazar this week it is given a rather profitable revival, with more success probably in the box office than on the stage. Wright Huntington is a rather lively Charles Greythorne, and F. B. Clayton is good as Sir Percy Wagstaff. Both Miss Foster and Miss Crosby overact woefully as Sophie Greythorne and Lady Maggie; Miss Kingsley makes a pretty and discreetly innocent Rebecca, and Mrs. Bates as Mrs. Tubbs is fussily excellent. A bright little bit is Bernice Graham as the apprentice. The best work in the piece is given by Mr. Shaw as the festive Tubbs—his comedy is good and the performance is satisfying, which is more than can be said for the remaining members of the cast. Baby Ruth's specialties are very clever, and take immensely with the audience.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

* *

A play for the most patriotic is "The White Squadron," this week's attraction at Morosco's. It fairly reeks with star spangled banners and brass band sentiment, to make no mention of gold lace, red tape and other official necessities. The scene is in Brazil during the time of Fonseca, who turns out in the last act to be quite a hero. But before this happens Victor Staunton of the U. S. S. Chicago makes things rather lively and upholds the dignity of his country in a most commendable manner.

* *

The popularity of "The Bohemian Girl" is being well attested at the Tivoli. Other operas may come and go, new stars may shine and fade away, but the merry Gypsy opera seems to run on forever, regardless of time and everything else. Michelena as Thaddeus receives principal attention. Having sung the part so many times with Emma Abbott he is thoroughly at home in it. His "You'll remember Me" is delightfully sung, but "The Fair Land of Poland" is his piece de resistance. Edwin Stevens varies the traditional business of Devilshoof with a few welcome variations, and J. J. Raffael is satisfying as the Count.

H. S. K.

DRAMATIC NOTES

A song recital of the compositions of Joseph Roeckel, under the direction of Mme. Ellen Coursen Roeckel, will come off at Byron Mauzy Hall on Thursday evening, October 21st.

Mr. Otto Bendix will give the first of four classical concerts at Byron Mauzy Hall Monday evening. Mr. Bendix will be assisted by Mr. Nathan Landsberger.

Herr Fritz Scheel directs the first symphony concert of the season at Metropolitan Temple Thursday afternoon October 21st. The orchestra numbers fifty selected musicians.

At the song recital in Y. M. C. A. Auditorium next Saturday afternoon, Mme. Emily E. Lassaugue will sing one of her own compositions—a canzone, "Jacqueminot Roses." She will also give an aria from Handel's "Jeptha."

"The Hoosier Doctor" runs another week at the Columbia. The attendance has been large, and promises to continue so to the end of the engagement. The next attraction will be Corinne in the new comic opera, "An American Beauty."

A departure from melodrama is announced for next week at Morosco's in the production of Edwin Milton Royle's well-known play, "Friends." The two principal characters of John Paden Jr. and Adrian Karje will be played by W. H. Pascoe and Mortimer Snow.

A feature of the Italian Opera season to open at the California on November 2d will be the production of several operas new to San Francisco, notably "Manon Lescaut" and "La Boheme." Other operas to be sung are "La Gioconda," "Werther," "Linda di Chamounix," "Masked Ball," and "Maestro de Capella."

Mme. Camilla Urso makes her farewell appearance to-morrow (Sunday) evening in Golden Gate Hall. Mme. Urso's numbers are Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin Op. 64, and Lalo's concerto russe Op. 29. Mme. Eleonore Joseph, Miss Marie Lina Voltz, Mr. Rhys Thomas and Colonial Quartette will assist.

The opening of "Under the Red Robe" at the Baldwin Monday evening is of particular interest. Mr. Rose's adaptation closely follows the story, and retains not only the dramatic interest, but also the color and character of the time. The company is headed by Mr. William Morris and Miss Mary Hampton. Mr. Giles Shine will play Richelieu. Others in the cast are William Farnum, Frank McGlynn, Edwin Thanhouser, and Marie Moore.

On Monday evening the Alcazar will present "Too Much Johnson." It is a gay, boisterous comedy, and in view of its movement in Cuba, it is of rather timely interest. Wright Huntington will play Augustus Billings (Gillette's old part), Miss Gertrude Foster Mrs. Billings, Mr. Wallace Shaw Francis Faddish, and Mrs. F. M. Bates Mrs. S. Upton Batterson. The latest anent "The First Born" is that a French version for early production is being written by a well-known Parisian dramatist.

Xaver Scharwenka, the brilliant pianist and composer, gives a series of piano recitals at the California, commencing Tuesday evening, October 19th. There will be five concerts in all — the others on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Wednesday and Saturday afternoons. The interest in Scharwenka's coming is considerable in artistic circles generally, for not since the appearance of Paderewski have we had a genuine celebrity here. Mr. Edward Xavier Roelker, the tenor, will assist.

The diminutive comedy duo, Arthur and Jennie Dunn, head the list of new people at the Orpheum next week. Miss Ola Hayden, who is announced as the renowned contratenor, and Miss Nina Collins, whistling artiste, make their first appearance, and also Joseph Hayden and Queen Hetherton, society sketch artists. Press Eldridge has made a tremendous success and will be continued with Provo, John J. Welch, the Adolphi Trio and O'Brien and Havel.

A genuine novelty, and a very successful one, is "The Geisha," to be sung for the first time in San Francisco Sunday evening next, at the Tivoli. It is now in its second year in London, and in New York it has broken many records. The scene is set in a Japanese tea house, calling for pretty scenery and dainty costumes. The plot is full of clever comedy and pleasing, catchy music. Edwin Stevens plays the Marquis Imari. Thomas C. Leary reappears as Wun Hi, the tea house proprietor, and Robert Dunbar will be Reginald Fairfax. Miss Edith Hall will be Mollie Seamore, Florence Walcott O. Mimosa San, and Tillie Salinger Lady Constance.

PRESS ELDRIDGE

A Star of Minstrelsy Who Has Succeeded at Variety.

Press Eldridge, whose "turn" at the Orpheum has been the feature of the bill, this week, has been in negro minstrelsy further back than he cares to remember. He is a bluff, blunt and vigorous type of fun-maker, who takes his performance and himself much more seriously than he permits his audience to. He is the last of the eminent burnt-cork artists to visit San Francisco. We have had Dockstadter, Haverly, Primrose and all the others, but Press Eldridge could never agree with Gustav Walter as to terms and he has remained a novelty. However, he claims frankly, and the Orpheum audiences apparently agree with him, that the loss is ours as he has, in the meantime, been tremendously busy in the East. He is a feature in New York, in Boston and in Philadelphia, and has originated more gags and sung more songs and thought out more "new business" than the combined hosts of his brethern—which may be true, for Press is funny his own way—a compound of audacity, impertinence, clear enunciation and facial expression.

There is something highly diverting about the manner in which he advances to the footlights and salutes the house—"Hello, audience." On the stage, as in a fight, it is generally the first blow that counts, and it is easy for Eldridge, after that attack, to hold his auditors. They are ready to laugh at anything he says or does, and they have generally good humorous reasons to be amused.

The quality of his enunciation is a factor in Press' success. So many of this type of performer mumble and jumble their words as to lose their sense and hide their meaning. He has also an appreciation of novelties, and does not imagine because a song or a joke has won a laugh three times that it is necessarily immortal. He told the writer that early in his career he realized the propensities of minstrels to imitate one another, and vowed he would find new things or invent them. Eldridge writes most of his own songs and composes the music, but then he has a tremendous energy and is well able to cope with any ordinary problem after his "turn" is over.

Rather an amusing reminiscence of Eldridge is about an experience in a Washington theatre years ago. It was one of those old-style institutions with a company attached which, between the visits of stars, would give concerts, negro minstrel performances, comedies or anything else to draw an audience. The custom was for the star to bring along his own play, and the company sustained the subordinate roles—all but Eldridge, who was the favorite comedian, and always in black face parts. This arrangement worked well enough until one night when the star did not put in an appearance. It was a wild-eyed melodrama, "Dick Daring, the Sierran Avenger," and there was nothing in the direction of crime that was not achieved in the course of the evening. The manager demanded that Press fill the vacancy and he had to comply. He rigged himself out in the costume of the role and, as he appeared in full cowboy panoply, with his armament of pistols and bowie knives, the audience which knew him colored, failed to recognize him white, and gave a shout of applause. He stood for a moment an impressive figure, and then cried: "Another step, you scoundrel, and you die," which happened to be the first words of the part. Then a nigger in the topmost gallery learned over and in disappointed tones declared:

"Aw it's only dat Press."

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents
Sold only at 102 Eddy street

ARE THEY SPOILED?

W. T. Stead Says the American Woman Has the Best of It. Query?

Is the American woman spoiled? The American male—is he henpecked? Mr. Stead who originated the Review of Reviews answers both questions in the affirmative, and great is the indignation thereat. Paul Bourget managed to convey something of the same idea in his book about Americans, for he was vastly impressed by the women of our production and rather sorry for the men. Stead alleges the male American will listen appreciatively to the inane nonsense which the fashionable woman calls conversation and never dreams or dares to offer a contradiction. A condition which may be chivalrous but is hardly intelligent. For this he is taken to task by Ella Wheeler Wilcox who grows angry in reply and declares the American man not given to the exhilirating exercise of wife-beating—which is rather begging the question. She says that the husbands of America have the courage of their convictions and the will to assert them even in the presence of wives and daughters, but agrees with Stead that our sisters and mothers are injured by the degree of freedom the laxity of brothers and fathers permits them.

The domestic virtues of English women have the approval of the poetess of passion, who asserts further that the American female stock would do well to cultivate the charm of repose.

DIGBY BELL
Who is now playing at the Columbia.

At the same time our men should acquire those niceties of manner which render the occasional foreigner so captivating to the native heiress.

You will perceive Ella rather consents, on the whole, to the strictures of the London editor, even though she does grow severe over the wife-beating.

But here cometh Dr. Morgan Dix who says our girls are really not a bit spoiled—save the "bloomer girl"—who is injured not by the men, but by wrong-headed leaders of her own sex. "Americans put women on pedestals," says the doctor, "and pay them homage." Truly an excellent idea—if the ladies would only remain on the pedestal. It is their return to earth that disillusionizes. Sir Edwin Arnold, who as an editor and poet and father, is supposed to have valuable information about such subjects thinks the female of America about the happiest extant, and kindly approves of the product in its dual capacity of mother and housekeeper. But, then, Sir Edwin only "passed through"—he never lived with the subject in either role. Elizabeth Banks has studied the lady of the land at close range and says she is spoiled—but only by comparison. "From the moment of her entrance by birth into these United States she has everything that love and money can give, whereas in other countries the greatest consideration is bestowed on the sons of the family. In Yankee land, little brother gives the biggest portion of his apple to little sister, so the New York financier diminishes his own expenses before he invites Mrs. Bullion to economize."

At this juncture there cometh Reverend George Pentecost, who thinks our ladies deserve spoiling—there are belles and beauties in other lands, he declares, but the American woman is incomparable. This enthusiastic gentleman is either just engaged or is much married.

To return to Mrs. Wilcox and Banks—both declare that American women make improper demands upon their husbands and are indulged too much. "What other men," they ask, "would allow wives and daughters to go off travelling for years abroad while they themselves remain at home devoting their time to work? They are more easily coaxed, more amenable to persuasion than the males of other climes. They yield to the argument of tears, whereas elsewhere the weeping wife must dry her own eyes after her husband has banged the door on her sorrow." Maybe this tenderness is the desire of the male for relief—and oh, the happiness of release from the tedium of existence with a nervous, distraught, jealous, exacting female, who wearies and worries and yearns only for the things she has not.

The ladies and reverends to the contrary—it is unquestionable that the American woman is spoiled. She demands and is accorded infinitely more than is conceded her sisters the world over. Her whims are indulged through mistaken tenderness. She is decorated and admired and petted and calls the devotion chivalry. However, this is San Francisco—the native land of beauty—if our girls are not spoiled why have we a city of boarding-houses rather than a city of homes? Why will the girl, who has just married a man of small means, demand life in a hotel instead of in a house, which she might make a home? Where else—but the subject might be pursued to an interminable length. One may be forgiven for asking, if in return for all his devotion, his chivalry, his tenderness, the American man receives an adequate return—if he is better and more truly loved than the men of other climes? His self-abnegation has made the women of our clime the most fascinating and beautiful of the race, but is it not at the expense of himself. His female is really a much finer creature than he, whereas the German man, who is the hero at his own fireside, is far a better specimen than his frau. It is thus in England, though to a lesser degree. The French, who next to the Americans, are most devoted of women worshippers—are physically the inferior of their neighbors. However, the assumptions presented here are debatable, even though the conclusions be irresistible.

SELINA FRANCES

A Scotch minister, preaching on the miraculous sojourn of Jonah in the belly of a marine monster, was careful the while to refrain from disclosing the exact species of the member of the finny tribe that furnished the accommodation. Having sufficiently stimulated the curiosity of his congregation, he said: "Noo, ma freens, what kind o' a fesh was this. Was it a sharruk? Nae, it was nae a sharruk. Was it a mackerel? Nae, it was nae a mackerel. Was it a cod-fesh? Nae, it was nae a cod-fesh. Was it a herrin'? Nae, it was nae a herrin'—" But this was more than an experienced fishwife could stand, and at this point she exclaimed, "Meenister, it was a whale," only to be sat upon with the stern correction, "Janet, ye're a bad wumman, takin' the worrud o' God out o' his meenister's mooth."

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

If you wish to be sure of the success of your entertainment, engage Huber's Orchestra. It gives complete satisfaction. Address 20 O'Farrell street. Telephone care Benj. Curtaz, Main 1247.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 Post St.

QUEEN LILY
SOAP

Will not shrink Woolens, Flannels or the finest of Fabrics. The Best and Most Economical Soap Made. Washes Without Rubbing . . . .

PATRONIZE HOME INDUSTRY

Notice.—On receipt of 25 Queen Lily Soap wrappers, we will mail to any address a handsome picture, 15x20, free from all advertising matter.

NEW ENGLAND SOAP CO.
307 Sacramento St., S. F.

SOHMER PIANOS
BYRON MAUZY
AGENT
308-314 Post Street, S. F.

NEW BOOKS

The Decline of Bret Harte—How "The Christian" was Received in London.

If Bret Harte could be persuaded to return to California he might find new material to work upon. This may seem vain optimism to anyone who has just read Three Partners (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), but there is a hope in the idea, and hopes are not lightly to be abandoned. The short story is the natural medium for the expression of his talent, for he has not the invention necessary to successfully construct an elaborate complication and conduct it to a rational conclusion. In this, Harte's latest tale, he rings the old changes on Jack Hamlin, the Spanish padres, the antique mining camps, the flash ladies of San Francisco, and all the other material which have so long been his stock in trade. The Three Partners is an incoherent romance, only relieved from the ridiculous by the admirable style of the author. It is the fine dignity and rather stately literary manner of Bret Harte, his inimitable vistas of Sierra scenery that alone makes his novels valuable, but their importance and rarity have been obliterated by familiarity. His types are history, but history never repeats itself as often as Bret Harte does.

Dr. Robertson Niccol, who figures as a literary Columbus in the British Weekly, discovered The Sowers, and his vigorous indorsement elevated Henry Seton Merriman into a literary high-light. The first new book since the achievement of that success is In Kedar's Tents (Dodd, Mead & Co.), which, though it is not a work of importance, is a notably well balanced story, distinguished for interest and readableness. It details the fortunate adventures of Frederic Conyngham in Spain during the first Carlist revolution, and presents to us in the personality of General Vincente, a characterization which is really the only literary achievement in the volume. One is struck with the clever management of the narrative and a certain buoyancy in the dialogue, but it is not out of such stuff as this that great novelists are developed. It cannot be stated too often that success in perspective and composition do not constitute greatness in a novel; there must be material and color. A great writer must have observed tremendously, and his narrative should not only give us the adventures of his hero, but an insight into his character, his surroundings, his atmosphere. In Kedar's Tents is a good story and only that.

The spirit of Bohemia life is difficult to distill into ordinary prose, and can never be conveyed through the medium of an outsider. The careless and jaunty air of the genus requires for its reproduction a light and skillful but sure touch, and a literary manner subdued to the material. Phillis in Bohemia is a harmless effort at describing a phase of literary and artistic life in New York, and is really not entitled to more consideration than could be packed into a sentence. It is notable, however, that this type of sketch is done ever so much better in London. Certain feminine subjects handled in the New York Sun have the proper blending of smartness and lightness, but assuredly it is not attained in Phillis. The Pall Mall and St. James' Gazette used to publish exceedingly clever dialogues, not of Bohemia alone but about clothes and society and topics of the moment, something on the line of Wells' Select Conversations With an Uncle which were capitally written and amusing into the bargain. Indeed there are in San Francisco several young women who could handle the subject of Bohemia to infinitely better advantage than the authors of Phillis. There was once a Bohemia in San Francisco—a veritable Bohemia composed of as bright, gay and careless a set of men as ever wrote copy or defied their creditors. What a delightful volume their adventures would make for the gifted some one who will yet appear to turn them into sketches. But it must be an artist to suggest the varied characters of the gang that consorted at the Frenchman's on Merchant street in the days of yore. There were neither cowboy poets nor make-believe magazine writers as there are in Phillis, among them, but the blood of life and fun bubbled in their viens, and they saw to it that their lives were full of incident and detail. But Phillis is a beautiful piece of typography, charmingly bound and smartly illustrated, for which the publishers (Messrs. H. S. Stone & Co.) are to be congratuted.

The English critics had no better welcome for Hall Caine's Christian than their compatriots on this side of the water. Indeed, the intrinsic vulgarity of this novel has met with severer reprehension in London than in America. The Times dismissed the book with a few curt lines appropriately sandwiched between the Stock Exchange list and "Home Markets." The Daily Telegraph says: "In the Christian Mr. Hall Caine has surpassed all his previous failures in this direction. He has succeeded in sinking far beneath the level of ancient Coburg and has only touched bottom in the lowest deep of the penny novelette. Spurious sentiment, sham satire, faked pathos, cheap morality, caricatured Christianity meet us on every page." Max Burbohm, who is writing criticisms for the Daily Mail commences his excoriation:

Parliament has risen and so has Mr. Hall Caine. He had bided his time cunningly, and now, having strangled the sea serpent and set his heel on the gigantic gooseberry, he has taken sole possession of the Silly Season, and has been passing with an accompaniment of thumped drums and brandished banners down the empty columns of the press. * * * As a matter of fact, Mr. Hall Caine is far more remarkable as cheap-jack than as author. Why stop his patter? "On the morning of the 9th of May, 18—, three persons important to this story stood among the passengers on the deck of the Isle of Man steamship Tynwald as she lay by the pier at Douglas getting up steam for the passage to Liverpool." That is the first sentence in the book, of which, I am told, "every sentence has been deliberated over with intense nervous care." Observe that it boasts twelve prepositions, one comma and a collision of three substantives, and that it ends with a sequence of four dactyls. * * * The Christian is packed full of everything its author could lay hands on.

Even the Argonaut, which really ought to know better, has published as an authentic document, a letter purporting to have been written by a Chicago swain to his sweetheart, proposing marriage and offering a degree of freedom that is extraordinary and certainly modern. It is copied from an article by Mrs. Atherton in the Contemporary Review. The letter is actually from Hamlin Garland's Rose of Dutcher's Cooly, and is the proposal of the editor hero to Rose. It is appropriate in that connection, but it is hard to believe that either heroine or editor have, even in Chicago, many prototypes.

BOOK NOTES

Miss Nina Barrow (The Century Company), by Frances Courtenay Baylor, is very much of an object lesson for girls. Miss Nina is a willful little heiress who has been brought up with more of her own way than is proper, and, as may be imagined, is a rather disagreeable young person. But she fortunately comes under the charge of a practical relative and in time becomes an amiable young woman. The tale is bright and pertly written; at times too much so; as a bit of fiction it is of little value, for whatever virtue it possessed is altogether in its character study.

Another story for children, but one infinitely more agreeable, is Master Skylark, by John Bennett (The Century company). It is a tale of Shakespeare's time, and among the characters introduced are Shakespeare, himself, and rare Ben Jonson, too. The hero is a little lad of Stratford, gifted with a marvelous voice, who is lured from home by a strolling player and brought to sing in London. After many adventures he escapes from his master and returns home. The story is full of romance of the Elizabeth age, and Mr. Bennett has given many pictures of characteristic scenes in old London. The illustrations by Reginald B. Birch, are in accord with the spirit of the story.

Up the Matterhorn in a Boat, by Marion Manville Pope (The Century Company), is a rather fanciful tale possessing, if nothing else, the recommendation of novelty. It describes the adventures of two Americans and a dog who scale the famous Swiss mountain in an aluminum boat attached to an electric balloon. On their way up they met with adventures innumerable which are narrated in a whimsical vein that makes entertaining enough reading.

Houghton, Mifflin and Company have just brought out Charles Egbert Craddock's new book, The Young Mountaineers. It is a collection of short stories and sketches descriptive of life and people in the Tennessee mountains. One of them, The Conscript's Hollow, is particularly good, and notably two others, In the Chinking and A Mountain Storm. The stories are all in Miss Murfree's familiar style and are full of homely pathos and dry wit. The dialect is of course good—for people who care for dialect.

Another excursion in dialect is Uncle Lisha's Outing, by Rowland E. Robinson, also from the press of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Mr. Robinson has made himself familiar with Danvis Folk and Vermont, both of them of much merit. For his outing Uncle Lisha goes off to Canada in quest of fish and game. His companion is a French Canadian named Antoine, and the two dialects are made the feature of the volume. It is cleverly done but dialogue is somewhat out of date.

Mrs. Alexander's new novel, Barbara, Lady's Maid and Peeress, (J. B. Lippincott Company), has for its raison d'etre the adventures of a young milliner's apprentice, who becomes maid to a lady of quality and finally turns out be the long-lost daughter of a peer. Not a startling nor a strictly original motive, but strong enough to be developed into a well told and interesting tale. It is at least without a mission, or a tangle in morals, or any other modern features.

The feature of the International Studio for October is a sketch of Marc Antocolosky the Russian sculptor. It is splendidly illustrated with copies of eight of Antocolosky's greatest works. Henry T. Schafer has an article on The Coloring of the Venetians, and Gleeson White contributes the second part of Some Glasgow Designers and Their Work. Copies are made from the drawings of J. M. Swan, A. R. A., and from olographs by Storm Van Gravesande.

$2,000.00

Schilling's Best baking powder is such baking powder as you would ask us to make if you knew the facts.

Sunshine

Is as necessary to good health and enjoyment as pure air and water. All of these you can get at Byron Hot Springs—with the addition of fine bathing in the Mineral Springs and complete restoration to health and recuperation of your nerves and vital forces by a course of those marvelous Mud Baths. Sunshine everywhere—in the house and out—no fogs nor wind, no dust nor noise—a restful retreat for the invalid.

After a night with the boys: Bromo Kola.

$100—Reward—$100

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

Address F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.
Sold by druggists, 75c.

Do You Want Gold?

Everyone desiring to keep informed on Yukon, the Klondyke and Alaskan gold fields. Send 10 cents for large Compendium of vast information and big color map to Hamilton Publishing Company, Hamilton, Indiana.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

Just Ready.....

In the Permanent Way

By Flora Annie Steel

Author of

On the Face of the Waters,
The Flower of Forgiveness,
Miss Stuart's Legacy,
In the Tideway,
Red Rowans.

Cloth, Crown 8vo., $1.50

Short Stories of Life in India

by the author of the most successful novel of the Indian Mutiny yet written; by the author of whom India's most famous story-teller said that no one, not even Rudyard Kipling. himself, has a better knowledge of India; by an author who has "the gift of story-telling in the highest degree; brilliant, graphic, full of spirited action;" by the author of a novel which a leading London review said that "few men and no other woman could have written it;" by the author of another which is said to be "fresh and sweet as the moorland air itself;" by the author of still another described as "a tragic idyll, strong in its climaxes and thoroughly natural in its sweeping analysis of human passions."

Press Comments on the Works of

Mrs. F. A. Steel.

Tales of the Punjab

Decorated Cover. Price, $2.00

"The story book of the year, which distances all others is beyond question 'Tales of the Punjab,' told by the people." Independent.

"Nothing can be fresher, more poetic, than these brilliant little stories. The imagination of the young cannot but be stimulated and strengthened by the delicious absurdities." Illustrated American.

In the Tideway.

Cloth, 16mo. Price, $1.25

"It has some veritably thrilling passages, but it is natural from cover to cover, and is laid down as a piece of evenly brilliant writing." The Tribune, New York.

Uniform Edition

On the Face of the Waters

Cloth, 12mo. Price, $1.50

This is the novel of which J. Lockwood Kipling wrote in a long article in The New Review, saying that "where native life, thought and character are concerned, Mrs. Steel leaves nothing to desire."

But apart from its historical value, which is great, apart from its interest as the most remarkable study of the native character yet written, it is an intensely interesting story, full of incident. There are some marvelously graphic pages — as where the famous nine men held a powder magazine till every hope was gone, then blew the whole magazine and themselves into eternal fame. There are other scenes as thrilling, and it is no wonder that the book has already passed into its Twelfth American Edition.

Twelfth American Edition

and is even more widely sold in England.

"I first heard of it through Mr. Rudyard Kipling, who praised it highly . . . he said that no one, not even himself, has a better knowledge of India than Mrs. Steel." —Miss Jeanette Gilder in The Chicago Tribune.

"Strong in its plot, in its characters, and in its grasp on historical facts." The Outlook.

"A strong novel, strong in its dramatic handling of heroic issues, stronger still in its calm veracity." Tribune, New York

"It surpasses anything that has been written of India except the best of Kipling's short stories." The Chronicle, San Francisco.

"The most vivid, the most exciting, the most powerful novel of the day." Inter-Ocean, Chicago.

By Mrs. F. A. Steel.

Uniform Edition. Each, $1.50.

Miss Stuart's Legacy.

"The story is a delightful one, with a good plot, an abundance of action and incident, well and naturally drawn characters, excellent in sentiment, and with good ending . . . Mrs. Steel touches all her stories with the hand of the master, and she has yet to write one that is any way dull or uninteresting."—Boston Courier.

The Flower of Forgiveness.

"There is a weird charm and fascination about these sixteen short stories by Flora Annie Steel. They all deal with Indian life, and evince the same patient study into Indian character as it developed and manifests itself in various castes that the author has shown in her former books."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Red Rowans.

"It is much for her art that the tragic close seems as purely accidental as a real occurrence, and sweet and fresh as the moorland air itself. And those who love Scotland know what this praise means."—Boston Transcript.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

66 Fifth Avenue, New York.

A Little Knowledge

Is Dangerous

BUT

the Knowledge that

E. & J. BURKE'S

Guinness Porter

and

Bass Ale

ARE THE FINEST TONICS KNOWN, AND THEIR USE WILL Restore Health to Many an Invalid!

PACIFIC COAST AGENTS

Sherwood & Sherwood

SAN FRANCISCO

PORTLAND LOS ANGELES

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED THREE HIGHEST AWARDS AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street

Under Occidental Hotel

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA ELECTRICAL WORKS

409 MARKET STREET

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. . ALSO . .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks

From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. Pacific Coast Sole Agents

Beware of Imitations

This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea

Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.

208 California St., S. F.

For sale by all grocers

DR. WARD'S MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.

Price, One Dollar.

Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.

Telephone Main 5697.

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC

14 Montgomery St., S. F

Telephone 305

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

A Close Criticism of the Stanford-Reliance Football Match.

The most noticeable circumstance in the Stanford-Reliance game was the improvement of Wells, centre for the clubmen. He clearly outplayed his opponent, making great gaps through which Arlett plunged for clean gains time and again. Should Wells continue to improve so rapidly, he will be a second Ames by the season's end, and one point of the Reliance line that seems likely to be weak will be very strong. Man for man Reliance outplayed their rivals. Between Smith and Carle there was so little difference that the men virtually neutralized one another's effectiveness. On the whole more gains were made by Smith's aid than Stanford made against him. It was poor captaining more than Reliance inferiority that allowed Jeffs to block Reliance kick. Much criticism has been directed against Rice becouse of the gains Carter and Morse repeatedly made through and around him. It must be remembered that the most effective attacks modern football has developed are divested at or near the tackle position. To such perfection have these plays been brought that the tackle alone cannot be expected to defend this part of the line. All modern systems of defense demand that the half and end be ready to aid the tackle, in fact the brunt of defense falls almost as heavily on the half as on the line man. Saturday Rice was supported by a back who was new to the position and who had not had time to master the defense demanded or to become used to playing in accord with his tackle. Rice's work must not be judged by Saturday's exhibition; he is a good tackle. Sheehy, who faced him, played his second game in the position and proved the wisdom of moving him from guard, for while he was a splendid guard he promises to be a superlative tackle. No man, I think, was ever endowed with a physique more adapted to this, the most difficult position a football man can be called to fill. He is compact, strong, a fast runner and very quick in starting.

* *

Stanford's showing was disappointing. The men were drawn to their limit, and they showed that in the stress of a hard game even veterans will forget sometimes the elements of play. Excepting Carle, the line men all played too high and persisted in watching the backs instead of the ball. The only play of note by the college line was the opening made for Jeffs and the ready way the half took advantage of it, and the good work of Smith in following in, gave Stanford its touchdown, and was the only really good football the cardinal showed in the game, except towards the final, when Cotton, aided by compact interference, did some very effective line-bucking. Cotton was slow. He was suffering from a bad ankle, and failed in starting on account of it. This slowness rendered it impossible to judge Brooke's new defensive formation with justice. In this line-up the ends are brought in close to reinforce the tackle. They are used practically as auxiliary tackle, and to a back placed about five yards behind the line is given the duty of following the runner out and tackling, after the tackles and ends have broken up or scattered the interference. In theory, with as fast, sure tackling a back as Cotton is, this seems a splendid defense. Its merit will be better judged when Cotton is in form to do himself justice. The cardinal showed the rudiments of the same rather slow but solid heavy-going interference that has made Pennsylvania's line-bucking a terror to their opponents. When Mr. Brooke gets Tickert and Carle into that "guard's back" play, five-yard gains will be plenty against the strongest lines.

* *

Murphy gave a pretty exhibition of coolness and long, clean punting. He was very slow, though, and twice at least there was no excuse for Reliance allowing the kick to go unblocked. On one of these occasions the quarter showed his remarkable self-possession. After receiving and fumbling a bad pass, he turned, with two or three Reliance men close by, picked up the ball, dodging the would-be tacklers, he punted low and clean for forty yards. Stanford's tackling was noticeably inferior to the clubmen. Time and again Reliance runners staggered along with one or more cardinal-legged men hanging fondly about their necks. The Reliance backs, taking advantage of the high tackling, went in low and hard for clean gains. Arlett was especially good at this plunging through the tremendous holes Wells, Smith and Hobbs made for him. He invariably shook Murphy off and reached Cotton, whose defensive work was good.

* *

The hard fought struggle was more interesting to watch than any early game here has been for years. It was marred, though, by some unpleasant occurences. The strenuous objections to the official's rulings twice seemed about to terminate the play in a wrangle. Then, too, there was a great deal of holding-in the line by the clubmen, and more or less roughing after tackles by Stanford men. Once or twice fists were flying along the line. The merit of the rulings is not of much importance. The question of interference with the punt-out will hardly occur again. The dispute merely illustrates that officials should be chosen some time before the day of the game and have an opportunity before play begins to discuss rules with the two captains. The other questioned decision was merely a matter of judgment. In such an event there should be no protest. Every man's judgment is apt to err. The surprising thing was that the discipline of the college men went to pieces, and nearly all of them, as well as Coach Brooke, began to harrangue the referee, whose position must have been far from pleasant. It is not intended to make this column reflect only the writer's athletic belief. Any real friend of athletics is welcome to space whenever he has anything to say that can aid in bettering athletic conditions on the coast. A week or two ago I commented on the condition and position of the Olympic Club as it appears to many of its well-wishers, both in and out of the club. Mr. Howard Taylor, than whom amateur sport has no more earnest friend, has very kindly promised to write on the subject from another point of view. His view of the matter, I hope, will appear next week.

CAPTAIN COTTON, OF STANFORD
Thors, photo

* *

The founders of the Olympic Club meant it to be, what every athletic club should be, an athletic college; a place offering young men a regular course for the development of their bodies. To this college the board of directors is relatively a faculty. To them is intrusted the government of the student body, and the formulation of a policy. What college in the land would be so foolish as entirely to change its faculty every twelve months? And if there was one so absurdly short sighted how long could it exist? To be successful the policy of any institution must be permanent and far-seeing. The yearly change of board forbids the adoption of any continuous policy by the Olympic Club and renders its government a happy go lucky one. Not the least of the reforms demanded within the club is a board of directors whose majority will hold office for at least two years. To elect for three years, each year replacing a third of the members by newly elected men, would insure a strong board with a fixed policy.

With such a board, backed by a membership of athletes and athletic enthusiasts the Club would soon become again what it once was, the leader in amateur sports on the coast and a factor in National athletic competition.

* *

One of the first acts of such a board would be to abolish the system of annexes. These annexes, clubs within the Olympic Club, are pernicious. A house divided against itself must fall and the annexes hopelessly divide those athletes who still wear the club's colors. In club matters there is no concern, the only thing of interest is how much the directors will contribute to the support of this or that annex, and every annex is suspicious of every other. There are the two bicycle annexes, "The Olympic Cyclers" and "The Olympic Wheelmen," each at the throat of the other, each ready to oppose anything the other may favor, no matter what the merits of the case may be. Until this anomalous state of affairs is remedied there can be no unity in the club and no possibility of any action looking to the betterment of things. The club should abolish these annexes. If they will do this and make the board of directors a more permanent body with greater power, the Olympic Club may again come to be an institution of which every true lover of amateur sport can be proud.

* *

There has been a lot of criticism of Haskell's quarterback work. After his exhibition in the last big game, his ability should be unquestioned. As Greisberg gets more used to passing the ball, and Haskell and he have moved together longer, the fumbling will disappear.

* *

To find efficient guards and ends is evidently going to give Mr. Nott more trouble than the filling of any other positions. Among the many candidates for tackle, there are a number of men who promise well. Nott is losing no sleep over backs, he has plenty of them and good ones too. Greisberg, when he learns to pass the ball better, will give a good account of himself at center. Hooper and Ludlow are the most formidable candidates for the guard positions. The former is light and inexperienced but he learns fast and plays with a snap that ought to make him efficient. He reminds one of McMillan who was the best guard that ever wore the cardinal of Stanford. A question that was asked often during the memorable slaughter of the U. C. hopes last year was: "What is wrong with Ludlow?" Why he, with his magnificent physical equipment and good head should have been so overwhelmingly out played was a mystery. The same thing happened last Saturday. Ludlow, it is true, made a number of good stops, but time and again, he was boxed or shouldered out of the play, all because he did not watch the ball. He keeps his attention fastened on the backs. Watching the opposing backs may be good policy for some, but Ludlow will never reach the point of play he ought, until he learns to keep the ball in sight while he watches his opponent. If he can learn to do this he ought to be as effective as any guard on the coast.

ROBERT WOLTERS

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. For particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

GET THE GENUINE ARTICLE!

Walter Baker & Co.'s Breakfast COCOA

Trade-Mark.

Pure, Delicious, Nutritious.

Costs Less than ONE CENT a cup.

Be sure that the package bears our Trade-Mark.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

(Established 1780.) Dorchester, Mass.

"GOLD SEAL"
"BADGER"
"PIONEER"

Rubber Goods

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.

MANUFACTURER OF

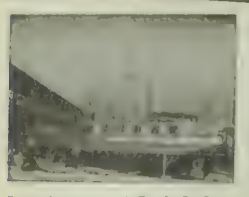
OIL CLOTHING

R. H. PEASE
Vice-President and Manager

573-575-577-579 Market Street
SAN FRANCISCO

73-75 First Street, Portland, Or.

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS



Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

Baldwin Theatre

AL. HAYMAN & CO. (Inc.) . . . . . Proprietors

Next Monday Evening, October 18th

Charles Frohman Presents the Brilliant Romance in four acts

Under the Red Robe

Adapted by Edward Rose

From the Novel by Stanley Weyman, as performed for over Three Hundred Nights at the Empire Theatre, New York

Columbia Theatre

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers

Did Your Hear What a Triumph

The Hoosier Doctor

Made the First Week?

Monday, Oct. 18th, commences the Second and Last Week of America's Favorite Comedian, Mr. Digby Bell

The company supporting him proclaimed the best seen here this season!

October 25th, first prodaction here of the Beautiful Comic Opera, "An American Beauty"

Orpheum

Week beginning Monday, Oct. 18th

ARTHUR & JENNIE DUNN, Diminutive Comedy Duo
MISS OLA HAYDEN, Renowned Contra-Tenor Vocalist
MISS NINA COLLINS, Whistling Artiste
HAYDEN & HETHERTON, Society Sketch Artists
Tremendous success of PRESS ELDRIDGE, the "Mother Hubbard Monologuist"
PROVO, the World-Renowned Juggler
JOHN J. WILSON, Eccentric Dancer
THE ADOLPHI TRIO O'BRIEN & HAVEL

New selections by the KNABEN-KAPELLE

Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House

MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager

Sunday Evening

Opening Comic Opera Season—the Triumph of Two Continents, the Japanese Musical Comedy

THE GEISHA

A TALE OF A TEA HOUSE
(By special arrangement with Augustin Daly)

Superb Cast! Spendid Chorus! Excellent Orchestra

Magnificent Scenery, Costumes and Effects from the London Models

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : . : : . : Manager

Phone Main 254.

Week beginning Monday, October 18th, with Ladies' and Children's Matinee Saturday

A Laugh in Every Line! Gillette's Masterpiece—the comedy that New York and London patronized for hundreds of nights

Too Much Johnson

Scenery specially painted—Environment appropriate
Performance absolutely unsurpassed

Never before at Alcazar prices—50, 35, 25 or 15c. including Reserved Seat.

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last four performance of the Patriotic Drama
THE WHITE SQUADRON

Commencing Monday, October 18th, Third Week of the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H. Pascoe, in the Romantic Comedy-Drama

"FRIENDS"

Romance, Pathos and Comedy! Beautiful Scenic Effects! Comical Situations! Strong Cast!

Evg. Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

FINANCE AND TRADE

Improving Conditions in Trade Circles —Stock Exchange Notes.

Thursday Evening.

The business outlook continues to be most encouraging, and as account is taken of the actual improvement the general conviction that prosperity has again returned to the country becomes more and more firmly established. No better indication of this fact can be afforded than the condition of the iron trade and the substantial increase in railway earnings. In the case of many important systems that have been in struggling financial circumstances for a long period, the recent traffic returns shew fully 20 per cent gain over the previous year. The effect of this must be to enhance the value of many neglected stocks and to bring the general investing public more freely into the market.

In the meantime, trading in the New York stock markets is chiefly confined to the professional operators, the bears for the moment appearing to have the upper hand. Municipal politics cloud the atmosphere there just now, but with an assurance of easy money for the remainder of the year, and a lower range of values, strong buyers will no doubt come on the scene before long.

The flow of gold from Europe has fairly set in and seems likely to continue to meet the expanding course of trade in the United States. Silver is very sensitive and though firmer for the moment, eveu its present position is by no means assured. Nothing seems likely to eventuate in the immediate future from the bimetallic movement, which, notwithstanding the hopes expressed, is not the least likely to get practical support from the financial powers in London.

Since our last review the bond market has pursued the even tenor of its way, and save that a slight fractional gain is noticeable throughout, no particular feature presents itself. Good securities are in demand and well held in view of the generally improved tone of business. San Francisco and North Pacific Railroad advanced to 104. Southern Pacific of Arizona is quoted 99½, at which these securities look cheap, the demand at that being good and buying orders coming from strong hands. In Northern Railway 6 per cent we heard of a sale of $100,000 at 108, for account of a deceased estate, purchaser being one of the local banks. Los Angeles Lighting have been changing hands at 100, the highest price paid for some time.

There promises to be a large demand for the limited amount of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley R. R. bonds, which the syndidate will offer in the market on the 1st proximo.

The stock of the Spring Valley Water Company has exhibited some weakness and at one time dropped from 100¼ to 99, but has since recovered and is now about 99½. The set-back was caused by the Supreme Court decision in the San Diego water case, which alarmed a few timid holders. We have no dohbt that the stock will improve again. Contra Costa Water Company's stock has been bid for at 43, but is firmly held with none offering at the moment.

In Gas and Lighting stocks Pacific Lighting is strong at 54, owing to a rumor of the dividend probably being increased to 40 instead of 35 cents, as heretofore. Mutual Electric is quoted 10¼, Gas and Electric 97½, Pacific Gas 94¼ x. d.

Our prediction with regard to Bank shares has beeen fully verified and a sharp advance has to be noted. Bank of California sold at 243, owing to the excellent showing made at the annual meeting. Throughout the list there is visible improvement and a firm demand.

At yesterday's meeting of the Nevada Bank the Chairman announced the intention to convert the institution into a national bank from the beginning of next year. Such a step, it is believed, will be in accordance with popular sentiment and will, at the same time, lessen the liability for taxation. The bank statement disclosed a favorable result for the working of the past year.

In the miscellaneous section Sugar stocks have been somewhat heavy during the week, owing to the absence of orders, but the future looks hopeful for this class of investment.

In grain the markets have been subject to a good deal of fluctuation, with values at a higher range again during the interval under notice. Sales have been moderate, with a good inquiry for futures, the highest price paid to-day for No. 1 December wheat having been 1.47½.

In all the leading produce markets a strong feeling prevails with prices generally tending upwards.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send, free of charge, to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

TURF TOPICS

California Two-Year-Olds — Cesarewitch Stakes and Jockey Sloan.

The Los Angeles meeting began on the 14th instant under favorable auspices, except slight rain which was against harness events. Racing will continue there until the 23d instant.

Recent returns from the East show that our two-year-olds that made a local reputation last spring have been able to hold their own on Eastern tracks lately. Travel and change of climate is very much against California youngsters doing anything when they first go on, especially after putting in some good races here in the early spring. Nearly all the colts and fillies that stamped themselves here as the best of the year have been adding to their reputation, notably the Burns and Waterhouse colt, Bliss Rucker, and filly, Napamax. Mr. E. J. Baldwin's Rey Salazar, too, has made a name for himself in the East and borne out the promise he showed before leaving here.

The migration of men and horses to the Pacific Coast is gaining strength as time goes on, and in another ten days several more large strings of horses will arrive. The entries for the first list of Ingleside stakes closed yesterday, but we shall not know the result for a few days yet.

In the enforcement of Rule 23 of the American Turf Congress and the ordinary track regulations, a considerable number of horses have been required to vacate stalls at Ingleside. Space is at a premium now, and the management has all it can do to find room for horses to which no exception can be taken in regard to either pedigree or registration.

The Cesarewitch Stakes (handicap, 2m. 2f. 35yds.) was run at Newmarket on Wednesday last and resulted in the victory of Mrs. Langtry's five-year-old horse, Merman, carrying 103 lbs. The Rush, 5 years, 117 lbs., being second, beaten a neck, and Carlton Grange third. The American horse, St. Cloud II, 98 lbs., the third in the St. Leger this year, ran well, but failed to stand the final rush from the bushes. Merman is an Australian-bred horse, being by Grand Flaneur out of Seaweed, and established a reputation previously as a stayer by his win in the old-time Lewes handicap, when he beat Carlton Grange, a horse of good handicap class, who has been performing well during the back end of the season. The telegraphic despatches tell us more about the feelings and deportment of Mrs. Langtry on the occasion than of the race itself, but evidently the event well sustained its character; and, as it represented an important meeting of English, American and Australian thoroughbreds, it was unusually interesting.

The Rush won the Chester Cup, 2¼ miles, in 1896 and the Liverpool Autumn Cup the previous year, and is a thorough stayer, so the Australians will have something to be proud of in beating him, even though Merman had a 14 lbs. pull in the weight.

Mr. Belmont's five-year-old horse, Keenan, 105 lbs., failed to stay the course. As he is an exceptionally big horse it is not unreasonable to assume that he is not a subject for a lightweight.

It is not surprising to hear that Sloan's way of riding has not created a favorable impression across the water. Those who are acquainted with his peculiar seat on a horse, and have been on Newmarket heath, will easily understand that his style would be much against his success on that ground. Sloan, undoubtedly, has more than average brains as a jockey and light hands, but, while he may be able to ride round a fence, as in this country, with a free running horse, his seat is altogether against him on the English courses, especially when his mount is a horse requiring leg-work that no man who sits as Sloan does can give to an animal. When Ruef was in England not long ago he proved a failure for the same reason and eventually was ruled off for interference. On an open course most horses have to be kept straight and a jockey must sit so that he can produce the required effect.

BENEDICT.

Tears.

When chars the heart to ashes in its pain,
Or withers in its vain desire,
Tears are the benediction of the rain
Falling to quench the fire.
—Charles G. D. Roberts, in Lippincott's.

Competition.

The race is won! As victor I am hailed
With deafening cheers from eager throats; and yet
Gladder the victory could I forget
The strained, white faces of the men who failed!
—Julia Schayer, in the Century.

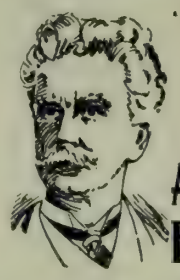
Physicians desiring a genuine old Port Wine of perfect and reliable purity should not forget to try the "Commendador" and "Palmeiro" Port Wine of Messrs. Dch. M. Fuerheerd Jr. & Co., Oporto, Portugal. To the invalid these wines will prove invaluable as a restorative, their great maturity in wood rendering them easy of digestion, while retaining great strengthening and recuperative properties.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE NAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN



THERE WILL BE A NEW STORY —BY— AMBROSE BIERCE —IN— THE SUNDAY EXAMINER, OCTOBER 17th

Copies, 5 Cents.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California—In the matter of the Estate of Eudora A. Chambers, sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers, deceased.

Notice is hereby given that Monday the 18th day of October, A.D. 1897, at 10 o'clock a.m. of said day, and the Courtroom of Department No. 10 of said Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, have been appointed as the time and place for proving the will of said Eudora A. Chambers, sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers, deceased, and for hearing the application of Robert C. Chambers for the issuance to him of Letters Testamentary thereon.

Dated September 23d, A.D. 1897.

CHARLES F. CURRY, Clerk.
[SEAL] By V. F. Northrop, Deputy Clerk.

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Attorney for Petitioner, Crocker Building, San Francisco.

DIVIDEND NOTICE

Dividend No. 48 (Thirty cents per share) of the HUTCAINSON SUGAR PLANTATION COMPANY will be payable at the office of the Company, 327 Market street, on and after Wednesday, October 20, 1897.

Transfer books will close Thursday, October 14th, 1897, at 3 o'clock p.m.

E. H. SHELDON, Secretary.

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS ELECTRICAL CO

523 Mission St., San Francisco

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD LANE

LANE & LANE

Attorneys and Counselors

Room 202

Crocker Building, San Francisco

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Belcher Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 56
Amount per share, 20 cents
Levied September 18, 1897
Delinquent in office, October 21, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Nov. 11, 1897.
C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.
Office, room 37, Mills Building San Francisco.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.

UNDERTAKERS

641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb

Telephone Main 43

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

---

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY
SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas..... | 4 00 am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

---

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Stmr. Pomona, 2 p.m. October 1, 5, 9, 13, 18, 22, 26, 30; November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28.

For Newport, Los Angeles and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Oct. 1, 5, 9, 13, 17, 21, 25, 29 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, Redondo--Los Angeles--and Newport, at 11 a.m. Oct. 3, 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27, 31 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, Stmr. Orizaba, 10 a.m. the 2d each month.

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

---

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov. 2 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.

S. S. "Moana," for Australia, Thursday, October 14, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO General Agents

---

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
24 Montgomery Street

---

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

The firm of JOE POHEIM is the largest in the United States. Rules for self-measurement and samples of cloth sent free.

201 and 203 Montgomery St . cor. Bush.
844 & 848 Market St. 1110 & 1112 Market St.
SAN FRANCISCO.
485 Fourteenth St., Oakland. 603 & 605 K St., Sacramento.
143 South Spring St., Los Angeles.

---

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

---

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

---

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets

Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

---

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

---

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

---

THE LATEST STYLES IN

CHOICE WOOLENS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel

Bicycle and Golf Suits

---

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

---

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, bookbinders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.

TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST

BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

Guarantee Capital and Surplus - $2,040,201 66
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash - 1,000,000 00
Deposits December 31, 1896 - - 27,730,247 45

OFFICERS

President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS

B. A Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

Deposits December 31, 1896 - $22,885,377
Paid Up Capital and Surplus - 1,504,501

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS

GEORGE W. BEAVER, ROBERT WATT, THOMAS MAGEE, GEO. C. BOARDMAN, W. C. B. DE FREMERY, DANIEL E. MARTIN, ALBERT MILLER, GEO. TASHEIRA, E. B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

Royal and Queen Ins. Cos.

Have removed their offices to the Royal Insurance Building, Northwest Corner of Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco.

Combined Assets Over $52,000,000

ROLLA V. WATT, - Pacific Coast Manager

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

Paid Up Capital . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . 25,000

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary.
A. J. CARMANY, Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726

Capital Paid Up, $3,446,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
B. J. SMITH, Assistant Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
301 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

A lady found herself at table with a number of English naval officers of high rank who were entertaining a large company at dinner. An admiral had taken her down to the dining-room, and she felt constrained to introduce a naval topic. Consequently, during the first pause in the conversation, she turned to her companion and asked him if he had been present when the battleship Victoria had been sunk through somebody's stupid blundering—she had forgotten whose—but it was shocking and inexcusable. She looked up innocently into a face which had suddenly grown white and convulsed with feeling. "Yes, madam," answered the admiral, with a grim smile, as he perceived that her question had been heard and that other guests were looking at him curiously; "yes, unfortunately I was there; and I did it." It was Admiral Markham, who had commanded the Camperdown.

Count de Lauragerais, a witty Frenchman who lived in the time of Louis XVI, used to poke fun at Prince D., a fashionable nobleman who, though rich and prominent, was a terrible bore. He applied gravely to the Court physician, asking if it were possible for a person to die of ennui. "Well," answered the doctor, "a long-continued state of ennui might induce some disease, such as consumption, and in that sense it might cause the patient's death." His reply was properly written and attested, and armed with it the Count applied to his advocate, stating that a design had been formed against his life, and that he intended to bring action. Being assured it was just and proper, he at once instituted proceedings against the Prince, claiming he had formed the design of tiring him to death.

Daniel Webster, when in full practice, was employed to defend the will of Roger Perkins, of Hopkinton. A physician made affidavit that the testator was struck with death when he signed the will. Webster subjected his testimony to a most thorough examination, showing, by quoting medical authorities, that doctors disagree as to the precise moment when a dying man is struck with death—some affirming that it is at the commencement of the disease, others at its climax, and others still affirm that we begin to die as soon as we are born. "I should like to know," said the opposing connsel, "what doctor maintains that theory?" "Doctor Watts," said Mr. Webster, with great dignity. "The moment we begin to live we all begin to die."

A Kansas granger who had made money out of wheat went to Washington, and, of course, repaired to the gallery of the House to hear the Congressman of his district speak. He remained a week, and returned home. A political friend met him who wanted to know all about the Capitol, but most about the Congressman. "He must be warming them up there," he said. "My, how he did warm up the monopolies and ringsters during the campaign. You heard him, I suppose?" "Every time he spoke," was the reply. "So far as I can judge, I tried not to let any of his remarks get away from me, but I'm afraid that maybe I wasn't watchful enough. I've only heard him speak five times. Three of them he said 'aye' and the other two he said 'no.'

During the Indian mutiny, a certain Private O'Shaugnessy was the foremost in an attack on a gorgeous palace, and had not gone far into its interior before he came in front of a great mirror. Instantly he stopped before it, and though the bullets were whistling past him, began to admire himself and twirl his mustache. "Bedad, Shaugh," said he to himself, with a grin, "ye're a foine figure of a man." Just then a bullet crashed into the mirror, breaking the glass into a thousand pieces, and obliterating the reflection of Shaugh's features. "Arrah, there," he called, angrily, turning back, "ye've sphiled the foine view that I had of meself."

Some years ago Sousa was leading a band at a small country festival. The advent of the band had been awaited with intense interest by the audience, and when they arrived the bandsmen were quickly surrounded by a surging crowd, which hemmed them in so that it was difficult for them to keep on playing. Sousa appealed to one of the committee to keep the crowd away, and said that unless his men had more room they could not play. The committeeman shook his hand warmly, and, turning to the assembled multitude, bawled out: "Gentlemen, step back and give the purfesser's purfessers a chance to play!"

The true distinction between a literary thief and one who gathers from innumerable sources the materials which he fuses into a new and homogeneous composition, is shown in the well known colloquy between the two broomsellers: "I do not understand how you can undersell me," said one, "for I steal my materials." "The explanation is simple," rejoined the other; "I steal my brooms ready made."

Dumas the elder was not in the habit of counting his money, but did once, leaving it on the mantle when he left the room for a few minutes. When he returned and was giving some instructions to a servant, he mechanically counted the pieces over again and found a louis missing. "Well," he said with a sigh, "considering that I never counted my money before, I can't say it pays."

Noise is not usually a passport to popularity, but the new Archbishop of Canterbury, by his powerful voice, won the affections many years ago of a Devonshire farmer, who, sitting near the bottom of the church where the then Bishop of Exeter was preaching, was overheard to say, "I do love the Bishop, 'cos he hollers proper!"

When Lord Bowen, the eminent English jurist, was at Homburg, the Prince of Wales was taking the waters there also. The Prince had a little dog, which persisted in running away. "That's the only creature here," said Bowen, "which does not run after the Prince of Wales."

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION

IN

THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

St. Denis

Broadway and Eleventh St. NEW YORK

OPPOSITE GRACE CHURCH

EUROPEAN PLAN

In a modest and unobtrusive way there are few better conducted hotels in the Metropolis than the St. Denis.
The great popularity it has acquired can readily be traced to its unique location, its homelike atmosphere, the peculiar excellence of its cuisine, and its very moderate prices.

William Taylor & Son.

Hotel Bella Vista

1001 PINE STREET

Elegant Furnishings and Apartments

DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED

MRS. A. F. TRACY.

Hotel Rafael

SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Sanitarium, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Magnificent Scenery and Drives. The thermometer averages for the winter months 64 degrees, excelling that of the famed Mentone, France.

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tourn ments

R. H. WARFIELD CO.

(Incorporated) Proprietors

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.

PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO

HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

"Hello! I thought you were on the way to Europe."
"I stopped to buy some Piper Heidsieck Plug and missed my boat."
"That's too bad."
"But think how much worse it would have been to have missed the tobacco."

The Man Who Saves money is the man most interested in the announcement that Piper Heidsieck Plug (Champagne Flavor)—by all odds the best liked brand of chewing tobacco ever put upon the market—has been reduced in price forty per cent. In other words, the five-cent piece is forty per cent. larger, although the quality remains the same. The next time you buy tobacco ask for the New Five Cent Size of

PIPER HEIDSIECK
PLUG TOBACCO

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 43 SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 23, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

DEDICATION OF THE STEVENSON FOUNTAIN

The memorial to Robert Louis Stevenson was formally presented to the City of San Francisco on Sunday, October 17th.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 23, 1897

CONTENTS

| | |
|---|---|
| Editorials | 2-3 |
| Home-Made Imported Liquors; by G. L. B. | 2 |
| Things and People; by Boswell Jr. | 3 |
| Passing of Charles A. Dana | 4 |
| Verestchagin and the Nobel Prize.; by W. H. H. | 4 |
| The Stevenson Memorial | 5 |
| "St. Ives": a review by C. | 5 |
| The Mining Convention | 6-7 |
| View of Old Coloma; photos by W. G. Woods | 8 |
| Fruit of the Tropics | 9 |
| A Memory of '40 | 9 |
| A Debutante's Diary | 10 |
| The Theatres | 11 |
| "Following the Equator" | 12 |
| Simondes' Forgery | 12 |
| Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter | 13 |
| Turf Topics; by Benedict | 14 |
| Finance and Trade | 14 |
| New Stories Re-Told | 16 |

THE GIST OF THE SEALING QUESTION.

It is pretty generally agreed that in the fur seal matter we have serious reason to complain of the behavior of England. At the same time, not one man in five thousand has any coherent idea as to what our grievance with England may be. With a view to ascertaining this let us glance at some of the facts in question.

The fur seal, an animal of great commercial value and of unsurpassed scientific interest, is practically confined to two herds, each inhabiting remote and almost inaccessible islands in Behring Sea. The peculiarities in the habits of the animal render it especially tractable on land. Since 1779 it has been under control and the land-killing has been confined entirely to superfluous males. As many females as males are born, but only one in thirty is allowed to enter the breeding grounds. The others with the young males are forced to herd apart, and they can be driven out and culled like sheep. The superfluous increment of males can be taken to the advantage of the herd. When the winter comes the herds leave these islands and move from one thousand to three thousand miles to the southward, return to their homes in July of the next year. At intervals also through the summer they go out to feed, the females travelling to the distance of 100 to 200 miles for their meals. The killing of the migrating or feeding herds at sea is known as pelagic sealing. On land no members of the breeding herd are ever killed or disturbed. The pelagic killing is confined chiefly to females. These are always graved when at sea and in Behring sea, each one taken leaves a pup to starve on the shores of the islands.

Before pelagic sealing began the great Pribilof or American herd numbered about 600,000 adult females. The Komandorski or Russian herd, 300,000; while the Japanese or Kurile herd had some 40,000, and the Mexican herd of Guadalupe island perhaps 8,000 more. At present the Pribilof herd, according to Dr. Jordan's paper, numbers 130,000 adult females, Komandorski has 50,000, the Kuriles perhaps 1,500, and the Guadalupe herd is extinct. The sole cause of this decline is the indiscriminate killing of females, whether on land or sea. The natural rate of increase of females is about 16⅔ per cent each year. The death rate from old age is about 10 per cent, leaving a net gain of 6⅔ per cent, from which all other losses are to be deducted. Pelagic sealing has taken each year since it began in 1885 from 5 to 40 per cent.

Our first grievance against England is that she tolerated and defended this shameful waste. We have the same grievance against the United States, which has never yet forbidden pelagic sealing on the part of her own people, although she has lost millions of dollars worth of valuable animals through its agency.

Our second grievance against England is that by false representation as to the nature and habits of the fur seal she secured the legislation of pelagic sealing. By its dependence on the statements of British officials, the Paris Tribunal was led to adopt "regulations for the protection and preservation of the fur seal," that could have no effect but to destroy it. These regulations did not even check the decline. By making the killing of females legal they stimulated pelagic destruction and they have in five years brought the American herd to the same commercial destruction, which the Russian herd has reached without regulations. The false statements made by the British Commission in 1893 are still repeated by the British Colonial office, in spite of the contrary testimony of the British Commission of 1896. It will need more than one "shirt sleeves" letter to bring these officials to the courtesy of telling the truth.

So far as the letter of the law made by the Paris Tribunal decision is concerned, Great Britain has lived up to it. Her vessels which have violated its provisions have been promptly condemned. It is the provisions themselves which are worthless. They constitute a protection which does not protect. It now remains to be seen whether Great Britain will consent to new regulations which are effective and not self-contradicting. If so, the fur seal herd with the great industries dependent upon it will be restored. If not, one more example will be given of the imbecility of civilized nations in dealing with matters involving common honesty and common decency.

"Every Englishman," says an old sea captain, "is at heart a wrecker. Whatever the sea casts up is his."

LAWLESSNESS IN HIGH PLACES.

We have no desire to indulge in Jeremiads concerning the growth of lawlessness in American society, but certain facts and tendencies are too patent to escape the scrutiny of honest minds. Thanks to the misguided "enterprise" of the sensational press, the public hears all too much of lynchings and mob violence in all parts of the land. It is bad enough to have these things occur; it is far more humiliating to have them bruited up and down the civilized earth.

But far worse still than the crimes of lynchers or the notoriety given them by modern "journalism," is the inert acquiescence of public opinion in these perennial outbursts of violence. Having gotten over all surprise at such high-handed proceedings, and duly held up our hands in immaculate horror, we have apparently settled down into dead indifference, while the merry pastime of administering "summary justice" goes on unhindered. Anything out ot the ordinary will, it is true, arouse a transient spasm of the public conscience. Responsible leaders of public thought, including a few newspapers, speak out plainly against such disregard of law. But in the main we accept it as inevitable, acquiescing in it as part of the established order, like the paying of taxes and the change of the seasons. In a land where public opinion rules, this apathy is as bad as could be, indicating a fundamental defect in the moral sense of the community — a sort of moral paralysis which has fallen upon us. In itself any particular incident is of small consequence, but as symptomatic of social standards and ideals it may suggest very much. For instance, a district judge in Boston, the other day, reprimanded two policemen for arresting a newsboy who had violated the Sunday ordinance. According to press dispatches, his Honor said he "was there to defend and uphold the laws of God and the country," but he would not prosecute newsboys. So he discharged the prisoner, and threatened the officers with removal if newsboys were again brought before his court. The daily press introduced the item under the significant headlines: "This Judge a Boy's Friend. Will Not Prosecute for Delivering a Paper on Sunday."

The incident is trivial as an incident, but it is highly suggestive as a symptom. Very likely the Sunday ordinance in Boston is a bad one. But that is not the question. Bad or good, it is the law; and judges are elected by the people to enforce the law. The power of the courts to interpret law does not cover the abrogation of law. Evidently the Boston judge depends on the "moral" support of the community — that part of it that elects district judges — in his calm nullification of the city ordinance. Behind the lawless magistrate is a lawless public sentiment.

The remedy must come chiefly from the regeneration of public opinion. When it is aroused the general conscience makes marvelously quick work of such abuses. But it is worth while to suggest that the acquiescence of so many good citizens in the open evasion of laws and ordinances rests partly on a basis of reason. We are the most law-ridden nation on earth. The "tariff tinkering," which has made our revenue policy a scorn and a derision, is but a sample of the clumsy botching that disfigures our statute-books on every hand. Laws are not made to be obeyed, but to promote private ends, to intrench selfish interests—to do various things other than serve the general good. Such laws prostitute the very idea of law, and beget the lawless spirit. It would be a distinct gain to the law, if, by some supreme act of self-extinction, all law-making bodies could be prevented, for the next decade, from exercising their law-making functions. We have too many law-makers, and, as a consequence, too many law-breakers. When we cease making new statutes and ordinances, and begin the firm enforcement of those we have, a better spirit will speedily prevail. Meanwhile every community owes it to its own good name and to the commonweal, to insist on obedience by magistrates and citizens alike, to all laws, so long as they are laws, be the consequences what they may. And there is no better spot on the round earth to begin this work than right here in San Francisco.

HOME-MADE IMPORTED LIQUORS

American citizens may well wonder at the astonishing sensations produced at times upon their palate, their throat and their internal apparatus generally, by the compounds served to them by enterprising restaurauteurs and saloon-keepers under the guise of beer, spirits, wine and liqueurs imported from abroad. In this city the murder is out.

For some time past we have been having a great deal in the cause of Pure Food, but not a word about Pure Drink. While most people eat, everybody drinks, and as the leading principle in the management of the affairs of this nation is that the majority rules, the greater cause would seem to be losing its rights. Or are the drinking folk under the impression that it is enough to try and scare the water-bibbers by thrilling stories of the impurities contained in the local water supply? To the honor of Uncle Sam be it said he at all events takes a larger view of his duties, albeit that with his proverbial shrewdness he discerns something in it for him.

The initiated have long been aware that you can stock your cellar with the special productions of the leading brewers, wine-makers, distillers and liqueur-makers of the old world, fabricated not a hundred miles from Lotta's fountain. Nevertheless nothing has been said or done, the fraudulent makers having profited by the ignorance or cupidity—we leave the public to determine which—of the buying retailers and the general run of consumers having quietly submitted to be poisoned and deluded without a murmur.

Under Section 3449 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it is abundantly clear that such traffic is an offense against the law. The section in question, however, takes no account of the villainy attached to the concoction of spurious liquids, so far as the deleterious effect exercised on the health of the consuming public is concerned, but simply deals with the fraud perpetrated on the government of the country by the sale of goods purporting to be of foreign make, but which have of course escaped the duty, to which the genuine article would have been subjected. Every such offense entails a penalty of $500, and the Internal Revenue Department of the Federal Government is now taking active steps to enforce the law in this city. With this view there have recently been made seizures of some of these home products from two firms extensively engaged in their manufacture. From firm No. 1 the following goods were taken:

6 doz. Double Orange Curacoa Bitters, Amsterdam.
12 doz. Oscar Vuraz Curacoa, Amsterdam.
3 doz. Swain & Co. Orange Bitters, London.
1 bottle Jas. Sykes Irish whisky, Liverpool.

and from firm No 2 the assortment captured is reported to be:

6 doz. Vini Vermouth Confezionate, Torino, Italy.
¾ doz. Liquor Monarchini Benedictine, Fecamp, France.
1 doz. Cruchons Curacoa Superfine. Amsterdam.
Dubb Orange, Wynnes Sarkin, Holland.

A further seizure is also reported of Rourke's Fine Old Irish Whiskey.

Similar action has been taken on previous occasions in eastern cities, and although the domestic manufacturers of so-called foreign goods have contested the point, they have been held to account. The local collector of internal revenue is proceeding in the matter with all due caution, and has so far contented himself with simply seizing the above-mentioned parcels and deferring further steps pending instructions from the Commissioner at Washington. In the meantime the bona-fide importers are giving the matter a good deal of attention, and it will not be surprising if they devise some scheme by which this movement on the part of the United States customs authorities may inure to the permanent benefit of those who like their liquor to be made by those whose name is on the bottles.

The lists given here of goods that have been impounded, by no means cover the entire field of this remarkable home industry, for even such everyday articles as brandy and gin, bearing supposed foreign labels and in every way got up to imitate the genuine spirits, except in the most essential respect, are the medium of an extensive and no doubt exceedingly remunerative trade. Perhaps ultimately the pure food campaign may be widened to include pure drink and in the meantime the public would be well advised when they order foreign specialties to see that they get them.

The various processes by which these spurious liquids are turned out are known only to the initiated, of course. It is not to be supposed, however, that they are costly, and the object of the makers is simply to make their sales all profit if possible. A large quantity of water, some sugar, coloring extract and chemical essentials are the ingredients, and vile compounds destructive of human vitals are the result.

Foreigners often wonder at the confiding liberality of the purveyors of liquor at the bars in America, where, when their staples are called for, the bottle is handed over to the tender mercies of the customer, instead of its contents being measured out by the bar-keeper in fixed quantities corresponding with specific charges. Here the price of a drink is a settled quantity, as elsewhere in the world, but the quantity of the liquid passing in exchange is determined by the inclination and appetite of the customer. When one reflects that there is no standard prescribed by the law in respect of quality or purity the cause for the foreigners' surprise is based on little ground. It is the fashion of the American citizen to sneer at the pettiness of the foreign system, but, as in many other things, the American is the victim of his own carelessness, and the liberal notions he prides himself on cultivating simply make him a prey of the unprincipled. While there are plenty of honest men in the trade, liquor-selling is not generally considered amongst the ennobling pursuits of mankind, and why any sensible individual should imagine that unscrupulous men who follow that profession will not protect themselves against the chances of their apparent liberality being taken undue advantage of is hard to conceive. They are accountable to no one and nothing but their own conscience, if they have any. That they in many cases make it up to themselves by retailing false brands of liquors there is not the least doubt.

Of course, in penalising the makers of the abominable chemically concocted fluids, masquerading in all sorts of colors for genuine fabrics of world-wide celebrity and real merit, the Government is doing something; but, until there are stringent liquor-laws, regulating quality and the measurements for service to the public, the real evil will never be touched. Possibly the only thing to bring this about would be simultaneous action on the part of the purity champions, as representing the consuming public, and the manufacturers, wholesale dealers and importers, who confine themselves to handling only genuine goods.

With the question of adulteration, falsification of labels and refilling original bottles, the present movement of the revenue authorities does not deal in any way. Moral considerations do not enter into their scheme, but must remain the concern of the legitimate members of the trade and those who give their attention to preventing the manufacture and sale of fraudulent goods. And here we may conclude by asking whether the Manufacturers and Producers' Association approves of its members, amongst whom is one of the firms, whose goods have been confiscated as referred to, exploiting a home industry that on the face of it is an unmitigated fraud. G. L. B.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

A prominent Guatemalan coffee planter whose precarious condition of health prevents him joining the rebellion against Barrios, wrote to a compatriot in San Francisco asking him to consult a San Francisco physician in regard to his illness. The medical authorities of Guatemala did not satisfy his requirements and he wanted more light on his complications. A complete list of symptoms was enclosed and the invalid desired medicines and full directions from the best available authority. The case was submitted to Dr. McNutt, who prescribed elaborately, and by the next mail the compatriot shipped a case of nostrums to the coffee planter. A month later came a letter from the invalid to his friend admitting the receipt of the drugs. But he knew he had enemies who wanted him out of the way so he had not touched the medicines, and would not until he knew on what side—the Dictator's or the Revolutionists'—was Dr. McNutt.

***

A strict rule promulgated by every successive commandant at the Navy Yard prohibits smoking on Mare Island, under the most stringent penalties. Admiral Miller sauntering one recent afternoon through a distant part of the island, came upon an Irish laborer digging a trench and smoking a short black pipe. He was puffing away serenely, unconscious of regulations and with evident enjoyment. The Admiral, who was in undress uniform, stopped. "Don't you know, sir, that smoking is absolutely prohibited in the Navy Yard?" he said.

The Irishman lookcd up, and with a kindly smile answered:

"Indade, that's thrue, but here am I all be meself, wid not a sowl to say a wurrd to, and I thought I'd take a puff or two to ralave the silence."

"The regulations are explicit, sir," rebuked the Admiral, "and the silence does not excuse you. What's your name, sir?"

"An' who may you be, anyway?" asked the Irishman·

"I'm Admiral Miller, sir."

"Ah, 'tis the new Admiral ye are. 'Tis the fat job you have, Admiral. Be careful you kape it. Me name's Pat McGinnis."

"Report at my office this afternoon without fail, McGinnis," said Miller, who could hardly keep from laughing. At five o'clock poor Patrick, who had made up his mind there would be the devil to pay, tramped over to headquarters and the orderly ushered him the dreaded presence of the Admiral, who said "Sit down, Pat." Pat sat down. Miller touched a bell. The orderly appeared. "Bring a bottle of champagne and two glasses," he said. Not a word was spoken until the wine arrived. The Admiral filled the two glasses and pushed one over towards the Irishman.

"Pat," he said, "give me the pipe. You'll not need it again."

The mystified laborer obeyed.

"Now," said the Admiral "drink hearty Pat, but you'll keep your job as long as I'll keep mine."

Nor is this the first situation saved by Irish wit.

***

Truly it cannot be said the Pacific Union Club is consistent. After arranging to remove to Van Ness avenue, after obtaining coin in plenty for the purchase of a selected site, and with the promise of more coin for the erection of the handsomest clubhouse in the West, the idea of moving is abandoned and the institution is to remain down town. Of its present quarters the Club has a lease for but two years and at the end of that time it is homeless, unless, indeed, a new location is found in the meantime. Buildings are not constructed in a moment, be it remembered, and, if a site that commends itself to the various elements is discovered, then there must elapse a long time before the new house is ready. One cannot but think it is curious that the directors who had the Club's authorization for the purchase of the Van Ness-avenue site and the money with which to proceed, should let their opportunity go by unimproved. The condition prevailing in the institution at the moment is one of innocuous desuetude. The magnificent dining room is closed and luncheon and dinners are served in the small dining room which has previously served as a breakfast room. It is sad to see the premier social organization of California losing it potency. An active mind is required to prescribe a course of rejuvenation and restore to the Pacific Union the prestige the University Club has undoubtedly deprived it of.

***

Under the guise of a social gathering at the Los Angeles races there has been held in the southern metropolis an important conference among the Republican leaders. Just what has happened no one seems able to define, save that there has been a general canvass of political possibilities in regard to future Gubernatorial and Senatorial candidacies. Certain gentlemen of prominence and renown want to go to Washington in the Senatorial role, and it is commonly assumed that the south has first call on the vacancy. But if the next Governor is a Los Angeles man, then the next Senator should be from San Francisco. So it is a question of finding some prominent citizen in the region south of Tehachapai who wants to rule California from Sacramento more than someone else cares to represent California in Washington. Strange to say few Gubernatorial ambitions are being developed in the city, though we have here embryo Senators by the bushel. In fact, the Governorship is not fashionable, and it is good form to be Senator. Judging from recent manifestations the internal dissensions which have made Republican politics so difficult these latter years are about to break out afresh. The Call, which indexes accurately the Spreckels' sentiment, shows manifest hostility to the interests of Burns, who is said to entertain Senatorial leanings, so that wing of the party with which the Colonel allies himself can depend on the opporobrium of the Spreckels' daily. It is said also that John D. Spreckels would not himself be averse to an experience at Washington, and that Manager Sam Leake will utilize his political sagacity to assist this laudable ambition. Then there arises across in Oakland two strenuous Gubernatorial candidacies which threaten peace in that environment. However, there are months to pass before convention is due, and much peace-making may be manipulated in the meantime.

***

Rather foolish politics that of Sam Rainey to capture the Democratic machinery in order to control the creation of the new charter. When a boss absolutely identifies himself with a movement there is an end to his usefulness. No man, be he as powerful as the Czar, can afford absolutely to disregard the amenities and the performance the other evening was indecent. It will avail no one for neither Rainey nor Curry, despite their best efforts, can induce the class of men who can be elected Freeholders to run for office on their ticket. Such citizens as Irving M. Scott, Mayor Pond, Horace Davis or James M. Kelly—men whom the community recognizes as fit charter-makers, will not identify themselves with such cattle. A new charter is essential, and everyone recognizes the fact. It will take better men than the manipulators in charge of affairs to defeat or deflect the wishes of the people. It should be remembered now that all future primaries must be conducted under the Stratton primary law which renders dangerous the chicanery ordinarily practised. If the anticipations of the keenest men in the several parties are not nullified, the effect of that law will be to kill the power of the boss. Thus far there has been found no flaw in the construction of the measure, though it has been submitted to several of the keenest lawyers on the coast, with instructions to discover unconstitutionality.

***

We are to hear more of the Welburn case, if Special Agent Thrasher's wishes are consulted. Not content with the unenviable position he has been placed in by the acquittal of the victim, he purposes further proceedings and hopes for more fortunate verdicts. Authentic particulars of his performances with the inside history of the affair have been sent on to Secretary Gage, however, and I'm inclined to think his effort at suborning perjury will end in his recall. Rather an amusing aspect of the affair is the suggested indictment of the forger Dillard. Hearing that Welburn's friends intended to ask the Federal Grand Jury to investigate Dillard, Thrasher, to protect his accomplice, proposes that the negro shall be examined on specific charges which will result in his acquittal. So he is taking the initiative. He know that Dillard has no intention of being a martyr, and if he should find himself in danger, would reveal the entire conspiracy. As I have stated before, the motive of the entire Welburn performance is to save Agent Thomas and Deputy Loupe. The acquittal of the ex-collector was a hard blow, and the indictment of Dillard would be most distasteful. Some impression of the degree of feeling which the trial has excited in the Revenue office may be gathered from the fact that one of the deputies who testified to a fact in favor of Welburn, though hitherto a friend of Thomas and Thrasher, has been cut by both of them since his evidence. In the course of years we have had some remarkable specials out here, but these gentlemen rather cap the climax.

***

No newspaper that has not an agitation on foot has the attention of the community. The Bulletin which has grown very audacious of late. attacking the Monarch as boldly as though it were a morning contemporary, has made itself the the champion of the rival steamer line which certain merchants have been advocating. We all want to see San Francisco go ahead and trust that the entire business of the West may yet be done by this burg, but it is curious that our merchants made no particular effort at gathering in the trade while the rates were low. Heaven knows we've had rate wars by the dozens over this northern trade—why wait until October, '97, to discover that Chicago was usurping the supplying of Portland and Seattle. However, the Bulletin is properly vehement in the good cause and anyway is making a first-rate paper. The era of the evening daily is at hand they say, at all events the circulation of the journal has so increased under the management of Mr. Crothers that a new press has become a necessity. It is not so long ago that the whole edition of the Bulletin was produced on an antique machine, and the performance of pressing the paper gathered all the small boys in town round the office on Clay street.

***

The conversion of Dr. Stephen Emmons into a public character is rather amusing at this end of the world. The form of alchemy he is practising is not that at which he attained notoriety in San Francisco. Now he is advertised as the discoverer of a chemical process for making gold out of silver; then he made gold in Pennsylvania out of a worthless mining property in Amador. His figure was familiar enough in the Crocker building where his mine had its headquarters, aud his literary ability on geological subjects is realized by quite a number of people who imagine there is a direct connection betwen fact and type. I would not for a minute suggest that Dr. Emmons is insincere, for really he is a most convincing writer, and must believe some of the discoveries he has achieved. The discoverer is a Londoner, is finely educated, has literary tastes and a neat turn at poetry, but sustained early in life an injury to his spine which compels him to move around in a wheel-chair with rubber tires. Though all the physical advantages seem against him, he has accomplished the circumnaigation of the world, and has been in more places that many of us with the full complement of limbs and members will ever reach—showing that mind is really more potent than mere legs. Dr. Emmons came to San Francisco with numerous gold mining ideas, aud proceeded to promote a property called the Gover, located near the Kennedy mine in Amador county. Having connections with certain of Pennsylvania capitalists, this was not difficult, especially as the Doctor furnished the most indisputable evidence of the value of the property. He had himself lowered into the mine together with his chair, examined the walls, and developed some remarkable theories about the Mother Lode. The greenstone belt that runs through Amador, which engineers have often declared worthless, Dr. Emmons declared was full of gold. In English and Eastern scientific journals he published admirable articles demonstrating his discoveries, and really produced such an impression that the stock of the Gover was comfortably floated, and all sorts of tunnels and drifts were projected. Two years were required to show up the infelicity of the geological theories of Dr. Emmons. A very little gold was found, but—alas—not in the greenstone, and the Goveer was closed down. Then the erudite physician left these parts and next we hear of him making gold in Chicago. The theory on which Dr. Emmons is working is that there exists a metal between gold and silver, and there is an elaborate chemical process by which he developes it. Silver is the basis, and there is an admixture of gases and an immense artificial pressure which produces very small quantities of a material that looks like gold. He establishes certainly the value of the theory, but much in the same way that chemistry has demonstrated that a diamond can be made by crystalizing carbon. The quantity produced will not make any effect upon the world's supply.

BOSWELL JR.

Professor E. L. Gates, of the laboratory of phsycology and physcurgy at Washington, D. C., claims to have quite recently invented, or as he prefers to say, discovered, a microscope capable of magnifying a subject three million times its diameter. Up to the present time the scope of the microscope has been limited to ten thousand diameters. To make the right kind of instrument for the work would cost about $12,000, and therefore its use is likely to be limited. At the same time its capacity for adding to the scientific knowledge of the world is simply inconceivable. In the line of his work he is engaged in some of the most extraordinary experiments ever attempted. In the pursuit of his investigations he has apparently satisfied himself that it is possible to build up and add to the powers of the brain. Amongst the first experiments in this direction he conducted a series with a litter of seven sheep-dog puppies, which from their birth he kept for the space of nine months in total darkness and then chloroformed them, reserving their brains, eyes and spinal cords for examination. Another group of puppies he permitted to lead an ordinary existence for the same period and similarly destroyed them, preserving the brains likewise. A third group of puppies he subjected to a certain course of training, with a view to brain development, and after nine months put an end to their existence. On comparing the brains of each different set he found that the first had no cells in the seeing areas of their brains, the second had the well-developed brain cells of the ordinary dog at the same age, and the third, or trained set, had a much greater number of cells more highly developed. Similar experiments on monkeys, rabbits and guinea-pigs confirmed his observations, leading him to the conclusion that man, as in the case of the lower animals, can develop the brains he has and add new brains along new lines as he pleases.

In the case of his own child, two and a half years old, Professor Gates has been able to produce some most remarkable evidences of brain-training, and believing, as the result of his experiments with animals, in the force of heredity, he considers that brain-building should begin with the father and mother before the child is born, and that a few weeks after birth the child should begin the process of development. The Professor is confident of his ability to take any man of ordinary intelligence, and by keeping him under control for a year or so to teach him to utilize his mind in thought, invention and discovery in any particular direction that would lead to actual results. The science of mind-building and mind-using, as reflected by his experiments and conceived by means of his various and entirely novel theories, Professor Gates will shortly present to the public in a series of books.

With the reopening of the theatres in Lomdon a histrionic star, that had already been in the firmament, has been revealed in its fullest effulgence. In accordance with precedent, the character of "Hamlet" is the medium chosen for the display. The Lyceum stage and the personality of Mr. Forbes Robertson complete the exposition. As an actor this gentleman, while admitted to have talent, some cleverness, and plenty of painstaking ability, has never been regarded as in the first rank, but, with his portrayal of the most snbtle and attractive of all the great master's creations, he has stepped into that position by almost general consent. In fact, the leading dramatic critics, of whom Clement Scott is the best known, go so far as to say that Forbes Robertson as "Hamlet" is the best of this generation. Mr. Scott declares him to be "the most human, the most natural, and in temperament, the most lovable of all the Hamlets of our time, English, French, Italian, or German," adding: "Lucky the students of 1897 to be able to boast in the long after years that they first studied 'Hamlet' at the feet of such a scholar and artist—such a natural actor and charming elocutionist, as Forbes Robertson." Even those of the critics who have grudged a favorable verdict, have expressed their judgments with the utmost enthusiasm. According to present arrangements, Robertson will continue in the part until Irving's return, late in November.

Another agreeable surprise of the new season has been uncovered at Drury Lane, in the shape of a sensational and comprehensive melodrama of the sort for which the house was so famous during the reign of the late Sir Augustus Harris. The piece is "The White Heather," by Cecil Raleigh and Henry Hamilton. The scenes include the Stock Exchange interior during a time of excitement; Battersea Park in the height of the cycling craze; Boulter's Lock on the Thames; a fancy dress ball, in which, it is stated, are worn the identical dresses that figured in the Duchess of Devonshire's costume affair; and a fatal fight between divers at the bottom of the sea. The last-mentioned scene is said to be perfect, with the fish, little and big, swimming in the depths, and a fierce contest, in dead silence, waging between the two men, ending in the cutting of the villain's air-tube and the ascent of his antagonist with the treasure for which they battled.

Mme. Bernhardt says that French dramatic literature has never been in such a promising condition as at the present time, nor have there ever been such a number of able men devoting themselves exclusively to writing plays. Of the many plays accepted for the Renaissance, Bernhardt will first put in rehearsal Maurice Donnay's "Affranchie." Another play is Harcourt's "Jeanesse de Neron." Nero and Agrippana, Sarah intends to play herself, and in the scene where the Emperor orders the assassination of his mother, expects to get in some powerful work.

PASSING OF CHARLES A. DANA

Career and Characteristics of the Great Editor of the "New York Sun."

The death of Charles A. Dana, the brilliant editor of the New York Sun, removes from the world of journalism its most notable figure on this continent. In every sense, mental and physical, the dean of American journalists was a strong man. Of Puritan descent, and raised on the hard New England soil, his early life and training developed in him a pitiless logic in dealing with the affairs of life, that once he had emerged from the impressionable period of early manhood, made him independent and self-reliant. As a young man he launched into schemes for righting the world which ended in disaster, and for a while he also indulged a taste for writing poetry. In his final and more practical ambition to become a power in journalism he was rewarded as fully and completely as the circumstances of his time and situation have admitted.

Dana's first definite work in the journalistic field began in his connection with the New York Tribune in 1847, with which paper, under Horace Greeley's management, he was associated for twelve years. At the end of that period he went to the War Department with Edwin M. Stanton and eventually became Assistant Secretary of War, in which position he continued until the close of the Rebellion. He then re-entered journalism as part proprietor and editor of the Chicago Republican, which proved an unsatisfactory investment. Making an unsuccessful attempt to get back into the public service he returned to New York, and failing to re-connect with Greeley on the Tribune, he obtained the necessary capital to purchase and organize the Sun, which he soon converted into the most aggressive paper in the country. As an investment the paper proved most successful, and has long enjoyed a position as one of the great journals of the country. In every detail the masterful influence of Dana could be traced, and on more than one occasion he showed no hesitation in executing a complete volte-face in political matters when he deemed the occasion needed such action.

Of Dana's personal characteristics and methods, the following description by Julian Ralph is interesting reading:

You may see him on any day except Sunday at the corner window in the third story of the Sun building, leaning back in his chair to rap his fingers with his pencil while he is thinking, or bending over a table to write. The room in which he is seated is one of four that compose the editorial suite. It contains a desk, two chairs, a small table and a rug as its main appointments. On the walls are a few pictures — one of the Count Joannes, one of the original quartet of Harper Brothers, one of the late Mark Maguire, a reporter, and a framed lithograph advertising the Willimantic Thread Company. These pictures have no special significance. Apparently they merely happened there, for it is a rule that whatever picture, ornament or other thing drifts there stays there. Mr. Dana has no pride in the adornment of his office. He asks only that it be kept clean and tidy. His home is a palace. His office is a workshop. A revolving bookcase is on his desk, and on top of that is a stuffed owl. There is a lounge, that I forgot, in a corner of the room, but Mr. Dana never was seen to use it. It is evidently another bit of flotsam like the pictures. * * *

His manner is almost certain to be vivacious. His good humor is perpetual. That sounds impossible, or possible only by straining eulogy, yet it is his distinguishing characteristic, and its explanation brings forward the queerest thing about the man. And that queerest thing is the secret of his success. He loves his business. On that account he can be most good-humored when he feels that he is writing an article that divides the people between applause and indignation. I have often heard of men who love their business, and have often heard men claim that distinction for themselves, but Charles A. Dana is the only man or journalist I ever saw or knew who gleefully and heartily enjoyed his work. At times he fairly bubbles over with the enjoyment of it. Of course that can only be true of a man who loves life itself, who boasts perfect health and the power to satisfy his longings, be they humble or grand. At beyond sixty Mr. Dana is the youngest man, in spirits, in the Sun office; his step is certainly the lightest, his eye kindles the most frequently and spontaneously, his complexion and skin are those of a pedestrian.

I remember once hearing a famous Cabinet officer say to him, on shaking hands with him, "Well, Mr. Dana, I don't see how you stand this infernal grind."

"Grind!" said Mr. Dana; "you never were more mistaken. I have nothing but fun."

"Bully" is a favorite word with him — a word used only to express uncommon pleasure, such as has been afforded by a trip abroad or a run to Cuba or Mexico, or by the perusal of something especially pleasing in the Sun's columns.

"You're letting yourself grow old," I heard him say once to a decidedly decrepit man. "Do you read novels, and play billiards, and walk a great deal?" "No, no, no," said the old man, sadly, at each pause. "I do," said Mr. Dana, with the exuberance of a child. "I have fun from morning till night." * * *

I have been asked the queerest questions about Mr. Dana wherever I have gone on either continent. A favorite question is this: "Does Dana really come down every morning and take up a subject, and say to himself, 'Now, what is the natural, humdrum way of treating this?' and does he, upon finding out what that way is, order an article written in any other way than that? Do you believe he says to himself: 'Everybody thinks so and so, therefore I'll take the opposite grounds?'" Of course that is absurd. The best answer to those or any other questions about Mr. Dana and his paper is that no one except himself knows what it is going to do, or why it does it. But, obviously, this is the direct result of an ebullient, vigorous and waggish nature, touched just a little with sarcasm. With that key you can read between the lines of any article in his paper. * * *

He is a presistent worker. He comes to his desk at 10 in the morning and remains until 5 in the evening. He writes a great deal, and is apt to contribute to every department of his paper except the advertising columns. Nearly all his work is dictated at first to a stenographer. Then it is carefully revised, and then revised again in proof. Of articles that others write he has seldom been known to read a page of manuscript. He sends the copy to the composing-room and reads the proof. "He can raise more Cain with a proof than any other man in the world," I once heard a printer say, but that is not true. That distinction has been nobly earned by Paul Dana, his son. One thing that Mr. Dana does, to an extent not known on any other paper, is the reading of proofs for what you might call their appearance. Whenever he finds one word or two short words forming a ragged line by themselves at the end of a paragraph, he goes through the paragraph to find words that can be stricken out to allow the paragraph to end solidly.

THE LATE CHARLES A. DANA

Above all things else he is quick in mind and movement. He can read all the morning papers of New York in fifteen minutes. There is a whirl of paper in the air during the operation, as he turns leaf after leaf and runs his eyes up and down the columns. He seems to see instinctively whatever each paper contains that is peculiar or noteworthy, whether it is a stickful or a column. A new man at the City Desk of the Sun noticed that Mr. Dana sent for the papers every morning and almost instantly returned them. Wondering at this, he asked the office-boy what the chief did with the papers. "Well," said the boy, a typical New York lad, "I pile 'em on his desk and he fires 'em on de floor, and then I gadder 'em up agin and bring 'em back to you."

He is as much quicker in speech and decision as lightning is quicker than rain. It is difficult to talk with him on that account—or, rather, it is bewildering to one who is not used to him. He seems to hear all you are going to say when you are just beginning to say it. Here is an example: In order not to bother him too often, one of his lieutenants used to "save up" things to see him about. On one day only two matters occurred that called for his counsel. The lieutenant decided to go to the chief and say that there was a man in the office who had tanned a piece of human skin and made a pair of boots of it, and did Mr. Dana want an article written about the matter? Also, that up in St. Johnsbury, Vt., a clergyman had been arrested upon a criminal charge, and there was to follow a long and complicated story about that. The lieutenant went into the chief's room, and this is what was said:

"Mr. Dana, there's a man at my desk who has tanned human hide and made a pair of boots——"

"Ugh," said Mr. Dana, "show him out of the office."

"Yes, sir," said the lieutenant, "and up in St. Johnsbury a clergyman has been arrested for——"

"Go yourself. Take the 6 o'clock train this evening. Anything more, Mr. ——?"

VERESTCHAGIN AND THE NOBEL PRIZE

AN ARTIST WHO HAS PROMOTED INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

The news that the Norwegian Storthing, or Parliament, has awarded the Nobel prize of $60,000 to the famous Russian painter, Vadili (or Basil) Verestchagin, has been received by the press of this country with many expressions of astonishment. By the terms of the Nobel foundation, five prizes are to be given annually — three for the most important discoveries in the various lines of scientific research, one for the finest achievement in literature, and the fifth for the greatest service rendered to the cause of humanity in the promotion of international peace. It is of the last of these prizes that Verestchagin has been made the recipient; and as the Storthing announced its choice without publicly offering any reason for it, much curiosity has been aroused, and speculation has been rife.

Those who know anything of the spirit and purpose of Verestchagin's work, however, will have little difficulty in understanding the meaning and true inwardness of the award. His gigantic, realistic pictures of scenes from the battlefields of the Turcoman, Indian and Russo-Turkish wars —pictures which were the results of studies made upon the spot—have brought straight home to the public mind of Europe all the horrors of glorious war with a vividness which no amount of tabulated statistics or mere description could ever be able to achieve. Ruskin long ago declared, in his downright fashion, that if, instead of slaughtering thousands of nameless men in Asian deserts and African swamps, war only shattered the furniture and bric-a-brac of London drawing-rooms, the women of England could soon find means to stop the too-costly game. The statement seems brutal; but wherein lies the element of profound truth, which we are bound to admit that it contains? It is easy to see. In these matters, everything depends on the imagination. It is not enough that we should know facts; we must be made to see and feel them, before they can produce any practical effect. And this is exactly where we have to recognize the power and value of Verestchagin's marvelous, though gruesome and repellant, pictures. With all their remorseless minuteness of interpretation, with all their crowded scenes of blood and filth and agony, they have helped men and women whom pages of accuumulated detail and columns of earnest invective could have left untouched, to realize at once, and intensely, the actual tragedies of the battlefield and the camp.

Let any San Franciscan read carefully some full account of the great Indian campaigns and then go and stand for half an hour before the vast canvas in the Hopkins Institute of Art, which shows a number of mutinous Sepoys about to be blown from the mouths of cannons, and he will no longer regard the Storthing's procedure as eccentric or inexplicable. Such work as this is worth volumes of argument and appeal in the practical promotion of the cause of peace.

Meanwhile we cannot but be interested in this remarkable recognition of the claims of art upon the ethical side. Of course, in connection with this, the questions will come up anew of the real value of art with a moral and of the method which Verestchagin has chosen to pursue. But whatever attitude we may assume towards the general problem of artistic dedacticism, we shall hardly be likely to protest against the Storthing's award, when we remember that, in carrying out a moral purpose through an appeal to the imagination, the great painter has kept himself to the true method of art, thus reaching his results in a justifiable way.

W. H. H.

Taber, photo.

BLOWN FROM THE GUNS

From the picture by Verestchagin in the gallery of Mrs. Phoebe Hearst

THE STEVENSON MEMORIAL

Formal Dedication of the Fountain in the Plaza.

It is the first monument erected in honor of Robert Louis Stevenson and it is set in the midst of the Plaza—San Francisco's holy ground. Lawns surround it; there is a sparse back-ground of trees and shrubs. Beyond and around rise the grimy buildings of Chinatown. The Latin Quarter stretches away from the edges of the square up the slopes of

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Telegraph Hill and down to the water-front. It is the center of the old town, and every inch of it teems with memories. This was the gathering place of the pioneers in the days of '49. Here the American flag was raised. Here, too, the vigilantes executed their prisoners. Where the base of the Bonaventure's pedestal rests stood Baker when delivering that ever memorable oration over the body of Broderick. It was in the Plaza the gamblers and the miners and the merchants of the early fifties repaired for their evening airing, where they discussed the events of the day, the news from the East brought in by the latest packet lying at anchor but a block below—for in those days the water lapped the edges of Montgomery street. This ancient square, now the loafing place of Chinamen and human derelicts, stands to San Francisco as the Common to Boston.

Very simple is this memorial of the man who caught in The Wrecker the very spirit and element of San Francisco. A heavy pedestal of grey granite—plain, unornamented—supports the bronze galleon whose gilded sails are spread for the South. The effect is inimitably graceful. One has the impression of motion, of life, from the set of yards and the sweep of the prow; the olive-green waves dash fiercely against the Bonaventure's sides, but disturb not the lines of her course. It is a beautiful piece of modeling, harmonious, artistic and, as a memorial, quite what one may believe Stevenson would most have cared for. There is an inscription on the granite pedestal—the writer's rule of life—"To be honest; to be kind; to earn a little; to spend a little less; to make upon the whole a family happier by his presence; to renounce when that shall be necessary, and not be embittered; to keep a few friends, but these without capitulation; above all, on the same grim condition, to keep friends with himself—here is a task for all that a man has of fortitude and delicacy." A water faucet protrudes from the face of the granite making the fountain, and there you have the monument, The idea is novel, unique and most fittingly executed.

As to its history—there is always a history. Bruce Porter, poet and maker of stained glass windows, had been re-reading The Wreckers at the time the news of Stevenson's death at Vailima arrived, and the thought came to him of a memorial in San Francisco. The idea of the galleon was at once suggested and he set to work on a design which towards evening had been roughly embodied. This was modified by Willis Polk, who set the project afloat in the newspapers—a vain enough dream it then seemed. However, subscriptions were invited and came in slowly, then permission was obtained to set the memorial in the Plaza, and on Sunday last it was dedicated. But the design had been changed a thousand times in the interval; there have been hundreds of drawings of both pedestal and ship before either assumed their present proportions. The model was then executed by George Piper. Something like $1500 is the total cost, representing contributions mainly Californian, but from Europe and the East also. Americans interested in literature and art have all subscribed. Miss Louise Imogen Guiney, the poet, aided the cause materially, Bliss Carman assisted with announcements and advocacy in influential quarters. Otherwise the memorial is a labor of love—for the men who executed the stone work and the casting charged but the absolute cost of their service, and then contributed a liberal proportion to the cause.

For the dedication ceremony there gathered at the Plaza a small assemblage of men and women representing the intellectual and artistic coterie of San Francisco. The memorial was shrouded in American and Scotch flags and a Samoan tapa; two highlanders in kilts playing bagpipes, and a multitude of Chinamen hanging over the balconies of the Woey Sen Low restaurant accentuated the picturesqueness of the occasion. The exercises were brief. Irving M. Scott moralized over the inscription, which he thought an admirable rule of life for any man, be he author, artist or millionaire. Bruce Porter explained the appropriateness of setting the memorial in the quarter to which Stevenson, during his various residences in San Francisco, had been most attracted. He read then a poem by Bliss Carman:

THE WORD OF THE WATER.

God made me simple from the first
And good to quench the body's thirst.
Think you he had no ministers
To glad that wayworn soul of yours?

Here, by the thronging Golden Gate,
For thousands and for you I wait,
Seeing adventurous sails unfurled
For the four corners of the world.

Here passed one day, nor came again,
A Prince among the tribes of men—
(For man, like me, is from his birth
A vagabond upon this earth).

Be thankful, friend, as you pass on,
And pray for Louis Stevenson,
That by whatever trail he fare
He be refreshed in God's great care!

Finally Mr. Porter presented the fountain to the Mayor of San Francisco, James D. Phelan, who made an interesting and clever talk, in which he passed from a tribute to the genius of Stevenson to a discussion of the artistic evolution of San Francisco, and a suggestion as to its possibilities as the source of literary and artistic material. That was all. The bagpipes groaned and whistled again, strains of Chinese music burst from the restaurant, the church bells tolled throughout the city, for it was service time, and round the bend from Montgomery Avenue came a cortege of men in green coats and plumed hats escorting the corpse of an Italian citizen to the Lone Mountain Cemetery.

"ST. IVES"

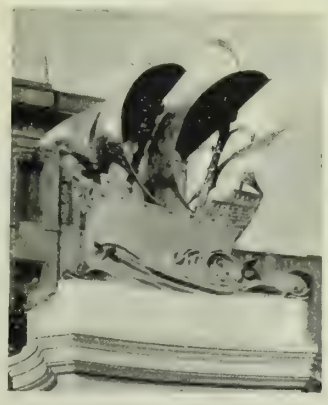
A Critical Estimate of Robert Louis Stevenson's Last Story.

In the Vailima Letters written by Stevenson to Sydney Colvin, the evolution of St. Ives (Chas. Scribner's Sons) and the progress of its composition are described. It was begun in January in the midst of the series of South Sea Island tales, while David Balfour was progressing to a conclusion. The idea occurred to Stevenson in January, '93, during a severe spell of sickness, and he started gleefully on the plot, dictating to Mrs. Belle Strong. It was his only effort at dictation, and it seems he reserved the system for this especial story, for he alludes subsequently to the style as stilted and left-handed—"to some extent the style of R. L. S. dictating." According to his habit he worked at the book between times, writing in the meantime on Weir of Hermiston, the Ebb Tide and several of the South Sea stories. Throughout all this period Stevenson was in wretched health, suffering from overwork, and in the lowest spirits. As he admits, "St. Ives has paid the penalty."

It is purely a story of adventure and action. To quote Stevenson again, "Some of the happenings very good in themselves, but none of them constructive, except in so far perhaps as they make up a kind of sham picture of the time, all in italics and all out of drawing." The hero, St. Ives, a French adventurer, is admirably conceived, and lives, at times, but he had in him possibilities which Stevenson alone and at his best could have realized. He begins the story a French prisoner in Edinburgh Castle and meets there the heroine, Flora Gilchrist, a handsome figure of a maiden rather feebly characterized. The appearance of lawyer Romaine gives the key to the plot which is concerned with Count de Keroual de St. Ives, grand uncle of the prisoner, an immensely wealthy Frenchman who had emigrated to England at the beginning of the revolution. Growing tired of the wickedness of his chosen heir, Viscount Alain, he desires to meet the other nephew, Viscount Anne, the prison and therefore supplies him with money to make good escape. There occurs, just before this, a sensational duel among the prisoners, in which St. Ives kills Gogouelat, who has insulted him. They fight with the blades of a scissors fastened to the ends of wands, and the encounter is the first episode and the initial complication of the story. Soon after he and ten of his comrades escape by a tunnel, and St. Ives makes his way to the home of Flora, who aids him with food and raiment, and a temporary refuge in the hen house. Here is introduced Miss Gilchrist, one of the veritable characters of the book, a natural, vigorous, decisive Scotchwoman, who takes the case of St. Ives out of his own hands and away from her niece, and entrusts him to two Highland drovers who are going to England with their cattle. He has a chance, however, to tell his love, and his declaration is not taken amiss. The story of the wanderings of this brave, gay, irresponsible young Frenchman and his adventures en route make some readable chapters. He reaches finally Amersham Place, the castle of his grand-uncle, which brings the first section of the tale to an end, The episode of the Colonel and Major, and the encounter with Dudgeon are in Stevenson's finer vein, though one could fancy him infusing a greater degree of vivacity into the dialogue between the attorney's clerk and the young Frenchman had the old-time humor been on him. But the Colonel is admirably done—a true and chivalrous gentleman, whose noble traits are contrasted with the vulgar animalism of the Major. But withal one misses in the passages of description which are interspersed that inimitable charm of style which has given Stevenson his mastery. There are notable passages, it is true, but the supreme distinction is missing. There is nothing in St. Ives that compares, for instance, with the voyage of the Flying Scud in The Wreckers, the duel in the Master of Ballantrae or the fight in the cabin in Kidnapped. The prose of The Ebb Tide, written while this novel was on the stocks, has the excellence of his best manner; Weir of Hermiston showed no lack of illumination—but in St. Ives the medium seems chill and colorless, lacking those delicious undercurrents and reflected lights which render his best prose a treasure and a delight. Here, however, is a passage with the real flavor:



THE BONAVENTURE

I only know I was walking in the dark night and among ruts when I heard, very far off, over the silent country that surrounded us, the guard's horn wailing its signal to the next post-house for a change of horses. It was like the voice of the day heard in darkness, a voice of the world heard in prison, the note of a cock crowing in the mid-seas—in short I cannot tell you what it was like, you will have to fancy for yourself—but I could have wept to hear it.

A second episode—near Durham on the way south—is even finer:

It was near midnight when I saw, a great way ahead of me, the light of many torches; presently after, the sound of wheels reached me, and the slow tread of feet, and soon I had joined myself to the rear of a sordid, silent, and lugubrious procession, such as we see in dreams. Close on a hundred persons marched by torchlight in unbroken silence; in their midst a cart, and in the cart, on an inclined platform, the dead body of a man—the centre-piece of this solemnity, the hero whose obsequies we were come forth at this unusual hour to celebrate. It was but a plain, dingy old fellow of fifty or sixty, his throat cut, his shirt turned over as though to show the wound. Blue trousers and brown socks completed his attire, if we can talk so of the dead. He had a horrid look of waxwork. In the tossing of the lights he seemed to make faces and mouths at us, to frown, and to be at times upon the point of speech. The cart, with this shabby and tragic freight, and surrounded by its silent escort and bright torches, continued for some distance to creak along the high road, and I to follow it in amazement, which was soon exchanged for horror. At the corner of a lane the procession stopped, and as the torches ranged themselves along the hedge-row side, I became aware of a grave dug in the midst of the thoroughfare, and a provision of quicklime piled in the ditch. The cart was backed to the margin, the body slung off the platform and dumped into the grave with an irreverent roughness. A sharpened stake had hitherto served for a pillow. It was now withdrawn, held in its place by several volunteers, and a fellow with a heavy mallet (the sound of which still haunts me at night) drove it home through the bosom of the corpse. The hole was filled with quicklime, and the bystanders, as if relieved of some oppression, broke at once into a sound of whispered speech.

My shirt stuck to me, and my heart had almost ceased beating, and I found my tongue with difficulty.

"I beg your pardon," I gasped to a neighbor, "what is this? what has he done? is it allowed? who was the man?"

"A suicide," said he. "Ay, he was a bad one, was Johnny Green."

The several scenes in Amersham Place between the old count and the young adventurer, especially the episode of the dispatch box, and the situation between the disinherited Alain and his uncle are all in the better manner though hardly, save in the appeal of the unfortunate Viscount, great. There are many fine touches in the development of the hero's character; the curious compound of levity, quick wit and reckless daring which distinguished St. Ives is especially brought out in the scene over the contents of the money box and in his relations with Rowley, the valet. But the treatment sags sadly after the episode at Gretna Green, which is rather a flat affair, while the several situations in Edinburgh are devoid of the touch and spirit of the master. Stevenson left the hero at a critical moment in his fortunes—when the toils of the law are about closing upon him. Then cometh Mr. Quiller-Couch with a conclusion—surely a sorry task even for genius. The extension is accomplished with considerable tact and dexterity. The flavor of the hero's personality loses something of its distinction; his audacity has a touch more frivolity than the part calls for; the baloon ascent with four men in the car strikes one with a suggestion of improbability, but that was the idea which had to be conveyed and it is done with the best possible grace. Where the magic touch of the master is most missed is in the episode of the Lady Nepean and Captain Colenso—one of those excursions with which Stevenson loved to diversify his narrative. The air of romance is not here, and the Yankee character is a foolish exaggeration. Nor is the idea of Stevenson in the treatment of the scenes in Paris realized. Withal, I doubt if the task could have been better performed by any one else, for the swing of the phrases is caught and the sequel blends evenly into the narrative.

THE PLAZA

It seems a pity Stevenson could not have lived to remodel—re-write St. Ives, as undoubtedly he must have. He hints in his letters at a desire to hold the book a year ere sending it to the publishers. It is an interesting story of adventure, however, about which one might readily grow enthusiastic if it bore the signature of a lesser man—but Stevenson has set his standard aloff and we measure him by the height of his most admirable achievements. C.

THE MINING CONVENTION

Sixth Annual Meeting of the California Miners' Association.

During the first three days of the present week the sixth annual convention of the California Miners' Association has been held in this city, and from 400 to 500 representatives of the mining interest have been in attendance. While the association transacts all actual business through an executive committee, these yearly meetings afford an excellent opportunity for drawing mining men together, ascertaining their feelings and focussing their influence in regard to matters affecting their welfare. The late gathering has been unusually large and the deliberations of the members evidence the stimulating effect exercised on what is really California's parent industry.

A pleasing incident of the proceedings on the opening day was the presentation of a loving cup to Mr. Jacob H. Neff, the president, he having held that office since the foundation of the Association, and having been re-elected for the ensuing year.

The work of the convention has chiefly consisted in hearing the reports of special committees, and discussing the most important matters, legislative and otherwise, affecting the mining interests of the State. Amongst these the respective rights of the miner and the farmer received considerable attention, and the spirit displayed in the debates on the subject encourages the belief that the open hostility, which formerly prevailed between these two sections of the community, no longer exists. It has come to be seen that for their prosperity, respectively, both are to a great extent interdependent. In this view a resolution was carried for the appointment of a committee to cooperate with the farming interest in securing the construction and maintenance of dams for impounding the debris in the rivers, nothing definite being arrived at, however, as to whether the erection of such dams is to admit of hydraulic mining operations being resumed in the prohibited localities. The revision of the Federal Mining Code was another question prominently brought forward, the main point being whether the abolition of the "apex" and its corollary the "extralateral right" law shall be urged. No action was taken, however, it being deemed advisable to leave the matter to take its course for the present. Much the same result followed reference to the State Mining Bureau, State Mineralogist Cooper being present and explaining the work of the bureau, which is always of interest to mining men. A resolution was agreed to endorsing the proposal to have a mineral exhibit at the coming Paris Exposition, which shall do the State full justice. The subject wnich perhaps engaged the most attention of anything during the proceedings, was the constitution of a Federal Department of Mines. After considerable debate a resolution was abopted providing for the appointment of a special committee "To act in conjunction with like committees from other bodies and conventions in behalf of an executive Department of Mines and Mining, the Secretary whereof shall be a member of the President's Cabinet." It was also resolved to press for an amendment to the lien law of the State, so as to secure the claims of those who labor or furnish material in connection with mining property held under an agricultural patent, as is the case when the title is acquired under the laws of the United States, and of this State and the local rules and customs of miners.

PRESIDENT JACOB H. NEFF.

The convention was attended by Governor Budd, Senator Perkins, Congressmen Barham and DeVries. Mr. John P. Irish was also present as a representative of the State Board of Trade, as well as Major Heuer of the Corps of United States Engineers and the California Debris Commission. All of these gentlemen addressed the assembled members, and expressed their recognition of the power and importance of the California Miners' Association. Several interesting and valuable reports were read, notably by Mr. Tirey L. Ford on mining legislation and by Mr. W. S. Keyes on the Federal mining laws and the need for their revision. Professors George Davidson and S. B. Christy and Mr. W. F. C. Hasson contributed valuable lectures in the evenings during the session.

The proceedings of the convention were brought to a close on Wednesday afternoon when the election of officers was held for the ensuing term, and resulted as follows:

Mr. Jacob H. Neff, who has been President of the Association since its first organization, was unanimously re-elected to that office, and will now, therefore, enter upon his sixth term. Mr. Neff enjoys the confidence of the mining community, and while anxious himself to withdraw from the position, his brother miners so urgently desired that he should continue in office he gracefully accepted the honor conferred upon him. Mr. T. J. Parsons, who was elected Vice President, is well known as the President of the Del Monte Milling Company. Mr. Samuel J. Hendy was chosen Treasurer, in the place of Mr. W. W. Montague. His firm is engaged in the manufacture and supply of mining machinery, and is one of the best known concerns on the coast. Mr. Julian Sonntag, who has served two terms as Treasurer and three as Secretary, has at all times taken the deepest interest in the work of the Association, and has rendered it invaluable service, was re-elected Secretary.

Amongst those who are prominently identified with the Miners' Association are several gentlemen whose portraits are given in these pages, in addition to those of the officers. Mr. Tirey L. Ford, whose work in connection with the proposed construction of a Federal Department of Mines has been of immense value to the Association, is known as the "Miners' Champion." As a member of the trans-Mississippi Congress committee, Mr. Ford's influence on the subject referred to is great, and he urges the Association to press the question on the attention of the government. Mr. A. H. Ricketts is a well-known authority on mining law, upon which he has published a valuable treatise. He drew up the Code of Mining Laws for Nevada; has assisted in devising those of Mexico and has rendered great service to mining legislation in the United States. As Chairman of two of the most important committees of the California Miners' Association, he holds a conspicuous position in the mining world. Mr. J. M. Wright is another prominent member, who is Chairman of the Jetty and Dredging committee of the Association. Mr. John T. Daggett, the late Superintendent of the San Francisco Mint, is a power in mining circles and a practical authority of vast experience. He is at present identified with two well known properties, the Black Bear in Siskiyou and the Santa Rosalie in Mexico. Niles Searls has been identified with the Association since its inception and proceeded to Washington in the interest of hydraulic mining. He assisted in the preparation and passage of the Caminetti bill. Commissioner Searls was chosen to present the loving cup to President Neff, a duty which he performed most happily. Mr. Curtis H. Lindley, late Judge of Amador county is the Chairman of the Committee on Revision of Federal Mining Laws and the author of a work on American Mining Law, the second volume of which will be issued from the press in about a weeks time. B.

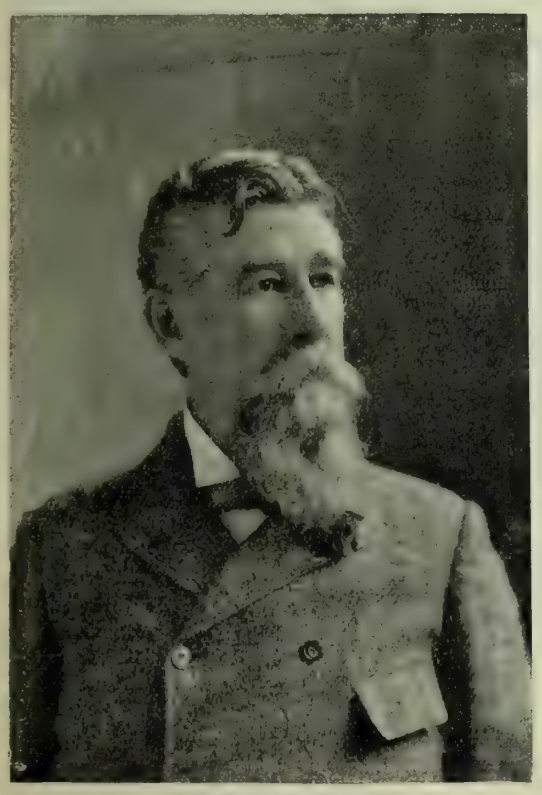
THE CONVENTION OF MINERS AT ODD FELLOWS' HALL

From a flashlight photo by Taber

SECRETARY JULIAN SONNTAG.

TREASURER SAMUEL J. HENDY.

VICE-PRESIDENT J. T. PARSONS.



JOHN DAGGETT.

CURTIS H. LINDLEY.

A. H. RICKETTS

NILES SEARLS.

TIREY L. FORD.

JOHN M. WRIGHT.

The acquittal of O. M. Welburn was a surprise, but was undoubtedly due to the efforts of his attorneys Gavin McNab and Frank Gould. The latter's speech in defence of the ex-collector was really a brilliant effort, and served as his introduction to law practice in San Francisco. Mr. Gould's identification has hitherto been with Stockton, but he has recently concluded to enlarge the field of his operation and has opened a law office in this city. He has served the State honorably as Speaker of the House at Sacramento, and was Chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee which elected Governor Budd. But he is not the only man who regrets that feat. He has now a fine practice in the Slough City, but being an excellent talker, endowed with both facility and eloquence, he has made up his mind that there is more of a future in the metropolis. Though we have lawyers innumerable, there are among them few capable speakers. This must be borne home to anyone who will spend a day or so round the courts at the City Hall. One hears the lamest addresses from nervous, stammering legal fledgings who mean well enough, but have neither the ability nor the readiness at oratory which their necessities demand. There is certainly a good chance in San Francisco for a man of Frank Gould's calibre, and he is sure to make the most of it.

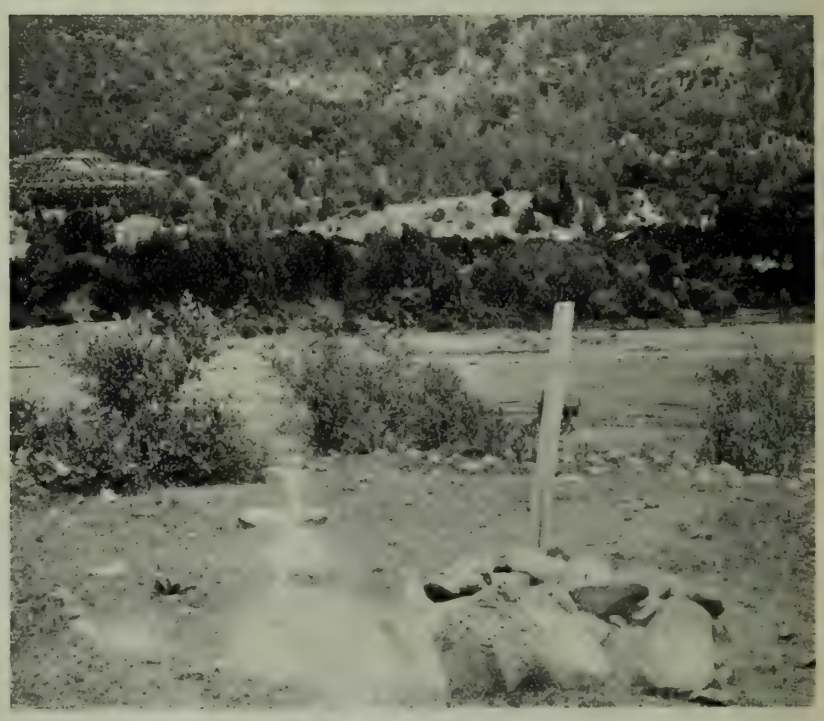
Fine voices are seldom found in a country where fish or meat diet prevails. Those Italians who eat the most fish (those of Naples and Genoa) have few fine singers among them. The sweet voices are found in the Irish women of the country, and not of the towns. Norway is not a country of singers, because they eat too much fish; but Sweden is a country of grain and song. The carnivorous birds croak; grain-eating birds sing.

The most wonderful astronomical photograph in the world is that which has recently been prepared by London, Berlin and Parisian astronomers. It shows at least 68,000,000 stars.

MARSHALL MONUMENT

COLOMA FROM THE MARSHALL MONEMENT

MARSHALL'S CABIN



SITE OF MARSHALL'S DISCOVERY

MINING OVER OLD GROUND

AMERICAN RIVER AT COLOMA

MAIN STREET, COLOMA

OLD COLOMA

Photos by W, G. Woods, Sacramento

TRANSHIPPING COPRA

LANDING THE COCOANUTS

A DECK CARGO OF NUTS

FRUIT OF THE TROPICS

The Local Cocoanut Supply and Its Wasteful Treatment.

Of all the trees or plants in the kingdom of nature, it may be asserted without fear of contradiction, that none can rival the cocoanut palm in general usefulmess, while, like all the rest of the palm species, it seems to be satisfied with what appears to be the poorest possible soil, where on to rear its elegant figure and yield returns for the support of that section of humanity which cultivates idleness as a fine art. Its chief habitat lies on the coast of the East Indies, the West Indies, the tropical isles of the Pacific, and in similar latitudes of the American continent. Speaking generally it may be said that it loves the sound of the sea and is found in its greatest perfection in the innumerable small islands of the Pacific. On the western shores of Southern India and in the beautiful island of Ceylon the coast-line is fringed with countless myriads of these trees, which, growing in sandy soil, afford almost the entire means of existence for millions of the inhabitants. From the products of the trees they construct their dwellings and their boats, derive a large portion of their food and drink in various forms and oil for different uses; rope, matting, mattrasses, brushes, food for cattle and swine and fertilizing matter for their cultivated land. The result is that the owner of a few cocoanut trees is practically independent. The account which Emerson Tennent gives in his interesting work on Ceylon of the cocos nucifera is exceedingly interesting, and as showing the value it possesses as family property he instances a case where a claim to the 2520th part of ten trees formed the subject of legal proceedings.

The cocoanut palm begins to crop between five and seven years from the time the seed is planted and when in full bearing will average sixty to eighty nuts per year, though fine iudividual trees, highly cultivated, will often yield nearly three times that number. The crop is almost continuous in equatorial latitudes, owing to the even climate, and pickings are usually made about every eight or ten weeks. The tree flowers in beautiful cream-white sprays close to the main stem and the nuts form in handsome green clusters, developing very rapidly, especially in places where there is abundant moisture. When the tree is flowering the juice or "toddy," as it is called, of the unexpanded flower spathes is drawn, fermented and distilled into "arrack," which is a very powerful spirit, though, if kept for several years it becomes mellow and distinctly agreeable. The same juice, if boiled down, forms excellent sugar. In order to facilitate the gathering of the nuts and the drawing of the "toddy" the natives run a series of rope-walks, immediately below the crown of the trees, through their groves, so that once they go aloft they can walk across from tree to tree and conduct their cropping operations. This practice no doubt gave use to the old traveler's story of monkeys being employed to work overhead amongst the trees in collecting and throwing down the produce, for a human of those parts up in a palm tree wears a very monkey-like look.

As soon as the nuts are gathered the outer husk is peeled off, this being composed of fibre, which is first soaked in water, then dried and separated, for the most part by machinery. It thus becomes what is known as coir fibre, available for manufacturing into rope, matting, and other articles of trade. The nut itself, contained in the hard inner shell, is broken and the meaty substance therein withdrawn in two cup-like halves, which are dried in the sun and converted into what is called copperah, or copra, from which oil is pressed, the residuum forming a cake, the best of which is used for stock-feeding purposes and the inferior portion as manure. There is, of course, a certain amount of export trade from all points of supply in the unbroken nut, both with and without removal of the fibrous husk. In this latter form chiefly shipments reach this port from the islands of the Pacific. The accompanying photographs illustrate the landing of a cargo of 35,000 cocoanuts and 15,000 sacks of copra which arrived here this week in the City of Papeete from Tahiti.

Altogether there are some dozen cargoes delivered here from Tahiti and the Marshall Islands in the course of a year, aggregating about 1,000,000 nuts and valued at about $5 per thousand. In contrast with the thrifty, utilitarian system of handling the cocoanut in the East Indies, the local methods are ignorant and wasteful in the last degree. The trade is in few hands and practically monopolized by one firm, who convert the succulent interior, dessicated and shredded, in nine different grades, into material suited to the requirements of bakers, confectioners, candy-makers and others, selling it at about 10 cents a pound wholesale. The fibrous husk, which should be valuable for manufacturing purposes, as before alluded to, is either burnt or dumped into the bay. It would seem, therefore, that there is an opening here for the exercise of skill and intelligence in the importation and manufacture of this product of the islands of the Pacific.

A MEMORY OF '49

The Town of Coloma, Where Gold Was First Discovered.

The little town of Coloma lies some forty miles above Sacramento on the south fork of the American river. One literally "drops in" on Coloma, for the sleepy little village lies on a bar or flat near the river bank and is surrounded by hills, up whose steep sides vineyards and orchards have gradually crept, until this section ranks high in the production of wine and fruit. A few outlying farm houses, then old-fashioned cottages with old-fashioned sweet-smelling gardens and broad-spreading fig trees; a turn, then the main street. The typical country store and post office, a hotel and bar combined, and that is all there is of Coloma, save the few heavy-walled, iron-doored buildings that have withstood the ravages of time, and the inevitable double row of trees that form an archway over the street. Their branches almost meet and under the stress of the afternoon breezes seem to whisper to the stranger that Coloma was not always the quiet, sleepy little place it is now; for here it was that Johu Marshall made the first authentic discovery of gold in California.

Gold! Gold! There were no railroads or telegraph lines in those days, and the news traveled slowly at first, but it made way gradually, gaining in weight like a huge snow ball, till it rolled over the East—nay, over the world. Gold had been found in the new State of California; and then came a great throng of seekers for the prescious metal. Across the dreary plains, over the snow-clad mountains braving hunger and thirst, and heat and cold, around the Horn in storms and calms, across the Isthmus, daring the terrible heat and the fever, by all routes and by all forms of conveyance from the ocean steamer to a wheelbarrow, they poured into the new Eldorado, and Coloma sprang into existence, lived its day; and when the gold had been gathered the little town was deserted, the big solid buildings left to stand as a monument of former greatess, while the more flimsy structures succumbed to the elements.

A post surrounded by a small pile of stones is all there is left to mark the site of Sutter's mill, and two immense boulders on the river bank are pointed out as the spot where the mill dam stood. Perhaps a quarter of a mile up into the hills above Coloma there is a bold round-topped hill, and from here one has a beautiful vista of the town and the whole river bar. On this spot stands the monument to Mershall, erected by the Native Sons. From a heavy granite base a massive column rises clear and free, and there in heroic bronze stands Marshall overlooking the river below. Clad in the homely garb of the pioneer, his broad hat pushed back on his head, he holds in one hand the dull yellow mass of metal that so startled the world, while pointing with the other straight down to the mill site where the discovery was made.

At the base of this little hill, and almost at his feet, there is a little tumble-down, vine-covered cabin, deserted now, save by a striped chipmunk that cocks his tail and scurries to his retreat as one enters the open door. This was Marshal's cabin.

Vale Marshall! Vale Coloma! For the golden days have gone, and, save for a few Chinamen working over old ground, the pick and the shovel and the rocker have given way to the plow and the pruning-hook, while Marshall and all but a hardy handful of those who saw the great days of yore quietly sleep. Coloma sleeps, too, and the trees overgrowing the little main street nod and wave and seem to whisper that Coloma was not always so quiet and peaceful, and to sigh for the "days of old, the days of gold, the days of '49." W.

Up to the moment of the pilot boat leaving the Teutonic with Editor W. T. Stead on board, bound for Liverpool, he was engaged in delivering himself, through the columns of the New York World, of a fresh series of his opinions on things in general and the difference in the respect paid to women in England and the United States in particular. His views on this subject, derived, as he admits, from very limited opportunities of observation, is that American women do not receive from men the same solid and serious respect and consideration as their English sisters. As reasons for this conclusion, in the first place, he points to the fact that a woman has ruled England for sixty years, while the constitution of this country makes no provision for a similar condition of affairs, if the ablest person in the States should happen to have been born a woman. Secondly, no man in America will ever contradict a woman, however foolish or illogical she may be, thus rendering a courtesy and forbearance, which are insuiting in their nature; and thirdly, that until women's work, say for instance in the journalistic and other common fields of exertion, is judged by the same standard as that of men, they must be the victims of a false respect. This is all very silly, but Mr. Stead never was a reliable authority on any social question, either on this or the other side of the water. That will not daunt him, however, in recording his impressions, with just so much ignorant frankness as a clever, superficial writer can employ to keep himself before the world.

The important question whether a person who once engages a room at a hotel is entitled to stop there forever, subject to payment of the rent, has come before the courts in England. Not long ago a lady who insisted on her right to stay at the Hotel Metropole, Brighton, but was, nevertheless, compelled to leave, has now brought an action against the Hotel Cecil, London, to maintain this right. Meantime she has appeared in a police court in the matter of cross-summonses for assault between herself and an attendant, who, acting on instructions, refused her re-admittance to the hotel.

The human hair is absolutely the most profitable crop that grows. Five tons of it are annually imported by the merchants of London. The Parisians harvest upwards of two hundred thousand pounds weight, equal in value to eighty thousand pounds sterling per annum.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I think, Diary dear, that all prophets of evil should be stoned forthwith. Think of it! They foretold a dull winter—well a day—methinks I should like to know what a gay one would be like. This morning when I came down to breakfast I positively quailed at the bulky appearance of the pile of letters at my plate. "Surely, Cricket, these are not all bills," remarked Papa, when he saw my puzzled expression as I tore open envelope after envelope. "Oh, no, Papa—merely invitations." "Then, why this thusness, my dear?" "Oh," responded Arthur, "the poor overworked darling will have to answer them." "By the way, Cricket, why don't you employ a private secretary to attend to your correspondeuce. I think you need one as well as Papa?" "I am positive I do," I replied, and, turning to Papa, I said, "Oh, can't I? Please say yes. I shall cheerfully give up my maid and share Leila's, if you will only let me." Think of it, Diary—a real live secretary — should I not be a scorcher! Fancy my pride when the girls should ask me anything. I could say, "Well, I am not certain, but shall refer the matter to my secretary." No lorgnettes, be they ever so jeweled, could please me then.

Papa, however, did not seem to think the matter worth consideration, and said, "Well, what's on the tapis now?" "Teas principally, and dancing clubs." "Surely, Cricket, there can't be any more dancing clubs?" he asked. "You are quite mistaken, Papa, to suppose the limit of dancing organizations can ever be reached," I replied in my most dignified tones. "This particular club," (brandishing my invitation), "is to be an awfully swell affair. Some say it will be the winter's crowning glory." "And what is this new club, and who is getting it up?" asks dear, unsophisticated Papa, though I have been talking the matter over for the past weeks. Wheat must be frightfully absorbing, for he does not hear half of my pet projects! You know, Diary dear, that I meant the Cinderellas—the club of which Mrs. Perry Eyre, Mrs. Charley Baldwin and Miss Page are to be the fairy godmothers, or patronesses, what you will. They are to give four balls—on Wednesday nights—which, I am told, will rival everything hitherto started, even our pet Terpsichoreans, they say, will have to take a second place.

"Have the Cinderellas anything to do with this tempest in a teapot that I am hearing about so constantly," inquired Arthur. "Oh, you mean the feud now existing between the king who was and the queens who would be," I asked. "Yes, how is this modern Montague Capulet affair progressing?" he continued, sarcastically. "Admirably, from the point of view of an outsider," I replied. "The armies are drawn up in line; each is awaiting the first move of the adversary."

It seems the ex-ruler sent invitations to all the debutantes to some affair or another. Some accepted, but the daughters of one of the rival factions refused point blank. Then this especial rival faction invited the ex-ruler to an affair of theirs, and the invitation was returned unopened with some curious club expression on the outside—"blowed if I do!" or words to that effect. So now the gauntlet has been thrown down and various peculiar missives fly between the two contingents. I believe they could both give points to the ready letter-writer. I hear of revenges deep and dire, theatre parties and dinners on the nights of the factional dances and so forth, so we anticipate much fun. I envy the men, though, there are so few of them that they will positively have to be divided into sections.

"And where do the young people come in—to which side do you pin your colors?" Arthur wanted to know.

"To neither, as far as most of us are concerned," I answered in my most dignified way. "We sit meekly by. Why should debutantes dabble in the troubles of their elders, so far there are no clouds in our social horizon?"

Now to return to my doings during the past week. On Thursday I went to see Rose Hooper safely on her journeyings. She and Ethel Tompkins and Miss Clark, of San Jose, went together, chaperoned by Mrs. Pomeroy. A number of us went to wish them "bon voyage" and their sections and drawing-room were stacked with chrysanthemums. On Saturday I went to Gertie Bates' dancing class in the evening and the football in the afternoon. We all go to the game every Saturday—all the debutantes and those of a year ago. Ethel Keeney, Leontine Blakeman and Charlotte Ellinwood were literally encompassed with navy men. Leila Burton, Mrs. Jouett, Mamie Thomas, Marie Wells, the Hoffmans, the pretty Mrs. Will Morrow and her husband all seemed perfectly wild over the game. There were accidents innumerable, which added to the excitement, but as no one was seriously hurt we could continue to enjoy ourselves. I am afraid, without its risk, football would lose much of its fascination, to the onlooker at least. I fear I was too tired to enjoy the dancing class as I might otherwise have done. There was a fine plentitude of men and not so many maids. I was the only debutante. Ethel Patton and Bernice Drown were the prettiest of the girls. The german was led by Willie Smith and Mollie Hurd. On Sunday I went to the unveiling of the Stevenson Memorial Fountain, which was most interesting. The more intellectual portion of our city was represented as well as the cosmopolitan element who throng around the old Plaza. I saw the Beavers, Mrs. Charles Webb Howard, Mrs. Rosenstern, Wrs. W. B. Bourne, Dr. Adelaide Brown, Ethel Moore, the Lloyd Osbournes, Luita Booth, Ella Goodall and numberless artists and college men. I enjoyed the speeches, which were delightfully short.

Then on Monday I had a glorious time—I went to Mr. Wiltsee's and Mr. McCaleb's theatre party in honor of the Stuyvesant Fish family of New York, and had the time of my life without any reservations. We had three boxes—think of it. Mr. and Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish, Mr. and Mrs. Spreckels, Miss Pomeroy, also of New York, Emma Butler, Marie Wells, Marie Oge, Mr. Harry Lehr, Mr. Cutting, Dr. Bellamy, all of the East. You know Mr. and Mrs. Fish are out here from New York in two private cars with innumerable servants and all that sort of thing. They are "roughing it in California—just stopped long enough to take a bath at Sutro's, you know." Mr. Lear is really a swell. He led the cotillion at the Bradley-Martin fancy dress ball. Surely that is celebrity. The Oelrichs have taken them around in San Francisco, and they have seen all the sights. On Wednesday they left for Yosemite and then go on to Mexico. But to return to the party. We all looked our best. Mrs. Gus Spreckels wore black and cerise and a picture hat. Mrs. Fish, white crepe trimmed with lace; Miss Pomeroy was stunning—tall, not handsome but athletic looking—in a sort of reseda green corduroy skirt, velvet jacket with flounces of lace in front. She is a fine horsewoman, I believe. We girls wore light silk waists and dark skirts. But the men! They were quite a new experience, all belong to the do nothing or leisure class and are enormously rich. I liked Dr. Bellamy the best—he seemed the least affected. As for Mr. Lehr, he explains the point of many hitherto misunderi stood witticisms of Life and Truth. We have none of his especial class of exquisite out here. Very well groomed, with manicured finger nails, feminine gestures, conversations strictly boudoirish and silly to a degree past credence. Mr. Cutting is of the Daniel Deronda type and the handsomest man in New York. Afterwards we had a swell supper in the Red Room at the Bohemian Club to the strains of Huber's band. The decorations were ornate in the extreme. A center piece of bride roses with chrysanthemums forming wheels and violets scattered broadcast.

The Thomas party was quite a large one. Alice Hoffman looked fetching in pale pearl gray silk. Therese Morgan in a light cerise waist and dark skirt. Mamie Thomas, Gerald Rathbone, Max McNutt and Mr. Greenway. Then Mrs. Joe Tobin and Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Coleman also had parties. Arthur said that even my theatre party could not have beaten Walter Martin's dinner at the 'Varsity Club in honor of Birdie Fair. It was very informal in the first place. Mrs. Martin was chaperone, and she always believes in allowing young people to enjoy themselves. The decorations were gorgeous—yellow chrysanthemums in wrought iron stands were placed at either end of the table. I believe there were about twenty guests. Birdie Fair became quite enthusiastic about it, and said even in New York she had never enjoyed anything more. Afterwards the various artists from the Orpheum gave a vaudeville performance, together with Huber's music through dinner.

Last night papa took us to the "Geisha Girl" at the Tivoli—Marie Wells and Marie Oge were there. Mrs. Foreman had a box party, including Miss Foreman, Miss Jackson and George de Long. On Wednesday Miss Foreman gave a debutantes luncheon at the Occidental—a very gorgeous and elaborate affair.

Of coming events, I am anticipating Bessie Ames' tea on Saturday. Not a single married woman is invited, just girls and men and we are to have a glorious time, "so say we all of us." All the boys have promised to turn up; I have even persuaded Arthur. Then Ethel Bent is to give a tea on November 7th. Such a shame about her house—you know they have had to give it up to the Croftons. I think it horrid, and don't think I could take it as amicably as Ethel does. Lieutenant Bent furnished it so prettily, too! Army life is not all beer and skittles, is it? Lieutenant O'Hamie might have taken the cottage before, but he said the Bents were too happy to be disturbed, but Mr. Crofton is made of sterner stuff. Lieutenant O'Hamie is to be married next month, the eleventh, to Miss Mamie O'Hara of Angel Island, a very quiet wedding. Miss Pratt and Miss Berkheimer are to be bridesmaids. Julia Crocker's is also to be home wedding on November 24th at Mrs. Clark Crocker's. She leaves for New York early in December. Next week Gertie Carroll gives a luncheon to Birdie Fair, and there is a big hop at the Presidio on Friday, so ends my gossip for this week. The Fairs leave at the end of next week—won't we miss them; I know I shall, at all events.

Your beloved MISS CRICKET.

* *

Mrs. Dr. Howitt of San Rafael gave a married ladies tea last week to introduce her nieces, Misses Marie and Gertie Oge. Nearly all those invited were San Rafael people. The Misses Oge wore white. Mrs. Howitt was assisted in receiving by Mrs. Page and Mrs. Frank Johnstone.

Interesting for various reasons was the wedding of Miss Rose Sachs and Mr. Albert Baruch, formerly of Central America. Miss Sachs is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lipman Sachs, and is an attractive-looking girl with large dark eyes and a sweet expression. The ceremony was celebrated at the home of the bride, and was an exceedingly smart affair. The rooms were decorated in masses of pink chrysanthemums. Miss Sachs was unattended save by her little niece, Miss Babette Heller, and two little nephews of the groom, little Leonard Hiller and Frederick Baruch. A swell supper followed the ceremony. Miss Sachs received many handsome presents, one especially noteworthy being a magnificent diamond necklace, presented by Mr. Levi Strauss. Mr. and Mrs. Baruch have gone to Europe on their honeymoon.

* *

Quite the most interesting event of the season was the garden party given on Saturday at the home of Mrs. Wetherbee in aid of the East Oakland Free Kindergarten and the Fruitvale Congregational Chapel. The affair was under the patronage of Mrs. Wetherbee, Mrs. F. M. Smith, Mrs. Goodfellow, Mrs. Tubbs, Mrs. Henshaw, and many others. The fete opened at about two o'clock, and from that time until late in the evening the grounds were crowded with myriads of people. In the afternoon a musical program was provided, under the direction of Mr. Harry Melvin, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Riley, Mr. Balch, and the California Mandolin Club. In the evening the grounds were lighted with thousands of Chinese lanterns, which added much to the effect of the scene. The Wetherbee place is among the sights of East Oakland, and the tall trees with these fairy lights and the figures flitting hither and thither was most picturesque.

Outside of this entertainment Oakland society has not had a wildly diverting time this week — the events are all on the horizon. Nothing of any importance in the immediate present. There are, of course, the usual number of informal affairs—for instance, a few card parties. Among these Mrs. Andrew Mosely gave a whist party to some forty of her friends on Saturday evening, and Miss Forester entertained a number of young people at a game of progressive hearts on Monday. At the latter Miss Brown, Miss Jordan, Mr. Swain and Mr. Wilson carried off the prizes.

A charming reception was given on Tuesday afternoon by Mrs. James Shepherd Jenks nee Vibella Martin, at the house of her father on Blackstone Hill. Mrs. Jenks has recently returned from her wedding trip, and is to give another reception next Tuesday. Mr. and Mrs. Jenks have taken rooms at the Hotel Nicholas for the winter.

The engagement is announced of Mrs. Marion Cullen Comstock and Captain Charles Goodall. Mrs. Comstock is one of the most popular women in Oakland, and quite the prettiest. She is a little above the medium height, has a charming figure, and exquisite coloring.

A pretty home wedding came off in Oakland Wednesday evening at the residence of the bride, Miss Alicia Mooney, on Filbert street. The groom, Mr. W. B. Compton, is connected with the Crocker Bank. Miss Mooney, who is a well-known Oakland artist, was smartly gowned in white, and the bridesmaid, Miss Annie Neylan, looked daintily pretty in pink. After the ceremony, which was performed by Rev. Michael King, Mr. and Mrs. Compton left for the south.

THE THEATRES

The Responsibilities of Messrs. Frohman for Frohman's Losses.

The Frohman's threaten never again to send traveling companies of players across the continent for the delectation of San Francisco audiences. Perhaps we shall suffer no loss if these gentlemen live up to their threat. One might better lose Messrs. Frohman's approval than maintain it at the expense of a dollar and a half a seat for all of the good, bad and indifferent performances they have vouchsafed to us. Probably the percentage of San Franciscans who have been pleased with Messrs. Frohman's companies is as high here as it is in New York, but it requires a much larger community than this to furnish a sufficient number of complaisant theatre goers to make mediocre performances profitable. We doubtless have our quota of indifferent amusement seekers, but not quite enough to justify one in saying that anything that "goes" in New York ought to "go" here, and apparently not enough to justify Mr. Frohman in sending his companies to us. There are people in this world so constituted—it has been declared to be a racial characteristic, but similar fault may be discovered in all races—who lower, degrade, and ultimately bring into disrepute every line of effort—commercial, professional or industrial—that is contaminated by their touch. With them business is not a question of honest return for honest money, they are not content to reap the rewards that naturally flow from a legitimate business. They are hungry for illegitimate profits: they begin by purveying honest goods in competition with honest rivals, but immediately their reputation is established, adulteration, imitation and fraud begin. Honor and honest rivalry is elbowed out of competition. Spurious goods rule the day. The honest man has two courses left open to him, in such a contest, retirement from business, or resorting to the same frauds practiced by his rival. In either event the commercial, professional or industrial life invaded by such men is lowered morally and the atmosphere about it polluted and rendered unwholesome.

I am not charging the Messrs. Frohman with all of these delinquiencies, but am prepared to say, decisively, that they have received from San Francisco just such treatment as they deserved at its hands.

Regard for a moment the company at the Baldwin. It is a typical Frohman company of players. Is there one name on the list of twenty people in the cast distinguished dramatically in any particular. In "Under the Red Robe" the play itself is the drawing power so Mr. Frohman gives us mediocre actors. Next week or week after he may give us a single player with national reputation, but more than likely the play itself will lack humor, interest or intelligence, or the support be insufferably weak.

My pen refuses to write the things that might be justly said of Mr. Morris, as Gil de Berault, there is something in the manner in which the big, and no doubt very good, fellow handles the dashing, scapegrace, duellist lover, that—while he is unfitted for the part—constrains me to deal gently with him. He tries with such honest vigorous earnestness to live the character, and is, forsooth, so far from anything that savors of impertinent over-confidence in himself, that you like him in spite of his delinquencies.

But examine the list of men in the company. They have not much to do, thank heaven and the playwright! There is one exception to the general mediocrity of the male cast—William Farnum—a lieutenant. The lieutenant is a grizzled, gruff old veteran, brave and blunt and Mr. Farnum succeeds in making him all that the author or playwright intended he should be. But Farnum, in the middle of the bill, is an oasis of merit in a desert of mediocrity. To Miss Hampton must also be credited much gracefulness of manner in the role of Renee de Cocheforet, and the lines falling to her demanding strong handling, were neatly and quite cleverly delivered.

"Under the Red Robe" relates a story full of dramatic interest. It amuses you and stirs up interest. If you have not read the story—and it is certainly wiser to see the play first and then read the story—you will certainly take enjoyment from the performance. B.

* *

The Alcazar is very much to the front this week with Gillette's comedy "Too Much Johnson." It is altogether the best production the Alcazar has given for a very long time; the acting is agreeable and the scenery and stage settings complete and attractive. Wright Huntington plays Augustus Billings with genuine Gillettian repose, strolling and smoking through the part with commendable ease and discretion. Wallace Shaw has rather little to do as Francis Faddish—that is, little to what he should—but he makes the most of it. Frederick Strong has a good makeup as the much abused Johnson and Frank Thompson as Frederic gives a clever performance.

Of the ladies Mrs. Bates is the most successful, as Mrs. Batterson, she presents the unique spectacle of a prying mother-in-law foiled on every occasion and finally gracefully subdued. Miss Foster is good as Mrs. Billings—a rather thankless part—and Miss Kingsley makes a pretty Leonora.

* *

The break in the style of things at Morosco's this week has been attended with success, and the careful rendering of Milton Royle's clever drama "Friends," is creditable both to the artists engaged and the management. The honors of the occasion unquestionably rest with Fred Butler in the part of Hans Otto and Maud Edna Hall as Marguerite. The former handles a by no means easy character with a nicety that can only be the result of careful study and natural fitness for the role. The same remarks apply to a great extent to Miss Hall's treatment of her leading part, in which she is gentle, sympathetic and free from any tendency to over-act. W. H. Pascoe takes immensely with the audience as John Paden, Jr., modern poet, but a somewhat too off-hand manner, at times, spoils the effect of his work. Mortimer Snow and Lauders Stevens, as Karje, the pianist, and John Paden, Sr., respectively, do fairly good work, while little Mamie Holden in her small part is quite clever. John T. Nicholson, as the villain of the piece, fulfills the roll in the matter of appearance, but his stilted manner and mechanical style of declamation jar the senses terribly. As a whole the play runs smoothly and is well worth seeing. The stage setting is appropriate throughout and very well done.

* *

The "Geisha" by any other name would not sound so inviting to our American ears, but it

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents
Sold only at 102 Eddy street

Miss Edith Hall

Miss Florence Walcott

"THE GEISHA" AT THE TIVOLI
Photos by Thors

would still be a fetching little operetta. Yes, it needs the two diminutives, for if the truth be but told there is nothing very great in this diverting "musical play" except Leary as Wun Hi, and, of course, Edwin Stevens' New York reputation and his seven feet of avoirdupois.

Omitting the part of Wun Hi, and even he has a pointless song to sing, the words of the play are rather poor, but the music of the lyrics is pretty and taking, and it is certain that one, critical or otherwise, can get much pleasure out of an evening at the Tivoli while the story of a Tea-house is on. The stage settings, costumes and girls looked very attractive, from the back of the house where I was seated, and came near consoling me for the jokes of farcial expression lost to me by my very situation.

Stevens and Leary make the utmost of their parts: Wun Hi is a really clever production, particularly when he was so "up-split," and the Marquis—well, as Wun Hi says, "you no put stop on the Marquis, he play damn good game, too." I am not so sure about Florence Wolcott and Edith Hall, though the former looked exceedingly pretty—from the rear of the house, mind you—and sang delightfully in her smooth fresh voice. Edith Hall was vivacious, expressive and undoubtedly pleased the house as the gong girl "with all the modern improvements." Juliette Diamand, a modified Katisha, was well done by Georgie Cooper, and Jennie Stockmeyer as Nami was very captivating in her soft blue kimona. P. W.

The management of the Palace Hotel is unsparing in its efforts to render that establishment complete and luxurious in every respect. Following on the improvements made not long ago in the grill and billiard rooms, an addition has been made in the same quarter of the big house of two very comfortable and appropriately fitted and furnished smoking parlors on the ground floor. These rooms are approached from the Market street entrance hallway, through doors on the right hand side of the passage, and also from the large grill room. They are delightfully retired and quiet, while looking out one side upon the life always to be seen in the large central court. Decorated in sober but handsome style and fitted with the most inviting arm-chairs and corner-settees, rich carpets underfoot and fine imported tapestries illustrating hunting scenes on the panelled walls, the most exacting sybarite can there while away the hour in perfect peace and enjoyment when so disposed. It is not surprising that many visitors to San Francisco find the Palace sufficient for all their wants.

Artistic competence, combined with sound business principles, account for the great popularity of Huber's Orchestra. Address 20 O'Farrell street. Telephone care Benj. Curtaz, Main 1247.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

XAVER SCHARWENKA

A Critical Estimate of His Scope and Technique.

In these days of managerial fulminations, the advent of Scharwenka is not at all likely to be the daily question in our musical world. On Monday evening a well-spread audience apparently recognized the propriety of welcoming Xaver Scharwenka, and maintaining at even its lowest ebb, an enthusiasm a trifle above the tepid degree. Rising for once to the boiling-point, the composer-pianist had himself to blame only in that the demonstration failed to grow stronger, for the programme arrangement, instead of leaving its culmination for the finale, as all popular programmes are accustomed to, reached its highest flight somewhere in the midst of the evening, and thereafter rose and fell to lesser levels to the end.

Just why Mr. Scharwenka has failed to become the most popular of pianists is not shortly told. No posing, no esoteric tricks, no personal pettiness, but a genial presence, enough bonhommie, and that spontaneous desire to be pleased and to please, usually resulting in the popular appreciation which Musin once enjoyed with his audiences. Not in the least that Mr. Scharwenka plays at his audidience or coruscates for them; his attitude appeared to be one of feeling the same sentiment as he evoked, and of an unaffected desire to hold the interest with an exercise of the musician's talent only. All that rubric of firming hair, occult rigidity and leonine stare, and other personal paraphernalia giving joy to Paderewski enthusiasts, is not with Mr. Scharwenka.

In America Mr. Scharwenka had the advantage of a large advertisement in the florid encomiums found in Amy Fay's bright letters; thousands, almost millions, of damsels have risen up and called his name blessed for the happy idea of the perennial and eternal Polish dance—the Polish dance. Others of the dances are more musical and have finer veins in them but they have never ousted the original dance in public esteem. Perhaps the composer regrets the fact of an obvious popularity for one composition, and feels other and later works are truer examples of his talent. Of the compositions played in the first programme, the Novelette had most distinction and musical value; the Spanish Serenade might be any kind of serenade excepting Spanish. But the pianist and not the composer is the main point of interest in this connection.

Remembering a long list of celebrities and valuing their genre for its own sake, it is not possible to find among them a peer to Scharwenka as to the playing of staccato passage effects. Quite unlike anything heard here is the easy adjustment and effortless rapidity of his staccato repeating action and the flame-like brilliance and density of effect such as the "William Tell" overture arrangement called out. His own "Staccato Etude" gave him opportunities of informing the local mind as to models of adjusted tension. Likewise in the pianissimo playing of "Fiorituri," and the vaulting arpeggi and scale there were those rare qualities of effort which is effortless to the point of negation. Scharwenka is one of those exceptional pianists who have the ear for tone as distinguished from interval, but the possession of this gift does not appear to have been developed equally in all lines of his playing. Like all the other personages built upon the short-armed, stout-bodied plan, nature supplies physique without emotion. True, there is sentiment in his work, and the desire for grace and elegance as well as neatness, but no overpowering sense of the tragic or the grandiose. In a word, this artist is great in his way, but his way is not great.

Nothing more mignon, more dainty than his playing of the andante from the "Appassionata" could be wished, but for all the sprightly force of his short-toned octaves in the first movement, and the evident seriousness of the study, no feeling of grandeur or heroic dignity escaped the player. It was a salon composition delivered with the seriousness of the salon. In this work the playing showed the want of real breadth which expresses itself in those familiar signs of punched chords and stunted octaves ground into the keyboard, in this case with an atoning bonhommie. In the Chopin numbers, the absence of the informing spirit known in the untranslatable term zal was compensated for, if such a thing is possible in Chopin, by a species of ballon and nuanceful turning of phrase—quite captivating in its way. In other words, the Chopin compositions were true to the text and glib and dextrous, but with the spirit of Chopinism left out.

Why an artist with so fine a sense of tone in pianissimo playing, who recognizes the true inwardness of negative work, does not, in the course of a developed career, bring that negation into the robust side of his work, remains a mystery. For so fine an ear must recognize punched inharmonic tone as distressing in itself. In the bass registers this defect was inevitably present. Likewise there were signs that the pianist was not in his best practice, and the public will probably get the benefit of the frequent recitals in the shape of still more genial and deft performances as the number of concerts go by. There have been better Steinway pianos played upon by visiting artists than the one used by Scharwenka, in tone and apparently in action.

Without being over obvious, it is quite certain that our public will do itself justice only if this artist is received with becoming warmth, for no more popular type of art is to be heard than the facile, ductile and vigorous quality Mr. Scharwenka represents, nor has there ever been witnessed a more unassuming attitude of good-fellowship towards an audience than this genial and well endowed artist ever maintains. LESLEY MARTIN.

Rubber heels: Easy walking, no fatigue. At Diettle's, 235 Bush street.

DRAMATIC NOTES

The success of "Too Much Johnson" at the Alcazar has warranted its continuance for another week. "The Highest Bidder," Southern's old play, succeeds it.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Henschel, the renowned English vocalists and composers will appear in concert at the California next Tuesday and Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoon. Both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will sing songs of their own composition.

The Tivoli has a strong drawing card in the "Geisha." The merry Japanese conceit has found great favor with its tripping melodies and quaint comedy. The houses have been full throughout the week, and from all indications the "Geisha" is in for a long run.

"Under the Red Robe" runs another week at the Baldwin. The next attraction will be the musical comedy, "Lost, Strayed or Stolen," by J. Cheever Goodwin and Woolson Morse. The company, which is large and capable, is headed by Charles Dickson.

Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt announces a recital at Sherman, Clay & Co's Hall on Monday evening, November 1st, under the management of Mr. William L. Greenbaum. Mr. Mansfield will play two entire concertos, besides some Schuman numbers never before heard here in public.

Next week the Columbia presents Corinne in the comic opera success "An American Beauty." Corinne, who is as vivacious and magnetic as ever, is supported by a company of fifty capable people including six comedians and a ballet of thirty ladies. The engagement of one week only will be followed by the Hermans.

The Great American Biograph will be the particular attraction at the Orpheum next week. The scenes presented are entirely new to San Francisco. A novel performance will be given by Mlle. Irma Orbasanky and her troupe of trained cockatoos. Next week will terminate the long engagement of the Knaben-Kapelle.

At Morosco's next week the naval drama, "The Ensign," will be given an elaborate production, with specially prepared scenic and mechanical effects. As the gallant young officer, W. H. Pascoe will have a splendid chance for effective work, and Baby Ruth, who has been specially engaged as little Mary, will bring in a few specialties.

At the Tivoli next Saturday afternoon, Fernando Michelena, the tenor, will receive a rather unique testimonial. The first part will be a grand operatic and classical concert, in which Michelena will give scenes from "Trovatore" and "Lucia," assisted by the Tivoli orchestra and chorus, and Mr. and Mrs. Marquardt with violin and harp. The second part will be "An Afternoon in Spain," consisting of Spanish songs in costume by Michelena and the Spanish Students.

"Scotch and Soda" is the fashionable drink in the East at present, and is fast becoming the fad out here. With a good quality of whisky, such as the "White Horse Cellar" Scotch Whisky, it makes one of the most pleasant and cooling drinks we have tried, and is sure to make a hit.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. For particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

"FOLLOWING THE EQUATOR"

Whimsical History of Mark Twain's Last Lecture-Tour.

At least one critic is satisfied with Mark Twain's new book Following the Equator (American Publishing Company). It is the author himself who declares "I wouldn't trade it for any book I have ever written." It is, as far as one may judge from the extracts, the whimsical narrative of a lecturing tour in two hemispheres—a compound of very eloquent description and shrewd and irreverent comment. That it is not as fresh, vivid or witty as The Innocents Abroad seems proved though it will surely make as readable a volume. One can readily imagine a trip with Mark Twain well worth the taking for he has a singularly graphic way of setting a scene before the mental eye—a knack so many of our alleged stylists lack. Here for instance is the first vista of Honolulu—surely a remarkably fine bit of impressionism.

In the night we anchored a mile from shore. Through my port I could see the twinkling lights of Honolulu and the dark bulk of the mountain range that stretched away right and left. I could not make out the beautiful Nuuana Valley, but I knew where it lay, and remembered how it used to look in the old times. We used to ride up it on horseback in those days—we young people—and branch off and gather bones in a sandy region where one of the first Kamehameha's battles was fought.

We lay in luminous blue water; shoreward the water was green—green and brilliant; at the shore itself it broke in a long white ruffle, and with no crash, no sound that we could hear. The town was buried under a mat of foliage that looked like a cushion of moss. The silky mountains were clothed in soft, rich splendors of melting color, and some of the cliffs were veiled in slanting mists. I recognized it all. It was just as I had seen it long before, with nothing of its beauty lost, nothing of its charm wanting.

There are views, equally vivid, of Sydney and of Bombay, and of the scenery of India. Interspersed with the portraiture of scenery one finds comment, grotesque often, audacious, flippant yet kindly. The pride of the Sydneyites in their harbor suggests the story of the Sydney man who rather objected to Mark giving praise to God for the beauty of the environment. The Australian replied: "It is beautiful, of course it's beautiful—the harbor; but that isn't all of it; it's only half of it. Sydney's the other half, and it takes both of them together to ring the supremacy bell. God made the harbor, and that's all right; but Satan made Sydney."

Like all travelers from Australia to India, Mark Twain stopped off at Ceylon, and here is a humorous portrait of a Cingalese servant:

January 14.—Hotel Bristol. Servant Brampy. Alert, gentle, smiling, winning, young brown creature as ever was. Beautiful shining black hair, combed back like a woman's, and knotted at the back of his head—tortoise shell comb in it, a sign that he is a Singalese; slender, shapely form; jacket; under it a beltless and flowing white cotton gown from neck straight to heel, he and his outfit quite unmasculine. It was an embarrassment to undress before him.

From India the humorist went to the Transvaal, saw the gold mines and the diamond mines and furnishes really a good story of life among the Boers:

"The Boers are a queer lot. I heard more strange stories about them than I can remember. One was that not long ago a Bishop was once making a business progress through a tavernless belt, and one night he stopped with a Boer; after supper, was shown to bed. He undressed, weary and worn out, and was soon sound asleep. In the night he woke up feeling crowded and suffocated, and found the old Boer and his fat wife in bed with him, one on each side, with all their clothes on, and snoring. He had to stay there and stand it—awake and suffering—until toward dawn, when sleep again fell upon him for an hour. Then he woke again. The Boer was gone, but the wife of his bosom was still at his side."

Among the longer episodes are some of an elaborately humorous character. This incident of a fox-hunt certainly induces a smile, but it is rather stagey fun—the labored humor of the comic weeklies.

"When we got to that place I got out, and went and leaned my elbows on a low stone wall which enclosed a turfy and beautiful great field with heavy wood on all sides except ours. Mrs. Blank sat in the dog-cart fifty yards away, which was as near as she could get with the vehicle. I was full of interest, for I had never seen a fox-hunt. I waited, dreaming and imagining, in the deep stillness and impressive tranquility which reigned in that retired spot. Presently, from away off in the forest on the left, a mellow bugle note came floating; then all of a sudden, a multitude of dogs burst out of that forest and went tearing by and disappeared in the forest on the right; there was a pause, and then a cloud of horsemen in black caps and crimson coats plunged out of the left hand forest and went flaming across the field like a prairie fire—a stirring sight to see. There was one man ahead of the rest, and he came spurring straight at me. He was fiercely excited. It was fine to see him ride; he was a master horseman. He came like a storm till he was within seven feet of me, where I was leaning on the wall, then he stood his horse straight up in the air on his hind toenails, and shouted like a demon:

" 'Which way'd the fox go?'

"I didn't much like the tone, but I did not let on, for he was excited, you know. But I was calm; so I said softly, and without acrimony:

" 'Which fox?'

"It seemed to anger him. I don't know why; and he thundered out:

" 'Which fox? Why, the fox. Which way did the fox go?'

"I said with great gentleness—even argumentatively:

"If you could be a little more definite—a little less vague—because I am a stranger, and there are many foxes, as you well know better than I, and unless I know which one it is you desire to identify and——'

" 'You're certainly the damndest idiot that has escaped in a thousand years!' and he snatched his great horse around as easily as I would snatch a cat, and was away like a hurricane. A very excitable man.

"I went to Mrs. Blank and she was excited, too. 'Oh, all alive?' she said.

" 'He spoke to you, didn't he?'

" 'Yes, it is what happened.'

" 'I knew it. I couldn't hear what he said, but I knew he spoke to you! Do you know who it was? It was Lord C—— and he is Master of the Buckhounds! Tell me—what do you think of him?'

" 'Him? Well, for sizing up a stranger, he's got the most sudden and accurate judgment of any man I ever saw.' "

$2,000.00

Can we prove that Schilling's Best baking powder is as good as we say it is?

No; buy it and try it.

SIMONIDES' FORGERY

Max Muller's Memories of an Extraordinary Literary Imposition.

The Rt. Hon. Max Muller, Privy Councillor, philologist, etc., grows garrulous in his olden days. Cosmopolis has an article from his facile pen on "Beggars," and it is really entertaining gossip, detailing Hon. Max's experiences with fakirs. Among them are some sturdy beggars, but it is the impostor type which most interests Hon. Max. Several good yarns he spins, but the most interesting is his story of Simonides' visit to Oxford. Simonides was the great manuscript forger who had taken in the Royal Berlin Academy by means of a palimpest purporting to be the long lost history of Uranios. But the professor tells all the facts:

Fortunately his fame had preceded him. There had been a full account of his doings and misdoings abroad, yet he arrived quite unabashed with a box full of Greek MSS. I had warned our librarian, the Rev. H. O. Coxe, and it was amusing to watch the two when their pourparlers began. Simonides—so called, not because he was a descendent of the poet Simonides, but (with a long i) because his ancestor was one Simon, a Jew—addressed the librarian half in ancient Greek, half in modern English. He knew both equally well. His manners were most engaging. The librarian was equally polite, and began to examine some of the Greek MSS. "These are of small value," Simonides said, "they are modern. What century would you assign to them?" The librarian assigned the thirteenth century to them, and Simonides fully agreed. He then went on producing MS. after MS., but claiming for none of them more than the tenth or ninth century. All went on most amicably, until he produced some fragments of an uncial Greek MS. The librarian opened his eyes wide, and, examining them very carefully, put some of them aside for further consideration. Becoming more and more confident, Simonides at last produced a real treasure. "This," he said, "ought to repose nowhere but in the Bodleian Library. And what century would you assign to it, Mr. Librarian?" Simonides said with a smile and a respectful bow. Mr. Coxe turned over a few pages, and, looking very grave, though never quite without his usual twinkle, "The second half of the nineteenth century, sir," he said, "and now pack up your MSS. and Apage (Begone)."

He was certainly a most extraordinary man—a scholar who, if he had applied his ingenuity to editing instead of forging Greek MSS., might have held a very high position. His greatest achievement was, of course, the newly discovered Greek text of the history of ancient Egypt by Uranios. The man possessed a large quantity of later Greek MSS. It seems that in the Eastern monasteries, where he sold, he also acquired some Greek MSS., by what means we must not ask. He tried several of these MSS. with chemicals to see whether, as was the fashion during the Middle Ages, the parchment on which they were written had been used before, and the old writing scraped off in order to get writing material for some legends of Christian saints or other modern compositions. When that has been the case, chemical appliances bring out the old writing very clearly, and he knew that in this way some very old and valuable Greek texts had been recovered. In that case the old uncial writing comes out generally in a dark blue, and becomes quite legible as underlying the modern Greek text. As Simonides was not lucky enough to discover or recover an ancient Greek text, or what is called a Palimpsest MS., the thought struck him that he might manufacture such a treasure, which would have sold at a very high price. But even this did not satisfy his ambition. He might have taken the text of the Gospels and written it between the lines of one of his modern Greek MSS., adding some startling various readings. In that case detection would have seemed much more difficult. But he soared higher. He knew that a man of the name of Uranios had written a history of Egypt, which was lost. Simonides made up his mind to write himself in ancient Greek a history of Egypt such as he thought Uranios might have written. And, deep and clever as he was, he chose Bunsen's "Egypt" and Lepsius' "Chronology" as the authorities which he faithfully followed. After he had finished his Greek text he wrote it in dark blue ink and in ancient uncial Greek letters between the letters of a Greek MS. of about 1200 A. D. Anybody who knows the smallness of the letters in such a MS. can appreciate the enormous labor it must have been to insert, as it were, beneath and between these minute lines of each letter the supposed earlier writing of Uranios, so that the blue ink should never encroach on the small but true Greek letters. One single mistake would have been fatal, and such is the knowledge which antiquaries now possess of the exact changes of Greek letters in every century that here, too, one single mistake in the outline of the old uncial letters would have betrayed the forger.

When Simonides had finished his masterpiece, he boldly offered it to the highest tribunal, the Royal Berlin Academy. The best chemists of the time examined it microscopically, and could find no flaw. Lepsius, the great Egyptologist, went through the whole text, and declared that the book could not be a forgery, because no one except Uranios could have known the names of the ancient Egyptian kings and the right dates of the various dynasties, which were exactly such as he had settled them in his books. The thought that Simonides might have consulted these very books never entered anybody's mind. Great was the excitement in the camp of the Egyptologists, and, though the price demanded by Simonides was shamefully extravagant, Bunsen persuaded the then King of Prussia, Frederick William IV., to pay it and to secure the treasure for Berlin. Dindorf, the famous Greek scholar, had been intrusted by Simonides with the editing of the text, and he had chosen the Clarendon Press at Oxford to publish the first specimen of it. In the meantime unfavorable reports of Simonides reached the German newspapers, and during a new examination of the MS. some irregularities were detected in the shape of the uncial M, and at last one passage was discovered by a very strong microscope where the blue ink had run across the letters of the modern Greek text. No doubt could then remain that the whole MS. was a forgery.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

BOOK NOTES

The Revolt of a Daughter, by Ellen Olney Kirk (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), comes in one of the prettiest covers of the season—a green affair decorated with sprawling poppies. The story is very much in Mrs. Kirk's usual vein—a narration of the clever doings of rather clever people—in particllar of the daughter who does the revolting. This young woman who is about seventeen and Italian by birth, visits New England with her American mother, twice widowed. She promptly falls in love with her mother's rejected sweetheart—the mother objects—the daughter persists—and herein lies the rebellion. But in all due time, things come to a satisfactory ending and true love finally comes into its own.

D. Appleton & Co., have published a Manual of Physical Drill, by Lieutenant Edmund L. Butts, U. S. A. The object of the manual is to systematize physical training in the army, and as the simplest mode of description, illustration is used. Simple and progressive exercises on the different apparatus, and the principles of wall scaling, climbing, etc., are given as being essential to the athletic training. Methods pursued in preparing for track and field events are added as matters of general interest and information.

A Browning Courtship, and other stories by Eliza Orne White (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), is little above average interest. The title sketch, A Browning Courtship, is rather ordinary, displaying a knowledge of Browning rather than of effective story telling, although the idea is somewhat original. The brightest story in the book is Two Anthors, a pretty, natural tale, simple and agreeably true to nature.

A Nocturne.

"I will arise and go unto my Dear,
And at her tiny mouth this longing slake;
Though she is sleeping and a chanticleer
Marks night's meridian, I'll bid her wake
And walk with me the fields, while lev'rets feed
Where fauns of eld heard Pan's o'ermastering reed."

Then I went out beneath the naked sky,—
Naked, because her vap'ry covering
Lay in that void where Lost Endeavors lie,
Which, when the far-off gods see hovering,
Like wraiths below the edges of our world,
Their lips at Man in proud contempt are curled.

As though the universe knew Mary slept,—
And silence reigned despotic in the spheres,
So motionless was ev'rything except
My heart, whose throb made discord in my ears,
Nor moved there aught in Heaven's blue afar,
Save, twitching noislessly, one nervous star.

It was a night such as the first night was,
When God, sole witness of the darkened earth,
Before dividing by omnipotent laws
Those elements akin to death and birth
Stood meditating on what should be done
Ere He conceived the image of the sun.

Then all desireless I walked alone,
Long in the mighty awe midnight inspires;
I heard a tremor from the dim Unknown,
Felt Hope replenish her low altar-fires,
And dying faith in Man new life-lease take,
But did not say, nor care to say: "Awake!"

—Ralph Johnson in the Chap-Book.

Do You Want Gold?

Everyone desiring to keep informed on Yukon, the Klondyke and Alaskan gold fields. Send 10 cents for large Compendium of vast information and big color map to Hamilton Publishing Company, Hamilton, Indiana.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

The Macmillan Company's

NEW BOOKS

F. Marion Crawford's

CORLEONE

A story involving the love affairs of our old friend Don Orsino Saracinesca, with Vittoria, a beautiful Sicilian girl who has the misfortune to belong to "the worst blood in Italy." The book is not in any degree a sequel to any other, but an independent story, dealing, however, with the fortunes of a family in which many of Mr. Crawford's readers will take especial interest, because one or another member of it has appeared in his other novels.

2 Vols., Cloth, Extra, Price, $2.

Old English Love Songs.

A Companion Volume to the Old English Ballads.

ILLUSTRATED BY GEORGE WHARTON EDWARDS WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY HAMILTON W. MABIE

With full-page illustration, head and tail pieces, etc. In brief, one of the most beautiful of the holiday gift-books. Specially designed cover, gilt top.

Price, Cloth, $2.

Limited edition, Buckram, $5.00 net.

A Forest Orchid and Other Tales.

By ELLA HIGGINSON,
Author of "From the Land of the Snow Pearls: tales of the Puget Sound," etc.

Cloth, Crown 8vo., $1.50.

The Public Opinion said: "The merit of Mrs. Higginson's Stories is their painstaking fidelity to truth. It is of the new Northwest that she writes, and for the most part of the Puget Sound country."

The Old Santa Fe Trail.

By COL. HENRY INMAN,
Late of the U. S. Army.

Cloth, 8vo., $3.50

The book is one of unusual interest, especially to those who knew the States west of the Mississippi in the time of the stage coach, to say nothing of the "prairie schooner," or the even earlier pack mule and train. Colonel Inman has added to a long personal experience of life on the plains, unusual opportunities of hearing the traditions of the Trail; has known and talked with all of the best-known scouts and hunters, and from the riches of their experience his book is full. Kit Carson, Buffalo Bill, Old Jim Bridger, and many another contribute to the often thrilling, sometimes amusing, always intensely interesting story.

A Map of the Trail.

Illustrations by Frederick Remington.

PUBLISHED BY

The Macmillan Company

66 Fifth Avenue, New York

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 Post St.

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

| | |
|---|---|
| Guarantee Capital and Surplus | $2,040,201 66 |
| Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash | 1,000,000 00 |
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | 27,730,247 45 |

OFFICERS

President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS

B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

| | |
|---|---|
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | $22 886,377 |
| Paid Up Capital and Surplus | 1,594,503 |

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS

GEORGE W. BEAVER, ROBERT WATT, THOMAS MAGEE, GEO. C. BOARDMAN, W. C. B. DE FREMERY, DANIEL E. MARTIN, ALBERT MILLER, GEO FASHEIRA, E. B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

Royal and Queen Ins. Cos.

Have removed their offices to the Royal Insurance Building, Northwest Corner of Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco.

Combined Assets Over $52,000,000

ROLLA V. WATT, - Pacific Coast Manager

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid Up Capital | $250,000 |
| Cash Reserve Fund | 25,000 |

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.
We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A D 1726

Capital Paid Up, $3,406,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

B. J. SMITH, Assistant Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
501 Montgomery Street

CONNECTICUT

FIRE INS. CO

OF HARTFORD

Assets. $3,300,000. BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager.

COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
501 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.
Telephone Main 5697.

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty
NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F
Telephone 305

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

News of the Football Field, with Side Notes on Athletic Affairs.

California's game against Reliance on Saturday last was a blending of common-place and brilliant football. None of the players except Hall showed remarkable form, and he only on the offensive. Though his defense was showy and sure, he did not go fast into the line to meet the runner before a gain was made. Hall allowed his man to make feet or yards and then brought him down hard and without further advance. When Berkeley's captain remedies this fault his game will be very strong. Bender as quarter was steady, but proved to those who have watched both men that he is outclassed by Haskell. Bender will be a first class man, though, in case Haskell's injuries do not allow the ex-captain to play. Those who have California's interests at heart sincerely hope this may not be, as they deem Haskell one of the mainstays of the eleven. It is no discredit to Bender, or to those who directed the U. C. players on Saturday, to say that with Haskell at quarter to handle the men their play would have been 25 per cent more effective.

* *

Football comparisons are always futile. To draw parallels between the play of the two colleges at present is impossible. Neither one nor the other is playing football. With them both it is a time of experiment, of hammering the principles of the game into green men and of shifting and changing in general. Now, the coaches are beginning to decide which men will be of value to their teams, and the style of play they have chosen. From this on there will be less trying of men in this or that position, more energy will be put to developing team work and in laying out novel and effective plans of attack and defense. The coach who can hammer green material into a stiff, fairly capable line and develop good backs from new men is not always the man to round the team into its best playing form. Mr. Nott has proven his ability to teach the game to beginners. If he be only half so successful in doing what remains to be done, California will have an eleven, victor vanquished, that the college need not be ashamed of.

* *

Nott's judgment in backs was vindicated by the work of the men. Griesberg's fumbling may be excused when we consider his greenness; and the probabilities all favor his overcoming this fault in the weeks of practice before Thanksgiving. Instead of weakening the center by his withdrawal Nott has strengthened it, especially on the defense, by utilizing Griesberg's great agility to aid any point of the centre that may be menaced. Kaarsberg and Mayer won their spurs, both playing good but not brilliant games, and both promising improvement. Barnes did not play up to his best; both tackles, in fact, disobeyed instructions by playing too close in, and so robbed us of a chance to gauge Nott's defense. Craig who was put in with some misgiving proved, next to Hall, to be the best individual of the eleven, and showed that experience and persistence count in foot ball as well as in anything else. The centre men did much better than was expected and can be worked up into an adequate trio.

* *

The hard and thoroughly good tackling of California was apparent throughout the game. That they seemed to play the better game was due to this and to Hall's good running. Reliance game is not to be taken as any criterion of their play. The athletic clubs always slump about mid-season. The absence of a number of good men made them fall far short of the standard they set in previous games. With the simplest kind of straight plays California gained, and was usually able to stop attacks directed at any other point than tackle.

* *

I know that every lover of the game and well wisher of the Universities hopes with me that the two colleges have learned by experience and that they will profit by the lessons to be learned from the officialing of the games that have been played this year. There is no comment to be made on the rulings that gave Reliance a touch down and lost them a goal. Such things are matters to be left entirely to the official judgment. When Captains engage in debate with the referee or umpire about a decision they not only lower their dignity, but they do decided injury to the game by disgusting the spectators. People pay to see the game played and really care little one way or another for decisions unless they are manifestly unfair. No one could accuse Fickert or Carle of unfairness. Such points as have come up for discussion on the field this season might well, if developed during the intense partisan strain of the Thanksgiving game, threaten the pleasant athletic relations of the two colleges. The character necessary to make a correct decision at the moment it is demanded is not possessed by every man. Not every one can watch the play properly, and some who can do that can not be absolutely impartial, for one side or the other is apt to engage a man's sympathies during a hard fought game, no matter how impartial he may have been at the kick off. Add to this the fact that every man in this vicinity, whose football knowledge might lead him to be considered a possible referee or umpire, is to a greater or less degree interested in the outcome of the game, and it will be seen that the colleges were wise in the days when they sent to the North for Carter and (?) to act.

* *

If these gentlemen are not to be secured again surely the managers of the two elevens can find, either in the Northwest or in Denver, two others, who while strictly non-partisan, will have the requisite knowledge and decision to make them acceptable officials. Not only should such gentlemen be secured but they should be secured very soon. The sooner the better.

* *

The captains of elevens ought to insist that no man on the team save themselves has anything to say during a game. Such a rule, strictly enforced, would please the spectators, who are not edified when the current of interest in a fast game is broken by players disputing with the officials. Had Reliance yielded the point on Saturday, the college men would have lost five minutes' chance to recuperate, and in all probability sharp play would have forced them for another touchdown.

* *

Besides laudation of stars, California's coach has to contend with the spirit that has kept Harvard's colors lowered for so long. There are too many fingers in the pie at Berkeley. Executive athletic committees should recognize the right of a coach to supreme control, and use their power only to support and strengthen him—never to interfere in any way with his policy. A glance at the work of the eleven ought to convince any one that Holt is master of his business. It is true that former elevens have showed better team form at this time in the season, but never has it been necessary to teach so many tyros the A B C's of the game. In spite of this, no California eleven has known, this early, so much of the kind of football it should, and so little it should not. There has been no attempt to develop team work—the men have been learning their positions, and Thanksgiving Day will show the wisdom of the course. Whether victory or defeat fall to them, certainly the eleven will be a better trained one than California has had in the field for some years, and, I believe, will show greater knowledge of the essential points of the game than any team that has ever come out of Berkeley. When these essentials have been learned the eleven will round into team form very rapidly. Then the malcontents who are grumbling now will be singing the praises of their coach.

* *

To find efficient guards and ends is evidently going to give Mr. Nott more trouble than the filling of any other positions. Among the many candidates for tackle, there are a number of men who promise well. Nott is losing no sleep over backs—he has plenty of them, and good ones, too. Greisberg, when he learns to pass the ball better, will give a good account of himself at center. Hooper and Ludlow are the most formidable candidates for the guard positions. The former is light and inexperienced, but he learns fast and plays with a snap that ought to make him efficient. He reminds one of McMillan, who was the best guard that ever wore the cardinal of Stanford. A question that was asked often during the memorable slaughter of the U. C. hopes last year was, "What is wrong with Ludlow?" Why he, with his magnificent physical equipment and good head should have been so overwhelmingly outplayed was a mystery. The same thing happened in the first U. C. game. Ludlow, it is true, made a number of good stops, but time and again he was boxed, or shouldered out of the play, all because he did not watch the ball. He keeps his attention fastened on the backs. Watching the opposing backs may be good policy for some, but Ludlow will never reach the point of play he ought until he learns to keep the ball in sight while he watches his opponent. If he can learn to do this he ought to become as effective as any man on the coast.

* *

One of the reasons advanced by the Olympic Club for withdrawing from the old association was that the representation allowed them was inadequate. The club argues fairly enough that so powerful an institution as they are, representing many branches of athletics and hundreds of members, should have more voice in the affairs of any body to which they may belong than an institution like the Lurline Swimming Club, with less than half a hundred members, all devoted to one branch of sport. This club and the boating and boxing clubs had all an equal voice in government with the Olympic and Reliance clubs—a state of affairs that was manifestly unjust to the Olympic Club. The same complaint is being raised in the East, especially in New York. The large clubs, such as the New York and New Jersey Athletic Clubs, are chafing because the innumerable petty clubs in and about city have equal voice with them in all islation for the Metropolitan district. fact is that the A. A. U. is in a bad way. T Pacific Coast branch of it is as well conducted as can be by men who are earnest and honest in their zeal for amateur sport. There are few other such branches. In the East professionalism is countenanced.

* *

Wefers, the greatest of runners, has been proven a professional, and the proofs have been in the hands of the A. A. U. officials for months. Yet because he is a wonderful performer, and because he is such a drawing card that his name on a programme will bring profit to the club on whose grounds he appears, he is still competing as an amateur. His is not the only case of professionalism known to the A. A. U. officials that they have ignored for just such reasons or for others equally unwarranted. The officers of the association seem to have no thought for the best interests of athletics. Anything to secure re-election appears to be their motto. Friends must be made even if it is necessary at frequent intervals to shut the eyes to rank professionalism in order to retain them. One man high in authority is advertising agent for A. G. Spalding & Co., the athletic goods firm. To him the Union is but a means to advance his employer's business interests. Protests, unless they come from people powerful enough to advance the interests of these able governors, are unnoticed, or noticed only to be used later as political levers. So demoralized is the organization at headquarters, that had the Olympic Club been an institution known to stand for the best in amateur athletics, its defection would have been the sign for a breaking up of the A. A. U. The new association fathered by the Olympic Club might have been the leader in a national movement, the dean of an athletic organization that would enforce and guard amateurism in the length and breadth of this country. Even now there is a chance. If the Olympic Club is in earnest, and will support Judge Lawler, Howard Taylor and the other men who have the real interest of athletics at heart, a way may be found to better conditions on the coast.

* *

The two colleges are out of place in the Pacific Association. Membership in it is unnecessary and undesirable to them, and they are seriously considering withdrawal. Both are in the Western Intercollegiate. This affords them all the athletic protection they need. For that matter a Pacific Coast intercollegiate could readily be arranged and might be of value. In case the colleges did withdraw the backbone would be taken from the association. The Reliance Club would then be the only powerful organization left in it. Such a condition of affairs would offer opportunity for men like Judge Lawler and Messrs. Humphrey, Eliott and Taylor to build a new league on the ruins of the two bodies that now exist. Such an organization wisely planned and firmly ruled might grow to be a national affair. The time is ripe, and the A. A. U. demoralized. The possibilities of such a movement are great, its success depends only on whether the Olympic Club is sincere, and will be persistent in its newly avowed friendship for the truly amateur in sport.

ROBERT PORTER.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

$100—Reward—$100

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.
Address F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.
Sold by druggists, 75c.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best

"GOLD SEAL"
"BADGER"
"PIONEER"

Rubber Goods

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.

MANUFACTURER OF

OIL CLOTHING

R. H. PEASE
Vice-President and Manager

573-575-577-579 Market Street
SAN FRANCISCO

73-75 First Street, Portland, Or.

SATISFACTORY TO THE EYE AND EAR

BYRON MAUZY PIANOS
308-314 POST ST.

THE Old Government
THE PERFECTION of WHISKY
MATURED and BOTTLED in BOND
THE U.S. GOVERNMENT
guarantees the age and purity
We guarantee the quality unexcelled
FOR SALE BY PRINCIPAL DEALERS.
William Wolff & Co.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
DISTRIBUTORS.

Baldwin Theatre
AL. HAYMAN & CO (Inc.) . . . . . Proprietors
Next Week, Second and Last Week
The Brilliant Romance in Four Acts
Under the Red Robe
Adapted by Edward Rose
From the novel by Stanley Weyman, as performed for over three hundred nights at the Empire Theatre, New York
Monday, November 1st, "Lost, Strayed or Stolen"

Columbia Theatre
FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers
One Week Only!
Commencing Monday, Oct. 25th. Matinee Saturday
CORINNE
And Opera-Comique Company, direction of Rich & Maeder—the Great New York Casino Success
AN AMERICAN BEAUTY
SEE the Gay Casino Girls; the six Funny Comedians; the Circus at Newport; Corinne on the Elephant.
HEAR the Love Song; the many Tuneful Airs; the Grand Chorus of Thirty Voices.
ENJOY the Wealth of Magnificent Scenery; the Most Gorgeous Production; the Elaborate Costuming.
November 4th, the Great Herrmanns.

Orpheum
Week beginning Monday, Oct. 25th
THE AMERICAN BIOGRAPH, the Greatest of Projecting Machines
MISS IRMA OREASANY and Her Great Flock of Performing Cockatoos
JENNIE & ARTHUR DUNN, the Diminutive Duo
OLA HAYDEN, Renowned Contra-Tenor Vocalist
MISS EDNA COLLINS, Phenomenal Whistling Artiste
And Others—Nineteen Great Artists in All
Last week of the KNABEN-KAPELLE
Reserved Seats 25c.; Balcony 10c.; Opera Chairs and Box Seats 50c. Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday.

Tivoli Opera House
MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager
Every Evening at 8 sharp
Brilliant Opening of the Comic Opera Season
The Japanese Musical Comedy
THE GEISHA
Superb Cast, including Edwin Stevens, Robert Dunbar, Thos. C. Leary, Phil. Branson, Florence Wolcott, Edith Hall, Tillie Salinger, Georgie Cooper.
Splendid Chorus! Ezcellent Orchestra!
Magnificent Appointments!
Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre
FRED BELASCO : . : : . : Manager
Phone Main 254
For Week of October 25th. Usual Matinee Saturday
BUSINESS WARRANTS IT?
The public's appreciation causes the management to continue for another week William Gillette's Great Comedy
Too Much Johnson
Handsomely staged and carefully acted! Perfect in scenic detail and environment!
Prices, including Reserved Seat, 50, 35, 25 or 15c.
November 1st, "The Highest Bidder."

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager
Last four performances of the Comedy-Drama FRIENDS
Monday, October 25th, Fourth Week of the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H. Pascoe, in the Glorious Naval Drama
THE ENSIGN
With Marvelous Scenic and Mechanical Effects and a Strong Cast!
Eve Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD LANE
LANE & LANE
Attorneys and Counselors
Room 202
Crocker Building, San Francisco

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, FIRE TILE, ETC. GLADDING, McBEAN & CO. SAN FRANCISCO. WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

FINANCE AND TRADE

Bullion Shipments — Stocks and Shares —The Produce Market.

Thursday Evening.

While the tendency in foreign centers is towards dearer money, the rates of discount having recently advanced in London, Paris and Berlin, the strong positiou of the banks in the Uuited States in respect of reserves, at the present time, and the absencc just now of any speculative movement in the stock markets, encourage the belief that in the immediate future there will be no appreciable advance in the value of money on this side. The chief conditions that engage attention are the enormous increase in the volume of trade throughout the country, large additions to railway earnings, and the means to be taken for retaining the gold from abroad which has lately been coming forward, but is liable to reflow in the usual course of events. As the winter approaches more nearly money may become dearer.

A further consignment of 450,000 sovereigns arrived here from Sydney to-day per steamer "Alameda," making the total value of gold shipments from the Australian colonies since August last $8,250,000.

In silver an advance has to be recorded, a point having been reached that has not been touched since July last. Bars have been in good demand locally at 59¼, and large shipments have been made to the Orient, where there is considerable activity accordihg to the latest advices. Nevertheless, the future of the white metal is exceedingly uncertain, its position being rendered the more sensitive by the continuing doubt as to international agreement with regard to bi-metallism.

During the period under review the local Bond market has for the most part presented a strong front, first class issues being in good demand at slightly enhanced prices. The securities of the Southern Pacific railway have been firm at higher prices. Market-Street railway 5 per cent bonds have been enquired for at 110.

For the new bonds of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley railroad the demand has continued to be very keen, the syndicate having declined to receive any further bids for the next instalment to be placed on the market.

For Spring Valley water stock the inquiry has been somewhat light, but the value has been well maintained since our last report, and the price closing to-day at 99½ shows a slight improvement, after allowing for the recent dividend.

Mutual Electric has taken a little spurt, owing to the reports that the company is doing a good business. Gas stocks have exhibited signs of weakness generally, due to a persistent rumor, which has been going the rounds, of fresh opposition in the field. The story cannot be traced to any particular source, but it has undoubtedly exercised a weakening effect. Gas and Electric are quoted 96¼, while for Pacific Gas Improvement there is no demand.

In the Share market the Banks generally remain very firm. Bank of California have changed hands at 241 and are still enquired for at that figure.

In the Miscellaneous division there have been considerable sales of Vigorit Powder at 3⅝, 3⅞. Alaska Packers Association have been dealt in at 98¼. Sugar stocks are steady but inactive, and probably will be the medium of but little business between now and the meeting of Congress, when Hawaiian affairs will come up for decision.

The local grain market has been dull and unsettled, although the feeling has somewhat improved since the beginning of the week. A reduction in the estimated requirements of European countries and a reported increase in visible supplies have produced a somewhat uneasy feeling for the moment. December No. 1 has been dealt in to-day at 1.47½.

Encouraging reports are coming to hand of the vintage throughout the State, and though the price of grapes in the leading vineyard districts is somewhat irregular, about $10 per ton being the more general figure, growers are in sight of a satisfactory outcome of their year's work. The crop is expected to be considerably above the average and the Eastern demand for California wine is found to be steadily on the increase.

Live Stock continues in good inquiry, and is firmly held. Owing to the receipt of large supplies of hogs, both here and in Chicago, rates have been slightly irregular, and at times somewhat easier, otherwise the general tone of the meat market is distinctly upward.

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

TURF TOPICS

The Coming Ingleside Meeting — Stud-Book Registration—Horse Shows.

The publication by the Pacific Coast Jockey Club of the book programme for the first two weeks of their meeting, beginning on November 1st, reminds us of the near approach of our winter racing season. On Wednesdays and Saturdays of each week there will be six events and on the other days five races each day. The purses vary from $350 to $500 each and four stake events are also set for decision.

Messrs. J. A. Murphy and J. W. Wilson will preside in the judges' stand, Captain Rees, who acted here last year, being prevented for private reasons from coming to California. Starter Caldwell will be on duty at the gate.

The patrons of Ingleside and Oakland will find many improvements on the tracks since last season, both places beginning to take on a finished appearance, and many little touches having been given which will add to the comfort and convenience of the general public and all who are engaged in racing. It is proposed to improve the street-car service to Ingleside on race-days by running more through cars and expediting the service by more frequent trips than formerly.

Amongst the strings that have recently arrived are those of Edward Corrigan, Burns & Waterhouse and Atkin & Lottridge. The first-named lot are stabled at Ingleside and the two others at Oakland. James McCormick, who was so ill last winter and unable to come to California, is again in command of the Burns & Waterhouse training operations.

The Harlem meeting is reported to have been a great success, and racing men have been glad to see the sport flourishing again in Chicago. It means improved prospects for breeders, who have undoubtedly suffered to a considerable extent by the closing of important tracks in that city and elsewhere. So long as racing is subject to the attacks of would-be legislators and the disagreements of associations owning race-courses, owners and breeders of blood-stock are greatly prejudiced and their property severely depreciated. There seems reason to hope that next summer there will be racing at Chicago on the same scale as in former years. The present meeting at Harlem will continue for another week or so, making about ninety days racing there altogether, and a total of some $230,000 distributed in purses.

Of the three Ormonde yearlings recently shipped to Mr. W. O'B. Macdonough in New York from his Menlo Park stud, two are now advertised for sale. These are the colt out of Jongleuse by Alarm and the filly out of Dizzy Blonde by Chillicothe. If not sold privately they will be put up at public auction on the 26th instant at Morris Park. These youngsters are the first of imp. Ormonde's get that have been offered for sale in this country.

Owners and breeders should not forget that Stud book registration is a matter requiring immediate attention, as the rules of The Jockey require that foals shall be registered before Nov. 1st. of the year of foaling, if it is intended to race them on courses under the auspices of The Jockey Club. The American Stud Book, now the property and under the control of The Jockey Club, is open for the registration of all thoroughbred horses, no matter of what year or what time presented. The fee charged is $2.00 per head. No charge is made for claiming names nor for recording brood mares.

This is evidently going to be a banner horse-show year and San Francisco is out of the running, having failed to stay, although getting the start of several other centers. The Chicago event looks most promising. Pittsburg has just had its first show, which was most liberally supported, while the Kansas City and St. Louis undertakings both met with success. All of these cities took up the modern horse show movement at a later date than San Francisco.

BENEDICT.

Glorious Weather.

Away from the city's fog and wind, away from the distracting noise and dust, to where your nerves can get perfect rest—to Byron Hot Springs, where the Autumn days are something always to be remembered with pleasure. The Mineral Spring Baths will bring you renewed health and courage. The Mud Baths remove every vestige of your Rheumatism, and you will come away from Byron full of life and in good spirits.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....
SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.
Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World
88,000 IN USE
SOLD ON EASY TERMS
BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents
16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE—Extra
Saturday Afternoon, October 30th, at 2:15
FERNANDO MICHELENA
THE RENOWNED TENOR
In Scenes from "Trovatore" and "Lucia" and "An Afternon in Spain."
MRS. MARQUARDT, Harpist
JOHN MARQUARDT, Violinist
SIGNOR CRUELLO, Pianist
THE FAMOUS SPANISH STUDENTS
AND THE TIVOLI CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA
Admission 50 cents, including Reserved Seat
Box office now open.

THE MUSICAL EVENT OF THE SEASON!
CALIFORNIA THEATRE
THREE SONG RECITALS
BY
Mr. and Mrs. Georg-Henschel
The Renowned English Vocalists
Tuesday Evg., Oct. 26th. Thursday Evg., Oct. 28th
Saturday Afternoon, Oct. 30th
Reserved Seats $1.50 Admission, $1.00
Sale of seats opens Saturday, October 23d, at the San Francisco Piano and Music Co., 225 Sutter street, above Kearny.

SHERMAN & CLAY HALL
Monday Evening, November 1st, at 8:15
PIANO RECITAL
BY HUGO MANSFELDT
Great Programme, including Grieg and Liszt Concertos!
Admission, One Dollar, including Reserved Seat

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE
BARE THIS LABEL ON
Stewart Hartshorn
AND SEE THAT YOU GET THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

DIVIDEND NOTICE

Dividend No. 48 (Thirty cents per share) of the HUTCHINSON SUGAR PLANTATION COMPANY will be payable at the office of the Company, 327 Market street, on and after Wednesday, October 20, 1897.

Transfer books will close Thursday, October 14th, 1897, at 3 o'clock p.m.

E. H. SHELDON,
Secretary.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Belcher Silver Mining Company

Assessment No. 56
Amount per share, 20 cents
Levied September 18, 1897
Delinquent in office, October 21, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock, Nov. 11, 1897.
C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.
Office, room 37, Mills Building San Francisco.

United States Laundry
Office 1004 Market St.
TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte: "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

---

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY
SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 [illegible] pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas..... | 4 [illegible] am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City ..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

---

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Stmr. Pomona, 2 p.m. October 1, 5, 9, 13, 18, 22, 26, 30; November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28.

For Newport, Los Angeles and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Oct. 1, 5, 9, 13, 17, 21, 25, 29 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, Redondo--Los Angeles--and Newport, at 11 a.m. Oct. 3, 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27, 31 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, Stmr. Orizaba, 10 a.m. the 2d each month

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

---

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov. 2 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.
S. S. "Alameda," for Australia, Thursday, Nov. 11 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO General Agents

---

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
24 Montgomery Street

---

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

The firm of JOE POHEIM is the largest in the United States. Rules for self-measurement and samples of cloth sent free.

201 and 203 Montgomery St. cor. Bush.
844 & 846 Market St. 1110 & 1112 Market St.
SAN FRANCISCO.
485 Fourteenth St., Oakland. 603 & 605 K St., Sacramento.
143 South Spring St., Los Angeles.

---

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

---

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

---

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE——

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets

Steamer and Train Service a specialty Phone 1950

---

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

---

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

---

THE LATEST STYLES IN

CHOICE WOOLENS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.
Merchant Tailors
623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel
Bicycle and Golf Suits

---

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

---

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, bookbinders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.
TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST
BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. . ALSO . .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company . . Pacific Coast
Baltimore Sole Agents

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS
ELECTRICAL CO

523 Mission St., San Francisco

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.
Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1878. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.
UNDERTAKERS

641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb
Telephone Main 43

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Anthony Trollope, the well-known novelist, while in the employ of the London Postoffice, was passing one day through the money order office to his own room and distinctly saw a letter-sorter abstract a sovereign from a letter and put it in his pocket. The man was given into custody, committed to prison, and brought to trial. The only witness was the gentleman who saw the theft committed. At the close of the examination for the prosecution, the counsel for the prisoner thus addressed the witness—"I believe, sir, besides holding an appointment in the Postoffice, you are a popular author?" The reply was in the affirmative. "Pray, sir, what may be the class of books you write?" "Works of imagination." "Works of imagination, fiction, lies? Pray, sir, how long is it since you first began to gain your livelihood in part by such an occupation?" "Nine years." "Your mother, I believe, was also an author and wrote similar books. May I ask for how many years she gained a livelihood by doing so?" "Twenty." Then turning to the jury, the counsel said: "Gentlemen, I am sure no British jury will convict the prisoner upon the unsupported evidence of a person who comes here and tells you that he has for nine years gained a part of his livelihood by telling lies, and that his mother before him had followed the same calling for twenty years." Notwithstanding the judge's summing up, the jury acquitted the prisoner, probably never having heard Trollope's name until he appeared in the witness-box.

Haweis, in his reminiscences, tells of an extraordinary courtship in Union County, Tennessee. "I was in the 'frog-pond' district of the county, when a young man rode up in front of the cabin where I was stopping and spoke to a girl who was dipping water from a spring. 'Howdy, Sal?' 'Howdy, Tom?' 'Come jump on the hoss an' go to Erwin with me.' 'What fur?' 'Ter git married.' 'But yo hain't done co'ted me yit.' 'I know I hain't; but I've been too pestered with work. I allus intended to marry yer, though.' 'But I haint got no clo's,' remonstrated the girl. 'Well, we'll ride on yon side of Erwin to Sister Mag's in the cove, and I'll git yer a dress.' 'Sho'ly, Tom?' 'Sho'ly, Sal.' 'What kin' of a dress?' 'Best thar is in Lowe's sto'.' Not another word was said. Sal dropped the bucket, and jumped upon the horse, shouting to her mother, 'Mam, me an' Tom is goin' ter git married at Erwin! We'll be by here in tha mornin'. The mother started as if to call her back; but the horse was galloping down the lane, and she went and carried off the bucket of water without comment."

There was a controversy at the French Academy of Sciences in which Pasteur figured actively. It was in regard to a problem in bacteriology, and two men who were not distinguished in that line opposed the great scientist's position. He heard them patiently, and then rose, and, with much animation, answered them to the satisfaction of every one present; but in the excitement of the controversy forgot himself a little. Turning to the two men, he said, "Do you know what you lack? You"—indicating one of them—"lack the power of observation; and you"—the other—"lack the reasoning faculty!" There was an outcry at this, and Pasteur was rebuked by the president for exceeding the proper limits. Pasteur saw that the rebuke was just. "I am sorry," he said; "I was carried away by the heat of the discussion. I beg the pardon of the members to whom I have referred, and of this honorable body." Then Pasteur added, "Having recognized my fault, may I not mention an extenuating circumstance in my favor? All that I said was true—absolutely true!"

A Glasgow professor who was visiting Canada with the British Association in 1884 was desirous of seeing something of Northwestern life, and for this purpose repaired to an Alberta ranch. "I fixed him up as well as I could," the rancher relates, "but he complained that he did not like sleeping with his clothes on. So after the first night I stretched a cowskin across the shack, and told him he might undress if he liked. He took off most of his garments and put on a long white night dress. In the morning my foreman came in while the gentleman was still sleeping. Observing the white night dress, he said, in a whisper, 'Rather sudden—eh?' 'What?' I asked. 'The death of the old man.' 'He's not dead—he's asleep,' I explained. 'Then what's he wearin' them b'iled clothes for?' was the reply. 'Never saw a chap laid out in b'iled clothes afore, 'cept he were dead.'"

A gentleman recently had occasion to visit a village in the county of Durham, where his host was a pitman, who, like the majority of his class, liked to make the most of life as he found it. Entering into conversation with his guest, he invited him to take a drink with him, but the gentleman replied that he was a teetotaller. "Well, ye'll hev a pipe o' baccy wiv us?" said the hospitable pitman. "No, thank you—smoking does not agree with me." "Then hev a pinch o' snuff?" "No, I do not like the habit." "Ma sakes! Hev ye a dog?" "No—unfortunately, I do not possess a dog." "Mercy on us—ye divvent drink, ye divvent smoke, ye divvent snuff, ye hev no greyhoond—an' ye caall yorsel a man?"

In a certain county where Quakers were numerous the entire body, on one occasion, gathered together for one of their periodical meetings. After the exercises of the morning a public luncheon was held, at which all the friends attended. The conversation turned to matrimony. "Bridget," said an unmannerly youthful member of the society, speaking across the table to a prim, elderly maiden lady' "wilt thou tell me why thou hast never married?" "Certainly, friend William," replied Bridget, in a voice audible over the room. "'Tis because I am not so easy pleased as thy wife was."

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION

IN

THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

St. Denis
Broadway and Eleventh St.
NEW YORK
OPPOSITE GRACE CHURCH
EUROPEAN PLAN

In a modest and unobtrusive way there are few better conducted hotels in the Metropolis than the St. Denis
The great popularity it has acquired can readily be traced to its unique location, its homelike atmosphere, the peculiar excellence of its cuisine, and its very moderate prices.

William Taylor & Son.

Hotel Bella Vista
1001 PINE STREET
Elegant Furnishings and Apartments
DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED
MRS. A. F. TRACY.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED
OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Hotel Rafael
SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Sanitarium, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Magnificent Scenery and Drives. The thermometer averages for the winter months 64 degrees, excelling that of the famed Mentone, France.

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments

R. H. WARFIELD CO.
(Incorporated) Proprietors

The Hotel Richelieu
N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.
PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO
HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

PIPER HEIDSIECK
PLUG
TOBACCO
CHAMPAGNE FLAVOR

A SURPRISE FOR YOU

when you ask for the new five-cent piece Piper Heidsieck Plug Tobacco—40 per cent. larger and better than ever—just try it.

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 44 SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 30, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

THE STARR KING MONUMENT IN GOLDEN GATE PARK

Photo by Taber

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 30, 1897

CONTENTS

| | |
|---|---|
| Editorials | 2 |
| The Question of Expert Testimony: by George Franklin Shiels | 2 |
| The French Mastery of Style: by William Henry Hudson | 2 |
| Things and People: by Boswell Jr. | 3-5 |
| The Comic Opera Season at the Tivoli; photos by Marceau | 6 |
| "The Associated Un-Charities": a Story by Frank Norris | 7 |
| Views of Sutter's Fort: by F. M. Braddock | 8 |
| How San Francisco Lives; by John Bonner | 9 |
| "Sutter's Fort": a Poem by Lucius Harwood Foote | 9 |
| A Debutante's Diary | 10 |
| The Theatres | 11 |
| Genius and Matrimony; a Review by C. | 12 |
| Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter | 13 |
| Turf Topics; by Benedict | 14 |
| Finance and Trade | 14 |
| "On the Heights": a Review of Lucius H. Foote's Poems | 14 |
| New Stories Re-Told | 16 |

"REGULATING" INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Insurance Commissioner Clunie is reported to be busily attempting to "regulate" the corporations that are unhappily engaged in the business of guaranteeing the California property-holder against losses by fire. While there has not yet arisen any public demand, great or small, for such "regulation," doubtless in circles where the ownership of property is regarded as a badge of crime, his performances will be regarded with much favor, for they promise well, in the line of destruction. It would seem to be only necessary in California to embark in a business enterprise, the conduct of which involves a contact with a large number of customers throughout the State, to immediately give birth to a desire, in the breast of some one, to "regulate" the enterprise. Complaints from patrons themselves may be infrequent; indeed there may be none at all; but the element of the community that never transacted a dollar's worth of business with the concern, seem to delight in the agitation and regard it as a holy duty to protect the citizens who are really interested, against a wrong that does not exist. It is a queer phase of human nature, but it is a phase nevertheless, that the loudest complaints against imaginary "public wrongs" emanate from those who would be least affected by the wrongs if they had existence.

The insurance situation in California is about this. Up to three years ago there was in operation here a compact under which the companies engaged in that business sold insurance at a fixed, uniform rate for each class of risk. So far as the public were informed the object and result of the compact lay in the uniformity of the rate, but of that, more anon. Dissensions arose, and the compact was broken. For three years past rates have been demoralized and cut to a point which, if maintained, would render the policy in the hands of the insured, a worthless bit of meaningless paper. Insurance that does not insure is valueless. The policy of insurance is a promissory note made payable when a certain contingency arises. Its value depends wholly upon the solvency of its maker, its cost upon the risk taken. In life insurance they have a mortality table, and men wise in such matters have long ago mapped out the course that Prudence points. It is clear as a mariner's chart, deviate from it and danger abounds on either side, and ultimate ruin is inevitable. Experience in such matters has been bought most dearly by many an unfortunate. In fire insurance they have an "experience table." It has been demonstrated that unless the past be taken as a guide to measure off the risks, the advantages and disadvantages that attend them, rates must be made unnecessarily high or unreasonably low. Neither condition is healthy nor to be desired. The man of insurance deals in probabilities, not in certainties; he has no other guide but that of experience. His own experience alone will not answer. If he base his present rates upon last year's successful business he is very likely to come face to face with bankruptcy the next. So insurance companies have established a practice, that is world wide, of coming together and basing their rates upon the combined experience of all. They agree, besides, to share common expenses for the common good tending in the direction of economy of management, the support of fire companies and trained corps of men to preserve threatened property whether it is insured or not. It is against this compact that a warfare is now threatened. All of the companies have not joined the compact. Several large institutions still cut the rates. There is no monopoly or trust. The cheaper rate that grows out of competition, is open to the insured; but not among the companies who have based their rates upon a combined experience table.

So far as investigating the solvency of these companies goes, so far as insuring to the insured a strict compliance with the laws as to investments and securities, they cannot be too rigidly enforced or too closely inquired into. Anything and everything that renders the insurance more certain should receive the most jealous care of the State. But a schedule of low rates is not one of means of guaranteeing the insured the amount of his loss. On the contrary, it has proven an effective method of rendering a policy worthless.

Insurance business is as free as the air; there is less warrant for attacking it than there is for attacking any other quasi-public institution. There are hundreds of such companies in America that are not seeking California business. Unusual profits would at once attract them to this State. They stand as a regulative force that prevents exorbitant local rates. Just as a deserted, unused canal, built at great expense recently in England, has there lowered railway rates along its line, although its waters have never been freighted with a ton of merchandise.

A REPLY FROM THE SOUTH.

The Los Angeles Times in its usual dignified and able manner has answered the question propounded the South in The Wave of the 16th. We have asked the entire press of the South for an expression of its opinion upon the question as to whether that section of the State most desires a Senator or Governor. While we do not doubt that the Times expresses the wishes of the great body of its people, it is nevertheless important that the free and untrammelled press of the South join in the verdict and make it unmistakable. When this is done The Wave stands ready to spread the sentiment among its northern contemporaries, and we feel more than confident that they will respond with a hearty, honest approval and support. The Times says:

> The South wants one of its people to represent it in the United States Senate when the term for which the Hon. Stephen M. White was elected has expired. * * *
>
> There is every reason why that Senator should come from the section lying south of the Tehachepi range of mountains, and none why he should not. In order that the State should be represented at Washington by men who know its needs, varied and widespread as they are, it is right and proper that the section which embraces its metropolis should have one Senator, and it is equally just that the section which contains its second city, which is growing and expanding with gigantic strides and which must be depended upon to roll up big Republican majorities, should be accorded the second place in the upper house at Washington.
>
> This is not entirely a geographical proposition—it goes beyond that. This long and narrow State has many and varied interests and industries, and it is impossible that men from San Francisco, or any other portion of Northern California, should be able to understand our needs and desires. It is a fact that never, until the election of Senator White, has this end of the State been able to get that hearing at the Nation's capital which its importance demands; but having once secured that representation, and knowing the value of it, the South will not only ask, but demand, that she shall have one of the Senatorships.
>
> The South has been steadfast and loyal to the North in this matter, in season and out of season. It supported the candidacy of Senator Perkins for the two-year term, and again for the six-year term, with a whole-heartedness and honesty which inspired his friends and made the victory for him certain. It did not do this in secret caucus or by airy promises made on the street-corners, but did it in party convention assembled, by instructing its representatives in the Legislature to vote for and use all honorable means to compass his election.
>
> The time is close at hand when the south will have a fair right to expect a return of the compliment, or, if you please, the honorable payment of the debt. This end of the State will present a candidate for the office who will adorn it with the same brilliancy and ability as does the Democratic incumbent, and it will expect for him the same enthusiastic support that was given to the cause of Senator Perkins by the people of Southern California.
>
> As to the Governorship of the State, the south has no candidate this year. It would not be becoming, even if it were possible of accomplishment, for this section to present candidates for both the offices of Governor and Senator, and no one but a neophyte in politics would suggest such a thing. The south grows rank with varied gubernatorial timber, which ranges from saplings to giants of the forest; but there will be no logging of that kind in the next campaign. We want the Senatorship and there the south stands fast, secure in the belief that it is asking no more than its merits warrant, and promising, when the time comes, to present a candidate who will represent the great State of the Pacific with courage, fidelity and loyalty to the best interests of the whole people, north and south. The man or men who stand in the way of this ambition must step aside. It is not a propitious moment for the small man to get into the running, and, for the sake of his personal gain or honor, hope to exalt himself to the gubernatorial office and leave the position of Senator to go to a section of the State already ably represented. The south asks for its rights, and if need be—which let us hope will not be the case—will fight for them.

United States Consul Eugene Germain, writing from Zurich, Switzerland, reports large shortages in many of the leading crops of fruit in Europe this season. He therefore considers that there will be a good chance to place American dried fruits in the European markets, provided growers ship choice goods only. Transportation and other charges being high, it will not pay to ship anything but the very best. Nothing smaller than 80s in French prunes, and all other dried fruits, such as apricots, peaches and pears must be of uniform size, bright and packed in an attractive manner. Owing to the damage caused by drought to the crop of Malaga raisins in Spain, fancy clusters and first-class London layers should fetch good prices this season in our home markets.

THE QUESTION OF EXPERT TESTIMONY

BY GEORGE FRANKLIN SHIELS, M.D.

The widespread interest in the trial of one Leutgert for the murder of his wife in Chicago, has chiefly centered upon the medical expert testimony, in which certain well-known medical men and physiologists took part on either side.

From the double-type headings of the daily papers one would gather that these gentlemen had placed themselves in an unenviable light, and that they had been held up as objects of ridicule by the sharp-witted and sharper-tongued attorneys. As a matter of fact medical expert testimony, in fact all expert testimony, as now introduced in courts of justice, can be of little value, since any clever lawyer can demonstrate such a conflict between expert-opinion witnesses, that their evidence must of a necessity bear but little weight in the conferences of well-balanced juries. But the matter to which it is desired to call attention is the attitude assumed by both the lawyers and their experts in this case of the People vs. Leutgert, and incidentally to most of the cases, criminal and civil, where this type of testimony is introduced.

The lawyers, both for the defense and prosecution, give two or three hours a day to the deep and exhaustive study of all the branches of medicine which could possibly bear upon the subject at issue, and often they devote this amount of time for days, weeks, and even as much as a whole month. What wonder is it that they should, with characteristic legal modesty, appear in court with a knowledge of medicine and its collateral sciences which it takes an ordinary mortal a lifetime to acquire. Proud of their prowess, forgetting the limits of the patience of judges and juries, nay the interests of the prisoner on trial and even justice itself, these Solons usually employ all means to show how deeply learned they are, and by cheap pitfalls, traps, and technical objections, do their best to harass and ridicule the expert, who, after all, has only been called to express an opinion, which opinion, like all other evidence can be considered or thrown out by the jury in their final deliberations. No better demonstration of these methods could be found than in this very Leutgert case. Fragments of bone, without any characteristic classifying markings, were given the experts to describe and classify. Bones of anthropoid apes, which most closely resemble their human homologues and analogues, and which could have no possible bearing on the case at issue, were used as stumbling-blocks to discredit the experts on either side, until not only the judge, the jury, and Chicago, but the world at large, became tired of hearing it through the columns of a daily press, which seems to exult in a minute description of all that is horrible, grotesque, and disgusting.

Now as to the medical expert testimony itself. The only questions to be answered were: "Could a human body be boiled in a vat with caustic potash and completely destroyed in the manner described?" This question was completely answered by the results of the experiments made by Doctor Bernhard L. Riese, which showed that such was the case, with the exception of the skull and large bones of the legs and arms. "Can you" (the expert under examination) "state whether the fragments of bone found in the vat were those of a human being, or of a hog, or of some lower animal?" The answer to this evidently could only be the expression of an opinion, since from all that can be gathered, it would seem that the treatment to which they had been subjected had removed all the markings which could be positively identifying. But no—these experts, through long and involved examination and cross-examinations, through taunts and insults, through personal vanity and through ill-feeling, were forced to inflict themselves on judge, jury and public for a period of weeks, in a burlesque of an examination in comparative anatomy, with a noisy, gesticulating attorney as examiner, a judge as master of ceremonies, and twelve innocent and bewildered jurymen as a committee to allot the diploma of wise men to the winners, and of fools to the losers. The diploma in this case to be written for the world to read by a number of sensation-seeking newspaper reporters.

In the meantime Mr. Leutgert was on trial for his life!

What has been said of the Leutgert case is more or less true of all cases, where this form of expert or opinion-evidence is introduced, and so long as it is introduced as it is now, just so long will we have this undignified, may I add, unjust and unseemly, conflict of opinion. It is almost laughable to hear the flat contradictions which occur when medical experts are put on the stand by contesting parties, and it must lead the intelligent mind to formulate a poor opinion of the profession. Further, since to be a doctor is to be an expert, it is easily understood how a fledgling by merely contradicting with ignorant positiveness the ripe opinion of a weighty authority, might practically destroy its value in guiding the jury.

There is only one way out of this difficulty, and that is to leave the matter entirely to the court, who could call one or a dozen experts to elucidate any technical points which might need clearing up. It may be urged that this plan places too much power in the hands of the judge, but the more responsibility and power vested in the judicial office, the more readily will the man sink his own personality, and rise to a full appreciation of the grave, dignified, honorable nature of the position which the people have called upon him to occupy.

The official report of the earnings of the Kiel Canal for the first two years of its existence is of a very unsatisfactory character. The income is far below what was anticipated. The annual tonnage was estimated at an equivalent of 18,000 vessels, which, it is said, would pass through and pay a toll of 5,000,000 marks, but the returns give 1,086,000 marks only. It is recognized that the canal is badly constructed, is full of faults, and that large steamers are avoiding it in order to save delay.

According to recently-pubiished statistics, the annual beer product of the older parts of the world is about 17,700,000,000 quarts. The contributions of the greatest beer-producing countries to this total are substantially as follows: Germany, 5,000,000,000; Great Britain and Ireland, 4,700,000,000; United States, 3,200,000,000; Austria-Hungary, 1,350,000,000; Belgium, 1,050,000,000; France, 840,000,000; Russia, 400,000,000.

THE FRENCH MASTERY OF STYLE

By WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

Under this title there appears in the current number of the Atlantic Monthly an unusually interesting and suggestive article from the pen of the great French critic, who recently visited this country — Ferdinand Brunetiere. The essay may well attract attention, for two reasons — first, because everything that Brunetiere writes is marked by extraordinary learning, insight and orginality; and secondly, because in this case he deals with a subject which the English reader will be particulary glad to see discussed by a Frenchman who speaks with authority.

That the fact of the matter is as Brunetiere states it, no one who knows French literature at all well, from the time of Ronsard downward, is likely to deny. Whatever other characteristics we may find distinguishing that literature, whatever qualities we may miss in studying it, we cannot overlook the supreme excellence of style, upon which the critic lays stress. In the power of marshalling ideas, of organizing material, of presenting thoughts with precision, persuasiveness, grace, we must recognize in the French the masters of the modern world. For the tyro in letters who feels himself lapsing into nebulousness or running into prolixity, who flounders hopelessly in his argument, or struggles vainly to give simple and forcible utterance to what he wants to express, there is still no school, no discipline, so good as the school and discipline of Pascal, Bossuet, Voltaire and their followers in the French stylistic tradition. "Ce qui n'est pas clair, n'est pas Francais"—what is not clear, is not French — wrote Rivarol, in 1781, proclaiming in one memorable sentence (often, by the bye, credited to Voltaire himself) the informing principle, the dominant conception, of all the best French writing, in verse no less than in prose. And though to-day, when we turn to the productions of the Symbolists and the Decadents, we may be led to imagine for a moment that the ideal has been forgotten, one may rest assured that it is too deeply embedded in the very fundamentals of French culture to be permanently set aside by a handful of second-rate novelty-mongers, for whose work we may prophesy the speedy oblivion which it deserves.

But given this general fact, then what can we say by way of accounting, to some extent at any rate, for it? If French has long been accepted by the cultivated world as an "instrument of international exchange and universal communication" by reason of the "transparent and radiant clearness" which characterizes it, can we show cause for such a condition of things? Can the French stylistic tradition be analyzed and explained?

These are the questions which M. Brunetiere sets himself to answer. And to begin with, he disclaims for his native tongue any initial advantage over other languages on the score of natural superiority. Here, perhaps, did space serve, we might have the temerity to protest a little, since it seems to us that, while French undoubtedly lacks the strength and vitality of English, the sweetness of Italian, the sonorousness of Spanish, clearness, precision, were from the outset among the inherent tendencies of that particular branch of the Latin family of speech. But we will waive this point, that we may at once reach M. Brunetiere's main contention, which, briefly stated, is, that for three or four hundred years French writers and the French public have concurred in regardiug their common language as a work of art, and in treating it as such. Style, therefore, has been, he conceives, a matter of long, careful, intensive cultivation—a cultivation in which authors and readers have alike had their part. "To be artistic in one's speech . . . this everybody has been and tries to be among us." We have here, then, no isolated phenomenon, no mere fad of coteries and schools, no working ideal of a small literary class, considered as such. Style among the French is rather to be interpreted as primarily a national instinct, the impulse of which has developed, in the course of several centuries, that high standard of form which an acute and intelligent public has insisted on, and generation after generation of writers has striven to reach.

That this cultivation of language as itself a work of art has had its manifold and serious dangers, M. Brunetiere is too conservative a critic not to admit. When once language is definitely conceived in this way, we must necessarily run the risk of seeing in it, sooner or later, nothing but language—of treating words as ends in themselves. From the precieux down to Bandclaire, Gautier, Flaubert, and Paul Verlaine, this tendency — another expression of art for art's sake—has been more or less conspicuous in French literature—sometimes very conspicuous indeed. How shall this dangerous bias towards an idle and meaningless virtuosity be checked and corrected. M. Brunetiere contents himself with showing concretely how it has been checked and corrected by the real masters of French literature—and, we may add, by the masters of all other literature, in whom the sense of style has been very strongly developed. "They have understood, or been made to understand" (for the alert public and its critical counsellors may in more than one case have forced the moral) "that language, though a work of art, still continues to be, above all, a medium for the communication of thoughts and feelings that may be called their instrument of exchange, their current coin; and that, consequently, perfect art cannot be conceived or sought apart from those attributes which are the attributes of thought itself."

Readers of Brunetiere will recognize here familiar doctrine. But with the critic's own position we need not now concern ourselves. What we have for the moment to notice is, that here he gives us a two-fold explanation of the French mastery of style. First of all, instinctively and through the power of a great and ancient tradition, language is held to be a work of art; writers consistently treat it as such; critics and the wider reading public insist that it shall be so treated by them. But sccondly, writers, critics, and the reading public, have, save in exceptional cases, clearly understood that this work of art—language—has an end beyond itself—the complete and adequate expression of ideas and emotions. What is not clear is not French. True; but the clearness is not a thing to be sought for its own sake. It means that when a writer has anything to say, he shall be able to say it to the best advantage—that we shall be able to see at once through the medium of communication to that which is to be communicated. It is this combination of qualities that makes the most characteristic French work just what it is. This is the supreme lesson which the masters of French, more than the writers of any other nation, have for several centuries been teaching the civilized world.

M. Brunetiere proceeds to show the way in which, as a result of this great coherent stylistic tradition, the French language and its literature have gained special fitness for the discussion of what are now called "social problems," and the expression of general ideas. But into this part of his argument, attractive as it is, we must not now follow him. One other point, admirably made, and, as it seems to me, of extreme significance, may, however, be touched upon, because, like the foregoing topics, its bearings are not merely local and temporary, since it will appeal to everyone who is at all occupied with the larger questions of style.

French prose, our author points out (and the truth of the remark is at once apparent), is distinguished from, say German and English prose, by its nearness to conversation—to the spoken word. "We are sometimes told that we must not write as we talk. This is a mistake against which, in case of need, our whole classic literature would protest. To write as we talk is precisely what we should do, with the proviso, of course, that we talk correctly." This practice of writing as nearly as possible as they would talk—of making literature approximate to conversation—is part then, of the practice of the great French prosaists. But now, observe that conversation implies a speaker and a listener or listeners; to whom we adapt our style, by whom we desire to be readily and easily understood. And it is the habit of French writers, conceiving their art as a form of cultivated personal intercourse, to write with their eyes always on their public, to carry this public always with them in the exposition of this thought. Carlyle, Browning, Schilling, even Goethe, wrote with less regard to their readers than to themselves; if they were intelligible to themselves, they seemed to care little or nothing about the difficulty others might have in following them. "But a French writer always speaks to his reader as he would to a hearer, or to one with whom he is conversing . . . His endeavor is, not to veil his thought, but on the contrary to lay it bare. He does not try to screen it, as it were, from the eyes of the profane, but, on the contrary, he takes every pains to render it accessible to them. He does not keep his secret jealously to himself, but he desires rather to impart it to everybody—to his countrymen, to foreigners, to the world." This important fact of the sense of relationship between the French writer and his public will go far to explain many things in French style; but for the moment it interests us most because it helps us to understand more fully than would be otherwise possible, that great French tradition of clearness and precision, to which we are glad that M. Brunetiere should have directed the attention of the American world of letters.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The launching of the Maguire boom was premature. The Congressman was certainly ill-advised, for the announcement of his pretensions has fallen woefully flat. Though most men admit the strength of his candidacy, yet its only endorsement comes from his immediate friends and his office force, Though the "Monarch" canvassed the town for interviews the paltry showing it made was the best it could obtain. It has been suggested that the gleeful energy of the Examiner's enthusiasm was wrought up for the purpose of destroying Maguire in advance, but this theory is untenable. Mr. Hearst is not ungrateful; the service of the Congressman was rendered at the moment of greatest need, and imposed an inestimable obligation. It has been predicted that the men to whom Maguire confides his political fortunes would excite an opposition that must eventually react on himself. The Congressman is strong before the people, if he can ever place himself before them, but his candidacy does not appeal to the men who mould conventions. The Governor has many offices to fill; it is currently assumed that Maguire would reward with place, not men who had assisted in his election, but a regiment of Tracys and Gallaghers—personal connections, who have never served their party, but, by reason of an alleged relationship, have always been a charge upon it. It is a fact also that Maguire is a self-centered man, whose mind is so immersed in problems that he fails to appreciate services rendered him. Not that he is naturally ungrateful, but he is unconscious and forgetful. Even his friends admit as much. This is the general impression about the man, and, in addition to the charge of the Exrminer's endorsement, which is a detriment at the moment, explains why his boom has flattened out.

***

Grave charges have been preferred by Dr. Wendte and John P. Irish against the management of the Ione and the Whittier Reform Schools. Secretary of State L. H. Brown, who has been to both institutions and speaks with a full knowledge of the circumstances and conditions in each, corroborates all that has been said, and reiterates the charges in simple and direct terms. Governor Budd contributes in reply a lengthy denial, alleging mainly what improvements he has wrought in the management of State institutions, but really begging the question at issue. Is it true that boys at Whittier have been flogged till they fainted and that it is customary at Ione to whip boys with such severity as to draw blood? Is it true that the girls sent to Whittier to be reformed are allowed to and have the liberty to continue in their evil ways? These are all sensational charges and the community should be informed about them. The manner in which the several papers have gone about this affair is a surprising testimony to their lack of enterprise. It is no good interviewing Governor Budd, or re-interviewing John P. Irish. The public demand the facts, and if such barbarities have been practised, then punishment for the perpetrator. The places to enquire at are Ione and Whittier—not San Francisco or Oakland. Why do not Mr. Crothers of the Bulletin and Mr. John P. Young of the Chronicle dispatch reporters to these institutions and give us the truth? If this had happened under Governor Markham, depend on it the Examiner would have given us pages of horrors. Flogging has been abandoned in the army and navy—the knout is discredited in Russia. There has been a big outcry in England recently because a naval apprentice received twenty-four cuts with a birch, yet in California we are assured that boys at our model reform schools are whipped until their blood runs. It is sickening and shameful and disgraceful. Would we not shiver with horror if such a story came to us from Russia or South America?

***

The assumption prevailing in certain respectable quarters that there is but one "push" and Rainey is its king, is happily a mistaken theory. The Bush street boss has a strong following, but by no means as powerful as that he possessed nine months ago. He has had to discriminate. This is the fatal necessity which curses the politician who leads men by their expectations. For every office there are fifty applicants, and a choice confers forty-nine disappointments. Rainey undertook to disburse the loaves and fishes, but not having a miraculous dispensation, hundreds went hungry away. The result is that the number of those who know there is nothing for them in his friendship is much greater than the force which has benefited by his patronage. The question of the "push" is interesting, however—there are several camps—Rainey's; then the old Buckley set, which has been reinforced by the disappointed office-seekers; the Curry-Crimmins set and the Kelly-Mahoney set—surely a charming aggregation which the respectable element of the community had well take heed of. It is improbable that these several forces can ever be persuaded to act together, for they all hate one another, and it is not impossible but that their machinations may be curbed by a new factor—the police. The antagonism between Gunst and Lees is sure to express itself in the forthcoming election. and the police will act on the side of the conservative element, from which they are entitled to expect more than from the vicious who would only curb the potency of the force for their own purposes.

***

The ire of a certain section of the medical profession has been aroused by the sensational announcement of a new cure for consumption alleged to have been discovered by Dr. Hirschfelder. This physician is a gentleman of very good standing in his profession, and with a tendency towards original research. He has been experimenting along the lines of Dr. Koch's theory, and claims to have found a new process of preparing the tuberculin altering its constituents and adding to its efficiency. This is achieved by substituting peroxide of hydrogen for water as used by Koch. The peroxide of hydrogen is the variation. It seems that in certain cases in which the new lymph has been tried excellent results have been obtained.. Mr. T. H. Williams, Jr., a well known citizen, has been treated, and it is said, has been cured of tuberculosis and it is really his experience that has made so much talk. Now cometh the others who declare the "discovery" amounts to nothing whatever. Dr. Potter defines the difference between the two lymphs thus: "Professor Koch drives tuberculin through $H_2O$ by a powerful centrifugalizer. Professor Hirschfelder treats tuberculin with $H_2O_2$, peroxide of hydrogen." Next comes the committee of the Cooper Medical College, with which institution Dr. Hirschfelder is connected, to whom the alleged discovery had been referred for examination and reports. "Your committee fully endorses Dr. Hirschfelder's method but wishes to take more time to complete their formulated indorsement for permanent record." There is a pretty squabble over the affair, with lots of truth telling in prospect. I don't believe Dr. Hirschfelder is responsible for the degree of advertising conferred on him, and it is safe to assume that the world is as far distant from a preparation that will restore lung tissues destroyed by tuberculosis as science is from a lymph which will repair piles ravaged by the teredo.

***

Quite the most extraordinary collection of pictures I have seen in a long time is that in the Park Museum. It is a heterogeneous gathering of early and latter day art comprising certain of the alleged master-pieces of Diehl, which are nearly as bad as they are large, together with effective examples of Corot, Diaz and innumerable unknowns. The Spooner pictures, which cover so much of the wall space, are quite without beauty or merit, and I can readily imagine their owner being delighted to rid herself of the painful necessity of gazing at them. In spite of the eminent foreigners, quite the best pictures there are by Californians. Yelland is represented by at least two interesting canvasses, while some of the landscapes by students of the Academy of Design, are far ahead of the alleged master-pieces. There is a highly allegorical early-day Keith—in his aboriginal style—which I imagine that artist would happily see dead and buried. It is interesting chiefly because it shows the rapid strides he has made since it was painted.

***

Apropos of Keith—there is growing up quite a Keith school. The style and manner of the master are being adroitly copied by the rank and file, who really are producing some very creditable replicas. That Keith cares especially for this form of appreciation I don't believe, for he considers, doubtless, that the town is quite small enough for one of him. However, imitation is the sincerest flattery, in which there is some unction if less profit.

***

Literary San Francisco is gradually emigrating to New York. Following Gelett Burgess and Juliet Wilbur Tompkins, Miss Geraldine Bonner has gone East, and henceforth will contribute to metropolitan journals. There is no denying that Gotham is now the literary center of America, though the Chap Book, one of the best periodicals in the country, is published in Chicago. Whoever writes good stories or can put together acceptable and clever descriptive articles, can find the market there that is denied here. Though there is in California material in abundance, in the "placing" of manuscripts fortune seems to favor the man on the ground. In New York, too, there is a literary atmosphere, a literary coterie which seems to be an important factor in the production of saleable copy. Every editor has his own idea as to the requirements of his magazine, and if a writer can only learn just what is expected, the junction between production and publication is comfortably effected. Besides most of the matter that comes to us weekly and monthly is written to order. Miss Bonner will certainly make a prominent place for herself. She is a cultivated and very intelligent critic—her dramatic articles have been especially good, and her stories have certainly attracted attention. Her latest excursion has been into the realm of playwriting—she has written several clever comedies that are under advisement, and, in collaboration with her father, John Bonner, wrote a dramatization of "The Cricket on the Hearth," which was accepted by the late Alexander Salvini.

***

New York is to have another comic weekly, L'Enfant Terrible, and Gelett Burgess and Oliver Hereford are to concoct it. It is to be four pages of pure nonsense for sale at five cents per copy. The staff devotes one night each week to its conception, and is ready to launch the first number with all the honors of peace. Oliver Hereford is considered clever in both New York and Boston, is well known to readers of Life and St. Nicholas, and is the hero of as many funny stories as A. Lincoln or C. Lamb. A third terrible infant is Jeffrey Roche of the Boston Pilot. Part of the idea of the Enfant is to make the advertising as funny as the actual reading matter. The ads are to be written by the stars and each announcement will be a joke apart. The colony of Les Jeunes in New York is distinguishing itself. The Century has taken two tales of Gelett Burgess; Life is to publish a Christmas story from his pen. He is doing a romantic ballad for the Christmas St. Nicholas, and has opportunities galore on the dailies. Miss Juliet Wilbor Tompkins is doing stories and dialogues for the several publications of the great Munsey, whose latest scheme, by the way, is a 2-cent monthly on the lines, I presume, of Tit Bits, which seems to be the proper thing in that direction. Ernest Peixotto is in much demand as an illustrator, has six months' work ahead on revolutionary war articles for Scribner's, has done Concord and Lexington, and and is now at work on the Brandywine country. Miss Lundborg has gone further afield—to Paris, has set up a studio there and expects to remain some time studying mural decorations.

DR. HIRSCHFELDER

***

There is really no sense in reviving the stupid slanders which certain disaffected people used to circulate about E. M. Greenway and the cotillions. It has been declared time and again that Mr. Greenway's leadership of San Francisco society was conducted for the benefit of his pocket. These enlightened critics made out that he profited through the champagne dealers and the caterers and that even the musicians paid him a stipulated portion of their earnings. Of course these tales were the creation of malice and revenge—at least they were proved time and again to be without foundation. Mr. Greenway has a genius for managing entertainments, and has given for the Friday Night Club quite the most brilliant and beautiful parties society has ever had. The decorations were always magnificent, the supper luxurious and the wine abundant. Just how he compassed such results with the limited funds at his disposal was the wonder of all the matrons accustomed to giving balls and parties. He used the influence of his position not for his personal benefit but to profit the club, which was served at rates far below what any other organization ever secured. The committees participating in the management with Mr. Greenway know that whatever discounts came from the champagne dealers or caterers were applied to the general fund of the club, which seldom, if ever, met the expenditure. There was generally a deficit which he loyally met and never said a word about. In his private capacity Mr. Greenway has been a most generous host. He has entertained more than any other man in San Francisco. He has given dinners and theatre parties by the dozen every season, and has spent through all the years of his prominence every cent he could make by his manifold activities. Now fortune favors him, for his Mumm agency is very remunerative, though society pays the penalty by his retirement from the leading role. It is true he is still directing the affairs of the Friday Night Club, but that institution monopolizes all his social intentions, and, alas, no one has arisen to move things in his place.

***

In a recent issue a description was given of the reclamation work being done at North Beach by the Fair estate, in the course of which allusion was made to a dispute that had arisen between the estate and the Pacific Gas Improvement Company. As the completion of the seawall was effected the company found itself prevented from getting its coal barges to the gas works, and concluded that an effort must be made to retain the advantage hitherto enjoyed in this respect. Legal proceedings were accordingly commenced, and the Harbor Commissioners were prompted to exercise their jurisdiction over the water frontage and protect alleged public rights in the premises. Meantime the Fair estate, through the contractors employed on the works, has maintained a force of men on the spot to prevent any interference with the piling, barges, or any other part of their working outfit. It may be that long and troublesome proceedings in the courts will result, in which case the development of that part of the city will remain in suspense. The rights in the matter are, of course, for the law to determine, but it is very regrettable that any issue of the kind should have arisen at this stage of the matter.

The Gas company must certainly have understood what their rights were all along, and, if we are correctly informed, were at one time negotiating with the late Senator Fair for the purchase of a couple of blocks for wharfage purposes. They were unwilling to pay the price he demanded, namely $65,000 per block, and the matter then dropped, to be taken up in its present form. The action of the Harbor Commissioners at this late hour would seem to show that if the public have rights upon which the Fair estate has been trespassing, they were in considerable danger of being altogether overlooked.

***

Superintendent Smith of the Botanic Gardens in Washington, D. C., lately furnished some startling facts regarding the service performed by his interesting charge in the cause of horticulture. He is a Scotchman, who has been upwards of forty years in his present position, and he says that when he first came to this country there were only seven palms of the fan variety in the United States; now there are thirty millions and the Botanic Gardens have distributed sixty thousand. With his own hands he planted the first Sorghum root that grew in America and started an industry therefrom which has yielded to one State alone an annual revenue of four million dollars. Ten years ago he gave a young lady of New Orleans a camphor plant, which is now a tree forty feet high, and has inspired the authorities to plant the streets of that city with camphor trees. A few years ago tuberose plants to the value of $10,000 were imported every year, but owing to his endeavors the people of the South are now growing enough of these plants to supply the home demand, and are exporting to the extent of $30,000 worth annually. What might not be done in California to extend the industry of horticulture?

ON THE COAST NEAR POINT ARENA
Taber, photo

When the veriscope pictures of the Corbett-Fitzsimmons fight were being shown in this city last summer, people thought 50 cents was an extravagant charge for a seat to view them. At the theatre adjoining the Aquarium in London, the best seats are selling at five to two-and-a-half dollars to see the same thing.

***

Thus far, but few stories about the late sleeping-car magnate have been set afloat. The available biographical material is of the most general character. One learns Mr. Pullman had lived in a four million dollar mansion in Chicago, that his estate is worth twenty-five millions, that he had immense tact in selecting as lieutenants able men who could execute his ideas, that he was treasurer of the relief fund organized after the Chicago fire, and that he assisted in building the elevated railway system of New York. Besides he created at Pullman a model town, in which the problems of sanitation and municipal government were handled with a courage, daring and success unique in the world's history. All this is in addition to the creation of the modern sleeping car. It is said that the credit of that idea really belongs to someone else, but it was in Pullman's brain that it took shape and with his coin that it was built, and to the end of the world sleeping cars will be Pullmans. All this represents a distinct degree of achievement—otherwise you must guess at a reserved, self-contained personality of rare will-power and great executive capacity. His career was purely his own creation, for he commenced life as a shop boy, went to cabinet-making, then into the moving of houses, mining next in Colorado, and at last into the great sleeping-car industry, which he handled with admirable foresight and intelligence. A scion of the Pullman family is Mrs. Frank Carolan, who has become by marriage a very good Californian and a better Burlingamite. She is a very handsome young woman, who has inherited the regular features of her father. Among her friends there is deep interest as to her share of the Pullman estate, for according to the papers she is not to have as many millions as her sister.

THE CAROLAN VILLA AT BURLINGAME

The Carolan villa at Burlingame is a charming residence and is furnished with excellent taste.

***

The movement for the encouragement of competing steamship lines between San Francisco and other ports of California, Oregon, Washington, Alaska, British Columbia and Mexico, which has been set agoing by some of the leading shippers of this city has assumed definite importance. A carefully prepared agreement is now in course of signature under which the subscribers will be liable for monthly contributions. Considerable progress has been made in securing subscriptions. It is calculated that a minimum revenue of $5000 per month is required to permit of the plans for competitive lines being put into force, and that as soon as that income is assured the associated merchants will be in a position to consider proposals which have already been made to them by the shipping interest. The Pacific Coast Steamship Company and the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company are the lines against which the movement is mainly directed, and the present action of the merchants shows that they are resolved to make good their threats of enforcing a reduction in the rates of freight.

THE "PEERLESS" CORINNE

***

The loss of the steam schooner Caspar off Point Arena recalls the disaster of about a year ago when the steamer San Benito went ashore in the same locality. Serious loss of life attended each catastrophe. During the last ten years there have been no less than fourteen similar mishaps at the same place followed in nearly every instance by loss of life, which could probably have been largely avoided had there been a properly equipped life-saving station in the neighborhood. On the California seaboard there are at present only five stations in active work, three in the vicinity of the Golden Gate, one at Point Reyes and the other at Humboldt Bay. Having regard to the proved dangerous character of the coast, it is more than time something was done for the efficient protection of life and property in that particular quarter. This last case is the more distressing from the fact that the necessary appropriation for a life-saving service at Point Arena was made some nine months ago, but so far no steps have been taken to get it into active working order. The establishment of the lifeboat and signal station there needs the immediate attention of the Government.

***

A talent for theatricals is rarely confined to a single member of a family. It streaks through a series of brethren and sistren, being often inherited from a play-going parent. Some one of the family makes the plunge and appears, then the rest follow suit, one after another; they become celebrated or it may only be "known to the public"—depending on their talent. California has given to the stage, innumerable young women who have attained various degrees of prominence, and notable among the theatrical families of this environment are the Boutons. There are three Boutons before the footlights. I believe Bouton pater and mater came here from Nevada, and Madeline Bouton inaugurated a career by joining the Palmer company. She was here not so long ago, in fact was in the troupe of which May Brookyn was a member, and attracted considerable attention by her cleverness. Miss Mabel Bouton, who appears with "Lost, Strayed or Stolen," at the Baldwin next week, is decidedly a pretty girl whose stage experience has been but a matter of eighteen months. She does ingenue roles, sings, dances, and is said to have real ability. She is decidedly pretty, is pronounced bright and interesting, and has the reputation of being quite a notable horsewoman.

***

That Mr. C. D. Lane of the Utica is in London is not so well known as the importance of the fact justifies. He is supposed to be floating mines—the Utica, maybe, or mayhap the Fortuna, but at all events there is some deal on foot, and the mining community "wants to know." When he returns to California Mr. Lane will be asked to cast a kindly eye over the accounts of the great Bryan reception. The original story had it that he had offered to finance the undertaking of the committee, which had delegated to itself the duty of entertaining the Democratic leader. But it seems their hopes were founded on a rash statement which Mr. Lane made to a friend that he would give five thousand dollars for a banquet to Bryan. Reasoning that five thousand for a banquet meant an available five thousand for something the committee went ahead, and the reception cost far more money than has been collected and there is a hiatus which will probably yawn as long as Lane lingers in London.

Miss Loretta Grace
Marceau, photo

***

A certain bibulous young millionaire is responsible for a new definition of gentility. There had been a little entertainment at the country house of this young gentleman's family, and among the guests was a friend of his brothers. They had spent a gay day together accompanied by lots of whisky and other liquid refreshments, and in consequence the party at dinner was much the worse for wear, especially the young millionaire himself. Next day he addressed his brother regarding the friend. "Jim, old man," he said, "that chap is no gentleman." "Nonsense," said the brother, "he is as good as any one else." "Take my word for it now he is no gentleman," reiterated the young millionaire emphatically. "But why," again queried the brother. "Well, Jim, at dinner last night he saw that I was drunk and yet the fellow asked me to pass him the cream."

***

A notable visator to the city this week is the Princess Kaiulani of Hawaii, who arrived here on Tuesday last, with her father, Mr. A. S. Cleghorn, from London en route to Honolulu. She had been preceded by Mr. Theophilus H. Davies, who has been her guardian during her visit to Europe for the last eight years. The latter gentleman is returning to the islands at once by the steamer "Belgic,"

Princess Kaiulani

the Princess and Mr. Cleghorn awaiting the later departure of the "Alameda." Mr. Davies has stated that the report to the effect that Princess Kaiulani is an aspirant to the throne of Hawaii is without foundation; adding, that so long as ex-Queen Liliuokalani lives she will be the representative of the royalist faction. The Princess paid a visit to the ex-Queen in the East before starting for San Francisco, and is believed to be on perfectly good terms with her. While staying in Europe the Princess, who has quite lately entered upon her 23d year, has devoted herself to study and, having besides had many advantages in the way of society, is possessed of education and accomplishments, that will fit her to take the lead amongst her own people. When she left the Islands she was regarded as the probable successor of Liliuokalani, but now returns to her home as an ordinary resident of Honolulu.

***

Again we have one of those romantic stories how millions awaiting undiscovered heirs have suddenly become the heritage of a young person in our midst. It seems that a score of years ago a man named Imblay Clarke, who was engaged in mining, having lost his wife, to whom he had not been long married, determined to leave California for parts unknown, and before setting out placed his baby girl in the care of people who, for a time, received funds for its support. After a while the payments ceased. It now appears that the remittances were stopped owing to the death of Clarke, who became very wealthy in Australia, and a $25,000,000 estate is awaiting claimants, at least twenty-five millions is the figure mentioned in the papers; $25,000 is more probably the fact. The daughter has continued to live in San Francisco and is now being congratulated on the discovery of the facts and her prospect of securing Clarke's fortune. In the meantime the daily press is detailing some of her plans for disposing of the vast wealth she is to receive, all of which appear to be most creditable to her head and heart. It is needless to say many other Clarke heirs are afoot in different parts of the globe and it may be that California will only have a share in the romance after all.

***

The Italian-Swiss colony at Asti, in Sonoma County, has undertaken an immense experiment this month in the way of ripening half a million gallons of red wine in a great underground tank. This tank is dug out of rock in the hillside, is 104 feet long, 34 feet wide, and 24 feet deep. It is coated with two feet of cement and glazed so that wine ages as though in bottles. The tank has been covered and three feet of earth placed over the cover so that the temperature may be kept uniform. The tank has already been filled, and after three months the wine will be drawn off into small wooden tanks in a cellar. The wine was pumped in through two four-inch pipes, but it can be drawn off by gravity. The great tank contains ten times as much wine as the famous Tun of Heidelberg. It cost only $7,500.

***

A great influx of miners is looked for next spring into the Peace River district, Northwest Territory, as men who have lately come down to Vancouver from there have brought in a considerable amount of gold and report that about 200 men who are working the placers along the river at present are doing well. Peace River rises in the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains, a little north of the centre of British Columbia. In the northern continuation of the same mountains rises to Pelly, Stewart and other important gold-bearing tributaries of the Yukon. There is this important difference, that the Peace River rises in the eastern slope of the mountains, while the Yukon's tributaries rise on the west side. Along Peace River north are the Reindeer or Cariboo mountains, which are believed to be rich in gold-bearing quartz.

***

A veritable beauty is Miss Loretta Grace, the new member of the Alcazar Company—a tall, dark, graceful maiden, who is sure to be a sensation and make a success. She is a native daughter, has talent, and strange to say, has never been to a dramatic school. Not having graduated with distinguished honors she has failed to acquire the strange tricks of manner and expression which the pupils of these precious institutions inevitably possess. Otherwise she is the daughter of John Grace, who is so well known as judge at the Ingleside Coursing Park, and her histrionic talent was discovered by T. D. Frawley. This happened at an entertainment at the Concordia Club, in which Miss Grace was a factor, and she evinced so much ability that he demanded an introduction and encouraged the debutante to persevere. Soon afterwards Miss Grace had an opportunity to join the Daly Company but there was strong parental opposition to which she succumbed. An opportunity presented itself with the Frawley troupe later, with whom she played various subsidiary roles under a nomme de guerre, gathering impressions and experiences at first hand. At her initial appearance in propria persona at the Alcazar Miss Grace made a decided hit and has now been engaged for the new company which begins its career next week. The debutante is not by any means a photographic beauty, for she is really a very handsome young woman, who, in addition to her heritage of good looks, seems plentifully endowed with sense and intelligence.

***

Poor "peerless Corinne" has had the worst of it at the critics' hands this week. However, she is a philosophic young woman and while she does not like it, is really indifferent as long as the audience does not agree with the press. Otherwise it is different. Corinne is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Flaherty—the latter being known to stageland as Mrs. Kimball—the Mrs. Kimball, who was one of the fiercest and firmest manageresses in the profession. The dusky lines of the "peerless" hair and complexion are inherited from Flaherty pere, who, though Irish, was a most decided brunette. Corinne has been on the stage since early childhood and now has the reputation of being like her mother—an excellent business woman. She is rich, inheriting about $50,000 from Mrs. Kimball, and no one has yet captured her hand. As to her heart, that is another story.

The New York World recently published a resume of the social position in that city, summing up with the conclusion that the Four Hundred no longer exists. The break-up, it

Miss Mable Bolton
Of the "Lost, Strayed or Stolen" Company
Thors, photo

was urged, had been caused by the numerous divorces in high life during the last few years, rendering it impossible for members of prominent families to continue their former associations. The Astors, Belmonts, Rives, Havermeyers, Vanderbilts, Bloodgoods and many others are thus affected, and it is pointed out that Mrs. Paran Stevens and Ward McAllister always held that no divorced woman, whether she remarried or remained single, could maintain a leading position in society. The collapse in New York is probably due to the fact that practically the sole foundation of social position there has been the posession of dollars, an evil which exists largely in our own city. The best elements in society every where are not those which are the most conspicuous.

Loretta Grace
Of the Alcazar Stock Company
Photo by Boye & Habenicht

JAPANESE MELODY

THE ENGLISH OFFICERS

EDITH HALL AS MOLLY SEAMORE

THOS. C. LEARY AS WUN HI—GEORGIE COOPER AS JULIETTE

A GROUP OF GEISHA GIRLS

TILLIE SALINGER AS LADY CONSTANCE WINN

THE COMIC OPERA SEASON AT THE TIVOLI: SOME "GEISHA" CHARACTERS

Photos by Marceau

The Associated Un-Charities.

BY FRANK NORRIS

There used to be a place in feudal Paris called the Court of Miracles, and Mister Victor Hugo has told us all about it. This Court was a quarter of the town where the beggars lived, and it was called "of the miracles," because once across it's boundaries the blind saw, the lame walked and the poor cared not to have the gospel preached unto them.

San Francisco has its Court of Miracles too. It is a far cry thither, for it lies on the other side of Chinatown and Dagotown, and blocks beyond Luna's restaurant. It is in the valley between Telegraph Hill and Russian Hill, and you must pass through it as you go down to Meigg's Wharf where the Government tugs tie up.

One has elected to call it the Court of Miracles, but it is not a court, and the days of miracles are over. It is a row of seven two-story houses, one of them brick. The brick house is over a saloon kept by a kanaka woman and called "The Eiffel Tower." Here San Francisco's beggars live and have their being. That is, a good many of them.

The doubled-up old man with the white beard and neck-handkerchief who used to play upon a zither and the sympathies of the public on the corner of Sutter street has moved out, and one can find no trace of him, and Father Elphick, the white-headed vegetarian of Lotta's Fountain, is dead. But plenty of the others are left. The neatly dressed fellow with dark blue spectacles, who sings the Marsellaise, accompanying himself upon an infinitessimal hand organ, is here; Mrs. McCleaverty is here, and the old bare-headed man who sits on the street corner by the Bohemian Club, after six o'clock in the evening, and turns the crank of a soundless organ, has here set up his everlasting rest.

The beggars of the Seven Houses are genuine miserables. Perhaps they have an organization and a president, I don't know. But I do know that Leander and I came very near demoralizing the whole lot of them.

More strictly speaking, it was Leander who did the deed, I merely looked on and laughed, but Leander says that by laughing I lent him my immoral support, and am therefore party to the act.

Leander and I had been dining at the "Red House," which is a wine-shop that Gelette Burgess discovered in an alley not far from the county jail. Leander and I had gone there because we like to sit at it's whittled tables and drink its Vin Ordinaire (tres ordinaire) out of tin gill measures; also we like it's salad and it's thick slices of bread that you eat after you have rubbed them with an onion or a bit of garlic. We always go there in evening dress in order to impress the Proletariat.

On this occasion after we had dined and had come out again into the gas and gaiety of the Mexican quarter we caromed suddenly against Cluness. Cluness is connected with some sort of a charitable institution that has a house omewhere in the "Quarter." He says that he likes to alleviate distress wherever he sees it; and that after all, the best thing in life is to make some poor fellow happy for a few moments.

Leander and I had nothing better to do that evening so we went around with Cluness, and watched him as he gave a month's rent to an infirm old lady on Stockton street, a bundle of magazines to a whining old rascal at the top of a nigger tenement, and some good advice to a Chinese girl who didn't want to go to the Presbyterian Mission House.

"That's my motto," says he, as we came away from the Chinese girl, "alleviate misery wherever you see it and try and make some poor fellow happy for a few moments."

"Ah, yes," exclaimed this farceur Leander, sanctimoniously, while I stared, "thats the only thing worth while," and he sighed and wagged his head.

Cluness went on to tell us about a deserving case he had —we were going there next—in fact, innocently enough, he described the Seven Houses to us, never suspecting they were the beggar's headquarters. He said there was a poor old paralytic woman lived there, who had developed an appetite for creamed oysters.

"It's the only thing," said Cluness, "that she can keep on her stomach."

"She told you so?" asked Leander.

"Yes, yes."

"Well, she ought to know."

We arrived at the Seven Houses and Cluness paused before the tallest and dirtiest.

"Here's where she lives; I'm going up for a few moments."

"Have a drink first," suggested Leander, fixing his eye upon the saloon under the brick house.

We three went in and sat down at one of the little rouud zinc tables—painted to imitate marble—and the Kanaka woman herself brought us our drinks. While we were drinking, one of the beggers came in. He was an Indian, totally blind, and in the day time played a mouth-organ on Grant Avenue near a fashionable department store.

"Tut, tut," said Cluness, "poor fellow, blind, you see, what a pity, I'll give him a quarter."

"No let me," exclaimed Leander.

As he spoke the door opened again and another blind man groped in. This fellow I had seen often. He sold lavender in little envelopes on one of the corners of Kearny street. He was a stout, smooth-faced chap and always kept his chin in the air.

"What misery there is in this world," sighed Cluness as his eye fell upon this latter, "one half the world don't know how——"

"Look, they know each other," said Leander. The lavender man had groped his way to the Indian's table—evidently it was their especial table—and the two had fallen a-talking. They ordered a sandwich apiece and a small mug of beer.

"Let's do something for 'em," exclaimed Cluness, with a burst of generosity. "Let's make 'em remember this night for years to come. Look at 'em trying to be happy over a bit of dry bread and a pint of flat beer. I'm going to give 'em a dollar each."

"No, no," protested Leander. "Let me fix it, I've more money than you. Let me do a little good now and then. You don't want to hog all the philanthropy, Cluness, I'll give 'em something."

"It would be very noble and generous of you, indeed," cried Cluness, "and you'll feel better for it, see if you don't. But I must go to my paralytic. You fellows wait for me. I'll be down in twenty minutes."

I frowned at Leander when Cluness was gone. "Now what tom-foolery is it this time?" said I.

"Tom-foolery, exclaimed Leander, blankly. "It's philanthropy. By Jove, here's another chap with his lamps blown out. Look at him."

A third unfortunate, blind as the other two, had just approached the Indian and the lavender man. The three were pals, one could see that at half a glance. No doubt they met at this table every night for beer and sandwiches. The last blind man was a Dutchman. I had seen him from time to time on Market street, with a cigar-box tied to his waist and a bunch of pencils in his fist.

"Eins!" called the Dutchman to the Kanaka, as he sat down with the lavender man and the Indian. "Eins—mit a hem sendvidge."

"Excuse me," said Leander, coming up to their table.

What was it? Did those three beggars, their instinct trained by long practice, recognize the alms-giver in the sound of Leander's voice, or in the step? It is hard to say, but instantly each one of them dropped the mildly convivial and assumed the humbly solicitous air, turning his blind head towards Leander, listening intently. Leander took out his purse and made a great jingling with his money. Now, I knew that Leander had exactly fifteen dollars—no more, no less—fifteen dollars, in three five-dollar gold pieces—not a penny of change. Could it be possible that he was going to give a gold piece to the three beggars? It was, evidently, for I heard him say:

"Excuse me. I've often passed you fellows on the street, in town, and I guess I've always been too short of change, or in too much of a hurry to remember you. But I'm going to make up for it now, if you'll permit me. Here——" and he jingled his money, "here is a five-dollar gold piece that I'd like to have you spend between the three of you to-night, and drink my health, and—and—have a good time, you know. Catch on?

They caught on.

"May God bless you, young man!" exclaimed the old lavender man.

The Indian grunted expressively.

The Dutchman twisted about in his place and shouted in the direction of the bar:

"Mek ut er bottle Billzner und er Gotha druffle, mit ein im-borted Frankfooter bei der side on."

The Kanaka woman came up, and the Dutchman repeated his order. The lavender man paused reflectively tapping his brow, then he delivered himself: "A half spring chicken," he said with profound gravity, "rather under done, and some chicory salad and a bottle of white wine—put the bottle in a little warm water for about two minutes—and some lyonaise potatoes with onions, and—

"Donner wetter," shouted the Dutchman, "genuch!" smiting the table with his fist.

The other subsided. The Kanaka woman turned to the Indian.

"Whiskey," he grunted, "plenty whiskey, big beefsteak, soh," and he measured off a yard on the table.

"Leander," said I, when he rejoined me, "that was foolishness, you've thrown away your five dollars and these fellows are going to waste it in riotous living. You see the results of indiscriminate charity. "I've not thrown it away. Cluness would say that if it made them happier according to their lights it was well invested. I hate the charity that means only medicines, clean sheets, new shoes and sewerage. Let 'em be happy in their own way." There could be no doubt that the three blind men were happy. They loaded their table with spring chickens, Gotha truffles, beefsteaks, and all manner of "alcoholic beverages," till the zinc disappeared beneath the accumulation of plates and bottles. They drank each other's health and they pledged that of Leander, standing up. The Dutchman ordered: "Zwei Billzner more alreatty." The lavender man drank his warmed white wine with gasps of infinite delight, and after the second whiskey bottle had been opened, the Indian began to say strange and terrible things in his own language.

Cluness came in and beamed on them.

"See how happy you've made them, Leander," he said gratefully. "They'll always remember this night."

"They always will," said Leander solemnly.

"I've got to go though," said Cluness. I made as if to go with him but Leander plucked my coat under the table. I caught his eye.

"I guess we two will stay," said I. Cluness left, thanking us again and again.

"I don't know what it is," said I seriously to Leander, "but to-night you seem to me to be too good to be wholesome."

"I," said Leander, blankly. "But I suppose I should expect to be misjudged."

Just then the Kanaka woman came over to give us our check.

"This is on me," said Leander, but he was so slow in fumbling for his purse that I was obliged, in all decency, to pay.

After she left us, the Kanaka went over to the blind men's table, and, check-pad in hand, ran her eye over the truffles, beer, chicken, beefsteak, wine and whiskey, and made out her check.

"Four dollars, six bits," she announced.

There was a silence, not one of the blind men moved.

"Watch now," said Leander.

"Four, six bits," repeated the Kanaka, her hand on her hip.

Still none of the blind men moved.

"Vail, den," cried the Dutchman, "vich von you two vellars has dose money, pay oop. Fier thalers und sax beets."

"I haven't it," exclaimed the lavender man, "Jim has it," he added, turning to the Indian.

"No have got, no have got," grunted the Indian. "You have got, you or Charley."

I looked at Leander.

"Now, what have you done?"

"For answer Leander showed me three five dollar gold pieces in the palm of his hand.

"Each one of those chaps thinks that one of the other two has the gold piece. I just pretended to give it to one of 'em, jingled my coin, and then put it back, I didn't give 'em a cent. Each one thought I had given it to the other two. How could they tell, they were blind, don't you see."

I reached for my hat.

"I'm going to get out of here."

Leander pulled me back.

"Not just yet, wait a few moments. Listen."

"Vail, vail," cried the Dutchman, beginning to get red. "You doand vants to cheats Missus Amaloa, den berhaps—yes, Zhim," he cried to the Indian, "pay oop, or ees ut you den, Meest'r Paites, dat hab dose finf thalers?"

"No have got," gurgled the Indian, swaying in his place as he canted the neck of the whisky bottle towards his lips.

"I thought you had the money, protested Mr. Bates, (which was evidently the lavender man's name), "you or Jim."

"No have got," whooped the Indian, beginning to get angry. "Hug-gh! You got money. He give you money," and he turned his face towards the Dutchman.

"That's what I thought," asserted Mr. Bates.

"Tousand Tamls —," shouted the other. "I tell you no."

"Yes, yes," growled the Indian, plucking at Mr. Bates' coat sleeve, "you have got."

"Yah, soh," cried the Dutchman, shaking his finger at the lavender man, excitedly, "pay dose finf thalers, Meest'r Paites."

"Pay yourselt," exclaimed the other. "I haven't touched them. I'll be any name, I'll be any name if I've touched them."

"Well, I ain't going to wait here all night," shrilled the Kanaka woman impatiently. The Dutchman shook his finger solemnly towards where he thought the Indian was sitting.

"It's der Indyun. It's Zhim. Ged ut vrom Zhim."

"Lie, lie," vociferated the Indian, "white man lie. No have got. You hav got, or you."

"I'll turn my pockets inside out," exclaimed Mr. Bates.

"Schmarty," cried the Dutchman. "Can I see dose pocket?"

"Thief, thief," exclaimed the Indian, shaking his long black hair. "You steal money."

The other two turned on him savagely.

"There ain't no man going to call me that."

"Vat he say, vait, und I vill his het mit der boddle demolisch. Who you say dat to, mee, or Meest'r Bates?"

"Oh, you make me tired," cried the lavender man, "you two. One of you two, pay Missus Amaloa and quit fooling."

"Come on," cried the Kanaka, "pay up or I'll ring for the police.

"Vooling, vooling," shouted the Dutchman, dancing in his rage. "You sheats Missus Amaloa und you gall dot vooling."

"Who cheats," cried the other two simultaneously.

"Vail, how do I know," yelled the Dutchman, purple to the eyes. "How do I know vich."

The Kanaka turned to Leander.

"Say, which of these fellows did you give that money to?"

Leander came up.

"Ah-h, now ve vill know," said the Dutchman.

Leander looked from to the other. Then an expression of perplexity came into his face. He scratched an ear.

"Well, I thought it was this German gentleman."

"Vat."

"Only it seems to me I had the money in my left hand, and he, you see, is on the right hand of the table. It might have been him, and then again it might have been one of the other two gentlemen. It's so difficult to remember. Wasn't it you," turning to Mr. Bates, "or no, wasn't it you," to the Indian. "But it couldn't have been the Indian gentleman, and it couldn't have been Mr. Bates here, and yet I'm sure it wasn't the German gentleman, and [illegible] I must have given it to one of the three. Didn't [illegible] coin down on the table and go away and leave it." Leander struck his forehead. "Yes, I think that's what I did. I'm sorry," he said to the Kanaka, "that you are having any trouble, it's some misunderstanding."

"Oh, I'll get it all right," returned the Kanaka, confidently. "Come on, one of you fellows dig up."

Then the quarrel broke out afresh. The three blind men rose to their feet, blackguarding and villifying one another till the room echoed. Now it was Mr. Bates and the Dutchman versus the Indian, now the Indian and Dutchman versus Mr. Bates, now the Indian and Mr. Bates versus the Dutchman. At every instant the combinations varied with kaleidoscopic swiftness. They shouted, they danced, and they shook their fists towards where they guessed each other's faces were. The Indian, who had been drinking whiskey between intervals of the quarrel, suddenly began to rail and howl in his own language, and at times even the Dutchman lapsed into the vernacular. The Kanaka woman lost her wits altogether, and declared that in three more minutes she would ring for the police.

Then all at once the Dutchman swung both fists around him and caught the Indian a tremendous crack in the side of the head. The Indian vented an ear-splitting war-whoop and began pounding Mr. Bates who stood next to him. In the next instant the three were fighting all over the room. They lost each other, they struck furious blows at the empty air, they fell over tables and chairs, or suddenly came together with a dreadful shock and terrible cries of rage. The Dutchman bumped against Leander and before he could get away had smashed his silk hat down over his ears. The noise of their shouting could have been heard a block.

"Thief, thief."

"Teef yourselluf, pay oop dose finf thalers."

"No have got, no have got."

And then the door swung in and four officers began rounding them up like stampeded sheep. Not until he was in the wagon could the Dutchman believe that it was not the Indian and Mr. Bates who had him by either arm, and even in the wagon, as they were being driven to the precinct station-house, the quarrel broke out from time to time.

As we heard the rattle of the patrol-wagon's wheels growing fainter over the cobbles, we rose to go. The Kanaka stood with her hands on her hips glaring at the zinc table with its remnants of truffle, chicken and beefsteak and its empty botttes. Then she exclaimed, "And I'm shy four dollars and six bits."

On the following Saturday night Leander and I were coming from a Mexican dinner at Luna's. Suddenly some one caught our arms from behind. It was Cluness.

"I want to thank you fellows again," he exclaimed, "for your kindness to those three blind chaps the other night. It was really good of you. I believe they had five dollars to spend between them. It was really fine of you, Leander."

"Oh, I don't mind five dollars," said Leander, "if it can make a poor fellow any happier for a few moments. That's the only thing that's worth while in this life."

"I'll bet you felt better and happier for doing it."

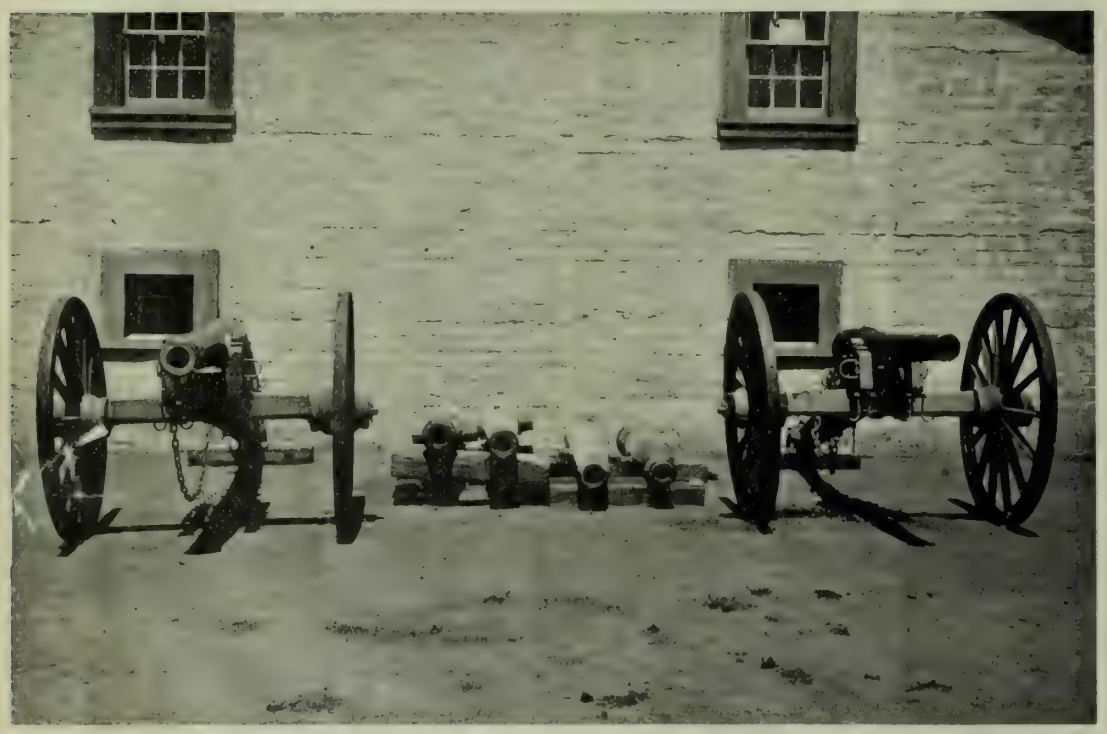
"Well, it did make me happy."

"Of course, and those three fellows will never forget that night'.'

"No, I guess they won't," said Leander.

A Primitive Cart

The Lake



Means of Defense

An Interior

Some Pioneer Relics

The Central Building

Outside the Gate

SUTTER'S FORT AT SACRAMENTO: A PLACE OF REFUGE FOR EARLY CALIFORNIANS

Photos by F. M. Braddock, Sacramento

HOW SAN FRANCISCO LIVES

IV.

The City Has a Weekly Bill for Over Forty Thousand Chickens.

It is a matter of record that when a traveler visited the old Missions, the hospitable monks stuffed a roast chicken or two into his holsters, when he left, to assuage the pangs of hunger when on the road; yet, when the Missions were secularized, the idle knaves into whose hands they fell so grossly negelected the chicken-yard, that McClellan quotes roasting fowls at the ridiculous price of ten dollars a pair. Sutter supplied them to early immigrants at a more reasonable figure; indeed, at New Helvetia the supply of ducks, quail, and sage hens was so profuse that, if he had set a fancy value on his poultry, he would have had to eat them himself.

The San Franciscan has always been a chicken eater. At the present time he consumes about 3,500 dozen chickens per week — 2,000 grown in the State, and 1,500 imported from the East, chiefly from Kansas—which, allowing a bird to a meal, implies 42,000 meals of chicken consumed each week. Dedncting the people who cannot afford chicken, the rest of the population must dine on chicken once a week. It is a luxury. At wholesale chickens are worth an average of $6 a dozen, or 50 cents each; this is counting young broilers, roasters, and hens for fricassee or soup all together. The uptown butcher and poulterer must make his profit, and housekeepers more often pay 75 cents for broilers and roasters than any smaller sum. Much higher prices are paid for such choice breeds as Mrs. Hume raises.

The old fashion of setting a hen on thirteen eggs, and waiting till she fulfills her duties of maternity, is quite passe. Old farmers who are behind the times, and raise a few dozen chickens in the season, still keep setting hens in corners of the hayloft; but the great bulk of the chickens raised in this State are evolved from the shell in incubators. Modern improvements in these substitutes for nature's machinery have reduced the business to a fixed science. All that is required for success is to keep the temperature uniform at the degree specified in the poulterer's guide; and when the pullets break through the shell, to guard them against rats. The poulterer must be sure of his eggs. Such poultry-raisers as Mrs. Hume, who has gone into the business scientifically, feed their hens according to rule, supplying them with ground bone as well as grain, and if the breed has been carefully selected, they have eggs daily through the laying season, and they can rely upon a succession of broods from the incubator.

The largest henneries in the State are at Petaluma. In that flourishing hamlet everybody raises chickens, and many people have grown rich at it. Their birds command prices which would astonish dwellers in the Central States. They sell for simply twice the price they would be worth in Kansas City; and yet, on the Missouri, poultry must be housed during the winter or their feet will freeze when they roost, and the bird will die or stop growing. Throughout the year the California chicken can forage successfully for his living, while in Missouri, Kansas and Illinois, he must be supplied with regular rations of corn. It would seem that before long, roasters and broilers must fall in our markets to something like half their present prices, while the growers will make as much as ever by increasing the volume of their output. Fancy chickens will probably continue to command fancy prices. Mrs. Hume raised a breed which she calls Plymouth Puffs, and which is worth $100 a pair.

Next to chickens, turkeys are our favorite poultry. They come from all parts of the State and from Oregon. From November 1st to the middle of January or February 1st our markets receive seventy-five cases daily, each case containing about 150 pounds of turkey. During Thanksgiving week about 500 tons of turkey are used in this city, and as much during Christmas week. The average wholesale price is 16 cents a pound. Between January 15th and February 15th many cars are received here from the North and East, each car containing twelve tons of frozen turkey. This is placed on cold storage, and is consumed in the following spring and summer, when turkeys are out of season.

When turkeys are out, spring chickens too small to broil, and roasting fowls fattening for the table, ducks come in. Here again the old fashions have gone out. The old domestic duck, which was raised in a duck-pond, and eaten when he weighed three pounds, is almost a thing of the past. Everybody is now raising the Peking duck, which at its perfection will weigh seven pounds, and with green peas and a stuffing of sage and onions, is a dish for the gods. The only present consumers of the old small duck are the Chinese. It is said that they hatch duck eggs in boxes of sand set over a stove. In the East and in England the domestic duck is much prized. It is killed when it weighs five or six pounds, and is eight months old. It is a cousin german of the mallard.

Our Peking ducks come in about May 1st and go out October 1st. They are worth $4.50 to $7.50 per dozen, according to size and condition. On October 1st the canvasback season opens, when the noble bird, in company with his poor relations, the sprig and the mallard and the teal, wings his flight from the icy north to the wild celery-ponds of California, and fulfills his destiny on the dinner-table either here or in the East. He is worth at wholesale, in an ordinary year, from $9 to $10 a dozen. There have been seasons when canvasbacks were so scarce in the waters of Maryland that our market was cleared of them, and they sold in New York for shipment to London as high as $10 a pair. As to this, O'Brien & Spotorno, who are the largest of our wholesale dealers, cock their eye and say that they do not remember a time when they conld not supply canvasback at $1.50 a pair.

It has been said that the only geese in this State are of the human variety. Certain it is that the white goose which is hawked through the streets in winter for sale at two bits, and the grey goose which is sold in the markets, do not deserve to be classed with the majestic birds which are smoked in Westphalia, or eaten roasted with chestnut stuffing on the feast of St. Martin in France. The European goose will weigh fifteen pounds and furnish a meal for a dinner-party; the Canada goose, which is consumed in the East, is almost as large. When the bones are deducted from our white goose or grey goose, a man with an appetite might eat it all, and afterward trifle with a filet. O'Brien & Spotorno sell them at $4.50 a dozen, and Providence in its mercy may possibly forgive them for the deed, though the buyer never will.

It is even doubtful whether our grey goose has a liver. The Strasburg goose, mindful of the object of its creation, follows the example of the hammer-headed shark, and runs all to liver, abstaining carefully from water, and roasting itself before a hot fire in order to contract enlargement of the organ which is to furnish pate de foie gras. The natnral kingdom affords few examples of such noble self-sacrifice and devotion to the service of humanity.

JOHN BONNER.

FELDING TIME AT THE PRESIDIO

A PETALUMA POULTRY-YARD

---

The case of Private Hammond's ill treatment by Captain Lovering, at Fort Sherman, has revived many stories of hard usage of men by army officers. The New York Sun tells of a case that was undoubtedly unique in horror:

It was reserved for the commanding officer of an Arizona post, a one-company outfit, to inflict so barbarous punishment upon an offending soldier that the whole scale of punishments in the United States Army was revised and made hard and fast. This commanding officer was a Captain, and the affair happened in 1879. He had in his company a soldier who was a very hard case, and put in most of his time in the guardhouse. He completed a guardhouse term in the autumn of 1879, and immediately repaired to the near-by town of whiskey shacks and made himself exceedingly drunk. He returned to the post with the announced intention of raising it to the level of the desert and firing a volley over it's ashes. The Captain had him lassoed as he was entering the post. The Captain then constituted himself a summary court-martial and passed upon the case. He ordered that a hole sufficiently large to receive the upright body of a man be dug in the sand of the parade ground. When the hole was dug the Captain ordered that the hard-case soldier be stood in it up to his neck and that the sand be then repacked around him as tightly as possible, covering his arms and shoulders, and leaving only his head protruding above the ground.

The Captain's orders were obeyed. The offending soldier, still more than half drunk, was packed in the sandhole, his head alone catching the rays of the blazing semi-tropical sun, and sentry was placed over him. The sun was nothing compared to to the desert ants. The desert ants sent out their couriers to the highways and byways and dunes and hollows, and it was no time at all before some thousands of them, big, red, spiderlike and ferocious, were running over the soldier's head. They crawled into his ears and his nose and his mouth, and they caused him such unspeakable agony that he shouted in frenzy. The sentry—who happened to be the poor devil's bunkie—first disobeyed guard regulations to the extent of stooping to brush the ants from his comrade's face. Next he disobeyed orders to the extent of deliberately walking over to the house of the Captain. He took his rifle along with him.

"What do you mean by leaving your post?" demanded the Captain.

"Because I don't stand for this kind of game for you or any other man from here to hell and back," replied the sentry. The whole company, seeming to have sprung from the ground, was right behind him. "And if you don't order that man turned loose in two seconds, I'll turn him loose myself."

The Captain turned to one of his sergeants.

"Arrest that sentry and take his gun and belt from him," he said.

"I'll shoot any man dead that lays a hand on me," said the sentry quietly; but it was not necessary for him to say it, for the sergeant stood stock still with his hands behind his back. All were with the sentry.

The sentry strode across the parade ground and found his prisoner insensible. The ants had made his face look like a beefsteak. With his fixed bayonet the sentry dug the unconscious man from the sand, and carried him in his arms to the post hospital and dropped him at the feet of the post surgeon. Then he walked to the commanding officer's quarters, handed the commanding officer his gun and belt, walked out of the post, and has never been seen or heard of in the United States Army from that day to this.

When the War Department got wind of the matter the Captain was court-martialed, suspended for a year and scorched by the Secretary of War. That was the extent of his punishment.

SUTTER'S FORT.

BY LUCIUS HARWOOD FOOTE

I stood by the old fort's crumbling wall,
On the eastern verge of the town;
The sun through clefts in the ruined hall,
Flecked with its light the rafters brown,

And, sifting with gold the oaken floor,
Seemed to burnish the place anew;
While out and in, through the half-closed door,
Building their nests, the swallows flew.

Charmed by the magic spell of the place,
The present vanished, the past returned;
While rampart and fortress filled the space,
And yonder the Indian camp-fires burned.

I heard the sentinel's measured tread,
The challenge prompt, the quick reply;
I saw on the tower, above my head,
The Mexican banner flaunt the sky.

Around me were waifs from every clime,
Blown by the fickle winds of chance;
Knights-errant, ready at any time,
For any cause, to couch a lance.

The stanch old captain, with courtly grace,
Owner of countless leagues of land,
Benignly governs the motly race,
Dispensing favors with open hand.

His long-horned herds on the wild oats feed,
While brown vaqueros, with careless rein,
Swinging reatas, at headlong speed
Are dashing madly over the plain.

Only a moment the vision came;
Where tower and rampart stood before,
Where flushed the night with the camp's red flame,
Dust and ashes and nothing more.

Borne to my ear on the ambient air,
Mingled with sounds of childish glee,
I heard again the low hum of care,
Like the restless moan of the sea.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

Actually, Diary dear, I feel like a politician who unexpectedly has had an office conferred upon him and who can hardly express his thanks to his constituents. I am "too full for utterance." You know, I am almost afraid that some dire misfortune is imminent. I am fey with happiness. Last week I thought I was satiated with pleasure, but I find that "increase of appetite has grown by what it fed on." I simply cannot drink too deeply of this, not Pierian Spring, but ambrosial. Everyone is vieing with someone else to see how gay a time they will give us this year. We are to have balls!! Diary, actually, in San Francisco—real, genuine balls, and private affairs at that. Think of it, dream of it. I cannot realize it, and three—t-h-r-e-e. There is the Bruguiere ball on the 17th to all the debutantes. Mrs. Thomas introduces Helen at a ball on the 18th, and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis is to give one to Susie Blanding and Margaret Salisbury on the evening that we Terpsichoreans give our first cotillion. We are disgusted about it, as we cannot be ubiquitous, and are going to our own affair, be there fifty other entertainments.

Then numbers of the men are coming to us, and I do not know where they will find sufficient to go round. There are two new men this year, only two—one is a civilian, Mr. Ben Holladay, the other is Mr. Wolf, who is stationed at the Presidio. I like them both. Mr. Wolf has a very cordial manner, I might almost call it gushing. One feels that he simply lives on the smiles of the maiden with whom he happens to be conversing. Mr. Holladay is quite young, but tremendously good-looking—tall and dark. He lives at the Palace, and is one of those fortunate people who has no disagreeable profession to worry over. He can go to all our affairs, even in the morning. All of us girls are quite "crushed," to be slangy, I only hope his head will not be turned.

Now as to what I have been doing since last week.

On Friday I went to the luncheon given to us girls by Emma Butler, at the Hotel Richelieu. It was a very pretty affair but did not differentiate in any particular from the usual luncheon. It took place in the main dining room so that all the other guests had an opportunity of gazing on our many and varied charms and of comparing one of us with another. We are a symphony in tans this year—nearly every one has one tan frock which speaks flatteringly of our complexions, does it not? For my own part I do not like luncheons in public dining rooms unless, perhaps, it be the Palace, where the room is so large that one is apart from all the other guests.

Then on Saturday we all went to Bessie Ames' tea. Arthur said he never saw a goodlier collection of comely maidens than were assembled there. We debutantes are charmingly pretty this year. I must say so even be it interdicta. We all wore white organdie gowns and looked deliciously sweet and bread and buttery. It is only in the appearance, however. Some of us are "cakey," others "gamey," but bread and butter—well that went out of date with mittens and spinning wheels, I believe. There were loads of men—a most unusual circumstance at a tea, but I understand they are all coming this year. Last season they were invited merely—some of them called afterward and some did not—we girls, however, are attractive enough to even have them at our crushes. I do not know which of us looked the best' Bessie Ames looked sausy and dear. Marie Wells looked really lovely in white, Charlotte Ellinwood was very attractive, Lillie Follis is stunning, Ethel Keeny, piquante, Leontine Blakeman and Mamie Polhemus, very striking. Though Arthur says he would not like to be a Paris with only one apple, I fancy beauties even among goddesses, must have been a scarcer commodity in the days of Helen of Troy.

Then Gertie Carroll's luncheon in honor of Julia Crocker was exceedingly pretty. Several of the debutantes and a few of the older girls were there. We had no wine. Thus far this year wine is eschewed at girls' luncheons. A number of us are strictly blue ribbonites, you know. There is quite a lively amount of discussion among the older ladies as to the wisdom of having punch at afternoon teas. Mamma and Aunt Caroline are very much opposed to it and we had quite an argument on the subject the other day at luncheon. Aunt Sybil believes in punch, but insists that it should be rather mild, while Mamma and Aunt Caroline contend that it is an abominable practice luring young men to destruction. I do think there is much to be said against it. I know Arthur went to one tea last year where they had very delicious but dangerously strong punch and the results were—well, disastrous in a brother—funny in another chap. Some of the boys were quite gay and lively, you know, and Arthur told me he had a fearful headache the next day, and I never knew him to drink so much water save after a stag party at one of the clubs.

Another tremendously smart luncheon was that given in the 'Varsity Club on Thursday, by Mrs. Colton in honor of Helen Thornton. We were all there, and the table looked exquisite. Oh, I forgot about, perhaps my jolliest afternoon, Wednesday, when the ladies of the Century Club threw open their new rooms. They gave a little play—that one of Howells called "Unexpected Guests." Jessie Glascock took the principal part and carried off the laurels. Mr. and Mrs. Howard, Ethel Beaver, Alick Baldwin, Cora Smedberg and Mr. Minxner took the other parts. Mr. Minxner was easily the best of the men; he plays like a professional. Miss Annie Beaver, who is president of the club, made a most charming hostess. The club rooms are wonderfully improved, the papering is so pretty and fresh looking, one would hardly recognize the old place—pretty window seats in harmonious tones—altogether as comfortable as a man's club.

By the way, we are all going to the Woman's Exchange Benefit at the Columbia next Monday night. It is to be a very smart affair. Dozens of parties have been made up already. The Herrmanns are very interesting and clever people, you know, and all the girls are talking about some new tricks which they are bringing out.

MISS ADELAIDE PATRICK

Whose engagement to Mr. E. J. Cote has been announded

Now, Diary dear, I fancy I have told you all the events of this week. In the future the horizon just teems with teas and luncheons. On Saturday three teas—Mrs. Keeney introduces Ethel and Leontine Blakeman, at a very large affair. Afterwards those who assist in receiving are to be given a dinner. Then Mrs. Charles Fox Tay will be at home from four to seven, and Mrs. John Boggs of Colusa, who has taken the Breeze's house, is to give a reception next week. Gweneth Henley gives a debutante's luncheon to Marie Wells on Tuesday, and Mrs. Murphy is to give a luncheon at the Palace to Addie on Thursday. The Ellinwoods are to give a reception to married people and a dance on December 1st. Therese Morgan gives a tea and dinner dance on the 12th of November and Marie Wells on the 13th. And so farewell for another week.

From your loving, though weary,

MISS CRICKET.

* *

Among the most interesting of social announcements, is that of the wedding of Miss Blanche Castle and Mr. Charles David Farquharson, which is to be solemnized at the Castle house, 2424 Steiner street on Thursday next.

There is considerable talk about the San Francisco Verein's entertainment next Saturday night. It is to be a floral fete and a dance, and inagurates the club's winter festivities. Something very swell is promised.

The Casserley-Cudahy wedding was duly celebrated in Chicago, on Wednesday last, with Archbishop Riordan officiating. W. O'B. McDonough was best man, and Miss Casserley went East for the occasion. The newspapers say it was a very interesting affair, but for the intimate particulars we will have to wait.

The Bohemian Club has decided not to tie itself up to the Post street quarters. There was a big meeting the other night, and, after due consideration, it was concluded not to accept a jinks room at the cost of a ten-year lease. Mr. Lent, who owns the building, offered to add a fourth story in which there should be a great hall, provided the club would agree to remain his tenants for another decade, but the idea did meet with favor. It was looking a bit too far ahead, and it was voted down, which was very sensible. It was really only a lack of courage which prevented the institution entering into the enjoyment of the Wenban building, and the time will come when it will take possession of a home of its own. The present lease has two years longer to run, and at the end of that time the club is privileged to have a renewal for five years more.

* *

The season in Oakland has thus far at least been a disappointment. Opening with so much eclat, great were the anticipations for an exceedingly gay winter. We have, of course, the allotted number of teas, a sprinkling of receptions, dinners and luncheons; but the reign of the function has ceased as suddenly as it began. There is not even a hint of any large private affairs in the future. The Prather-Miller wedding is to be immensely smart. It is to take place on Wednesday, November 3d, at St. Paul's Church. The young people hoped to be married in St. John's Church, which is being rebuilt, but it would have meant a considirable delay. The reception afterwards is to be comparatively small, only the immediate friends having been invited. When one realizes the immense Prather-Miller connection, however, even a family party becomes of formidable proportions.

There are some rather interesting dinners to chronicle this week, among them a farewell affair to Miss Florence Sharon and a dinner by Mrs. Robert Price. The Sharon party was given by a trio of bachelors who have taken the Bugbee cottage on Lake street and have gone in for housekeeping. Mrs. Sharon chaperoned the young people who had a rarely jolly evening. Among them were Miss Pauline Fore, Niss Sharon, and Margaret Knight. Miss Florence Sharon is to leave for Washington early next week. About a dozen men and maids were invited by Mrs. Robert Price, on Friday evening, at her home on Linda Vista Terrace. The decorations were in chrysanthemums.

Of receptions, the most important was that of Mr. and Mrs. Jenks at the home of Mr. J. C. Martin. The whole house was decorated with chrysanthemums. Before the reception a breakfast was served to a number of Mrs. Jenks' friends including the bridal party. The young people had much fun, especially when the cake was cut. Miss Hutchings had the good fortune to receive the ring; the coin fell to Dr. Anna Sawyer and the thimble to Miss Davis. About two hundred guests paid their revoirs during the afternoon.

Another at home was that of Miss Blix Smith in honor of Miss Grace Hilborn on Tuesday of last week. There were a goodly number of guests. Miss Smith was assisted in receiving by Miss Kenna, Miss Murray, Mrs. Howard Bray and Mrs. Henry Gray.

An interesting series of lectures has been arranged by Mrs. John Phillips and managed by Mrs. Horace Wilson. The subjects are artistic and literary, I believe. The lectures will be given at Mrs. Phillips' house on Thursday mornings. The next on the list is "Scenes from the Life of Christ."

A very pretty home wedding was that of Miss Ethel Harte Wyman and Dr. Hilliard Wasser, which took place at the home of the bride's sister, Mrs. S. J. Taylor, on Linda Vista Terrace. Miss Wyman is a charming looking girl, very dark, with bright black eyes and animated expression. She is a niece of Bret Harte. Dr. Wasser is a young physician stationed at the Wellington coal mines, Nanaimo. Miss Wyman wore white silk and carried bride roses. Little Miss Margaret Taylor was her sole attendant.

A cotillion club is being organized in Berkeley this winter. There are to be three germans given in Shattuck Hall. The patronesses are Mrs. Martin Kellogg, Mrs. Davenport, Mrs. John Garber, Mrs. Wm. Duff, Mrs. Deane, Mrs. Bacon, Mrs. Blake and Mrs. Greenleaf. The first meeting is to take place on Wednesday, December 1st.

A smart affair was the reception given on Friday evening by Mrs. Boone, in honor of Professor Haskell and Mr. Moore. About fifty young people were invited to meet them. Mrs. Boone looked very well in a combination of pompadour silk and turquoise blue velvet. Among the prettiest of the girls were Miss Ruth Rising in white organdie and Miss Florence Green, who wore a sweet little frock of green silk veiled in figured organdie. The house was decorated with ferns and flowers, which were arranged in Indian baskets with charming effect.

Among the future events is a large party to be given by the Misses Crellin on Thursday. Mrs. Clay has issued cards for an at home on Friday next. Mrs. A. A. Pennoyer, who has been spending the last eighteen months in Europe, is on her way home. Mrs. Pennoyer has travelled extensively during her stay. She made Paris her headquarters and placed her children in school there. During their vacations she took them to see the various points of interest. Mr. H. M. A. Miller has gone on a short trip to Mexico. His brother, Mr. Harry Miller, is at present in Portland, Oregon, the guest of Mr. Farrell.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles. Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

THE THEATRES

An American Beauty That is Neither Beautiful Nor Interesting.

Some one more prodigal than prudent is burning money with the Corinne company. There was a strong odor of incinerated dollars in the dress circle and orchestra of the Columbia this week. "An American Beauty" was the attraction that failed in its purpose, and New York—poor New York! jay New York! was again libelled, for the play bills announced the opera comique as "the great New York Casino success." No one can truthfully label the production a San Francisco success, for it was a flat, dismal, weary failure. It is not even clever nonsense. The book is stupid, and the people all harmonize beautifully with the book. Gustave Kerker, whoever he may be, is responsible for the music. He gives us some things good in the way of a chorus or two, and no doubt the gentleman has it in him to do excellent work, but he took himself too seriously in this undertaking and forgot the popular ear demands something beside technically clever music. "The American Beauty" type of performance has had its day. With "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and some other types of dramatic performance, its place is now in the backwoods, not in a metropolis.

Of Corinne's company little may be said in praise. Owen Fitzgerald has a rather pleasing voice, and just escapes having a good-looking face. His walk and bearing are painfully awkward to behold, and one is constantly agitated while Fitz is on the stage, lest he may be suffering from a colic or some more serious pain—so doubled up is he. The young ladies of the company are of a very plain sort; but the fact that abbreviated skirts and no skits at all expose abbreviated limbs and no limbs at all does not add interest to the situation. But they are good girls—which is something.

Corinne herself is a curious little mixture. She has the eyes that mean much, for there are fire, volcanoes and all sorts of disturbances behind them. One might have some fear of her were it not for the mouth and chin that disclose a strongly sympathetic and kindly nature. She is not pretty. Certainly not when she smiles broadly. I cannot recall when I first saw this young lady, nor how often, but if she cares to know when she looks her best, let her actually play her mandolin before a camera, for there comes into her face then a something womanly, thoughtful, perhaps tender; at all events, more pleasing than the broad smile that is hers. One knows innumerable people who look best when talking or smiling—others when their mouths are hermetically sealed. Corinne is one of the latter. It has been a misfortune of this young lady since she has grown to womanhood to tie herself to some of the worst companies it has ever been my misfortune to know, usually accompanied by an extravaganza something worse than the performers. She will succeed in injuring herself financially and wrecking her chances theatrically, unless she cuts entirely away from present environments and makes a new departure. This advice is gratis, but it seems to be needed.

B.

* *

A charming figure is Mme. Orbasany, the lady with the cockatoos at the Orpheum—pretty and pleasing with deep dark eyes and hair to match, a picture-like costume and jaunty cap. But the fair Orbasany is merely incidental, the cockatoos are the thing—there are about a dozen of them, all remarkably well trained and well behaved. They dance about and pirouette, turn over bars and somersaults, open gates, play with cards and march in truly martial manner, and through it all the madam flits about with a little stick in her hand saying little words in Russian. The act is the most pleasing and graceful the Orpheum has had for many a moon. The Biograph comes at the end of the programme after rather weary waiting. The machine is in almost perfect condition, reproducing life most naturally.

* *

"The Ensign" appeals to the American heart

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

Rubber heels: Easy walking, no fatigue. At Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

When the Curtain Rises

The Situation in Act II

SCENES FROM "THE GEISHA"
Marceau, photo

in a rather peculiar manner; it is melodramatic and unnatural in many ways but it is good just the same. At Morosco's this week it is receiving much favor, of which considerable is due to the elaborate setting. The double deck of the U. S. S. San Jacinto is really a fine bit of stage work, and the view of Moro Castle and the Havana harbor, a pretty perspective. As for the acting, it is always acceptable at Morosco's tinged with the real melodramatic dye. H. S. K.

THE HENSCHEL CONCERT

The Beautiful Art of Perfect Rendering Delightfully Exhibited.

In these days of the culture of specialism, every kind of effort which arrives meets with its deserts. Be the cult either large or limited there is always in matters musical sufficient encouragement held out to those who reach the standard. If the standard is a great one so much the better; if an ordinary one, the appreciation is equal, providing, always, that the artist fulfills his or her intention. Perhaps no better examples of intentions lived up to are to be heard than the Henschels.

Singing as an art, in its pure and original state, is bound up with those eternal verities, felt by and evenly eluding the most cultivated and ignorant, and only to be appreciated in the actual performance of what is called great singing. Mainly traceable to modern life in its complex rapidity, the accomplishing of real singing grows more difficult, and the demand for any kind of song grows greater, so that the public will take the best it can get rather than wait for the best that is possible. Those pure, voluminous, liquid voices coming down in tradition to us, are scarcely heard in this generation, and are a divine accident, rather than the outcome of severe and intense study. Tone is dethroned and emotion and elocutionary style reign supreme. Models of the great school are so rare that the general public has not much chance of comparison, and all kinds of qualities are accepted which in themselves have nothing to do with beauty of tone itself. Toleration is the shield of bad art.

In the main, the success of artists of the type of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel lies in a wide sympathy and appreciation of the underlying principles of art. Not special singing art, but in the art of presenting ideas with finesse, calmness and a certain intimate simplicity. Quite frank, absolutely without pose is the desire to give a truthful, interesting and graceful idea of the contents of those gems of art, which are chosen with the finest of taste, by the way. A glance over their programme is sufficient to show that only good work comes under the crucible of these artists study. Such readings as they give are all spontaneous, there is no method of interpreting, no laboriously worked out scheme of elocutionizing, such as local performers agonize over and under. With the advantage of these gifts, combined in personnel, ease and a certain air of unconscious good breeding, the singing of these artists makes an immediate impression on the portion of an audience whose sympathy is worth having, the other portion of the house is quietly ignored. Genuine feeling of enjoyment for the intrinsic quality of the numbers illustrated, displayed so candidly and with so little of mere personal mannerism, is as winsome a charm as it is rare. Everything that good taste and æsthetic judgment can do to make a performance delightful is done, and from beginning to end the atmosphere of real art exhales over all.

Such admirable gift and talent as Mr. Henschel shows in his musicianship in sustaining, supporting and developing the numbers with his piano playing, has probably never been equalled here. The ready memory and the fluent and certain control of the piano-forte medium in itself would stamp him as a gifted artist—filled as it should be with the enclosing spirit of the compositions as they developed themselves. This playing was the solid masonry upon which the whole structure of the singing seemingly rested. Both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel enter an art world true to itself with the singing of every number, and whatever the style they have a fresh and interesting something to express.

Deep feeling, true sentiment, tender gaiety, humor, pathos and a healthy and happy sense of the beauty of emotion permeates the whole effort, to the achievement of a perfection such as many will treasure through years of artistic experiences. The public recognized that combination of joy in art and "sweetness and light" uniquely combined in this delightful musical couple.

As to the singing itself these artists are not strictly tone artists. Having at command a certain method of tone they give themselves over an reservedly to developing the delivery of their imaginative pictures with a refreshing certainty. That the quality of tone shall be ever perfection and nothing but perfection, there is no evidence, they evidently regard that side of their art as of less importance. Consummate exquisite tone does not play any especial part. Mrs. Henschel has a limit of volume, as likewise has her gifted husband, and wear has not improved in the latter what could never have been a pure negative tone. Where there is so much that is delightful and admirable only an inexorable tone sense will regret the absence of perfect tone—and the tone sense is fortunately, or otherwise, not a common one. In Mr. Henschel a flatness of timbre and in Mrs. Henschel a prima facie shortness of resonance, as well as that peculiar spreading of intonation coming from the German habit of covering the high tones, makes itself apparent to tone lovers, but does not interfere with the apparent spontaneity of effort, or the enjoyment of this artistic side of their work. The beauty of the artistic side of their work is so apparent that the public and lovers of the classic leids, however, will find an intense gratification coming in a form as refined and gracious as the personalities of two charming and distinguished artists can make the beautiful art of perfect rendering.

LESLEY MARTIN.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

An Interesting Delusion in Madame Hermann's Repertoire
Thors, photo

Artistic competence, combined with sound business principles, account for the great popularity of Huber's Orchestra. Address 20 O'Farrell street. Telephone care Benj. Curtaz, Main 1247.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"Lost, Strayed or Stolen" comes to the Baldwin Monday evening with a company of sixty people, including a large chorus and a troupe of Spanish dancers. The piece is a musical comedy in four acts by J. Cheever Goodwin and Woolson Morse. Charles Dickson heads the company.

The Italian Grand Opera Company opens its season at the California, Tuesday evening, with "La Gioconda." "The Masked Ball" will be given on Wednesday, the double bill, "Cavelleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci," on Thursday, and "Il Trovatore" Friday evening and Saturday matinee. On Saturday evening Puccini's new opera, "La Boheme," will be sung, for the first time in this country.

We have had cake walkers and cake walkers of many moods and manners, but the monarchs of them all come to the Orpheum next week—Billie and Willie Farrell, the world's champions, whose walking in Madison Square Garden some years ago literally took the cake. Two other new people are Foy & Clark, eccentric comedy duo. The Biograph has a number of new views and Mme. Orbasany continues with her cockatoos.

The Hermanns come to the Columbia Monday evening with a newly arranged programme of dance and mystery. Their new act of decapitation has created a sensation, and their other illusions, "The Maid of the Moon" and "The Hindoo Clock" are said to be equally as good. Mme. Hermann has invented a new fire dance and will reappear in some of her old creations. The attraction following the Herrmann engagement, which is for two weeks, will be "In Old Kentucky."

For next week the Alcazar announces a revival of The Highest Bidder. This is the piece that first won recognition for E. H. Sothern, and although played frequently since then, still possesses much interest. Wright Huntington is cast for Jack Hammer ton; Wallace Shaw, Bonham Cheviot; Charles Bates, Sir Evelaine Craine, and Gertrude Foster, Louise Thornhill. "The Girl I Left Behind Me" is underlined to follow.

At the Michelena benefit at the Tivoli this afternoon the programme will consist of the "William Tell" overture by the orchestra, harp solo "Valse Caprice" by Mrs. Marquardt, scene and aria from "Trovatore," and last act from "Lucia" by Michelena and company. The second part includes a number of Spanish songs in costume by Michelena and the Spanish Students.

Melodrama returns to Morosco's next week with the presentation of Joseph D. Clifton's well-known play, "777." The piece is of the sensational sort, full of exciting realism and dramatic effect. The scenery and costumes have been apecially prepared and the production promises to be generally satisfactory. W. H. Pascoe assumes the treble role of George Malcomb, Miss Hall, Mr. Snow and the balance of the company are suitably cast. A number of specialties are to be given.

The engagement has just been made public of Miss Adelaide Patrick, eldest daughter of Mr. A. B. Patrick, the wholesale leather merchant, to Mr. E. J. Cote, of St. Louis, Mo. Miss Patrick is a strikingly handsome girl of a decidedly brunette type and is quite a favorite among the younger set. The prospective groom is well known in business and club circles both here and in the East.

The Music Teachers' Association of California will give a concert at Byron Mauzy Hall next Wednesday evening, November 3d. The admission is by invitation only, to be obtained from members of the Association.

"The Geisha" commences its third week at the Tivoli to-morrow evening. The opera has caught on immensely and will likely run some weeks longer. "Rip Van Winkle" comes next and then the Christmas spectacle modelled after Mother Goose.

"The rummiest marster I ever 'ad," said an old gamekeeper in a Northern county, "wur t'ould Parson Sharp. He wur as blind as a bat, he wur." "And did he go shootin'?" asked one of the interested audience. "Shootin'? Yes—he shot reg'lar. But he couldn't see, he couldn't. When anythin' rose, I used to cry, 'Birds, sir!' and then I'd run behind parson, and the dogs 'ud run behind me, and we'd all go dancin' round behind t'ould gentleman, while he blazed away with both bar'ls."

Henry Russell, the composer, was once singing in public his song, "There's a Good Time Coming," when he was staggered by a gentleman arising in the audience and gravely asking, "Won't you oblige us with the date?"

Mount Vernon Pure Rye.

Distillery bottling, square bottles only. The public appreciate a good article when they can get it. Sold by all first-class dealers.

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

GENIUS AND MATRIMONY

An Interesting Book About the Wives and the Wooing of Great Men.

One may be a genius and married and yet be happy. To the majority of people who recall the misfortunes of Carlyle and the infidelities of Byron, this may seem a daring assumption, but it is proved by the author of The Love Affairs of Some Famous Men (Frederick A. Stokes Company). In this volume of some three hundred and forty pages, he relates the courtships and matrimonial entanglements of some of the greatest soldiers, statesmen, artists and preachers the world has had, and the conclusion is irresistible. Many of them not only loved their wives but were devoted; even sentimental husbands. Save in the instance of Byron, Goethe and Shelley, this especial set of eminent personages seem to have been more constant and gentle than their mates who were often females of uncertain temper and exasperating manner. It is impossible to generalize further though the evidence submitted is most abundant. Geniuses in selecting their spouses go about it much as other men do, and take all those chances in the lottery which nature imposes on the rest of us. If fate had endowed them with a true woman then their happiness transcended the ordinary—witness the marriages of Hawthorne and Browning. If not, they suffered as did Carlyle, Lincoln or John Wesley, whose spouse used, in her paroxysms of jealous rage, to drag him around by the hair. That unfortunate preacher realized all the terrors of the termagant. Mrs. Wesley used to watch her husband, open his letters, spy upon him—in fact subject him to every torment and insult. Not that he suffered in silence for he protested. "I dislike," he writes, "not having the command of my own house, not being at liberty to invite even my nearest relations so much as to drink a dish of tea without disobeying you. I dislike your talking against me behind my back, and that every day and almost every hour of the day making my faults (real or supposed), the standing topic of your conversation."

Maybe, however, Wesley was a trying personage, but he was a saint in comparison to George Whitefield who in proposing for the young woman he had decided to marry, wrote to her parents:

"This comes like Abraham's servant to Rebekah's relations to know whether you think your daughter, Miss E., is a proper person to engage in such an undertaking? If so, whether you will be pleased to give me leave to propose marriage unto her? You need not be afraid of sending me a refusal; for, I bless God, if I know anything of my own heart, I am free from that foolish passion which the world calls love. I write only because I believe it is the will of God that I should alter my state; but your denial will fully convince me that your daughter is not the person apointed by God for me."

I am glad to say the maiden in question refused to succumb to this very deliberate wooing and convinced him as aforesaid. Bishop Hall had great good fortune in matrimony, though the choice of a helpmate was made for him by a friend. This is how he describes his entry into the wedded state:

"The uncouth solitariness of my life, and the extreme incommodity of my single housekeeping, drew my thoughts to the necessity of the married state, which God, no less strangely, provided for me; for walking from the church on Monday in the Whitsun week with a grave and reverend minister, I saw a comely and modest gentlewoman standing at the door of that house where we were invited to a wedding dinner, and inquiring of that worthy friend whether he knew her: 'Yes,' quoth he, 'I know her well, and have bespoken her for your wife.'"

The comely and modest gentlewoman made an excellent spouse and they lived in harmony together forty-nine years. The other clergymen whose experiences are detailed seem to have had better luck. Dean Stanley, who married Lady Augusta Bruce, was thoroughly happy—so was Dean Alford and Sydney Smith. But to turn from the ministry to war, one learns that the Duke of Wellington and his wife were unhappy. Some one asked the great soldier if he had not during his life inspired great admiration and enthusiasm among women. "Yes," he replied, "plenty of that—but no woman ever loved me."

As a young man he had fallen in love with Lady Catherine, daughter of the Earl of Langford, who refused his consent because Captain Wellesley had no coin. However, the lady assured him she would consider herself engaged to him, and with that understanding he went out to India. He returned eight years later Sir Arthur Wellesley and a great man, but Lady Catherine, in the meantime, had lost her beauty through smallpox. She offered her lover his freedom but he refused and they were wedded. A long separation such as this is often fatal to a sentiment, for subsequently the Duke was heard to say, "There is nothing in the world worth living for." More fortunate was Sir Henry Lawrence who found an ideal woman. She accompanied him on the most perilous journeys and assisted the performance of his duties as a good comrade might. Several pages are taken with a recital of the relations of the Duke of Marlborough and his wife. Sarah Jennings was a veritable beauty but her temper was that of a tigress. Her virtue was above suspicion because she loved her husband with a fierce and exclusive earnestness. After his death the Earl of Somerset asked her to marry him. "Were I only thirty," she replied, "I would not permit even the Emperor of the world to succeed in that heart which has been devoted to John, Duke of Marlborough." Though Marlborough's personal honor is tainted, in his relations with his wife he was most tender and devoted. He writes to her: "I do love and adore you with all my heart and soul—so much, that by all that is good I do and will ever be better pleased with your happiness than my own; but, oh my soul, if we might be both happy what inexpressible joy that would be." However, on another occasion he wrote to his Duchess from the Low Countries: "I have before me at this moment sixty thousand of the best soldiers in the world commanded by the best General in Europe and I am not half so much afraid of them as I am of you when you are angry."

The most romantic of military love affairs was that of Garibaldi, who loved at first sight and won a wife at once an Amazon and a Madonna. The great liberator was tramping the quarter deck of the Itaparica, wrapped in sad thoughts and longing for the sympathy and love of a woman. He tells in his autobiography the episode:

"My glance fell by chance upon the houses of the Barra, a little hill thus called at the entrance of the Laguna (of St. Catherine in Brazil), on which are some simple but picturesque dwellings. With the aid of my glass, which I habitually held in my hand when on the quarter-deck, I saw a young girl. I ordered the men to row me ashore in that direction, and disembarked, and made for the house which contained the object of my voyage, but could not find it, when I encountered a person of the place whom I had known on my first arrival. He invited me to take coffee at his house. We entered, and the first person on whom my gaze fell was the one who had caused my coming on shore. It was Anita, the mother of my children: the companion of my life in good and evil fortune: the woman whose courage I have so often desired! We both remained in an ecstatic silence, gazing at each other, like two persons who do not meet for the first time, and who seek in each other's lineaments something which shall revive remembrance. At last I saluted her, and I said, 'You must be mine!' I spoke but little Portuguese, and I spoke these audacious words in Italian. However, I seemed to have some magnetic power in my insolence. I had tied a knot which death alone could break."

Anita was indeed a soldier's bride. She stood beside Garibaldi in battle and encouraged his soldiers to deeds of valor. Once in a ship engagement, when urged by her husband to go below for her safety, she answered, "If I do, it will be but to drive out those cowards who have sought concealment there, and then return to fight."

The marriages of great scientific men seem to have been very happy, for they selected women who assisted them in their labors. Buckland dictated his books to his wife. Galvani's wife was the first to observe the froggy convulsions which led to the discovery of galvanic laws. The politicians seem also to have had good fortune in matrimony. William Cobbett married the daughter of an artilleryman who was the most devoted of women. Edmund Burke had infinite happiness out of his marriage. Lady Randolph Churchill certainly aided the career of her husband. It is interesting to note the circumstances of their first meeting:

Lord Randolph first met his future wife at a small dinner-party in Paris. Though the young statesman was little given to ladies' society, his attention was attracted to the lovely young American through the fluency and brilliant wit by which she carried on the conversation in French. When the evening was over, he said to a friend, "That is the brightest girl I have ever met."

Lord Beaconsfield married an extraordinary woman, the widow of his friend Wyndham Lewis. She was not beautiful, but most devoted, and she had many thousands a year. Though eccentric and vulgar she was an admirable wife, a true helpmate and confidante. When she was dying Beaconsfield said, "For thirty-three years she has never given me a dull moment." Lord Salisbury married against the will of his father a daughter of the late Baron Alderson. She is a most gifted and brilliant woman who threw herself heart and soul into the career of her husband. She wrote for the magazines during the period of their poverty, and is said to have contributed some of the smartest articles the Saturday Review ever published. Withal she has made her husband a most devoted wife. Our own Abraham Lincoln was very unfortunate. On the day first set for his marriage with Miss Todd he failed to appear at the church. The couple were reconciled however, and on the second occasion Lincoln appeared pale and trembling. Some one asked him where he was going, and he replied, "To hell, I suppose." She was a violent woman with excellent intentions, and Abraham obeyed her sedulously. Once a gardener at the White House asked Mrs. Lincoln if he should cut down a certain tree. She consented. Then he came to the President to ask him. "What does Mrs. Lincoln say?" he enquired. "That it shall be taken away. "Then, in God's name," exclaimed Lincoln, "cut it down to the roots." One might quote all night out of this most entertaining budget of tales. Really it is a most interesting, most entertaining volume this Love Affairs of Some Famous Men, and worthy a wide circulation.

C.

$2,000.00

Satisfactory:

Schilling's Best baking-powder and tea.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

BOOK NOTES

The holiday season is at hand and new books for children are appearing by the dozen. A contingent of pleasant stories prettily bound and cleverly illustrated cometh from the house of Roberts Bros. One of these is The Resolute Mr. Pansy, by John Trowbridge, in which the adventures of a young school teacher, who takes charge of a class of unruly boys in an out of the way village are narrated. After many trials and vicissitudes the young man tames his flock, interests them in electricity, incidentally reforms things and finally marries the belle of the village, all of which is accomplished in a very short time. The book is specially suited for boys—in particular for those interested in electricity.

Wanolasset, by A. G. Plympton, is something more stirring. The scene is in Massachusetts in the Puritan days, with the sanctimonious settlers and more or less savage Indians for principal characters. The heroine, a little Puritan maid called by the savages Wanolasset—"the little one who laughs"—is stolen in a raid by King Philip's tribe and carried away. She is finally rescued after much suffering and sorrow by her half-brother and a half civilized Indian. The story is well written, easily claiming attention. It is instructing as well, bringing in considerable history of the time.

A tale that will appeal to many children is Torpeanuts the Tomboy, by Lily F. Wesselhoeft. Torpeanuts is a familiar character, a half wild, wholly good-natured little girl, with a particular affection for animals.

Essentially a boy's book is The Secret of the Black Butte, or the Mysterious Mine, by William Shattuck. It describes in quite a realistic manner the adventures of two lads who kill bears, discover a lost mine and missing heiresses within an almost incredible space of time. It fairly teems with excitement and narrow escapes, and as everything turns out well in the end, it leaves an agreeable impression.

Something more pretentious, but also involving mines and adventures, is The Golden Crocodile, by F. Mortimer Trimmer. The scene is the Roaring Fork Canyon, and the banks of the Medicine Creek in the days of California's discovery of gold. The crocodile represented a mining boom, the bottom of which finally fell out, causing considerable ruin. Around this collapse the tale is written, the characters are well drawn, and as the plot is well formed and unravelled, it makes interesting reading.

Roberts Bros. have also gotten out a new edition of Helen Jackson's well-known booklet The Procession of the Flowers in Colorado.

A new serial by Frank R. Stockton is begun in the November number of the St. Nicholas. It is entitled The Buccaneers of Our Coast, narrating the adventures of celebrated pirates. Another continued story is With the Black Prince, by William O. Stoddard. W. S. Harwood has an interesting article The Story of a Pine Board, and George Kennan contributes a sketch My Narrowest Escape. A feature of the number is a new southern story A Funny Little School, by Ruth McEnery Stuart.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send, free of charge, to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 Post St.

Baldwin Theatre
Al. Hayman & Co (Inc.) . . . . . Proprietors
Commencing Monday, November 1st
"It is Paris!"
"Lost, Strayed or Stolen"
A Musical Comedy in Four Acts
by J. Cheever Goodwin
Original Music by Woolson Morse
Sixty People! Original Production!

California Theatre
Great Music al Event!
Beginning Tuesday Evening, Nov. 2d
ITALIAN GRAND OPERA CO.
Del Conte & Co,. Proprietors
Direct from Milan, Italy, and National Theatre, City of Mexico.
Repertoire first week: Tuesday, Gioconda; Wednesday, Masked Ball; Thursday, Cavalleria Rusticana and Pagliacci; Friday Night and Saturday Matinee, Trovatore; Saturday Night, La Boheme
Grand Chorus and Orchestra
Seats . . . . 50c. to $1.50

Columbia Theatre
Friedlander, Gottlob & Co, Lessees and Managers
Commencing Monday, November 1st
New and Marvelous Entertainment of Magic, Mirth and Mystery
LEON HERRMANN
Nephew and Successor to Herrmann the Great, and ADELAIDE HERRMANN, Prestidigitice and her World-Famous Spectacular Dances
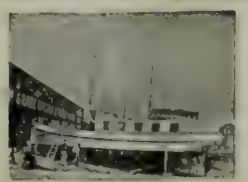
First time here of the Marvelous and Unexplainable Illusion, "Elixir Vitae"—the sensation of two continents—a man's head cut off in full view of the audience. Next attraction, "In Old Kentucky."

Orpheum
Week beginning Monday, Nov. 1st
The Farrells, World's Champion Cake-Walkers
Foy & Clark, Eccentric Comedians
Mlle. Orbasany and Her Great Troupe of Trained Cockatoos
The American Biograph, the Greatest of Projectoscopes New Views
Ola Hayden & Edna Collins
Positively last week of the Knaben-Kapelle
Reserved Seats 25c.; Balcony 10c.; Opera Chairs and Box Seats 50c. Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday.

Tivoli Opera House
Mrs Ernestine Kreling : Proprietor and Manager
Every Evening at 8 sharp
Triumphant Opening of the Comic Opera Season
The Japanese Musical Comedy
THE GEISHA
Superb Cast, including Edwin Stevens, Robert Dunbar, Thos. C. Leary, Phil. Branson, Florence Wolcott, Edith Hall, Tillie Salinger, Georgie Cooper.
Splendid Chorus! Excellent Orchestra!
Magnificent Scenery, Costumes and Effects!
The Prettiest Production Ever Seen in this City!
Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre
Fred Belasco : . : : . : Manager
Phone Main 254
Week of November 1st. Usual Matinee Saturday
A Strong Character Comedy
The play that brought recognition to E. H. Sothern, and made of him a star
The Highest Bidder
Amusing yet serious!
Strong Cast, Excellent Stage Appointments, and Appropriate Scenery!
Not before at these prices—50, 35, 25 or 15c. including a Reserved Seat

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
Walter Morosco : : : Sole Lessee and Manager
Last four performances of THE ENSIGN
Monday, November 1st, Fifth Week of the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H Pascoe, in the Sensational Comedy-Drama
"777"
A Play of Startling and Thrilling Interest!
Beautiful Scenery and Costumes!
Good Comedy and Mechanical Effects!
Evg Prices 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS


Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....
SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.
Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

SOLDIERS OF FORTUNE
AND OTHER
NEW BOOKS
AT
HARTWELL, MITCHELL & WILLIS
107 Montgomery Street.

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

The Reliance-Stanford Football Game—Notes of the Gridiron.

The Reliance-Stanford game was chiefly interesting because of the very excellent officialing. In Mr. Tobin there was found an umpire who has a thorough knowledge of the game and a keen eye for infractions, coupled with the character and decision necessary to an instant and unchanging ruling. The contrast between the way this gentleman kept his eyes open to play and his ears shut to protest and the debating-club methods of those who enforced rules in the previous games, was refreshing. If Mr. Tobin can be persuaded to act he should be chosen as one official in all important matches from now on.

* *

The Reliance eleven has developed remarkable charity of late. Twice it has given away games, and once could only persuade the other side to accept a tie. Without overlooking the immense stiffening-up of Stanford's defense, it is not too much to say that the athletic club men played away below their best. A certain listlessness marked the conduct of their part of the game, especially on the defense, that was in marked contrast to the vim of the college men. But allowing for the listlessness of one side and the vigor of the other, it was only the most stupid kind of captaining that kept Reliance from making at least another touchdown. To be sure, the slippery foothold handicapped the light, fast-moving club backs more than it did Fisher or Cotton. When the Reliance men did get their interference formed none of them seemed able to shake loose from it to take a dangerous opponent. Time and again when the interference would smother Stanford's end and leave an opening outside the back plunged inside into the arms of the very man who would have been hustled out of the play had the runner swung out farther. The play might even have made ground with the half going inside had an interferer gone out to meet the tackle, but often he was left free, without an attempt to prevent his stopping the play. The choice of plays in the first half, too, was bad and those chosen were poorly executed. Much of the latter fault was due to the poor condition of the field, but the Reliance must have more effective offensive formations than those it brought off on Saturday. There is certainly some one to blame for not using them and for not using ordinary judgment in choosing the point of attack. The lineup that allowed a Reliance man to block his fullback's kick and gave Stanford her first points was loose, careless and illy-adapted to protect a man who kicks straight ahead as Wykoff does. Another apparent trifle that the clubmen neglected, and that Stanford was careful about, was the matter of cleats. Especially on a rainy day do well cleated shoes lend an advantage hard to estimate. Time and again when Murphy was making his pretty runs the worn down cleats on Reliance shoes refused to hold and the would-be tacklers went sprawling. The slowness of the backs, usually so fast, was partly due to this same neglect. When we consider that quick starting is the foundation of good football and that without cleats quick starting is absolutely impossible, we can see how much effect so apparently small a matter may have on the result of a game. It is in such trifles and other trifling matters in play and practice that the colleges are better than the athletic clubs. With as careful management and systematic practice the Reliance could simply sweep over either of the colleges.

* *

Mr. Wykoff has strengthened the team immensely and with Code to play quarter he would be of much more value, for on Saturday his shifting from quarter to fullback gave Stanford plenty of time to meet his kicks but, even so, after the first few tries, his coolness allowed him to place the ball to the best advantage for his side, although his kicks did not cover the distance that we had a right to expect from his form of other days. Sherman, withall he did not play his best game, showed that he is the peer of any end we have seen barring Nolan; but Sherman, in knowledge of the game, ability to get into a play at the right time, and to save himself when necessary, need not bow even to the old West Pointer, whose advantage over the little Reliance man is chiefly in physique. Lanyon played a good game, his play is consistently improving every week. His prettiest play was a steal of the ball from Murphy's arms on Stanford's fifteen-yard line. The dailies credited Murphy with a fumble. There was no fumble. Lanyon saw his chance, took the ball and enabled his eleven to score their only touchdown. Again Carl Smith played a magnificent game. When big holes were opened in Reliance center, Smith was in like a flash, more often than not stopping the play right there. The Stanford center trio, notwithstanding their reputation, did not make the openings that the lighter and less experienced men from Berkeley did a week before. Erskine, who went in at tackle in Sexton's absence, played better than any tackle has yet this year; if his work remains consistent he will probably replace Sexton; at least the fight between them ought to be close. Erskine's weight and strength offsetting Sexton's remarkable aptitude for and understanding of the game.

* *

On the day of this issue two freshman elevens will battle for intercollegiate supremacy. There is a general impression that California is to win an easy contest. Those who think so are apt to be very much surprised before sunset. On paper the record of the Californians shows that the game ought easily to be theirs, but paper records are not weighty. While Coach Nott has been keeping his freshmen hard at work together as an eleven, Mr. Brooke has been working his best men on the college to give the 'varsity practice. This week the Stanford men will work together, and all the coach's attention will be lavished on moulding them into a team. The promising individuals of the California line are few. On the Stanford eleven there are a number with reputations. Morgan and Beckley, the former who played so well last week on the 'varsity, are apt to smother any end runs the U. C. youngsters may try. Then at tackle there is Burmeister, who was a star on St. Matthew's School team of last year, a team that won the Academic Championship and showed a type of game nearer the Eastern standard than did any eleven except Stanford's victorious 'varsity. Manley from the same team is a very effective end runner on whom the cardinal relies for gains, and they ought not to be disappointed, as the blue and gold is not strongest at end. Hill, a very strong fast man who has been playing at end on the college, will probably do as well as Manley in skirting the ends, and Wilson, with a splendid academic record, will give good account of his weight and experience as fullback.

* *

Rumor comes up from Palo Alto that he has been making good gains against the 'varsity. The best men of the U. C. '01 class are McCabe half-back and captain, Fowler centre and Pringle tackle, who are 'varsity material. Premo, their crack end, has been on the injured list, but may be out for the day's game. Talman, a man of much reputation, will probably be outclassed by Burmeister or any other able man Stanford may play at tackle. Frank Smith is a light but gritty and determined fellow of value to the eleven as a line plunger and good partner for McCabe. Altogether conditions between 'varsity and freshman elevens in the two colleges seem reversed. Stanford's 'varsity and California's freshmen are weaker on the ends and behind the line than their opponents, but at centre, guard and tackle are the stronger. But there is this difference—neither freshman eleven has a first-class kicker, while Stanford's 'varsity has Murphy. The end running of Stanford's freshmen with no kicking to offset it ought to give the cardinal a victory by about one touchdown.

* *

The football managers of the two universities have found it expedient to suspend the intercollegiate agreement as to eligibility in order that Stanford may play Morgan and Berkeley Talman on their freshman teams. It seems incredible that the managers have the right to waive agreements entered into by the universities governing the eligibility of players. If they have this right the sooner the colleges withdraw it the better it will be for the health of intercollegiate athletics. The laws governing the athletic relations of the two colleges ought to be as unchangeable (not unchanging) as the laws of the Medes and Persians and beyond the power of any individuals and especially beyond the power of the athletic managers to alter in any way.

* *

There is an absurd rumor afloat that Harvard wants to secure Fickert to replace Bouvee. Even if that fine player were less devotedly loyal to his alma mater than he is, it would be impossible for him to play with Harvard, as not only the residence rule but the law barring a man who has done four year's service for another college prevents his transferring allegiance from the cardinal to the crimson.

* *

A professional baseball team calling itself the Reliance baseball team has been wearing the Reliance Club's emblem. This is a matter for Mr. Berry or some other of the club's officials to look into and remedy.

ROBERT PORTER.

---

A good many years ago, when the dealers in England began to advertise orange marmalade as a substitute for butter, a Lancashire workingman's wife concluded to give the novelty a trial. She bought a two-pound jar from a grocer, and the next morning she entered his shop in a state of high indignation. "You old villun!" she exclaimed; "what do you mean by selling me that stuff? I pretty nearly poisoned my old man with it." "How were that?" asked the innocent shopkeeper. "How were that? Didn't you say it were a substitute for butter?" "Yes, I did." "Well, it is a grand substitute. I used some of it to fry a bit of fish with, an' it made us all sick as we could be."

---

How's This?

We offer One Hundred Dollars reward for any case of catarrh that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.

We, the undersigned, have known F. J. Cheney for the last fifteen years, and believe him perfectly honorable in all business transactions, and financially able to carry out any obligations made by their firm.

West & Truax, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.
Walding, Kinnan & Marvin, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.

Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. Testimonials sent free. Price 75c. per bottle. Sold by all druggists.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. For particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

GET THE GENUINE ARTICLE!

Walter Baker & Co.'s Breakfast COCOA

Pure, Delicious, Nutritious.

Costs Less than ONE CENT a cup.

Be sure that the package bears our Trade-Mark.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

(Established 1780) Dorchester, Mass.

Trade Mark

"GOLD SEAL"
"BADGER"
"PIONEER"

Rubber Goods

OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

GOODYEAR RUBBER CO.

MANUFACTURER OF

OIL CLOTHING

R. H. PEASE
Vice-President and Manager

573-575-577-579 Market Street
SAN FRANCISCO

73-75 First Street, Portland, Or.

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Guarantee Capital and Surplus | - | $2,040,201 66 |
| Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash | - | 1,000,000 00 |
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | 27,730,247 45 |

OFFICERS

President, B. A BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS

B A Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H B. Russ
D. N. Walter and N Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | $22,885,377 |
| Paid Up Capital and Surplus | - | 1,594,503 |

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS

GEORGE W. BEAVER — ROBERT WATT
THOMAS MAGEE — GEO. C. BOARDMAN
W. C. B. DE FREMERY — DANIEL E. MARTIN
ALBERT MILLER — GEO. TASHEIRA
E B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. F. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

Royal and Queen Ins. Cos.

Have removed their offices to the Royal Insurance Building, Northwest Corner of Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco.

Combined Assets Over $52,000,000

ROLLA V. WATT, - Pacific Coast Manager

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid Up Capital | $250,000 |
| Cash Reserve Fund | 25,000 |

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOW[illegible]

Policies of Insurance [illegible] perfect Abstra[illegible]

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF [illegible]

Incorporated by Roy[illegible]

Capital Paid Up, $3 4[illegible]00
Surplus to Policy [illegible]

ROBERT DICK[illegible], Manager

B. J. SMITH, Assistant Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
301 Montgomery Street

CONNECTICUT FIRE INS. CO

OF HARTFORD

Assets. $3,300,000. BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager.
COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
301 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

SOHMER PIANOS

BYRON MAUZY
AGENT
308-314 Post Street, S. F.

THE Old Government
THE PERFECTION of WHISKY
MATURED and BOTTLED in BOND
THE U.S. GOVERNMENT
guarantees the age and purity
We guarantee the quality unexcelled
FOR SALE BY PRINCIPAL DEALERS.
William Wolff & Co.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
DISTRIBUTORS.

PACIFIC COAST JOCKEY CLUB
INGLESIDE TRACK
Racing from Monday, November 1st, to Saturday, November 13th, including
Five or more races daily, rain or shine
First race at 2 p.m.
S. P. R. R. Trains 12:45 and 1:15 p.m. daily. Leave Third-street station, stopping at Valencia street. Returning immediately after the game.
Electric Car Lines—Kearny and Mission-street cars every 3 minutes, direct to track without change.
F. H. GREEN, Secretary. S. N. ANDROUS, President.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF ROBERT A. ROSE, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at Room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

A. C. FREESE,
Adminis-trator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, October 26th, 1897.

J. D. Sullivan,
Attorney for Administrator.

Don't Borrow a Home!
BUY IT Your rent payments for the borrowed home will do it through the aid of the CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California
WM. CORBIN, Secretary and Gen. Manager.
Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco

MADAME LASSAUGUE
A Celebrated European Teacher of the great Marchesi and Lamperti Vocal Methods has her private vocal studio at Kohler & Chase's to teach te same. May be seen daily (except Mondays and Thursdays) from 3 to 4 p.m. Appointments evenings when desired. Mail and applications to KOHLER & CHASE, 28 O'Farrell street. Soyrano Concert Vocalist.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE MAKE THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD LANE
LANE & LANE
Attorneys and Counselors
Room 202
Crocker Building, San Francisco

United States Laundry
Office 1004 Market St.
TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

GLADDING, McBEAN & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO.
WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

A. K. DAGGETT
Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty
NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. P.
Telephone 305

FINANCE AND TRADE

The Money Market—Stocks and Bonds—Trade Expansion.

Thursday Evening.

The present conditions of the money market display the same tendency that was apparent at the date of our last report, and there is every appearance of settled ease during the next few months, provided no disturbing political influences should arise. The expanding volume of trade this fall surpasses the most sanguine expectations, the exports during the third quarter of the current year showing an excess over imports amounting to $124,000,000, as compared with $53,000,000 only for the same period in 1896.

The local Silver market has been quiet during the interval, the demand from the Orient having been satisfied for the present. The now disclosed failure of the Commissioners to effect any arrangement in London, looking to international agreement with regard to a bimetallic ratio, has not had as depressing an effect on the value of Silver as might have been expected, probably for the reason that the result had been fully discounted.

It is worthy of notice that the new issue of United States bonds has this week been quoted 128 to 128½, the highest price yet recorded.

In the local Bond market the same good demand continues for first-class securities. Spring Valley 4 per cent bonds have been dealt in at 102¼, the best figure marked for some time past; while the 6 per cent issue of the same concern have changed hands at 118¼, a remarkably good price, seeing the bonds have only eight years to run.

The second instalment of the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railroad bonds may be looked for on the 1st proximo, and the immense popularity of this new issue is amply proven by the fact that this lot, amounting to $200,000, has been tendered for ten times over. We understand there will be a slight advance in the figure, which will probably be in the neighborhood of 101½.

Spring Valley water stock has been by no means strong, and has sold as low as 99, at which price, however, there seem to be further orders in the market. The legal proceedings commenced in the United States Circuit court, with regard to the San Diego Water Company, are being carefully watched by water stock proprietors, and, in the meantime, tend to influence the course of the market.

Gas stocks show strength generally. San Francisco Gas and Electric have advanced from 95¾ to 96¾. Pacific Gas are steady at 93½ to 94, and Mutual Electric are quoted 11¾, strong in tendency.

Fireman's Fund Insurance stock has been bid for at 185.

Bank stocks continue firm and in good demand, the shares of Savings Banks likewise.

Street Railroad stocks are strong generally. Market Street shares, on which the dividend had just been paid, having changed hands at 48.

Powder stocks have weakened somewhat, in view of the suit in contemplation by Mr. W. T. Baggett, with the object of having the local corporations treated as a trust combination.

Alaska Packers stock has been sold at 98.

Oceanic Steamship have been down as low as 30½, but have since been bid for at 31 and are strongly held. This figure seems to us low, as the Company is doing a fine business, and in time the value of their stock should show marked improvement.

Sugar stocks are slightly lower, owing to the absence of orders, while speculators seem disposed to await the action of Congress in regard to Hawaiian annexation. In the meantime the market in this class of shares is likely to continue quiet.

Notwithstanding that all the controlling influences appear to favor higher prices again in the Wheat market, there is no very important gain to record. At the moment of writing the general opinion seems to point to an appreciable advance in values being established ere long and the closing price for No. 1 December is 1.49¼ per cental, which represents a slight improvement for the week.

Other produce markets are without material change, the most noticeable feature, perhaps, being the continued firmness of prices and the strong demand for live stock of all kinds.

Get Out of the city; go into the beautiful valley near Mount Diablo; recruit your flagging energies, renew your youth, grow young again in the invigorating and inspiring climate of Byron Hot Springs. Autumn is the best season there. The Mineral Springs will build you up suprisingly. The Mud Baths will take all that stiffness out of your joints. It is only three hours' ride from the city. Reduced rates balance of season.

TURF TOPICS

Opening of the Season—First List of Stakes at Ingleside.

The meeting at Los Angeles proved quite a success, financially as well as otherwise, and the association will realize a profit of $10,000 to $12,000 on its nine days' racing. Satisfactory race-meetings in this State, when conducted in the larger centres of population, are the rule, and there is no doubt that as the class of sport improves the results will do so likewise. The object of every one interested should be to improve the tone of things, great progress having been made in this direction during the last three years.

When the season has fairly opened at Ingleside and Oakland, we shall see a surprising change for the better in every respect. What is most satisfactory is that the class of horses generally will show much improvement. There is now so much money to be won here with good animals that a larger number of the better Eastern horses have been scheduled for a winter in California than we have seen hitherto. This shows that our best purses are going to be well-competed for, which means sport in the right sense. By way of making things a little better for us than they would otherwise have been, the New Orleans fever scare has helped to a certain extent, as stables that would probably have operated there have bent their steps this way. Carloads of horses are arriving daily, and men and animals seem delighted to be on the perfect tracks and in the genial clime of California. Of the betting fraternity there is evidently to be a large gathering, and the town is beginning to show a fair sprinkling of well known men already on hand.

Monday next the ball will open at Ingleside, and present appearances are in favor of fine weather and a beginning under generally favorable auspices.

The Pacific Coast Jockey Club has now published the list of horses entered for the ten stakes which closed on the 15th instant. The result shows a total number of 391 entries, the largest number in any one race being eighty in the Crocker stakes for two-year-olds, to be run on December 29th. The smallest number of entries is twenty-five in the University stakes, one mile, for three-year-olds, to be run on the opening day, and for which the Burns & Waterhouse stable with Altamax, Colonel Wheeler, Parthamax and Shasta Water look like playing a strong hand, subject to the horses they may send to the post being fit.

The Sunny Side stakes, for two-year-old colts and geldings, to be run on November 13th, has fifty-two entries and ought to produce a good field.

Comparing the list of entries with the first list of the California Jockey Club, published some weeks earlier, it will be found that the average number of entries is practically the same.

According to the present look of matters the Eastern horses should have the best of it in the events for three-year-olds and upwards, but in the two-year-old section the California stables will probably have things pretty much their own way. Burns & Waterhouse have strengthened their hand in that direction by leasing Traverser, who arrived all well with the rest of their lot except the Morello filly Recreation, who had to break the journey, owing to an attack of sickness, but has since reached Oakland in fairly good health. It is to be hoped this beautiful mare will fully regain her strength and be able to give further proof of her undoubted merit.

The result of the late Rancho del Paso sale in New York was exceedingly disappointing. Few of the yearlings changed hands and many of those at merely nominal prices. The position of affairs on the turf does not justify the extensive breeding operations of Western farms, a view which Mr. Marcus Daly evidently holds, as he has lately effected some important sales of stallions and mares.

BENEDICT.

Do You Want Gold?

Everyone desiring to keep informed on Yukon, the Klondyke and Alaskan gold fields. Send 10 cents for large Compendium of vast information and big color map to Hamilton Publishing Company, Hamilton, Indiana.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

"ON THE HEIGHTS"

A Review of the Collected Poems of Lucius H. Foote.

The prominence of individual literateurs is determined largely by environment. A writer who is proclaimed a great man in New York is great for America, whereas the fame of a distinguished San Franciscan is bounded by California. There has been a huge critical outcry over the publication in book form of certain poetical writings of Edmund Clarence Steadman, whose celebrity is a New York creation. The dailies are full of choice extracts and agreeable commendation. Yet Mr. Steadman's vogue is, in a degree, a fashion. He is the proper literary thing, and one bows to his verse when it appears as irreproachable poetry. I question whether the verdict of the English critics, who may not be aware of Mr. Steadman's importance, will fall—in with this chorus. It is highly probable they will admit the correctness of manner, but will ask the wherefore of all the enthusiasm. Contemporaneous with the issuance of this volume appears, unheralded, a collection of the verse of Lucius Harwood Foote—a San Franciscan whose writings are not unknown to readers of The Wave. Yet in regions where the personality of Steadman carries no weight, there will be compliments and recognition for Foote which the poems of the former cannot command.

There are many charming and graceful poems in On the Heights. The writer is most punctilious in his regard for form and diction. His inspiration is drawn from a variety of sources—here are lyrics, sonnets, ballads and ballades, in innumerable styles and metres, characterized by simplicity invariably, and by real excellence of versification. What is better than a mastery of manner, however, is the sense of poetic feeling which is manifest throughout this volume. In such brief snatches as "Waiting," "The Wooing of the Rose," Marie, "De Profundis," "Summer Days," there is the veritable touch, a breath of the magic that is poetry. Trailing through each of these graceful poems are the delicate threads of a story—the mere suggestion of an incident exquisitely wrought in. I have ventured to reproduce some of these—many of the others were published when written—"Guido," for instance, "Richard Lovelace," and "Lady Jane," in which there is the antique ballad flavor. "Types," too, is admirable. How many writers of the day are doing better than this:

Though her marvelous face, with its halo of hair,
Is so hauntingly fair,
There's a smoldering fire which flickers and flashes
Beneath her lashes,
And the ghost of an old Patrician disdain,
Like the phantom of pain,
Is lurking now
In the swell of her nostril, and shade of her brow.
In fine,
There is pride and passion in every line,
From her finger tips,
To the arch of her foot, and the curve of her lips.
Men have gone to their death, for women like this,
And counted it bliss.
In the hush of her chamber, this very night,
She will tell her beads in the chastened light,
And pray to the Mother of God to keep
Her soul in sleep.

"The Hymn," "To the Unknown God" is a poem that will undoubtedly attract in this form some of the attention its inspiration deserves. It is a notably fine flight, written in a metre that conveys the strenuous "pulse of automatic vibrations." The translations are especially clever. There are several from the French of Gautier, and the German of Heine that are delightfully dainty and felicitous. Indeed, On the Heights is certainly a volume that will give real pleasure to the lover of poetry, and I predict for it an unusual degree of critical consideration. The typography of the volume is admirable—like other products of the Roycroft Printing shop. However, here follow certain of General Foote's briefer poems. That on the Sacramento is the fifth verse of a charming poem, for all of which there is not space. The rest tell their own story.

El Rio Sacramento.

In ceaseless, silent sweep, between
Low-lying meadows, rank and green,
Along the marge of bastioned banks,
Its dimpled face reflect the ranks
Of gray-beard oaks; its liquid kiss
Thrills all the river reeds with bliss;
The thirsty fibrils of the vine
Reach down to quaff its amber wine;
The grasses and the willows lave
Their tangled tresses in its wave.
The silver thread has grown to be
A molten avalanche set free.
Its path the highway of the world,
Where sails of commerce are unfurled,
Emblem of Time's resistless tide,
On, and still on, its currents glide,
Until, at length, far, far below,
It weds the sea, with stately flow.

El Vacquero.

Tinged with the blood of Aztec lands,
Sphinx-like the tawny herdsman stands,
A coiled reata in his hands.
Devoid of hope, devoid of fear,
Half brigand, and half cavalier,—
This helot, with imperial grace,
Wears ever on his tawny face
A sad defiant look of pain.
Left by the fierce iconoclast,
A living fragment of the past,—
Greek of the Greeks he must remain.

Summer Days.

He came when stormy March was done,
And April birds were on the wing,
When flush of sward and flash of sun
Lent light and color to the spring.

His smile made glad the summer days,
Until my foolish heart was stirred,
And as we walked the woodland ways,
I listened to his whispered word.

Now fields with bloom are not besprent,
And birds no longer pipe with glee;
He took the summer when he went,
And left the winter here to me.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY

SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas..... | 4 00 am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. October 3, 8, 13, 18, 23, 28 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Stmr. Pomona, 2 p.m. October 1, 5, 9, 13, 18, 22, 26, 30; November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28.

For Newport, Los Angeles and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Oct. 1, 5, 9, 13, 17, 21, 25, 29 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, Redondo--Los Angeles, at 11 a.m. Oct. 3, 7, 11, 15, 19, 23, 27, 31 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, Stmr. Orizaba, 10 a.m. the 2d each month

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov. 2 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.
S. S. "Alameda," for Australia, Thursday, Nov. 11 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO General Agents

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
24 Montgomery Street

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

The firm of JOE POHEIM is the largest in the United States. Rules for self-measurement and samples of cloth sent free.

201 and 203 Montgomery St. cor. Bush.
844 & 846 Market St. 1110 & 1112 Market St.
SAN FRANCISCO.
485 Fourteenth St., Oakland. 603 & 605 K St., Sacramento.
143 South Spring St., Los Angeles.

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets

Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

THE LATEST STYLES IN

CHOICE WOOLENS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors
623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel
Bicycle and Golf Suits

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, bookbinders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.

TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST

BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. . ALSO . .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. . . Pacific Coast Sole Agents

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS ELECTRICAL CO

523 Mission St., San Francisco

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.
Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.
Telephone Main 5697.

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.
UNDERTAKERS
641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb
Telephone Main 43

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Mr. Lincoln once remarked to a fellow-passenger on the old-time mud-wagon coach, on the corduroy road which antedated railroads, that all men were prompted by selfishness in doing good or evil. His fellow-passenger was antagonizing his position, when they were passing over a corduroy bridge that spanned a slough. As they crossed this bridge they espied an old razor-backed sow on the bank of the slough, making a terrible noise because her pigs had got into the slough and were unable to get out, and in danger of drowning. As the old coach began to climb the hillside Mr. Lincoln called out, "Driver, can't you stop just a moment?" The driver replied, "If the other feller don't object." The "other feller," who was no less a personage than at that time Colonel E. D. Baker, the gallant general who gave his life in defense of old glory at Ball's Bluff, did not object, when Mr. Lincoln jumped out, ran back to the slough, and began to lift the little pigs out of the mud and water and place them on the bank. When he returned Colonel Baker remarked: "Now, Abe, where does selfishness come in on this little episode?" "Why, bless your soul, Ed, that was the very essence of selfishness. I would have had no peace of mind all day had I gone on and left that suffering old sow worrying over those pigs. I did it to get peace of mind, don't you see?"

Dr. Robert McIntyre, a prominent Chicago minister, went to Washington, Ia., to deliver the inaugural address in a new hall located in a fine building, the owners of which operated a private electrical plant. There was a large audience and the subject was "Patience." The speaker was well under way when the lights went out. A panic was imminent but Dr. McIntyre diverted it by continuing as though nothing had happened. Suddenly there was a burst of illumination in the midst of one of the Doctor's first periods disconcerting everyone. There was a general blinking but the speaker kept right on. Gradually he was approaching the peroration when again the light was shut off. This time he calculated the darkness would last long enough to finish in peace. "Patience," he said, "is absolutely necessary for success in the daily affairs of life. Never lose your temper. It is foolish to display such a weakness——" Just then the lights flashed up. The speaker walked to the wings, and shaking his fist at a brawny Irishman who was tampering with the wires, cried out, in a tone which could have been heard a block away: "Confound you, you idiot! Will you ever have sense enough to leave those wires alone?" That ended his lecture on "Patience."

Henry George was traveling once on a sleeping car. The porter came to brush the dust off him and "work" him for the customary quarter. There were but few passengers. George reflected on the fact that Pullman paid his poor black hirelings little or naught, and relied on their ability to brush and gouge the public instead and determined to give him all the change he found in his pocket. He thought there might be about sixty cents but there actually was $3 in quarters, halves and dimes. He gave it all to the darky, who dropped his broom and stared at the tip and then at George. "This all fo' me, boss?" he gasped. "It's all for you," replied George. The darky looked at the little, rusty, modest man and again at his handful of silver. "Wow!" he ejaculated, "it's true as de good book puts it, you nevah cain tell how fah a toad kin jump twell you sees him hop."

Many are the traps that the English language sets for the unwary. At a quiet little dinner-party the other evening the conversation turned upon housekeeping affairs and a couple of ladies joined issue across the table on the question of spice. Mrs. Straitlace was all for purity and therefore favored the goods of a certain storekeeper, who claims to supply genuine products only. Mrs. Newstyle maintained that flavor was the primary consideration, and the best of the argument seemed rather to be with her, much to the delight of her better half. At length the former lady put her foot down and said, "Well, I wouldn't deal with your man; he's such an adulterer!" "Oh!" said Mrs. Newstyle, "that's his wife's affair—I'm talking about spice with the best flavor. Their respective spouses proceeded to discuss the change in the weather.

The commanding officer of a corps was much troubled about the persistent untidiness of one of his men. Reprimand and punishment were unavailing. A brilliant idea struck the colonel. Why not march him up and down the whole line of the regiment and shame him into decency? It was done. The untidy warrior, who hailed from the Emerald Isle, was ordered to exhibit himself and march up and down the entire regiment, and the men were told to have a good look at him. The unabashed Pat halted, saluted the colonel, and said, in the hearing of the whole corps, with the utmost sang-froid: "Dhirtiest regiment I iver inspected, sorr."

Bishop Wilberforce was a keen sportsman by inclination, and one fine day, when on a visit at a ducal seat, was persuaded to join a shooting party. His grace's head keeper was a Scotchman and a Presbyterian, and the Bishop tried to engage him in a friendly chat, but, finding the keeper's replies were short and reserved, he said: "I suppose, Grant, you think a Bishop ought not to go out shooting?" "Weel, my lord," said the Scot, frankly, "I doubt ye'll find no warrant for it in the Screeptur'. Did ye ever read of the apostles going out shooting?" "No — true," replied the Bishop; "they had no game in Palestine in those days—they went out fishing instead."

An American visitor to a London hotel, ruffled at being pressed for a settlement of his bill, threatened to leave. "You don't stir from this hotel until you have paid up," said the manager. "Just put that in writing, and I'll stay here for the remainder of my days," was the retort.

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION

IN

THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

St. Denis Broadway and Eleventh St. NEW YORK
OPPOSITE GRACE CHURCH
EUROPEAN PLAN

In a modest and unobtrusive way there are few better conducted hotels in the Metropolis than the St. Denis.
The great popularity it has acquired can readily be traced to its unique location, its homelike atmosphere, the peculiar excellence of its cuisine, and its very moderate prices.

William Taylor & Son.

Hotel Bella Vista
1001 PINE STREET
Elegant Furnishings and Apartments
DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED
MRS. A. F. TRACY.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED
OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Hotel Rafael
SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Sanitarium, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Magnificent Scenery and Drives. The thermometer averages for the winter months 64 degrees, excelling that of the famed Mentone, France.

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments

R. H. WARFIELD CO.
(Incorporated) Proprietors

The Hotel Richelieu
N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.
PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO
HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

"I see Henderson is back from Klondike with a barrel of money. He must have struck a rich mine."
"No, he didn't do any mining at all. He took a supply of Piper Heidsieck Plug along and sold it to the miners."

The Plug is Larger—Everywhere among tobacco chewers the recent enlargement of the Piper Heidsieck Plug is a matter of common talk, and universal congratulation. More than one-third bigger than before, and better than ever, the tobacco with that delicious champagne flavor promises to be the most popular "chew" in the whole wide world. Try the New Five-Cent Size

Piper Heidsieck
Plug Tobacco

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 45 SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 6, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

AMPITHEATRE AT THE HEAD OF MERCED RIVER

LYELL FORK MEADOWS, MERCED RIVER

IN THE HIGH SIERRAS

Photographed by Theodore Solomons.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 6, 1897

CONTENTS

Editorials ..... 2
The Charter Convention's Work ..... 2
The Seriousness of Modern Life; by William Henry Hudson ..... 3
Things and People; by Boswell Jr. ..... 3–5
The Herrmann Company ..... 6
Gipsy Life in the West ..... 6
Italian Opera; by Lesley Martin ..... 6
"Fantaisie Printaniere"; a Story by Frank Norris ..... 7
Scenes at the Mare Island Navy Yard ..... 8–9
The World Abroad ..... 9
The Career of H. G. Wells ..... 9
A Debutante's Diary ..... 10
The Theatres ..... 11
November Magazines ..... 12
"Hugh Wynne"; a Review by C. A. Duniway ..... 12
Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter ..... 13
Turf Topics; by Benedict ..... 14
Finance and Trade ..... 14
New Stories Re-Told ..... 16

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Every Populistic convention resolves in favor of the establishment of Governmental Saving Banks, and the newspapers, with perhaps a few exceptions indorse the proposition—not in a whole-hearted way as if the matter was understood, but perfunctorily as if it was in due course and in the line of progress. Before any strenuous support is given the movement, it will be well to look a little into methods and at possible results.

Great stress is laid on the fact that postal savings banks have been a success in England, but this has little or no bearing here. Great Britain has a debt considerably in excess of $3,000,000,000, of which only $16,500,000 is required for the support of the currency, the enormous remainder, save a relatively small proportion invested by order of courts, is always on the market at some price and usually about par, for the government avails itself of the opportunity to reduce the rate of interest whenever consols are at a premium for any length of time; thus investments for savings bank deposits are always at hand, and when money in excess is wanted by depositors, it can be provided by sale of consols with little or no sacrifice.

A very different state of things exists in this country; here the national debt is but slightly in excess of $1,100,000,000, of which at least four-fifths is held by banks as a basis of circulation, by foreigners, or as investments by order of courts, and of the remaining fifth there is no quantity at any one time on the market, and any attempt to gather up even a few millions would carry prices to a point where the net rates of interest to be realized would be little more than nominal. It will require a large sum in the aggregate to prepare for the receipt of deposits by the postal department of government, for it may be assumed that every office where postal money orders are now sold will be authorized to receive deposits and will have to be furnished accordingly, the cost of conducting the business year by year will be counted by millions. If the people do not deposit, this expense will be wasted; if they do deposit liberally, the question arises: what is to be done with the money.

According to the report for 1896, of the Controller of the Currency, the savings banks and trust companies have of interest-bearing deposits $2,500,000,000, or, to be exact, $2,493,624,433. If as alleged, the safety of the depositors requires the responsibility of the government, it follows that this sum of money will be withdarwn and deposited with the government institution, but supposing that only one-half, or say one-fourth, is so drawn and so re-deposited, what is to be done with the money? There are no national bonds that can now be purchased; will the government create a debt for the sake of paying interest? It has been said that the money may be used for building ships for the navy or for opening the Nicaragua Canal; these are works of necessity, or they are not; if they are, they should be performed with money which may be borrowed in the markets of the world at 2 1-2 per cent; while if they are not, facility in raising money is no excuse for construction.

There remains what has been suggested, that the government may invest the money by purchase of securities, or by loaning on mortgage of real estate, one or both; but to this there are very serious objections from the standpoint of good citizenship, though not from that of professional politicians. The first of these objections is that the money would inevitably be lost in good part if not as a whole. The successful handling of money requires ability and experience that is not to be found in office holders, nor even in special appointees. Money invested or loaned through government machinery would melt away like snow under a summer sun. The second objection is that the deposits would become a vast corruption fund; the devotees of party cannot be expected to administer a trust in a non-partizan spirit. A party in power with five hundred or a thousand million of dollars to place where it will do the most good may be expected to prolong its term of office without limit.

Command of large sums of money by the government would endanger the permanency of our institutions, make a farce of our presidential elections, and lower the standard of public morality. Economy is never practiced by legislators in their collective capacity, except under stress of necessity; the only limit to city, county, state or national legislative appropriations is the utmost dollar that ingenuity can provide in the way of income or resources. If history does not afford sufficient proof of this statement, give Congress a whack at saving bank deposits and the most incredulous will be convinced.

THE ARTILLERY QUESTION.

The November number of the Journal of the Military Service Institution contains an article written by General George W. Wingate on "The Urgent Necessity for an Increase in the Artillery," which has attracted the attention and aroused the approving comment of the Eastern press. The article shows that, as the result of persistent appeals from military men, supported generally by the press and the public, a plan has been adopted by the War Department for a modern system of defence for our coasts. This system calls for about 2,000 guns and mortars, to be mounted in some 110 separate works, for the defense of twenty-five harbors. The Secretary of War has put forth the comforting prediction that by June of next year one half of this immense armament will be in position, ready for service, and that with the dawn of the new century our coasts will be practically invulnerable, if the mere existence, at certain points, of powerful guns and strong fortifications can keep us safe. As General Wingate's article shows, it will require about 29,000 artillerymen to provide one relief for the service of this vast collection of guns and mortars, three reliefs being required in action. The entire artillery force of the United States is to-day less than 4,000 men, which number includes ten batteries of field artillery, which are not available in the works for coast defense. The best of guns in the strongest of works will be quite as useless for defensive purposes, in the absence of competent gunners and cannoneers to serve them, as were the guns which our provident Government sent here without carriages on which to mount them, at the time when there was some prospect of a war with Chile. It is evident then that more gunners must be forthcoming, in addition to all our fine array of forts and guns, if we are really to enjoy that measure of security which the Secretary has promised us for the end of the century. The great gun of our day is a very expensive and very powerful engine, the proper and effective use of which calls for a very high degree of intelligence, skill and training on the part of the soldiers assigned to its service. We cannot improvise a corps of good gunners as we get together a police force or a sheriff's posse in an emergency. Even the National Guard is not available as a recruiting ground in this case; for if war comes upon us we may be perfectly confident that our enemies will not be so courteous and forebearing as to give us time to make even fair artillerists out of our militia infantry. The only possible course for us to pursue is to train our gunners in time of peace for the duties which they must discharge, but cannot learn in time of war. This course calls for a large and immediate increase in our artillery strength. It is to urge the necessity for such an increase that General Wingate has written his article. Almost simultaneously with the appearance of this article statements have been published that the Secretary of War and the General of the Army would, in their forthcoming annual reports, urge upon Congress the necessity for increasing our artillery.

General Wingate has conclusively made his case, so far as he has carried it. In our opinion he could, with great advantage, have gone farther. We found our guns useless without carriages, and we know that guns and carriages together will be quite as useless without trained men behind them. We know, further, that even if the additional men required are all provided, we shall not be much better off if the direction of our coast defenses is suffered to fall into the hands of incompetent and untrustworthy commanders. We have had an experience in San Francisco which gives ample reason for suspecting the quality and the competency of some of our military leaders—an experience which should suggest to our legislators the necessity of taking some security that, if any additional men are to be enlisted for the artillery service, they shall be devoted to the purposes for which they are now sought, and that they shall not be denied the fullest opportunity of learning their duties.

San Francisco is, at present, the only fortified harbor on this coast. Our fortifications were procured only after a long course of agitation and appeal to a languid Legislature and an indifferent public. In this agitation the commanding generals of this military department took a prominent part. Of our five regiments of artillery, one only is stationed on this coast, and the greater part of that regiment had always, until about a year ago, been stationed at the Presidio, the only fortified point in the harbor. At that time, on the recommendation of the present Commander of the Army, almost all the artillerymen were taken away from the only guns on the coast and their places were filled by a regiment of infantry. What were the motives of such an astonishing proceeding we have never been able to discover; we can only assume from the deep silence with which they have been guarded, that they were far from respectable. Such action could have been taken only by an officer profoundly ignorant of his duty or profoundly confident of public indifference as to his actions. How can the Congress or the people have any sense of security behind any system of coast defenses which is entrusted to such hands?

General Wingate is not an officer of the army, but he is a good and capable soldier. He has written his article, as he well says, "solely from the standpoint of common sense and patriotism." The journal of the Military Service Institution is a publication conducted by officers of the army, and, therefore, not a proper vehicle for the expression of opinions that may involve criticism, however true and wholesome, of their superiors. That such criticism is needed there is no room for doubt. It is frequently and beneficially meted out to other branches of the public service, but the prevailing ignorance of all things military in our country has screened the army from its influence. General Wingate, and other soldiers unattached to the army, could do no better service "from the standpoint of patriotism and common sense" than to warn their fellow citizens as well as their fellow soldiers of the evils that may befall the country from a capricious, incompetent and irresponsible administration of our army.

THE CHARTER CONVENTION'S WORK

BY A MEMBER OF THE CONVENTION

So far as the work of the Charter Convention has gone there is basis for the prophesy that the finished charter will be the most liberal and best considered of the various fundamental instruments presented for approval to the people of this city. The personnel of the convention is such as to warrant confidence in its product, made up as it is of leading representatives of many lines of business, the various professions, the different schools of belief as to municipal government. The convention is certainly non-partisan. Although appointed by a Democratic Mayor there are more Republicans than Democrats in the body, and an equal number of Socialists and Populists. Out of the twenty-one chairmen of the standing committees twelve are Republicans and nine are Democrats in national politics. The membership, in short, is such as to give the closest scrutiny and the most thorough examination into every provision and every sentence of the proposed instrument. No delicacy has been shown towards reports of committees no matter how eminent their sponsors. Ex-Mayor Ellert, Irving Scott, Dr. John Nightingale, James Denman, George K. Fitch, Sheldon G. Kellogg and other chairmen of committees which have thus far reported, have had to battle with all their might to uphold their reports. The convention is no respecter of persons, authority or hobbies. It yields nothing for the sake of peace. Every line runs a gauntlet of motions to strike out and to amend, to survive which is a certificate of worth. Each paragraph passes through the fiery furnace of debate and many there have been which have gone up in smoke or come out as dross. It is this carefulness and elaborate consideration which has made the progress of the convention somewhat slow. Nevertheless the greater part of the convention's work is now over. There are many reports still to be considered, but the lines of the new charter are well established and work from this time on will be much more rapid.

The lines of our present government will not be deviated from to any radical degree. Some there were who wished for the adoption of the Glasgow plan of government, a large council combining legislative and executive functions. But the convention thought this unadapted to our conditions and decided upon a Board of Supervisors composed of eighteen members having powers much the same as those now enjoyed by our legislative body. The Mayor is to have greater power than at present he enjoys, and corresponding responsibility. He is to appoint a Board of Public Works of three, having charge of buildings, parks, sewers and streets, a Board of Health of five, having charge of hospitals, alms houses and matters of public health, a Fire Commission, a Civil Service Commission, a Board of Education of five, and probably a Police Commission. Yet but three elective offices are abolished by the creation of these boards—the Superintendent of Streets, the County Surveyor and the Board of Education. The Board of Public Works is the Superintendent of Streets and the Surveyor plus the Park Commission and the City Hall Commission. The only new commission provided for is that on Civil Service which is to have charge of the system of appointment to offices upon merit, all the other commissioners are at present appointed by the Mayor or the Governor, and as the charter's basic principal is home rule, the power has been given to the Mayor rather than shared with the Chief Executive of the State. It will be seen, therefore, that the Mayor's powers are not nearly so extensive as those granted by many of the new charters of Eastern cities.

More attention has been paid in this charter to the consideration of the matter of public utilities, their acquisition, control and management, than in any other heretofore drafted for this city. Provision is made for the submission to the people of proposals for the purchase or building of water works, gas, electric light and telephone plants. The Board of Supervisors is prohibited from renewing any street railroad franchise and the means are provided by which street car lines may be municipally managed after the Scotch example. New franchises may be granted, but for not more than twenty-five years, and on payment to the city of not less than five per cent of their gross receipts for the greater portion of their lives.

The powers of the Board of Education are restricted, and a new body known as the Board of Superintendents is provided for, which is to be composed of educators in the department and which shall have within its functions the selection and recommendation of text books, the visiting of schools and the general organization of the educational side of the department. The Board of Education, therefore, is to have strictly the business end of the work to look after, and much of the labor now imposed on the Board, such as the repairing and building of school buildings, goes to the Board of Public Works.

In recognition of the growing demand for more direct control of legislation by the voters. the charter provides for a system of initiative under which, by petition, the people may compel the passage of ordinances which the Board of Supervisors might not be willing to pass. The charter, by the same plan, is made subject to amendment.

It is, of course, impossible at this time to give any detailed analysis of the charter, but from this brief and imperfect outline it can be seen that the new charter will be an up-to-date instrument, the work, not of theorists, but of practical men, incorporating the best work of the most recent charters, and under which the city would be governed more economically, and with more likelihood of honesty and intelligence in administration and legislation than at present. The work of the convention is intended, after all, but as advisory and suggestive to the Board of Freeholders, which is to be elected next month. Whatever imperfections the instrument has when it leaves the convention, will doubtless be corrected by the Freeholders, and we may expect with much reason that a well worked out system of municipal government will be submitted to the people.

THE SERIOUSNESS OF MODERN LIFE

By WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

Agnes Repplier is always entertaining, and never more so than when she is playing with delicate raillery about that favorite theme of hers—the strenuous seriousness of our modern civilization. That we have lost much, that we seem yearly to be losing more, of the old-fashioned, frank enjoyment of the good things of this life; that the inherited burden of Puritanism, and the accumulated weight of latter-day speculation sit heavy upon us all; that we take even our pleasures grimly and with ever-increasing self-consciousness; such is the text to which she returns again and again; and the sermons she preaches on it, if sermons they may for the moment be called, are full, not only of humurous banter, but of sound sense and real wisdom as well. We may, of course, feel that is she is often enough guilty of exaggeration, that she looks at one side of the question only. But the exaggeration itself is always amusing, and the side she emphasizes is worthy of presentation, since it is habitually left almost entirely out of account.

In several of the papers gathered together in her recent volume, Varia, Miss Repplier reiterates her charge against her generation with no abatement of the old vigor. The book makes capital reading throughout, but we will here confine our attention to those portions of it in which the ideas referred to are expounded or touched upon.

The first essay that arrests attention, as we turn the pages, is one with the significant heading, Cakes and Ale. It is a gossipy study of the Bacchanalian element in English poetry, and is interesting from the literary point of view, so far as it goes, though it makes no claim to originality or profoundness of research. But Miss Repplier approaches her subject with a paragraph of misgiving, and closes her sketch with a rueful back glance upon the genial, pleasure-loving past. Can such a theme ever be made acceptable to the austere nineteenth-century conscience? Must every drinking-song, no matter how slight and simple, carry with it for us an ominous suggestion of downright drunkenness and bestiality? Is it no longer possible for us to enjoy, just as poetry, the frank, cheerful, irresponsible, Anacreontic verse of Fletcher or Herrick, Burns or Peacock? The answer to such questions is not far to seek. "The perpetual intrusion of ethics into art," Miss Repplier insists, "has begotten a haunting anxiety lest perchance for one glad half hour we should forget that it is our duty to be serious. Which lesson," she adds, "I had forcibly impressed upon me a few years ago when I wrote a harmless essay upon war songs, and a virtuous critic reminded me, with tearful earnestness, that while there was nothing really hurtful in such poetry, it would be better far if I turned my attention to the nobler contest which Lady Somerset was then waging so valiantly against intemperance." In these days, then, when "a vigorous censership is maintained over the ethics of literature, with the rather melancholy result that we hear of little else," songs in praise of cakes and ale have passed under a ban, and the timid critic will find it safest to leave them severely alone, since a word of incautious eulogy may suffice to bring wholesale accusations of impropriety, if of nothing worse, upon his defenceless head. Miss Reppier is not timid, and she says her say; but then, we see how she has fared.

Yet, surely, there is something rather ridiculous about all this; and we should at once appreciate the absurdity of it, were it not that, under stress of our tremendous earnestness, the sense of humor in such matters appears to be fast ebbing away. Pertinently enough, our essayist asks whether we are not apt to-day, after our solemn fashion, to over estimate the direct moral influence of every scrap of literature, to force into it too large and deep a meaning. Under the magnifying lens of modern ethical criticism, trifles light as air have ceased to be trivial, and the tiniest things have assumed vast and depressing significance. And so a bit of verse in honor of Bacchus, a few lines in which a poet in a cheerful mood, so far forgets himself and the problems of life as to sing of revelry and carousal, are seized npon with burning indignation, and handled without mercy by all sorts of self-constituted custodians of public decency. A sufficiently ludicrous illustration of this kind of over-zeal is cited by Miss Repplier. Some years ago, Tennyson published a patriotic poem called Hands all Round, in which he invited his countrymen to > "First pledge our Queen, this solemn night, > Then drink to England, every guest."

and threw out other suggestions of the same highly improper character. Not by any means a rollicking song, however, or a ribald one, was this, as Miss Repplier very justly says; yet such was the scandal given to advocates of temperance by it "that the Saturday Review, playing for once the unwonted part of peacemaker, 'soothed and sustained the agitated frame' of British sensitiveness by reminding her that the laureate had given no hint as to what liquor should be drunk in the cause of freedom, and that he probably had it in mind to toast 'the great name of England round and round' in milk and mineral waters." Truly, there is such a thing as showing unreal enthusiasm by makiug mountains out of molehills!

Another phase of our modern tendency towards inordinate seriousness is brought out in the paper on Old Wine and New—in which, by the way, it may be said at once that, despite the title, there is nothing of an alcoholic character. The attack here made is upon our now widely accepted theories of history, and it, therefore reminds us of Mr. Augustine Birrell's brilliant little essay on The Muse of History. Once upon a time, this Muse of History was really a muse, acted as such, and held secure place in the radiant sisterhood. Now Clio has lent herself unreservedly to the demands of onr exacting generation, and "shorn of her splendor, sits spectacled before a dusty table, strewn with acts of Parliament and acts of Congress, and forgets the glories of the past in the absorbing study of Constitutions." Divorced from what Professor Seeley contemptuously called "mere literature," she is now wedded to science—"that grim but amorous lord, whose harem is tolerably full already, but who lusts perpetually for another bride." The Romance of History? This must be dismissed to the nursery even if, with our new-fangled notions of education, we can allow it temporary refuge there. History for us, in the often-repeated phrase, is "philosophy teaching by example"; it should begin with a maxim and end with a moral; its documents are to be found in "Blue books and other statistics"; its essential products are "political philosophy, the comparative study of legal institutions, political economy and international law." Thus did Professor Seeley formulate his inspiiing creed, and in no uncertain words. And the creed is to-day proclaimed as the one orthodox doctrine of a large and influential school of historians, with whom it has become a matter of pride "to be gray and neutral, accurate in petty details, indifferent to great men, cautious in praise or blame, and as lifeless as mathematicians." Miss Repplier gives a telling illustration of the methods adopted by such writers. "It has been well said that Nelson's signal to the fleet at Trafalgar, that last, pregnant and simple message, sent in the face of death, has had as much practical effect on the hearts and actions of Englishmen in every quarter of the globe, in every circumstance of danger and adventure, as seven-eighths of the acts of Parliament that decorate the Statute Books. Yet Dr. Bright, in a volume of more than 1,400 pages, can find no room for an incident that has become a living force in history." The severe New Muse will have no dealings with sentiment. And so the chronicler "takes pains to omit, in his lukewarm account of the battle, the one thing that was best worth the telling."

Are we not, then, to strive for accuracy in petty details? Miss Repplier is doubtless inclined to make rather too light of the painstaking care which has become a tradition in the modern school of historians. Yet she is nearly right in declaring that the actual spot where Montrose was hanged is of little importance to any one but the specialist (though, by the by, she very neatly convicts Mr. Gardiner himself of error in just this particular).

But perhaps those of us who crave the life and dramatic interest which the historian no longer gives us, may turn to fiction for stimulation or relief? The outlook is a poor one, we must confess, when critics of weight if not authority, and novelists of acknowledged position, join in loud chorus to proclaim that fiction is no longer to be associated with story telling—that it has very different and much more serious aims, ethical, religious, psychological, sociological. What Miss Repplier herself thinks of some of the most protentous developments of the modern novel, she has told us clearly enough before this, though she adds a word or two in the present volume, in the chatty paper, The Royal Road of Fiction. Here, however, in discussing things From the Reader's Standpoint, she clinches the moral in another way, by showing how our novelists themselves are yearly growing more self-conscious, more beset by theories, and in consequence, more dogmatic and contentious. They cannot leave one another, or one another's pet theories, alone; they must needs argue, wrangle, protest and counter-protest, till a field of literature which was once sought by the train-weary reader for its pleasant freedom from the bustle and stress of existence, is now turned into a noisy battle-ground. "It is a serious age in which we live, and there is a painful sense of responsibility manifested by those who have assigned to themselves the task of directing their fellow creatures, not only in matters spiritual, but in all that pertains to intellectual or artistic life. That we need guidance is plain enough; the helping hand of patient and scholarly criticism was never more welcome than now; but to be driven or rather hounded along the sunny paths of literature by severe and self-appointed teachers, is not perhaps the surest way of reaching the best that has been known and thought in the world. Neither is it calculated to increase our enjoyment enroute." And now, to make matters a hundred times worse, the novelists themselves, unwilling to be any longer regarded as mere caterers for the public's amusement, have joined in the hue and cry. They exploit their own doctrines of art, say bitter things about rival schools, lay down critical principles, and draw up elaborate creeds.

Cannot, cries Miss Repplier, cannot they leave the poor reader alone, to chose his own books, establish his own standard, to find enjoyment where for him the fullest enjoyment is to be found? Literary creeds are of no great interest to him; the squabbles of "veritists" and "romanticists" add nothing to the sum-total of his pleasure. But the realist must have us know that there is a logical theory behind his realism; and the romanticist is ill at ease until he has made it clear that his romanticism, too, is deliberate and rational—a thing of set purpose. Could we not secure, as Miss Repplier suggests, a truce to these internecine struggles, say for six months or a year? "It would freshen us amazingly to hear nothing for a whole year about 'the soul-searching veracity of Tolstoi,'" and a great many timid people might pluck up heart to read that fine novelist, who has been rendered so alarming by his admirers. In a year the romanticist could write of young people who marry, and the realist, of middle-aged people who don't; and in the renewed tranquility of interest, each workman might, perhaps, recognize the strength of the other's position." But there is little hope for such a consummation, devoutly as it is to be wished. With novelists so desperately in earnest about themselves and their work, the critical battle is likely to be waged with ever increasing severity in the years to come; and happy the reader who can hold himself sufficiently aloof from the turmoil, who can keep his taste free and catholic enough, to go his own way, and find in the writings of the different schools that pleasure and relief, which, after all, it is the greatest privilege of fiction to provide for a heavy-laden and much-troubled generation.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The result of the election in New York City is not surprising. It offers an illustration of stupidity on one side and of shrewdness on the other. It indicates that a farseeing political manager, with but a minority following, may so take advantage of the prejudices of a well meaning majority as to defeat all their aims and purposes. In the New York election, two factions of an element of the community reputed to be respectable, and largely in the majority, rather than bury their differences and combine against an element reputed to be bad, were more willing to quarrel with each other and permit the minority element to come out victorious. From this distance no other view of the case is possible, and no other significance is to be attached to the result. The victory of Tammany was the result of the Raines law; and it was the effort of the wing of respectability seeking its maintenance that resulted in turning over the mayoralty of Greater New York to a man notoriously a Tammany candidate, whose name was less known, and whose reputation was less great than either of his serious opponents.

A cosmopolitan city will not tolerate Sunday closing laws, will not obey them and will not respect them. It is folly for an element of the community that makes toward decency in municipal government, to wrangle over such a question, while the enemy to both walks off triumphantly with the prize.

***

No one will thank Governor Budd for associating himself with Sam Rainey to control San Francisco politics. The connection between the executive and the indecent gang which is trying to obtain possession of political supremacy in this city is as obvious as the Palace Hotel. Major Harney, who is figure head in the Rainey forces, is the Governor's favorite Harbor Commissioner. For Sam Rainey himself the Governor pardoned a convict, and has appointed innumerable friends to office. The papers have made plain the connection between this boss and the Curry-Crimmins outfit, which has control of the Republican machine, so the general purpose of the combination is as plain to Budd as to the community. Why the Examiner, which devotes itself so streunously to lashing the mere politicians who are in this plot, should protect the Governor, is hard to understand, for if Budd withdraw his influence from Rainey, public opinion will soon cause the retreat of certain State officials who have permitted themselves to be drawn to the support of this disreputable cabal.

***

The ordinary college entertainment lacks intelligence. Conceived, in most instances, by immature amateurs for sympathetic auditors, it affords amusement to the coterie and regret to the outsider. It is really a family affair, arranged on a domestic basis, with fireside heroes in the leading roles and an admiring audience applauding in advance. I have assisted at several affairs of this character, and imagined something on the same order would be developed at Stanford by the Kermess. But it is a very active and patriotic set that rules affairs there, and the entertainment proved not only an exception but was really beautiful and extremely interesting. A more admirable setting for a Kermess than the classic interior of the Museum building could not have been had, and decorated as it was with ropes of evergreens, with palms and wreaths and flowers and illuminated with hundreds of incandescent lights, it made a magnificent background for the gay and happy crowd that composed the audience. The general aspect of the gathering suggested a fancy dress ball, for there wandered among the throng soldiers, sailors, monks and Japanese maidens, fakirs, Pierrots—all manner of strange and amusing disguises, adding bravely to the color and interest of the mass. As to the entertainment—there was a clever farce comedy by H. L. Nash, in which members of the faculty participated, a vaudeville performance by the students, side shows, fortune telling in the Egyptian room and innumerable other things which I have not the space to describe. Everything was performed with illimitable spirit, and appreciated with appropriate enthusiasm, and a real success—artistic, financial and generally satisfactory—was achieved.

***

Mr. James Flood is accepting congratulations over a big strike in the Allison Ranch mine. In the early days this was one of the best mining properties in California, yielding several millions of dividends ere the ledge was lost. About a year ago Mr. Flood was persuaded to take the property in hand and did so with such earnestness and vigor of purpose that a new vein seven feet wide, running between proper walls has been discovered. The ore averages $100 a ton so the Flood millions will have a substantial addition. This is Mr. Flood's first important venture in the mining field on his own account, and it seems he has had excellent encouragement to go ahead. Apropos of Nevada County, the Empire, perhaps the oldest mining property in the State, has been converted into a new mine by the discovery of a rich vein at the twenty-two-hundred-foot level, from which handsome returns are being obtained.

***

The Hirschfelder controversy continues to agitate the medical community. So far as a layman can gather the difficulty seems to be rather over the manner in which the Doctor's alleged discovery was announced than in the treatment. If the Doctor has really found an intelligent modification of the Koch lymph no one has a right to feel aggrieved. He claims that the substitution of peroxide of hydrogen for distilled water intensifies in some extraordinary way the virtues of the tuberculin and makes it quite tue most effective injection yet applied to the treatment of tuberculosis. Just why this should be, why the oxygenized lymph is more fatal to the bacilli than Koch's, Hirschfelder does not pretend to explain, but claims the results are better than what others are achieving. There is no question but that Thomas H. Williams Jr. fully believes he is cured, and announces he will do something very handsome for the physician, who has saved his life. Some idea of the extent of the Doctor's researches may be gathered from the fact that during his experiments the market price of guinea pigs has advanced from 25 cents each to one dollar and a half.

***

Out in his studio at Woodward's Gardens Douglas Tilden is busily modeling the new Donahue fonntain, which is to be set at the intersection of Bush, Market and Battery streets. A design has at last been evolved by Mr. Polk and the sculptor after hundreds of experiments. The monument will be semi-circular in form, with a central pillar which will be the support of a bronze group representing the mechanical arts. At either end will be groups—science and the arts doubtless, the composition of which has not been decided. The central figure will be something like forty feet in height, and the structure will be a most graceful ornament to Market street. It is no easy task modeling a monument; the scheme has to be modeled in clay so as to get the right effect. Then the proportions must be fixed long before the actual stone and metal work can be prepared for. The monument is to cost $25,000. After it is under way, the Balboa figure ordered by Mayor Phelan will be taken in hand.

***

The Stevenson fountain is certainly the feature of the Plaza, and the comments of casual passers thereon are very amusing. Two human derelicts—emaciated, disreputable—stood looking at the "Bonaventure" one recent afternoon. "Who was this Stevenson," one man said. "Don't know," replied the other, in an exaggerated English accent. "Presume he must have been some American chap who lived around here." Alas for fame. Another day a group of sailors were inspecting the fountain; one of them said he knew Stevenson, and claimed the novelist would never have sanctioned sails so full of wind as those. Really it is curious to watch the races represented around the fountain. I saw there two Chinese, a Jap, an Indian and a Kanaka taking turns at the faucet recently. A friend told me of seeing a colored prize fighter and two Italians there the other day.

***

The precious fluid now flows freely in the Native Sons fountain on Market street. A great deal of fun has been poked at both the architect, Willis Polk, and the sculptor, Mr. Tilden, because there had been provided no overflow for surplus water. The truth is, however, that an accident occured in casting the bronze basin which was to receive the waste, and it had to be made over again. As for the stories about the granite not being pierced for water pipes, they were journalistic inventions, creditable rather to the imaginations of the reporters than to their regard for fact. However, this is quite the most successful monument in the city, and its good taste is generally commended.

***

One gets so weary of finding fault eternally with the way the public affairs of the city are administered that it is an unfeigned pleasure, when one lights upon any stray evidence of intelligencs, honesty—this, though, seems to be an unattainable quantity—or regard for the public convenience, to record the circumstances. It is only lately that a plan has been adopted of placing on corner buildings the names of the streets in plain legible characters and in uniform style. Of course there are vastly more important matters that remain undone and neglected, but that should make us none the less thankful for small mercies, and if it be true that life is made up of trifles, the smallest of things should not be overlooked. Perhaps in time our city fathers may realize that no civilized place in the world has so disgracefully paved a main thoroughfare as Market street. For property owners to line its sides with magnificent buildings that are becoming so conspicuous in its extent is about the same thing as for a man to be walking about with a swell frock coat on his back and a dirty shirt underneath.

***

And, by the way, it is a frequent cause of wonderment to discerning minds how our business development is going to keep pace with the increasing office space afforded by the large business blocks, such as the Mills building, Parrott building, Claus Spreckels building, and several other large structures lately added and now being constructed. So far, cost of rent has shown no tendency towards lessening, but there are signs that owners of such property will be forced to fix a lower scale if they expect to attract occupants of some of the older offices to fill the new edifices. That there is any actual increase of office space needed for the purpose of business concerns at all commensurate with the progress of the building work is not to be supposed, and the only way for the new places to be filled up is to offer inducements in the way of moderate rent and improved accommodation.

The traffic departments of the Southern Pacific Company has lost a capable, popular and able official by the death of Chas. F. Smurr. He was a genial, affable man socially, and a thorough master of the details of his business. Easy to approach, quick of mind, firm and accurate in his convictions, he was an ideal man to meet the shipper, to settle differences, to insist upon the rights of his employer and in the end leave no wounds or disagreeable impressions. Up to but a short while ago he was the picture of health and the essence of good humor. His death is a loss to the railroad, and the thousands of shippers who have come in contact with his decisive intelligence and pleasant manner will be inclined to consider that the community has also lost in his taking off.

C. F. SMURR
Photo by Taber

***

It is not surprising that Francis Powers' admirable Chinese play "The First Born," which proved such a tremendous success here and in New York, has failed to "catch on" in London. The residents of that little village have no acquaintance with Chinese life, and the striking realism and admirable situations which so attracted us here, when Mr. Powers first produced his clever little drama, are therefore lost upon a London audience. Of course there must be any number of people in the English metropolis that have taken in the sights and scenes of our weird little Oriental world here and many others who are closely acquainted with Chinese life and character at home, but London is so vast and its attractions in the way of amusement so numerous and varied, that it is always difficult by means of ordinary advertisement to secure attention to any particular item in the way of amusement. If it could have been possible to sandwich the performance in at some showhouse, which by the general excellence of its attractions is always sure of a crowd, the public might have eventually come to appreciate the little play. It will certainly be a pity that the virgin field, which Powers' talent opened up, should not be grasped by the English playgoing public. They are everlastingly crying out for novelties, and nothing better than "The First Born" can be offered to satisfy their demand. If it be too novel for their limited powers of judgment, that is certainly not the fault of the playwright or the actors, whose representation has been so thoroughly acceptable to audiences in America qualified to form an opinion on the merits of the production.

Inasmuch as prize-fighting is a recognized industry in this neighborhood, it is satisfactory to know, through the arduous exertions of the daily press, that the latest battle was not a "fake." In a comparatively recent event of the kind the contrary was so evidently the case that the good name of San Francisco was badly damaged in the eyes of lovers of the fistic art. This being a free country and everybody being welcome to take his pleasure in any form that the law allows, there is further satisfaction in knowing that the management of last week's fight far surpassed that of any previous exhibition, for which the executive having the affair in charge gives the full credit to the police. The records show that 4,892 persons occupied seats at the Mechanics Pavilion (the scene, by the way, of the recent convention of the Christian Endeavor Society), and probably there were some 6,000 souls present altogether to view what is pronounced to have been a first-class bruising contest between the lad from Michigan and the gentleman of color from Boston, in which the former captured $8,724, the winner's portion of the total net receipts, which are stated to have amounted to $14,540. The loser was consoled with $2,181, and the so-called club that exploited the affair retained the balance of $3,635. San Francisco, therefore, seems fairly entitled still, despite the recent slur on her reputation, to be considered "a good fighting town." And it is a good town for many better things than the exhibitions of the prize ring, Mr. Frohman, of the theatrical firmament, to the contrary notwithstanding.

***

Under the auspices of the Merchants' Association, a timely and well-directed effort is to be made with the object of securing for San Francisco a full share of the commercial benefits which will accrue to this coast from the rush to the Yukon district that may be expected next spring. All information points to the number of travelers in that direction being immense, and while there will be no attempt made to foment the excitement, which led to the hurried departure of many thousands for the Klondike this late summer and fall, the systematic direction of the expected travel this way by all legitimate means is to be closely attended to. Committees of the Merchants' Association on transportation, promotion, and publicity, will handle the executive work, and everything that is done will bear the indorsement of the Association, which is composed of the leading mercantile houses of this city, and in this matter will receive the support and encouragement of the entire business community. Up to the present time Seattle has diplayed the most energy of all the cities of the Pacific Coast in developing facilities for furnishing transportation and supplies to miners proceeding to the Yukon, but, if the present movement of our local merchants be pursued with energy and judgment, as no doubt it will be, the superior capabilities of San Francisco in these respects will soon be generally appreciated. Half a century of experience in dealing with the wants of miners must give this city a great advantage, while the vastly larger resources of our outfitting establishments and the superior accommodation furnished by our hotels and restaurants will be an assurance that all who turn their steps this way can be provided for, and this without any enhancement of ordinary rates. The same conditions exist in regard to transportation facilities, and the Association will be in a position to show how these can and will be increased during the coming season. The fact that the Mint is established in San Francisco compels the smelting houses to allow full value for all gold coming into their hands, which must further tend to help this city in the position of mining headquarters in this part of the world. All that is now required, therefore, is an honest and vigorous effort to make our resources thoroughly well known everywhere.

AFTERMATH OF THE KLONDIKE EXCITEMENT

***

Disastrous news has come to hand regarding the whaling fleet in the Arctic. No less than eight vessels — the Orca, Jeanie, Fearless, Jessie H. Freeman, Belvedere, Rosario, Wanderer, and Newport — are described by navigators as having been "licked up by the ice tongue." This is a formation of ice which extends from the polar regions in a southeriy direction almost to Behring Straits, and "wags" with the wind between the shores of Alaska and Siberia. Once caught in the grinding floes of the tongue few vessels have been known to escape, and in 1871 thirty-three whaling ships were licked up by it, and many of the crews totally lost, while nothing was ever seen of the vessels again. In 1876 a similar fate attended twenty-two ships, which, with all on board, were never heard of afterwards. Every year since there have been one or two casualties of the kind, and the whaling men had begun to grow more careful, but as steam power has come into use and whales grew scarcer, the masters have again become more daring. This season they neglected the warnings of the coming winter, and there seems now no hope of the return of the vessels named from the northern seas. For the number of vessels engaged the catch is considered to have been good, representing 90,000 pounds of bone — the product of fifty whales. Since the news of the disaster to the fleet the price of whalebone has advanced in the East to $4 per pound.

***

On Monday last the racing season, for which San Francisco is becoming famous, opened at Ingleside, under what have been generally regarded as most auspicious conditions. Usually opening days have been fixed for a Saturday when the attendance of the general public, as distinguished from those actively engaged in the business of racing, is always larger than on any other day of the week. The first day of the season, however, is of great importance, and judging by the increased number of people and horses that have already arrived here from the East, as compared with previous years, it is evident that the attractions of California to owners of thoroughbred horses and others who delight in seeing good racing are fully recognized. Of the appearance of the Ingleside grounds, the improvements made in the course itself, the surrounding lawns and gardens, and in its buildings, of which the internal arrangements are admirably planned, too much cannot be said; and, though a person may be indifferent to the charms of the sport, there is satisfaction in viewing the well-appointed property and observing the orderly and systematic manner in which the racing programme is carried through. This is the fifth season we have had racing in San Francisco during the winter and each year, as it has passed, has shown improvement in every respect. That a still further advance is in prospect during the season now opened cannot be questioned, and if the authorities at Ingleside and Oakland continue in their efforts to uphold the tone of the sport present promises are certain to be realized. Anyone who enjoys a pleasant outing amidst agreeable surroundings, will be certain to feel rewarded for devoting an afternoon to seeing what is going on at either of the tracks, and all the more if they can enjoy good racing.

THE BELLE OF WAPUNGNOBEQUITE
Photo of Piute Wickyup near Stillwater, Nevada, from copyrighted photo by George B. Fairbanks

SCHULTE'S DARING DIVE FROM THE CLIFF HOUSE BALCONY, 88 FEET ABOVE THE WATER

***

The raisin-growers of Fresno, Tulare and Kings counties for several years past have had to contend with a scale of prices that rendered their industry scarcely profitable. This season, however, the market has greatly improved, and the only circumstance that appears at all unfavorable to a successful issue for the present year's work is the damage caused by unpropitious weather during the curing of the crop. Rainstorms and unseasonably cold weather are said to have injured at least a third of the entire output in the Fresno district, while in Tulare County the extent of the disaster is even greater. Reports from the East are to the effect that the California seeded raisins are making rapid strides in public favor, and the efforts which have been made to push these descriptions in the market, in the face of a good deal of prejudice and doubt as to their superiority over ordinary varieties, are now being fully rewarded. The almost complete failure of the crop of Malaga raisins in Spain will greatly help the demand in home markets for the best quality of California raisins.

***

Schulte, who jumped into the ocean from a plank extended from the upper balcony of the Cliff House last Sunday, looks like the son of a Viking, with his flaxen head and blue eyes and fine strong limbs. He walked to the end of the board and waited, and then sat down. Doubtless this was to give the crowds on the beach due notice that the jump was imminent. But the very typical American throng on the balconies, construed this wait quite differently, as was evidenced by their remarks:

"Oh, I don't know. That's not so warm" (pointing to the foam, 100 odd feet below).

"Waiting for someone to push him."

"Look at his knees knock. He don't come from a knee-knocking family."

"He's a yellow streak somewhere."

The probabilities are that Schulte was neither specially cool nor particularly frightened. A slight nervousness was evident, but when he was ready, he rose, stood on the end of the board facing the sea, and quietly fingered his bathing suit and adjusted it most carefully. Then he jumped—imperturtably, deliberately and with perfect nicety. His body made a beautiful, slightly curved line to the water, his disappearance therein was clean and almost soundless, and at once, as it seemed, he was up and breasting the swell toward the Seal Rocks. Making thus a gradual curve, he swam to the beach on the south through a strong sea, and was swallowed up at once by the hero-worshipping crowd.

***

The statement that the proprietors of the Treadwell mine in Alaska have determined to add a further 300 stamps, at a cost of $500,000, is of great interest to the mining world. The present number of stamps is 240, and it will be necessary to provide increased power for running the stamping machinery, which will be done by putting in an electric transmission plant, capable of operating 600 stamps. When the new additions have been completed it is said that ore can be mined and milled at a cost of only $1 per ton, and possibly even somewhat less. It is invariably urged by the best mining authorities that the industry has hardly begun in California, and if it be shown that ore can be treated at the trifling cost stated, the opportunities for the employment of capital in developing the immense quantities of low-grade ore which are in reserve in this State are great. Of course large capital is needed to erect the requisite milling plant and instal electric motive power, but inasmuch as there would be practically no risk and a certain return, handsomely remunerative for the outlay, the advantages offered to capitalists will no doubt be availed of.

***

In view of the failure of the Silver Commissioners' mission to Europe, we are evidently doomed to a fresh deluge of writing on the subject of the white metal. A Chicago paper expresses its surprise that the Indian government should openly declare that the divergence of the two metals has given India a great advantage as an exporting country, and a local evening paper quoting this and further remarks of the same journal, says: "The wheat-grower of India does not get the benefit of gold prices. He sells his wheat to the British shipper, who sells it in Liverpool at the market-price in gold. * * * Probably the inspiration of the dispatch from India * * * came from parties who are interested in buying wheat at its silver price and selling it at its gold price." The real cause for surprise is that editors can pen such stuff for their leading articles. Any merchants' invoice clerk or junior in a bank would scorn to show the ignorance thus displayed. The market value of every article of export or import dealt in by merchants in India, or any other country where silver is legal tender, is determined on a gold basis. There is no such anomaly as "silver prices and gold prices" in existence. If any one here thinks there is a fortune to be made buying produce for export in a silver-using country, let him try the plan in Mexico, which is handy for the purpose.

***

Combinations in restraint of trade are matters that crop up in various forms. One of the latest affairs of the kind that has been leading to considerable discussion in local circles is the compact entered into between the powder companies last spring in regard to the schedule price of blasting powders. In this center of the mining industry the manufacture and supply of explosives are of considerable importance, not only California itself, but a large territory outside the State being likewise dependent upon our resources. For a considerable time prior to the first part of this year the competition between the companies engaged in the trade had rendered operations unprofitable. It something had to be done to alter the position of the affairs, if they were to continue in the business. With this object three of the leading companies formed an association and agreed upon a minimum scale of prices. One company remained outside the fold, but is now reported to have been gathered in, thus removing all chance of competition from the market. Seeing this, it has appeared to people interested in powder being as cheap as possible that something should be done to break up what is contended to be an illegal trust, opposed to the enactments of the Union and the State. So far the movement to effect the discussion which has arisen and the expressed intention of the opposition has been to create a little flurry in the stocks of the powder companies on the local exchange. Whether anything definite will be achieved by the contemplated legal measures remains to be seen.

***

In cycling circles the advent of the bevel-geared chainless wheel is the absorbing topic of the hour, and the fact that it would appear to possess a greater attraction for the general riding public than for the race-rider makes the interest in the new gearing almost universal. Moreover, if the wheel proves on acquaintance to be really what is claimed for it, it is bound to be specially favored by the ladies, for there are no parts to catch in their clothes, it is elegant in appearance and having all its motive parts encased, no dust or mud can get into them, and it is easily kept clean. Ever since the introduction of the "safety" bicycle mechanics have striven to supplant the chain driving mechanism with a substitute that would give better satisfaction, and the Patent Office contains hundreds of devices calculated to revolutionize the wheel in this respect. The construction of the new wheel is simple. The gearing consists of two sets of cog wheels, one set at the pedals and the other at the rear axle. A connecting rod extends from one set of cogs to the other. The pedals transmit the power by the turning of the rod between the gearing of the pedals and the gearing of the rear axle. The cogs and the rods are enclosed in enamelled cases. For practical road riding the new machine is by demonstration a vast improvement on the chain-geared bicycle. On sixty consecutive days a rider made sixty consecutive century runs on this wheel, at times through mud and slush and water almost up to the hubs, a feat impossible with the chain wheel. A means of adjustment is provided to take up any loosenesss that may be occasioned by wear. When the wheel is put together a plentiful supply of a special preparation of the consistency of crude vaseline is distributed about the gears and acts as a permanent lubricant. A careful rider will probably not find it necessary to attend to lubricating his wheel once a twelvemonth. To the cyclist the chainless wheel promises to be as desirable as a hammerless gun is nowadays to the sportsman.

BOSWELL, JR

The accompanying photograph, for which we are indebted to the Spirit of the Times of New York, affords a good likeness of Star Pointer, the speed champion of the world in harness, he having been driven to a record of 1:59¼ by David McClary at Readville, Mass., on August 28th last. Star Pointer is a pacer, and his pedigree shows him to be bred in pure pacing lines, although it runs early into obscurity. He is a brown horse, standing about 16 hands, and was foaled in 1889, making him now eight years old. His performances this season in the East with his rivals, Joe Patchen and John R. Gentry, have been a source of the greatest interest to the sporting world, his victory over the first-named in a race at Springfield, Ill., on October 1st in 2:01½, stamping him as the champion racehorse in harness. It is now very generally believed that he will yet surpass this great feat.

STAR POINTER

THE KICK-OFF IN THE SECOND HALF

CALIFORNIA'S TANDEM SCORING THE FIRST TOUCHDOWN

FRESHMAN FOOTBALL. STANFORD VS. THE U. C. AT CENTRAL PARK

THE NEW BABY HOLDS A LEVEE

THE BELLE OF THE CAMP

A CORNER OF THE CAMP

A GROUP AT THE WAGON

GIPSY LIFE IN THE WEST: SKETCHED AT THE POTRERO

THE HERRMANN COMPANY

How Leon Herrmann Contrasts With His Great Uncle—Key to Some Feats.

The path of the critic is more often than not a thorny one, and there seems to be a lingering feeling of self-reproach when one takes pen in hand to write unfavorable comment, however slight, on those who have been performing in the cause of charity. Add to this the pain of having to say a word in dispraise of the kinsman and successor of Herrmann the Great. But it is bad to be found out, especially in not telling the truth, and the rights of the public take precedence of all else at the hands of the critic. The opening evening at the Columbia was reserved as a benefit for the Woman's Exchange, generously tendered by the Herrmann the Great Company, ot whom Leon Herrmann and Madame Herrmann, nephew and widow respectively of the Professor, are practically the sole members. Leon Herrmann is, in a measure, an imitation in appearance, manner and speech of his uncle, but unfortunately lacks the peculiar grace and magnetic influence that made Herrmann the Great a man by himself. In the capacity of a magician, the gulf between the two is not so wide as in the personal side of the comparison, but as everyone knows, style and manuer is more than half the battle in the field of magic representation. Allowance must, of course, be made for the more limited experience of Leon. Perhaps, too, the effort required from the audience, in order to follow his Frenchified diction, may not be so severe ou their patience when he has been longer in the country, and has acquired the art of speaking English in United States, at least to some extent, instead of wholly in French.

Of Madame Herrmann, it need only be said that, personally charming, as every one knows, if her dancing, so called, may be accepted for what it is, a succession of smooth and sweeping motions, it was an excellent and delightful performance, improved since last occasion by novel spectacular effects in color that surpass anything yet seen in San Francisco.

With the exception of a trick in which the female form divine is suspended on an invisible slack wire, and put through certain evolutions of doubtful charm, the performances of Leon Herrmann were a repetition of those given here at different times by his great namesake, such as "decapitation," now styled "elixir vitae," the "artist's dream," rising cards and other magical feats. "Decapitation" in itself is not by any means calculated to create awe, as it is too apparent that the returned Klondyker's head is "received" by the mechanical chair, and that the cabinet, mirrored to create the necessary illusion, furnishes the individual whose head eventually waggles out of the movable "receiver" or helmet. In the "artist's dream," when the canvas painting is resting on the floor, the lady supposed to be pictured comes up behind the painting through a trapdoor in the stage floor, and ensconced behind the picture, is lifted by the artist, assisted by invisible pullies, on to the easel. The curtain is drawn, the lady rolls the canvas up into the stretcher and steps out from under the curtain. Returning she replaces the canvas, the artist pushes aside the curtain and finds once more only the painted canvas. The palming and other tricks which Leon undertakes are good conjuring, and, so far as actual execution is concerned, his skill is little short of his lamented relative.

---

There is little in common between the old Romany tribes and the Gypsy bands of the present day. The people of the Potrero camp illustrated have most of the comforts of home; for besides their trim tents, they have huts built of boards, and their sleek horses are domiciled in a neat looking shed. The wagon used in common by the three families would do credit to a circus. As for space, they occupy a big lot on Sixteenth street and Potrero avenue, and are protected from the too ready visitation of the vulgar, by a natural hedge of great blocks of quarry rock. The inmates of the camp, too, are painfully modern in their manner and habits. Bethsheba Whorton, the most Gypsy-like of the women-folk, wears a smart green shirt waist and a dark skirt in place of the parti colored rags of romance, and her eyes are blue and not snappy black. The belle of the camp insists on primping for her picture, just as other girls do, and the little boys play with the urchins of the neighborhood and hurl the most blood-curdling slang. A week-old baby is now the chief personage of the camp. He was issued into Gypsydom by a civilized doctor, and civilized rites have celebrated his advent, for there was a christening to which the elite of that neighborhood were invited. The function was a gay one, according to a local historian.

"De kid wuz named Potrero, because he was born on dat street, see? And dey had some booze and a bloke played de cordeen; and say, youse had oughter seed de kid's pap; he was a beamin' all over his physog."

---

The disruption of the liquor dealers' machine has attracted less attention than the event deserves. Though rumor has stated so, it was not because of internal dissensions that the organization was disbanded, but because its members had been made to realize that their organization was a source of danger rather than an element of profit. When the association openly endorsed an individual the community found in the fact a reason for voting against him, and so they concluded it was best to do politics among themselves rather than through the medium of a president, secretary and other officials.

ITALIAN OPERA

The Methods and Vocal Manner of Certain Late Importations.

If the singing of the five principal singers of the Italian Opera company now playing here, and as heard on Tuesday night, represents a good average of operatic singing in Italy, that must be a distressful country to send students of vocal art to. As an experience of everything that singing should not be, their performance of La Gioconda was all it should be. Everywhere this horrible contortion resulted in sound as offensive to the ear as sewer gas to the nostril. In particular the soprano and tenor of the cast outdid themselves. The lady, an opulently endowed blonde, strangulated a laryngeal whistle first on one side of her throat and then on the other, finally winding up by keeping the whole throat in motion with a rapid and vigorous visible trill of the lower jaw, at which the whole house necessarily "came down." Not to be outdone in the muscular race, the tenor of the occasion took so many reefs in the throat muscles that two large veins started up like "quills upon the fretful porcupine," and evident showers of perspiration, sluiced the makeup into an inconglomerate halo. His vocal whistle appeared to please for there was applause galore.

Of the baritone and mezzo-soprano it could be said that both had splendid material, with that robust Italian physique of which so many noble singers have been possessed. The vigor aud frequency of carrying up those hard yet fresh chest tones to unknown heights, was something to be remembered in this mezzo-soprano; and the baritone bawled with equal throat power from beginning to end of the opera. Mertens, himself, could not have shouted more lustily. Neither of these performers are passe or worn even, thanks to a remarkable recuperative power. If not possessed of temperament as understood in America, these people possess a quality which has nothing to do with vocal or dramatic art, yet compels attention and even applause from an audience, a sort of animal spirits or brio belonging to the Latin people. Their playing of the opera had nothing dignified, nothing remotely resembling dramatic realism in it, yet it maintained some interest for the average audience, and those barn-storming, bouncing gestures, and antediluvian struttings, appeared to have a magnetic attraction by reason of that compelling Italian anima. To conduct an opera through with principals incapable of uttering anything approaching a singing tone, and a chorus unspeakably awful, vocally as well as to appearance, and with a band of doubtful quality, was an heroic feat and accomplished with more than credit by Signor Kallini. LESLEY MARTIN.

---

In Japan every child is taught to write with both hands.

Fantaisie Printaniere.

BY FRANK NORRIS.

The McTeagues and the Ryers lived at the disreputable end of Polk street, away down in the squalid neighborhood by the huge red drum of the gas works. The drum leaked, of course, and the nasty brassy foulness of the leak mingled with the odors of cooking from the ill-kept kitchens, and the reek of garbage in the vacant lots did not improve the locality.

McTeague had once been a dentist, and had had "parlors" up at the respectable end of the street. But after a while the license office discovered that he had no diploma; in fact, had never attended a college of any sort, and had forbidden him to practice. So McTeague had taken to drink.

Ryer, some years back, had been a sort of small stock-dealer on the outskirts of Butchertown, and had done fairly well until the Health Board reported him to the Supervisors because he had fattened his hogs on poultices obtained from the City and County Hospital. The result was a lamentable scandal, which finally drove him out of business. So Ryer had taken to drink.

The Ryer's home (or let us say, the house in which the Ryers ate and slept), adjoined the house in which the McTeagues ate and slept. You would have thought that this propinquity, joined with the coincidence of their common misfortunes — both victims of governmental persecution — would have insured a certain degree of friendship between the two men. But this was not so at all, a state of feud existed between Montague Ryer and Capulet McTeague. The feud had originated some year or so previous to the time of this tale, in the back room of Gerstle's "Wein Stube" on the corner opposite the drum. A discussion had arisen between the two men, both far gone in whiskey, as to the lines of longitude on the surface of the globe. Capulet claimed they were parallel throughout their whole extent — Montague maintained they converged at the poles. They discussed this question at length — first with heady words and vociferation, next with hurled pony glasses and uplifted chairs, and finally, after their ejection from the "Stube," with fists clenched till the knuckles whitened, crooked elbows, and the soles of heavy-shod boots. They arrived at no definite conclusion. Twice since then had they fought. Their original difference of opinion had been speedily forgotten. They fought now, they knew not why—merely for the sake of fighting. The quarrel between them came to be recognized by the "block" as part of the existing order of things, like the reek from the drum and the monthly visit of the rent-collector.

Ryer had something the worst of it in these fights. He was a small, lean, pinkish creature, like a split carrot, his mouth a mere long slit beneath his nose. When he was angry his narrow eyes glistened like streaks of bitumen.

McTeague was a huge blonde giant, carrying his enormous fell of yellow hair, six feet and more above his ponderous, slow-moving feet. His hands, hard as wooden mallets, dangled from arms that suggested twisted cables. His jaw was that of the carnivora.

Both men thrashed their wives, McTeague on the days when he was drunk, which were many, Ryer on the days when he was sober, which were few. They went about it, each in his own peculiar fashion. Ryer found amusement in whipping Missis Ryer with a piece of rubber hose filled with gravel, or (his nature demanded variety of sensation), with a long, thin rawhide, which he kept hidden between the matresses. He never used fists or boots; such methods revolted him. "What! am I a drayman, am I a hod-carrier!" exclaimed Mister Ryer. When McTeague did not use the fist or the foot, he used the club. Refinement, such as characterized Ryer, was foreign to the ex-dentist. He struck out blindly, savagely, and with a colossal, clumsy force that often spent itself upon the air. The difference between the men could be seen in the different modes of punishment they affected. Ryer preferred the lash of the whip, McTeague the butt. Ryer was cruel, McTeague only brutal.

While common grievance had not made friends of the two men, mutual maltreatment had drawn their wives together, until no two women on the "block" were more intimate than Trina McTeague and Ryer's wife. They made long visits to each other in the morning in their wrappers and curl papers, talking for hours over a cuppa tea, served upon the ledge of the sink or a corner of the laundry table. During these visits they avoided speaking of their husbands, because, although the whole "block" knew of the occasional strained relations of their families, the two women feigned to keep the secret from each other. And this in the face of the fact that Missis Ryer would sometimes come over to see Trina with a thin welt across her neck, or Trina return the visit with a blackened eye or a split lip.

Once, however, only once, they broke in upon their reticence. Many things came of the infringement. Among others this fantaisie.

* * * * * * *

During that particular night three dandelions had bloomed in the vacant lot behind the gas works, the unwonted warmth of the last few days had brought back the familiar odor of the garbage heaps, an open car had appeared on the cross down cable line and Bock beer was on draught at the "Wein Stube," and Polk street knew that Spring was at hand.

About nine o'clock Trina McTeague appeared on the back steps of her house, rolling her washtub before her, preparing to do her monthly washing in the open air on that fine morning. She and Ryer's wife usually observed this hated rite at the same time, calling shrilly to one another as their backs bent and straightened over the scrubbing-boards. But that morning Trina looked long for Missis Ryer and at last fell a-wondering.

The fact of the matter was that the night before Ryer had come home sober and had found occasion to coerce Missis Ryer with a trunk-strap. By a curious coincidence McTeague had come home drunk the same evening, and for two hours Trina had been hard put to it to dodge his enormous fists and his hurled boots. (Nor had she been invariably successful).

At that moment the ex-dentist was sleeping himself sober under the stairs in the front hall, and the whilom stock-dealer was drinking himself drunk in the "Wein Stube" across the street.

When eleven o'clock had struck and Missis Ryer had not appeared, Trina dried her smoking arms on her skirt, and, going through the hole in the backyard fence, entered the kitchen of the Ryer's house and called. Missis Ryer came into the kitchen in a blue cotton wrapper and carpet slippers. Her hair was hanging down her back (it was not golden). Evidently she had just arisen.

"Ain't you goin' to wash this mornin', Missis Ryer?" asked Trina McTeague.

"Good mornin,' Trina," said the other, adding doggedly, as she sat down hard in a broken chair: "I'm sick and tired a-washin' an' workin' for Ryer."

She drew up instinctively to the cold stove, and propped her chin upon her knuckles. The loose sleeve of the wrapper fell away from her forearm, and Trina saw the fresh marks of the trunk-strap. Evidently Ryer had not held that strap by the buckle-end.

This was the first time Missis Ryer had ever mentioned her husband to Trina.

"Hoh!" ejaculated Trina, speaking before she thought, "It ain't alwus such fun workin' for Mac, either."

There was a brief silence. Both the women remained for a moment looking vaguely out of the kitchen door, absorbed in thought, very curious, each wondering what next the other would say. The conversation, almost without their wishing it, had suddenly begun upon untried and interesting ground. Missis Ryer said:

"I'll make a cuppa tea."

She made the tea, slovening languidly about the dirty kitchen, her slippers clap-clapping under her bare heels. Then the two drew up to the washboard of the sink, drinking the tea from the saucers, wiping their lips slowly from time to time with the side of their hands. Each was waiting for the other to speak. Suddenly Missis Ryer broke out:

"It's best not to fight him, or try to git away—hump your back and it's soonest over."

"You couldn't do that with Mac," answered Trina, shaking her head with decision; "if I didunt dodge, if I let um have his own way he'd sure kill me. Mac's that strong he could break me in two."

"Oh, Ryer's strong all-right-all-right," returned Missis Ryer, "an' then he's sober when he fights an' knows what he's about, an' that makes it worse. Look there what he did last night." She rolled up her sleeve and Trina glanced at the arm with the critical glance of a connoisseur.

"Hoh," she said scornfully, "that ain't a circumstance. I had a row with Mac last night meself, and this is what he did with his fist. Just his fist, mind you, and it only grazed me as it was." She slipped a discolored shoulder out of her calico gown. The two critically compared bruises. Missis Ryer was forced to admit that Trina's bruise was the worse. She was vexed and disappointed but rallied with:

"Yes, that's pirty bad, but I'll show you somethin' that'll open your eyes," and she thrust the blue wrapper down from the nape of the neck. "See that scar there," she said, "that's the kind of work Ryer can do when he puts his mind to it; got that nearly four months ago and it's sore yet."

"Ah, yes," said Trina loftily, "little scars, little flesh wounds like that! You never had any bones brokun. Just look at that thumb," she went on proudly, "Mac did that with just a singul grip of his fist. I can't nevur bend it again."

Then the interminable discussion began.

"Look at that, just look at that, will you."

"Ah, that ain't nothun. How about that, there's a lick for you."

"Why, Mac's the strongest man you ever saw."

"Ah-h, you make me tired, it ain't a strong man, always, that can hurt the most. It's the fellah that knows how and where to hit. It's a whip that hurt's the most."

"But it's a club that does the most damage."

"Huh! wait till you git hit with a rubber hose filled with gravel."

"Why, Mac can knock me the length of the house with his left fist. He's done it plenty a' times."

Then they came to reminiscences.

"Why, one time when Mac came home from a picnic at Schuetzen Park, he picked me right up offun the ground with one hand and held me right up in the air like that, and let me have it with a kitchun chair. Huh! talk to me about Ryer's little whips, Ryer ain't a patch on my man. You don't know what a good thrashun is."

"I don't, hey, you can just listen to what I tell you, Trina McTeague, when I say that Ryer can lay all over your man. You jest ought a' been here one night when I sassed Ryer back, I tell you I'll never do that again. Why the worst lickin' Mister McTeague ever gave you was just little love taps to what I got. Besides I don' believe your man ever held you up with one hand and banged you like that with a chair, you wouldn't a' lived if he had."

"Oh, I ain't lyun to you," cried Trina, with shrill defiance getting to her feet. Missis Ryer rose likewise and clapped her arms akimbo.

"Why," she cried, "you just said as much yourself, that if you didn't dodge and get away he'd kill you."

"An' I'll say it again. I ain't gowun to eat my words for the best woman that ever wore shoes, an' you can chew on that, Missus Ryer. I tell you Mac's the hardust hittun husband a woman ever had."

"I just like to have you live here with Ryer a week or so, you'd soon find out who was the best man, an'——" here Missis Ryer came close to Trina and shouted the words in her face. "An' don't you sass me either, an talk about eatin' words, or I'll show you right here the kind a' whalin' Ryer's taught me."

"I guess Ryer, himself, knows who's the best man of the two, he or Mac," exclaimed Trina, loftily. "How about that last scrap o' theirs? If Mac got hold a' you once and gave you one lick, like the kind I get twenty of evury week, you wouldunt be as well off as your man was when Mac got through with um the time they fought last Washingtun's burthday, behind the brick kill. Why Mac could do for the whole three of us, you an' Ryer an' I, yes he could, with one hand."

"Ah, talk sense, will you," shouted Missis Ryer, as she moved the previous question. "Ain't Mister MacTeague drunk when he dresses you down, and don't it stand to reason that he can't give it to you as hard as Ryer gives it to me when he's sober?"

"Do you know anything about it anyways?" said Trina, excitedly, "I tell you he's a deal worse to me than Ryer ever thought of be-un to you. Ain't he twysut, three times as strong?"

"That's a lie," retorted Ryer's wife, vindicating her absent husband with astonishing vehemence.

"Don't you tell me I lie again," shouted Trina, her cheeks flaming, her chin thrust out.

"I guess I'll say what I please in my own kitchin, you dirty little drab," screamed the other. Their faces were by this time close together, neither would draw back an inch.

"No you won't, no you won't," panted Trina, "an' don't you dare call me a drab. Drab yourself; best go back to the pigs your man used to fatten on old poultices, go back to your sty, I guess it won't be any dirtier than this here kitchun."

"Git out of it then."

"Not till I get ready."

"An' I'll call you drab till I'm black in the face, drab, drab, dam nasty, dirty little drab. Git out uv my kitchin."

"Ah-h, let me see you put me out."

"Ah, dirty little drab."

"Ah, slattern, ah, pig-feeder."

Suddenly they tore at each other like infuriated cats. A handful of black and gray hair came away from Missis Ryer's head. Fingernail marks, long red lines appeared on the curve of Trina's cheeks, very like McTeagues conception of the parallels upon a globe. Missis Ryer, hustling Trina toward the door, pushed her into the arms of McTeague himself. At the same time Ryer, warned of this war of wives, entered the kitchen from the front of the house. He had come over hastily from the "Wein Stube" and was half drunk. McTeague had partially slept off his intoxication and was about half sober.

"Here, here, here," cried the ex-dentist over his wife's shoulder, "you two women fightin', quit it, what the bloody Hell!"

"Scrappin'" shouted Ryer from the doorway, "choke off ol' woman, if there's any scrappin to be done, I'll do it meself."

"She called me a drab," gasped Trina, glaring at her enemy from under the protection of her gigantic husband.

"An' she said my kitchin wasn't a place for pigs to live in," retorted Missis Ryer, without taking her eyes from Trina.

The men had not yet looked at each other. They were unwilling to fight this morning, because each one of them was half drunk or half sober, (either way you chose to put it), and because Ryer preferred to fight when he had all his wits about him, while McTeague was never combative until he had lost his wits entirely.

"What started the row, whatcha been fightin' about?" demanded the ex-dentist.

"Yes, sure," put in Ryer, "whatcha been scrappin' about, what started the row?"

The women looked at each other, unable to answer. Then Trina began awkwardly:

"Well I—well—well—a—well she told me—she said—well, she run you down, Mac, an' I didunt figure on puttun up with it."

"She tried to make small of you, Ryer," said his wife, "an' I called her down, an'—that's all, she tried to make small of you."

"Hey? What'd she say?" demanded McTeague, "out with it."

"Well, this is what she said," exclaimed Trina suddenly. "She said Ryer could give her a worse dressing down than you ever gave me, an' I wouldn't stand it."

"Well," declared Missis Ryer, turning to her husband, "I ain't goin' to let every dirty little drab that comes along say—say—throw mud at my man, am I? I guess," added Missis Ryer, defiantly, facing Trina and the ex-dentist. "I guess Ryer can do what he likes in his own house. I ain't goin' to let any woman tell me that her man is better'n mine, in any way."

"An' that's what you two fought over," exclaimed the husbands in the same breath.

"Well, suppose we did," said Trina with defiance.

"I guess I can quarrel about what I like," observed Missis Ryer, sullenly.

For the first time since they had entered the room the eyes of the two men met, and for fully half a dozen seconds they looked squarely at each other. Then the corners of the slit under Ryer's nose began to twitch, and McTeague's huge jaws to widen to a grin in nut-cracker fashion. Suddenly a roar of laughter shook him; he sank into a chair, rocking back and forth, smiting his knee with his palm. Ryer cackled shrilly, crying out between peals of laughter: "Well, if this ain't the greatest jolly I've struck yet."

"Fightin' over our fightin' them," bellowed McTeague.

"I've seen queer bugs in my time," gasped Ryer, "but the biggest curios yet are women, oh Lord, but this does beat the Dutch."

"Say, ain't this great, Ryer?"

"Mac, this does beat the carpet, sure."

"Look here old man, about them parallel lines, I say let's call it off. I ain't got no quarrel against you."

"That's a go, Mac, you're a good fellah, sure, put it there."

They shook hands upon their reconciliation, their breasts swelling with magnanimity. They felt that they liked one another hugely, and they slapped each other tremendous blows on the back, exclaiming at intervals "put it there," and gripping hands with a cordiality that was effusive beyond words. All at once Ryer had an inspiration.

"Say, Mac, come over to the Stube and have a drink on it."

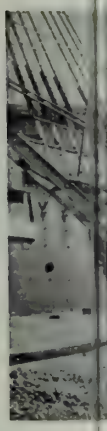
"Well, I just guess I will," vociferated the ex-dentist.

Bewildered and raging at the unexpected reconciliation of their husbands, the two women had disappeared, Trina slamming the door of the kitchen with a parting cry of "pig feeder," which Missis Ryer immediately answered by thrusting her head out of a second story window and screaming at the top of her voice to the neighborhood in general, "dirty little drab."

Meanwhile the two men strode out of the house and across the street, their arms affectionately locked; the swing doors of the "Stube" flapped after them like a pair of silent wings.

That day settled the matter. Heretofore it had been the men who were enemies and their wives who were friends. Now the two men are fast friends, while the two women maintain perpetual feud. The "block" has come to recognize their quarrel as part of the existing order of things, like the leak from the gas-works and the collector's visits. Occasionally the women fight, and Missis Ryer, who is the larger and heavier, has something the best of it.

However, one particular custom common to both households remains unchanged — both men continue to thrash their wives in the old ratio—McTeague on the days when he is drunk (which are many), Ryer on the days when he is sober (which are few).



1. Sewing sails on the Monadnock. 2. Anchors for warships. 3. Remodeled training-ship Pensacola. 4. Loading stores on a warship. 5. The Mohican being modernized. 6. The Mon from the Philadelphia. 8. A group of Marines. 9. Deck scene on the Monadnock. 10. Lifting steel beams aboard the Charleston. 11. A new storage h 13. Bottom of the Monterey, newly painted. 17. Cleaning the quay. 15. Lunch hour on the Monterey.

SCENES AT THE MARE ISLAND NAVY YARD

9. undergoing repairs on the dry dock. 7. Taking worn out parts
12. Loading the Charleston.

THE WORLD ABROAD

News and Gossip From Some European Capitals.

Emperor William may be depended upon to keep the diplomatic world agog. His latest idea was to drop in upon King Leopold of Belgium and see what arrangements he could make for having Belgian territory placed at his disposal in case German military operations, say in a war with France, for instance, would thereby be facilitated. It is needless to say that such a suggestion is regarded by other powers as nothing more nor less than paramount cheek. In fact, in the face of what occurred when the Franco-Prussian war broke out in 1870, it seems hardly worth considering. Of course, existing conditions are different, but what has Belgium to gain by such an understanding? And is it to be supposed for a moment that, even if France took no steps in the matter, England, who acted so promptly in 1870 in promoting and securing the tripartite treaty between herself, France and Prussia, guaranteeing respect for Belgian neutrality and independence, would be likely to stand by and see anything of the kind agreed to between Belgium and Germany, without interfering? The Belgian people themselves are at the present time actively employed in denouncing a scheme that is about to be presented to Parliament for extending the system of military conscription, and as the Socialist vote has been proved, by a recent election in Brussels, to have quadrupled in the last three years, chiefly owing to the dislike of the working classes for the military laws, the people are not likely to sympathize with the designs of the German Emperor.

Henry Labouchere, Member of Parliament, and proprietor and editor of Truth, has been getting a dose of his own medicine from the hand of Mr. Henry Hess, editor of the African Critic. It is well known Labouchere has never been sparing in his treatment of his victims, many of whom have undoubtedly deserved all they got from his pen, but Mr. Hess seems prepared in dealing with Mr. Labouchere himself to out-Herod Herod. The editor of Truth has now acknowledged to being the author of letters published in fac-simile by Mr. Hess, which at first he declared to be forgeries, and also pleads guilty to rigging the stock market when financial editor of the World. Labouchere having declined further notice of Mr. Hess or his charges, the latter renews his attacks in vehement language, accusing the former of cheating and swindling and declaring that he will be driven out of public life at an early date. It has been generally recognized that in politics and finance Labouchere has never been scrupulous and has not hesitated to make unfair use of his opportunities to advance his own interests. Possessed of such instincts and endowed with exceptional ability and energy, he has been feared rather than respected; and, if his downfall can be brought about, there will be no little satisfaction amongst those who constitute the best elements in social and political circles.

There is no lack of new ideas for the coming Paris Exposition, many of them of most astonishing proportions. M. Hunt proposes a six-cornered building, 100 feet in diameter and 200 feet high, on the top of which sleigh races are to be held on artificial snow. M. Banks has the idea of a gigantic candelebra, whose three feet are to serve as promenades. M. Buff advises the erection of two fountains, one representing a man and the other a woman at 200 times the average size. M. Couchol, a patriot, would have the Eiffel tower remodelled into a statue of France, the first two stories to serve as a pedestal. M. Mazelagne proposes a house 1,000 feet in height in order to ascertain scientifically to what height houses may be habitable without danger. A pyramid 1,200 feet high, revolving around its center, is the ideal of John Richardson; and Gustave Songeux, a philosopher and philanthropist, proposes two colossal statues, "War" and "Peace," whose contrast would cause all nations to declare in favor of peace. A proposition likely to be considered seriously is that of Prince Della Rocca and Fernand Hau, to arrange an exhibition of religious art of all ages. Another likely plan is Herr Fildermann's project to construct a minature city, inhabited by people who are to live strictly according to hygienic rules.

Princess Charles of Denmark, formerly Princess Maud of Wales, grows tired of her Danish home. Though devoted to her husband the royal lady does not like his country, nor the manners and habits of the Danish. The cooking she finds conducive to dyspepsia, and the court, in her own words, "terribly dull and dreadfully religious." Its gets up very early in the morning and goes to bed correspondingly early at night, and, except on gala occasions, eats its dinner at 6 o'clock in the evening. Princess Maud, whose temperament is rather lively, has filed an objection to all this and has accordingly petitioned her father the Prince of Wales to arrange for her husband to become an English citizen and enter the British navy. The old King and Queen of Denmark are furious at the idea, and judging from paragraphs in the Copenhagen press and other straws from Denmark, Princess Maud is likely to become the most unpopular woman in the kingdom. Another complaint of the Princess is the scarcity of bathrooms in the royal palace, washing in Denmark being regarded more as a luxury than as a habit, a peculiarity not only of Denmark, but also of Norway and Sweden.

Addressing the British Medical Association recently on the subject of "The Surgeon of Old in War," Dr. Mitchell Banks, of Liverpool, made reference to Richard Wiseman, not without reason termed the father of English surgery, who was born in 1620 and died in 1676. He believed in stimulants. After describing the perilous state of a certain patient, he says: "The man swooned and complained that he could not live without wine. I complied with his desire. He drank again as he pleased; his sickness went off; his wound digested; and he cured. This I have often seen in some of our Dunkirkers at sea, who drank extraordinarily, and were full of drink in our sea fights. I could scarce ever cure them without allowing them wine, and thereby their spirits were kept up, and I had the liberty to bleed them as I thought fit." He also insisted strongly upon the immediate extraction of bullets, the neglect of which he describes as having been "the cause of the death of many a brave Souldier, and every Battel produces instances of it, to the discredit of our profession." This, as Professor Banks said, is "good surgery and straight talk."

SCIENTIFIC FICTION

The Career, Studies and Future Plans of H. G. Wells.

Mr. H. G. Wells, author of "The War of the Worlds," thinks that the best possible training for literary work is a scientific education. "Criticism," he says, "is the essence of science, and the critical habit of mind an essential to artistic performance." And Mr. Wells has dipped deep in the sciences. Although beginning life at fifteen as a draper's apprentice, he soon rose to higher things, and became junior master in a school and subsequently a scholar at the Royal College of Science. In 1890 he took his science degree at London University, with first class honors in zoology. Then followed a period of coaching, editing a text book of biology and a lot of other hack literary work without any particular success. Finally the Fortnightly Review accepted an article and in a short time he became a regular contributor to the Pall Mall Gazette, Saturday Review and Nature. Mr. Wells continued at journalism for some time, giving it up entirely two years ago for the writing of books.

Since then his success has been remarkable, for his works have received serious attention and general circulation. This autumn two new books are to come out. One is a collection of essays written two or three years ago, called "A Collection of Material, Mainly Autobiographical." It is devoted to certain of the greater issues of life. The other is termed "The Invisible Man," the main idea, already used by Mr. Gilbert in one of the Bab Ballads, being that a man is able to make his living tissues invisible. As this invisibility is not a magic quality but the result of certain applications of the science of optics, it does not extend to his clothing, or even to his food before it is assimilated. The story consists in the realistic treatment of this leading idea, the experimenter being represented as an extremely egotistical and irritable person.

Speaking of the scientific foundation of "The War of the Worlds" which has been a feature of The Cosmopolitan, Mr. Wells terms it a story of a possibility, and like "The Invisible Man," a piece of realism. "It may seem incredible," he says, "to a large number of people not familiar with the ascertained facts about Mars and its relation to the earth. But," he goes on, "to anyone acquainted with the possibilities modern science opens out it will, I am afraid, seem only very sober fiction indeed. If anything of the sort did happen, it would probably be a great deal worse than anything I have imagined in the story."

Mr. Wells has in the course of intermittent construction a novel of ordinary things and people. It is called "Love and Mr. Lewisham." Another work in prospect is a romance of the immediate future, a horoscopic affair somewhat on the lines of "Looking Backward."

As for the common things of earth, Mr. Wells strongly supports bicycling—he is a great believer in the educational value of the wheel. It will, he thinks, mark the greatest social revolution of the century, no less than "the aeration of the narrow-thinking, timid-living respectable class. Young people of that sort that never went abroad in other than genteel, tidy garments, and never conversed with others than those in their immediate circle of friends, have been suddenly whirled out and abroad beyond the range of what the neighbors think."

REFITTING SHIPS OF WAR

Busy Days at the Mare Island Navy Yard.

Never has there been greater activity at Mare Island. The Navy Yard is alive with sailors, soldiers, engineers, mechanics and laborers. They are repairing and rejuvenating battleships and cruisers, torpedo-boats and gunboats, improving, replacing, repainting, restoring—but the accompanying pictures afford a clearer idea of the movement than any cursory explanation of the processes. Not only is there activity in the Yard itself, but also quite an elaborate dredging operation is being conducted in the channel which separates the island from Vallejo. Two hydraulic and one old-model dredgers are at work deepening and filling, and great will be the convenience thereof when the proceeding is completed. As to the work—experience proves that warships are delicate instruments, and that high speed machinery is very liable to get out of gear. Though the materials of which they are constructed are of iron and steel, yet wear and tear compels a constant replacing of posts and pillars and shafts and other impedimenta. The "Monterey" is still on the dry dock, and has had the benefit of a tremendous overhauling. The "Philadelphia" is at the quay, being rehabilitated after a long spell of service. Next to her is the "Charleston," into whose interior huge steel beams are being lowered by the agency of an immense derrick. Near by is the "Monadnock," on whose decks a swarm of mariners are engaged sewing on huge squares of canvass. The "Pensacola," which is being converted into a training ship and her interior rearranged, is also an object of interest. Of course, this implies substantial remodelling.

There is much to interest the casual visitor to Mare Island. One can see all forms of mechanical activity, including the erection of a huge new workshop to be consecrated on completion to some new process of ship building. Another of the sights is the great anchor rack. There are hundreds of anchors of all sizes and designs awaiting utilization. What their combined gripping power is may be calculable by some erudite mathematician, but there is mooring for a fleet. Sentries are everywhere. There is a fine intermingling of marines and workmen; tram cars, drawn by locomotives, shuffle along; the pounding of hammers, the clang of machinery, the shrieking of steam burden the air with resonance. Indeed, the satisfaction is of the eyes alone, for hearing is out of the question.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

My life, this week, dearest Diary, rather resembles the career of a shuttlecock, for I have been tossed between teas and theatre parties, between theatre parties and teas, with only an occasional fall in the direction of a girls' luncheon or a dinner. To be honest, a fatal error in society, but quite safe within your sacred pages, Diary dear, I loathe girls' luncheons. They are more fatiguing than a long sermon in the summer time, more stupid than a novel without a hero. They might well be considered a homily on the modern society maid versus the early Christian. Then it was "how these Christians love one another," it now is "how these debutantes loathe one another." We do, too, some of us. Of course, several are like St. Paul—all things to all factions; others do not even disguise their sentiments and would like to return to the less civilized methods of tearing one another's eyes out.

The "tea" crowd versus the "gang"—I wonder who will come out ahead. Arthur says it is a toss up, but I think there are some of us too heavily handicapped. One feels this atmosphere of veiled antagonism at a luncheon in particular. One may be sitting next a member of the rival set with no man to stand between you and topics marked dangerous—no warning placard "beware of the dog." I assure you some glances are exchanged that were the blasting power of "She." not merely a matter of fiction would wither many a foe.

I have had a most exciting week of it. Starting with Saturday and its succession of teas, which I managed to get in, in spite of all bets to the contrary. You see, I had to receive at Ethel Keeney's and go to Mrs. John Boggs' and Mrs. Tay's "at homes". I started off by going to Mrs. Boggs' where I found nearly all the younger crowd and had a capital time. Then, on to Mrs. Tay's. It was a thoroughly pretty tea. The rooms were decorated in charming fashion, and Mrs. Tay looked exquisite in pale blue and white. She was assisted by Mrs. Bert Morrow, Mrs. Walker, Miss Deming and Miss Andrews of San Jose. Miss Andrews is an unusually handsome girl and was strikingly gowned. We had the Hungarian orchestra as an accompaniment to the conversation. Mrs. Keeney's tea was a tremendously smart affair. Everyone was there, not only the younger set, but the real old society people. Mrs. Keeney was very strikingly dressed, and Ethel and Leontine Blakeman stood beside her in the window where they received. Both girls wore white frocks and looked charming. I must say I prefer Ethel's hair parted to the pompadour she now affects—it seemed to harmonize with her features and her piquant style. This lends an air of severity I do not care for. The dinner was capital and the table delightfully fixed up. The cloth was almost hidden by masses of those dear little Cecile Bruner roses, intermingled with ferns and bows of pink satin ribbon—pink candleabra with dainty pink shades lighted up the room. The girls looked bonny in their white frocks, with Julia Crocker and Emma Butler lending a bit of color to the scene. I went in with my dear Ben Holladay so, of course, I was radiantly happy. We had multitudinous men young, old, handsome and otherwise. I think Mr. Williams, Mr. Wiltsee's chum, awfully good-looking. He is especially gifted of the gods, being rich, handsome and fascinating. On Monday was a perfect avalanche of theatre parties, which has continued throughout the week. I think I have been to the Baldwin three times and to the California once. Mr. Wiltsee took a big crowd of us on Monday and we had a capital time, with supper afterwards in his rooms. His guests were Genevieve Goad, the de Ruyters and Gus Spreckels, with a sprinkling of debutantes. On the same evening Miss Foreman and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels had small parties. On Tuesday the Carolans asked twenty-four of us—Mrs. Schmidell chaperoned the party. Then Mr. Greenaway invited the Hoffmans, the Moores, Alice Hager, Therese Morgan, the Thomas girls and the Smiths to another Baldwin party. I think when Walter Martin's invitation arrived I should have cried Enough! but luckily his was an opera party at the California. Prior to it he gave us one of his really swell spreads at the 'Varsity Club. The same crowd was again invited and we had a glorious time.

Then there were two debutantes' luncheons. One to Marie Wells on Tuesday by Gwinette Henley. Such a pretty luncheon—everything in violets. A square in the center of the table with bunches scattered broadcast and ribbons dexterously interwoven. Later a gypsy fortune-teller came in and amused us by predicting all sorts of wonderful careers. We are to have sweethearts galore and a satiety of husbands. I am to be married three times—perhaps four. Whether death or the divorce court is to release me she did not divulge. I hope the latter, as I perfectly abominate black, it is so unbecoming to my particular style. I really think that Addie Murphy's luncheon was the event par excellence of the season. The table was charming—you know how smart a Palace Hotel luncheon can be—and the menu phew! A veritable feast for goddesses. I don't eat much as a rule, but there were so many dainties that I positively gorged. Miss Stranahan, who is visiting Mrs. Murphy, was the guest of honor. She is on the Celtic order, with big blue eyes, a creamy skin and black hair and has very fascinating manners.

Then on Wednesday, Miss Colburn gave a girls' tea which we all enjoyed. I am looking forward to the first Friday Fortnightly, which is to be held on November 5th. Lillie Follis is to lead with Allan Wright. On Saturday, Leontine Blakeman is to give her tea with a big debutantes' dinner later. And on Sunday, Ethel Bent gives an "at home" at the Presidio. All the debutantes are to receive and there are to be seventy-five men, chiefly army fellows. You know Ethel has been laid up recently with a bad attack of grippe, but I am happy to say she is again convalescent. The cards for the Thomas ball are out and great are our expectations. We girls intend getting gowns that are to be positively ravishing. That is all on the tapis now, but by next week there will be another list. Till then, au revoir.

Your own MISS CRICKET.

* *

A loan exhibition and sale of needlework,

MISS ETHEL KEENEY
Who made her debut last Saturday

which ought to prove interesting, is to be held in the Maple Room of the Palace Hotel, on December 2d, 3d and 4th. Exhibitors are assured that the work will be taken care of, show cases being provided for the perishable articles. Mrs. Jos. Donohoe, Mrs. Beverly Macmonagle, Mrs. Hall M'Allister, Mrs. Wm. Taylor, Mrs. Austin Tubbs and Mrs. Robert J. Woods are among the patronesses. The exhibition is in aid of the Associated Charities.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Sachs, of the Palace Hotel, gave a big theatre party at the Baldwin on Monday evening. Afterwards supper was served at the Concordia Club.

Mrs. Steinhart and Miss Hilda Steinhart gave a large "at home" on Sunday afternoon. Mrs. Steinhart was assisted in receiving by Miss Cohen, Miss Bachmann, Miss Sachs and Miss Hilda Hecht. The hours were from four to seven. Later a dinner was given to those who assisted the hostess.

The engagement is announced of Lieutenant Kellogg, U. S. N., and Miss Ethel Pomroy, daughter of E. B. Pomroy of Oakland. Miss Pomroy is a blonde of rather striking looking appearance. She is a niece of Mr. Blake, of the firm of Blake, Moffitt & Towne, and inherits a neat little fortune from her mother.

Mrs. Elizabeth Strong Worthington gave a successful "at home" last Friday evening. Mrs. Worthington was assisted in receiving by Miss Marion Cole, Miss Dorothy Jaep and Miss Helen Higby. The affair, which was largely attended, was in the nature of a house-warming. During the evening music was given by Mr. Walter Campbell and Mr. Lucy.

The Sketch Club held its Autumnal exhibition in its new rooms, 713 Sutter street, on Wednesday evening. The rooms are large and better adapted for hanging pictures than the former quarters on Montgomery street. The club has made great strides in the past six months, the members' work being better, stronger and more professional. The canvasses of Mrs. L. Macdonald Sleeth are the best on exhibition. The portrait of Miss Henry is a capital piece of work, the flesh tints being excellent. The "woman in gray" is also worthy of the highest commendation. A landscape by Anna Frances Briggs, and a Chinese scene by Mrs. Whelan are also very well done. Miss Helen Hyde's canvas, "Divided Duties," is noteworthy for the light effects.

A big benefit concert, in which Scheel's Orchestra is to be a feature, will take place on Saturday afternoon, November 14th at Metropolitan Hall. The affair is in aid of the building fund of the Hahnemann Hospital, to be erected on the corner of Fourteenth and Lake streets.

* *

This has been a rather festive week in Oakland, the glamor cast by the Miller-Prather nuptials seems to have been reflected by a succession of events of major or minor significance. Of primary importance is the wedding of Mr. Miller and Miss Prather, and of the others the teas of Mrs. Clay and Mrs. Havens come next.

Mrs. Clay's was given in Fruitvale on Saturday of last week, and was the largest reception of the season, three hundred guests having been invited. The house was decorated in chrysanthemums and ferns. Mrs. Clay was assisted in receiving by the Misses Margaret and Sadie Sinclair and Miss Alice Stephenson. Mrs. Havens' "at home" was in honor of her daughter, Miss Marietta Havens, and was a very jolly affair. Few married people were invited, but all the Saturday Fortnightly young people turned out in full force. As many men as maids appeared, which augurs well for the popularity of the young hostess.

A charity event of more than the usual degree of interest was given by Mrs. Gorrill for the benefit of the Manse. To the uninitiated the "Manse" appears rather enigmatical, but it is a society somewhat on the order of the college settlement, with the view of teaching the children of working people useful work. Miss Fanny Smith assisted Mrs. Gorrill in receiving. During the afternoon musical selections were given by Mrs. Sylvia Chapman Martin, Mrs. Carrie Brown-Dexter and Mrs. William Piutti.

A pleasant affair was the married ladies' luncheon given on Saturday by Mrs. Hill, of Highland Park, at the Haywards Club House. Mrs. Hill is a sister of Mrs. Rosborough. The decorations were La France roses. Mrs. Hill, Mrs. J. C. Hays, Mrs. Creed, Mrs. Jerome, Mrs. Whitney and others were among the guests.

One of the jolliest parties of the season was that given to the members of the 21 Club by Misses Laura and Mona Crellin on Thursday evening. During the earlier part of the evening seven-handed euchre was played, later the young people danced until the wee sma' hours.

Wednesday last was the occasion of a young people's dinner at the Purcell's home on Webster street. The Misses Strong, Kittredge, Jessie Kimble and the Hubbards were among those bidden to the feast. Later cards were played—Miss Georgie Strong and Mr. Will English carried off the prizes.

The second meeting of the Saturday Fortnightly was held at Reed's Hall on the evening of the 30th. It was a Hallowe'en party, the figures carrying out to some extent the old fashioned customs of that occasion. The german was led by Miss Bessie Palmer and Mr. Otto Wedemeyer. Among the prettiest of the girls I noted Miss Carrie Quinan, Miss Genevieve Fore and Miss Marietta Havens.

Quite a little dissatisfaction has arisen over the Berkeley Cotillions. A secret committee on invitations was appointed by the lady patronesses and the young people who made out the list did not consult the ladies as to who should receive invitations and who should not. The consequence is war and rumors of war. The especial friends of the ladies have been neglected and a number of people of no especial degree of importance invited. Again it is a question of popularity versus eligibility. I believe there is considerable indignation among the patronesses, who according to all the ethics of social affairs should have at least been consulted.

In Alameda the season has just begun. The Cotillion Club promises to be an immense success this winter and very smart. The last dance was noteworthy for the number of pretty girls present. The ones I particularly noticed were Miss Lally, in pale pink. She is a tall blonde, with creamy skin and blue eyes. Another pretty girl, in a rather different style, is Miss Ruth Metcalf, who was simply gowned in white mull. Miss Florence Mason made an effective picture in yellow, and Miss Charlotte O'Keefe looked bright and piquant in white chiffon veiling pink silk.

Then on Saturday evening, Mr. and Mrs. Brutton gave a house-warming and Hallowe'en party in their new house, which is as yet unfinished. It was an immensely jolly affair. All the old-fashioned games were played—the guests flew up and downstairs on broomsticks, ducked for apples, melted lead and otherwise tempted fate. Then they had all the antique country dances. The refreshments were served in the kitchen, the decorated sink forming a stand for the punch bowl. The next event of social significance is the theatrical show, which is to be held on December 2d, in aid of the Episcopal Church. "A Scrap of Paper" is to be given. Those taking part are Miss Della Cruger, Miss Marie Victor, Miss Susie Le Count, Miss Charlotte O'Keefe, Messrs. Fine, George Whitney, Donne de Teller and Fred Henkencius.

Fine Display of Art Goods.

S. & G. Gump, 113 Geary street, have just begun to show their European importations for this season, and invite their patrons and the public to view the many fine and interesting noveltses received and unpacked so far.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

THE THEATRES

Brief Comment on New Shows, with Anticipations.

Were the success of "Lost, Strayed or Stolen" to depend upon the first act we should have still another company designating San Francisco "a jay town." One can readily believe it clever in the original French, but translated it has failed to prove its raison d'etre. The jokes are broad without being humorous, the songs ditto. The last three acts rather redeem it, and the girls are pretty and graceful enough to give life to a worse show. They dance well and their dress adds much to the interest of the situation, or, should I say, their garters? Their dresses were long but they manipulated them to advantage, showing very neatly turned limbs. Miss Bouton is a fascinating little actress, and rather resembles Gladys Wallis, but has a feminine softness that the latter lacks. She made a tempting nurse-maid and her dancing was really charming. I did not care for Miss Anna O'Keefe; she was too tempestuous in her movements and her voice was not at all pleasing. Nor she did not fit one's idea of a Cafe Chantant singer. The men were fairly good on the whole, Mr. Dickson particularly so. P. W.

* *

The air at the Orpheum this week is heavy with color and cake, or rather with cakewalk. The world's champions in the classic art—the Farrells (Billie and Willie)—mince through their different figures, principally triangles, with confidence and precision, much to the delight and approval of the audience. Miss Farrell, presumably Willie, is a rather attractive young woman with bright eyes and good features, and tall as a daughter of the gods. She dresses well and is clever, but spoils her work at times by over-acting. Billie, the gemman of the team, plays well on the guitar and sings even better. Altogether the act is pleasing and refreshingly free from vulgarity. The little red band is in its last week, playing as well and as successfully as at the first. It will leave behind memories of the Hapsburgs, of Vienna, and the gallant little drum major pleasing to think over.

* *

After a few weeks of retirement melodrama returns triumphantly to Morosco's in the sensational play, "777." The piece is of the real old-fashioned sort. The plot centres about a robbery and a murder, for which the hero is naturally accused. He is estranged from the heroine, put in prison but escapes and after four acts of increasing entanglement finally succeeds in clearing his name, discomfits the villian and begins life with prosperity and the heroine by his side.

* *

"The Highest Bidder" is hardly a play of the period. It has some pretty scenes and is genreally interesting, but it lacks the life, the requisite energy to keep it in popular favor. But then it is not a play of the times, it hasn't been for several years, and a judgment upon its performance in these days should be given altogether to the players. The Alcazar people seem to have an easy time with their innocent work—all but Chas. Bates, as Sir Evelyn, who requires more energy to be the bad man thau do the others to assume virtue. Wright Huntington plays Jack Hammerton, giving rather an agreeable performance. Wallace Shaw gets all the humor possible out of Bonham Cheviot and is a good foil to Frederic Strong as Sir Muffin. Miss Gertrude Foster plays Rose Thornhill in her oddly gentle way and Mrs. Bates as usual is good as Mrs. Lacy.

H. S. K.

DRAMATIC NOTES

There is a second week of the Herrmans at the Columbia. The next attraction will be "In Old Kentucky," which is now in its fifth year and apparently as popular as ever.

"The Geisha" continues with undiminished popularity at the Tivoli, with excellent pros-

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

They meet

An acquaintance is formed

Become friendly

A trifling service

Distinct progress

The first kiss

A CAKEWALK AS PERFORMED AT THE ORPHEUM BY THE FARRELLS
Photos by Marceau

CAKEWALKING

The Farrells Discourse on a Diversion Which Has Become a Profession.

The Farrells—Billie and Willie—cakewalk at the Orpheum and [illegible] tell you it's "the real thing." In times past [illegible] to the cakewalks at the Orpheum stage, and while they [illegible] in their way, their efforts, at the best, were only imitations, and there is always something lacking in an imitation. A white man's idea of doing a cakewalk is like an Irishman talking German—funny enough, but it isn't "Dutch."

The other evening Billie Farrell (that's the man—"Willie" was [illegible]) put the story of [illegible] thereof. He said:

"As near as I can [illegible] the cakewalking business had its origin among the French [illegible] ago."

"Say [illegible] (they [illegible]" interjected Willie.

"Yer right, gal, but we're strictly in it now [illegible] there is no little doubt but that the original cakewalk was an offshoot of some of the old French country dances. From New Orleans it spread all over the South. The plantation masters seemed to have encouraged it, probably for the fun of the thing. Later there came another reason for cakewalks, which tended to make them popular: During slave days the plantation negroes were not wedded by license, as Willie and I were—but that's another story—and it was seldom that a parson was called in.

"At a cakewalk a man might legitimately show his preference for a woman, and thus publicly claim her for his wife. So this festival became, in a sense, a wooing, an acceptance or rejection, and a ceremony. Sometimes, when two negroes took a notion to walk with the same 'piece of calico,' there was a butting match right then and there, for a negro in those days never thought of using his fists, neither did he carry a razor, and the solar plexus blow had not been discovered.

"The floor was rough and sandy. Smoky pine torches flared against the cabin walls. The slaves—dozens of them—were dressed in all the simple finery they could command. The cake was baked 'up at the big house.' There was more cake to it than those one gets nowadays. The cake we won at Battery D, Chicago, was made mostly of bricks and stucco work."

"Yes, and some fly coon swiped all the real cake," remarked Willie, and her eyes snapped fire that betokened ill to that "fly coon," were he within reach.

"But we won the honors and then we did lay that crowd out," replied Billie. "But to go on with my story. The music at the plantation was furnished by a battered fiddle and a home-made banjo, composed of sheepskin stretched over a cheese-hoop. The melodies were 'Hop Light Ladies,' 'Old Zip Coon,' 'Billy in the Low Lands,' 'Cotton-Eye Joe,' 'Run, Nigger, Run' and others. The contest ants were terribly in earnest and they 'walked hard.' Half the time the man was not certain whether or not he would win the dusky maid—she with the bandana bound about her head whom he was wooing with perspiration and fancy step. These were scenes of rude mirth and good genuine homespun love-making, gone never to return.

"Cakewalking has improved, as do most things that are constantly practiced. It has lost its old-time significance in the South. Negroes now get married, when they marry at all, in white folks' fashion. It has become, however, a pantomime dance. As now practiced the walk is divided into three kinds: the straight walk, the comic walk and the fancy walk. The fancy walk is the pantomimic variety and we make it our specialty. As we do the cakewalk it portrays, first the meeting between the man and a maiden, then acquaintance, then an approach to familiarity, then courtship, then a kiss and then an acceptance which in the old times constituted marriage."

Billie Farrell is a native of Cincinnatti, while his wife is a French quadroon and was born in Trinidad, West Indies. Her blood shows itself in the alluring postures she assumes, possibly unconsciously. She joins the African warmth to the French coquetry with something of the savage freedom of the West Indian dark life and the composite is astounding and fascinating. There is a dash and vim combined with a genteel abandon in her work that is simply charming. The [illegible] as portrayed by the Farrells, is [illegible] not in the least [illegible]. If compared with the atrocity of the [illegible] it is simply holy.

AYAFLO' MOORE.

pects of running for some weeks to come. "Rip Tan Winkle" follows, with Edwin Stevens as Rip, his original creation.

Sunday night performances of "Lost, Strayed or Stolen" will be given at the Baldwin. The final week of the engagement commences Monday evening. The next attraction will be "In Gay New York," with Eddie Foy at the head of the company.

A revival of "The Lost Paradise" will be given next week at Morosco's. Special scenery has been prepared, and elaborate mechanical effects. The cast, which includes W. H. Pascoe and the regular company, will be augmented for the occasion.

Rosenthal, the violinist, who has lately returned from the Brussells Conservatory, gives a concert at the San Rafael Opera House, San Rafael, next Thursday evening, November 11. Mr. Rosenthal will be assisted by the Colonial Quartette of this city.

The Henschels will make their last appearance in this city to-morrow (Sunday) evening, at the California. The programme will consist of popular numbers, and as the prices have been specially reduced the attendance is likely to be unusually large.

For next week the Alcazar announce a reproduction of "The Ugly Duckling." The play, which was originally written for Mrs. Leslie Carter, contains a strong plot and is full of much human interest. Miss Polly Tupper, a bright and attractive Fresno girl, will make her debut in "The Ugly Duckling."

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Since the latter part of August last the San Francisco public have been privileged to enjoy nightly at the Orpheum a performance by the Knaben-Kapelle, or Hungarian Boys Military Band. Nothing of the kind has ever before been seen on this continent. The band consists of forty pieces, and the oldest of its members does not exceed sixteen years of age, some of the boys being not more than eight. One of the smallest and choicest is the little drummer who is depicted here in the uniform worn by all the little soldier musicians. Dressed in bright scarlet tunics and trousers neatly trimmed with gold braid, and turned out in the smartest military style, from the silver spurs on the heels of their tasseled brown hessians to the white pompons of their headgear, which is a mixture of French shako and British busby, the little fellows make a glowing centre-piece on the stage, and their execution is fully on a par with their appearance. The band is now about to depart hence to Los Angeles, Portland, Tacoma, Seattle and Victoria, B. C. proceeding thence over the northeastern circuit to Chicago and New York. Mr. Gustav Walter brought them from Budapest, and is under contract to return the youngsters safe and sound on the completion of their tour in the United States.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

At the California this evening the Italian company will produce, for the first time in this city, Puccini's "La Boheme." On Monday evening Verdi's "Otello"; on Tuesday evening and at the Saturday matinee "Lucia" is to be sung. Wednesday "Rigoletto," Friday "La Favorita" and Saturday evening "The Masked Ball." A Sunday evening concert by the quartette and orchestra will likely be given before the close of the season.

The second festival of the California Music Festival Association commences in Metropolitan Temple, next Tuesday evening, with the oratorio "Elijah." Soloists, Mme. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, Miss Anna Miller Wood, Mr. Rhys Thomas and Mr. S. Homer Henley. The second concert will take place Wednesday afternoon, and the third and last on Wednesday evening, at both of which selected programmes will be given.

Olga Regina, Countess Von Hatzfeldt, incidentally a chanteuse, is announced as the premier attraction for next week at the Orpheum. The noble little lady has some catchy songs, and, what is more, is said to be able to sing them. Another European sensation to come next week is Mlle. Leopoldine, one of the "seven aerial wonders." The Misses Cooke and Clinton will play on the xylophone with rifle shots, and A. L. Steele is to perform on two cornets at once. A. O. Duncan, ventriloquist, is another new-comer, and also W. J. Alexander, "the Paganini of the bells."

Dr. Hanslick, of Vienna, tells of having once asked Schumann how he got on with Wagner. "Well," he replied, "Wagner is a great man, but I can't get on with him at all. He talks at such a rate, I can't get a word in edgeways." Shortly after this, Hanslick met Wagner, and put a similar question to him about Schumann. "Ah," said Wagner, "I can't get on with him at all. He just looks at me with a vacant stare and never says a word at all."

The Life of the Orange.

The famous oranges of California are invaluable for their medicinal qualities. By blending these with the phosphates of iron and manganese, Mr. F. A. Haber, Manager of the Emporium Wine and Liquor Department has produced a delightful Orange Tonic Cordial, known as "The Life of the Orange." This delicious compound is prepared according to an old recipe obtained many years ago by an American naval officer from the monks of an Italian convent, with the addition of the most effective tonics and restoratives known to modern science. The fruit, the flowers, and the leaves of the orange-tree all yield something towards the preparation of the cordial, which is pronounced by a competent analyst to be absolutely pure and possessed of the medicinal virtues claimed for it. It is highly recommended by leading physicians as the most effective and pleasant tonic on the market.

A Delicious After-Dinner Cordial

A MOST WONDERFUL TONIC

A NERVE AND BLOOD REGENERATOR

No Drugs —— Not an Excitant

Recommended by leading physicians as the most effective and pleasant tonic on the market for nervous and stomach troubles.

F. A. HABER

Manager the Emporium Wine and Liquor Dept.

NOVEMBER MAGAZINES

Best Articles in the Current Monthlies —Hawthorne in the Taj Mahal.

The best article in the November magazines Suppose you were condemned to read only a single article in the set—which would it be? I asked myself this question and in trying to answer it have sedulously gone through the contents of each monthly. It is hard to decide. Here is a man, for instance, who assisted at Andree's baloon ascent and took photographs which the Century has—Jonas Stadling is his name—that is an interesting contribution, written in a very unornamental but graphic way. You can readily see Andree jumping into the basket, calling to Strindberg and Fraenkel, his companions, to get into the basket. They wait for a lull in the wind, then the voice of the explorer is heard calling to the sailors who held the ropes: "Cut! one, two, three!" "A simultaneous snap and the gigantic balloon rose majestically out of its prison and started before the strong wind on its way to the unknown regions of Ultima Thule—a voyage more daring than any since old Pytheas, more than 2200 years ago, sailed out of the port of Marseilles for the North."

Yes, that is a most readable contribution, but how about Richard Harding Davis, on the Grecian war in Harper's? With the exception of Stevens of the London Mail, Davis is the best correspondent alive. His matter is most entertaining, most intimate, and his point of view, sufficiently general to give you a survey, and yet critical of the moot points. One really wants to know if Prince Constantine actually behaved in the manner the papers stated at the time—according to Davis, he was worse. The Prince escaped from Larissa by special train, and his chief of staff—an Athenian cotillion leader—turned a number of Greek ladies out of a railroad carriage to make room for H.R.H.'s lingerie and dressing cases. One of the Greek papers describing the affair said: "We are happy to state that on the arrival of the train, it was found that not one handkerchief belonging to the Prince was lost—so the honor of Greece is saved." The Greek soldier, according to Davis, has no sense of discipline, and though he may be brave enough, is hampered by his individuality. "My courier," says the writer, "who was a hotel runner, used to shake hands with the Minister of War and the Minister of the Interior, and they called him by his first name and seemed glad to meet him." Indeed, the country was like a huge debating society. Every private had his own idea of how the war should be conducted, and had a map of the country in his canvass bag. It became apparent, however, that the Turkish army, as a fighting machine, knows its business, and does possess some of those qualities of reserve, endurance and courage which are the honorable male qualities. Turning from this scathing survey to look again to the Century, it is interesting to gather a new impression of the Sultan of Turkey. According to ex-Minister Terrell, he is the most intellectul potentate in Europe; a gentle, intelligent, mild-mannered person, quite incapable of the cruelties of which he is accused. In the course of the conversation the Sultan explained—in his gentle way, I suppose—that Mussulmen regard as sacred, the Koran, the books of Confucius, the Talmud of the Jews and the Bible of the Christians. "How," he asks "could a Mussulman murder Armenians merely on account of their religion, when the Koran prohibits cruelty?" How, indeed?

However, let us turn to McClure's, which has several contributions entitled to consideration —notably a liberal extract from Mark Twain's diary, quite the most satisfying sample of the new book I have yet encountered. It tells the story of Mark's voyage from Calcutta to South Africa, and is full of crisp, graphic description and quaint, humorous touches. I have read dozens of articles about Mauritius, but Mark gives you the essence of the place in a page or so. Here is a comment on the subject of ship's beds:

"Many ships have good beds, but no ship has very good ones. In the matter of beds all ships have been badly edited, ignorantly edited from the beginning. The selection of the beds is given to some hearty, strong-backed, self-made man, when it ought to be given to a frail woman, accustomed from girlhood to backaches and insomnia."

One cannot but laugh over the story of Barnum and Jamrach negotiating for elephants, out of which arose the great showman's purchase of Shakespeare's house at Stratford-on-Avon—one of the greatest advertising achievement of his life. Mark Twain give two versions of the episode in his inimitable style, but you are entitled to select that which suits yourself. Three other articles of importance are contained within the Thanksgiving covers of McClure's—the first installment of Dana's reminicences of the war. Brunetiere's impressions of America and Edison's revolution in iron mining. The death of the editor of the Sun makes his impressions of greater interest; and even here, where he is merely setting forth preliminaries, he is delightfully frank. He tells plainly of the little indiscretion which gave him a set back with Stanton. It seems the Secretary of War invited the editor to take the office of Assistant Secretary, and, on accepting, Dana told a newspaper friend what had befallen him. The fact was telegraphed to New York, appeared in the papers, and Stanton was so angry that he withdrew the appointment, which seems rather unjust. Brunetiere was most impressed in America by the cosmopolitanism of society, and the facility with which the races had blended. "Americans," he says, "are younger than we are, and less complicated; the personality of a true American is interior. He is at home everywhere because he is everywhere himself." He is not gossipy or keen as Bourget was, but is general and important and educational as befits the editor of the Revue de Deux Mondes. Everyone should read Theodore Waters' description of Edison's revolution in iron mining, which tells how the great inventor solved the problem of extracting the iron ore from the rocks of New Jersey, the result of which will be to renew the steel industry in that region. What he has accomplished and the manner of it is of real interest.

To revert back to Harper's, there is interesting material and good authority in the essay on New Japan by the Japanese Minister; Carl Schurz reviews the career of Daniel Webster in a manner to make one realize both his extraordinary talents and his unfortunate weaknesses. The Atlantic gives the place of honor to Hamilton Wright Mabie's review of the Tennyson biography—a somewhat academic performance. Mr. Godkin exploits the peculiarities of American municipal government in that thoroughly critical manner of which he possesses the secret; and there is also a clever review of the Bacon-Shakespeare controversies by John Fiske. Though a readable Atlantic the November number hardly compares with its predecessor.

The Cosmopolitan is rather falling behind though it still has Wells' fine story. The final instalment of Hawthorne's Indian series is devoted to the beauties of India which he describes most eloquently. There is a superb prose picture of the Taj Mahal, the jewel of the world. It seems a pity the editor of this magazine should have done such an injustice to Mr. Hawthorne's work in his prefactory comment, for there has been nothing to justify the assertion that the articles would expose the misrule of England. The contrary has been proved. The series represent this clever and very unequal writer at his best. I extract this from the Taj:

"The old priest who acts as guide and guardian, after he has explained what little needs interpretation, lifts up his quavering voice and sends it forth in a long, undulating cry. It is not in itself a musical note by any means; but no sooner has it left his lips than it becomes transfigured into such music as cannot elsewhere be heard on earth. It mounts into the dome, wandering and returning, becoming every instant purified into more exquisite and fine-drawn perfections of enchanted harmony; and still lives and vibrates in a magical remoteness, the more ravishing the more remote; and sighs itself into silence that yet seems spiritually vocal, and is gone at last — or is it gone? If you have known what it is to love and to lose, you cannot listen to this divine vanishing without a swelling of the throat. If such be the voice of sorrow, surely she must sing in heaven. Wisely and lovely did the old builder build; for he has made the groans of bereaved mortality take wings beneath his dome, and become divinely reconciled with the soul of all beauty."

And now as to fiction — the Atlantic has a capital story by Madelene Yale Wynne, and also the second installment of "Caleb West," which is a first rate tale with a fine southern type in it. "Good Americans," Mrs. Burton Harrison's new serial in the Century, introduces some interesting people and suggests a promising situation. "Gallop's," two sketches by a new man, David Gray, are decidedly clever and humorous. "A Pair of Patient Lovers," by Howells, in Harper's re-introduces Mr. and Mrs. March of Their Wedding Journey. It is thoroughly Howellsesque—full of delicate observation, intimate touches, unobtrusively and admirably clever. "Spanish John," too, has movement and vigor, which is more than may be said for "Who Made the Match," which is poor stuff. The short stories in McClure's are out of place and should have appeared in Munsey's. Save for the Kipling stories and the William Allen White contributions, the fiction in this magazine is generally inferior. I am quite sure S. C. McClure, who is one of the most progressive editors of the day, does not himself attend to this department. The yarns read as though they were selected by the president of a feminine press club for publication in the Young Ladies' Journal. I may suggest to Mr. McClure, that tales by Mr. Jno. R. Spears, Cutliffe Hayne, Conan Doyle, W. W. Jacobs, Frank Norris, Quiller-Couch and Owen Wister, have the strong masculine flavor his publication requires.

C.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

Of Course

You want some of that $2000. And of course you want good tea—Schilling's Best—your money back if you don't like it, at your grocer's.

Sunny Days and Balmy Nights.

This is Byron Hot Springs' best season, when the days are sunny and warm, free from fogs and winds, and the nights are like the glorious Autumn nights of the South. Invalids using the mineral springs find a quick recovery and an easy convalescence in this beautiful climate. The popular mineral water bathing tank grows in favor steadily. Only three hours ride from San Francisco—only three dollars round trip.

Artistic competence, combined with sound business principles, account for the great popularity of Huber's Orchestra. Address 20 O'Farrell street. Telephone care Benj. Curtaz, Main 1247.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

"HUGH WYNNE"

A Review of Dr. Weir Mitchell's New Novel.

The appearance of any such piece of fiction as this two-volume story by S. Wier Mitchell is sure to excite controversy. Especially is this true when the book is heralded as "the great American novel." Historical fiction (is not the very conjunction of terms suggestive of contradiction?) is assumed to be the proper type of "the novel." Instantly objectors arise, among historians and among novelists. The historian protests that the truth of history must be perverted to meet the exigencies of the story. The novelist declares that his noble art must be distorted by pedantic efforts to be true to the facts of the time. What may be given as a judgment between these hostile critics? Is not the so-called "historical novel" merely a work of fiction introducing characters, events, places, which have had a real existence? And if the artist subordinates the sober narration of facts to the necessities of his work, shall we therefore condemn him and his creation? The artist can never be a mere literalist. His is the prerogative to illumine all things by the imagination. Then let the historian frankly recognize that all he can ask of the historical novelist is truth to the spirit of men and measures. The element of historical interpretation in a novel can not be measured by scientific tests—it is not history. On the other hand the litterateur must put out of mind the thought that the characters of a story were historical, merely asking that the symmetry of a work of art be not marred by slavish fidelity to facts. From the standpoint of literature, a piece of fiction is neither better nor worse because people bearing well-known names walk across its pages.

"Hugh Wynne" is the story of a Quaker lad born in the great city Governor William Penn founded. As the son of a wealthy Quaker merchant, he has all the advantages to be found in the semi-urban, semi-rural society of colonial Philadelphia. His life is made quite different from that of most Quaker youths by the fact that his aunt is anything but a meek maiden. This Mistress Gainor Wynne, with her masculine strength in business, her worldly ways in fashion, teaches her nephew to eschew the Friends' paths of peace. He learns to fence, to ride, to lay stakes at cards, finally to become a dissipated young blood. His father is disgraced by his unnatural son's drinking and fighting. There is a fine touch in the austerity of the old Quaker when he puts his boy at work as apprentice to a blacksmith, "that as the great and good proprietary decreed, thou shouldst acquire some mechanic trade." So, too, there is a revelation of the force of unrelenting integrity when the father becomes a party to a public reproof of his son in the Quaker meeting. Hugh has the manhood to realize the dangers of the life he has been leading. He forsakes his evil ways, although he can have no sympathy with the sectarian views and the conventional morality of the orthodox Friends

The hero's life is made to cover that interesting epoch of American history, the period from 1750 on through the Revolution. He witnesses the gradual rise of the strife over the constitutional rights of the colonists involved in the execution of acts of trade, the stamp act, and the other pitiful blunders of a blind ministry. He goes through the struggle of a divided allegiance to Quaker principles of peace and to his love of the soldier's life. He alienates himself from the sympathy of his stern father, and chooses to become an active participant in the war. Intrepidity soon wins for him an honorable place in the American army. General Washington, Colonel Alexander Hamilton, Lafayette, and many others of the leaders of the Americans are made to appear in the action of the story. The campaigns around Philadelphia, the sufferings of the winter at Valley Forge, the brilliant but shameful career of Benedict Arnold, the fate of Andre, the spy, the siege of Yorktown—these events are pictured with life and color. The heart-rending differences of a time of civil dissension are illustrated with a faithful pen. Washington is made to appear as one of our familiars, a great man with strong passions under rigorous control. The threads of a love story run through the fabric, but not prominently enough to constitute the chief feature of the tale.

And what is the net result of the perusal of this "American novel"? The reader feels that he has been privileged to peruse a narrative reflecting the feelings common to American provincials who were gradually led to assume the role of rebels. In this the author has been true to the spirit of history. But what about the literary value of such a narrative? One instantly thinks of comparing this book with Conan Doyle's "Micah Clarke," or with the well-known works of Cooper. Does "Hugh Wynne" give promise of ranking higher than these older rivals? He is indeed a bold prophet who would answer affirmatively. One may successfully portray the features of a historical crisis and make his fiction sought after by his day and generation. But not in such a guise is the American novel to appear. It will have to be of such supreme artistic value in its treatment of the human passions that all thought of commendation for the setting, the stage effects, will be lost in ungrudging admiration of its simple dignity, its insight into human character, its grasp of the power of personality imperfectly realizing itself in ideals of beauty and of moral strength.

C. A. DUNIWAY.

SONNETS OF DE HEREDIA.

The task of the translator of verse is herculean. His labor is a labor of love, and the commendation he receives is, at best, only a reflected tribute. It requires as much genius to rehabilitate as it does to create. The man who would interpret the numbers from another tongue, must not only know, but must feel; he must make manifest not only the thought, but the spirit and life of the thought. To do this successfully, he must be possessed with the fervor which inspires the creation, and keeping within the prescribed meets and bounds, he must have the felicity of expression to voice it in consonant rhythm and rhyme. An exact version will often give us a commonplace result; and thus the indefinable flavor is lost. The true artist produces corresponding effects by a happy use of equivalents.

That the Sonnets of Jose-Maria de Heredia (William Doxey, publisher), are all that Mr. Gosse and others have claimed for them, will scarcely be questioned. One should be conversant with the original, to know if the translator, Dr. E. W. Taylor, has given to them a befitting English garb. The work bears evidence in every line of its literal and faithful rendition; and while there are occasional faults in accent, and flaws in rhyme, these may, perhaps, be attributed to the translator's desire to be exact. That he is entitled to and should receive a meed of praise for undertaking and accomplishing such a work there is no doubt. Considered as a piece of book-making it would be difficult to excel this volume. The typography is admirable and the printing house of E. D. Taylor is to be congratulated on such a beautiful volume.

For latest styles in fall heckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

Irish Song.

On Innisfallen's fairy isle,
Amid the blooming bushes,
We leant upon the lovers' stile,
And listened to the thrushes:
When first I sighed to see her smile,
And smiled to see her blushes.

Her hair was bright as beaten gold,
And soft as spider's spinning,
Her cheek outbloomed the apple old
That set our parents sinning,
And in her eyes you might behold
My joys and griefs beginning.

In Innisfallen's fairy grove
I hushed my happy wooing,
To listen to the brooding dove
Amid the branches cooing.
But oh! how short those hours of love,
How long their bitter rueing!

Poor cushat! thy complaining breast
With woe like mine is heaving,
With thee I mourn a fruitless quest
For ah! with art deceiving
The cuckoo-bird has robbed my nest,
And left me wildly grieving.

"Songs of Killarney" in the Spectator

Do You Want Gold?

Everyone desiring to keep informed on Yukon, the Klondyke and Alaskan gold fields. Send 10 cents for large Compendium of vast information and big color map to Hamilton Publishing Company, Hamilton, Indiana.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

The Macmillan Company's NEW BOOKS

The Story of Gladstone's Life

By JUSTIN McCARTHY, M.P.

Author of "A History of Our Own Times," "The Four Georges," etc.

Finely Illustrated. Cloth, 8vo. $5.00

The Story of Mr. Gladstone's Life is of necessity, because of the prominent positions which he has held during so many years, to some degree

A History of England's Policy

during the past few decades. Naturally, the book contains many references to other men prominent in public affairs, and contains, besides his own,

Portraits of Many Public Men.

The Letters of Elizabeth Barrett Browning

Two Volumes, Crown 8vo. $4

These simple, natural letters, cover all of the mature life of an observant woman, a poet, who was thrown among some of the most interesting people and stirring events of her time.

PUBLISHED BY

The Macmillan Company

66 Fifth Avenue, New York

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 Post St.

THE
Old Government
THE PERFECTION of WHISKY
MATURED and BOTTLED in BOND
THE U. S. GOVERNMENT
guarantees the age and purity
We guarantee the quality unexcelled
FOR SALE BY PRINCIPAL DEALERS.
William Wolff & Co.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
DISTRIBUTORS.

CHICKERING PIANOS
For 75 Years Standard of the World
88,000 IN USE
SOLD ON EASY TERMS
BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents
16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....
SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.
Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF ROBERT A. ROSE, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at Room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

A. C. FREESE,
Adminis-trator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, October 26th, 1897.

J. D. Sullivan,
Attorney for Administrator.

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.
S. STROZYNSKI
24 GEARY ST.
The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.
Telephone Main 5697.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE NAME THUS ON LABEL AND CAP
Stewart Hartshorn
THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY
Price 25 Cents
DR. PARKER'S COUGH CURE
One dose will stop a cough—it never fails!
ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR IT

United States Laundry
Office 1004 Market St.
TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, PIPE, TILE, ETC.
GLADDING, McBEAN & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO.
WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

A. K. DAGGETT
Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty
NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F.
Telephone 105

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

Comments on the Stanford-California Freshman Game—Team Form.

Were the two colleges to line up to-day for the final game Stanford would probably win, because its defense is better perfected than California's. It is a curious thing that each college is strong in a defense not adapted to meet the offense of the other. No ends that the cardinal has yet shown could prevent the really well-planned runs of California from gaining, and as surely the compact half revolving tackle plays of Stanford would smash through California's line. Between Stanford's three who guard the center and their opponents there would not be the difference people suppose. Experience, weight, strength and reputation are all with Fickert, Carle and Burnett, but the men from Berkeley did almost as well against Reliance and showed a superior agility and aggressiveness. At tackle Barnes would be outplayed by Rice, who, to my mind, light as he is, is the best of the college tackles. He follows the ball tenaciously and never forgets to get into a play, even if he has been crowded out of it earlier.

* *

With Murphy to punt, and run in punts, Stanford would have a great advantage in a kicking game, and they would undoubtedly try such a style to get inside California's twenty-five yard line and then force a touch down by heavy tackle play. Certainly no back that California has thus far shown can make even a respectable showing in handling kicks. Karsburg is the surest handler of them but he is slow in getting under way. While excepting Harelson, the old Stanford quarter, Murphy's equal in this special work has never been seen here before. If the game were to be played to-day by aid of such mass plays and the advantage of Murphy's kicking over California's the cardinal would probably score twice. On the other hand, by Hall and Karsburg's runs around Stanford's only fairly strong ends California ought to make one touch down. So, with a month of practice before them, the U. C. has to make up a handicap of at least six points and besides make as good progress as the cardinal from this on. It is a hard task, but Yale and Princeton teams have fought out and won when as badly handicapped. It is going to be a close race and the winners and the public will know that there has been a game.

* *

Neither California nor Stanford need be ashamed of the freshmen who battled on Saturday. It is seldom that first year men leave such an impression of absolute fearless, enthusiastic play with the spectators. The cardinal-clad eleven won, and won on merit. Especially meritorious was its defense, and the superiority of its backs was most marked. Erb, Wilson and Burmeister all tackled low and hard, never allowing the runner to gain after the tackle. The chief interest in the freshman game must be aside from the playing. For while these boys approached good football more nearly than any freshman teams before them, our curiosity was to learn what men the incoming classes had brought to strengthen the football ranks of their colleges. Stanford, as she has always been, is the more fortunate. In Premo, Pringle and Fowler, California has three first-class men — men who can be made into 'varsity material. It is possible that Gurberson and Dickson may, after hard, patient coaching, become of value, but neither promises much. The first, a huge man, and very strong, does not seem adapted either in mind or frame to the game. He is mentally apathetic, while Dickson, on the other hand, is over-anxious, and loses judgment at a critical moment, although he has had more or less experience. It was over and around him that Stanford's best gains were made early in the game, because he persisted in playing close enough to be boxed in almost every play. During the second half his work was better. Though California's backs were very light they played well together on the offense and in scoring the first touchdown gave a pretty exhibition of team work. They used a tandem play somewhat obsolete in character and effective only because of the precise way in which it was launched. Their double passes were disastrous, merely going to show that experience is necessary to bring trick plays off successfully.

* *

What a shame it is that little Kerfoot is not half a hundred pounds heavier. His work was nothing short of marvelous, approaching in brilliance the best open field work that we have ever seen here, this too when opposed by an end who will probably represent Stanford on her Varsity. Hornlein, hardly any larger, came in for a lot of hard work on the defense: he met every play unflinchingly and more often than not was responsible for Stanford's failure to gain. Burmeister, who played fullback for the Stanford men, promises to be as good as the best men California has given to that position. He is beautifully built for it, and even now gets a quick powerful drive that makes his kicks hard to block and sends them sailing far when started. His strongest point, though, is the way he has of holding his feet in mass plays; a faculty that in this day of concerted, concentrated play is hardly to be overestimated. With this fullback and such men as Wilson, Hill, Morgan and Beckley, Stanford's Varsity will be strong enough to maintain its past reputation in days to come.

* *

Erb and Dole, too, although light, ought to be of use to the major eleven some time. With them, as with McCabe, Smith and Kerfoot of the U. C.'s freshmen, it seems a pity that handicap of weight should rob the Varsity of such courageous, intelligent and hard-working players.

* *

Stanford offered a further demonstration of the fact that their foot ball is more up to date than California's. The situation here parallels the story of Princeton, Pennsylvania and Yale. The two former have brought a new and improved method of attack and defense to the game Yale, conservative and cautious, is clinging to and improving what she has found good in the past. In consequence minor colleges following more modern methods, are pressing the former invincible blues close to defeat. With us Stanford has chosen to follow the newer, more effective school. What California may elect this year remains to be seen. Last year Mr. Butterworth clung to the old and the lesson he should have learned, when the blue and gold was so overwhelmed, seems to have been lost, for Yale, under his tuition, promises to be outclassed by all three of her rivals.

* *

Stanford, on Saturday, swept a half revolving mass at tackle consistently and with accuracy. That one play with Burmeister's kicking would have won them the game had it been necessary. It was not used to a very great extent as the weakness of California's left side made straight simple plays effective enough to win.

* *

Even though Mr. Nott should decide to adopt the heavy Princeton or Pennsylvania style, what he can accomplish with it remains problematic. In one season no coach can be expected to do more than hammer green players into valuable men and round them into a fairly efficient eleven. To do this and give his team style and ability to work the more complicated plays so efficient under present rules is impossible in a short three months. It is here that Mr. Brooke has the advantage. His men are, in the main, tried and know the game. It will be easy for them to pick up the game where they left it last year, and make their play far more advanced in many ways, especially as they are so well adapted in physique for just the kind of game that eastern experience has proven the best.

ROBT. PORTER.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

How's This?

We offer One Hundred Dollars reward for any case of catarrh that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.

We, the undersigned, have known F. J. Cheney for the last fifteen years, and believe him perfectly honorable in all business transactions, and financially able to carry out any obligations made by their firm.

West & Truax, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.
Walding, Kinnan & Marvin, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.

Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. Testimonials sent free. Price 75c. per bottle. Sold by all druggists.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

Among the many great Financial Corporations on the Pacific Coast, none rank higher than the
FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.
Its Agents are found throughout America, and its Record for Prompt and Equitable Settlement of All Honest Losses is Firmly Established
D. J. STAPLES, President — WM. J. DUTTON, Vice-President — B. FAYMONVILLE, 2d V.-Pres., Sec'y
J. B. LEVISON, Marine Sec'y — LOUIS WEINMANN, Asst. Sec'y — STEPHEN D. IVES, General Agent

The German Savings and Loan Society
526 California St., S. F.
Guarantee Capital and Surplus - $2,040,201 66
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash - 1,000,000 00
Deposits December 31, 1896 - 27,730,247 45
OFFICERS
President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER
DIRECTORS
B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union
532 CALIFORNIA ST.
Deposits December 31, 1896 - $22,885,377
Paid Up Capital and Surplus - 1,594,503
ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier
DIRECTORS
GEORGE W. BEAVER — ROBERT WATT
THOMAS MAGEE — GEO. C. BOARDMAN
W. C. B. DE FREMERY — DANIEL E. MARTIN
ALBERT MILLER — GEO. TASHEIRA
E. B. POND
Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company
Paid Up Capital . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . 25,000
OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING
CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager.
Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.
We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

Royal and Queen Ins. Cos.
Have removed their offices to the Royal Insurance Building, Northwest Corner of Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco.
Combined Assets Over $52,000,000
ROLLA V. WATT, - Pacific Coast Manager

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A.D. [illegible]
Capital Paid Up $[illegible] Assets $[illegible]
Surplus to Policy Holders $[illegible]
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

CONNECTICUT
FIRE INS. CO
OF HARTFORD
Assets $[illegible] BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager
COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
501 Montgomery Street

The Lion Fire Insurance Co. Limited of London
Total Cash Assets in United States $885,[illegible]
The Imperial Insurance Co. Limited of London
Established on Pacific Coast in 1862
WM. J. LANDERS, Resident Manager
PACIFIC COAST BRANCH
205-207 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Thuringia Insurance Co.
OF ERFURT, GERMANY
Capital $2,250,000 — Assets $10,984,248
PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

Don't Borrow a Home!
BUY IT Your rent payments for the borrowed home will do it through the end of the
CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California
WM. COLBURN, Secretary and Gen. Manager
Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco.

SATISFACTORY TO THE EYE AND EAR
BYRON MAUZY PIANOS
308-314 POST ST.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. For particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

Baldwin Theatre

AL. HAYMAN & CO. (Inc.) . . . . . Proprietors

To-night, Sunday Night and all Next Week
Last performances of the Musical Comedy

"Lost, Strayed or Stolen"

With its Great Cast.

November 15th the Burlesque Extravaganza
"IN GAY NEW YORK"

California Theatre

Immense Artistic Success!

ITALIAN GRAND OPERA CO.

To-night (Saturday) first time here
LA BOHEME, by Puccini
A Great Cast! Elaborate Staging!

Next week — Second week of the Opera Season! Monday, Otello; Tuesday, Lucia; Wednesday, Rigoletto; Friday, Favorita; Saturday Matinee, Lucia; Saturday Night, Masked Ball

Seats . . . . 50c. to $1.50

Columbia Theatre

FREDLANDER GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers

Second and Last Week!
Complete Change of Programme! Best of the Year!
The Premier Magical Entertainment of the World!

Herrmann the Great Company

Headed by Leon Herrmann
(Only successor to Herrmann the Great)
Adelaide Herrmann. Prestidigitatrice. in Her Bewildering Spectacular Dance Creations
Nov. 15th, "In Old Kentucky"

Orpheum

Week beginning Monday, Nov. 8th

COUNTESS VON HATZFELDT, Chanteuse Supreme the Latest Sensation
MLLE. LEOPOLDINE, Principal of the Seven Aerial Wonders
MISSES COOKE & CLINTON, Wonderful Exhibitions of Rifle-Shooting
A. L. STEELE, World's Greatest Double Cornetist
A. O. DUNCAN, the World-Famous Ventriloquist
W. J. ALEXANDER, Eccentric Musical Comedian
AND OTHER VAUDEVILLE STARS

Reserved Seats 25c.; Balcony 10c.; Opera Chairs and Box Seats 50c. Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday.

Tivoli Opera House

MRS. ERNESTINE KOELING : Proprietor and Manager

Every Evening at 8 sharp
Success of the Year — the Japanese Musical Comedy

THE GEISHA

Splendid Chorus! Excellent Orchestra!
A three hours' trip to the Orient!
Mirth and Music Skillfully Combined!

Next, RIP VAN WINKLE
Look out for Christmas Spectacle!

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : . : : . : Manager

Phone Main 254

The play that piloted Mrs. Leslie Carter to histrionic fame, brought her theatrical recognition and made of her a star

THE UGLY DUCKLING

An intensely interesting Society Comedy-Drama, abounding in strong situations and climaxes
Our prices do not fluctuate—50c, 35c, 25c, and 15c. including a Reserved Seat.

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO . . : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last four performances of 777
Monday, November 8th, Sixth Week of the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H. Pascoe, in the Charming Comedy-Drama

THE LOST PARADISE

One of the Best Plays Ever Written!
Beautiful Scenery and Costumes!
Good Comedy and Mechanical Effects!

Evg. Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

CALIFORNIA THEATRE

Next Sunday Evening, November 7th

Positively last appearance in San Francisco

MR. & MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL

IN A

Grand Popular Concert!

Popular Programme! Popular Numbers!

Popular Prices — Orchestra and Dress Circle, $1.00; Balcony, 50c.; Gallery, 25c. Seats on sale at the store of the San Francisco Music Co., 225 Sutter street, and at the Theatre Boxoffice on Sunday.

MADAME LASSAUGUE

A Celebrated European Teacher of the great Marchesi and Lamperti Vocal Methods has her private vocal studio at Kohler & Chase's to teach te same. May be seen daily (except Mondays and Thursdays) from 3 to 4 p.m. Appointments evenings when desired. Mail and applications to KOHLER & CHASE, 28 O'Farrell street. Soprano Concert Vocalist.

NEW BOOKS! NEW BOOKS!

"The Story of An Untold Love"
by the author of "Hon. Peter Stirling"
"Paste Jewels," by John Kendrick Bangs

JUST RECEIVED, AT

HARTWELL, MITCHELL & WILLIS
107 Montgomery Street.

TURF TOPICS

The Season Opens at Ingleside — Recall Flag Question.

From an attendance point of view, Monday is not a good day on which to start a new racing season, but even if the crowd was below what Ingleside can muster on special occasions, there was a general cheerfulness that went a good way towards making a satisfactory gathering. When the course was first reached the weather was bright, though a fog came in later, and the place showed up well and surprised many who had not seen it for six months. How it looks, and what the improvements are, will be described more fully in this journal another time, when the Oakland track will have got into full swing again also, and the new racing season is well on. A lot of new work has been done on the track itself and it is a little heavy still, but after a while will probably be in fine shape for fast time. The plan of requiring numbered saddle-cloths on the horses warming up before a race, as well as during the race itself, is to be commended and will enable the general public to tell one animal from another, which hitherto has only been possible for those who know all the horses by appearance.

In the first race over six furlongs, Bellicoso, 110 lbs., got well away in a generally bad start, in which two out of the ten runners were left at the post, made all the running and won by a length and a half. Farrar & Turberville's well-named three-year-old Polish, by Bootblack out of Peerless, 105 lbs., who got away badly and traveled in the ruck, made Mr. Naglee Burk's horse exert himself in the run in. The latter looked a bit lusty and big after his absence from the course and seemed to find the journey quite long enough for him. The four-year-old mare Marquise, 103 lbs., justified the opinion of the talent by landing the $400 purse in the 1 1-16 miles, in a tight finish with Lorena II, 103 lbs., and had she not been crowded out in the early part of the race, would probably have had an easier task. In the two-year-old event we were treated to a clever exhibition of galloping work on the part of St. Cuthbert. 99 lbs., a son of St. Carlo, who won with some four lengths to spare in the hands of Holmes; Miss Remsen, 109 lbs., the quality looking daughter of Owas, second, and Catawba, 99 lbs., third, with little to spare between them, and Estro, 116 lbs., a close-up fourth.

In the race of the day, the University Stakes, $1,000, one mile, seven three-year-olds came to the post. Two false starts, caused apparently by the deficiencies of the barrier, the second leading to the jockeys travelling nearly half a mile before they understood that they had been recalled, produced considerable annoyance. When the horses did get away Fleur de Lis, 111 lbs., took up the running and for upwards of half the distance kept in the lead. Altamax, 114 lbs., however, laid handy along the back stretch, moving in fine form and rounding the final turn with a comfortable bit of space, gradually increased his advantage to fully four lengths by the time he had passed the judges' box. Hohenzollern and Horatio fought out a struggle for sesond place, which the former secured by a head. Charles Fair's promising filly Flamelia, by Flambeau, was so badly cut into by Newsgatherer as to have a hind back tendon completely severed, and there was nothing tor it but to put an end to her existence. The next event at four furlongs was taken by Hermanita, and the following race, one mile, her full brother, Ostler Joe, 112 lbs, succumbed, as he has done before, to Boots & Sons' Installator, 107 lbs., both horses ridden out and half a length being the verdict in favor of the junior. The popular black horse looks in fine fettle after his successful season in Montana.

On the second day the chief event, a $500 purse for all ages, one mile, brought out Installator and three two-year-olds. The first-named, carrying 111 lbs., made all the running, and, ridden pretty hard towards the end of the journey, won by a length, Los Prietos, 89 lbs., just beating Fonsavannah a short head for second place. The other five races brought out good fields, Don Luis, by imp. Midlothian, capturing the two-year-old seven-furlongs race in good style.

On Wednesday the San Francisco Stakes, $1200, six furlongs, which had closed with twenty-six entries, brought a field of eight runners to the post, Napamax and St. Calatine on looks and performances outclassing their competitors, and both, with 120 lbs., giving from 5 to 10 lbs. away in weight. The start was by no means good, and greatly to the advantage of St. Calatine, who succeeded in maintaining her position to the end and winning in somewhat easy fashion. Napamax was unable to get through until the paddock had been reached, when she made a big effort, under punishment at the hands of the Burns & Waterhouse light-weight O'Donnell, but the St. Carlo filly evidently had the foot of her and left the impression that she should always hold her own with the daughter of Maxim. Of course it must be borne in mind that the latter has only lately had to submit to climatic changes and the drawbacks of traveling, but the stable was very confident, and apparently believed their filly to be in good form. The Emperor of Norfolk colt, El Salado, was a good third, just in front of Yule, by imp. Inverness.

In the $400 purse for all ages, seven furlongs, half a dozen of very fair class sported silk and got away nicely together. Tea Rose, 102 lbs., with her usual quickness went to the front, where Clawson kept her throughout and secured the verdict by a couple of lengths. Grady and Ostler Joe, with 110 lbs. each, were second and third respectively, the former taking precedence of the black horse with little trouble, though the latter was traveling fast at the finish. The Ace, 86 lbs., and Elsmore, 89 lbs., made no show, but the quality-looking Highland Ball, 89 lbs., a son of imp. Inverness, kept handy until well into the stretch.

From what we have so far seen of the jockeys Piggott has certainly been improved by his further Eastern experience. Clawson, too, has fulfilled the promise he gave early in the year, while the new-comers, Woods and Holmes, are both youngsters that shape nicely. Of the older riders at present on the spot M. Martin and M. Hennessy take the lead.

---

Since racing began a great deal has been said about the necessity for a recall flag as an adjunct to the starting gate at Ingleside, discussion of the subject being prompted by some poor starts on the first two days. As remarked in these columns last spring it is contrary to the principle of the starting gate to have a recall after the barrier has been removed, and the system would simply be an encouragement to horses and riders to give trouble. In Australia, where the gate was first introduced, and where fields are often far larger than we ever see here, no recall flag is resorted to, and the main argument adduced in its favor here is that those who have backed horses that are unreliable, or for some reason or other unlucky in getting away on good terms with the rest, should be protected. If the lifting of the gate be treated as final, it stands to reason that jockeys will be more careful than otherwise, and so the starter will have less trouble, which after all, is the main point. The remedy is to exercise the power of fining jockeys who try to make running starts or manoeuver horses in any way that creates difficulty at the post. If owners choose to send badly mannered brutes to the post and the public are foolish enough to back them, neither have any right to blame the starter for any disappointment that may result.

DIAKKA

---

The picture shown in these colums, taken from the Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News of London, represents the winner of the sixth renewal of the Duke of York Stakes, £2000, at Kempton Park, a handicap, one mile, run on October 9th. Diakka is a four-year-old colt by imp. The Sailor Prince, the sensational winner of the Cambridgeshire, out of Rizpah, and was bred by Mr. Lorillard, who shipped him to England, where the horse has been raced as the joint property of Mr. Lorillard and Lord William Beresford. Diakka was strongly fancied for the Lincolnshire Handicap at the beginning of the season, but was then troubled with splints which affected his going. He is now described as one of the finest movers in England, was in splendid fettle on the day of the race, started equal favorite with Mrs. Langtry's Australian mare Maluma, and accomplished a popular victory in true racehorse style.

BENEDICT.

A Grief.

Oh, where is de goil dat inspired me to song?
She's a daisy; a peach—I don't t'ink.
I was tickled ter deat', oncet, ter take 'er along
Ter de ball, er ter skate on de rink.
As a looker, I backed 'er to take every prize,
An' now she's clean out'n de race;
I sits down and cries till I've used up me eyes
Since Mag got de bicycle face.

When I sees how her sky fringe is twisted an' blown
By de winds, till she looks like a fright—
Den I t'inks how de moonbeams at Coney oncet shone
On 'er hair dat was frizzed out o' sight.
Fur freckles, she had such a cute-winnin' way,
But de sunburn has give 'em de chase;
I'm half crazy by night an' I'm foolish by day
Since Mag got de bicycle face.

It's hard, when ye've saved up yer money ter splice
Ter call de match off, an' to quit;
Ter say dat yer love letters don't cut no ice;
Ter end de hull romance wid "nit."
But trut' must come out. Dere's no show ter conceal
De horrible facts in de case;
I'd as soon ask de joss down in Mott Street ter spiel,
As Mag, wid 'er bicycle face.

—Philander Johnson in Life.

Mount Vernon Pure Rye.

Distillery bottling, square bottles only. The public appreciate a good article when they can get it. Sold by all first-class dealers.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

FINANCE AND TRADE

Ease in Money — Stocks and Shares — The Wheat Market.

Thursday Evening.

Since last writing the money market has shown a disposition toward ease in London, which has tended to confirm the feeling that has been prevalent on this side. The result of the municipal election in New York, however, has created a very unfavorable impression in European financial circles, and a considerable decline has taken place in American securities on the leading stock exchanges, a condition of affairs that was immediately reflected in the dealings on Wall Street.

Silver has been weak and presents every appearance of touching a lower point in the immediate future.

In the Bond market prices have remained very firm, and the good demand for first-class issues still prevails. If it shall continue, as seems almost certain, a higher range of values will be established.

The result of the abundant tenders for the monthly instalment of San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railroad bonds was as we predicted, the figure realized being 101½. The syndicate has handled the bonds with shrewd judgment, and there is every reason to believe the demand for these new secureties will continue unabated.

Spring Valley water stock has been steady, and after changing hands at 98¾ has advanced to 99¼ bid.

Gas stocks have been weak on liquidation, though we have to notice strength in Mutual Electric, which, reported strong in tendency at date of last writing, were subsequently dealt in at 12 on rumors of a dividend to be paid in January next or thereabouts.

Bank shares are still in good demand, without any noticeable change in quotations. Little is doing, however, for the reason that there are practically no offerings.

The most prominent feature of the market during the period under review has been the sudden advance in the value of Market-Street Railway shares from 47½ to 49⅝. Large transfers of the stock have been made and the purchases have gone into strong hands. There are rumors on the street o. increased dividends, but, though the company is well known to have been doing a large business, we doubt if these will materialize.

The looked-for break in Powder stocks did not occur, and so far the movement alluded to in another column has not had any appreciable effect on the minds of holders. Sales of Giant shares are reported at 36½.

Quite a tidy little parcel of Alaska Packers shares has changed hands at 98.

In Sugar stocks there has been some reaction in Hawaiian, which sold at 23, but a better feeling has since prevailed and there has been a recovery to 23¼ offered.

Oceanic Steamship have borne out the view expressed in our last summary, and have been enquired for at 31¼, but the shares are well held and hardly obtainable at present.

In the grain market there was a strong upward tendency in wheat at the close of last week, chiefly due to speculative movement. This, however, was but short-lived, and, with declining quotations, there is at present considerable divergence between the views of buyers and sellers. Foreign advices have had a depressing effect on American markets, especially for forward deliveries, though the local trade has in this respect shown a somewhat better feeling than existed in the interior and abroad. December No. 1 has to-day been quoted 1.46¾, fairly steady. With the reported increase in the visible supply the present outlook does not exhibit strength.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles. Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Bartholomay
BREWERY CO. ROCHESTER, N.Y.

The "Knickerbocker"

is universally acknowledged the Finest Beer produced in this country.

WILLIAM WOLFF & CO.

Pacific Coast Agents San Francisco

PACIFIC COAST JOCKEY CLUB

INGLESIDE TRACK

Racing from Monday, November 1st, to Saturday, November 13th, including

Five or more races daily, rain or shine
First race at 2 p.m.

S. P. R. R. Trains 12:45 and 1:15 p.m. daily. Leave Third-street station, stopping at Valencia street. Returning immediately after the last race.

Electric Car Lines — Kearny and Mission-street cars every 3 minutes, direct to track without change.

F. H. GREEN, Secretary. S. N. ANDROUS, President.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

---

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY

SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas ..... | 4 00 am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

---

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov. 30 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.
S. S. "Alameda," for Australia, Thursday, Nov. 11 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

I. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO General Agents

---

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

---

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Steamer Pomona, 2 p.m. November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28

For Newport (Los Angeles) and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Nov. 2, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 30 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Harford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles and Redondo (Los Angeles), at 11 a.m. November 4, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 28 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, 10 a.m. the 2d each month

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal

---

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

The firm of JOE POHEIM is the largest in the United States. Rules for self-measurement and samples of cloth sent free.

201 and 203 Montgomery St., cor. Bush.
844 & 846 Market St. 1110 & 1112 Market St.
SAN FRANCISCO.
485 Fourteenth St., Oakland. 603 & 605 K St., Sacramento.
143 South Spring St., Los Angeles.

---

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

---

BEST & BELCHER MINING COMPANY - Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the second (2d) day of November, 1897, an assessment (No. 63) of twenty-five cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessmynt shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of December, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless paid before, will be sold on Tuesday the twenty-eighth (28th) day of December, 1897, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. M. JAFFE, Secretary.

Office, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco. California.

---

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Kentuck Consolidated Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment | No. 14 |
| Amount per share | 5 cents |
| Levied | October 27, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office | December 1, 1897 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock | December 22, 1897 |

AUG. WATERMAN, Secretary.
Office, room 23, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

---

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Gould & Curry Silver Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment | No. 82 |
| Amount per share | 20 cents |
| Levied | November 2, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office | December 7, 1897 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock | December 29, 1897 |

A. K. DURBROW, Secretary.
Office, room 69, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

---

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

---

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty Phone 1950

W. C. WRIGHT C. S. WRIGHT

N. GRAY & CO.

UNDERTAKERS

641-643-645 Sacramento Street, corner Webb
Telephone Main 43

---

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

---

THE LATEST STYLES IN

CHOICE WOOLENS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.
Merchant Tailors
623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel
Bicycle and Golf Suits

---

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

---

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, bookbinders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.

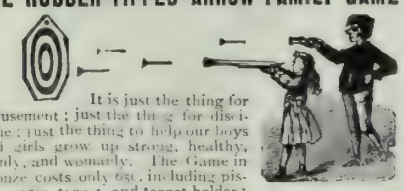
TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST
BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA
ELECTRICAL WORKS
409 MARKET STREET

THE RUBBER-TIPPED ARROW FAMILY GAME



It is just the thing for amusement; just the thing for discipline; just the thing to help our boys and girls grow up strong, healthy, manly, and womanly. The Game in Bronze costs only 65c. including pistol, arrow, target, and target-holder; in nickel, 90c., all complete.

ELASTIC TIP CO., 735 Market Street,
Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS
22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard
. . ALSO . .
Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company . . Pacific Coast
Baltimore Sole Agents

Electrical Supplies

BROOKS - FOLLIS
ELECTRICAL CO
523 Mission St., San Francisco

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package
Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored
E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS
Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.
Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE
Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.
1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies
30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael
Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

A party of teetotal cyclists, in a recent tour, put up at a wayside inn in the neighborhood of Melbourne, Australia. The landlord was a brusque man of business, and eminently practical. Three of the party of five called for water when they were ushered to a quiet little room away from the ungodly bar. Another wanted a cup of tea, and the fifth, making a plunge, had ginger ale. Nearly an hour passed, and the weary wheelmen calmly rested without offering further patronage. At last the host put his head in the doorway and said, "I think I heard you ringing." "Oh, no—none of us rang," came the response. "Then, by—— you will either ring or pay me for a week's lodging! How do you think I live?" A few moments later the tourists were scorching away from the inn, mentally resolving to camp at a dry creek next time rather than risk the danger of such importunate landlords again.

Marie Shotwell, who supported Fanny Davenport when she opened in Boston last Wednesday night, was riding in a cable car the day she left New York. Marie has a pet dog she carries everywhere, and she is so pretty that nine times out of ten, conductors let her ride for nothing. Marie got on a Broadway car near Fourteenth street, and it was not until she had ridden several blocks that the conductor noticed the dog. "Hello, my miss," said the conductor, as he tried to put Marie off the car, "you cannot keep that dog here. There are no dogs allowed on the cars." "Indeed!" said Marie, "how do you keep on?"

Aubrey de Vere tells in his reminiscences of an Irish chieftain of the antique type—Sir Edward O'Brien. Seated one day at dinner with the poet, Sir Edward remarked: "I have just been thinking that this is the year that I have to die in." The poet replied: "Nothing of the kind, Sir Edward. I never saw you better. You will probably live another dozen years." Sir Edward was highly provoked. "Do not say that, Sir Aubrey," he rejoined; "the head of our family always dies at the age I have now reached. It is our way, and I don't want to change it." He died within the year.

Governor Brough of Ohio was a man of intense energy and great executive ability, but most sparing of words. During the Civil War a newspaper reporter applied, through the Governor's private secretary, for information in regard to the Ohio troops, both in the field and to be recruited, which it would have been highly improper, if not unsafe, for the Governor to give. The Governor said, impatiently, to his private secretary, "Give him an evasive answer." The secretary said: "Well, Governor, how shall I put it?" The Governor answered: "Tell him to go to hell!"

A Tennesseean tells this story of a darky freight hand on a southern railway. It seems that Ben, the darky, had been placed in charge of a mule, whose destination was marked on a tag attached by twine to the mule's leg. Before the animal had been pursuaded to enter a car, he, in some way, managed to reach the tag and, before Ben could interpose, the mule had the tag well chewed up. The old man looked up the local freight agent and asked in perturbation: "W'at I goin' do wid dat mewl? He done et up de place w'ere he's goin.'"

The following amusing passage took place between counsel and witness in a disputed will case. "Did your father give you no parting admonition?" "He never gave much away at any time!" "I mean to say, what were his last words?" "They don't concern you." "They not only concern me, sir," said the barrister severely, "but they concern the whole Court." "Oh, all right!" was the reply. "Father said, 'Don't have no trouble when I'm gone, Jim, 'cos lawyers is the biggest thieves unhung!'"

At an Oxford dinner party James Payn sat next to the Countess of Desmond. A learned clergyman, who bore the burden of conversation, quoted several Greek texts and the Countess asked Payn what they meant. He gave her to understand, with a well-assumed blush, that it was scarcely fit for a lady's ear. "Good heavens!" she exclaimed. "You don't mean to say——" "Please don't ask any more," said Mr. Payn pleadingly; "I really could not tell you." Which was true to the ear, if not to the sense.

A Derbyshire servant gave notice of her intention to leave, informing her mistress she was about to be married. About a week before the ceremony she came to the mistress and asked if she had obtained another girl. "No, Bridget; not yet," was the reply. "Then, Ma'am, I'd like to stay on, if you don't mind." "But what about the marriage, Bridget? I thought you were going to marry the chimney-sweep?" "That's true, Ma'am; I was; but when I saw him with his face washed, I felt I could never love him."

The late Duke of York, son of George the Third, owed quite a sum of money to a dissipated clergyman named Ponsonby, and in order to pay the debt, proposed giving him an Irish living. He therefore sent him to Ireland with a note to the Bishop of Cork, which read: "Dear Cork—Ordain Ponsonby. Yours, York." In a short time the Prince received this equally concise note from the Bishop: "Dear York—Ponsonby ordained. Yours, Cork."

A poor man lay dying, and his good wife was tending him with homely but affectionate care. "Don't you think you could eat a bit of something, John? Now, what can I get for you?" With a wan smile he answered feebly, "Well, I seem to smell a ham a-cooking somewheres; I think I could do with a little bit of that." "Oh, no, John, dear," she answered promptly, "you can't have that. That's for the funeral."

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION
IN
THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

The best people from everywhere, bent on business or pleasure, when in New York, stop at
The St. Denis
The cuisine and comforts of the hotel have become so well known that its name is now a household word in thousands of homes in this country and Europe
Central Location
Broadway and Eleventh Street
Opposite Grace Church
New York

Hotel Bella Vista
1001 PINE STREET
Elegant Furnishings and Apartments
DELIGHTFULLY SITUATED
MRS. A. F. TRACY.

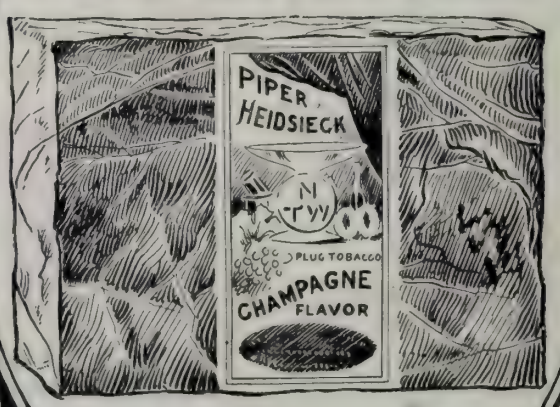
Hotel Rafael
SAN RAFAEL, CAL.
The Sanitarium, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast
FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO
Magnificent Scenery and Drives. The thermometer averages for the winter months 64 degrees, excelling that of the famed Mentone, France.
Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments
R. H. WARFIELD CO.
(Incorporated) Proprietors

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention
A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED
OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

The Hotel Richelieu
N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.
PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO
HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

PIPER HEIDSIECK
PLUG
TOBACCO
CHAMPAGNE FLAVOR

THE NEW
FIVE-CENT PIECE



ENLARGED 40%
Ask For It.

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 46 SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 13, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

UNLOADING A FIVE-THOUSAND TON MERCHANTMAN ON THE WATERFRONT

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 13, 1897

CONTENTS

Editorials ... 2-3
Things and People; by Boswell Jr. ... 3-5
How San Francisco Lives; by John Bonner ... 3
The Cost of a Daily ... 6
Ostriches and Feathers; by Sarah Comstock ... 7
Scenes at Camp Morgan ... 8
"His Dead Mother's Portrait"; by Frank Norris ... 8
Views of the Presbyterian Chinese Mission Home ... 9
A Debutante's Diary ... 10
Musical Review; by Lesley Martin ... 10
Catering in San Francisco ... 10
The Theatres ... 11
Finance and Trade ... 11
"The Vice of Fools"; a Review by C ... 12
Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter ... 13
Turf Topics; by Benedict ... 14
New Stories Re-Told ... 16

A SUGGESTION TO CORPORATIONS.

A gentleman well known in insurance circles, commenting upon the widely different and frequently harsh and unusual regulations imposed upon insurance concerns by the several States, asked the writer, some time ago, why this legislative discrimination might not be remedied by the Federal government. In brief, it was his idea to "nationalize" the interstate insurance business — bring it under Federal control exclusively — and so secure immunity from local impositions that are obviously intended as measures, and are calculated to induce these corporations to unlock their treasuries to the lobbyist and the legislative officer. The Legislatures of the Western States are hungrier and more daring in this direction than the lawmakers of the far East, and in California we have been cursed with somewhat more than our share of legislative highwaymen.

Patentees and Manufacturers
COTT 22-inch, Bevel-Edge Steel Square

It is not our purpose to discuss the practicability of our friend's suggestion; but there is a grim and menacing something behind it all that does need discussing. Fear lay at the root of this suggestion — a fear that was impossible in America twenty years ago — a fear, the mere existence of which, warranted or only half warranted, should never have existence in the mind of any man living under a government that makes a pretension of protecting its citizens from spoliation. The plan outlined by this gentleman was not a device of experimental idleness — not the utterance of a dreamy theorist or intermeddler in governmental policies. It was an idea formulated by a practical, intelligent business man, upon whose mind had broken the gray dawn of fear and distrust. In free America an American citizen was seeking to obtain freedom from legislative injustice, and for his property, protection from the public thief and plunderer. He did not deny the necessity for regulation, did not claim the right to immunity from governmental control; he merely put forth a plea for fairness, for plain, common honesty; for immunity from legislative brigandage and official rapacity. That was all. He was deeply concerned for what the future might hold. His willingness to entrust the regulating of his business to a Federal office-holder was clearly stated, long in advance of his appointment, with a knowledge of the changes that new administrations would bring, with all the attending uncertainty and doubt as to who that person might be, he was willing and anxious to submit to that supervision rather than——rather than what? Rather than remain in the clutches of the public officers of the several States.

And yet, the officer whose jurisdiction he would avoid is closer to the people and would more nearly represent their wishes than would a Federal insurance commissioner, who would in all likelihood receive his apointment at the hands of the President. It would seem, then, as though to secure immunity from official thievery or unjust impositions it is necessary to get as far away from popular will as possible. To admit this, is to confess to a most lamentable condition of affairs. Yet the fact cannot be denied that the shortest highway to popularity lies in the direction of prostituting one's abilities at the shrine of demagogy.

If a State officeholder ostentatiously parades his hostility toward corporate and other wealth, he does so for popularity's sake—nothing else. The individual who is most persistent, most rabid, and most uncompromising in his attacks on wealth, is commonly regarded as being more honest than his fellows who abstain from such cheap and unworthy practices. And there is a reason for all this. Greed, a lust for plunder, trickery, and political debauchery, which is the common practice of some corporate attaches, have blackened all their fellows, innocent and guilty alike. There are other causes producing this effect, notably an insincere press, but corporations themselves are not wholly blameless, and we propose to confine this article to their instruction.

Take the case of the insurance companies. We will suppose—we do not charge it—that a Legislature made up to a large extent of "boodlers," threatens to adopt measures calculated to visit great hardships upon individuals engaged in that business. We will further suppose that, driven to desperation; threatened with total destruction; having a knowledge that the legislation was conceived in iniquity; that it was intended to bleed them; that, if adopted, would serve no public good; that the wretches who stand sponsor for it have no opinions to change, no good motives to divert, no high ambition to serve the public weal, but are dominated and governed alone by but one desire — and that money. We will further imagine that the insurance companies, in their distress, hastily form a pool, dispatch to the capital a trusted messenger, with money sufficient to satisfy the avarice of the wretches who have stood them up — what is the result? The legislation is defeated — temporary safety has been secured, but at what price? There is a harvest of woe that must be reaped. Notice has been served on every rascal who may subsequently secure an office that these corporations may be forced to "give up." He, like his predecessor, is eager and watchful for an opportunity to bleed Once set in motion, the chain of corruption is endless, and the same old demand is repeated and repeated. These performances are never kept secret, however secretly they may have been accomplished. The honest legislator, too, is served with notice that the insurance side of the question—though it may be the only honest side to take—is the one on which money has been corruptly used. He is precluded from voting as his conscience dictates for fear of being classed with known corruptionists. He decides against his conscience and in favor of the "people," as the Examiner would put it; and awakens the next morning to find the press has made him mildly famous for resisting corporate bribery that was never tendered him. Like his corrupt colleague, he too sets an example for his honest successor to follow.

Here it is where the corporations have blundered, and they are still floundering in the same difficulties that beset them years ago. They are no nearer a solution of their difficulties now than then. Indeed, the outlook is worse. Every repetition of the performance above narrated has created its own mischief. So deplorable is the present state of public mind to-day, that as a remedy Federal intervention is suggested as the only means of escape.

It is not insurance companies and railroad corporations alone that suffer; nor is it in the halls of legislation alone that men give vent to their spite against such institutions. It creeps into the jury box, it is felt on the bench, it has become part of public opinion. It does not matter whether the public officer who attacks these institutions is after pelf or popularity, his hostility is sanctioned by public opinion. Public opinion is the lash that is used to beat the corporations into submission to the demands of the plunderers. The entire public does not partake of these animosities and prejudices, but enough voters do to influence an ordinary election. This condition of affairs is an inherent but not an ineradicable vice of our form of government. There is a remedy for it. Older communities have rid themselves of the distemper and we may do the same thing. It will require patience, thorough organization, education and an entire divorcement from the poltical boss and manipulator, who, after all, is most interested in perpetuating the trouble he is presumed to allay. The possibility of official wrongdoing does not grow out of the fact that the community is vicious. A community is not corrupt because its public officers are venal; nor is dishonesty a partisan trait. Honesty in the public service should be made and could be made a matter of party pride. There is no good reason why a respectable party should not discipline such of its representatives as happen to develope corrupt tendencies in official life. There has been no regulating hand to whip or guide the wrongdoer into the straight path of honesty. Men, once they are elected to office, apparently cease to concern their party, and are permitted to drift as their inclinations lead. It was nobody's business that a Legislature "stood up" an insurance compact. That a Republican or Democratic office holder "dragged a sack" from this or that corporation never has seemed to be a party affair in this State. And yet a party could render a community no higher service than this of insuring the honesty of its representatives. No factor in the community is in a better position to demand this insurance against legislative and official larceny, than the institutions which suffer most from its frequency. It has always been our contention that the corporations were most interested in securing an honest government. Such a happy condition they may materially contribute to secure, and for the common good it is to be hoped they may so direct their future energies.

THE TRIUMPH OF TAMMANY.

It is probable that by most American citizens who hope for the evolution of a good system of municipal government in the United States, the result of the municipal election in the new city of New York was received as a grave disappointment. To many it seemed, doubtless, that a great plurality, almost a majority, of the citizens of the second city of the world had deliberately confided the welfare of their city to the hands of a political organization whose name has long been a synonym for corrupt methods in politics. If it were true that the people of New York have emphatically expressed their preference for the methods of Tweed, the result would go far to justify the political pessimism of those citizens who profess to believe that universal suffrage is a foundation too unstable to sustain a structure of good government for a great city. But there is good reason for believing that no such meaning can be read in the choice of a Tammany man to be the first Mayor of the great city.

The movement in support of Henry George collapsed immediately on the death of its leader, and his followers distributed themselves among the supporters of the other candidates, in what proportion cannot be known. This left the voters of New York to choose as their Mayor one of three men. The avowed enemies of Tammany were arrayed in in two camps, more hostile to each other than to the common enemy. Senator Platt, the undoubted "boss" of the Republican party in his state, put forward General Tracy. A great body of independent citizens, principally Republicans who objected to the machine rule of Senator Platt, nominated Seth Low as an exponent of the principal of non-partisanship in municipal affairs. As between Mr. Low and General Tracy, personally, there was probably little to choose. Both are honest men and good citizens, and, except in the point of obedience to a "machine" or a "boss," as a matter of party duty, which General Tracy recognized and Mr. Low repudiated, there was probably very little difference in their ideas of what constituted a good government for their city. Both believed it to be the right and the duty of a majority to compel a minority to be good according to the pattern of goodness approved by the majority, and such legislation as the Raines law would have been enforced by either of them, if successful, as stringently as Dr. Parkhurst himself could desire.

Against these two candidates Tammany put forth a rather obscure man named Van Wyck, who had nothing whatever to say for himself during the whole course of the exciting canvass. He was the personal nominee of Mr. Croker as certainly as General Tracy was the pawn of Senator Platt. He had neither the reputation of Tracy as a public man nor the somewhat offensive attitude of Mr. Low as a superior person. But he stood on a platform which appealed strongly to a constituency which has been long accustomed to be governed as a subject province by the Legislature at Albany. It was a platform which, in many respects, was more closely in accord with American principles than the platform of his opponents. It resented the interference of the Legislature with the right of the city to conduct its own municipal affairs, and it denied the right of the sermon-loving majority in the State to impose the torments of Sunday thirst on the beer-loving majority of the city. It pointed out the great pecuniary cost of a "reform" government and its futility except in the matter of street cleaning—a success due solely to the character of Colonel Waring and the able men whom he chose as his subordinates. There was no Bryanism in the platform, and the Tammany movement was as strictly limited to questions of municipal management as was that of Mr. Low's supporters. The Democrats who deserted Mr. Bryan and refused to stand on the Chicago platform last year found ample room on the Tammany platform this year, and most of them stood there.

Senator Platt was much more deeply concerned to punish the indepence and irregularity of Mr. Low and his followers than he was to provide a competent and honest government for the city, and Mr. Low stood for the continuance of a system which has come to be regarded as odious and tyrannical by thousands of good citizens. It is not to be wondered at, then, that Mr. Van Wyck carried every borough of the great city and came close to a majority of all the votes cast, and this without a single newspaper supporting his candidacy.

But there is no reason in this result for despair on the part of those who are hoping and working for better government in our great cities. Corruption has not won more than honesty. It does not mean that the people of New York have deliberately opened the door to another Tweed, or that the practices of the days before the Lexow revelations are to be resumed. It means that the people believe that even Tammany can improve with the times, and that they prefer to take their chances of securing a fair measure of justice and public comfort under the rule of Croker rather than to be exploited for the benefit of the political fortunes of Platt. In the days of its unchallenged supremacy Tammany was never so bad as it was painted, and the citizens of New York were never called on to submit to the many annoyances and neglects which the patient people of San Francisco endure uncomplainingly because they have never known anything better.

HOW SAN FRANCISCO LIVES

V.

A Chapter on the Food Fishes of Pacific Coast Waters.

If a convulsion of nature destroyed all the cattle and sheep and hogs on the Pacific slope, there would be no fear of famine, as long as people had access to the sea. The relative quality of the Atlantic and Pacific food fish may be a matter of debate, but there can be no question as to the quantity and variety of our fish supply, as Dr. Jordan, the greatest ichthyologist of the age, will certify, and as anyone can convince himself by visiting the great wholesale fish market at the foot of Broadway at five o'clock in the morning. Ever since the settlement of New England, thousands of people have earned their living by fishing the waters which reach the coast from Cape Cod to Cape Race, but we ask no odds of them.

At the time of the American occupation, who said fish meant salmon, and to this day the rich pink or yellow-fleshed fish still occupies the first place on San Francisco's table. The retail fish-dealers say that they sell more salmon than any other fish. They charge from 12½ to 25 cents per pound, according to season and grade. But the wholesale dealers are content with 10 to 12½ cents for the Sacramento salmon, and 8 cents for the inferior fish, which are brought down from Seattle. On the Columbia, the fisherman rarely get over 5 cents for their average catch. In Alaska, where the salmon pack does not fall far short of fifty million pounds a year, the par value of a salmon fresh out of the Arctic waters is a cent a pound, and the fishermen get as much of a premium as the canners will allow. No food contains more nutriment than salmon; it is especially rich in fat, but it is cloying, and people should not eat it oftener than twice, or at most, three times a week. Consumed in moderation, there is no more toothsome dish than a broiled salmon steak, or a boiled salmon with shrimp sauce.

In the East salmon is a luxury that is rarely sold for less than 50 cents a pound, and is only in the market in the spring and early summer. The favorite fish dishes at New York are bluefish, mackerel, smelts, sheepshead, and the variety of fresh water fish known as pan fish. We have no real cod here; the fish sold under that name in the markets is a poor relation. The true gadus does not swim south of Cape Flattery. We have no bluefish at all, though they abound on the coast of Africa and Asia. The mackerel we have, though it is not as abundant in our waters as it is on the Atlantic Coast, or on the coast of England, where the Sunday laws are suspended to permit the fishermen to cry their mackerel on the Lord's day. It is a coarse fish, better suited for whales and porpoises than men. This remark only applies to the common scomber; the aristocrat of the family, the Spanish mackerel, or bonito, makes a dish for the gods.

Of smelts we have several varieties. The true osmerus, which is so highly prized in the East, is sold here under the name of the silver smelt, and is delicious with sauce tartare. Our California smelt, which is an inferior fish, is an atherinopsis, and the breed has been crossed so that it embraces a number of other fishes which are classed as smelts, and constitute the staple boarding-house fish dish. French epicures think highly of the eperlan, as they call the osmerus, and it occupies a favorable place at grand dinners.

Here it is odds that the fish course at small hotels will be California smelt or rock fish. These last comprise many kinds of fish, of many sizes and colors, among them are sea bass; but they are generally classed by the fish sharks as scorpenido, or sebastes, or sculpins. They are a good, honest fish, though they run too much to head. The wholesale dealers class them with smelts and herring, and sell them at 5 and 6 cents per pound. They are so abundant off the Farallones that the saying is that if all the fishermen on the coast filled all the fishing boats on the coast with rock fish on Sunday, there would not be one the less on Monday.

Our choice fish, as everyone knows, is the pompano—a first cousin of the pompino of the Mediterranean and the Gulf of Mexico, and much smaller in size. The supply of this fine fish is variable; sometimes it is very scarce, and the retail dealers ask $1 a pound, then again it is reasonably plentiful and can be bought for a quarter. There is nothing in the Eastern waters which surpasses the pompano in flavor.

Scarcely second to the pompano when it is in good fettle is the barracuda — the long thin fish which dashes through the watter like a streak of lightning. This is the sphryrena of European waters; its praises are celebrated by Athenians under another name.

The choicest of the Eastern fish is the shad, which, during its six weeks' season, is eaten at least once a day by New Yorkers. The shad was planted in our bay some twelve years ago, and has become fairly plentiful. In flavor, it is inferior to the Eastern fish, though it is not to be disdained. We have not yet risen to the height of the planked shad, but we have learned to eat shad roe, which is the choice delicacy at a Newport breakfast. Ten years ago our fishmongers threw the roes away, when they did not present them as a gift to an Eastern customer. It is with the shad as with the Eastern oyster — it has not yet adjusted itself to our waters, but that will come.

Of the large family of pleuronectida, we have several varieties, which sell in the market under the name of sole, turbot, and flounder. They are cheap—5 or 6 cents a pound is the average wholesale price. Our restaurants serve a filet de sole, which is excellent eating, though not equal to the sole a la normande, or the sole en matelotte that the traveler has for breakfast on both sides of the British channel, nor the turbot, which follows the turtle soup on the alderman's table in London. There is one comfort — our flat fishes are to the flat fishes of British and French waters as the pebbles of the sea are to abalone shells.

They, with the halibut of the Alaskan plateau, could support the life of the whole American people without other food. What effect such a diet, with the excess of phosphorous it contains, would have on the health, the constitution, and the morals of consumers, is another question. The peculiar instincts of the inhabitants of Cape Cod and Nantucket have been noticed by all travelers.

JOHN BONNER.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

It cannot again be said that the heavy guns which protect the approaches to the harbor of the Golden Gate are not being utilized. At Camp Morgan five batteries of the Third Artillery are entrenched, and each day for weeks past the men have been drilling with the big cannon. There is an immense amount to be learned about the handling of these modern implements of destruction, and it is only by repeated practice in manuvering, loading and aiming them, that this important knowledge can be obtained. The extraordinary course of the War Department in exiling the artillery to Angel Island where there are no big guns, and locating the infantry at the Presidio which is close beside the new works necessitates the location of a camp upon the bluffs commanding Baker's beach. A picturesque situation is that of Camp Morgan on the side of the hill above the water, in the midst of a thick grove of eucalyptus trees. It is laid out according to the latest theories. There are five streets, upon which the tents open—one for every battery, and at the lower end of each is a large awning tent which serves as dining room and assembly room for the men. Here is the kitchen, also, which is a source of particular interest several times a day. Morning and night the men cluster around the big camp fire, and there in the glow of the huge logs, spend the hours when off duty. You wonder how they ever dragged these great beams up the steep hill, but there is no lack of power and energy in the hundreds of willing hands and arms at the camp. The views on page 8 afford an interesting idea of the life at Camp Morgan—under Colonel M. B. Miller.

***

The form of intelligence which a political "boss" developes in making combinations to control supervisors, is really the same as that which a great merchant exhibits in creating a "trust." It is merely the business of persuading certain industries of a community of interests to be subserved by association, and is as effective in one direction as in another. The fact is beautifully exemplified is the case of Christopher A. Buckley, for many years the "boss" of San Francisco. Never was there a more successful manipulator than Chris., who, though blind, handled his forces with the greatest acumen. He swayed the destinies of San Francisco for years, and if he had continued to practise moderation his lease of power would undoubtedly have been longer. But when the gray-stone was erected over his political remains, Mr. Buckley hied himself to the vineyard at Livermore, which he had acquired in the heyday of his career, and made up his mind to pass the rest of his days a peaceful agriculturist. Now Livermore valley is one of the greatest vineyard regions of the State and a vast amount of excellent wine is produced there. Never had there been much association among the growers, however, and the dealers were in the habit of pitting one against the other by way of reducing prices. As soon as the ex-Boss realized the condition of affairs, he put forth all his cleverness to forming a combination among them. The various winemakers were separately approached and the result is an association thoroughly organized, the members of which are obtaining for their product the best price going. Chris, himself, has made considerable profit out of its operations and has certainly won the respect of the California Wine Association, which goes to show that there is in the business world an outlet for that form of talent which in politics results in plunder and mis-government,

***

Though Judge Wallace, of the Superior Court, has been engaged administering justice more years than any other man in the State, never until last week in the case of murder Knott has he had to pronounce the death sentence. In order to familiarize himself with the verbal formulas used in extreme cases, he decided to consult the records, and repaired to the office of the District Attorney. Together with Mr. Barnes he examined into the sentences of bye-gone jurists, and slowly prepared a concise formula of condemnation. When he came to the words, "And may God have mercy on your soul," with which from time immemorial judges have wound up the death sentence, he stopped. "Is there any judicial basis, Mr. Barnes, for this invocation of the Almighty," he asked. "There is no judicial reason, Judge, save that of precedence." "That's very true," said Wallace, "but while I respect precedent as much as any man—why interfere with the Almighty in such a matter; besides, Mr. Barnes," continued the Judge, whose differences with the Appellate's Court are well known, "I am afraid it might be construed by the Supreme Court as another invitation to reverse the sentence on the ground of want of jurisdiction by Department Six."

Though the silver question ought to have disappeared from politics, certain local interests have a purpose in keeping it alive. I am told there is being organized a Republican Silver party, which proposes to gather under its banner all the silver sentiment of California, and to utilize it for the accomplishment of its own designs. The disaffected, few of whom are honest, are for silver, and the leaders of the new movement imagine there are enough of them to make a force which they will use to dictate to the Democracy. A complete realization of the entire project will be gathered from the fact that "Lane" for Governor is the watch word of the combination. The great leg-pulling match of last campaign, in which certain dividends of the Utica proclaimed the glory of white metal and incidentally benefitted its exponents, is not yet forgotten, and the impressarios are determined to give the same bank account another chance next Winter. It is a clever scheme and undoubtedly will be profitable if Mr. Lane is as easy of beguilment as before. Perhaps he has grown tired of being financier of the white metal cause. If he has not, his friends are to be congratulated on his patience.

***

Talk over the disbandment of the Liquor Dealers Association has not yet ended. Various theories are propounded to account for the sudden retirement of the organization. I am inclined to think it was due to the high licence ideas of the Supervisors. When the ffrst announcement of increased tribute came the retail liquor dealers applied at once to the wholesalers for assistance, suggesting that as they had thus far made politics for the trade they should now sustain the brunt of the situation. Of course, the high licence idea is only an artistic project to exact a little coin from the whisky insterest. With an organization in full view, an incursion was possible, but with the band scattered, it will be hard to get at any one. At all events, the wholesalers have no intention of paying for the immunity of the other fellows—hence the latest phase of the situation.

***

The Winter Exhibition of the Art Association opens next Thursday evening with the usual reception. I am told to expect several good pictures, and that there are signs of substantial progress. The exhibitions of the Association are the landmarks in the life of the local art colony and are also of considerable interest to the community. There are now almost as many young artists in town as professional men. The classes at the Institute are full, morning, afternoon and night, and there is constant application for vacancies in the art departments of the dailies. Apropos of art, I hear that Alexander Harrison is to come out to the coast, and will be with us in the early future, for a week or more.

***

The first exhibition of the Sketch Club in it's new home on Sutter street, has attracted to the organization more attention than it ever obtained in its old home on Montgomery street. On the walls are some very clever landscapes and portraits, a fleeting impression of which may be gathered from the photograph below. Notable among the exhibits are portraits by Mrs. Sleeth, president of the club, and by Miss Helen Hyde who has obtained some exceedingly clever effects. Miss Vesaria has some charming bits of color, showing sunset effects on the Tamalpais marshes. Mrs. Wheelan is to be congratulated on a set of Chinese pictures full of individuality and brightness. Certain colored prints by Miss Hyde, done by a process of her own, have attracted considerable attention. They are Japanesque in style, and she has sold quite a number of them. Altogether it is a very attractive show and the club is to be congratulated.

***

When the late Charles A. Dana visited the Vatican during his last trip to Europe he had audience with the pope and spent an hour capping Italian verses and quoting alternate lines from the "Inferno." Soon after he returned he attended a prize fight one evening after besting his son at a post-prandial game of billiards. This very year he has added Russian to his list of languages, grown a new rose and written a monograph on the proper culture of mushrooms. In his hours of repose he has collated his experience in the civil war as "Lincoln's reporter," for McClure's magazine, which thus becames the lucky heritor of one of the greatest books of the century.

***

The theatrical situation in San Francisco, so far as it is affected by the dealings and intentions of Messrs. Frohman and Hayman, engages renewed interest by the fact that the

THE SKETCH CLUB'S PICTURE EXHIBITION

Macdonough estate, as proprietor of the California theatre, has commenced a suit in New York against the Hayman Theatrical Company for damages amounting to $105,000, alleged to have been sustained by the failure of Hayman to maintain the theatre and "keep it always open and in use as a first-class theatre," in accordance with the terms of a lease granted to his company for ten years from April, 1889, in consideration of an annual rental of $13,200. The theatrical combination, which has been in chief control of the dramatic affairs of this city, has for some years past kept the doors of the California theatre closed to serve their own ends, greatly to the injury not only of the connected hotel, owned by the same proprietors, but also of many neighboring places of business. The action of the Macdonough heirs will be closely watched, and if the breach of contract can be established and exemplary damages recovered from the Hayman company, the public in general will doubtless be gratified, especially those amongst them who benefit by the theatre being kept in operation.

***

The intentions of Al Hayman are unknown to his associates. Even Mr. Bouvier is not informed of the fate impending. The question, will the Baldwin close, can be answered now in the negative. It is certain, Hayman or no, that that theatre will continue to invite patronage. If the shows of the Frohmans are not vouchsafed, we shall at least have other performances to beguile our evenings. If the cost of transportion is the reason for denying us Drew, Crane and other celebreties—would it not be a profitable undertaking to organize a good stock company at the Baldwin and produce in San Francisco the plays that Frohman puts on in New York? Then, we should have a chance to see the new shows as soon as our Atlantic neighbors. Drawing room comedies and tragedies, such as Pinero and Henry Arthur Jones and the group of American playwrights write, are not costly to produce, and, given a competent force of actors and actresses, this community would prove itself as generous in its support as it has recently been niggardly. It is no use bringing to San Francisco second-rate plays and third-rate talent, and insisting on first-rate prices. On the other hand, the enormous success of the Orpheum demonstrates what may be achieved by a generous programme.

***

The Gladys Wallis-Frawley controversy is rather more amusing for the community than for the principals, assuming that notoriety is unwelcome to them. The form in which both succeed in achieving it is not especially creditable and one cannot but think how little the other would have had to say had either followed the golden rule of silence. Unless some distinction is to be gained, it is safest never to be interviewed, and while the sorrows of Miss Wallis and the tribulations of Mr. Frawley have made a funny chapter, it is a pity they so sinned against discretion as to make public their opinions. We are all interested in stage folk, especially in so pretty a young woman as Miss Wallis, and we all appreciate the energy and persistence of Mr. Frawley, but really no one is the better for knowing that this trouble has had a career, or that the contestants ever before exchanged blows.

***

The fate of the Mardi Gras ball hangs in the balance. Shall it be—or not?—that is the question, and the members of the Art Association are to settle it by ballot. Certain of the directors oppose the idea, because masked balls are not profitable—that is, there have been no dollars in the treasury consequent upon past Mardi Gras entertainments. Neither has there been any loss. Now economists who believe energy wasted that does not show an immediate profit declare the association is really out of pocket by these affairs. The wise point out, however, that the prominence conferred on the institution by past shows more than counteracts the loss of energy. In other words, a Mardi Gras ball is an excellent advertisement, and serves to keep the association before its patrons and the community. Besides, it adds something of color and variety to the life of San Francisco.

***

The vicissitudes of fortune are entertainingly illustrated in the case of ex-Railroad Commissioner Abbott who has just sold out an interest in the Santa Rosalie mine for over one hundred thousand dollars, to go into banking in the State of Sonora. Four years ago Mr. Abbott was penniless. He had been a banker in Sacramento—he is a brother-in-law of N. D. Rideout by the way—became involved in speculations that the panic of '93 made misfortunes, and went to Mexico in the condition known as "broke." He managed to obtain an interest in the Santa Rosalie, the wealth of which he surmised, and he it was who interested John Daggett in the property, which has made both rich. Mr. Abbott remained in Mexico as superintendent of the mine and, being an active business man, took advantage of his opportunities. He realized that the country required capital for its development, and from President Diaz obtained a concession to organize a national bank for the State of Sonora, with power to issue three dollars in currency for every dollar in coin in his vaults. Such a privilege affords Mr. Abbott a great opportunity and doubtless he will become the magnate of that environment. He found no difficulty in disposing of his Santa Rosalie stock, 20,000 shares of which were taken up here in two days.

***

The Examiner is hardly a reliable guide in personal matters affecting the British aristocracy, and I should opine that its Debrett or Burke and its gallery of celebrities are badly in need of renovation. Not very long ago it concocted a sensational story of the intended visit to San Francisco of the notorious Marquis of Ailesbury, who has been in his grave for the last three years, prompted thereto by the fact that the present holder of the title, an entirely different kind of person, had been visiting the East. The late Marquis cherished a standing grudge against his Maker that he had not been born a costermonger, and, if I remember

AMBROSE BIERCE
Who has taken to writing Fables in place of "Prattle"

rightly, displayed but one piece of good taste in his short but rapid existence, in that he saved his order the disgrace of taking his seat among the members of the House of Lords. In last Sunday's supplement a spicy review of Mrs. Langtry's amours was embellished with illustrations purporting to be portraits of her victims, and included therein, besides her much-to-be-pitied dead husband, was a representation, pictorial and otherwise, of the second Sir Robert Peel, the father of the present Sir Robert, who not very long ago was under attachment to the Jersey Lily. Scandal is never edifying, but it is abominable when it is served up to beguile ignorant readers and applied to wrong individuals whether living or dead.

***

Mr. Gavigan, who is cutting such a figure throughout the charter controversy, is the same person who was selected by Buckley a decade ago to collect delinquent taxes. Immediately upon his appointment and before he had qualified, Gavigan entered into negotiations with a big shipping firm here which was in arrears for many thousands of dollars in taxes; without consultation or authorization, he compromised this account, and instead of turning the coin into the city treasury he took a flat, went in for revelry and for weeks was lost to the world. He indulged in champagne baths and various other extravagances, all of which coming to the ears of Mayor Pond, caused an inquiry to be instituted. Gavigan was arrested; was in a bad predicament, but was assisted in making good the defalcation by a certain notorious woman whose protege he was. The amount made good was about $10,000. He then departed for Mexico to avoid further complications, remained there sometime, picked up a medical diploma in a Southern State, then returned to San Francisco and entered into practice as a dipsomaniac expert. He had a species of modified Keeley cure, which he said was the "greatest yet." More recently Mr. Gavigan resumed law practice uniting the two professions with a subtle ability, being an attorney in the morning and a physician in the afternoon. The last public appearance of Dr. Gavigan was in connection with a bill to appoint a sociological expert, which he had very cleverly lobbied through the Legislature. The provisions of the measure were so drawn as to compel the appointment of Mr. Gavigan to the office created, for they exacted conditions which he alone could meet. Ingenious, yes, but the question of honesty is another issue. The scheme was killed by the press, and vetoed by the Governor. I am not in the habit of resuscitating the record of private citizens, but Mr. Gavigan makes himself unpleasantly conspicuous in a bad connection. His cause is as honorable as his career.

THE GUNBOAT "MARION," THE NEW TRAINING-SHIP OF THE NAVAL RESERVE
Taber, photo

***

So the Naval Reserve is to have a real war ship to cruise around in. The Navy Department has turned over for its exclusive use and advantage the "Marion," and that good old tub will enter upon a new sphere of usefulness in her dotage. It is something for the Reserveto have an opportunity of learning seamanship on a veritable vessel. For some time Captain Turner and his men have been drilling on the old monitor Camanche, and in spite of the obsolete character of her fittinge and furniture some excellent work has been done thereon. The force proved itself alive to its chances, however scanty, and here is the reward of enthusiasm.

***

The manner in which our wealthy men are subscribing to the Wilmerding School Fund is most creditable to their generosity. It will be remembered that the University Regents decided to locate the institution provided for in the will of the capitalist in San Francisco, provided a site was given free by the city. The location selected is in the Potrero, and is appraised at $16,000. So it now behovoes the collection of that amount. Mayor Phelan has taken hold of the canvass, and has personally subscribed $3000; Claus Spreckels is down for a similar sum and John Center and A. B. McCreary have given donations of $1000 each. The manner in which the Mayor throws himself into all sorts of philanthropic schemes testifies to a rare endowment of public spirit and generosity. No one has ever displayed such a fine spirit of giving, and the talent deserves encouragement and recognition.

***

If Major General Nelson A. Miles and Secretary Alger have really fallen out as the telegrams indicate, the fact may interfere with the realization of the former's ambition. He wants to attain the role of Lieutenant General, and all his energies are bent to that end. During the absence in the West of the Secretary of War, Miles has officiated as head of the Department, and it looks as though he had exceeded his powers in announcing the transfer of the First Regiment to Fort Logan, returning the Seventh to San Francisco. This especial arrangement was not what the Army anticipated, inasmuch as one regiment had been at Vancouver nearly fourteen years, and in the new distribution of places it should have had the best post. It may be, however, that reports of divergences in this direction are without foundation and that the delay has been occasioned by differences of opinion as to the transportation question. It is hinted that alteration in the present distribution of the infantry and artillery regiments is imminent, which will mean the return of the former to Mare Island.

***

Public anxiety regarding the crews of the whaling vessels which have been caught in the ice-pack off Point Barrow has been intensified during the past few days, and the Government has been appealed to for assistance in providing a relief ship. There would seem to be no doubt whatever that the eight vessels, the names of which were given in our last issue, will be totally lost, and the plans will therefore be confined to rescuing the crews, numbering some 400 men, from starvation and other ills during the winter. Experienced men seem to be satisfied that when the ice closed in upon them they will have abandoned their ships, and, getting their provisions together, will have made for St. Michaels, which would mean a journey of about 1200 miles. At the same time there is known to be a certain quantity of stores at the Point Barrow and Hershel Island depots, which would be placed at their disposal. At the time of writing no definite steps have been taken by the Government to detail a ship for the relief expedition, but the cutter Bear, commanded by Captain Tuttle, is not unlikely to be commissioned for the service, and the steam whaler Thrasher, now at this port, has also been suggested as suitable and available for the purpose. The local Chamber of Commerce

THE REVENUE CUTTER "BEAR"
Which is to be sent to the relief of the imprisoned whalers has telegraphed a petition to the President urging the matter on his attention. The Call and Examiner have both submitted substantial offers of pecuniary assistance and have been active in creating public interest in the schemes for relief. Newspaper rivalry has been instrumental in getting the matter pushed forward and the public have been not a little amused to watch the efforts of the Examiner to steal the Call's thunder. The latter was unquestionably foremost in drawing attention to the disastrous position of the whalers and in coming forward with offers of assistance, as well as in directing its correspondents to place themselves in communication with the authorities at Washington.
Taber, photo

***

The majority of the sugar-planters of Hawaii have refused to renew the agreement which has been in existence for the past five years between themselves and Mr. Spreckels, under which their crops were shipped to the refinery in this city. Arrangements have been made for the delivery of a large portion of the current season's crop to refineries in the East and to the new concern to be established at Port Costa. It is estimated that some eighty thousand tons will go forward by sailing ships to New York. The Sugar Trust has likewise been shut out of the deal, the local federation of planters in the islands finding that they have been able to make better terms for their produce in the open market.

***

All the information that comes to hand confirms the expectation that there will be an enormous rush to the Yukon district this coming spring from all parts of the globe. Under these circumstances it is satisfactory to know that the Canadian Government is sparing no effort to simplify the means of access to the country, so far as lies in its power. The extensive failure of so many adventurers to accomplish the journey to Dawson City by water this autumn is not unlikely to lead to a preference for the land route, and numbers of those who have returned here from St. Michaels and the lower river points intend renewing their attempts to get into the country early in the year by land. Opinions seem to be divided as to the best route, but that via Fort Wrangel and the Stickeen River is at present very favorably considered. As an instance of the vast rush that may be looked for, the Canadian authorities state their information shows that 50,000 people will probably migrate to the northwest from Australia alone. Should the gold returns from the Klondyke district in the early summer of next year show that the increased work, which has been done since the first large clean up was made this year, has resulted in a correspondingly greater output of treasure, the excitement will certainly be renewed with more force than ever, and the extensive immigration already looked for will probably be exceeded. Many experienced persons are disposed to believe that things will take this course. It is sincerely to be hoped that the adventurers now contemplating the journey to Alaska in the near future will have been forewarned by the many failures and hardships which those going this year have met with, and take all proper precautions to minimize their risks as far as possible. News from Dawson has been somewhat scarce recently, and the public are at present in suspense as to the residents being sufficiently provided with food and other necessaries for the winter. Within the last few days Mr. C. R. Hosmer, general manager of the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company, has been in this city and has stated that there will be a telegraph line built early next year from Ashcroft to Dawson, a distance of 1,400 miles, and following that, in all probability, connected lines will be constructed to Juneau and other Alaskan points. Mr. Hosmer pointed out that the Ashcroft-Dawson line will follow the same route that was traversed by the telegraph thirty years ago, when it was intended to connect, by means of a cable line through Behring Sea, with a land line on the Siberian coast, but the successful laying of the Atlantic cable caused the work to be dropped.

***

The preliminary work of the representatives of the United States, Russia, and Japan, looking to the protection of the seal herds, would seem to have been completed both expeditiously and harmoniously, and it only remains for their respective governments to approve their conclusions and ratify the agreement signed by the respective commissioners. In the meantime the references between the United States and Great Britain, the latter covering the Canadian interest, will be kept in progress, and Professor Thompson, the British expert, is at present in this country with the object of facilitating the adjustment of the present differences. A suggestion has been made that the views of the British government would be met by a purchase of the rights of Canada in respect of pelagic sealing. Of course, before anything of the kind could be done, it would be necessary for the lawyers and naturalists of both countries to come to a clear understanding as to what the Canadian interests really are in the premises. There would seem to be a wide divergence of opinions at present, and if the naturalists who represent the United States are correct in their judgment, the seal herds will hardly remain in existence long enough to admit of definite conclusions being arrived at, unless the rate of progression is greatly accelerated.

***

A Jewish colonization experiment that will, no doubt, be watched with interest is about to be started in Nevada. The neighborhood of Wellington, in Lyon County, has been selected as the locality for the new colony and the pioneer colonists consist of twenty-six families, nearly all of whom have already left this city for the land of promise. This is situated in a valley about 22 miles from Virginia and 48 from Carson, the settlement of 5,300 acres having been secured by purchase on easy terms at the rate of $5 an acre from Morris Cohn, a well-to-do Hebrew residing at Carson, who is desirous of helping his deserving co-religionists. Nearly half the tract is already fenced in, 500 acres being laid with alfalfa and a further 1000 acres cleared for cultivation. A small orchard is already planted out and the land generally is said to be well suited to the growing of grain. A wagon road runs from Carson to the village of Wellington, where the colonists have in the meantime secured accomodation pending the erection of homes for themselves, towards which Mr. Cohn has provided a liberal supply of lumber. The colony is to be reserved for those of Hebrew birth, and it is expected that in course of time it will receive additions to its present number, some of whom have had a farming experience in Russia, Canada and in Dakota and California.

***

When doctors disagree—who shall decide? It not a question of decision now, but of peacemaking. It seems there is the devil to pay among the medicos all over the Hirschfelder tuberculin and Dr. D'Evelyn's equisine, both of which were announced in the papers before being made known to the profession. This is a breach of the ethics of science and medicine, and has been partially resented by the expulsion of Dr. D'Evelyn from the County Medical Society. But there is rather more in the Hirschfelder controversy than lymph. It is the alignment of the Cooper College and its connections against the New College of Physicians and Surgeons and the Toland College, which is connected with the University of California. The Cooper organization, commanded by Dr. Lane has to make head against considerable rivalry, and being a private affair, requires to be kept before the public. Now it is a very glorious thing to have a member of one's faculty discover a "sure enough" cure for consumption, and the opportunity for its exploitation in a sensational daily is certainly to be taken advantage of. The proceeding may not be ethical, but it's business. The County Medical Society would like to enter this controversy and bar Hirschfelder as it has D'Evelyn, but the latter does not happen to be a member, so that condemnation is impossible.

***

To add to the gaiety of the profession, rumors about a clash between Dr. Lane and Dr. Kenyon in the presence of Dr. Heath, the English specialist, are rife. It seems the president of Cooper College and the surgeon of St. Luke's do not love one another. Rivalries of various kinds are at the bottom of this enmity—fights for the presidency of the several medical societies, and other honors trifling to the lay mind. Dr. Kenyon was invited to hear Professor Heath lecture and went. Dr. Lane saw him and assured him he was not welcome, that he had disgraced his alma mater and sundry other things which were really unnecessary and rather out of place. The full details of the unpleasantness are in the Pacific Medical Journal, the staff of which is composed of members of the new College of Physicians and Surgeons. Of course there will be reprisals and retorts in other medical mediums, and the chasms which divide the profession will grow into abysses. Really, it is very sad our doctors should develop so much energy over so small an affair. The only possible good that may result is that the community may learn who not to call in when ill.

BOSWELL JR.

FICKERT CARL MURPHY

Three players whose mastery of their positions promises to assist in making the Stanford team invincible

Photos by Thors

A CONSULAR SUGGESTION

Proposed Asiatic-Pacific Commercial Museum at San Francisco.

Included in the Consular Reports for October is a paper by John Barrett, Minister Resident and Consul General for Siam, in which he suggests the establishment of an Asiatic commercial museum or bureau in San Francisco with the view of aiding the development of American trade with the Orient. Such an institution would serve the same purpose with regard to the Asian Pacific seaboard that the Philadelphia museum does towards the trade of this country with South America. The immense field that is open in the direction referred to is little realized by our mercantile and manufacturing houses, engaged in the import and export trade, but if the wide range from the Straits Settlements to Siberia be taken into consideration it will be found to cover fully 4,000 miles of coast line and a total population of 500,000,000, with an existing foreign trade representing $1,000,000,000—a very small portion of which is done with the United States.

San Francisco would seem to be the natural location for such a museum, to which Mr. Barrett points out all the leading cities of the Pacific Slope from Seattle to San Diego, including inland commercial centres, should be induced to lend their assistance, while Eastern States and cities would, no doubt, also be willing to co-operate, in return for the benefits to be derived from its establishment. Exhibits, samples and general commercial data would be furnished by voluntary contribution to a large extent, but, at all events, the appropriation of a few hundred dollars for the necessary work to be done in that connection at each foreign port would procure the necessary material wherewith to equip the museum at the outset.

As regards the basis upon which an undertaking of the kind should be founded and maintained, the plan adopted at Philadelphia would afford sufficient example. There the city government gives its direct support, and that would seem to be the proper course to follow here. Probably Mr. Barrett's calculation of $25,000 for the initial cost, and an annual expenditure of $15,000, would meet all requirements. United States ministers and consuls throughout the region referred to would willingly lend their assistance, and the very fact of such an institution being in existence would greatly extend their opportunities of serving the interests of American commerce. Every commercial man of any standing in import and export circles should peruse the ministers's paper, and now that the business community of San Francisco is bestirring itself to increase the trade of the port the excellent suggestion which he makes should not be allowed to prove unfruitful.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA FOOTBALL TEAM

RONDEAU.

BY LOUIS A. ROBERTSON

I love thee still, there's not a day
That drags it's dreary length away,
From dark December into June,
Through winter night or summer noon,
But unto thee my fancies stray.

Poor heralds of my heart are they,
Who would to thee my love convey,
And woo thee with the wearying tune,
I love thee still.

Ah, but to feel thy pulses play,
And once again my head to lay
On thy white breast. For such a boon
Though thou wert fickle as the moon,
My lips would cling to thee and say
I love thee still

SONNET.

BY ROBERT PORTER

Unnumbered years from now when all our pride
And pomp, tears, wisdom, pain are lost to thought
And buried eons deep beneath the tide
Of black oblivion, when in all the wide
Domain of things no echo shall be caught
Of glorious deeds we deem undying naught
Of all the names that we have deified,
Or any greatest thing our hands have wrought;
Some poet musing then upon the dear
Delights that grace his love, shall sudden find
New ecstacy in song, new rapture sweep
Across his soul. For then in accents clear
He'll tune the sonnet to her praise, and bind
Love once again in song's most perfect lays.

THE LOCAL STAFF OF THE "CHRONICLE" AT WORK

THE COST OF A DAILY

Facts and Figures Showing the Expense of Producing a Newspaper.

When a gentleman possesses several million dollars, and is embarassed by the development of his income, he casts around for some expensive enjoyment which will curb its growth. If his inclination lies in the direction of society or travel, doubtless he will purchase a steam yacht and spend fifty to one hundred thousand a year in its maintenance. If in his heart he cherishes a literary aspiration, he may conclude to start a daily paper. After that he will have no further need to worry over surplus investments. Molding public opinion or expressing private impressions every morning or afternoon is about as expensive a luxury as any man can enjoy. The enormous cost of a journalistic enterprise is seldom realized save by a few officials of the business office. The manager knows—maybe the editor is told—the cashier finds out. The reporters surmise vaguely, erroneously, and the subscribers take the paper as a matter of course.

The tightly-rolled newspaper which is delivered on your doorstep every morning has cost an immense amount of labor and several thousand dollars. A batallion of men has been engaged during the twenty hours preceding in gathering and preparing the material, a regiment in mechanical production, and a company in distributing the manufactured article throughout the city and State. Think of the array of occupations—distinct professions, by the way—there are under a newspaper roof!—editors, critics, reporters, artists, photo-engravers, printers, stereotypers, engineers, pressmen, mail clerks, carriers; then managers and accountants to keep track of the finances, and advertising and subscription solicitors to bring in the revenue which goes to pay their colleagues. In a big gold mine one finds a superintendent, engineers, an assayer, and miners—in a big store, managers, floor-walkers, heads of departments, salesmen, and porters. But a newspaper requires as many officials as a municipality, and not one of its employees makes pretense of being anything but that for which his salary is paid He believes he does his duty to himself and humanity after his share of the big paper is performed. He generally does, too.

That San Francisco suffers from an overabundance of newspapers, just as it is cursed with a superabundance of weeklies, is undeniable. In San Francisco there is scope for but two morning and two evening dailies, and in each field there are three. The evening papers are, it is true, vastly less expensive than the morning press, being less pretentious, but they are more hampered by the absence of a copper coinage here. In spite of efforts to introduce cent prices, few people carry them, and the selling price of the Bulletin, Post and Report remains at five cents, though a carrier will deliver them at 40 cents and 50 cents per month at your home. The great circulations of the New York and Chicago evening journals is gained because of their cheapness, for, while five cents seems an extravagance, no one regards the outlay of a single cent when that sum purchases the latest news and the best entertainment. But for all that our millionaire cannot enjoy the possession of an evening journal at less than eight to twelve thousand per month. Of course, his white paper bills may not be so large as his rivals, and in consequence the monthly expense will be below the lower figures at first. It costs something less than three cents per pound, does this essential material, though the cost goes somewhat on the amount purchased. For instance, the Examiner, Chronicle and Call pay several fractions less. There is one important item fixed. Next the ink, which costs four to six cents a pound, which involves a monthly charge of $30 to $75 per month for an evening paper, and a hundred or two per month for a morning journal. Lead for the stereotypers and composition metal for the linotypes is not a great charge, because the plates are used over and over, but gas and electricity and coal and other necessities for motive power and machinery are all costly items. Thus far I am referring to the material necessities of production. Before this the millionaire must have purchased at least five linotypes, which cost him $3000 each, a press which involves a charge of $20,000 to $40,000, type for advertising, a stereotyping outfit, a dynamo, and all the furniture of a composing-room. In addition, there are editorial rooms to be fitted up, which may be accomplished economically, but there must be a brave show made in the business office, which involves handsome fixtures and desks. It should be remembered, also, that a newspaper must have a big, roomy basement for its press and process outfits, a set of offices for editorial and art rooms, and a business office fronting on the street, all of which can hardly be accomplished for less than $300 per month rent. Here, then, is the institution. We'll assume it has an Associated Press telegraphic franchise, for which it pays $650 per month.

The exigencies of the evening press require the editorial staff to report at 8 in the morning. The linotype operators commence at 8 setting up "fill" matter and copy left out over night. Each operator receives $4 per day of eight hours, and sets four times as much type as he could "stick" by hand composition. Indeed, the introduction of machines has reduced composition bills some 40 per cent—a most substantial saving, by the way. However, type bills average at least $400 per week for a six-page paper, and $600 for a ten-page paper, all of which must be paid out every Saturday. There is also the foreman of the composing-room, an experienced printer, who has $30 to $40 a week, and his two assistants $25 to $30. When the type is all set and the forms made up, they are passed on to the stereotypers, of whom there are four generally, the chief getting $25 to $30, and his assistants $10 to $15, involving say $60 more. The press department, one of the most important in the institution, requires a strong force, and the head man invariably has a good salary—$30 to $40—while his three assistants get between them, $60 more. Nor must we forget the mailing-clerk, who gets $20 or more; his assistants, who have to deal out the papers to the boys and to the carriers; the engineer, who supervises the motive power and the linotype machines, which require constant attention. However, there is the mechanical department.

The editorial department is also a costly luxury of journalism. The proprietor of an evening paper generally acts as managing and news editor—different functions on morndailies. The City Editor, who must be a clever man, commands forty to fifty dollars per week; then there are eight to a dozen reporters averaging from fifteen to thirty dollars each; the Exchange Editor usually reads the telegraphic copy and writes heads—fifteen to twenty dollars; editorial writers draw twenty-five to forty dollars, depending on their merits.

The art department involves quite an expense, though the administration be economical unto niggardliness. The process room costs from $40 to $60 per week, for the service requires the labor of two to four men. Then the artists—there must be two—take $40 more. The Bulletin art room costs at least $100 per week. The literary end of an evening daily—by which I mean the editorial, reportorial and pictorial departments cannot cost less than $350 per week, though $1600 per month is nearer the average.

A BATTERY OF LINOTYPES

Let us descend now into the business office—the manager, he who supervises and directs the work of the advertising men, is paid at least $35 per week—his assistants from $20 to $30. There are two generally. Then a bookkeeper, who officiates as cashier; a clerk to look after subscriptions, say they have $20 per week each; the collector has $15 more, the boys from $3 to $5—there must be half a dozen of these to distribute and receive the papers and drive the wagons. Indeed it is a clever manager who obtains results in this department at $150 per week. These items detailed above are all bare necessaries—they do not include the luxuries—special articles, important contributions or other features the editor may feel like indulging in. However, you may accept it as a fact that it is a good month that consumes less than $10,000.

But after all that is the evening paper. Consider that it costs from $1000 to $2000 daily for the morning dailies. In every department the expenditures are greater—the receipts also. I am sure the editorial department of the Chronicle costs from $600 to $800 a week; the Examiner pays its local staff at least $1000. There are additional reporters, artists, linotype operators, compositors, besides Sunday, society, sporting, dramatic, fraternal, musical and literary editors—all of whom being specialists, command a fair rate of compensation. In fact the morning paper is a vastly expensive engine for the dissemination of news and the moulding of public opinion, and the cost of it easily runs up to fifty and ranges as high as seventy-five thousand dollars per month. You must remember that a big daily must have a Managing Editor, whose salary ranges from $70 to $125 a week; a News Editor who gets $60; a City Editor who may be paid $80, but is sure to have at least $50. There are copy readers who have $25 to $35; special writers from $35 to $50. The three foreman—of the composition, press and stereotyping departments are important men and get at least $40 each. The business manager has from $75 to $125. Then there are telegraphic tolls for the Associated Press, averaging $1000 per month, covering the cost of ordinary news service. In addition the big dailies have personal representatives in Chicago, New York and Washington who supplement with special news elaborating subjects of importance to the coast. The functions of Exchange and Telegraph Editor cannot possibly be compassed by the same man, and one finds a roomful of journalists fixing up telegraphic reports for the linotype operators. This department on the Examiner costs $300 per week. As for the tolls, the service varies, depending on Congress and the interest the community has in the subjects under discussion there. At least, special dispatches cost another thousand per month.

In addition to ordinary expenses one must remember also the special ones. For instance an important "scoop" often involves a considerable expenditure. It is not unusual for a city editor to pay $50 to $100 for an exclusive story to go on the front page with half a dozen "scareheads." A Sunday supplement is not produced by the regular staff, but by extra men. An average of $25 per page is the price paid for freak stories, such as the Sunday editions delight in. Serials and short stories, which are syndicated all over the country, are not expensive—rarely costing more than five or ten dollars per installment. The great men, of course, commaned more money—for instance, the privilege of publishing the latest Kipling tale will cost $20 or $30. Nor must we forget the colored press—the services of 14 men are required to assist in that process, and the cost of the colored ink tops the bills of the evening papers for that commodity. The business office, too, is a mercantile establishment—accountants, collectors, canvassers, must be on hand. Take the Examiner business office—the weekly costs $100; the "display ad" department consumes $110, then there are eleven clerks, averaging at least $18 per week—altogether a banking force, but rendered essential by the exigencies of the work. Then as to paper—I am told the Examiner's bills for that commodity foot up to $28,000 a month—rather an item, by the way.

The illustrations accompanying this article give an impression of the latter day composing-room, with its battery of linotype machines. The second picture represents the local room of the Chronicle, with the reportorial staff engaged in producing copy. The use of typewriters is an innovation—the idea is that this style of copy is more easily edited and more rapidly set up—the profit of machine typesetting depending on the rapidity of the linotype operator. The ordinary journalist requires some time to grow familiar with the usages of a typewriter, but the accomplishment lessens materially the duties of his calling and doubles his rate of verbal production. C.

OSTRICHES AND FEATHERS

Graphic Impressions of a Plucking at the Pasadena Farm.

The production of ostrich feathers is now a California industry. Not content with making wine, and raising apricots and curing raisins, but we are in the feather business—at least the south is and contributing a fair quota to the world's supply. There are now two farms in Southern California—one at Norwalk—established in 1884 by Mr. Cawston—the other at South Pasadena, which seems rather better adapted for the purpose of growth and development. To the Pasadena institution I went the other day to witness a plucking—an inimitable sight by the way. It is a great sandy tract carefully and securely fenced; provided with numerous structures and dwelling houses for the proprietor and his force of assistants. Here two hundred ostriches are gathered within the precincts of a large corral and they constitute a spectacle well worth the trip from Los Angeles.

As you draw near the fence be wary. A dozen huge bodies come plunging towards you rolling from side to side like a ship in a heavy swell, wings full spread to every breeze that blows. As many elastic necks will writhe their way between the fence rails, winding in and out, while the big brown eyes watch eagerly for the anticipated meal of sugar beets and alfalfa. You may estimate most carefully the length of the neck, feeling sure that you may go within such and such a distance and still be out of reach, when presto, the rubbery neck lets itself out like a telescope, and the two-bit cigar which you thought firm between your own teeth is glowing in a mischievous bill. There is a tale of a new spring bonnet that once visited the ostrich farm, arrayed in its new spring garniture of milliner's cherries, and went away denuded, a sadder if not a wiser bonnet.

One might write much about the habits and manners of the ostrich. When about four years old the birds are paired off, if they have not already chosen their own partners for life; they are of an affectionate and loyal nature, however, and there are more love matches among them than marriages of convenience. From that time until the end of their seventy or eighty allotted years, there is only loyalty and devotion; any ostrich husband will fight off a strange hen who comes his way, and only a lonely widowerhood ever induces him to love twice.

"What do they eat?" I ventured to ask one of the keepers.

"S'pose you thought we feed 'em on screws and tacks," he replied. "There was once a little girl who bought screws and tacks and was found feeding them to the greddy fowls, and it went hard with the little girl when she was caught at it. It might have gone harder but that she belonged to Mrs. William Jennings Bryan, who was present to apologize.

When the birds are eighteen months old, that is, soon after they reach their permanent styles of dress, they may be plucked. A plucking occurs only once in ten weeks; as often as that, the whole troop is looked over, and those whose plumes are ripe are marked as victims. No bird undergoes this process oftener than every nine months, so their lives are for the most part peacefully undisturbed, being one round of love-making and sugar beets. It is a sorry sight to see this destruction, even though pride and a haughty spirit do precede it. As ever, the wolf comes in sheep's clothing, and the plucker rattles a great sack of dry corn in a way that would make any ostrich mouth water. "Here's a fine meal," says the whole troop, and forthwith they come lunging, plunging, lurching from far and near. The demurely garbed females are worth little for plumage; when their brother took to his dashing style, he did not realize that in his glory lay his downfall. As the whole troop crowds close around the pile of corn, one of the doomed fellows is singled out, driven or coaxed a little to one side, and in a second the gate of a pen has closed him in.

It is a narrow pen, with sides joining in a wedge-shape, and into the wedge the angry bird is forced by two men who guard most carefully the while against a kick from a heavy foot. It is the work of a second to clap the stocking over Mr. Ostrich's head, and this calms him like a dose of soothing syrup. The stocking is made from a long strip of heavy blue jeans, and the sudden blinding of it bewilders the bird so that the beating wings grow still in his wonder. The long stocking is shaken and pecked at, but it cannot be worked off by any blundering vexation, and from this moment the ostrich is in the hands of his masters. Now the plucking begins.

One of the great close-held wings is turned back, revealing a wealth of black plumes, white plumes and variegated

PLUCKING AN OSTRICH

plumes. The great floating white ones, such as adorn the picture hats, are cut close to the root; if they were left until ripe enough to pull, the ends would have outlived their perfection. The scissors are sharp and merciless, and clip, clip, they are snipping off dollars and dollars with every stroke. The smaller feathers in the wings, those which are protected closer to the body, may be pulled out without, as my guide deprecated, hurting the bird very much. Not very much. Did you ever have a lock of hair pulled out with a jerk? Perhaps you know why the ostrich winces. As soon as the clipping and the tugging cease, he probably imagines the inexplicable ordeal over, but a moment more, my whilom dandy, that a daub of red paint may designate your sign post legs as belonging to a plucked bird. That done, the stocking comes off and out you go to liberty in the broad corral once more, to liberty but not to present happiness. For the shame of a plucked bird is crushing, it is long before he can rise above it, and his more fortunate companions lose no chance to twit him on his disgrace, fighting him off as often as he tries to mingle with them. His only comfort lies in having companions in misery, for several proud fellows must undergo the humiliation on the same day. The feathers are carefully stowed away by a man with a bag; the loss of one would mean loss of money. In their raw condition, uncurled and undyed, they are sold at wholesale for sixty dollars per pound, or about sixty cents for a feather, but some of the finest plumes are worth much more. The body feathers are never pulled, but gathered daily as they drop in the corrals. SARAH COMSTOCK.

THE GREAT CORRALL AT THE PASADENA OSTRICH FARM

CAMP KITCHEN

PEELING POTATOES

THE CAMP FIRE

KILLING TIME

MAIN STREET OF THE CAMP

SCENES AT CAMP MORGAN, IN THE PRESIDIO, SAN FRANCISCO

Photos by Theodore Solomons

His Dead Mother's Portrait

BY FRANK NORRIS.

I came to know young Drexel because of his cleverness in making a certain kind of trout-fly which he called the "Midshipman," and which is most effective in mountain streams on very gray days. Young Drexel earned his living by making trout-flies for certain sporting firms on Market street, and after his great success with the "Midshipman" (it really is a chef d'oeuvre), everyone ceased to call him Drexel and always addressed him as Midshipman.

The Midshipman lives in one of those very quaint and curious old houses on the corner of California and Dupont streets, at the very edge of Chinatown. There are three houses here, and they face on Dupont street just opposite the cathedral, you must have noted them—quite above the grade, built up on bulkheads, and sporting old glass verandas. There are lots of flowers and vines in the yard, and trellises, too, where once and a while you may see a bunch of grapes.

The Midshipman knows trout as you know you right hand, I making enquiries for flies and tackle was sent to find him in his room in the glass verandahed house opposite the cathedral.

We got to know each other very well. He was a blonde small young fellow, not over twenty-five, I believe; he wore spectacles—for the fineness of his work had told on his eyes—had the hands and fingers of a woman and also a woman's temperament. Besides this, he was passionately fond of German music. He dodged the roughnesses of the world of San Francisco, and lived much to himself with one or two friends, his delicate flies, an old female trout in a glass aquarium and—a small photograph of his dead mother.which he always carried with him in his pocketbook.

It did not take me long to find out that the Midshipman's dead mother was his religion, the one great influence of his life, that had kept him straight and fine and clean. She had passed out of his life when he was too young to remember her. However, he had her picture which was to him—but I have no right to repeat what he used to tell me. He always kept this picture by him, used to sleep with it under his pillow, and on Sundays had a very pretty habit of writing letters to it.

On Saturday nights the Midshipman and I used to dine together at the "Buon Gusto," over in the Mexican Quarter and afterwards used to walk about Market and Kearny streets, seeing what we could see, much preferring that form of amusement to the best "attractions" billed at any of the theatres. For on Saturday nights Market and Kearny streets of this city of San Francisco are en fete. It is like a country fair — all the world is abroad promenading itself. On one corner the Salvation Army is booming, on another a street-fakir is entertaining a crowd, the kinetoscope booths, the shooting galleries and small auction shops are wide open, a cable car goes by with a blaring brass band that announces a suburban amusement; from Chinatown comes the reek of punk, the blink of swinging red lanterns, and the wailing of pipes and two-string fiddles; you hear the jangle of pianos coming up through the sidewalk from the dives and dance-halls; for five cents you can look at Mars through a telescope, take a shock of electricity, "know your weight," or sit for your tintype. From the Barbary Coast to Lotta's fountain it is all gas, glitter, and gaiety. Where else but in Paris would you find the like?

It was towards nine o'clock on that particular Saturday evening that the Midshipman and I passed down the Barbary Coast on our way from the "Buon Gusto." In front of the "Bella Union" we were met by a group of some half dozen fellows whom I am ashamed to say I knew. They took possession of us at once. There was nothing for me to do but to introduce the Midshipman to them.

"Look here," said one of these fellows; "we're going into the 'Bella Union,' and you're coming with us."

"In there? I'll see you far first. It's the most disreputable dive in town."

"Yes, but we're going in for the fad of the thing. Let me tell you. We were there last night. Oh, it's raw! — raw as beef! There's an old woman there," the young brute went on, "an old woman of forty, dressed up as a girl of fifteen, that does a song and dance. She can't dance, and her voice is 'hark-from-the-tombs-a-doleful-sound.' I honestly think she's dotty. Y' know, she comes out and yowls and gambols and the whole audience hiss and hoot and groan and stamp till she goes off, and then as soon as she's off we all applaud and clap and shout 'encore!' 'encore!' till we get her back. Then she'll come out and bow and smirk, and as soon as she begins to do her turn over again we all hoot and groan till we get her off. And so on over and over again. Laugh! I nearly split my sides!"

"I'd like to split your head," said I.

"Fiddlesticks! the woman's crazy. I tell you she don't know the difference, and she's forty if she's a day. It is hideous, I admit, but it's something to see. Come in with us for ten minutes and we will go to some decent show afterwards. Leander is here; he'll take us all to hear Nordica in 'Seigfried,' afterwards."

"But such a beastly dive; don't want to be seen going into such a hole-in-the-wall."

"The people whose opinion counts for anything don't frequent the Barbary Coast."

I turned doubtfully to the Midshipman.

"Shall we look in for ten minutes?"

The Midshipman wavered. Nordica in "Siegfried" tempted him.

"I don't like such places—I've never been—it's not my line you know. Still, for ten minutes only, and you say we'll go to the opera afterwards."

We moved toward the box office and the Midshipman reached for his pocketbook. I was standing at his side at the time, and, as he fumbled in the pocketbook for the price of his admission, I noticed that his eye fell upon the portrait of his dead mother which he always carried there. He looked at it an instant and then around him at the vestibule, that sordid dive with its staring, vulgar billboards. From inside the theatre came the jangling of a cheap band and the raucous notes of a concert-hall singer.

The Midshipman turned about with abrupt resolution.

"No," said he to me in a low voice so that none of the others heard, "No, I wont go in. I–I can't, you understand," and with that he was gone.

Leander came up just in time to see him go.

"Hello," said he, "that was young Drexel with you wasn't it—the Midshipman—where did he go; what did he go for?"

"He didn't like the idea of going into this joint. He has pretty strict notions, you know, Leander."

Leander scratched his ear.

"That's a queer case," he said reflectively.

"As how; do you know him?"

"I know people that do. He thinks his mother died long ago."

"Great Scott! Didn't she?"

Leander put his chin in the air.

"It would have been better if she had."

"Come on, you fellows," cried the rest of the party, "come on, we're going in."

"Hello, what's this?" exclaimed Leander, stooping to pick up a photograph that lay at our feet.

I saw what it was and tried to get it away before the others came up.

"Give it here, Leander," said I in a low voice, "It's a picture of the Midshipman's mother, he dropped it just now."

But I was not quick enough.

"Hoh," exclaimed one of the party as his eye fell upon the picture, "it's the old woman inside who does the song-and-dance turn. Come on, let's go in. Now all you fellows be sure to yell and groan as soon as she comes out."

"Let's not go in," said I to Leander.

President McKinley, who is busy upon his message to Congress spends most of the day in his office, reserving but an hour or so for a drive, his only exercise. At 7 o'clock he drives with Mrs. McKinley and at about 10 goes back to work, continuing until long after midnight.

RECESS

WHERE BIBLE STORIES ARE TAUGHT

IN THE DINING-ROOM

THE MISSION BUILDING

A CORNER IN THE RECEPTION-ROOM

WAITING FOR MEAL TIME

STUDY HOUR

A BUSY TIME IN THE KITCHEN

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHINESE MISSION HOME

When the Blackstone of what is euphemistically called "miner's law" shall publish his treatise, he will find much in its principles that will be difficult to reconcile. In camp and on trails, where the code runs, the penalty for stealing is understood to be the hangman's rope, and there have been stories of its application to cases of theft during the present rush to the Yukon district. But accerding to latest reports, the captain of a river steamer narrowly escaped hanging because he obstinately refused to allow a large part of his cargo of provisions to be intercepted by a body of miners, whose stock was insufficient for the winter. It would thus seem that an action which is deemed criminal on the part of a starving individual is regarded as legitimate by a hungry crowd. Classification of the code will be no light task.

Whether the amicable adjustment of the existing friction between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, as set forth in recent dispatches, will be effected by the visit of Sir Wilfred Laurier and other officials to Washington time alone can show. It is understood that the sealing controversy is primarily responsible for the mission of the Canadian officials, but the importance of other outstanding matters, which have lead to complications with our northern neighbors, is at the same time to receive full recognition. In many respects mutual interest should prompt a conciliatory attitude on either side, and if no mistake has been made in guaging the spirit with which the government of this country is to be approached by the Canadian premier, there would seem to be grounds for hope that satisfactory conclusions may be reached. The labor immigration question, as effected by the existing alien laws in both countries, is perhaps the most pressing item needing settlement, especially in view of the large population of American citizens engaged in mining on Canadian soil. Trade reciprocity may be less easy to deal with, but even under that head a beginning could be made without much difficulty towards a removal of the obstructive and unfriendly character of the legislation on both sides. Fisheries and navigation disputes are of old standing and the unsatisfactory experience accumulated under the existing state of affairs should surely be sufficient to secure a better understanding for the future.

Vacher, the French "Jack-the-Ripper," who is charged with having committed seventeen murders, has confessed to twelve, claiming that he is not responsible for his actions. He says (and the statement has been proven to be true), that in his youth he was bitten by a mad dog, and, after taking some concoction given to him by a village herbalist, he was transformed from a quiet, inoffensive individual, into a morbid, irritable brute. Subsequently he underwent a painful operation for a disease which he had contracted. His crimes have extended over a series of years, throughout the whole southeastern district of France and in several instances innocent people have been suspected of and suffered for his sins.

During last month Henry M. Stanley sailed from Cape Town as one of a party of guests of the Bechuanaland Railway Company, who are to make the first run on the new line from Mafeking as far as Buluwayo. When he shall have published his reflections on the trip, as he has agreed to do for certain London publishers, journalistic and otherwise, they ought to make interesting reading. What makes this railway undertaking of special importance is that it may ultimately form part of a trans-continental system, via the Zambesi River and Lakes Nyanza and Tanganyika, from north to south. But five years ago Buluwayo was the kraal of the savage chief, Lobengula and is now a modernized town.

It is perfectly appalling to think of the wide field open to enterprising murderers, or alleged murderers, when proprietors of freak shows are believed to be willing to "sign them up" on contracts for an indefinite period at the rate of $500 per week by way of salary. This is reported to be the value of Sausage-maker Luetgert's personality for show purposes. Probably this is about as well as champion prize-fighters can do, and they have hitherto been considered top-notchers in that line.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I am afraid, dearest Diary, that this is what might be termed an off week. Think of it, four days without a single girls' luncheon or a tea. Between you and me I am glad to rest on my laurels, for when one spends one's days eating all sorts of delicacies and one's nights finishing off with Welsh rarebits or oyster suppers, the complexion soon loses its bloom and the eye its lustre.

Last Friday night I had a capital time at the Fortnightly. It really proved an occasion worth recording, and the girls looked radiant. There was a great plentitude of men, and each of us debutantes voted it "the time of our lives." Mamma said it was as successful a meeting as she had ever seen, and even the military cotillion of last year was eclipsed. Mr. Ed Sheldon led with Lillie Follis in his most skillful fashion. I don't think as a leader Mr. Sheldon can be surpassed. He seems to know how to do the right thing at the moment when it seems necessary. All the debutantes looked fetching, but I think the palm of belledom may be conceded to Miss Margaret Salisbury, who was radiant in white organdie over white satin. Lillie Follis made a striking picture in her white frock and Frances Baldwin was lovely in pale pink satin. Among the most popular of the girls was Edna Hopkins who looked piquant in pure white. Of the maidens who have passed the debutante stage, I noted Miss Alice Masten in pink and white and Miss Jessie Glascock in white organdie trimmed with Valenciennes lace. The next cotillion is to be led by Edna Hopkins and Robbie Eyre.

Then on Saturday I went to the football with the McCutcheons. You know they took a party of us—Alice Hoffman, Della Davidson and several of the boys. I saw a number of the crowd there—Marie Wells, Marie Oge, the Burton girls and multitudinous others. After that, I rushed home and dressed for Leontine Blakeman's tea. I, of course, wore organdie as did all of us—it may be termed the uniform of the debutante. It was a prettier tea, if possible than Ethel's. Mrs. Blakeman, Leontine and Mr. Blakeman received the guests who then floated around and were entertained by the other debutantes. We had all the men in town and several told me that they no longer objected to teas, the girls were so attentive. Honestly we are nicer to them than to the girls or even the matrons, but in corraling them to our teas we achieve a triumph unprecedented in the annals of debutantage. There were twenty of us at the dinner. It was a "pink" party. We sat at a round table which made it much jollier and conversation more general. I liked Ethel Keeney's dress particularly well, it was, I think, the handsomest, being trimmed with real Valenciennes lace that was charmingly arranged round the waist. Leontine looked especially well as did Marie Wells.

Later we all went to the dancing class and had a jolly time. We were the sole debutantes present —I did not know any of the other girls. It seems to me that they have an entirely new crowd, who have not the pleasure of my acquaintance. Lieutentant Kilburn led the german, which did not differentiate from the usual. The figures were on the marching order. On Sunday we were at the Bent tea at the Presidio. It was exceeding jolly and the uniforms lent an air of distinction to the scene; of course there were loads of officers, and I did not notice a single wallflower.

On Monday I rested quietly all day and in the evening went to the opera. Jack Thornton invited a number of us—all debutantes except, of course, our chaperon and an equal number of men. Charlotte Ellinwood, Bessie Ames, Leontine Blakeman, Helen Thornton, and moi-meme. We had a fine time, although we were rather sold with regard to the opera "Otello" not having been given. I always enjoy "Cavalleria," however, and in a theatre party one never cares particularly. I must say I didn't pay much attention. I saw numbers of people whom I knew. Major and Mrs. Rathbone had a box. Beatrice and Celia Tobin were with Mr. Dick Tobin, and there were others. Oh, I must tell you a joke. You know Lieutenant Magill gave a theatre party at the Baldwin to Marie Wells and Marie Oge. He only invited "Oregon" men and what was his chagrin when he arrived at the Palace (their rendezvous) to find a note telling him his friends had been ordered on board. It was too late to replace them so he had to carry off the honors alone.

Do you know, I hear that the Bruguieres have decided not to give their ball. All of us think it an outrage, as we were anticipating a tremendously swell affair. There are loads of things on for next week and this week's end is to be especially gay. Therese Morgan's tea on Friday, to which we are all invited, with dinner and cotillion to sixty. Then Marie Wells' "at home" on Saturday. She is not going to give a dinner afterwards but is going to have a bouffel supper, to which all the girls who receive and a number of men have been invited. It will be less formal than a dinner and we expect a capital time. On Monday next there is to be a big dinner at Lizzie Whittier's in honor of Gertie Carroll. On Tuesday, Lucy Jackson gives a debutantes' lunch at the 'Varsity Club. On Friday evening Mrs. Fred Woods gives a ball in honor of her daughter Maud, one of this season's debutantes. On the same evening Mr. Greenaway gives a theatre party and we girls are divided between our desires to attend both. On Saturday, Bernie Drown is to give us debutantes a big luncheon, and on Saturday, the twentieth, Mrs. Hopkins is to introduce Edna at a tea, and Mrs. Bunce gives an "at home" to Bertie. Clara Hamilton comes out this week on the same day as Marie Wells. The Eyres gave a tea on Wednesday to a number of us. The Blandings, Hoffmans, Mary Belle Gwin, Helen Thornton and the Salisburys were there. It was a tremendously smart affair. I did not receive, alas, not being sufficiently urged. Marie Messer is to give a dance and tableau about December 1st. The preparations for the Thomas ball proceed apace and some of our dresses are glorious. Now for another week adieu. Your devoted MISS CRICKET.

* *

The San Francisco Verein held it's opening ball on Saturday evening. The rooms were gorgeous in their decorations of ferns, palms and chrysanthemums. It is said to have been one of the prettiest balls ever given at the Vercin. The gowning was simply superb. Miss Bachman and Miss Schwabacher carried off the honors. Miss Bachman's frock was of pale pink tulle over pink satin with Vandykes of chiffon, arranged in the front and over the hips, following the line and solidly embroidered over the skirt and waist were opals which reflected the varied lights. The waist was stunningly cut trimmed with opals in similar fashion. Miss Schwabacher wore white tulle over white satin. The skirt was edged with gradvated ruffles to about a foot from the bottom. From there to the top, pink velvet bands graduated to the waist. The bodice was a dream. It was trimmed in pink baby velvet and fastened with black velvet bands each bearing a single rhinestone set in the centre. Dear little puffed sleeves completed this charming gown. Mrs. Abe Rothschild looked fetching, in pink, and Miss Amy Ehrmann and Miss Edith Cohn were among the most popular.

Of the married ladies Mrs. Schweitzer's gown claimed my attention. It was of purple mirror moire trimmed with peau de soie and passementerie. Mrs. M. Schweitzer was in Persian navy blue silk with white taffeta silk yoke inserted. A garniture of turquoise velvet applicqued with jet and a jeweled girdle completed this costume. Miss Rosie Newman, who is tall and slight and pleasing in appearance, wore pale pink dotted mull finished in insertion.

The value and virtue of the Paso Robles Springs have obtained very general recognition and the most distinguished and prominent people utilize it for their various ailments. During the summer the hotel has done an excellent business. John W. Macky and his son were guests there for several weeks and returned to town much benefited by the water. Secretary Godchaux and Attorney Chickering are among the recent guests.

A very pleasant crowd of people are located at the Hotel Bella Vista—the Wakefield Bakers, the George Knights, Mr. Neibling from Portland and innumerable others. During the winter Mrs. Tracy has asranged a series of hops, the first of which took place on the evening of November 11th. The house is pretty well filled up, and the cusine is even better than usual

The first meet of the Winter Cotillion Club occurs at Lunt's Hall on the evening of November 24th. It will be an assembly followed by a german to be led by George E. Bennett. Clarence L. Mitchell will officiate as floor manager. The club is now in its third season and boasts a membership of fifty couples.

* *

The sole events in an otherwise shockingly dull week in Oakland were the two at homes given by the debutantes. The first, by Mrs. de Fremery, to introduce her daughter Miss Sue de Fremery, took place on Saturday afternoon. Only the younger set were invited. Miss de Fremery is tall and dark, and was gowned in white organdie trimmed with lace and ribbons. Quite a little excitement was caused during the afternoon. A cosy corner was accidently set on fire, and it took the combined efforts of all the boys there to put it out. For a few minutes there was considerable fear lest their efforts to extinguish it should be unavailing. Miss Emelie Fairchild, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Fairchild, also made her first appearance at a tea. All the debutantes were present, and made a pretty picture in their white frocks. Miss Fairchild is an attractive girl, tall and fair, with very fine coloring. Miss Marietta Havens of Vernon Heights followed the example of the San Francisco debutantes and concluded her at home with a dinner. It was a very pretty affair. Among the young people who were present were Miss Florence Green, Miss Marie Messer, Miss Bessie Palmer, Miss Grace Baldwin, Miss Jean Howard and Miss Carmen Moore, and a dozen young men. Later, cards were played.

All Oakland turned out on Friday evening to hear the Henschels at the Congregational church. There were endless concert parties, and every seat in the church was filled. Prior to the concert Mrs. Charles Webb Howard entertained Mr. and Mrs. Henschel at dinner.

Among the most important of the coming events is the A. A. Moore reception on Tuesday of next week.

Mrs. J. K. McLean and Miss Bailey have just returned from a visit to Palo Alto. Mr. A. P. Brayton and Miss Louise Brayton are to leave this week for the Hawaiian Islands, where they anticipate spending the winter. Mrs. R. L. Stevenson is to spend the next few months in Berkeley with Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Osbourne. In the Spring she intends to go to London. Of the Oaklanders at present in the East are Mr. Marshall Pierce and Miss Josephine Pierce, Mrs. Tucker and Miss Mae Tucker and Mrs. Tom Magee.

The engagement is announced of Miss Jane Mae McCrum, of Oakland, to Lieutenant Guy Warner Brown of the United States Navy.

Fashion in Champagne.

New York cultured society has taken up the Moet & Chandon. Since the Bradley-Martin and Patriarchs ball no menu is considered en regle without this brand.—Exchange.

Artistic competence, combined with sound business principles, account for the great popularity of Huber's Orchestra. Address 20 O'Farrell street. Telephone care Benj. Curtaz, Main 1247.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

"LA BOHEME."

Consumption Set to Music—Interesting Performance of a Beautiful Opera.

Not till "Cavalleria Rusticana" had grown familiar, and "Pagliacci" was almost as well known, was it felt that Italy was once more a living factor in the creation of opera. No longer opera as known through Verdi's prime period, but composition with the spirit of the modern Italianesque strong upon it, modelled after the compelling genius of Wagner and the dramatic necessity of the time—and fulfilling the unwritten laws forcing modern work generally to yield up a tangle of quivering and adverse emotion. Puccini's opera belongs to the latter-day school in every point, and as to realism, may have stepped beyond the two operas mentioned. All the conventions of the old opera are ignored, without orchestral prelude the scenes open, and set aria and recitative are not to be found, while more than once the curtain rings down upon an empty stage. From the opening to the end the orchestra plays the principal role, and in this work the entire libretto is orchestrated, while the singers go through a vocal narrative rising into fragmentary melody of the species known as suggestive. Leading themes there are plenty, worked up into a dense mosaic, carrying a stream of musical emotion so lyric that the absence of song in the personages is supplied almost satisfyingly. At once the master hand of a great orchestrial colorist is felt and sustained with fine variety and unending spontaneity Never brassy, bathetic or overladen, this incessant play of sound atmosphere embrace every scene in a luxuriant warmth and with a novelty and prismatic shimmer of color contrasted with unerring sympathy and instinctive felicity.

Of the libretto, very little beyond a certain picturesqueness make an agreeable impression. The personages are miniature, and from an ethical point of view, low-toned and utterly wanting in distinction. Such a central motive as the love of an apparently weak and despicable poet and a girl afflicted with well developed consumption, carried out to its miserable finale, is provocative of a strong sense of nausea and malcontent that such a theme should have been chosen by a gifted, creative mind to illustrate with the poetry of the most ideal of the arts. The sickly passion is doomed from the first, and has no hold upon the real sympathies. To bring in a heroine coughing consumptively from her first scene was daring, and to her death scene gruesome realism was faithfully adhered to, but more of the hospital atmosphere than the air of operatic art resulted. However, such as the plan of the work is, Puccini's genius has completely expressed it in the tone art. A continual poignant thread is ever in the score, hopeless and clinging as is the character of Mimi herself rising here into searching lament without frenzy. Without irony this is consumption set to music. Not that this vein of emotion crowds out the bizarre effects intended to present musical Bohemia. Puccini is evidently too well balanced a genius for any wholly one-sided effect, and there are fugitive gleams letting in the hearty life of the people in clarified contrast. From the short-lived melodies he utters likewise bloom phrases memorable for their burden of peculiar Italian love-emotion heard in the text given to Mimi and her lover, and often sung in opposite unison by them. Unison in the voice parts, as well as a constant use of fifths in orchestrating, are among this composer's points of technique. This work is true to itself, and the realism it brings never flags, holding well together all the interest of such complex strands as modern opera is necessarily composed. With a great motif it seems probable this Italian is likely to compose a great work.

No great singing qualities are necessary in this opera. Signorina Montanari has personality, a possibly beautiful voice, and is without stage tricks. The Musetta of the cast, Signorina Vicini, was admirably played with refinement ot diablerie. Agostini the tenor did the usual local chord service. Nothing better than the general performance could be wished for, presuming that opera singing is not necessarily pure or correct. The company made a mistake in failing to open in "La Boheme." With the cast as given on Wednesday, it would have created a desirable impression and ought to be heard by all opera lovers.

Mendelssohn's fame to-day rests upon the real greatness in kind, of his appreciation and genius in filling out the ideal form of oratorio with musical beauty and dignity and dramatic suspense. The "Elijah" unfailingly inspires its performers and hearers with reverence and delight in the great genial creation of a truly humane artist. Oratorio may be "Thames fog dished up" to flippant and superior journalists, but in the judgment of the few it is the only logical and satisfying form uniting the poetry of verse, voice and instrument. Opera, at best, is a hectic attempt at painting the rose and forever verges on the ludicrous. In the performance of "Elijah" in question, despite their being no orchestra, the presence of a niggling piano and a somewhat hooting organ, there was enough enthusiasm in the chorus itself. The audience, too, was more homogeneous than is usual here, the alien element being conspicuously absent, and the example of so many silvered heads giving their services with an abnegation unknown to the present generation, lifted the performance out of the region of criticism into a desirable atmosphere of genuine feeling, however falteringly expressed. Madame Bishop, as the notable soloist, was said to be suffering from a cold, a sufficient excuse, though the type of her efforts assumed that strenuous vocalism made known to fame by Nordica of the fantastic facemaking. LESLEY MARTIN.

Rubber heels: Easy walking, no fatigue. At Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

CATERING IN SAN FRANCISCO

Ernst Ludwig's Return to Business—His Successful Career.

The people who give parties will be relieved to know that Ernst Ludwig is back again in the catering business. With nine caterers out of ten the supper or dinner or lunch will be mismanaged; the food will be poor or poorly cooked; the service insufficient and the help inadequate. The fact seems to be that it is only one man in a hundred who has the generalship necessary to manage a big affair, and this faculty Ernst has to a greater degree than all his rivals together. Because of it he has been a success.

There is a bit of history behind Ernst's retirement from the old firm of E. H. Ludwig & Co., and his re-entry into the catering buiness. His wife had been ill a long time and the physicians suggested that a change of air would prolong her life. So he decided to sacrifice his interest which was purchased by his partner, Chas. S. Wheeler, for less than half its value, and arranged his affairs to go East. Unfortunately the wife died; he became involved in a speculation and suffered a serious loss. The result—his return to catering. All of which goes to show that its an ill-wind which blows no one some good—for San Francisco hosts and hostesses have every reason to be satisfied.

Ludwig enters into his old field with an entirely new equipment. He has set himself up in a first rate establishment at 122 Geary street, and is prepared to meet every emergency from sandwiches and ice cream to a cotillion supper for four hundred ladies and gentlemen. The mere outsider may not know it, but considerable material in the way of crockery and glassware is essential to successful catering. The domestic outfit of most families is adequate to their daily needs, with perhaps an extra plate or so for a guest, but when it comes to the entertainment of a multitude—then you call on the caterer and he provides the service as well as the food. Ludwig's equipment of table linen and ware, of glasses and tumblers and vases and ice cream dishes is the very latest and best. He has the newest ideas about table decorations and is up-to-date in every department.

As in other businesses, there is considerable rivalry in catering. For many years Ernst had enjoyed the bulk of the patronage of society and his competitors, knowing it was impossible to rob him of his prestige, were glad to have him out of the way. Over his return to the field, they thought he had abandoned, there is naturally some feeling, about which the public cares but little, however. It may be said in this connection, that Ernest Ludwig in re-entering business violated no agreement or promise and is working in good faith and with all the old spirit and desire to do his best that has always animated him. He is in a better position than ever before to meet the demands of society and in soliciting the patronage of his former customers he does so with the consciousness of past successes and a record for good service extending over a term of fifteen years.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market Street

THE THEATRES

Comment on Current Performances — Things to Come.

The bones of the departed Hatzfeldts may rest in peace, the gyrations of Countess Olga Regina will never disturb them. Her little excellency is really injuring no one but herself, and it is a pity, for she is rather pretty, with appealing blue eyes, and an amiable maidenly manner, and her voice isn't bad, but she's not a "chanteuse supreme," in fact, she's little of a chanteuse at all. Mlle. Leopoldine, aerial artiste, is a pretty pleasing figure, all in blue from her slippers to her mouchoir. She goes through some new and rather startling evolutions. But the soul of the show is the lovely Willie Farrell, the quadroon goddess with the glinting eyes—in her sketch with Billie she introduces new business—as for cake walkers —there are no others.

"The Lost Paradise" is finding much favor at Morosco's. It is a play that peculiarly appeals to the working man, well filled with his trials and tribulations and tipped finally with his triumph over a wealthy employer. Herein is the joy of "The Lost Paradise," the victory of toil and the subjection of capital. It is well played and mounted at Morosco's—the big stage admitting of many possibilities. Mr. Pascoe has an agreeable part in Ruben Warner, playing it with much vigor and manliness. Maud Edna Hall is Polly Fletcher and Lorena Atwood, Margaret Knowlton.

The performance of "The Ugly Duckling" at the Alcazar this week is interesting for more than one consideration. The play itself is not of exceptional character, but it affords the players margin for good work. Wright Huntington as Count Malatesta is agreeable and easy in his acting, and convincing as well. Miss Foster plays Kate Graydon, the unhappy duckling in a pleasing manner, with much more intelligence, it is easy to imagine, than did her now famous predecessor in the part. A feature of the performance is the first appearance of Miss Polly Tupper, a pretty Fresno girl, whose work already promises well for her future. H. S. K.

DRAMATIC NOTES

"A Celebrated Case" will be revived next week at Morosco's, with some elaborate new scenery and specially prepared appointments.

Mme. Inez Fabbri Mueller celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of her first operatic appearance at Golden Gate Hall, Tuesday evening, Nov. 16th. A capital programme will be given.

After the run of "The Geisha," which enters on its fifth week to-morrow evening, the Tivoli will put on Planquette's romantic opera "Rip Van Winkle," with Edwin Stevens as Rip. Preparations are already being made for the Christmas spectacle founded on the Mother Goose rhymes.

A grand sacred orchestral concert, under the direction of Fritz Scheel, will be held at Metropolitan Temple Sunday afternoon, November 14th. The affair is to benefit the Homœopathic Hospital about to be erected on Lake and Fourteenth Ave. in conjunction with the Phoebe A. Hearst Ward for Sick and Destitute Children. This is really to be a first-class entertainment, and worth going to.

At the Orpheum next week the Morris trained ponies make their first appearance. The animals give a complete military drill and many other novel and original movements. Another feature will be Olschanky and Lonny, comedy acrobatic tumblers from the Empire, London. Countess von Hatzfeldt has some new songs. The Farrels continue, also A. O. Duncan, Mlle. Leopoldine, Cooke and Clinton, and Foy and Clark.

An olla podrida of opera comedy and spectacle is "In Gay New York" which opens at the Baldwin Monday evening. The piece is one of the Casino's successes. Burlesques on popular plays are introduced, lavishly costumed ballets and noted persons in caricature making the show interesting. The company, unusually large and capable, is headed by Eddie Foy.

The opera at the California this evening will be "The Masked Ball." "Traviata" will be given Monday, "La Boheme" Tuesday and Saturday evening, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" Wednesday and "Otello" Friday. "Faust" is also announced for presentation during the week. To-morrow, Sunday evening, a lyric and orchestral concert will be given by the four leading singers of the company in connection with the orchestra. The admission is reduced one half.

HELOISE DUPONT
"In Gay New York" at the Baldwin

"In Old Kentucky," with its pickaninny band and its thrilling racing scene, opens at the Columbia Monday evening. This popular play is now in its fifth year and from all indications bids fair to retain favor for many seasons to come. The pickaninny band is still one of its features, second in interest only to the great racing scene. The company, which is efficient throughout, includes Miss Affie Warner, a San Francisco girl, daughter of the well-known actor, Neil Warner.

Frederic J. Lane. D. D. S., has removed to 522 Sutter street, San Francisco.

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

FINANCE AND TRADE

Important Rise in Market-Street R. R. Shares — Grain and Live Stock.

Thursday Evening.

In financial circles the general feeling since the beginning of the week has exhibited an improved tone, local politics in New York having yielded in interest to matters of wider importance. The first impetus towards a better condition of affairs seems to have come from London, which, supported by an impression on this side that the Cuban question was less threatening in appearance, led to an advance all round in the leading stocks. The position of money has not greatly changed in the interval and discount rates seem pretty firmly established for the present on the basis of 3 per cent as the Bank of England rate, this figure having ruled for the past four weeks.

Silver has advanced since the date of last report, but as we write is weaker again in appearance.

The bond market here presents no special feature, though the demand for first class issues still continues good, the recent flurry on the New York stock exchange having left the local market entirely untouched.

The transactions include sales of Market Street Railway 5 per cent bonds at 111, and San Francisco and North Pacific Railway at 104½. Spring Valley Water Company's bonds have changed hands at 99⅝, which shows an important advance for the week, and these are strong with a hardening tendency.

Gas stocks are steady.

The tone of things in regard to Bank shares continues favorable, and although there is little doing for reasons previously given, a sale of Bank of California at 242½, showing an advance of 1½ dollar per share over the previous sale, has to be recorded.

In our last report attention was specially drawn to important dealings in the shares of the Market Street Railway. The upward movement has continued with the result that the stock has now reached 51, representing a rise of seven per cent in a couple of weeks. Large blocks of the shares have been absorbed by strong people, and there seems every reason to believe that, although no further considerable advance is likely in the immediate future, the higher range of values already established will be well maintained and probably followed by a further appreciation in the coming year. As previously mentioned, the company is doing a large and increasing business.

Powder shares are noticeably weak and there seems to be no support for them in the market at present.

In the Miscellaneous list Alaska Packers have been dealt in at 98, and Oceanic Steamship have advanced, as expected, to 32¼. Reports show that there are good orders on the market for these latter and they ought to do still better shortly.

In Sugar stocks the volume of business is limited, but Hutchinson have sold as high as 35 and, though subsequently a shade weaker, are in good demand. Hawaiian find ready buyers at current rates.

In the grain market there has been a steady decline for nearly a week past, although the offerings have been by no means large. Holders for the most part appear pretty confident that better prices will rule again ere long, but the hopeful tone seems rather to belong to the extreme future section of the market than to spot and December dealings. The precise promise of the crop from Argentina seems to be the main factor influencing the minds of operators, and, if the reports of damage by frost are confirmed, there should be an early rebound in the market. At the close of business at the local Produce Exchange to-day the price of December No. 1 was marked 1.43⅜.

In the live stock market there has been an absence of the briskness that has prevailed for some time past, but quotations are maintained and the moderate supplies are readily placed.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

A certain struggling lawyer in a small Ohio town received a call for advice from a farmer. The codes were taken down and the advice administered, and $3 for fee was the charge. The client handed him a five-dollar bill. The lawyer blushed, explored his pockets, looked disappointed, turned over his papers, and then, taking down the codes again, remarked: "I'll give you two more dollars worth of advice!"

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles. Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send, free of charge, to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. Noyes, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

Fine Display of Art Goods

S. & G. Gump, 113 Geary street, have just received a fine display of Art goods, and are ready to show their latest importations for this season, and invite their patrons and the public to view the many fine and interesting novelties received and unpacked so far.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

Dr. G. A. Danziger Dentist, 22 Geary street

A Delicious After-Dinner Cordial

A MOST WONDERFUL TONIC
A NERVE AND BLOOD REGENERATOR

No Drugs——— Not an Excitant

Recommended by leading physicians as the most effective and pleasant tonic on the market for nervous and stomach troubles.

F. A. HABER
Manager the Empire Wine and Liquor Dept.

CITY OF PARIS...

DRY GOODS COMPANY

UNION SQUARE

A HANDSOME AND SUBSTANTIAL BUILDING
SPECIALLY ERECTED FOR

A High Class Dry Goods House For All Classes

Every article of quality can be found on the shelves — not cheap goods to sell cheap, but the choice of the European and American markets, bought by trained buyers, to protect purchasers and prevent them from securing bad articles in exchange for their money.

If there is not to be found in our Made-Up Dress Department a costume that fits perfectly

MISS M. GRATH, Our Dressmaker

Will duplicate it to our patrons' measure, or alter it to suit their taste.

CLOTH CLOAKS and JACKETS will receive the same attention from a SKILLED MAN-TAILOR, whose specialty is cutting and fitting Tailor-Made Suits

A NEW FEATURE IS THE

Infants' and Children's Wear Department

Purchased by and under the direct care of MISS MOLLIE MURPHY, who has had twenty years' experience in selling and making the same in this city

City of Paris Dry Goods Co.

SOUTH-EAST CORNER STOCKTON AND GEARY STS., SAN FRANCISCO

To insure prompt attention, address all country orders direct to the firm

"THE VICE OF FOOLS"

Washington Society From the Chicago Point of View.

It would be interesting to learn what The Vice of Fools (H. S. Stone & Co., Chicago), is. Not so long ago the author, H. C. Chatfield-Taylor, wrote Two Women and a Fool, but in that instance the inference was obvious. Experience has at least taught him discretion, for here is a confusion as to the vice and the fools. Is the vice the habit of smart talk, which half the characters have? or, is it the unfortunate manner of the heroine who falls in love with the wrong man and marries a second to obtain a political revenge? In both instances the author is to blame, because no intelligent woman could have conducted herself as Violet Duncan is made to, while the dialogue of the others bears the same relation to nature that mill work does to wood carving. Can it be the novel-writing habit that is referred to? In that view it might be easier to agree, but really the author should have been more specific.

In dubbing H. C. Chatfield-Taylor the Mrs. Van Rensaeler of Chicago, it may seem that an injustice is done the literary accomplishment of the latter. There is a touch of real talent in the frivolity of Julien Gordeu; her chiffons are in excellent style—but of Mr. Taylor, if I may call him Taylor—alas he is merely industrious. Surely he achieves that dialogue in collaboration with a Thesaurus and a rhyming dictionary. His epigrams are only alliterative generalities—they are not even truisms. His characters are personal creations devised for this performance only and impossible outside his book. Where he found either models or manners is difficult to decide. I'm sure they know better in Chicago and in Washington, where the plot happens—they have certainly better sense. However, let Mr. Chatfield-Taylor speak for himself—this is a bit of dialogue from the first chapter. Mrs. Cortland is "a New Yorker by birth, a cosmopolite by experience" and a widow of forty in fact; she was born with the tactful genius of a controlling spirit in politics, but being a woman she contented herself by controlling politicians. There she is ladies and gentlemen—but, wait, "her enemies insisted dark tints were discernible about the roots of her hair,"—the brutes but this was mere envy, caused by jealousy of her superiority. Thank heaven she did not [illegible] line. The other is Ritchie Maitland, late Secretary of the Embassy in Paris, who is in Washington trying to be Secretary in London. General Lloyd is a New York politician in love with Violet Duncan, the beautiful daughter of the Secretary of War, at whose reception the dramatis personae are introduced:

"Not exactly. He has plenty of influence in New York, and lots of money. He practically controls the delegation of his State, and is a power, if a cunning, cold, selfish, unprincipled man can be a power."

"It is evident you do not like him."

"No, he is one of the few men whom I despise."

"You are very severe."

"No, I am very just. General Lloyd killed his wife by coldness and neglect. He was overbearing, exacting and cruel. He treated her like an inferior. He neglected her, too, but I assure you he never neglects the wives of his friends."

"But he is at least a man of the world," said Maitland.

"Yes, his manners are irreproachable and his morals irredeemable."

Maitland smiled. Morality has sexual variations," he said. "In a woman it is honor, in a man honesty."

"Not exactly," she replied. "Honesty is a term you men apply to your transactions with each other. Your treatment of women is so universally dishonorable that you do not consider it even worthy of opprobrium."

"Really, Mrs. Cortland," he said, laughing, "Your denunciation of my sex is so absolute that a refutation appears useless. I confess, however, that misanthropy was the last sentiment I expected to find concealed beneath such a face as yours."

"A woman's face is invariably a mask for her fancy. Like a court masker she can only be recognized by her mouth."

"What a novel theory!" said Maitland in an interested tone. "It might be possible to tell a woman's age by her teeth I suppose, but to tell her character by her lips—that seems quite another thing."

"But I am confident that a woman's mouth is a true index of her motives."

"You must demonstrate your theory. Now, Miss Duncan for instance. What does her mouth indicate?"

Mrs. Cortland scrutinized the beautiful face of the secretary's daughter. "At present her lips lack tenderness," she said; "They are too firmly set. Love has not closed her heart to ambition."

"But is she not cold by nature?"

"No, she is cold because she has not met the man she can love."

"Who must possess the melting power of a blast furnace I should say," replied Maitland doubtfully.

"No, I think that at heart Violet Duncan is sincere."

"Sincere in everything but love."

"It is that which proves a woman's sincerity," replied Mrs. Cortland firmly. "A sincere woman loves, a fickle woman loves to love, and a selfish woman loves to be loved."

"What an uncanny person you are. I hope you cannot read men so clearly."

"All men are more or less alike. The only difference is that occasionally one has a conscience."

Maitland laughed. "Then I suppose you know me through and through by this time. Tell me the worst, I pray."

"The worst is no worse than your reputation."

"That is insulting or enigmatical, I don't know which."

"Then to be plainer I think a girl should beware of you; a married woman afraid of you, and a widow a match for you—not in the matrimonial sense."

"What a hopelessly bad reputation I must have."

"Is it undeserved?" she asked, looking him straight in the face.

"A criminal is never obliged to convict himself," he answered with a forced smile.

"Then, let us declare a truce. In the meantime you may get me an ice."

In the interim between the foregoing and a dinner at Mrs. Cortland's—the characteristics of which the following extract make plain—the plot gets a start. Ritchie Maitland decides to cultivate Miss Duncan for her influence as prompted by Komlossy, the Hungarian minister, and she makes up her mind that she does not love Jack Hardy, the worshipping army officer, who stands for virtue in the subsequent performance:

Mrs. Cortland's Sunday dinners were never dull.

They were always small, never too long and the guests were chosen with unerring tact. She abhorred functions, so the few officials who came on these occasions were invited as friends, not as functionaries. Mrs. Cortland was a leader of the exclusive set which boasted that but six senators and three congressmen were admitted within its folds. The number of cabinet minsters was proportionately large, but the administration was popular socially, as some of the so-called "cabinet ladies" entertained delightfully. None, however, was more popular than Violet Duncan. She was universally acknowledged to be the success of the administration. Violet had a standing dinner engagement with Mrs. Cortland for each alternate Sunday until Lent. This was irrefutable testimony of her popularity.

As Violet entered Mrs. Cortland's drawing-room the Sunday following her own reception she cast a hurried glance about the room. Weazen Komlossy was almost eclipsed on a distant divan by two matrons of bulging proportions. He always made it a point to talk to the woman who entertain, before dinner, so that after dinner he might devote himself to the women who amuse.

Mrs. Jack Elliott, a very pretty, very frivolous woman of twenty-five, was surrounded by a group of young secretaries and attaches, who laughed at her flighty remarks and paid her the extravagant compliments she courted. In a darkened corner Dick Willing, a good-looking, impecunious clerk in the State Department whom every girl liked, but none wanted to marry, was looking into the eyes of a young heiress to millions. This called forth sinister glances from the dark face of Count Joam de Albuquerque, the Portuguese secretary, whose monthly custom was to lay his title at the feet of this girl, with protestations of affection on his lips and predilections for the millions in his heart.

Now Maitland begins the attack on the lovely heroine. He is fascinating, remember, and very handsome, and in Paris his country people were not good enough for him. This is how the polished and charming diplomat talks:

"Have you taken them all in, Miss Duncan?" said Maitla, who had been watching her.

"Yes, I think I have."

"Then you can tell me who are wearing last year's gowns made over."

"That can be easily told by the expression of a woman's face. There is a self-consciousness in the possession of a new dress that few can disguise."

"Then there is something beside love which a woman's face cannot dissemble."

"But a woman can always conceal love when it suits her purpose."

"Not from the man she loves."

Violet laughed. "What a thoroughly conceited member of your sex you must be."

"You misunderstand me. I am merely talking theoretically, not from experience."

"I suppose you wish me to believe that you are one of those insufferable men who insist that they have never been in love."

"On the contrary I have never been loved."

"How fulsomely modest."

Maitland sipped his sherry. "One must love several times before learning how to win love."

"So you think you are a master of the art."

"I am confident of it," he said half laughing."

Violet looked into his face. His assurance was so good natured and preposterous that it was scarcely definable as conceit.

It would be diverting to comment on the extraordinary way these ladies and gentlemen of Mr. Taylor's fancy chaff one another about each other's most intimate affairs, and to outline the courtship of Maitland, which is a compound of palmistry and cynicism—but there is not space. It would be amusing to rveal the remarkable plot and to travesty the final situation, but it is unnecessary to be obvious or to point morals in the presence of Mr. Chatfield-Taylor.

C.

BOOK NOTES

The leading article of the November Ladies' Home Journal is "The First Thanksgiving Dinner," by Clifford Howard. It is a well written sketch of the hardships and sufferings of the early Pilgrim settlers. Lillian Bell describes her first days in London, and George L. Weed tells of Dr. Whitman's adventures in Oregon. Reginald DeKoven contributes a waltz and Henry Kellar explains a few of his tricks.

The two latest numbers of The Temple contain "A Stronger Home," by Helen Campbell, and "The Captain's Dream," by Paul Tyner. Miss Campbell's sketch is a plea for the new woman and a sort of protest against unnecessary kitchen work. "The Captain's Dream" is a narration of personal experience at sea, veined with sympathy and sentiment.

Edward Maslin Hulme publishes a new booklet of verse At Twilight (H. S. Crocker Company), written during his under graduate course at Stanford University. The Lyrics are generally pleasing; in particular "A Twilight Song" and "When Love Shall Come."

What to Eat, for November, contains a number of appropriate suggestions for Thanksgiving, an article on "Servants Abroad," by F. T. Charles, and a treatise, "Kissing for Dyspepsia," by C. P. Burton.

The heroine of G. B. Burgin's new novel Fortune's Football (D. Appleton & Co.), is the daughter of a dead dramatist whose great play has been stolen by the villain. She is young and traditionally beautiful, and, as a sort of life work, takes it on herself to track the plagiarist to the end. This she does in a most dramatic manner, to the satisfaction of everyone but the villain. The plot is little above the ordinary, but the unravelling is rather cleverly done. Bright bits of dialogue add much to the interest of the tale.

A Soldier of Manhattan (D. Appleton & Co.) is a new historical novel by Joseph A. Altsheler, author of The Sun of Saratoga. The scene is set in the colonial period, and the story is narrated in the first person by a young American in the British army, who relates his adventures at Ticonderoga and Quebec. These adventures are all that a young and handsome hero should have—attended with the requisite risk and success. The manners of the times are utilized, military engagements are graphically described and interest throughout the tale is generally well sustained.

Another story of adventure, but of more romantic mold, is The Clash of Arms by John Bloundelle-Burton (D. Appleton & Co.) The scene is in England and France in the time of Charles II. and Louis XIV. The hero, a young Englishman, starts out in search for revenge upon his successful rival, and after some delay and much fighting, finally succeeds in getting it. The story, which is well connected, is entertainingly told, to the usual accompaniment of duels, top-boots, flagons of wine, swaggering gallants and the other necessities of romantic fiction.

Paste Jewels, by John Kendrick Bangs (Harper & Brothers), is termed on the title page "seven tales of domestic woe." It describes the typical experiences in housekeeping of a young couple during the first few years of their married life. The deceptive jewels are sundry domestics, who start out well, but finally prove themselves disappointing. There are seven sketches in the book, all of them touched with Mr. Bang's characteristic humor. The last is a study of an eccentric creature, a maid whose character deteriorated with kindness, and who found her redemption in cruel and abusive treatment.

How's This?

We offer One Hundred Dollars reward for any case of catarrh that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.

We, the undersigned, have known F. J. Cheney for the last fifteen years, and believe him perfectly honorable in all business transactions, and financially able to carry out any obligations made by their firm.

West & Truax, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.
Walding, Kinnan & Marvin, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.

Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. Testimonials sent free. Price 75c. per bottle. Sold by all druggists.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

Of course

you want some of that $2000. And of course you want good tea—Schilling's Best—your money back if you don't like it, at your grocer's.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

Only Six Days More

The opportunity to secure The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia on the favorable terms offered by the "Chronicle" through its Century Club will last just six days longer. If you have been thinking of taking advantage of this marvelous offer, you should decide at once, and act immediately. There is no profit in delay. By joining the club NOW you obtain immediate possession of the work, have the privilege of small monthly payments, and at absolute wholesale price. Note the fact that this is the newly-revised and enlarged edition of The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia, in seven royal quarto volumes. For fuller information send in the coupon below.

INQUIRY BLANK

To "Chronicle":

Please send me fuller particulars of your "Century Club" whose members secure The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia at the wholesale price and on small monthly payments.

Name .....

Occupation .....

Address .....(W1)

NOTE.—The publishers have made arrangements with Mr. William Doxey, bookseller, 631 Market street, to supply the work at regular prices after the closing of the club.

Address THE CHRONICLE

San Francisco.

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

An Analysis of the Berkeley-Reliance Footall Match.

On ground that resembled a mortar-bed more than a football field, California and Reliance each scored four points in a game that was virtually won by the clubmen. The field was so utterly unfit for play that deduction based on the playing is worthless. The only minutes that tested the worth of the elevens came toward the end of the game, when the ball was on dry ground in the west end of the field. Reliance clearly outclassed the collegemen, and every Berkeley heart went down. Fouling and holding in the line were so frequent and so general that it was almost impossible to penalize one side at a time, as the offenses of that eleven were neutralized by similar fouls of the other.

* *

Smith and Carter were the bright stars of the day, their really extraordinary play shining particularly when contrasted with the less than mediocre play of most of the other men on the field. Code, Greisberg, Ludlow and Haskell may be excepted from this charge of mediocrity. The defense of the first two was at times almost brilliant, and Ludlow has evidently found the place where he can put his football abilities to the best use for his college. Haskell got the ball out fairly, considering the condition of the grounds. In defense he was good, and used judgment in calling signals. His work in speeding plays and encouraging the players was the best any quarter has shown this year.

* *

Captain Hall handled kicks in better style than was expected, showing marked improvement in this. On a dry field he ought to rival Murphy. Unfortunately his running game from a lineup seems to have suffered. He showed a tendency to leave his interference at the wrong time when carrying the ball, and he did not always take the man he should when interfering. The impression left after the game was that Carter and Morse are in a class by themselves as halfbacks, being far the best individuals for that position we have seen here. And, that when at his best, Smith is head and shoulders above Hobbs, Carle and Fickert, who are easily superior to any other guards on the Coast.

* *

One thing is certain, that Mr. Nott's men will improve at least twenty-five per cent in the three weeks before the final match. Their offense gives promise of becoming brilliant, but it seems useless to hope for anything like a strong consistent defense from them. The men do not seem to grasp their individual duties when defending their own goal. Like all inexperienced teams they will fight hard and well for a time and then slump, letting the simplest play disconcert and demoralize them. Still with three weeks to play before Thanksgiving something better in the way of defensive play may be developed. If Mr. Nott is equal to the seemingly impossible task, and can get as good work from his men when their opponents hold the ball as when the Californians are attacking, then we may expect the blue and gold to give good account of itself against the apparently invincible Stanford eleven.

* *

Besides the California-Reliance match, three games of football were played on Saturday last that should interest all who care for the sport. They were fought by elevens from the preparatory schools in and about San Francisco. These schools and others forming the Academic Athletic League are struggling for supremacy. By a process of weeding and elimination the weaker elevens are dropped earlier in the season. The matches of last week were the first of the semi-finals. Hoitt's and Belmont Schools won the right to compete in the final series. St. Matthews School, too, will be represented, and either Lowell or the Polytechnic High School. Which one of the latter elevens will compete must be determined by a game yet to be played, as their last meeting resulted in a tie game. It seems that either Hoitt's School or Belmont will prove to have the best eleven, with probabilities favoring the former, although St. Matthews may have a bare chance in the last series.

* *

The eleven from Burlingame (Hoitt's), is heavier than any Coast school has yet had, and, coached by Mr. Lafayette, a resident instructor, it has developed remarkably effective play. Under the tutelage of Oscar Taylor, the best of California's backs, and a gentleman to whom football is an open book, Belmont school has for two seasons had a well-balanced, fast and accurate playing eleven. Between Hoitt's and Belmont there should be played a game well worth any one's watching, and, moreover, a game from which the college players might glean some lessons in play. Last year St. Matthew's School sent out the champion eleven, but the graduation of a number of their best men, notably Initzer end, Burmeister tackle, Johnson fullback, and Henion guard, has left them weak, especially as no new material has come in that can take the place of the old. However, the present light team is doing good work, and with the prestige of last year's victory may give a good account of itself.

* *

The pleasant thing about all this interest of the secondary schools in football is not, as some assure us, that college football of the future will be bettered by the men who come from them. It is that the masters and instructors have come to realize the educational value of the game, and that through it they will come more and more to realize the value all athletics have for the mind and hearts of healthy boys.

* *

The great evil of latter-day boy life is the lack of enthusiasm and the absence of that discipline of respect that Matthew Arnold declares to be the basis of all enduring society. If it were only that football demanded a daily half hour of full enthusiasm, and that the playing made a boy willing to respect authority, as embodied in his captain and coach, the game would be worth all the bruises and bumps that make it a bugbear to anxious mothers. But its value does not end here, the lesson of suiting action to thought, the impotency of the individual and the power of co-operation, the necessity for precision and the fact that precision and perfection come only to the patient, are all reiterated in the daily practice. It is a common thing to see a faltering, half-hearted boy, in one season of football play, grow to be self-reliant and enthusiastic. The best of our educators have come to recognize athletics as a power in making clean, healthy-minded men of boys in their charge, and there is no form of athletics that offers more possibilities for development than football.

* *

The future of athletics lies in the hands of those who are now high school boys. If their athletics can be kept scrupulously clean now, in the future they will keep others to the standards that they have come to know indispensable. It is, indeed, a pleasure to know that such a splendid organization as the Academic Athletic League is quietly, but insistently, doing so much for the present and future health of amateurism. The following account of the organization and its work, by a gentleman who is enthusiastic and untiring in his labors for it, is printed with a great deal of pleasure:

"Discerning sportsmen are appreciating more and more the excellent work that our California youngsters are doing to encourage high-grade amateur sport. Some years ago what was known as the Four A's was formed, with comparatively few schools in membership. This organization gave way to the Academic Athletic League of California. Sixteen high-schools and private schools are now enrolled as members. Two field-days are held each year in San Francisco or Oakland, and hotly-contested games of football, baseball, tennis and cycling are held regularly.

Nearly all the best athletes in the University of California, and not a few of those at Stanford, got their first track enthusiasm in the A. A. L. Over three thousand spectators viewed their field-day at the Olympic grounds in this city last month. Records were broken, as they always are at A. A. L. meets, and Plaw of the Oakland High School was well worth seeing when he broke the world's record for the 12-lb. hammer throw. He sent his hammer flying in excellent form. The feature of the day was the presence of a team from Ukiah High School. The Ukiah boys, by their pluck and perseverance, took back to the mountains a handful of points as a result of their efforts.

The boys of the A. A. L. are now intensely interested in their series of football games. Last year Oakland High School, after holding the football championship for several years, gave way to the finely organized team from St. Matthew's School, San Mateo. Two of the men of the latter team—Manley and Eurmeister—played for Stanford in the freshman game last Saturday, and a third—Snitzer—is doing good work at Yale. Fifteen teams have been playing out the preliminary games, and about eight will take part in the semi-finals which begin to-day. These semi-finals will be played in San Francisco, and we advise our older football enthusiasts to attend if they want to see some first-rate gridiron work. It is difficult to foretell the outcome, as yet, but if one may judge from the preliminary score, Hoitt's School and Belmont School are well in the lead, with St. Matthew's a good third. Hoitt's School relies on the unusual weight and strength of her men, together with good training. Belmont is lighter, but is said to play a quick, snappy game, developed by a first-class coach. Oakland High School has lost some good players through the establishment of the Central High School, and suffered a bad defeat from Stockton High School three weeks ago. Stockton, by the way, may prove to be a dark horse.

These youngsters are indeed keeping things lively. And the best thing to their credit is the fact that their sport is absolutely clean. The president, Mr. F. W. Hall of Oakland, is an official of the P. A. A., and to him is due in large degree the present excellent condition of the League. A good example these boys set for the members of our older clubs. We are glad to hear that at the last meeting of their Board of Directors a proposed amendment allowing men over 21 years of age to compete in League contests was voted down. An academic or scholastic league should keep older players out. As the A. A. L. stands now it is unquestionably the best and cleanest scholastic association in the United States."

ROBERT PORTER.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

Shifted Interest.

The football season comes again,
So, rouse ye braves with flaunting hair,
While echoing over hill and plain
Applause proclaims your merits rare.

Who heeds the diplomatic row
Conducted in soft, civil tones?
That's far too mild to suit us now,
It blacks no eyes and breaks no bones.

These Behring disputants must learn
That o'er their words we can't enthuse.
The sealskin gives us small concern,
The pigskin's what the world pursues.

Washington Star.

A General Cleaning Up.

Many timee, all that is wrong, when you imagine you have some fearful disease, is a general run-downness, and all that is needed is a general cleaning-up. Better than all the tonics for cleaning out the system is a short course at Byron Hot Springs. The mineral waters, used under the direction of the resident physician, will build you up in a surprisingly short time. You better try them.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

GET THE GENUINE ARTICLE!

Walter Baker & Co.'s Breakfast COCOA

Trade Mark.

Pure, Delicious, Nutritious.

Costs Less than ONE CENT a cup.

Be sure that the package bears our Trade Mark.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

Established 1780 Dorchester, Mass.

Among the many great Financial Corporations on the Pacific Coast, none rank higher than the

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.

Its Agents are found throughout America, and its Record for Prompt and Equitable Settlement of All Honest Losses is Firmly Established

D. J. STAPLES, President — WM. J. DUTTON, Vice-President — B. FAYMONVILLE, 2d Vice-Pres., Sec'y
J. B. LEVISON, Marine Sec'y — LOUIS WEINMANN, Asst. Sec'y — STEPHEN D. IVES, General Agent

Royal and Queen Ins. Cos.

Have removed their offices to the Royal Insurance Building, Northwest Corner of Pine and Sansome Streets, San Francisco.

Combined Assets Over $52,000,000

ROLLA V. WATT, - Pacific Coast Manager

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A.D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,446,100 — Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy-Holders, $8,980,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

CONNECTICUT
FIRE INS. CO
OF HARTFORD
Assets, $3,300,000. BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager.
COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
501 Montgomery Street

The Lion Fire Insurance Co. Limited of London. Total Cash Assets in United States, $886,797.09

The Imperial Insurance Co. Limited of London Established on Pacific Coast in 1852

WM. J. LANDERS, Resident Manager
PACIFIC COAST BRANCH
205-207 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal

Thuringia Insurance Co.
OF ERFURT, GERMANY
Capital $2,250,000 — Assets $10,984,248
PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

Don't Borrow a Home!
BUY IT Your rent payments for the borrowed home will do it through the aid of the
CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California
WM. CORBIN, Secretary and Gen'l Manager
Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco

REMOVAL
Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .
W. L. GREENBAUM,
of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at
128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

The German Savings and Loan Society
526 California St., S. F.
Guarantee Capital and Surplus
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash
Deposits December 31, 1896
OFFICERS
President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, [illegible]
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. [illegible]
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER
DIRECTORS
B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. [illegible] hart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. [illegible]
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union
532 CALIFORNIA ST
Deposits December 31, 1896
Paid Up Capital and Surplus - 1,594,503
ALBERT MILLER, Pres. — E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier
DIRECTORS
GEORGE W. BEAVER — ROBERT WATT
THOMAS MAGEE — GEO. C. BOARDMAN
W. C. B. DE FREMERY — DANIEL E. MARTIN
ALBERT MILLER — GEO. TASHERA
E. B. POND
Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
38 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. — GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company
Paid Up Capital . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . 25,000
OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING
CHS. PAGE, President. — HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager.
Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued
We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

FRANKLIN K. LANE — G. WHITFIELD LANE
LANE & LANE
Attorneys and Counselors
Room 202
Crocker Building, San Francisco

SOHMER PIANOS
BYRON MAUZY
AGENT
308-314 Post Street, S. F.

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
136 POST ST

Baldwin Theatre
AL. HAYMAN & CO (Inc) . . . . . Proprietors
To-Night and Sunday Last Times
Lost, Strayed or Stolen
Next Monday, November 15th Klaw & Erlangbr's Complete Production of the New York Casino Theatre Popular Success
In Gay New York
Prepare to enjoy the best entertainment in years
Come and catch the new and entrancing airs
Pretty music, graceful dancing, beautiful scenery

California Theatre
ITALIAN GRAND OPERA CO.
To-night, Masked Ball
Sunday Night, Grand Popular Lyric and Orchestral Concert. Great Pprogramme.
Special Prices, 25c, 50c, 75c.
Monday, Traviata; Tuesday, Thnrsday and Saturday Evenings, La Boheme; Wednesday, Cavalleria Rusticana and Pagliacci; Friday, Otello; Saturday Matinee, Faust
Seats . . 50c. to $1.50

Columbia Theatre
FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers
TWO WEEKS
To begin Monday, November 15th
"IN OLD KENTUCKY"
The Most Popular Show in the Land!
It Holds the Record for Big Business!
Coming . LOUIS JAMES

Orpheum
Week beginning Monday, Nov. 15th
THE MORRIS TRAINED PONIES, the World's Greatest Performing Ponies
OLSCHANSKY & LONNA, Acrobatic Tumblers
COUNTESS VON HATZFELDT, Chanteuse Supreme
MLLE. LEOPOLDINE, the Greatest Aerial Artiste
A. O. DUNCAN, Ventriloquial Comedian
COOKE & CLINTON, Expert Rifle Shots
FOY & CLARK, Eccentric Comedian
THE FARRELLS, Cakewalkers
Last week of the BIOGRAPH
Reserved Seats 25c.; Balcony 10c.; Opera Chairs and Box Seats 50c. Regular Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday.

Tivoli Opera House
MRS ERNESTINE KYELING : Proprietor and Manager
Every Evening at 8 sharp
The merry triumph of mirth and music the triumph of the season—the Japanese Musical Comedy
THE GEISHA
Superb Cast Spendid Chorus Excellent Orchestra
Fun Fast and Furious!
Monday, 30th Performance, Special Souvenir Night
Next opera, Rip Van Winkle
Look out for our Christmas Spectacle
Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre
FRED BELASCO : : : : : : Manager
Phone Main 254
To-night and To-morrow (Sunday)
Last times of THE UGLY DUCKLING
Manday, November 15th, Entire Week and Matinee Saturday
The Beautiful Comedy of English Military Life
Our Regiment
Seats on sale six days in advance.

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager
Last four performances of The Lost Paradise
Monday, November 15th, Seventh Week of the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H. PASCOE, in the Romantic French Drama
A CELEBRATED CASE
The pathetic story of a father's love and a daughter's faith and devotion
A Grand Production with a Strong Cast!
Evg. Prices 10, 25 50c Matinees Saturday and Sunday

Channing Auxiliary Lecture Course
1897-98
First Unitarian Church, Geary and Franklin Sts.
Tuesday Afternoons
November 23, 30, January 4, 11, 18
Prof. Bernard Moses on "Japan."
Prof. Edward H. Griggs on "Literature."
Tickets of five coupons, $1.50. Single admission, 50c.

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.
S. STROZYNSKI
24 GEARY ST.
The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.
Telephone Main 5697.

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, FIRE TILE, ETC. GLADDING, McBEAN & CO. SAN FRANCISCO. WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

TURF TOPICS

Marquise and Spunwell Each Score a Brace of Victories.

The unfortunate accident which led to the two-year-old filly Flamelia being destroyed last week, decided Mr. Charles L. Fair to retire from the ranks of owners. As he promised to be a liberal supporter of the turf, and is fond of the sport, this is a matter of general regret, and it is hoped that he may yet reconsider his determination and once more try his luck, which since he first embarked on the cares and finaucial responsibilities of ownership, has certainly been very disheartening.

A rainy spell towards the latter part of last week made the going at Ingleside heavy, and fields below the average in number. The most interesting event on Thursday, was the five-furlong scramble for maiden two-year-olds, in which a baker's dozen faced the gate and got away nicely, though the actual race resulted practically in a match between the Flambeau gelding Catawba and Atkin & Lottridge's Al Koran, the latter of which is a big colt by imp. Duncombe that looks as if he wants a little more time. The former just landed the money after holding the lead throughout- the only other runner up any part of the way besides Al Koran having been the filly Bodacia. In the mile race for all ages, the two-year-olds Fonsavannah and Don Luis were first and second, respectively, and the day's proceedings closed with a win on the part of Fleur de Lis, over seven furlongs, with Aquinas, Osric II, Horatio and The Roman strung out behind her.

Again on Friday the two-year-old events were the feature of the day's sport. In a field of fifteen Atkin & Lottridge's Spunwell, by imp. Duncombe-Spinning Time, captured the $400 purse; Lord Marmion by St. Carlo, and Novia by imp. Islington, second and third respectively, being the only other youngsters that showed the least ability to keep him company. In another five-eighths of a mile spin for two-year-olds Highland Ball justified the favorable impression formed regarding him being her closest attendants. Marquise, 107 lbs., who was chopped at the start and late in getting into her stride, made up little ground for the first half-mile, after which Wilson began to make use of her fine speed, and by the time he had rounded the turn for home had placed the little mare within a couple of lengths of Grady, who was a like distance from Tea Rose III. From that point matters became very interesting. The last named mare kept command to the paddock, but her speed being then exhausted, Grady drew up on even terms and Marquise was fast joining issue with the pair. From the betting ring to the finish it was hammer and tongs every inch of the way for the trio, and while Grady seemed to be just doing Tea Rose III on the post by a nose, Marquise cleverly scored the trick over him by the same almost imperceptible interval. It was a grand race, gallantly won by the Miser mare, and ridden capitaly by Wilson. Having regard to the ground Marquise lost at the start and the speed she showed in the run in, it is pretty evident that we have yet to see how good a mare this is. In the seven furlongs with conditions, Altamax, 112 lbs, now grown into a big powerful colt, had little trouble in landing the money, imp. Trance, 105 lbs., making the running and beating Horatio, 108 lbs., and Hohenzollern, 107 lbs., quite handily for second place.

Tuesday last was not a satisfying day. The best event was the six furlongs for two-year-olds, in which a dozen showed their colors. The field was practically cut in two by a bad start, and Bliss Rucker, 111 lbs., from whom great things were expected, was included amongst the moiety of disappointed ones. Miss Remsen, 103 lbs., soon assumed command and won comfortably, with Prestar, a fairly promising son of imp. Prestonpans, second a head in front of Catawba, 108 lbs. This race is no guide whatever in the way of form.

Wednesday gave us the best weather and track yet seen, and with the weekly free day for ladies, there was a large attendance. In a selling race for two-year-olds the imp. Duncomb colt Spunwell added another bracket to his name and won pretty much as he liked in the hands of Cawson. A seven furlong dash produced a good race between Satsuma, 110 lbs., and Libertine, 108 lbs., the former

BR. C. SPUNWELL (2 yrs.) imp. Duncombe-Spinning Time — Clawson up by getting home in front, with Hermoso the only one in the field of nine that made him exert himself at all.

Saturday was another day of small fields, about half a dozen going to the post in each event. In the mile race for two-year-olds, Morellito, 106 lbs., and Los Prietos, 103 lbs., had things pretty much to themselves, the other four runners being altogether out-paced, though Estro, 101 lbs., made a bid for honors at the head of the stretch, but was unable to hold his ground. Piggott found it necessary to keep the good Morello colt at work to shake off Los Prietos and eventually landed him a length and a half ahead. In the Golden West Stakes $1,000 for three-year-olds, 1½ miles, six out of an original entry of twenty-seven put in an appearance, Marquise, 109 lbs., Grady, 115 lbs., being the only ones seriously fancied and Del Paso II being a moderate third favorite in the betting. As soon as they had settled down to work the two latter moved in front, with Marquise lying in the rear until well into the backstretch, when Wilson placed her handily in waiting on the leaders, who were apparently well matched. Before reaching the final run for home the Miser's daughter with little effort showed a clean pair of heels to her field and came into the straight with a couple of lengths or so to spare and running free to the end of the journey won in easy style, without showing the least signs of distress, proving himself to be an exceedingly choice piece of racing property. Del Paso II outlasted Grady and finished second with three or four lengths to the good, Atticus, Peter the Second and Billy McClosky beaten off.

As an exposition of sport Monday was the best day's racing we have yet had. In the two-year-old race, ⅞ mile, the Midlothian colt Don Luis won by sheer grit, helped by Piggott's determined riding. Colonel Dan showed up badly in this event, and seems to have no racing ambition, although early in the year he gave signs of being above the average. The mile handicap produced a first-class contest with a most exciting finish. Tea Rose III carrying 104 lbs. made the running in accordance with her usual tactics and came into the straight with a clear lead of fully a couple of lengths, Thelma, 90 lbs., and Grady, 116 lbs., securing the verdict by a short head, while Summertime, 104 lbs., made a good showing. A field of eleeven in the hurdle handicap, of very mixed quality and uncertain soundness, made the 1½ mile course in perfect safety at a fast pace, the result, The Bachelor, 140 lbs, first, J. O. C. 150 lbs., second, and Arundel, 143 lbs., third, being pretty true to form and in accordance with the ring operations.

Principle has succumbed to expediency, the Ingleside management on Wednesday last having authorized Mr. Caldwell to use a recall flag with the gate. Not wishing to inflict my own opinions further on the public I will only say that recent conversation with experienced owners, trainers and jockeys has shown me that the majority of these men are in favor of an absolute start when the barrier rises. It may as well be understood that the flag has been brought into requisition to please the general public, whose opinions on racing questions are chiefly based on the gambling instinct; and, unfortunately for the cause of sport, racing associations cannot afford, as things stand, to disregard their wishes.

Next Monday the scene will change to Oakland, when we shall have the mile Opening Handicap, and a special match at level weights between St. Calatine and Napamax. Both events promise to be interesting. The programme for the first two weeks of the Oakland meeting provides for five races daily, except on the twelfth day when six are scheduled. Exclusive of stakes the purses range from 300 to 500 dollars in each raee.

I am informed on good authority that Mr. Macdonough has refused a bona fide offer of $8,000 for his yearling colt by imp. Ormonde out of imp. Countess of Langden by Hampton, which was shipped to New York with two other Ormonde yearlings a little while ago.

The Pacific Coast Jockey Club has wisely extended the date of closing seven stakes for two-year-olds, foals of 1896, originally fixed for 15th instant, to January 15, 1898.

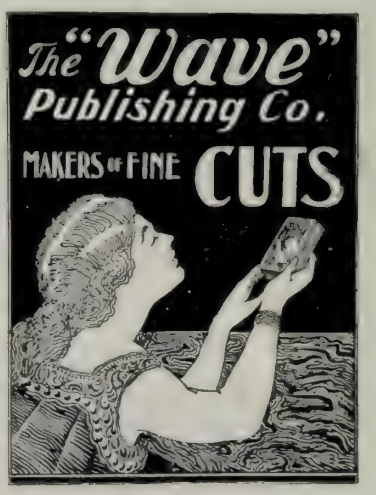
BENEDICT.

Mount Vernon Pure Rye.
Distillery bottling, square bottles only. The public appreciate a good article when they can get it. Sold by all first-class dealers.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. Far particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

Ernst H. Ludwig
CATERER
Supplies Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice
Also Terrapin, Entrees, Luncheons and Dinners, Ice Cream, Cake, etc.
NO. 122 GEARY STREET
Telephone Grant 119



24 Montgomery Street
SAN FRANCISCO

California Jockey Club
OAKLAND TRACK
Winter Meeting 1897-8, beginning Monday, November 15th.
Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, rain or shine. Five or more races each day. Races start at 2:15 p.m. sharp.
Ferry leaves San Francisco at 12 m., 12:30, 1:00, 1:30, 2:00, 2:30, 3:00, 3:30 p.m., connecting with trains stopping at entrance to track. Buy tickets to Berkeley.
Returning, trains leave the track at 4:15 and 4:45 p.m., and immediately after the last race.
R. B. MILROY, Secretary. T. H. WILLIAMS JR. President.

PACIFIC COAST JOCKEY CLUB
INGLESIDE TRACK
Racing from Monday, November 1st, to Saturday, November 13th, including
Five or more races daily, rain or shine
First race at 2 p.m.
S. P. R. R. Trains 12:45 and 1:15 p.m. daily. Leave Third-street station, stopping at Valencia street. Returning immediately after the last race.
Electric Car Lines — Kearny and Mission-street cars every 3 minutes, direct to track without change.
F. H. GREEN, Secretary. S. N. ANDROUS, President.

Book Bargains
FOR THIRTY DAYS, AT
H. R. WILLIS'
107 MONTGOMERY STREET

THE LATEST STYLES IN
CHOICE WOOLENS
H. S. BRIDGE & CO.
Merchant Tailors
623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel
Bicycle and Golf Suits

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, book binders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.
BUCHANAN BROS.
TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST
BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

United States Laundry
Office 1004 Market St.
TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte: "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG, the most attractive and accessible of the interior mountain resorts of California, 320 miles from San Francisco, on the line of the famous "Shasta Route." Elevation, 2100 feet. Luxury, good cheer, hospitality, and matchless scenery.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F.
Telephone 205

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY

SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas..... | 4 00 am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov 30 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates

S. S. "Alameda," for Australia, Thursday, Nov. 11 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO. General Agents

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Steamer Pomona, 2 p.m. November 3, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28

For Newport (Los Angeles) and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Nov. 2, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 30 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Harford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles and Redondo (Los Angeles), at 11 a.m. November 4, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 28 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, 10 a.m. the 2d each month

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

The firm of JOE POHEIM is the largest in the United States. Rules for self-measurement and samples of cloth sent free.

201 and 203 Montgomery St., cor. Bush.
844 & 846 Market St. 1110 & 1112 Market St.
SAN FRANCISCO.
485 Fourteenth St., Oakland. 603 & 605 K St., Sacramento.
143 South Spring St., Los Angeles.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Gould & Curry Silver Mining Company

Assessment ..... No. 82
Amount per share ..... 20 cents
Levied ..... November 2, 1897
Delinquent in office ..... December 7, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock ..... December 29, 1897

A. K. DURBROW, Secretary.
Office, room 69, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

ESTATE OF EUDORA A. CHAMBERS, DECEASED

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, R. C. Chambers, Executor of the will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within ten months after the first publication of this notice, to the said R. C. Chambers, at the law offices of Franklin K. Lane, rooms 201-202 Crocker Building, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

R. C. CHAMBERS,
Executor of the Will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, November [illegible]

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF ROBERT A. ROSE, DECEASED

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at Room 3, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

A. C. FREESE,
Adminis-trator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose Deceased.

Date Lat San Francisco, October 26th, 1897

J. D. Sullivan
Attorney for Administrator

BEST & BELCHER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that a meeting of the Board of Directors held on the second (2d) day of November, 1897, an assessment (No. 63) of twenty-five cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of December, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless paid before, will be sold on Tuesday the twenty-eighth (28th) day of December, 1897, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. M. JAFFE, Secretary.

Office, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Kentuck Consolidated Mining Company

Assessment ..... No. 14
Amount per share ..... 5 cents
Levied ..... October 27, 1897
Delinquent in office ..... December 1, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock ..... December 22, 1897

AUG. WATERMAN, Secretary.
Office, room 23, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

THE RUBBER-TIPPED ARROW FAMILY GAME

It is just the thing for amusement; just the thing for discipline; just the thing to help our boys and girls grow up strong, healthy, manly, and womanly. The Game in Bronze costs only 55c., including pistol, arrow, target, and target-holder; in nickel, 90c., all complete.

ELASTIC TIP CO., 735 Market Street, Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS

NOTICE NAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND SEE THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. . ALSO . .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks

From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. . . Pacific Coast Sole Agents

Beware of Imitations

This is a fac simile of the package

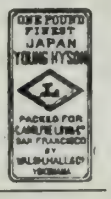
Genuine Diamond "L" Tea

Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.

208 California St., S. F.

For sale by all grocers



DR. WARD'S MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin. Price, One Dollar.

Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY

Price 25 Cents

DR. PARKER'S COUGH CURE

One dose will stop a cough—it never fails.

ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR IT

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

A story is told of old Lord Selkirk in the days when symmetrical arrangement was considered the height of good gardening. One day he found a boy shut up in the summer-house at the end of the terrace at St. Mary's Isle, and was informed by his gardener, who was, of course, a Scotchman, that it was for stealing apples. On reaching the other end of the terrace, where there was another summer-house, Selkirk beheld the gardeners' son looking dolefully out of the window. "Eh, John, what's this? Has your boy been stealing too?" "Nay, nay, my lord," was the answer—"I just put him in for seemetery."

Though the late poetess, Miss Jean Ingelow, had written charmingly of nightingales, she never heard one sing. She was stopping at a country house in England, and made this confession. So one night the whole household went out in the moonlight especially to hear them, and after, by an effort, holding their tongues for five minutes, while the nightingales sang divinely, they were startled by Miss Ingelow's asking, "Are they singing? I don't hear anything." With a Londoner's dread of draughts, the poetess, before going out in the night air, had filled her ears with cotton wool."

The habit of the firm of Smith & Son, who control the railway book service of England in settling for publications, is to make the check payable to the title of the book "or bearer." James Payn tells of having sold a number of his novels to the cheap edition department, receiving in return two drafts—the first made out to "Family Scapegrace or bearer" and the second to "Found Dead or bearer." The bank clerk, who received the second check, looked at it carefully. "A good thing it is 'payable to bearer,'" he said, "and not to order, otherwise it would have had to be signed by your executors!"

A story of Verdi's hatred of hand-organs is told with much corroborative detail by a journalist who visited him once at Moncalieri. He says that Verdi lived in one room as sleeping-room, study and dining-room. But the composer opened the doors and showed two much larger rooms in the distance. They were filled with hand-organs. "On my arrival," the maestro said, "these organs played airs from 'Rigoletto,' 'Trovatore,' and other operas of mine, and that angered me so that I rented the lot for the season. It cost me $300, but I had peace, at all events."

A Member of Congress, wishing to conciliate an old captain of a mine, a voter, sent him a splendid pine-apple. "I hope you liked the pine-apple!" he said to the old man when he met him a few days afterwards. "Well, yes, thankee—pretty well. But I suppose we sort of people are not used to them fine things, and don't know how to eat 'em." "How did you eat it, then?" asked the M. C. "Well," said the old man, "we boiled 'im." "Boiled it!" cried the M. C. in horror. "Yes, sir—we boiled 'm with a leg of mutton."

A Roman deacon was sent for to baptize a baby. In the cabin he could find no water, but there was a pot of tea. "Tea," he reasoned, "contains water, the rest is but accident," and proceeded to pour out a cup. But it was strong, even to blackness, so he went in search of water, and, having found some, watered the tea down to a more reasonable color, christened the baby with it and reported the circumstance, as a case of conscience, to his superior. It had not occurred to him, having found the water, to use it by itself.

When Rubinstein was traveling through the United States on a concert tour, it chanced that Barnum's Circus followed almost exactly the route chosen by the great Russian. On one occasion, when the train was filled with snake-charmers, acrobats, clowns, and the like, the guard, perhaps noticing Rubinstein's remarkable appearance, went up to him and said, "Do you belong to the show, sir?" Turning his leonine head with a savage shake, Rubinstein growled fiercely, "Sir, I am the show!"

A witness once appeared before Judge Hunt in the Superior Court of San Francisco with his head enveloped in surgical bandages. The case on trial was one for damages arising out of a collision between two barges in the bay of San Francisco. Turning to the witness, the judge said, "I did not catch what you said you were." "I am a mariner, your Honor." "Ah, I see," said the judge in those soft tones which are so characteristic of him—"now outward bound!"

A certain struggling lawyer in a small Ohio town received a call for advice from a farmer. The codes were taken down and the advice administered, and $3 for fee was the charge. The client handed him a five-dollar bill. The lawyer flushed, explored his pockets, looked disappointed, turned over his papers and then, taking down the codes again, remarked, "I'll give you two more dollars worth of advice."

Marshall Wilder was standing in front of Wallack's Theatre in New York recently, and was pulling out a cigar when M. H. de Young of the Chronicle stopped in front of him. "Hello, de Young," said the humorist, "have a cigar?" "Yes," returned de Young; "what's the matter with it?"

"Now, Thomas," said a certain bishop, after taking his servant to task one morning, "who is it that sees all we do, and hears all we say, and knows all we think, and who regards even me in my bishop's robes as but a vile worm of the dust?" And Thomas replied, "The missus, sir."

A raw Scottish lad had joined the Volunteers, and on the first parade-day his sister and his mother came to see the corps. At the march-past Jack was singled out by his sister, who exclaimed, "Look, mither—they're a' oot of step but oor Jock!"

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION

IN

THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

Hotel Rafael

SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Sanitarium, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Magnificent Scenery and Drives. The thermometer averages for the winter months 64 degrees, excelling that of the famed Mentone, France.

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tourn ments

R. H. WARFIELD CO.

(Incorporated) Proprietors

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.

PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO

HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

The best people from everywhere, bent on business or pleasure, when in New York, stop at

The St. Denis

The cuisine and comforts of the hotel have become so well known that its name is now a household word in thousands of homes in this country and Europe

Central Location
Broadway and Eleventh Street
Opposite Grace Church
New York

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

"Ahoy! Spread the good news—the Five-Cent Piece of Piper Heidsieck Plug Tobacco has been enlarged forty per cent. and the quality remains the same."

It is no longer necessary for the man of smallest means to chew one of the cheaper grades of tobacco.

PIPER HEIDSIECK

PLUG TOBACCO

(CHAMPAGNE FLAVOR)

is recognized everywhere as the best, and everyone can now afford to use it. Ask for the New Large Five-Cent Piece.

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 47 SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 20. 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

This Paper not to be taken from the Library.

A GROUP OF WELL-KNOWN CALIFORNIA RACEHORSES

Photos by Hodson

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 20, 1897

CONTENTS

Editorials ... 2
An Open Letter to Mayor Phelan ... 2
Thomas Bailey Aldrich, by William Henry Hudson ... 3
Things and People, by Boswell Jr. ... 3-5
"Shorty Stack, Pugilist", by Frank Norris ... 5
Dean Farrar's Memories ... 7
The Racing Season, by Benedict ... 7
Scenes at the Ingleside and Oakland Race Tracks ... 8-9
A Debutante's Diary ... 10
The Theatres ... 11
Europe's Mother-in-Law ... 12
The Prince's Supper-Club ... 12
Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter ... 13
Turf Topics; by Benedict ... 14
Finance and Trade ... 15
New Stories Re-Told ... 16

MORE MILITARY FOOLISHNESS.

Nothing could demonstrate more clearly the general ignorance of the American people as to their military condition, and their general indifference to the subject, than the result of certain resolutions adopted recently by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York in favor of a large increase of the artillery force of our army. In any other country in the world such a declaration from the representative commercial body of a commercial capital would have been made only after careful inquiry and deliberation resulting in a conviction of the need of increased protection. A demand for an increase of defensive strength made under such circumstances would be of very serious significance.

But the resolutions of the New York Chamber of Commerce possessed no such importance. The Chamber was probably "worked" by some of the military gentlemen who are interested in procuring an increase of the strength of the army, with certain "merely incidental" promotions which will accrue to themselves. The commercial gentlemen of the Chamber probably passed the resolutions in a perfunctory, but kindly way, knowing little and caring less about the matter, but quite willing to oblige the military gentlemen. But the military workers, in furtherance of their self-centered benevolence, saw to it that the resolutions, once safely adopted, were advertised as widely as the press reports could carry them. When these reports reached the European commercial centers their significance was judged by the standards prevailing in all countries in which the military strength of the nation and its ability to defend itself from aggression are matters of permanent interest to the public. Judged by such standards, the New York resolutions could mean nothing but the imminence of war. They were taken as an exhibition of proverbial sensitiveness of capital in the face of danger, and the foreign capitalist proceeded forthwith to unload his American securities. The day after the resolutions were so kindly adopted and so widely advertised something like $25,000,000 was knocked off the quoted prices of the securities dealt in on the New York Stock Exchange. Some few fortunate bears may be grateful for this unexpected result, but it is safe to predict that the next detail of military workers who set out to work that Chamber of Commerce will be received with harsh language and will be thrust out like foolish prophets.

We have a Chamber of Commerce here in San Francisco, a body rich in resolutions and fertile in memorials to Congresses and Legislatures on all sorts of subjects. And our Chamber has likewise been honored by the attentions of the military workers and has responded obligingly with the resolutions so politely asked for. Fortunately, our Chamber is so well known locally, and so totally unknown everywhere else, that no calamity in Pine Street or Wall Street is to be looked for in consequence of any of its acts or omissions or declarations. The Chamber declares that it wants more artillerymen for the defense of our harbor, yet it is more than probable that the entire commercial and resolutionary body could not recognize an artilleryman unless a sample duly labelled and certified were furnished them.

More than a year ago the only fortifications of San Francisco were deliberately stripped of artillery soldiers and turnde over to an infantry garrison, by the same military men who have so cheerfully "worked" the Chamber of Commerce for a set of resolutions calling for more artillery troops. That there ever was any honest military motive for such an insane proceeding is beyond credibility; that it was a direct sacrifice of the public welfare and a deliberate injury to the military branch of the public service is only too evident. If the Chamber of Commerce had any knowledge of, or any real interest in the defense of our harbor, the voice of that body would long ago have been raised in denunciation of such a gross betrayal of a public duty. But the Chamber found no voice until requested to pipe up the demand of the military mandarins—for more military playthings. And, significantly enough, as soon as the Chamber had meekly passed the desired resolutions, an order was issued from the military mandarins sending one-half of the scant handful of artillery soldiers remaining in the defenses of San Francisco to San Diego. There are no guns at San Diego, to be sure, but to have guns without gunners in one place, and gunners without guns in all the other places that may require defenses, seems to be an arrangement well devised to exhibit the military character and the military wisdom of the collection of mandarins we have on hand.

If the Chamber of Commerce wants to form a reasonable opinion of its own as to what is needed for the defense of San Francisco, let it appoint a committee to inquire into the present condition and disposal of the force available now. And let inquiry be made as to what would be the advantage of having any additional force of men and guns if they are to be only playthings of ignorant, capricious or designing officers. Then let the Chamber find a voice of it own to express its own conclusions and its utterances will be entitled to and will receive respect. We need more artillerymen for our coast defenses, just as we need more cavalrymen and more infantrymen for our protection. But most of all we need a public opinion which will not tolerate ignorance and imbecillity—or worse—in the administration of the army any more than in the Treasury or in the courts.

THE NEW CHARTER

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE HON. JAMES D. PHELAN, MAYOR OF SAN FRANCISCO.

The Wave is moved to address this open letter to you in the interest of good government and honest reform in municipal affairs. While not always approving your official course, this journal has never questioned the integrity of your intentions. We have been just and fair to you. We have consistently supported you and your administration, and, in so doing, have passed without criticism official and quasi-official acts that chafed sorely against the principles we advocate. While omitting to criticise you, we have never failed to applaud your course when it deserved approbation. Neither slurs, nor ridicule, nor slanderous attacks have ever crept into these columns concerning you. Within the acquaintance of the writer, there are a score of high-minded, honorable men whose good opinion you once might claim, and whose esteem was well worth having, who now speak of you unkindly, and attribute to you unworthy, selfish and ignoble motives. The Wave refuses to partake of this unkind sentiment, and while it believes you have not always been right, and that you have sometimes been misled, affirms its faith in your honesty and sincerity of purpose. Having thus established our relations toward you, we feel free to address you as one man would another, in perfect frankness, upon a subject wherein both are equally interested.

There is soon to be chosen a Board of Freeholders whose duty it will be to frame and submit to the voters a new fundamental law for this municipaiity. The writer does not assume that you will be able to control or determine the spirit that will animate these Freeholders, but your influence should, and doubtless will be, great in shaping and directing the course of many among their number. Your high office — the active part you have taken so far in the movement, would seem to insure this much, and it is in that connection, for your own success and the success of the charter itself, this journal would address you—indeed, warn you.

This city stands wofully in need of a new charter. Few honest men acquainted with the tattered and patched up law of to-day will deny that. But the need is not greater than that which existed at the time the last charter was defeated, and the charter preceding it. A new charter was no less a necessity then than it is to-day. Yet all past efforts in that direction have failed, and not without reason. The promoters and sponsors of former charters were just as enthusiastic, and just as sanguine of success, as will be the promoters of this movement. They failed; and unless from their experience we take profit now, this charter will meet diaster too.

We may fairly start in with the proposition that the majority of the voters of San Francisco are honest men. This being conceded, it would then seem that the very essence of simple common sense would suggest the preparation of a charter that would not be obnoxious to honest men, and so secure its adoption. There are forms of "honesty," however, that are most pernicious. The Socialist who would deny you the right to own real property that was acquired by inheritance from your father, would, no doubt, hotly resent any imputation directed against his honesty. Indeed, the virtue to which he lays most violent claim, is his "honesty;" yet it would not be wise to accept the Socialist's standard of honesty to measure up the merits of our charter or to influence its scope or expand its purpose. There are other extremists who hug weird notions of property rights, and have radical ideas of municipal regulation of quasi-public institutions, who are also "honest" men, if measured by their own self-created, self-erected principles of right and wrong. But measured by the broad, universal principles that govern civilized man in every land under God's canopy, these men are neither honest nor are they just. Their "honesty" consists in unfairly taking from one man that which the law and common justice makes his; and, as did the highwayman of romance, they would distribute to the many the stolen goods they have neither earned nor created. An extension of the principle advocated by these "honest" men would soon absorb the Phelan block, the banks, and end—no man may foretell where. It is not wise — indeed, it is dangerous in the extreme to encourage or to compromise with this most pernicious sentiment. The destiny of our government is not threatened by unlettered ignorance among its voters one quarter as much as it is by the damnable "isms" that have taken root in the half-barren intellects of half-educated zealots.

The main object to be sought in framing a new charter; indeed, sir, the only rational object to be sought is the securing to this municipality of an honest and economical government, honest elections, and honest administrations. There is not within the corporate limits of this municipality an honest man who would object to a charter framed solely and simply to accomplish this broad, beneficent purpose. There is not a newspaper, daily or weekly, that would dare conspire, in the interest of bossism, to the defeat of such a charter. There is not room for a single doubt that such a charter would be overwhelmingly adopted. It would have enemies, no doubt. There are dishonest men in plenty who would attempt its defeat. Political bosses and their lambs; ballot-box stuffers and repeaters; the vile and wretched outcasts who live on the offal that floats down the sewers of municipal politics, would oppose such a charter—vigorously, cunningly, desperately—but, in the end, hopelessly. Such a charter, dominated by a broad, honest and liberal spirit, confining itself to its own business—the business of government—could not be defeated.

The political boss is full of cunning, however; shrewdness marks his every thought, and indirection his every act. He is powerful to-day simply because we have not such a charter as we mention. He does not propose to have placed before the people the clean cut issue of "honesty and economy" as against "bossism and extravagance." It is to his vital interest to make the document, which he fears, just as obnoxious, just as fearful and just as threatening to as many different interests as it is possible to do by hook or crook. In that direction lies his only safety, and there, too, lurks the danger to the charter. His cunning tells him that his efforts must be directed towards having injected into the charter as many attacks as possible on property rights, on water and gas companies, on telephone and telegraph companies, and to accomplish this end he has a most useful and active tool and ally in the probably well-meaning but hopelessly stupid ass who has devised a charter provision to knock the breath out of some large corporate interest. The heart of a Rainey warms towards the poor creature with theories and plans concerning franchises and corporations, for such measures hopelessly alienate from the charter just so many honest votes that would otherwise be cast in its favor. They frighten honest men of means, they send terror to the mind of the prudent man who has his savings invested in dividend paying stocks, they serve notice on every man of property that he too may be in danger, and in doing all this the zealot with an "ism" is simply serving the ends of the Boss, whom all decent men despise.

It would seem to be using bad judgment to imperil the fate of good government for the mere sake of indulging in hostility toward corporations. It would seem as though the first and foremost desire should be to obtain a clean-cut fundamental law. It would seem as though common sense and past experience would urge a rigid adherence to this single purpose. Such a charter could be amended hereafter. If there arose a general demand for some special provision the question could be placed before the people as a clean-cut issue without imperilling the entire charter. And we ask you, sir, in the interest of all, to use your influence, whatever it may be, toward securing a charter that will be entirely free from socialism, agrarianism or similar offensive, unwise and mischievous provisions. We ask you to advocate the policy of trusting to amendment hereafter to secure whatever of that nature may seem to be necessary or expedient. You may reply that a three-fifths vote is required to adopt an amendmeut, while a majority vote would adopt the same provision if in the original charter. Such an answer would be a lamentable confession of weakness on the part of the popularity of such measures. The advocates of these strange innovations and harsh impositions pretend to believe the community would be unanimous in their favor, and it is a pitiable confession to admit that three men out of every five cannot be expected to give their willing adherence to doctrines so loudly and patriotically advanced in the name of the "people."

We ask you, sir, to use your influence for a charter dealing with government pure and simple, and not to imperil its fate, or endanger municipal decency, by proposing a fundamental law with obnoxious provisions repugnant to a large body of respectable citizens, who equally with you are interested iu Home Rule and honest, economical municipal government.

Editor The Wave.

Rearing babies by the incubator system is the latest medical device. One of these institutions has been established in New York, and there are several in France. Out of 850,- babies born during a year in France, 135,000 of them have perished because they came too soon. The incubator absolutely agrees to save any child, exempt from hereditary disease, that weighs not less than 2 pounds and 3 ounces, provided the child is put in the incubator soon enough. The records of the Paris institution are interesting. Eight children who weighed less than 2 pounds (actual records say 1 kilogram, which is 2.2 pounds) died the day of their birth. Of 36 children weighing from 2 to 3 pounds, 18 were saved. Of 72 weighing from 3 to 4 pounds, 52 were saved. Of 54 weighing from 4 to 5 pounds, 49 were saved. Of 14 weighing from 5 to 6 pounds, all were saved.

The Rev. Dr. Swallow of Kentucky, recently elected State Treasurer, overwhelmingly defeating the Quay contingent, is editor of the Pennsylvania Methodist, and rather an eccentric person. He is tall, angular, vain, and fond of notoriety and controversy. His ways are often theatrical, and during his campaign against the State officials, whom he charged with burning the Capitol for selfish motives, he often prayed publicly, and never made a move in the proceedings without first consulting God and then his wife, whose maiden name, by the way, was Robin. Despite these consultations he was most inaccurate in his statements, and his attacks on the Governor and the courts were often vicious and never stated in the language of the New Testament.

THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.

BY WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

The publication in eight volumes of the collected works of Thomas Bailey Aldrich tempts us to say a few words about some of the more striking characteristics of a writer who now occupies a secure place in the world of American letters. First of all, we may touch upon the obvious fact that the sum-total of his production seems, in these days of facile pens and feverish book-making, astonishingly small. Mr. Aldrich has been before the public for rather over forty years, and during that time, following up the early and sudden success of the Ballad of Baby Bell, he has written with something like steadiness and regularity. Yet in respect of mere bulk, he is easily distanced by nearly all his contemporaries. On the other hand, the lack of inequalities in the volumes now before us, is no less remarkable. We may, of course, detect in them the differences of good and not-so-good; but the gaps are not nearly so great as we are accustomed to find in reading through the works of almost any one of our poets or novelists; and it may be added that, in this case, we never pass from the not-so-good to the utterly worthless or inane. This brings us upon the most important single quality in Mr. Aldrich's writing, alike in verse and in prose. From the outset, and all through his career, he has shown himself the highly-conscientious, as well as the finely-trained literary artist. He has been consistently intolerent of the slip-shod, the imperfect, the unfinished. He has never allowed himself to be seduced into hasty production or ill-considered utterance. Scrupulous care, literary sincerity, a lofty ideal of excellence, an artistic reserve most unusual in our time—these essentials of his genius and method go far to account, not only for the perfection of his best production, but also for the wonderfully high average maintained by him throughout. He has sought to write, not as much as possible, but always as well as possible.

It should, however, be added that another element of power here to be recognized, is the exactness with which Mr. Aldrich has gauged his own capacity and limitations. He seems quite early to have realized what was within and what was beyond his reach; and he acted wisely in deciding to do the one well, rather than fail, however nobly, in the other. An old-school critic, whose main business was to find out what an author had not attempted, and then abuse him for not having accomplished it, might here complain because, as poet especially, Mr. Aldrich has generally avoided large designs, the more serious kind of subject-matter. But by this time we understand that the essential thing is, not that a writer should give us this or the other, but that, whether this or the other, it should be of his best. Mr. Aldrich's poetic themes are often slight; he rarely deals with the darker problems, the deeper issues of life; like Keats—to whom he evidently owes much—he has never regarded as part of the poet's functions to usurp the role of preacher or prophet or seer. But that, understanding his genius so thoroughly, he is fully justified in the course pursued by the results achieved, is clearly shown by the simple fact that what he has chosen to give us in verse is practically unsurpassed in its kind.

His poetry, indeed, cannot fail to be a delight to those who love refinement of thought and feeling, the subtle melodies of metre, and a style so exquisitively delicate and chaste that a phrase or syllable amiss would be enough to ruin, by blatant contrast, the effect of a whole page. We note always in his work that unerring sense of the one word which of itself reveals the master. Another equally salient quality of his verse is its high pictorial power. His word-pictures are often beyond praise; to find their equal in delicacy and precision of touch, in photography accuracy of detail combined with artistic selectiveness, would be no easy task. "A poet—that means painter too," says Mr. Aldrich in the delightful In an Atelier. He himself is essentially a painter, and his delicately-wrought descriptions have all the vivid effect of perfect pictures. Nothing, for example, could be more admirable than the dainty landscape of Before the Rain and After the Rain; but there is scarcely a page on which the same picturesque power is not manifested.

Among Mr. Aldrich's more ambitious poetic efforts the highest rank must probably be given to Friar Jerome's Beautiful Book and Judith and Holofernes. The former is an exceedingly touching mediæval legend of rare, romantic charm and sweetness; the latter, a recent work, is marked by the more classic qualities of dignity, concentration and reserve. The two poems stand in interesting contrast as regards method and style, but the description in them, thought quite differently wrought, are equally superb. No reader is likely to forget the Friar's passage through the "dim alcoves" of the cloister, in the one, or Judith's view of the Assyrian camp at midnight, in the other.

It is doubtful whether Mr. Aldrich's poetry contains the elements necessary to insure popularity; but in his prose fiction he has, of course, appealed to a wider circle of readers. Here his finest work is, characteristically enough, to be found in his short stories—in Pere Antoine's Date Palm, for example, and in the whole collection originally entitled Marjorie Daw and Other People. Respecting Marjorie itself, criticism is superfluous; it is one of those surprises in fiction which, in the nature of things, cannot but be infrequent, and if at first we are a trifle inclined to resent the disillusion which the author holds in store for us, we are forced to acknowledge the consummate skill with which the materials of the narrative are handled.

Even in his prose, Mr. Aldrich is beyond all things a poet, and his novels are essentially poet's novels. It is true that in Prudence Palfrey, and even more notably in The Stillwater Tragedy, he made successful excursions into the fiction of incident; but even in these cases, though the plots are well prepared and capitally managed, we feel that much of the charm depends on the delicacy of character drawing, and the vividness with which certain phrases of New England life are portrayed as seen through a pleasant atmoshere of romance. Hence, perhaps, the even greater fascination of The Story of a Bad Boy and the Queen of Sheba, for in these works the subject-matter is itself poetical, and lends itself naturally to Mr. Aldrich's half-realistic, half-romantic method. The former of these books is full of the purest, most buoyant poetry of childhood, and like Daudet's La Petit Chose, with the earlier portions of which it has a good deal in common, it is to some degree autobiographical. The latter may seem to the ordinary novel reader a little fantastic; but in conception, development, style, it seems to us to merit the very highest praise.

It is a pleasure to be able to add that, while we have now before us the collected works of Mr. Aldrich, we are not obliged to believe that these volumes will represent his complete works. He is not yet an old man, and it is not time for him to lay down the pen. Such verse, such prose, as his are of the utmost value to-day, for the splendid constrast they furnish to the crudeness, the laxity, the strain of violence, of so many of our western writers. And whatever else he may now add to his contribution to American letters, we may be sure that he will give us nothing unworthy of his well-earned reputation.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

That the Charter Convention is in earnest in its desire to create an inst.ument acceptable to this community is exhibited in the character of the men it has nominated as Freeholders. They are all fair-minded and honorable citizens, of conservative habit, representing the best instincts and most important interests of the community. Doubtless there will be some criticism of Joseph Bretton, who has rather allied himself with the socialistic forces, but he is a wealthy man with a considerable stake in the welfare of San Francisco, and it is irrational to presume he would participate in an attack on property interests. There are three Populists—Dr. Jerome Anderson, Alfred Cridge and Judge Thompson. Of these, Dr. Anderson was a member of the previous Board of Freeholders; and Mr. Cridge does hold socialistic theories, but he has made no attempt to force them on the Charter Convention. Altogether that organization is to be congratulated on the excellent discretion it has exhibited, for it has pledged its nominees to nothing but the cause of home rule, civil service and economical government. The charter, as formulated, undoubtedly contains provisions which further consideration will eliminate, but it is merely submitted as suggestive. There is no intention or suggestion of dictation. The nominations will be made in the name of the Citizens' Charter Convention, and will be endorsed by the Non-Partisan and by the straight Democratic Convention.

***

There is an impression current throughout the city that rather more politics is being done in this charter fight than the obvious necessities of the situation require. The enthusiasm of the Raineys, Currys and Crimminses is never motiveless, and the inspiration is invariably a monetary one. Corrupt influences are evidently concerning themselves in the approaching contest, and it behooves all who are interested in good government to look out. The fact that the bosses have offered the names of a number of excellent and honorable men as candidates must not blind the community to the fact that Rainey, Crimmins and Curry have inspired their selection. We know that Mr. Reinstein is not a creature of Rainey, but he is a friend of the Governor, and unquestionably Mr. Budd of Stockton, who desires to figure in local politics, persuaded him to accept this boss nomination, as he also did Mr. Henry Fortmann. However, these facts will all be made patent during the forthcoming campaign, That there will be a strong fight may be expected, and there will be such a lining-up of forces as has never been seen before. I wonder if the powers remember the lesson of previous Freeholders' elections in which there has ever been manifested a strong independent vote. The best men have had the offices, and the Non-Partisan indorsement has generally been accepted by the citizens. It must be remembered that this election will be held under the new primary law, which will make more difficult than ever before the enforcement of boss control.

***

The disaffection in the ranks of the local Republican party which resulted so disastrously for candidates of that designation at the last municipal election has grown more pronounced. The two factions show no inclination towards harmonizing, and each is preserving its organization and machinery. The County Committee proper, is in the hands of Curry and Crimmins, who are associated with John D. Spreckels, while Kelly and Mahoney are supreme in the other set. At the last election the regular wing cast 13,000 votes, while the other had 11,000, so the margin of superiority is very small. Since Kelly has not been consulted in the negotiations with Rainey, it is probable his faction will act on its own behalf in such a way as to give striking testimony of its power. With the regular Democratic machinery in the hands of Governor Budd and Sam Rainey, and with a set of particularly corrupt men dominating the other side, the future of the Non-Partisan party is assured.

***

If Sam Rainey is to make a charter for us what will become of the city. His policy is made apparent in the Board of School Directors, which he controls through his connection, Dr. Ragan. The jobbing and mismanagement of the combination is quite the worst on record. Since the beginning of the year 126 new places have been created. Prior to this, the department had been afflicted with a superabundance of teachers, but now they are falling over one another. Appointments to positions in schools have been made the basis for all sorts of trades and were freely offered in the lobby at Sacramento during the legislative session. The carpenter shop is full of men who know nothing about tools, but who were given place for political services. In the meantime the school houses are falling into ruin, for there is no money left in the fund for their repair after the teachers' salaries have been paid, and besides there does not seem to be a single man in the shop capable of fixing a loose plank in place. This disreputable debauchery of the public service will continue as long as Sam Rainey is permitted to be a prominent factor in affairs. What the consequence of turning over the city to him would be may readily be estimated from the evidence h e submitted.

***

The Klondyke's the thing. Which city shall control its trade—San Francisco or Seattle? For once there is a strong fight being made here for this business. The ship yards around the bay are running day and night, turning out craft of all sorts; dozens of steam schooners are being fitted up to run between the Golden Gate, Dyea and St. Michaels. For the moment no other trade seems to merit consideration. It is impossible to get carriers for the development of business in other directions, for the cry is "Alaska and the Yukon." When the excitement dies down, as it is sure to do, there will be sailing craft galore which will be forced to look for support from other fields. It may be, then, an effort will be made to develop our long-forgotten trade with South America.

***

Considering the general superiority of the Italian Opera Company, now at the California, to its French predecessor in which society took so much interest, it is surprising there should be so few theatre parties there. While the tenor is not a de Reszke nor the prima donna a Patti, still it is a fair combination of singers and seems to have given considerable pleasure in the City of Mexico. The tout ensemble is far ahead of the French combination with the exception of Feodor and Albers, who were more capable vocalists than the Italians. Thus far the bulk of their support has come from the Latin Quarter, and it is safe to say that Little Italy is wildly enthused over their performances. The character of the patronage and auspices under which a company makes its appearance, is a potent factor in deciding the degree of support it will command in San Francisco. Let it be a society production with much artistic preliminary advertising, and it will enjoy good houses, but if the preparatory puffing is clumsy and there is no personal interest excited, you may depend, unless the performance is of extraordinary merit; it will be neglected by our haut monde.

***

Quite a distinguished personage has been among us, Mr. Richard Peters of New York, a prominent member of the innermost fashionable circle of the metropolis. He has been in California for some weeks, visiting at first with Mr. and Mrs. Charley Baldwin at Mountain View, and very recently has been entertained by James L. Flood, who took him, Phil Lydig and Clarence Mackay on an expedition to his great cattle ranch at San Diego. This is a veritable principality of some three hundred thousand acres and embraces the most diversified country in California. There are all sorts and conditions of game and I am told Mr. Peters, Mr. Mackay and the host made fine bags. On Thursday morning Mr. Flood organized for Mr. Peters a party to visit the Country Club's preserves. He is a very bright, intelligent man, the son of a wealthy Philadelphian. His sister, who was the belle of the Quaker city, married Craig Wardsworth, a son of the War Governor of New York.

***

There is no question that the year of prosperity has begun. This is the gayest season society has seen in years, and more balls, parties and dances are being given than the town has dreamed of in a decade. There seems to be a general loosening up of money bags. Business, both wholesale and retail, has begun to pick up; from the country money is flowing into the Savings Banks and there are coins innumerable for investment if the proper occasio.. be only afforded.

***

The deepest regret is expressed over the death of Mrs. W. H. L. Barnes, which occurred on Wednesday last. She was one of those thoroughly kind, good and gentle-natured women who are a blessing to the world and to their families. Though her illness has kept her retired from the world for some years, Mrs. Barnes had long been a factor in society and her friends entertained for her the most genuine esteem and affection. The expressions of sorrow at her demise are general and sincere. She belonged to a well-known New York family and leaves, besides her husband and her two sons, three brothers, two of them residents of Santa Barbara.

***

The formal incorporation of the Utica mine and the listing of its stock is taken by the initiated to mean that Alvinza Hayward has decided to retire from mining. He is old—seventy-five years—and is suffering from those ills of the flesh incident to such an advanced age. His has been a fiercely active life, but his intellectual activity has proved stronger than his physical vigor. He cares no longer to visit his various properties. It is three months since he has been to the Utica, and he proposes, I am told, to invest his money in some other form of endeavor from now on. The Dead Horse in Tuolomne county, one of his best properties, is offered for sale, and the other interests will follow—quietly, indeed, for Mr. Hayward does things without fuss. The other associates will doubtless retain their stock, especially C. D. Lane, who is a veritable enthusiast on mining, and cares more for delving after ore than for the silver question. I wonder to whom prospectors will go with their schemes with Hayward out of the way. He has had first chance at every promising property found during the last decade, and never hesitated to spend money to develope what seemed to him a good lead.

***

The disposition to sarcastic comment which Judge Coffey indulges in his court room, is not a commendable habit, though it often results in a laugh at the expense of some presumptuous lawyer. It is a favorite theory among men of judicial eminence that the amusement of the bystander is an excuse for the impertinence of a witticism. However, an energetic lawyer who was pleading a bad case with much enthusiasm and feeble logic, was stopped in the midst of his eloquence by the Judge. "Mr. Soandso," he said, "you are most unflattering. You seem to argue on the basis that the Court is only an ordinary ass. In order to accept your reasoning and believe what you pretend to believe, the Court would have to be an extraordinary ass."

***

Though there has been little support for art or artists these latter years of depression, the influence seems to have been inspiring rather than discouraging. There is to be noted a real improvement in the canvasses of our leading men and a distinct advance in the work of the younger artists- The show of pictures at the Hopkins Institute makes this clear, and it was made evident at the recent exhibition of the Sketch Club. The most conspicuous feature of the latter show was a series of portraits by Mrs. Sleeth.

PORTRAIT BY MRS. F. V. SLEETH.
From the Sketch Club's Exhibition

They evince an excellent quality of talent—good color and clever handling. The best, to my mind, is the head of Miss Henry of which I was unable to make a reproduction. The portrait which accompanies this is charming in coloring and has been especially commended. Mrs. Sleeth is president of the Sketch Club, and has devoted much time to art, with the encouraging success that has been demonstrated. At the Morris and Kennedy gallery recently I saw a capital portrait by R. L. Partington—really a clever piece of work and also a fine pastel study by Kunath—Eve—which is well worth looking at.

***

M. H. de Young of the Chronicle has just returned from a prolonged stay in Europe, and proposes to give us the benefit of his society for some moons to come. During his absence he did not forget the Park Museum. He picked up quite a number of interesting and curious objects which will be added, as they arrive, to the collection. A score of big cases are already on hand, and among the things they contain are a number of ancient Germanic relics, parchments, elaborately carved trunks, a beautiful set of iron crosses, a set of weights dating back centuries, and an elaborate collection of tea kettles, together with a new set of medals, Russian, Austrian, Italian, Belgian, Polish, English and Roman. To the collection of medallions of the Pope he has made several additions, so there are now two hundred and five in all. Mr. de Young has also found some valuable pieces of armor. These were picked up in Paris at a curio dealer's sale at prices far below those ordinarily ruling. Among the finds are a set of Chassepot rifles, needle guns, Italian guns and sabres, and a cuirass worn by Napoleon's old guard at Waterloo. Some new ivories, keys and locks will supplement the interesting collection of these objects which the Museum now boasts. Of course, these acquisitions represent in each instance a long and elaborate bargaining, in which lies the pleasure of the purchase for the buyer. Mr. de Young is a born collector, and has gained the reputation of being one of the most adroit buyers of curiosities in Europe, and the Museum collection in the park attests his skill. It has been fashionable to scoff at this collection, to declare it made up of imitations and fakes, but it is holding the attention and interest of the public to a greater degree than any other object in the park. Considering the extreme brevity of its existence, and the moderate sum expended in its creation, the showing is excellent. In some features it has no rivals—ivories, for instance, locks and South Sea Island curios, while the collection of birds, though by no means the largest, is really one of the best in America.

***

Mr. de Young's private collection has also been enriched during his stay abroad. He has added a number of fine ivories and rare miniatures to his cabinets and was able to complete his sets of decorations, which rank now as about the best in the country. He also got two very fine pictures, a Gainsborough landscape and a head by Denner, the latter a most admirable painting. The latter was obtained from Sedelmeyer, the great Parisian dealer, who in forty year's experience, has only had two canvassess by this master. There are two in the Louvre, two more at Munich and three at the Hermitage at St. Petersberg. Mr. de Young's is a fine specimen—a female head, notable for the microscopic fidelity of the painting and the perfect art of the modeling.

***

Colonel H. G. Otis of the Los Angeles Times, preserves an uncompromising attitude towards the news and lives up to the dictum of the late Dana, that whatever is good enough for the Almighty to let happen is not too bad for publication. Matthew Gage tells a story about Senator White and himself defending the Colonel in a libel suit, the verdict of the jury being against them and the Times for $1,000. It seemed to the lawyers that the decision would establish a bad precedent, inasmuch as the success of one plaintiff in a libel suit would encourage a host of such prosecutions. So Mr. Gage kept the story out of the Express and White undertook that the Herald would be equally silent. This being accomplished they came with a statement of the situation to Colonel Otis and were ready to accept congratulations. "Look here, gentlemen," said the Colonel, "there is something due the public in this. If I had won I'd have told Los Angeles all about it—isn't it my duty to tell them that I've lost? I'm gratified and I thank you, but the Times is a newspaper and the news goes, hurt whom it may." Of course this meant that White had to explain to the Herald and Gage to the Express the way the Colonel felt, just to prevent the Times having a "scoop." At least that is what The Capital says on the subject.

***

The end of the Fair controversy is by no means at hand, though the Craven case be over. New contests have been filed by the daughters and son of the late millionaire, alleging that the trust will was evoked by deception, fraud and misrepresentation. At the moment this is not an unfriendly move but is made in view of contingencies which, if consummated, would seriously interfere with the plan of campaign. It is not impossible but that the Supreme Court may reverse the decision of Judge Slack which upset the realty trust and that would set the entire property back into the hands of W. S. Goodfellow and his fellow executors, whose power to administer the revenues as they themselves thought fit would then be legally unassailable. In the absence of the Craven will there would be no other recourse for the heirs, hence the institution of these latter suits, which are really a basis of further defiances. However, if Judge Beatty and his colleagues agree with the conclusions of Judge Slack that the trust is worthless, six million of dollars will at once be distributed to young Mr. Charley Fair and his sisters, and doubtless the residue of the property will continue to be administered from the office of Mr. Goodfellow, who seems capable in the connection. If, however, the trust is sustained and then the will is contested and broken there are other wills behind it to be submitted in due course. Altogether the prospect of long sustained litigation is most encouraging.

***

The system of private vengeance which prevails among our Mongolian fellow citizens is no respector of persons. To the feuds of the tongs, priests as well as laymen are sacrificed. The latest victim of the gentle controversy between Sam Yups and See Yups is a priest of the Temple of the King of the City, who, on Sunday afternoon was stabbed to death in the presence of his joss. Of course, the assailant escaped, and among the authorities mystification reigns supreme. It seems the priest of this temple has fallen under the ban of the warring clans because he admitted the rivals to worship there. He refused, it appears, to choose between Sam Yups and See Yups, and for his impartiality, has a knife in his heart. Both insisted that he bar the other, and promised dire punishment if he went his own way, but, being an obdurate divine, this priest of the Temple, he did go his own way, and is now with the gods. Quite medieval it sounds, this practice of summary vengeance, but Chinatown is full of just such episodes, which is one reason why it is such a capital background for the stories that no one seems to write, save, at intervals, Frank Norris.

***

The extraordinary illiberality of some good people excites the regret of the writer. At a recent meeting of the University Regents it was decided that the library at Berkeley should be open on the Sabbath as well as on week days. The suggestion emanated from Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst, who, as a Regent, has a vote and a voice in all pertaining to the 'Varsity. It is impossible to imagine a more pacific and less mischievous method of passing the day of rest than to spend it reading, and one might imagine the general religious organizations of Berkeley would rejoice at this refuge from temptation. But no, the Young Men's Christian Association and the feminine Christian Association object strenuously, and actually take the attitude that the sanctity of the Lord's day is ruptured by the new ruling. It is preposterous attempting to reason with Christian youths and maidens so misguided, but their's is the spirit which would ban cakes and ale because of their own virtue—the same spirit that dictates Raines' law and prohibition. Will they never learn, these zealots, to have respect for individual liberty, and for that sovereign right of the citizen to go fishing and quaff lager and even read novels on Sunday if he so choses.

***

The parole system, inaugurated some three years ago in connection with the State Prisons of California, has proved a capital innovation. There are now out on "leave" from San Quentin sixty men, and from Folsom forty more, who every month report to the Wardens their doings, the statement being vised by the sheriff or constable of the environment in which they reside. In spite of the statements so often made before ministers' meetings and in freak journals, that it is impossible for an ex-convict to obtain work—every one of these men is engaged in some legitimate calling, and a few of them have been successful enough to save money. They are leading honest lives, and are proving the beneficence of the system which has afforded them the opportunity to regain their position in society. The Prison Directors contemplate further extensions of this parole system, of course hedging the privilege with proper precautions.

***

So Al. Hayman has executed his threat, and in earnest has shaken the dust of San Francisco from his feet. Literally he has spurned us, condemned our taste, derided our press and declares boldly he will have none of us. This is serious. According to the newspapers, the Al Hayman Co. retires and its leases are offered for sale. Friedlander, Gottlob & Co. have made an offer for the property, and from latest accounts, a contract is in course of preparation which will make the Columbia combination theatrical dictators for the coast. It is no light task they are essaying. Hayman declares his institutions have been managed at a loss, that he and Frohman are out $100,000 through companies which have played in San Francisco to empty benches. The California costs $1200 per month, and its lease has six years yet to run. It is said that the trend of traffic has so entirely deserted the northern end of town that it would be impossible to restore to the institution its ancient prestige. Recently the Columbia combination has had an interest there, and has engineered several successful musical entertainments, but the rent is a fixed expense, and virtually must be met out of the earnings of the Baldwin. The question of attractions is a salient one—if the Frohman shows are not available, what will the combination play? There seems no lack of confidence on the part of the aspirants that they will be able to meet all engagements. Their idea would be to keep the Baldwin for the very best class of attractions, playing at the Columbia such shows as "My Friend From India" and "Lost, Stolen or Strayed," which are really burlesques and appropriate for a smaller house, at the dollar rate.

***

That Hayman did make money here is undeniable, but the amusement business is now divided among many institutions, all of which contrive to make a living and something over. Besides, there has been experienced on the coast, a period of depression unexampled in our history. There you have two causes for the condition. For the third, let Mr. Hayman look to his management. He is playing at the Baldwin, companies that belong to the California, besides he sends us alleged New York successes, stripped of of the actors whose prestige created their fame. When there has been a good show at his house, a performance worthy of the price, the cry has been standing room only. It may happen that the negotiations with the Columbia people will fall through. Then it devolves on Hayman to accept the situation with such good grace as he can command. It would be amusing if the entire explosion turned out merely a stage effect introduced to stir the community to a realization of its situation.

***

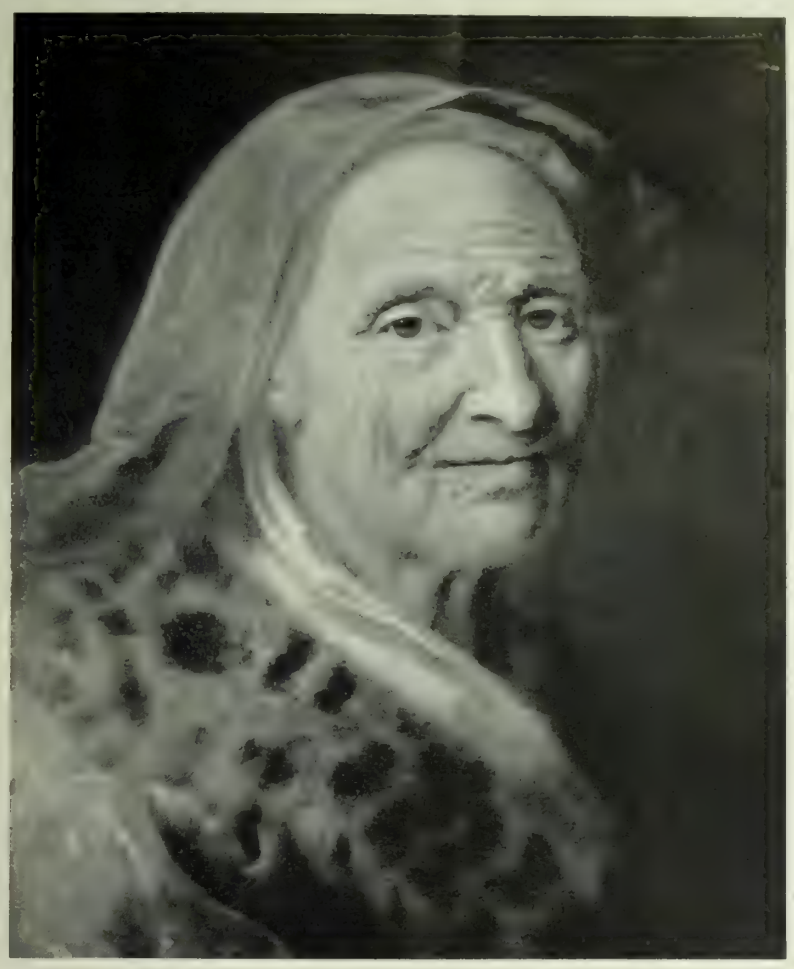
The excursions of the Cross-Country Club are not accorded that attention by the press which their interest deserves. The organization has been in existence eleven years, and its members have tramped the highways and byeways of all the bay counties, with profit both to their minds and bodies. The accompanying picture, from the camera of B. D. Bent, give a reliable impression of both the Club and the regions into which its activity takes it. Last Sunday the destination was the Big Carson Spring, reached from Fairfax Station by a good trail over a country dotted with generous growths of manzanita and chemisal. The spring gushes from the center of a rock some seven feet high, set in the center of a barren hillside and flows down into Lagunitas Creek over a bed covered with immense boulders and bridged by innumerable fallen redwoods. The scenery is really very fine, and the walk—about fourteen miles—by no means tiring. The Cross-Country Club has some forty-five member, twenty-one of whom are safe to attend its excursions which take place on alternate Sundays throughout the year. On the 28th it goes to Redwood Peak, Alameda county.

***

Anyone dependent on the daily sheets for illustrative enlightenment on football matters must be left with the impression that the present generation of university students who take part in football games are of Indian extraction. Indeed, the pictures that have been published of athletic teams of genuine descendants of the red men are far less suggestive of their origin than the pictorial makeup of the white men is of the kin of Pocahontas and Sitting Bull. The lawyer in default of a case is privileged to abuse the counsel of the opposition, and I presume that on the same principle, when an artist is not a master of his work, he feels at liberty to guy his subject and impose upon the readers of his journal by the feeble ridicule under which he attempts to shelter his incompetence. There was a time when every form of sport or outdoor amusement was submitted to this elevating process in the United States, but in those parts of the country where people prefer to be considered within the pale of civilization and insist on being treated accordingly, that style no longer obtains. Possibly the youthful exuberance of spirit which expresses itself in unearthly yells and other tinges of ruffianism on and off the football field, may lay the contestants open to the spurious form of comic treatment in which the newspapers indulge, but that is a matter

THE CROSS-COUNTRY CLUB ON BIG CARSON CREEK
Photo by B. D. Bent

which the public goodnaturedly accepts, and would doubtless prefer the truth in sketch and description from the journals to the wretched efforts whereby it is beguiled. The style of the past having been ushered in again for the present season, we fear there is now no hope, for this year at least, of any change from a hateful, played-out fashion. Nevertheless, there is a great opening for any spare enterprise or decent sensibilities in editorial circles, and one that, if availed of in a clever and sportsmanlike way, would be certain to achieve credit for the journal that made the new departure. Why should the public be supposed to appreciate recurring caricatures of athletic meetings any more than they would of — shall I say — a yacht race or a prize fight? The former contest is always treated truthfully and in good taste, and the latter is for the most part also made a serious subject, save perhaps when a colored person is elegantly satirized for his skill and pluck either as conqueror or conquered.



A Head, by Balthasar Denner, in the Dresden Gallery

***

The increase of the naval force of Great Britain in the Pacific by the addition of the two new first-class cruisers "Powerful" and "Terrible," is a significant fact. The strength of the British navy on the China station has hitherto been represented by one great battleship, four first-, three second-, and one third-class cruiser, one dispatch vessel, seven gunboats, two supply vessels, and one coast-defense ship—the latter stationed in the harbor of Hongkong. When this collection of vessels is considered, together with the ships on the Pacific station, the entire outfit represents a formidable aggregation, and implies a strong determination on the part of Great Britain to prevent any interference with her interests and naval prestige in the Far East. Unless present appearances are deceiving, the day is not far distant when Russia and Japan will be brought face to face with each other. The former power is resolved to secure by fair means or foul a more southerly terminus than Vladivostock for the trans-Siberian railroad, and the only course that seems open to the government of the Czar is to acquire a foothold on Korean territory with a port open throughout the year. Japan will be watchful to prevent this consummation, and England may be expected also to have something to say on the subject when the time comes. In the interval the policy of the latter is evidently to make a display of power in that region conspicuously greater than her present territorial interest, and at the same time to protect her lines of communication and transportation for military purposes in the Northern Pacific in case of need. The rise of Japan as a naval power has already been enlarged upon somewhat in detail in a previous issue and was subsequently pretty fully indicated by the writings of Mr. Cramp, the eminent ship-builder of Philadelphia, who, it is needless to say, is a competent and well-informed authority on the subject.

BOSWELL JR.

D'Arcy Thompson, professor of zoology in the University of Edinburgh, who is representing England in the sealing controversy, is a typical Scotchman, tall and broad, with sandy hair and beard and blue eyes. Professor Thompson studies Greek for a pastime, is a delightful personage, and possesses the manners of a courtier. He has much praise for American universities, the idea of free education especially pleasing him.

The simultaneous transfer of the Russian and German ambassadors Nelidoff and Von Jeltsch from Constantinople to Rome, indicates much diplomatic activity in the Italian capital during the coming winter. Russia's idea is to assure Italy of the friendship of France should she withdraw from the Driebund. To checkmate this scheme Germany sends Von Jeltsch who is said to understand the Russiad diplomat's peculiar methods.

Shorty Stack, Pugilist

By Frank Norris

Over at the "Big Dipper" mine a chuck-tender named Kelly had been in error as regards a box of dynamite sticks, and Iowa Hill had elected to give an "entertainment" for the benefit of his family.

The programme, as announced upon the posters that were stuck up in the Post Office and on the door of the Odd Fellows' Hall, was quite an affair. The Iowa Hill orchestra would perform, the livery-stable keeper would play the overture to "William Tell" upon his harmonica, and the town doctor would read a paper on "Tuberculosis in Cattle." The evening was to close with a "grand ball."

Then it was discovered that a professional pugilist from the "Bay" was over in Forest Hill, and someone suggested that a match could be made between him and Shorty Stack "to enliven the entertainment." Shorty Stack was a bedrock cleaner at the "Big Dipper," and handy with his fists. It was his boast that no man of his weight (Shorty fought at a hundred and forty) no man of his weight in Placer County could stand up to him for ten rounds, and Shorty had always made good this boast. Shorty knew two punches, and no more — a short-arm jab under the ribs with his right, and a left upper-cut on the point of the chin.

The pugilist's name was McCleaverty. He was an out and out dub — one of the kind who appear in four-round exhibition bouts to keep the audience amused while the "event of the evening" is preparing—but he had had ring experience, and his name had been in the sporting paragraphs of the San Francisco papers. The dub was a welter-weight and a professional, but he accepted the challenge of Shorty Stack's backers and covered their bet of fifty dollars that he could not "stop" Shorty in four rounds.

And so it came about that extra posters were affixed to the door of the Odd Fellows' Hall and the walls of the Post Office to the effect that Shorty Stack, the champion of Placer County, and Buck McCleaverty, the Pride of Colusa, would appear in a genteel boxing exhibition at the entertainment given for the benefit, etc., etc.

Shorty had two weeks in which to train. The nature of his work in the mine had kept his muscles hard enough, so his training was largely a matter of dieting and boxing an imaginary foe with a rock in each fist. He was so vigorous in his exercise and in the matter of what he ate and drank that the day before the entertainment he had got himself down to a razor-edge, and was in a fair way of going fine. When a man gets into too good condition, the least little slip will spoil him. Shorty knew this well enough, and told himself in consequence that he must be very careful.

The night before the entertainment Shorty went to call on Miss Starbird. Miss Starbird was one of the cooks at the mine. She was a very pretty girl, just turned twenty, and lived with her folks in a cabin near the superintendent's office, on the road from the mine to Iowa Hill. Her father was a shift boss in the mine, and her mother did the washing for the "office." Shorty was recognized by the mine as her young man. She was going to the entertainment with her people, and promised Shorty the first "walk-around" in the "Grand Ball" that was to follow immediately after the Genteel Glove Contest.

Shorty came into the Starbird cabin on that particular night, his hair neatly plastered in a beautiful curve over his left temple, and his pants outside of his boots as a mark of esteem. He wore no collar, but he had encased himself in a boiled shirt, which could mean nothing else but mute and passionate love, and moreover, as a crowning tribute, he refrained from spitting.

"How do you feel, Shorty?" asked Miss Starbird.

Shorty had always sedulously read the interviews with pugilists that appeared in the San Francisco papers immediately before their fights and knew how to answer.

"I feel fit to fight the fight of my life," he alliterated proudly. "I've trained faithfully and I mean to win."

"It ain't a regular prize fight, is it Shorty," she enquired. "Pa said he wouldn't take ma an' me if it was. All the women folk in the camp are going, an' I never heard of women at a fight, it ain't genteel."

"Well, I d'n know," answered Shorty, swallowing his saliva. "The committee that got the programme up called it a genteel boxing exhibition so's to get the women folks to stay. I call it a four round go with a decision."

"My! itull be exciting," exclaimed Miss Starbird. "I ain't never seen anything like it. Oh, Shorty, d'ye think you'll win?"

"I don't think nothun about it. I know I will," returned Shorty, defiantly. "If I once get in my left upper cut on him, huh!" and he snorted magnificently.

Shorty stayed and talked to Miss Starbird until ten o'clock, then he rose to go.

"I gotta get to bed," he said, "I'm in training you see."

"Oh, wait a minute," said Miss Starbird, "I been making some potato salad for the private dining of the office, you better have some; it's the best I ever made."

"No, no," said Shorty, stoutly, "I don't want any."

"Hoh," sniffed Miss Starbird, airily, "you don't need to have any."

"Well, don't you see," said Shorty, "I'm in training don't dare eat any of that kinda stuff."

"Stuff!" exclaimed Miss Starbird, her chin in the air. "No one [illegible] ever called my cooking stuff."

"Well, don't you see, don't you."

"No, I don't see. I guess you must be kind of getting whipped if you're so afraid of a little salad."

"What!" exclaimed Shorty, indignantly. "Why I could come into the ring from a jag and whip him, 'fraid! afraid. I'll show you if I'm afraid. Let's have your potato salad, let's have it. Heah! I'll show you if I'm afraid."

But Miss Starbird would not immediately consent to be appeased.

"No, you called it stuff," she said, "an' the souprintendant said I was the best cook in Placer County."

But at last, as a great favor to Shorty, she relented and brought the potato salad from the kitchen and two bottles of beer.

When the town doctor had finished his paper on "Tuberculosis in Cattle," the chairman of the entertainment committee ducked under the ropes of the ring and announced that: "The next would be the event of the evening and would the gentlemen please stop smoking." He went on to explain that the ladies present might remain without fear and without reproach as the participants in the contest would appear in gymnasium tights, and would box with gloves and not with bare knuckles.

"Well, don't they always fight with gloves?" called a voice from the rear of the house. But the chairman ignored the interruption.

The "entertainment" was held in the Odd Fellows Hall. Shorty's seconds prepared him for the fight in a back room of the saloon, on the other side of the street, and towards ten o'clock one of the committeemen came running in to say:

"What's the matter? Hurry up you fellows, McCleaverty's in the ring, already, and the crowd's beginning to stamp."

Shorty rose and slipped into an overcoat.

"All ready," he said.

"Now mind, Shorty," said Billy Hicks, as he gathered up the sponges, fans and towels, "don't mix things with him, you dont have to knock him out, all you want's the decision."

Next, Shorty was aware that he was sitting in a corner of the ring with his back against the ropes, and that diagonally opposite was a huge red man with a shaven head. There was a noisy, murmuring crowd somewhere below him, and there was a glare of kerosene lights over his head.

"Buck McCleaverty, the Pride of Colusa," announced the master of ceremonies, standing in the middle of the ring, one hand under the dub's elbow. There was a ripple of applause. Then the master of ceremonies came over to Shorty's corner, and, taking him by the arm, conducted him into the middle of the ring.

"Shorty Stack, the Champion of Placer County." The house roared; Shorty ducked and grinned and returned to his corner. He was nervous, excited. He had not imagined it would be exactly like this. There was a strangeness about it all; an unfamiliarity that made him uneasy.

"Take it slow," said Billy Hicks, kneading the gloves, so as to work the padding away from the knuckles. The gloves were laced on Shorty's hands.

"Up you go," said Billy Hicks, again. "No, not the fight yet, shake hands first. Don't get rattled."

Then ensued a vague interval, that seemed to Shorty interminable. He had a notion that he shook hands with McCleaverty, and that some one asked him if he would agree to hit with one arm free in the breakaway. He remembered a glare of lights, a dim vision of rows of waiting faces, a great murmuring noise, and he had a momentary glimpse of someone he believed to be the referee; a young man in shirt-sleeves and turned-up trousers. Then everybody seemed to be getting out of the ring and away from him, even Billy Hicks left him after saying something he did not understand. Only the referee, McCleaverty and himself were left inside the ropes.

"Time!"

Somebody, that seemed to Shorty strangely like himself, stepped briskly out into the middle of the ring, his left arm before him, his right fist clinched over his breast. The crowd, the glaring lights, the murmuring noise, all faded away. There only remained the creaking of rubber soles over the resin, of the boards of the ring and the sight of McCleaverty's shifting, twinkling eyes and his round, close-cropped head.

"Break!"

The referee stepped between the two men and Shorty realized that the two had clinched, and that his right forearm had been across McCleaverty's throat, his left clasping him about the shoulders.

What! Were they fighting already. This was the first round, of course, somebody was shouting.

"That's the stuff, Shorty."

All at once Shorty saw the flash of a red muscled arm, he threw forward his shoulder ducking his head behind it, the arm slid over the raised shoulder and a bare and unprotected flank turned towards him.

"Now," thought Shorty. His arm shortened and leaped forward. There was a sudden impact. The shock of it jarred Shorty himself, and he heard McCleaverty grunt. There came a roar from the house.

"Give it to him, Shorty."

Shorty pushed his man from him, the heel of his glove upon his face. He was no longer nervous. The lights didn't bother him.

"I'll knock him out yet," he muttered to himself.

They fiddled and feinted about the ring, watching each other's eyes. Shorty held his right ready. He told himself he would jab McCleaverty again on the same spot when next he gave him an opening.

"Break!"

They must have clinched again, but Shorty was not conscious of it. A sharp pain in his upper lip made him angry. His right shot forward again, struck home, and while the crowd roared and the lights began to swim again, he knew that he was rushing McCleaverty back, back, back, his arms shooting out and in like piston rods, now for an upper cut with his left on the——

"Time!"

Billy Hicks was talking excitedly. The crowd still roared. His lips pained. Someone was spurting water over him, one of his seconds worked the fans like a windmill. He wondered what Miss Starbird thought of him now.

"Time!"

He barely had a chance to duck, almost double, while McCleaverty's right swished over his head. The dub was swinging for a knockout already. The round would be hot and fast.

"Stay with um, Shorty."

"That's the stuff, Shorty."

He must be setting the pace, the house plainly told him that. He stepped in again and cut loose with both fists.

"Break."

Shorty had not clinched. Was it possible that McCleaverty was clinching "to avoid punishment." Shorty tried again, stepping in close, his right arm crooked and ready.

"Break."

The dub was clinching. There could be no doubt of that. Shorty gathered himself together and rushed in, upper-cutting viciously; he felt McCleaverty giving way before him.

"He's got um going."

There was exhiliration in the shout. Shorty swung right and left, his fist struck something that hurt him. Sure, he thought, that must have been a good one. He recovered, throwing out his left before him. Where was the dub? not down there on one knee in a corner of the ring? The house was a pandemonium, near at hand some one was counting, "one—two—three—four—"

Billy Hicks rushed into the ring and dragged Shorty back. "Come back to your corner. It's the rules when he's up to go right in to finish him. He ain't knocked out yet. He's just taking his full time. Swing for his chin again, you got him going. If you can put him out, Shorty, we'll take you to San Francisco."

"Seven—eight—nine—"

McCleaverty was up again. Shorty rushed in, something caught him a fearful jar in the pit of the stomach. He was sick in an instant, racked with nausea. The lights began to dance.

"Time."

There was water on his face and body again, deliciously cool. The fan windmills swung round and round. "What's the matter, what's the matter," Billy Hicks was asking anxiously.

Something was wrong. There was a lead-like weight in Shorty's stomach, a taste of potato salad came to his mouth, he was sick almost to vomiting.

"He caught you a hard one in the wind just before the gong, did he?" said Billy Hicks. "There's fight in him yet. He's got a straight arm body blow you want to look out for. Don't let up on him. Keep——"

"Time!"

Shorty came up bravely. In his stomach there was a pain that made it torture to stand erect. Nevertheless he rushed, lashing out right and left. He was dizzy; before he knew it he was beating the air. Suddenly his chin jolted backward, and the lights began to spin; he was tiring rapidly, too, and with every second his arms grew heavier and heavier and his knees began to tremble more and more. McCleaverty gave him no rest. Shorty tried to clinch, but the dub sidestepped, and came in twice with a hard right and left over the heart. Shorty's gloves seemed made of iron; he found time to mutter, "If I only hadn't eaten that stuff last night."

What with the nausea and the pain, he was hard put to it to keep from groaning. It was the dub who was rushing now; Shorty felt he could not support the weight of his own arms another instant. What was that on his face that was warm and tickled? He knew that he had just strength enough left for one more good blow; if he could only uppercut squarely on McCleaverty's chin it might suffice.

"Break."

The referee thrust himself between them, but instantly McCleaverty closed again. Would the round never end? The dub swung again, missed, and Shorty saw his chance; he stepped in, upper-cutting with all the strength he could summon up. The lights swan again, and the roar of the crowd dwindled to a couple of voices. He smelt whisky.

"Gimme that sponge." It was Billy Hicks voice. "He'll do all right now."

Shorty suddenly realized that he was lying on his back. In another second he would be counted out. He raised himself, but his hands touched a bed quilt and not the resined floor of the ring. He looked around him and saw that he was in the back room of the saloon where he had dressed. The fight was over.

"Did I win," he asked, getting on his feet.

"Win!" exclaimed Billy Hicks. "You were knocked out. He put you out after you had him beaten. Oh, you're a peach of a fighter, you are."

* * * *

Half an hour later, when he had dressed, Shorty went over to the Hall. His lip was badly swollen and his chin had a funny shape, but otherwise he was fairly presentable. The Iowa Hill orchestra had just struck into the march for the walk around. He pushed through the crowd of men around the door looking for Miss Starbird. Just after he had passed he heard a remark and the laugh that followed it:

"Quitter, oh, what a quitter."

Shorty turned fiercely about and would have answered, but just at that moment he caught sight of Miss Starbird. She had just joined the promenade for the walk around with some other man. He went up to her:

"Didn't you promise to have this walk around with me?" he said aggrievedly.

"Well, did you think I was going to wait all night for you?" returned Miss Starbird.

As she turned from him and joined the march Shorty's eye fell upon her partner.

It was McCleaverty.

* * *

The Chambers of Deputies in France will have before them the subject of bull fighting. For some time the sport has been in vogue in the south of France and recently a successful effort was made to introduce it in the north. At Roubaix, near Lille, a fight on a large scale under the patronage of the municipal council came off before an immense crowd. These exhibitions are not imitations of the real article, but according to all the traditions of the bull ring. The hold it has taken upon the French people, especially in the South, may be gauged by the fact that a revolution nearly resulted in Nimes from the attemps of the authorities to stop the spectacle.

* * *

If the King of Siam should come to the United States, he ought to prove a "good thing" for hotel-keepers. When en route to Europe he made a short stay in the island of Ceylon, and at Colombo his hotel bill, which included one dinner, breakfast and luncheon, came to $1,100. At Kandy, for rooms, one dinner, and one breakfast, he was charged $1,300 by the hotel.

DEAN FARRAR'S MEMORIES

Reminiscences of Tennyson and Browning His Friends the Bishops.

Dean Farrar made a serious error in entitling his book of memories Men I Have Known (Thos. E. Crowell & Co.). It should be Men Who Have Been Good Enough to Know Me. His tone throughout is decorously deferential. He wonders, at regular intervals, at the good fortune which has enabled him to become intimate with so many prominent and notable gentlemen, and he is highly solicitous lest it might be suggested that he is making "copy" out of his acquaintanceships without proper excuse. So, laboriously the Dean tells us in the introduction, that there is nothing "necessarily vulgar or trivial in such a refined and modified Boswellism as may seem to be involved in slight Reminisences," and adds "that no one would disdain more absolutely than myself the ignoble chatter of mere petty gossips and, above all, of that petty malign detraction which seems to have a strong attraction for small minds." So it is not to make a saleable volume, that these memories of the Dean have been written out but to show posterity how the geniuses of his generation appeared through his spectacles. In this effort to entertain and yet to be perfectly proper, however, he has produced a priggish book that is really an advertisement of his own place among his contemporaries. He will not have you overlook the fact that he went to Tennyson's house frequently, and quite often met Browning at dinner and had some very slight communication with Darwin and Huxley and Cardinal Newman. Here are letters from all these gentlemen—generally in answer to some invitation or inquiry, and he transcribes the dedication of Lord Lytton's translation of Horace, in which fulsome testimony is paid to his "Intellect enriched by the variety of culture which gives renown to the scholar, etc." This is not adduced "out of vanity," mind, "but only to show the kindness of Lord Lytton's heart."

Dean Farrar is a successful clergyman, gifted with the talent of keeping himself before the public, and the ability to initiate that form of controversy which will attract attention to the controversialist. It is really a journalistic type of mind, its prototype is that of W. T. Stead of the Review of Reviews—the smart person who wrote If Christ Came to Chicago. Being a conservative and decorous clergyman, sensationalism befitted not his chosen role, so Dr. Farrar identified himself with movements. He it was who inaugurated the crusade against Hell. He wrote a popular life of Christ, and lectured in America. Altogether the Dean is a smart man, who knows his business, and has conspicuously "arrived." He has been Head Master of Marlborough School, was Canon and is now Dean of Canterbury. If his memories are not otherwise valuable, they afford an insight into the arts of prominence as he practised them. To turn to the book itself, however, one cannot but feel how much more interesting the Dean might have been, especially about Bishops, had his pose concerned him less. Really, it is not Tennyson he tells us about, but merely his personal relations with the poet. His style is a loose journalese, and he is quite without that power of graphic presentation which is so essential in a work of this character. To commence with Tennyson—with whom he seems to have been decorously friendly—really he adds nothing to our knowledge of the poet's personality, though he tells us he suggested the theme of St. Telemachus. It is not uninteresting to know that Tennyson thought he had put some of his best poetical work into the "Princess," and regretted not having constructed a stronger and more serious frame work. There are several accounts of walks and talks, for instance this: "I shall never forget how one evening we did not return from our walk until it was nearly dark, and our footsteps disturbed the many birds which sheltered themselves in undisturbed security in the densely flowering shrubs and trees which surrounded the poet's home. As the birds uttered their various notes, he stopped with delight and said, 'There! that is a blackbird; and that a thrush; and that a robin; and that a blue-tit.' He thus showed both the keenness of hearing and his intimately familiar knowledge of the 'voices of the birds.'" Wonderful, was it not, that Tennyson should have known a blackbird when he heard it? He tells of Tennyson plucking a blossom in his garden one day and commenting in the good old strain about how utterly ignorant we all are about the laws which underlie the life of even a single flower. Most important of all is the description of the marriage of Lionel Tennyson and Miss Locker Lamson, at which the Dean officiated. He describes it with a real society air, and an amusing delight at the number of celebrities who gathered for the occasion.

Browning, the Dean seems to have met often but all he can remember of the many conversations they apparently had together, is of certain Mahomedan myths which the poet narrated with great skill. He told Dr. Farrar that in the poem, La Saisaiz, he had "given utterances to some of my deepest convictions about this life and the life to come." Also that he had written the poem about "The Good News From Ghent" during a sea voyage from Messina to Naples. The desire for a swift gallop was in his mind and being denied the pleasure of a ride he took one in imagination—hence the swinging measure of the poem. Browning never offered any explanations of the serious difficulties of his style and the Dean never had the courage to invite any from him. Whenever casually asked for an explanation the poet used deliberately to put off the query with remarks he did not always intend to be understood too seriously. He was once questioned about the origin of "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came." He said that it was suggested partly by a lonely castle turret which he had seen in the Alpines, and partly by an old piece of tapestry owned by his father on which was represented a horse, which looked as gaunt and ghastly as the one described in the verse. The lesson lay enshrined in the poem itself, but if anyone desired to profit by it, he must find it for himself. Browning really resented bitterly the neglect to which his work had so long been subjected. He told often the story about a copy of "Bells and Pomegranates" falling into the hands of John Stuart Mill, then in the height of his power and importance, who was much impressed with the poetry and the originality it contained. He wrote to the editor of Tait's Magazine, then a leading literary organ, asking if he might review the book in the forthcoming number. The editor replied that the previous issue had contained a review of "Bells and Pomegranates." Browning read the review which was as follows: "'Bells and Pomegranates' by Robert Browning—balderdash." That episode, the poet believed had delayed his fame at least twenty years.

Rather more graphic are the impressions of Mathew Arnold, whose boys the Dean taught at Rugby. They met frequently, and were evidently friends. He paints the author of Literature and Dogma as a most lovable man, full of humor, with a delightful wit, and very fond of his home. That superciliousness of which his contemporaries so often complained did not characterize his demeanor when among his intimates, but his personality was revealed in all its charming simplicity and dignity. Quite a good story it is the Dean tells about Huxley and Arnold conversing one day about dinner-parties. The former said that, as a rule, he did not care at all about going out. "Ah!" said Arnold, "I rather like it. It is rather nice to meet people." "Oh, yes," replied Huxley, "but we are not all such everlasting Cupids as you!"

One feels Dr. Farrar is on his own ground when he comes to talk of Dean Stanley. The most interesting memory of that great cleric is of his speech at an important meeting of the clergy in the National Society's rooms at Westminster, convened to denounce one of Bishop Colenso's archdeacons, and incidentally Bishop Colenso himself. The Archbishop of Canterbury presided, and the Archbishop of York sat beside him. It was at a time of great controversy throughout the English Church, and the liberality of Colenso's theories had excited extreme wrath among narrow-minded churchmen. The unfortunate Bishop had been toasted and roasted by his colleagues, when Dean Stanley arose and pronounced a glowing eulogy on the absent dignitary, recited that he alone among colonial bishops had taken the trouble to learn the language of his episcopate; that he had translated the Scriptures into the Zulu tongue, and that he never came home to England save to assist the oppressed and needy. "Sneer at Bishop Colenso," he said, defiantly, at the close of his speech; "Bishop Colenso's name will be remembered and honored when" (with a sweep of his arm) "when every one of you are dead, buried and utterly forgotten."

The persecution to which Colenso was subjected is again alluded to in the chapter on the Bishop himself. Colenso told Dr. Farrar that he found it difficult to get servants, and that his laundress had actually declined to wash for him because by doing so she lost customers. Once when Farrar had been preaching in a large West End church, the Bishop invited him to his house and they walked out together arm and arm. There passed around an awe-struck whisper: "He's walking with Bishop Coleson.

Of course the Dean knew Cardinal Manning and had some intercourse with him—but their communications were, for the most part, epistolary—a specimen of the Manning handwriting being submitted, of course. He adds a story of Bishop Moberly's about the great convert when at Oxford. It seems Manning was a youth full of eager ability and self-confidence. Once in construing a difficult passage Thucydides, he made a mistake which Moberly corrected. "Oh, sir," said Manning, "my rendering is, I assure you, quite tenable." This was said with such an air of conviction that Moberly was silent and proceeded to analyse the passage again. Meeting the young man later in the quadrangle he said "How could you defend your translation of that passage in Thucydides? It was quite wrong." "Oh, sir," said Manning, with a smile, and entirely unabashed, "didn't you observe that I had not looked at it before." Manning and Moberly corresponded after they had both left Oxford, and about the time rumors were being circulated about the former's conversion to Romanism, the latter received the last charge which Manning published as Archdeacon. It was an argument on the Episcopalian side of the controversy, and Moberly wrote that he was glad to receive it inasmuch as it disproved the rumors about his leaving the English communion Manning replied: "In my charge I have only stated the case of the Church of England, I wish it were tenable." Shortly afterwards he became a Catholic. C.

JOB.

BY LOUIS A. ROBERTSON.

Majestic Mourner! when thy spirit moaned
  Itself to music on thy peerless page,
When thy great grief in mighty measures groaned,
  And when Fate flung to thee her galling gage,
  Oh, what a soul-sustaining heritage
Was hidden in the fortitude that owned
  How vain and weak it were a war to wage
With Him, the Lord, who sits in Heaven enthroned.
Thy flesh was fed to foulness, Sorrow clad
  Thy soul with sackcloth, and thy forehead frowned
    With the black ashes of a heart consumed.
But through it all, Oh Man of Uz, thy sad,
  But sure philosophy thy trials crowned
    With perfect peace that out of sorrow bloomed.

* * *

Speaking of the prosecution of the native press in India for seditious writings, the London Times says:

The tone of the native press has improved since the prosecutions instituted against the worst offenders. The necessity of these was clearly proved. Not so long ago the Hindu Advocate of Lahore held the English people up to public contempt, commenting on Sir Edwin Collen's statement in the Viceroy's Council that the profession of prostitution in India was not looked upon as one of unqualified shame. The Advocate denounced Sir Edwin Collen, and described one half of the English race as bastards, stating that female chastity was exceptional, and unchastity the rule.

The most liberal-minded person can hardly blame the Indian Government for calling a halt when things got as bad as that.

* * *

It is said that John Wanamaker, whose establishment in Philadelphia gives employment to 4,000 clerks and is believed to return a profit of at least a million dollars a year, occupies as his own private office a little room 10x12 feet and does his work at a $25 desk. He is of opinion that the great store erected in New York by A. T. Stewart, and which Wanamaker now owns and carries on, is better suited for the purpose than any of the modern structures which are erected for a similar trade. The building cost Stewart nearly $3,000,000. Mr. Wanamaker says that he has tried all kinds of advertising, but that he now uses the newspapers almost entirely.

PARADE FOR THE OPENING HANDICAP AT THE OAKLAND TRACK

The horses are coming out in the following order: Libertine (H. Shields), Senator Bland (Holmes). Ostler Joe (H. Brown), Shasta Water (Clawson), The Roman (Morse), Chartreuse II (McNichols). Satsuma (Jones), Imp. Trance (McHugh), Grady (Hennessy), Thelma (Gray).

THE RACING SEASON

Modern Turf Projects in California—The Ingleside and Oakland Tracks.

At the beginning of the present month the racing season, which extends through the fall, winter and spring, was opened in San Francisco under most favorable auspices, and to all appearances there is a steady growth of public interest in the affairs of the Turf. In the last three years California has seen a great development in the racing business. In 1893-4 the first of the series of annual meetings was conducted at the then existing Bay District track, under the management of the California Jockey Club, the successor of the old Blood Horse Association, and the venture proving successful, a repetition followed in 1894-5. It then becoming certain that the site of the old Bay District track would soon be required for building purposes, a movement was made for the establishment of other racing facilities, which eventually resulted in the formation of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club to operate a track at Ingleside. This was accordingly built, and the first meeting conducted there, in 1895-6, proved a success, both from a financial and sporting point of view. The California Jockey Club continued to race at Bay District, the only difference being that, instead of their meeting being a continuous one, as had formerly been the case, they raced every other two weeks only, the younger club closing their track when the senior institution went into session. Thus amicable opposition and friendly rivalry was brought about, and has since continued with unquestionable benefit to both concerns and their patrons, whether the latter are closely identified with the Turf, or merely spectators while the races are being run.

For the season of 1896-7 the California Jockey Club was obliged to relinquish the old headquarters of racing in California, where so many memorable contests had been seen between both running and trotting horses, and established itself on the site of the old Oakland track, which, improved and beautified in accordance with modern requirements so as to be changed beyond all recognition, became the scene of the first meeting under the present regime. The California Jockey Club found the change in every way advantageous and, sparing neither expense nor pains to attract the public and please the horse-owners, its first season at Oakland was a pronounced success. At the outset the majority of people seemed to think that the necessity of making the trip across the bay would deter a great many from attending the races there, but this judgment has proved wholly incorrect, and only went to show once more that majorities are not always right and that the race-habit is not fully understood. In point of time Oakland has the advantage of Ingleside, so far as transportation is concerned, and the trip across the bay is as a rule a pleasant one, while the little run by special trains on the other side is but momentary. The service to Ingleside has been improved this year by the running of street cars on a three-minute schedule without change, but the special trains of the Southern Pacific are specially slow ones and the regular race-goers complain very generally that it should take so long to cover the five or six miles from the city to the course. The Pacific Coast Jockey Club certainly has a claim to better treatment on the part of the railroad. The best way of all to enjoy a visit to Ingleside is to drive out, but of course that is a pleasure which comparatively few can allow themselves. However, all said and done, both tracks are favored as to the routes by which they are reached, and if the people who complain here had to submit to the delays and discomforts of reaching the races in other places they would probably find themselves speechless with disgust. Californians are sometimes better off than they think, and at other times they are just as mistaken the other way. However, in the matter of getting to the races they have an uncommonly easy time.

In this present issue is included a large number of sketches illustrating the features at both our tracks, and whether the reader be an ardent race-goer or has never been present on either of the courses, we believe the scenes and incidents depicted will be of considerable interest.

Everybody knows that a large number of people consider the Turf an iniquitous institution, just as some condemn the theatre and other forms of popular amusement; but, fortunately, the community at large is not regulated by the more narrow-minded section. It is the abuse of these enjoyments that constitutes their evil effect, and if more people could only be got to see that the sport of racing has far greater inducements to offer to those who will cultivate a legitimate taste for it than the mere opportunity of gambling, the Turf would take higher rank than it does. This is most needed in this country, for in Europe, especially in England, admittedly the leader in racing matters, numbers of men and women of the highest distinction, interest themselves in its affairs solely for the sake of the pleasure and not the profit, to be got out of so doing. To attain this end here the tone of the sport must be kept as high as possible and everything that tends to demoralize it must be carefully watched for and cut adrift. In this respect the last three years have seen a great advance here. There is reason to hope that the improvement will continue, and that as time goes on the best class of people will identify themselves more and more with the Turf in California.

In the half century of its existence as a State, the most wonderful results have been achieved in the way of horse-breeding and the industry is of the greatest importance. In order that it may continue to full advantage, the maintenance of first-class racecourses is s positive necessity. The owners of the existing tracks in this neighborhood, are as fully alive to the situation as it is possible to be, and if their policy in the past be any indication of their plans for the future, we may hope to see both racing and horse-breeding continue hand in hand as a source of untold benefits to California. Nothing does more to advertise the State as one of the most desirable portions of the universe, and to furnish employment and delightful recreation for the manly section of its inhabitants and visiting residents. Even if the inevitable gambling adjunct be considered, it is noticable that since racing became permanently established here there is far less indoor gambling than there used to be. Whatever evil there be is unconcealed, and, as far as possible, under control, roguery in any form being scotched whenever discovered.

The accompanying sketches suffice to show the convenient and elegant manner in which the Ingleside and Oakland tracks are equipped, and in some degree a fair idea can be gained of the orderly and systematic way in which the racing is administered. Pictures, however, necessarily fail to convey the full measure of life and spirit that pervade the gatherings on the course and, as has been urged before in these columns, no one who can enjoy pleasant surroundings, even if they have no liking for racing contests, will find themselves unrewarded should they pay a visit to the tracks while the sport is in progress. In Kentucky and other parts of the country, where there are well kept and laid out tracks, that are not nearly so beautifully located and completely designed and finished as our tracks here, people resort to them as they would to parks for recreation, even when no racing is going on.

Concluding these remarks with a short description of the tracks themselves, it may be observed that the Ingleside track is situated on the Ocean House Road about five miles from the heart of the city, and is conveniently reached by special trains on every race day from the Townsend street depot of the S. P. R. R., and also by electric car on the Mission extension road. For those who prefer to drive or ride out the road through the Park, past the asylum ou to the Balboa Boulevard, will be found delightful.

The course itself is 85 feet wide at the homestretch, the turns and back stretch being 70 feet in width. The grand stand will seat 4,000 people, and below is the vast betting ring with the paddock, containing twenty-six stalls, jockeys' room, secretary's office and other necessary adjuncts close at hand. A separate clubhouse for members of the Jockey Club is annexed to the grand stand, and the whole of these elegantly finished buildings are approached by well laid-out avenues and surrounded by charming lawns, gardens and shrubberies. The stables afford room for 1,000 horses, and consist of several blocks of well-finished buildings, the drainage and sewerage throughout the track being admirably engineered.

The Club entered upon its third season on November 1st, and racing will continue every alternate fortnight until about the middle of May, 1898, giving at least five races each day with purses of $400 to $7,500 in value.

The president is Senator S. N. Androus, vice-president, Henry J. Crocker; secretary, F. H. Green; these gentlemen, with E. Corrigan, W. S. Hobart, M. F. Tarpey and J. Malowansky constituting the Board of Directors, with their business office at the Palace Hotel.

The Oakland course is situated at Emeryville, and is reached by ferryboat from the foot of Market street, passengers proceeding from the Oakland mole by a train journey of seven minutes to the station at the track. In its appointments it is very similar to Ingleside and equally dommonious in every respect.

The Board of Directors is composed of the following gentlemen: Thos. H. Williams Jr., President; D. M. Burns, First Vice-President; Henry Ach, Second Vice-President; M. A. Gunst, Louis Lissak, with R. B. Milroy, Secretary; and the company has its business office at Sutter and Kearny streets.

BENEDICT.

IN THE NIGHT.

BY ROBT PORTER

In the night,
In the endless hours before the dawn
Lie breathless and listen,
Listen and hear—
Hear the lilt, the monotone that swings
From off the quivering hoop of Life.
Wrung from the aching,
Wrung from the weary,
The loveless,
The loved.
Anguish deep from the heart of things,
The cry of unknown souls,
Unborn, and yet in fear.
The song of useless endeavor,
Unending endeavor and useless achieving,
Of passionate striving, and pulseless attaining.
Then
The heart of the lotus
The touch of Nivvana
The vision of sleep that is endless;
Strivingless drowsiness,
Fullness of feeling and numbness of thought
Promiseful, smiling, inscrutable death;
Masterful death
Quietness, restfullness, peace.

Tod Sloan, the American jockey whose riding has excited so much comment in England, has apartments at the Hotel Cecil, with his valet, and goes back and forth by train to the various race meetings. Sloan had $2000 on St. Cloud II for the Cambridgeshire Stakes, and, as jockeys are not allowed to bet over there, the Jockey Club's attention has been called to his proclivities. It is urged that if he remains in England he must be stopped from betting.

Pope Leo made eight hogsheads of wine this year from the vineyard he had set out in the Vatican gardens. A small part of the wine is reserved for his own use, another portion is sent to churches to be used at mass, and the rest is sold. The Pope is proud of the profits of his agricultural enterprise, and intends to plant more vines in the Vatican and at Castel Gandolfo.

1. Club House. 2. Light Weights. 3. Watching a race from the paddock lane. 4. Weighing out. 5. Judges' and Timers' Stands and Signalling Boards. 6. Press Room. 7. A glimpse of the Grand Stand Balcony. 8. Leaving the Paddock for the Course. 9. A winner returning to weigh in. 10. Jockey Clawson promises to win.

INGLESIDE TRACK: THE PROPERTY OF THE PACIFIC COAST JOCKEY CLUB

1, Jockeys returning tô the paddock after a race. 2. Lining up at the gate. 3. Starter Ferguson improves his mind while waiting for the horses to come to the post. 4. The Home-stretch. 5. A corner of the betting ring. 6. Carriage entrance. 7. Grand Stand: Judges' Stand in the foreground. 8. Covered walk from the Railway Station to the Grand Stand.

OAKLAND TRACK: THE PROPERTY OF THE CALIFORNIA JOCKEY CLUB

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I am afraid, dearest diary, if this whirl of gaiety continue your poor little Cricket will have to take a rest-cure or some such other heroic treatment. I am so worn out that I can neither eat nor sleep, except out of order. I peck at a few dainties at luncheons and suppers, and take forty winks in the carriage when whirling between places. Papa says that I am no longer even rational and avers that this shall be my last as well as my first season. Even Leila is utterly fatigued, and she has only been invited to the larger affairs.

The week commenced with Therese Morgan's reception and dinner-dance on Friday. Dear me, I can hardly describe what a capital time I had. The tea started at five sharp when we girls were all in attendance. Our costumes were more elaborate, I think, than at the other affairs, and some of us changed afterwards for the dinner. The house was superb in its decorations. The drawing-room was hung in gorgeous scarlet hibiscus, the dining-room with those brilliant-hued ladyapples on branches. Mrs. Morgan, Therese and Ella received the guests. Mrs. Morgan wore black velvet and lace, a very smart gown. Ella was in pale pink and white. Therese's gown was a dream made of white chiffon spangled in opals which caught the different lights and reflected them. I never saw her look more stunning; Edna Hopkins was piquant as ever in white chiffon; Margaret Salisbury wore white with long sweeping ends of chiffon depending from the shoulder, which looked effective; Helen Hopkins wore a fetching frock of pale green and white striped silk trimmed with graduated ruffles of chiffon. After the tea we all tripped upstairs to the garret which was transformed into a banquet hall. The tables were all round and each adorned in pink, the covers of some novel bamboo cloth. The decorations of ferns with lights peeping through the bamboos had a most picturesque effect. Later we danced. Therese and Mr. Greenway led the German. The figures were pretty and on the marching order, the favors charming little arrangements in the form of paper jockey caps for the men, umbrellas and fans for the girls—I shall keep mine as a souvenir of one of the smartest affairs of the season.

On Saturday I rested all the morning, took a massage treatment and a milk and oil bath. In the afternoon I felt remarkably fit and ready for the several teas. I first went to Clara Hamilton's, a pretty affair with bevies of young people. None of the older set were invited. Alice Hoffman, Addie Murphy, Miss Stranahan and Florence Josselyn assisted in receiving. Thence I hastened home, donned my "war paint," as Arthur calls my organdie gowns, and rushed down to Marie Wells' where I assisted in receiving. I was a little late and found a perfect horde of people. Shoals of men—more even than at Leontine's, where they almost outnumbered the girls. The house was literally massed with flowers—roses of every hue were placed in the reception rooms—the banisters banked with chrysanthemums, the dining-room gay with scarlet berries and buds. Mrs. Wells, Marie and her cousin Marie Oge were in the window. Mrs. Wells wore a stunning gown of green silk; Marie Wells was in organdie, a love of a frock covered with lace arrayed in divers designs; Marie Oge's costume was somewhat similarly built. Both of them looked really beautiful and I had to make my calculations as to the belles of the season once again. Mary Belle Gwin also looked especially well in pale blue silk. Ethel Keeney, Leontine Blakeman and Charlotte were among the prettiest of the girls. Afterwards a number of the men came in and we had a buffet supper. It was such fun and so delightfully original. We danced until the bells warned us of the approach of the Sabbath. On Sunday, in the afternoon, I went to the Scheel Concert which was packed, and in the evening retired to get a few hours beauty sleep. A lot of the boys came in in the afternoon and were disgusted to hear of my absence but when music beckons I fly—it hath charms more potent than even the bright eyes of my favorite youth. I have not told you his name, dearest Diary—I may later. Now, I myself, can hardly say.

On Monday in the afternoon I went to the farewell concert of the Henschels, and had a most enjoyable hour or so. Everyone was there. I saw Mrs. J. Downey Harvey, the Moodys, Mrs. M. H. de Young and countless others. Then home and an hour's rest before dressing for Mrs. Carroll's dinner at the 'Varsity Club. It was a genuine function—no other term can be used. The table decorations were in excellent taste, and the gowns of the girls immense. I shan't say aught of the menu save that even my peckish appetite was stimulated. The handsomest of the frocks were those of Mrs. Whittier, a confection of white chiffon over taffeta, with reseda crepe laid on in cords. The skirt had graduated cords. The waist was banded with them. Over the shoulders and in the center were straps of insertion of embroidered chiffon, with the crepe running through. Gertie was in white and looked well. Therese Morgan's gown also pleased me—it was of white taffeta trimmed with lace. On Tuesday I had a most exciting day of it. First there was Lucy Jackson's lunch at the 'Varsity Club, when we all wore our loveliest frocks. Lucy looked stunning, I admire her anyway, she is so tall and well made. She was in light green silk with a big picture hat. I don't think Leontine Blakeman ever looked so well as in her costume of royal blue trimmed in mink. Helen Thornton was in dark green and red, and Clara Hamilton in pearl grey silk. The table was decked in jacqueminot roses. In the evening I went to a big theatre party given by Mr. Greenway at the Baldwin. There were about thirty of us, and we simply made things hum. The Baldwin fairly resounded with our mirth—afterwards to supper at the 'Varsity, when Walter Martin distinguished himself. He is the funniest of youths, and has quite superseded Addison Mizner as King of the Brownies. He is quite bright, too, graduated with honors from Georgetown, if you please. But he tells the funniest tales. I don't always understand the wit of them, but he looks so ludicrous when he is relating a commonplace incident that the most dignified of the matrons is bound to laugh. Another man who has caught the popular favor is M. de Haven, a young French cavalry officer—a friend of Baron von Schroeder. He does not in the least resemble the French type as most of us understand it. He is tall, slight, with blue eyes and curly brown hair. I like his accent immensely and his gestures are positively irresistible—his shrugs more entertaining than most fellows' epigrams.

Oh, I have not told you of the girls Mr. Greenway entertained. There was Ethel Patten in black satin and purple velvet, Lillie Follis in pearl grey. I always admire her gowns, they are chosen with more real relation to the wearer and to the occasion than the clothes of most of us buds. Mamma is always scolding me for my carelessness in not discriminating between my dresses. Had I my way I should never wear aught but tailor built frocks, but mamma says there is a future and—I am not so plump that frills add too much to my contour. Then, late as it was, I went to the Wood's ball. Leila had gone earlier with papa and mamma, so Aunt Sybil chaperoned me. I found everything going swimmingly, and the boys enthusiastic about the supper. One or two told me they had taken no less than six different girls down and had a fresh supply with each! Maud Woods was in white and looked ever so bonny. The Van Winkles were all there. Ethel Murphy wore a smart frock and looked very chic; it was of white silk trimmed in pearls. Florence Josselyn also was daintily gowned in white lace trimmed with lilies of the valley. I could not help admiring Marie Messer, she is so graceful, and dances like Terpsichore herself. Helen Thornton was in white silk, Bertie Bruce in white with blue ribbons.

On Wednesday evening was the Thomas ball. Were it not a trial to your patience, dear Diary, I should again go into ecstasies, but I can't help it. It was a perfect affair, and we all had capital fun. The debutantes were there en masse, all in their white frocks. Who was the belle? I do not know, or perhaps I should not like to say. I know Helen Thomas' frock was the second prettiest in the room. It was of white satin, embroidered in pearls. Marie Wells was adorable in white organdie and lace. Lillie Follis and the Carolans were pleasing pictures. Oh, but I cannot discriminate—'t would be easier to pick out the plain girls, I think. On Thursday Bernie Drown gave a violet luncheon, at which we debutantes were well represented. Bernie wore a stylish frock; Gertie Oge also looked well—she is enjoying the last weeks of her season here as she goes East in December; she wore a green and white check silk with points of pleated chiffon. Florence Stone, Bertie Bruce and many others were there. In the afternoon to Mrs. Lents' and Mabel Bacon's teas. Both were jolly affairs, though they did not differentiate from the usual. At Mrs. Lent's there was more of the older crowd; at Mabel's, the younger set was conspicuous. Yesterday there was Mrs. Newhall's tea, which I shall tell you of next week.

A catalogue for Saturday—the Carrolls, Hopkins and Bertie Bruce's. Next week promises to be equally gay. There is Charlotte Ellinwood's ball on Tuesday. Then the Doll Show at which we are all to receive—all we buds, I mean. We anticipate an event of social as well as financial importance. All the youths have promised to save their shekels, and try and make our especial dolls win the prizes, and now, adieu, dear Diary; were it not for conscience' sake my confidences would be shorter. Till another sennight, your much fatigued

MISS CRICKET.

* *

They have begun playing Polo at Burlingame. The field is in excellent condition and there is every prospect of a lively season. Indeed, the Club has expended a large sum in the purchase of raquets and balls and has enough to stack a regiment. There was a good game last Sunday, three against three, and this afternoon and to-morrow will be devoted to practice. To the joy of everyone concerned, Walter Hobart is around again and has lost none of his old enthusiasm. But polo is really subordinate in interest to golf. The new links are well situated, and last Sunday all the ladies whose husbands are members of the Club turned out for practice. There was quite an array of matrons and damsels. Among them I noticed Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Harry Howard. The vogue of golf is yet in its infancy, but we shall doubtless see as great an excitement here as they have in the East over the ancient and venerable game.

The San Mateo Hunt Club begins its season next week. The first meet takes place at the Burlingame Clubhouse at three o'clock Saturday, November 27th, and it is proposed to meet every Saturday with an occasional bye-day on on Wednesday. Mr. Hobart will officiate as M. F. H., and I judge the following this season will be very large, inasmuch as quite a number of the gentlemen who paperchased at San Rafael are determined to try hunting at San Mateo under less artificial conditions.

Mr. J. B. Haggin is again in town, but it is understood that his trip is purely business. He is accompanied by his sister-in-law, Mrs. Amsden and by her daughter, Miss Voorhies, a charming and attractive young lady. Their stay in town is to be brief; thence they go south via Bakersfield visiting Mr. Haggin's extensive properties en route.

Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Lester have returned from the East and are now quartered at their Van Ness Avenue mansion. Mr. and Mrs. Charley Baldwin who have been living very quietly at Mountain View are talking of going East in the early future.

There are expressions of life and occupation in the Flood mansion on California street, the drawing of blinds, the general brightening up of windows and the reappearance of the front door, all of which indicates the return of Miss Flood and her determination to occupy her California-street home.

As a function it would be difficult to excel the opening ball of the season of '97 at the Concordia Club on Saturday evening. The affair opened with a performance which was entertaining and well handled. This was followed by the dance in the ballroom of the club. The decorations were magnificent. The walls were hung in white and red bunting intermingled with pink roses and smilax. It was the occasion of the first appearance of a number of the debutantes, who proved exceedingly attractive. The palm of belledom may, I think, be conceded to Miss Gertrude Ettlinger. She is an exceedingly pretty girl with dark eyes and wavy hair, which she arranges in pompadour fashion. Her dress was striking—of white mousseline de soie spangled in silver. On either side of the skirt was a lattice of ribbons. Around the bottom of the skirt and edging the corsage was chiffon. A design of silver spangles was arranged on either side of the waist and skirt. It was the gown of gowns for a debutante, and Miss Ettlinger is to be congratulated. Another of the buds is Miss Edith Cohn, who wore a white frock of filmy material. I admired Miss Clara Rosenbaum, particularly. Her gown was of white taffeta covered in pink mull, over which was draped white chiffon, giving a suggestion of the pink through it, like the under-side of a sea-shell. Pink corals were arranged in lines both in the back and front of the corsage, and a necklet around the high collar. Lace ruffles with dewdrop centres followed the lines of the figure. A jabot was arranged over the shoulders and the skirt trimmed with draped ruffles. Miss Rosenbaum is from Stockton, and is already very popular. Miss Newman also wore a striking costume of moire chiffon. The skirt was arranged with apron cut in Vandyke fashion, edged with a ruffle of chiffon. The whole front was covered with a lattice of white ribbons. Around the bottom was a double filling, between the edges of which was arranged a garland of pink rose petals. The waist was edged with ruffles of chiffon, the rose petals following the line of the corsage. Miss Norma Bachmann also looked stunning in pink. Miss Daisy Schweitzer looked very charming in a white taffeta covered with point d'esprit and trimmed with baby roses; the waist was arranged a la bebe, with bows of silk and a long pink sash. The skirt had flounces graduating edged in tiny ruffles. Of the married ladies who were conspiciously handsome, I noted Mrs. Ed Rothschild, Mrs. Blum and Mrs. M. Koshland. Mrs. Blum's gown was especially worthy of comment. Of green moire plaid, the skirt had two flounces around the bottom coming up high in the back and edged with frilling; the waist had a muslin front inserted in fine narrow chantilly lace; gorgeous jewelled passementerie was arranged round the front and shoulders and green velvet caps edged with black frilling covered the top of sleeve.

Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Moore, Miss Ethel Moore and Miss Carmen Moore gave a big reception on Tuesday evening to the young people of Oakland. It was a rarely pretty affair. The grounds surrounding the house were hung with Japanese lanterns and the house was massed in chrysanthemums and ferns. During the evening the young people danced or wandered round at their pleasure. All the debutantes were present and many of the belles of the past few seasons. Among the prettiest of the girls I noted Miss Lillian Strong in white, Miss Thom of Yokohoma, a tall, slender blonde, who wore a pink and white gauze gown; Miss Carmen Moore in white organdie and lace. Miss Sallie Quinan in white, Miss Smith of Claremont, who was radiant in white brightened with cerise velvet and a big white picture hat. Miss Randall in white moire chiffon and pink ribbons, Miss Luita Booth in white and Miss Alice Moffitt in a lovely gown of white and pink. Mrs. Moore was assisted by Mrs. Frank Smith, who wore a stunning gown of Persian silk and necklet of diamonds.

* *

The social life of Oakland this winter is most erratic. The usual entertainers are either wantdering in other States or have taken a back seat, leaving their former places unoccupied. Even Mrs. Charles Webb Howard has confined her efforts to small and informal entertainments. Mr. and Mrs. Orestes Pierce have been in Oregon, and the younger married crowd have thus far shown no enthusiasm in the direction of social gaieties. Since the failure to reorganize the Deux Temps Cotillion Club, the dancing element, with the exception of the Friday Fortnightlies, has remained passive. I do not even hear of a new cotillion club being under way, and the debutantes of this season are having a very monotonous time. Mr. and Mrs. George Grayson gave a dinner recently to some of the older married people which proved enjoyable. Judge and Mrs. Garber, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. J. Owens and Mr. and Mrs. McNear were among their guests. Another dinner was given on Monday evening by Mr. George McNear to a number of his business associates and their wives.

Mrs. G. B. Beck gave a candy pull to the members of the Friday Fortnightly on Saturday last, when the young people had a capital time. Mrs. Beck is a fine hostess, and consequently popular. Bicycle rides continue to retain their popularity—a very jolly evening was spent last week by Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Paten, Mr. and Mrs. Hodes and Mr. and Mrs. Stahl. They went to San Leandro, where they had supper, and later returned home. The roads are in excellent condition at present, which, of course, adds to the enjoyment of wheeling.

* *

THE DOLL SHOW.

The Doll Show of the Doctor's Daughters at at the Maple Room Tuesday and Wednesday, will be an innovation in San Francisco society. For several seasons the idea has been successfully carried out in New York formerly at Sherry's and later at the Waldorf, where the exhibit was made in the great ballroom. Having outlived its novelty, the show is now one of the fixed affairs in New York, and is as firmly established as were the codes and rules with the ancient Medes and Persians. In the last exhibit held in March the leading American dressmakers contributed dolls costumed in the modes of the season, the best dressed models in the different rules receiving prizes donated by noted New Yorkers. Aside from its social feature, which is half the thing, the exhibit offers splendid opportunities for modistes and manteaux makers to introduce new fashions, and for ordinary people of society to gather to themselves ideas of the proper thing in gowning.

The San Francisco show promises to be little if any behind its metropolitan predecessors. Much interest has been evidenced ever since the conception of the idea, and considerable rivalry is agog among dressmakes and milliners generally who are preparing models. In society anticipation is even keener, and during the two days of the exhibit the Maple Room will present a smart appearance. As for the Doctors' Daughters and their work—both deserve much consideration. The society is organized to alleviate sickness and suffering among the poor and to assist generally the unfortunate. Such an object is laudable enough to receive the support and substantial attention of the charitably inclined.

Fashion in Champagne.

New York cultured society has taken up the Moet & Chandon. Since the Bradley-Martin and Patriarchs ball, no menu is considered en regle without this brand.—Exchange.

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles. Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

Frederic J. Lane, D. D. S., has removed to 522 Sutter street, San Francisco.

THE THEATRES

Incongruities of "Gay New York"—The Cleverness of Mr. Foy.

There is a rattling, lively, fetching, swing to "Gay New York," that begins with the rising of the curtain on the first act, and does not lag or halt throughout three acts replete with whimsical, impossible, ludicrous and amusing nonsense. A song and dance in front of the Waldorf Hotel is made the most natural thing possible. A young lady dressed as young ladies do at the age of twelve, affianced to the ancient Duke of Mulligatawny, is not at all incongrous. A song and dance on a church steeple would have been possible and in perfect harmony with the surroundings. A bevy of chorus girls in abbreviated skirts, a young lady in blue tights, Virginius and his daughter en costume, a composite Trilby and Svengali all parading through the Grand Central Depot, New York, are among the things you grow accustomed to in this very impossible performance.

The music of the burlesque is by Gustave Kerker, he who performed the same office for "An American Beauty;" but Mr. Kerker has given us something more popular in the way of tuneful airs, in the piece now on the Baldwin stage, and the company far and away surpasses that accompanying the other "Casino success" headed by Corinne. The Klaw-Erlanger people cannot be charged with wasting time in a pains-taking search for beauty with which to equip its chorus. De Wolf Hopper never blunders in this direction, and and at the Hopper performances, if you admire the fresh faces of the chorus, you are simply paying tribute to the excellent judgment of the very clever comedian himself.

You are offered in the second act of "Gay New York, a "kaleidoscopic view" of New York's latest theatrical successes. There is a suggestion or two from "The Lady Slavey," some of Yvette Guilbert and a travesty on Belasco's "Heart of Maryland," which fairly brought down the house. There is a neat Hebrew turn by York and Adams. To the tune of "There's a Hot Time in the Old Town To-night," they offer up the story of a Hebrew whose business was on the point of collapsing, to whom came the inspiration of kerosene and matches, whereupon, the "Hot Time in Old Town" followed. Messrs. Gregory and Curley the two Casino scrub-women, won several well-merited recalls. One thing crowded upon another so rapidly, and the people were withal so clever, that it is difficult to discriminate. Eddie Foy was, naturally enough, head and shoulders above the rest. The last time Eddie came West, he was trying his abilities at impersonating a "Miss Brown," in farce comedy; but it was a chilly, frosty, failure, financially, and artistically, too, for that matter. I might say some unkind things of Mr. Harrison's style of brazen comedy, but will not. I have on railway trains and elsewhere met some fresh young fellows, just budding into drummers, who were built along this young man's lines. All in all the company is very acceptable, crowded houses prevailed during the week. If given the power to "cut;" one characteristic of the performance would disappear. Theatre-goers, as a rule, do not approve of the man in the gallery who holds a shouting dialogue with the actor on the stage. Neither is there any necessity for old Mr. and Mrs. Tompkins stalking down the center isle of the dress circle shouting for their daughter. Cutting out this species of unnecessary diversion, would also, very properly, remove Mr. Johnny Brown and his lewd antics from the proscenium box. Such eliminations would not lessen the interest of the audience, and might have a tendency toward elevating the tone of the performance, if such a thing is desirable.

SENORITA BEATRIX FRANCO
Of the Italian Opera Company

B

* *

The trained ponies at the Orpheum are dainty little creatures with well-combed tails and fat, sleek sides, and their intelligence seems to be in proper proportion, for they trip and waltz about, march in military manner, and do a lot of other things, including a wrestling bout, in really amusing fashion; and through it all the house looks on amused to the fullest extent of the law. Professor Morris is a natural-born trainer, and his little animals are things of beauty and of profit. Olschanky & Lonny, comedy acrobats all the way from the London Empire, are amusing and clever in their work. Countess Von Hatzfeldt is also receiving approval—something she saw little of last week. She has a new song—her own composition—a pretty thing; but her gown, or rather dress, is a wonderful distortion—both strange and fantastic.

* *

It is a good performance they are giving this week at Morosco's, touched with considerable animation. The play, "A Celebrated Case," is a favorite of many seasons, and will likely continue so as long as melodrama itself. The scenery, as usual, is a feature of the production, being pretty and pleasing, and well-arranged, and the costumes look fresh and new.

H. S. K.

DRAMATIC NOTES

Miss Beatrix Franco, of the Italian Opera Company at the California, is the fortunate possessor, not only of a beautiful voice, but also of a thorough musical education. In 1881, Miss Franco, who is a native of Mexico, accompanied her father, a general in the Mexican army, to Milan on a Consular mission, where she began, a year later, a three-year's course in musical theory, at the great conservatory in that city. When she had arrived at the age of sixteen in 1893, she commenced studying the art of singing, and, a year ago, made her debut at the Teatro Nacional in the City of Mexico, as Azucena in Trovatore, winning immediate approval from th· leading critics of the capital. In view of the Mexican standard in matters musical, Miss Franco's success was of special significance. The young cantatrice then continued her studies until September of this year when she was engaged by the Del Conte Company, now so successfully appearing in this city. Miss Franco is a langorous beauty of genuine Mexican mould, with dark, dreamy eyes, clear olive skin and a most engaging personality. Her voice is a rich contralto under perfect control, and full of sympathy and dramatic expression. Her favorite roles are in "Aida," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Linda," "Trovatore," "Carmen" "Mignon."

At the California to-morrow (Sunday) evening the Italian Opera Company closes its third week with a production of "Fra Diavolo." Monday, Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" will be sung for the first time in this city. Tuesday, "Ernani," Wednesday, a repetition of "Manon Lescaut." Thursday and Saturday matinee "La Boheme," Friday, "Force of Destiny" and Saturday evening, "Carmen," with Montenari as the bewitching cigarrero. For Sunday night a farewell concert is announced.

A dramatic event of real interest is announced for next week at Morosco's in the production of "The Great Diamond Robbery," the play that set New York agog several seasons ago with Mme. Januschek and Blanche Walsh in the principal parts. The piece is full of genuine thrilling interest from beginning to end, the cast comprising 22 characters. The most elaborate scene in the play is a represen tation of the Hoffman House bar in New York City.

For its attraction next week the Alcazar offers Mrs. Pacheco's lively comedy "Incog." The piece is well known in this city, having been played so successfully for several seasons by Charles Dickson, who, by the way, will personally direct the Alcazar production. The cast includes Wright Huntington, Wallace Shaw, Gertrude Foster, and Mrs. F. M. Bates. Frederick Paveding is on his way from the East to join the Alcazar company.

The first of the Channing Auxiliary lectures comes off at the Unitarian Church, next Tuesday afternoon, at 3:30 o'clock, and the second the Tuesday following, Prof. Bernard Moses speaking on "Life in the Ancient Capital of Japan," and "Japan Under the New Regime." On January 4th, 11th and 18th, Prof. Edward H. Griggs continues the course with "Goethe's Faust," "The Spiritual Philosophy of Tennyson," and "The Relations of Poetry to Painting and Music."

A testimonial concert will be tendered to Prof. J. Sancho by his pupils at Native Sons Hall, Tuesday evening, November 23. The programme, almost entirely consisting of Spanish music, will be given by the El Turia and La Giralda mandolin clubs, Prof. Arrillagas Flores de Espana, Susie M. Blair, violinist, Edythe E. Henderson, vocalist and dancer, Jas. A. Snook, basso, and the Andalusian Serenaders.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents
Sold only at 102 Eddy street

THE ANDALUSIAN SERENADERS
Who make their debut at Prof. Sancho's concert next Tuesday evening
Elite photo

The San Francisco Symphony Society has completed arrangements for a series of symphony concerts, to be directed by Fritz Scheel, which promises to be the most successful ever given in this city. They are to take place at the Tivoli, on alternate Thursday afternoons, beginning December 2d. The orchestra is to consist of fifty musicians.

"The Geisha" enters on its sixth week at the Tivoli Sunday evening. A new set of costumes, imported from the Royal Opera House in Tokio for Augustin Daly, will be shown a few nights next week when several special performances will be given. "Rip Van Winkle" has been in rehearsal for some time and will follow "The Geisha."

The Orpheum offers for its principal attraction next week, Servais Leroy, illusionist and magician. Other new-comers are Harry Edson and his trained dog Jack, and Mlle. Grevian, transformation dancer. The Biograph has been retained for another week and will show the Haverstran Tunnel.

"In Old Kentucky" is being played to large and delighted audiences at the Columbia. The second week of the engagement commences Monday evening. An extra matinee is on for Thanksgiving. The next attraction will be Louis James in his new play "A Cavalier of France."

Sunday night performances will be given at the Baldwin during the run of "In Gay New York." The piece, which has made a great hit, will be continued two weeks longer. A special matinee will be given Thursday.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" relieve Throat Irritations caused by cold or use of voice. The genuine sold only in boxes.

Artistic competence, combined with sound business principles, account for the great popularity of Huber's Orchestra. Address 20 O'Farrell street. Telephone care Benj. Curtaz, Main 1247.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. For particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

THE LIFE OF THE ORANGE
ORANGE TONIC CORDIAL
P. J. Huber
SAN FRANCISCO

A Delicious After-Dinner Cordial

A MOST WONDERFUL TONIC
A NERVE AND BLOOD REGENERATOR

No Drugs——— Not an Excitant

Recommended by leading physicians as the most effective and pleasant tonic on the market for nervous and stomach troubles.

F. A. HABER
Manager the Emporium Wine and Liquor Dept.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

Royal makes the food pure, wholesome and delicious.

ROYAL
ROYAL BAKING POWDER
BAKING
POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

CITY OF PARIS...
DRY GOODS COMPANY

would be complimented by the presence of their friends and patrons at the formal opening of their new home on Union Square, corner Geary and Stockton streets, this Saturday Evening, November 20th, from 7:30 to 9:30 . . . . .

Store closes at 5 p. m. for this Saturday Afternoon

City of Paris Dry Goods Co.

SOUTHEAST CORNER STOCKTON AND GEARY STS., UNION SQUARE

EUROPE'S MOTHER-IN-LAW

Queen Louise as a Mischief-Maker—The Czarina's Great Influence.

It is rather the fashion in some places to decry the degree of women's influence in politics, and to underestimate the feminine power behind the throne. Since the fall of the Empire in France, and the decline of the salon, women in the Republic have officiated but little in the direction of affairs. As the wives of ministers and embassadors, their position is social rather than political, and the powers that be show a strong desire to keep them out of the government. But, strange as it may seem, the rest of Europe is under the sway of the royal petticoat, and the hands that hold the scales are the grandmothers of the great powers—Queen Victoria of England, and Queen Louise of Denmark. Queen Louise is a truly remarkable woman, who has fully earned the title of the Royal Matchmaker. A daughter of Hesse Cassel, married to the sovereign of the smallest kingdom in Europe, she has managed to secure empires and monarchies for each of her children. Her eldest daughter is the Princess of Wales, her second, the dowager Czarina of Russia; one of her sons married the richest princess of Europe. Her second son is King of the Hellenes; her third, Waldemar, married Princess Marie Louise of Orleans, daughter of the Comte de Paris. In this way she is related to nearly all the ruling houses. Born a manipulator, in her declining years her passion for intrigue has grown paramount, and it seems now that nothing would give her greater happiness than to have all her relatives at loggerheads. Her most recent machinations have been directed against the Anglo-Franco-Russian friendship, and thereby hangs rather an interesting tale.

The courts of Russia and Denmark are no longer one happy family as in the days when Alexander sat upon the throne and the Imperial Russias spent all their holidays in the quiet Danish court at Copenhagen. The Dowager Czarina, who inherits her mother's intriguing propensities, is no longer persona grata at St. Petersburg, and there is no great love lost between her and her son Nicholas. The Czar is completely under the sway of his wife, the daughter of Princess Alice of England, later of Hesse, and Darmstadt is their place of retirement when resting from the affairs of state. This has roused the wrath of Queen Louise, who credits the change to the influence of her rival mother-in-law, Queen Victoria. Naturally enough she set about making trouble and the victim selected to operate upon was Princess Maud of Wales, Queen Victoria's favorite grand-daughter, who had married her grandson, Prince Karl of Denmark. Living at the court is Princess Marie of Orleans, who as sister-in-law of the Dowager Czarina and a daughter of France, is a devotee of the Franco Russian alliance. To her went the Queen with a tale of the abuse heaped upon the Russians by Maud, who called them semi-civilized barbarians. Marie rushed to the English Princess and hurled invectives upon her head. Things were waxing warm in the Danish court and both Princesses asked King Christian for justice, while their husbands besought the Queen to make peace between the belligerents. Princess Maud reported her miseries to her mother while Marie of Orleans made havoc with English interest at the Russian court. King Christian sent for the Princess of Wales, beseeching her as a Dane and a daughter to pour oil on the troubled waters. The Prince and Princess of Wales appeared but sided strongly with their descendant. Instead of compelling an interchange of apologies, they advocated Maud's return to England offering Prince Karl a place in the British Navy. King Christian is evidently opposed to this scheme which he avers will offend the Danes, for Karl is a general favorite and the populace have shown strong admiration for Maud. Besides the King is ill and his death will probably cause further confusion, for Queen Louise is as hale, hearty and mischievous as ever and what she may do without the restraining influence of her husband is what is worrying the diplomats.

While this family feud rageth between England and Denmark, another of perhaps deeper portent has been developed at Darmstadt. As I remarked previously the Czar and Czarina spend their summers in the dominion of Hesse. Quite recently, in Carlsruhe, the statue of the old Kaiser Wilhelm was unveiled, and the Grand Duke of Baden and his wife called on the Czar, supposedly to invite him to be present on that occasion. He curtly refused to receive them, and all Germany considered itself slighted. One theory was that the Czar expected to please France by decling to see the statue of its conqueror reared in a capital so near the French frontier, but it seemed inexplicable that he should also insult both that conqueror's daughter and son-in-law in refusing to see them. The Duke is much esteemed in Germany, for he is a solid, sensible man, and the best representative of the Teutonic type of ruler. There is another explanation of the incident and a woman is at the bottom of it. It appears that the Czarina has a grievance against the Duke, which dates back to the time of the Franco-Prussian war. The Duke of Baden, openly objected to the way news was sent from the front by the Grand Duke of Hesse to his wife, Princess Alice of England, at Carlsruhe, and by her to the English court, from where it found its way to Paris. The Hessians were furious about this accusation and since that time a feud has existed between them and their neighbors of Baden.

The Czar, when away from home and his muscovite advisers, is dominated by his wife and her brother, Ernest Ludwig of Hesse. The latter is a splendid young fellow, who alone among the princes of his generation has never been ruined by debauchery or over education. He is a genial, attractive, level-headed man, and the Czar adores him. He thinks his sister a perfect intellectual wonder, and Nicky and he regard her cleverness as something phenomenal. It is in her capacity as daughter of an English mother that she has put this insult on the old ruler of Baden. In a quarrel between two German capitals—one the most aggressively imperialistic and neo-Teutonic in the Empire, the other with two grandchildren of Queen Victoria on its throne, the Czar is brought forward as a combatant on the English side. The weight of the incident may be overestimated. The Czar has official pressure to meet as well as domestic, but it is readily seen that the fireside influences about him are English in sympathy rather than German. In other words, the Czarina is more Princess Alice's daughter than the Emperor William's cousin. For the rest, the episode renders it certain that Russo-German relations are bound to become even more strained during the coming winter, though the Kaiser is learning Russian.

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

$2,000.00

Schilling's Best baking-powder is soda and cream of tartar, and nothing else.

Oh, yes — lots of know-how; and that's the main point, after all.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

THE PRINCE'S SUPPER-CLUB

Late Gossip from London — Court Mourning and Jubilee Gifts.

Great were the anticipations of an exceedingly gay winter this year. All sorts of social events were promised, royalty was to have made an especial effort, and now the Duchess of Teck's death has nipped all our hopes in the bud. I hear that the period of court mourning is to be unusually long. There is even a suggestion of mourning drawing-rooms. You know the Queen is never so happy as when we are all "in the trappings and habiliments of woe." She clings to melancholy and hugs grief to her heart. I suppose it is the consolation of her declining days. Curious, is it not, but age seems to positively revel in sadness. In spite of all this, I have been enjoying life lately. True, the weather has been foggy, the streets more or less slushy, but one never worries over natural events in London. I have a short skirt, goloshes and a mackintosh and fly hither and thither. Or if the occasion demands a smarter frock, I jump into a hansom and drive to my destination oblivious of everything—even the passing accident.

The exhibition of the Jubilee presents has most recently claimed my attention, and I must give you some of the details. The gifts were displayed at the Imperial Institute under the direction of Sir Alfred Jephson. I cannot begin to describe the beauty of the collection. The Prince of Wales' present occupied the place of honor. It is a life-size portrait of himself and the Duke of Connaught by Edward Detaille. The Princes are in uniform and in the background is a Highland regiment. The work is spirited and military and the likenesses of the Princes are not aggressively flattering. The Princess of Wales and her children gave a gorgeous diamond brooch, which I should really like to own. It was charmingly designed and the stones were rarely exquisite in their purity of color. The remainder of the Queen's children united in presenting her with a big chain necklet with crown and dates in diamonds. I admired the Emperor of Russia's donation of an open pendant heart of diamonds with the number "60" in the center. The German Emperor and his family gave a silver vase with figure of Brittania, and the Emperess Frederick a chrysopase paper-weight set in diamonds. The Emperor of China's gifts were porcelain vases, embroidered curtains and sacrificial wine vessels. Her Majesty's Eastern Empire is well represented. There is a buhl clock from the Nizain of Hyderbad. The other potentates sent jewelry of all descriptions imaginable and of every design beneath the sun. There was an immense crowd at the exhibition; all London flocked to see the Queen's gifts. I noted some immensely smart people jogging elbows in most democratic fashion with their butchers, bakers and candle-stick makers. The exhibition is for the benefit of the Hospital Fund, which I am sure will make a goodly sum out of it.

Oh, I must tell you about the new Supper Club which has recently been organized by the Prince of Wales' set. It is quite the swellest club in London, is to meet on Saturday nights, and is in future to be the "hall mark" of all that is smartest and most rapid of the upper Ten Thousand. I hear that Grafton Galleries are to be the place of meetings and 12 o'clock the time when gaieties begin. The Earl of Ava, the heir of the Marquis of Dufferin, and brother of Lord Terence Blackwook (who married Miss Flora Davis, of New York), is one of the promoters. The Grafton Galleries are in the heart of the west end of London. In the octagon gallery the hosts will receive their friends, His Royal Highness opening the affair. There are about two hundred on the list of membership, and each gentleman will have the privilege of bringing one lady.

CATRIONA.

London, November 1st.

Mount Vernon Pure Rye.

Distillery bottling, square bottles only. The public appreciate a good article when they can get it. Sold by all first-class dealers.

BOOK NOTES

In The International Studio, for November, James Stanley Little writes at length on "Frank Brangwyn and His Art," the article containing eleven illustrations. Mortimer Mempes contributes another of his unique letters from Japan, and Count Birger-Marner discusses Swedish art at the Stockholm Exhibition. A series of sketches on wood carving is commenced by G. Frampton, A. R. A., and Gleeson White continues his work on Glasgow designers. The number contains four full page supplements; also, a portrait sketch of Mr. Brangwyn by Phil May.

Seven on the Highway, by Blanche Willis Howard (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), possesses the virtue of being unique. The book contains seven stories or sketches, the majority of them fancifully portraying thought rather than action. The first sketch, "Marigold Michel," is pretty and fantastic, daintily written and full of charming and original ideas "The Youth that Never smiled," and the other sketches are interesting, especially "Puss in Boots" and "All Sails Spread for Monkeyland."

A book of genuine delight is F. Hopkinson Smith's Gondola Days (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.). It consists of a number of sketches in pencil and pen, descriptive of Venice and Venetian life. The piazza of San Marco, the caffes, old gardens, along the Riva, open-air markets, and memories of the past, all are touched upon with rare poetic feeling and charming appreciation. The illustrations are in Hopkinson Smith's happiest manner, and add greatly to the beauty of this admirable volume.

The First Christmas Tree by Henry Van Dyke, illustrated by Howard Pyle, has been re-issued in attractive holliday form by Scribners. The story of the days of the God Thor and the coming of St. Boniface, is as interesting now as on it's first appearance, and, in view of the festal season, is peculiarly appropriate. The illustrations are photogravures from Mr. Pyle's drawings and are striking bits of work; but the chief charm of the new edition is it's typography. The binding in it's rich green with gold lettering and raised cover design making a pleasing appearance.

Another successful effort of the Scribners is A Capital Courtship, by Alexander Black, author of Miss Jerry. The sketch which has been expanded and otherwise added to for book publication, is termed a Picture Play, and was written for oral delivery before audiences. It is a brightly written tale of clever doings of rather clever people. The illustrations are from life photographs by the author, who had among his sitters Presidents Cleveland and McKinley, Daniel Lamont, Speaker Reed, Sir Julian Pauncefote and Commodore Melville.

Charles Egbert Craddock's last story, The Juggler, (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), has just appeared. It differs very much from Miss Murfree's preceding work, which was essentially a thing of dialect and adventure. The Juggler contains adventure enough, but the familiar dialect is quite in the background. The hero of the tale, a traveling mountebank, is an agreeable young man with a soul above his surroundings. He undergoes his troubles and trials in quite a different view from that of the average hero, and in the end departs this life with tragic accompaniements.

Mrs. S. P. McLean Greene has made her new book, Stuart and Bamboo (Harper & Bros.), somewhat of a social study. It is full of contrasting conditions, refinement, commonplace mediocrity, intellectual culture and human nature in the rough—a wide range of good material. But Mrs. Greene has hardly succeeded in her use of it. As a novel, her work is not to be considered—as a study of life it possessess little value. The dialect is poor—about as poor and inconsistent as dialect can possibly be.

A book of more purpose and success is John Leighton, Jr., by Katrina Trask (Harper & Bros.). Leighton is a young man who protests against the narrowness of his father's religious belief, and in reward for his interference, is thrust out upon the world to provide for himself. This he manages to do, incidentlly passing through the different stages of agnosticism, reaching a more definite belief, much to his inner satisfaction. The divorce question is ably handled without undue relapse into ethics, making the book of additional interest. In this time and tide of so much vapid meaningless work, John Leighton, Jr., is in many ways a welcome relief.

Drown Your Rheumatism

in the waters of the famous Byron Hot Springs, Contra Costa County, California, as many another has done to his great joy and relief. Malaria, rheumatism, liver, kindey and stomach troubles all flee from before the curative powers of these waters. Not a small factor among the curing agents there is the tank filled with bubbling mineral water naturally warm, that is used (free of charge) by all the guests at Byron. Write for particulars.

Fine Display of Art Goods.

S. & G. Gump, 113 Geary street, have just begun to show their European importations for this season, and invite their patrons and the public to view the many fine and interesting novelties received and unpacked so far.

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 Post St.

Telephone or Telegraph

The closing hours of the "Chronicle" Century Club are at hand. To-day will probably be your last opportunity of taking advantage of our offer. Remember that through no other source can you obtain The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia at absolutely wholesale price. The office, seventh floor, "Chronicle" building, will be open until midnight to-night for the accomodation of those who cannot call to-day. To-morrow may be too late. Better telegraph or telephone your order. We will reserve a set for a limited time. It is now only a question of hours, for the last set will be claimed, so act quickly.

Send the money with the coupon—no time for correspondence.

TO CHRONICLE,
San Francisco, Cal.:

Enclosed find $5.00, for which reserve me a set of The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia until I can select a binding.

Name.....
Occupation.....
Address.....

Wave

NOTE.—After November 22d Wm. Doxey, 631 Market street, will act as general agent for The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia, and will take subscriptions at the regular publisher's prices, which are about 50 per cent higher.

Suppose You Had An Aeolian!

Suppose you could have in your home an orchestra and when you wanted music you had but to make a request and it would be immediately complied with. Suppose, too (as long as we are only supposing it does not matter how improbable we are), that this orchestra could play any piece of music ever composed without waiting to study or practice it. If you wanted a programme of operatic music you had only to mention the particular selections you wished to hear and they would be promptly rendered.

Suppose you had some friends spending the evening and wished to dance. Your orchestra could play waltzes, lancers, two-steps and polkas, with such perfect time and rythm that the pleasures of dancing would be immeasurably increased. Suppose you were alone and your mood called for some particular piece—some old-time favorite—very likely you would have your own conception of the manner in which it should be played. Suppose you found that you could conduct this remarkable orchestra yourself—direct its playing according to your own ideas and wishes.

And, finally, suppose the playing of this orchestra was exceptionally fine—so good, indeed, that great musicians, such as Paderewski, De Reszke, Nordica, Campanini and others equally as famous had hired it to entertain them with its playing; so good that people of wealth and culture everywhere sought it for their homes—people with means sufficient to enable them to enjoy all that is best in art and music and all the pleasures and recreations that money can purchase.

Suppose we tell you that you can have this orchestra in your home; that you can have music at any or all times, and that you can, yourself, play any piece of music ever composed, even if you, literally, "cannot tell one note from another."

The possession of an AEOLIAN will do all this. It will do infinitely more—it will entertain and instruct every member of the family, from the youngest to the oldest. Each can play it for himself or herself.

It will bring into the home music never performed except by large and well-drilled orchestras. It will familiarize you with all the great works of the old masters, and enable you to keep in touch with and enjoy the best music of the day. It is the greatest of all musical educators and the most practical of all home instruments. You can purchase a good AEOLIAN for $75 This instrument is the Princess. We publish a special catalogue of it. Other styles up to $750. Aeolian Orchestrelles from $1500 to $2500. Aeolian Pipe Organs and Pipe Orchestras from $2500 upwards.

KOHLER & CHASE, 28 and 30 O'Farrell street, San Francisco, sole agents for the Pacific States.

Saves Time, Money, and Temper!

MADE IN CALIFORNIA!

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.

Telephone Main 5697.

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

Reliance-Stanford Game—The Great Thanksgiving-Day Event.

The Reliance Club has come to its own at last. A team of veterans, trained faithfully for a week, sent the club colors flaunting above the Cardinal. The score, ten to nothing, gives no expression to the difference in value of the elevens. What a magnificent lot of men these Reliance fellows are; not only giants with all the agility of well-trained athletes, but also tried and experienced foot-ball players to whom every principle of the game is known. The score of Saturday might easily have been tripled had this lot of men been playing together since the first of the season; for, while their interference and team work were excellent, what perfection might have been attained in a season's practice can only be surmised. The game was, in some respects, very distinctly the struggle of athletic club football against college, for on the Reliance team there were but two men in any degree indebted to college training for their football ability. Excepting Serman and Cade, who each fought four years for his college, no man who played on Saturday had ever received tuition from a college coach enough to alter his style in any degree. It would be very difficult to pick from all the football players at present on the coast an eleven to defeat this of the Maroon.

* *

Hobbs, at center, proved himself even more effective a player than he did at guard. He clearly outclassed his opponent who has had much skillful coaching, and made himself a decisive factor of the game. Sheehy and Smith, at guards, were great although opposed by men almost as good. Sheehy had rather an easy time with Fickert and simply toyed with the tackle who dropped in to take that guard's place, when the latter swung out of the line for the guard's back play. Smith, too, was very noticable, but had a much more formidable opponent in Carle. Behind the line Reliance had Carter and Moss, which means they had the best halfbacks we know; and as well, they had the uncertain spectacular Seawright, who happened to be in one of his brilliant moods, and gave an exhibition that stirred the spectators to excitement and applause. What this team might accomplish by the use of the guard's back play, so ineffectively launched at them by Stanford, were they using it against the same team, would be very interesting to note. Should they attain equal rapidity and skill in getting it under way, I believe there are few rush lines that would not yield to their immense weight and strength utilized in this most telling of modern plays. It is this guards back play, by the way, that will win the Thanksgiving-day game.

* *

Had California guards such as Smith and Sheehy, perhaps they might stop it as quickly and as conclusively as Reliance did time after time; but, not having such guards, and with the handicap of a team apt to be disconcerted by unusual plays, this attack of Mr. Woodruff's will probably help the Cardinal over California's line more than once. It must be remembered, too, that when Captain Cotton's men line up next Thursday they will have had ten days' more practice than they had on last Saturday, and that the accuracy gained in ten days may almost double the mechanism and efficiency of such semi-mass plays.

* *

It is not only in the ability to put more weight and strength into attacks on the line that Stanford will have great advantage everyone realizes how much better Murphy is than any kicker that California has. In addition to this, the greater experience of Stanford men ought to render the Cardinal's defense vastly superior, although in the matter of tackling there are few on the Stanford eleven who might not take a lesson from the way most of the Berkeleyans bring men to the ground.

* *

Another obvious fault of the Cardinal line is its tendency to play high, a fault that if not corrected may result in an unexpected touch down. If the teams were more evenly matched and the ends overran kicks as they did on Saturday, what runs such errors would allow California's backs to make might win the game, but with the advantage so greatly against them there is little chance of such misplay proving fatal to the men from Palo Alto, although Hall is a dangerous man in a broken field.

* *

Earlier in the season Stanford promised to have a decided superiority in the handling of kicks, but the conditions seem now to be reversed. California's men cover more ground, are surer and get away quick and fast. It is too bad that Hall is burdened with the captaincy of the eleven this year. His own game is suffering in consequence as a captain's game almost inevitably does. Could he but overcome a few very bad habits his game would be better than the best any man has done here for many a day. He is a wonder in an open field, and if he only would follow his interference he could skirt any end that plays in these parts. And if he only would not, once in a while, slow up to give that last man the straight arm more touchdowns would be to his credit.

* *

At one time it seemed that circling Stanford's end would be a play that California could bring off constantly with a fair certainty of gain, but the reappearance of Smith in fine defensive form seems to belie the promise of the earlier games. It will take interference as effective as a cyclone to round his end more than once or twice in a game. Reliance, big, burly and fast gave it up after a few unsuccessful attempts.

* *

So far as individuals go, Stanford has guards, one tackle, one end and one man behind the line that are better than the men California has to offset them, while the Blue and Gold has one tackle, one end and two halves that are superior to the same players for the Cardinal. At center there is little to choose, the little ought to be in favor of McDermott, the man from Berkeley. In everything but kicking Haskell is a better quarter than Murphy. The advantages of Stanford are particularly adapted to the style of play chosen, and even if the separate men were inferior the vast margin in her favor from Murphy's excellent kicking coupled with the fact that this eleven has practically played intact for two seasons, ought to give Stanford the victory. So when it is considered that not not only do these advantages lie with the Cardinal, but also that she has a very divided factor of personal superiority, not so great a one as generally supposed but still one to be reckoned with as decisive, Berkeley's hope of winning must lie in the knowledge that Fortune's smile is given most often to those who woo her fighting with close shut teeth on the last redoubt. ROBERT PORTER.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

How's This?

We offer One Hundred Dollars reward for any case of catarrh that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.

We, the undersigned, have known F. J. Cheney for the last fifteen years, and believe him perfectly honorable in all business transactions, and financially able to carry out any obligations made by their firm.

West & Truax, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.
Walding, Kinnan & Marvin, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.

Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. Testimonials sent free. Price 75c. per bottle. Sold by all druggists.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

Among the many great Financial Corporations on the Pacific Coast, none rank higher than the

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.

Its Agents are found throughout America, and its Record for Prompt and Equitable Settlement of All Honest Losses is Firmly Established

D. J. STAPLES, President — WM. J. DUTTON, Vice-President — B. FAYMONVILLE, 2d V. Pres. & Sec'y
J. B. LEVISON, Marine Sec'y — LOUIS WEINMANN, Asst Sec'y — STEPHEN D. IVES, General Agent

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

| | |
|---|---|
| Guarantee Capital and Surplus | $2,040,201 66 |
| Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash | 1,000,000 00 |
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | 27,730,247 45 |

OFFICERS
President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS
B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

| | |
|---|---|
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | $22,885,377 |
| Paid Up Capital and Surplus | 1,594 501 |

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS
GEORGE W. BEAVER — ROBERT WATT
THOMAS MAGEE — GEO. C. BOARDMAN
W. C. B. DE FREMERY — DANIEL E. MARTIN
ALBERT MILLER — GEO TASHEIRA
E. B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid Up Capital | $250,000 |
| Cash Reserve Fund | 25,000 |

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

The Lion Fire Insurance Co. Limited of London
Total Cash Assets in United States, $885,797.09

The Imperial Insurance Co. Limited of London
Established on Pacific Coast in 1852

WM. J. LANDERS, Resident Manager

PACIFIC COAST BRANCH

205-207 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A.D. [illegible]
Capital Paid Up $3,[illegible] Assets, $[illegible]
Surplus to Policy Holders $[illegible]
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

CONNECTICUT

FIRE INS. CO.

OF HARTFORD

Assets, $3,300,000. BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager.
COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
501 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

Don't Borrow a Home!

BUY IT Your rent payments for the borrowed home will do it through the end of the

CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California

WM. CORBIN, Secretary and Gen. Manager.
Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE—

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

[illegible] LANE — G. WHITFIELD LANE

LANE & LANE

Attorneys and Counselors

Room 202
Crocker Building, San Francisco

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bath houses, billiard tables, brewers, book binders, candymakers, canners, dyers flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc

BUCHANAN BROS.

TEL. 6610 — 609 SACRAMENTO ST

BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 410

SATISFACTORY TO THE EYE AND EAR

BYRON MAUZY PIANOS 308-314 POST ST.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE
Hartshorn LABEL
AND SEE THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

Baldwin Theatre
AL. HAYMAN & CO. (Inc.) . . . . . Proprietors
To-Night, Sunday Night, and all next week
Holiday Matinee Thanksgiving Day
Klaw & Erlanger present the Immense Burlesque Extravaganza Success
In Gay New York
An Increasing Round of Fun and Frolic!
Seats two weeks in advance

California Theatre
Fourth and Last Week
ITALIAN GRAND OPERA CO.
Monday, First time here
MANON LESCAUT
Tuesday
ERNANI
Seats . . . 50c. to $1.50

Columbia Theatre
FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers
Beginning Monday Next—Good-Bye Week
Extra Matinee Thanksgiving Day
It still beats 'em all! The best production ever given here!
"IN OLD KENTUCKY"
Coming. The Prince of Players LOUIS JAMES

Orpheum
Week beginning Monday, Nov. 22d
American debut of the European Sensation, SERVAIS LE ROY, Europe's Greatest Illusionist and Magician
HARRY EDSON AND HIS DOG JACK,
Most wonderful act of its kind extant
MLLE. GREVAIN, Famous Transformation Dancer
MORRIS' TRAINED PONIES, Greatest Animal Act ever seen at the Orpheum
OLSCHANSKY & LONNY, Comedy Acrobats
OLGA REGINA, Countess Von Hatzfeldt
COOKE & CLINTON, Shooting Stars
A. O. DUNCAN, Ventriloquist
Retained for one week more, THE AMERICAN BIOGRAPH—the Great Haverstraw Tunnel Scene
Special Matinee Thanksgiving Day

Tivoli Opera House
MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager
"Click! Click! the monkey on a stick!"
Every evening until further notice, the success of the season—the Japanese Musical Comedy
THE GEISHA
"The Jewel of Asia"
Superb Cast! Beautiful Scenery! Splendid Costumes!
"The dear little Jappys-Japs-Jappys"
Next, Planquette's Romantic Work, Rip Van Winkle
Look out for our Christmas Spectacle
The Tales of Mother Goose
Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre
FRED BELASCO : . : : . : Manager
Thanksgiving Greeting!
Week of November 22d—A Legitimate Farce
INCOG
By Mrs. Rumaldo Pacheco
Extra Matinee Thanksgiving Day
Regular Matinee Saturday
Seats by Phone Main 254, or at Box Office
Prices—15c., 25c., 35c., 50c., including Reserved Seat

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager
Last four performances of A Celebrated Case
Monday, November 22d, Eighth Week of the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H. PASCOE, in the Great Sensational Melodrama
THE GREAT DIAMOND ROBBERY
Abounding in Exciting Incidents,
Rollicking Fun and Brilliant Specialties
Great Scene of the Famous Hoffman House Bar, New York City
Evg. Prices. 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

SAN FRANCISCO SYMPHONY SOCIETY
Sale of Subscription Seats
OPENS AT
SHERMAN, CLAY & CO'S
Next Tuesday, Nov. 23d, at 9:30 a.m.
and will continue until Saturday at 5 p.m.
New subscriptions accepted until close of sale.

Book Bargains
FOR THIRTY DAYS, AT
H. R. WILLIS'
107 MONTGOMERY STREET

TURF TOPICS

Review of the Sport at Ingleside and Oakland Tracks.

In the $500 purse for all ages, 1⅛ miles, on Thursday of last week a field of very fair quality sported silk, consisting of Installator, Buck Massie and Ostler Joe, 112 lbs. each, Wheel of Fortune 104 lbs., Aquinas 95 lbs., and Los Prietos 82 lbs., the owner of which last must surely believe he has a stayer. Unfortunately this affair was marred by an objection to Ostler Joe, who got first past the post in a hard drive with a length to spare, resulting in his disqualification for fouling Wheel of Fortune, to whom the race was awarded. Ostler Joe paced with Buck Massie alongside him for half the distance, when the latter dropped back a couple of lengths. Rounding the final turn Clawson brought up Wheel of Fortune on the rail, but as he drew near home Ostler Joe swerved onto the Wheel and appeared to cause her to dwell, at the same time Buck Massie coming up on the outside and getting over the line a short head behind the mare. The award caused some grumbling, as Ostler Joe had made the best show in the running, but the decision itself could not be questioned. Beyond a runaway victory of Tea Rose III, in a five furlong sprint and an easy win by imp. Devil's Dream in the mile selling race, the day's sport calls for no further comment.

Friday's programme was a strong one, the first item a six furlongs sprint for non-winners this year bringing out thirteen, about half of which number only presumed to contend in the running. Matt Storn's Ben Ali filly Easel got out in front at the start and keeping a couple of lsngths in hand the entire journey left Rufalba and Hazel D. to battle for second money, which the former landed by a hand. Count of Flanders, 116 lbs., a choicely bred youngster by St Carlo out of imp. Countess of Langden, easily captured the six furlongs event for two-year-olds, Fonsavannah, 111 lbs., a wiry, well-conditioned son of Fonso second, being a couple of lengths in front of Lord Marmion, 106 lbs., who had led into the stretch but failed to stand the pace thereafter. The $500 purse, one mile, was well worth seeing. Six runners faced the flag and got away fairly well. San Tuzza, 111 lbs., made the running round the first turn, when The Roman, 105 lbs., went to the head of affairs, with the useful Australian mare Trance, 111 lbs., on the outside a bare head behind, and so they travelled to the paddock, when the riders of the trio began to work in real earnest. McHugh on the mare seemed to be producing the desired effect and for a moment victory appeared within her grasp, but a few cuts from Ames, who was obliged, owing to the nearness of Trance to his mount, to use his left hand, brought the Boots' horse up and landed him a game winner by just a nose. Argentine, 111 lbs., was third, McLight, 114 lbs., Sweet Favordale, 111 lbs., and San Tuzza beaten off. The honest Judge Denny scored a creditable win in the 1 1-16 miles selling race and was bid up to $1500 as against an entered figure of $400, thus making Louis Ezell, the owner of the second horse, Personne, a greater gainer by the race than the owner of the winner.

The wind-up for the fortnight on Saturday was not favored in the way of weather but we had a good day's racing nevertheless. The smart Midlothian colt, Don Luis, with H. Martin up for the first time this season, gained rather a hollow victory over seven furlongs; Spunwell, who had won his two previous essays, second, and the attractive-looking Outlay third, Estro fourth and the remaining five out of it. Judge Denny, 102 lbs., provided H. Martin another opportunity for success in the mile handicap, though Shasta Water, 97 lbs., gave him a mighty close call at the finish. Grady, with 117 lbs., ran an honest horse, but his weight forced him to be content with third place, Devil's Dream, 93 lbs., who made a show up to the straight, being a bad last. A jumping affair, 1¼ miles, caused some surprise by the victory in his maiden attempt over the sticks of the St. Carlo colt Our Climate who only a few days ago captured his first bracket on the flat. The event of the day was the Sunnyside Stakes $1200, seven furlongs for two-year-old colts and geldings, in which nine youngsters, all but two of which have been winners, faced the starter. The lot got nicely away. Hermoso, 113 lbs., taking command for the moment, was soon passed by Ed Gartland II, 103 lbs., and the latter came into the stretch with a handsome lead and looking all over a winner. Eddie Jones, however, on Los Prietos, 110 lbs., who had whipped in the crowd the best part of the way, was coming through in great form and with a fine burst of speed, had passed Wilson on Ed Gartland II before he knew it and gained the verdict by half a length. Fonsovannah third, Morellito, 113 lbs., the favorite, fourth, and Bliss Rucker, 118 lbs., immediately behind and some ten lengths from the winner.

---

Monday was opening day at Oakland and an auspicious one it proved. The weather was delightful, the attendance large and the sport fully up to expectations. The six furlongs match for a private sweepstakes, with $400 added by the California Jockey Club, between the two-year-old fillies, Napamax and St. Calatine, with 115 lbs. each, was a gift to the former, with Piggott in the saddle and Ames piloting the St. Carlo filly. From what I saw standing at the post when they started, the latter boy failed to get his mount nicely set in the breakaway, which, as Piggott made the pace very hot from the fall of the flag, was much against St. Calatine's chance, and though she kept on even terms with the Maxim filly to the head of the stretch it was only by straining every effort leading to collapse at the head of the stretch, from which point Napamax drew away and won hands down by four lengths in 1.14. Napamax proved to be very lame as she came back to the judges' stand. The event of the day, the Opening Handicap, $1,000, one mile, brought out a field of ten, all but a couple of which received some support in the ring and finishsd where they belonged. The start was quite a piece of gallery work and Mr. Ferguson received an oration from the stand. Libertine, 112 lbs., had the rail; H. Shields took him out in front at once, followed by Senator Bland, 118 lbs., Shasta Water, 100 lbs., and Satsuma, 110 lbs., the last named ridden by E. Jones. Ostler Joe, 114 lbs., imp. Trance, 104 lbs., and The Roman, 105 lbs., continued the order until almost half the distance had been run, Libertine sailing along at a splitting pace from three to four lengths ahead of the field. Still keeping his lead he rounded the stretch when Satsuma began to overhaul him and gradually wore Galen Brown's handsome horse down and secured the verdict by a head. Libertine came again just opposite the stand and made a game struggle, but to no purpose. The Roman was third several lengths away, a few inches only in front of Senator Bland, the rest of the field, except Shasta Water, being out of the hunt. The Roman was taken out very wide at the turn and made up ground fast in the stretch. As Shields came back to scale on Libertine, with his eyes on the result and time boards, his face was a study, as well it might be when he was beaten in 1.39½, a fraction over the California record.

I do not know that Tuesday needs much notice. It was a disastrous day for the talent, even a 1 to 4 favorite going down, and not until the last race did any sort of a favorite come to hand, and then it was hardly a first choice. The two-year-old race at six furlongs was won in a walk by the imp. Prestonpans colt Plan, a slashing-looking sort of youngster that carried 92 lbs., George Lee, 97 lbs., second, and Estro, 101 lbs., third. Colonel Dan, 98 lbs., once more deluded his party and declined to prolong the undoubted speed which Salvator has given him so as to get home in front. Installator, 112 lbs., administered half a length's beating to Wheel of Fortune, 104 lbs., in a mile and a sixteenth, the time—1.46¾—being the California record. A mile selling-race with five runners resulted in a victory for Personne, 92 lbs., who came on with a wet sheet in the run in; Lady Hurst, 99 lbs., second, beaten a nose, and Marquise, 115 lbs., third, a head behind her. Time 1.41¾.

Wednesday saw the two-year-old Count of Flanders picking up a $300 purse at his leisure at six furlongs, and Tea Rose III doing likewise over five and one-half furlongs.

---

On the 17th instant Mr. A. B. Spreckels' horses in training were sold here by public auction, in consequence of his retirement from racing, though he retains his interest in breeding. Tnirty-one head, which, by the way, it took a full three hours to sell, realized an average of $410, certainly good considering there were no really choice animals in the lot, and that youngsters are at present to be had so cheap. George Palmer made $1075 and Marcel $800.

BENEDICT.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

FINANCE AND TRADE

The Stock and Share Market—Grain Notes.

Thursday Evening.

The prevailing ease in the money market, not only locally, but also in New York and London, has strengthened the demand for leading investment stocks. In the less desirable section of securities things have been somewhat off, and as there are some signs that money may become slightly dearer in London in the immediate future, the speculative tendency is decidedly dull.

Silver has been buoyant here during the past few days, but at the moment presents a somewhat weak appearance. The future seems full of uncertainty in regard to the white metal.

In the local Bond market there has been quite a brisk demand for the best issues, and the quantity offering exhibits continued scarcity. The most active securities during the interval have been the bonds of the Southern Pacific Railway of Arizona, of which sales have taken place at 99⅞ and 100. With nearly five months' accrued on these bonds present quotations seem very low, and we are advised that in all probability they will take an upward direction.

In the Stock market Spring Valley Water has again touched 100, and is in good demand. Gas and Electric have receded to 94 during the week on persistent rumors of opposition, but the tone is again much firmer, the closing quotation being 95¾ bid. Mutual Electric took a jump to 16, but subsequently had a sudden break and was traded in as low as 12¾. We are given to understand that the earnings show up pretty well.

In Bank Shares there is nothing of importance to note beyond the fact that the good demand previously recorded still exists. The arrangements for the transformation of the Nevada Bank into a National Bank are well nigh completed.

Market-Street Railway shares are steady at 50¾, and in good demand at that figure.

In Powder shares there is nothing new in regard to the general situation. Giant have been sold from 35 to 37½, and may now be quoted about 36½.

In the Miscellaneous market Sugar stocks are steady, with quite a firm tone in Hutchinson, for which 35 has been bid, without eliciting offers of the stock. Oceanic Steamship has been the medium of sales at 32½.

In the Grain Market wheat has seriously declined in sympathy with the steady drop in prices at importing points. At the time of writing there is a general feeling of unsettlement pervading the market, more especially in regard to futures. Dealings are comparatively small at present, but any improvement would probably be followed by considerable offers. The latest transaction in No. 1 December was concluded at 1.38.

FRANK H. GOULD.

There are, it is true, innumerable lawyers in San Francisco, more, perhaps, than the city requires, but there is ever a welcome for a new man, if he is outfitted with real brains. Sooner or later the best talent of the country bar comes to San Francisco to seek the broader field and the larger opportunities of the metropolis. After many years of work and success in Merced and Stockton, Frank H. Gould has opened a law office in San Francisco, and had the opportunity of showing his capacity in the case of O. M. Welburn, in whose defense he was associated with Gavin McNab. The closing argument made by Mr. Gould was a fine piece of oratory, and was distinguished not only for eloquence of language but for logic and vigor of reasoning. Few men at the local bar are capable of such an effort, and it is not surprising that, in consequence, Mr. Gould's name has been very prominently mentioned in connection with other important cases soon to come to trial.

FRANK H. GOULD

Mr. Gould's settlement in San Francisco is really because of his appointment as Building and Loan Commissioner. He has been Speaker of the House at Sacramento, and was Chairman of the Democratic State Central Committe which elected Budd Governor.

A LARGE BENGAL TIGER TO MATCH THE CELEBRATED LION.

A large engraving of a tiger, in colors, from the renowned picture of the famous animal-painter, Rosa Bonheur, has been engraved at great expense to order for Charles Lyons, the London Tailor. Can be had at either of his three stores, at the nominal price of 10 cents; by mail 20 cents. Free to customers.

721 Market Street
302 Kearny Street
1212-1214 Market Street

Landseer's celebrated picture of the Lion can also be had at the same price.

Thoroughbred Sales
Friday, November 26th
YEARLINGS, ALSO STALLION
Imp. Cyrus
From PALO ALTO STOCK FARM, at 7:30 p.m.
Occidental Horse Exchange
Friday and Saturday, Nov. 26th and 27th
Three and Two-Year-Olds from Santa Anita Stud
Property of E. J. BALDWIN, Esq., at 12:30 p.m. at grounds of California Jockey Club, Oakland
Wednesday, December 8th, YEARLINGS BY THE GREAT MORELLO, property of I. B. Chase, Esq. at 12:30 p.m. at grounds of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club, Ingleside.
For Catalogues, apply to
KILLIP & CO.
Livestock Auctioneers, 11 Montgomery St., S. F.

California Jockey Club
OAKLAND TRACK
Winter Meeting 1897-8, beginning Monday, November 15th.
Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday.
Five or more races each day. Races start at 2:15 p.m. sharp.
Ferry leaves San Francisco at 12 m., 12:30, 1:00, 1:30, 2:00, 2.30 and 3:00 p.m., connecting with trains stopping at entrance to track. Buy your tickets to Shell-Mound. Returning trains leave the track at 4:15 and 4:45 p.m., and immediately after the last race.
R. B. MILROY, Secretary. T. H. WILLIAMS JR. President.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over. Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F.
Telephone 305

Santa Fe Route

Practically a New Railway

Trains leave from and arrive at Market-Street Ferry

San Francisco Ticket Office, 644 Market Street, Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1520.
Oakland Office, 1118 Broadway.

THE BEST RAILWAY
SAN FRANCISCO TO CHICAGO

LOOK AT THE TIME

| LEAVE | DAILY | FOR EXAMPLE |
|---|---|---|
| San Francisco.. | 4 30 pm | Monday |
| Sacramento ..... | 6 20 pm | " |
| San Jose..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Fresno ..... | 12 55 am | Tuesday |
| Bakersfield ..... | 4 40 am | " |
| Barstow ..... | 4 55 pm | " |
| Ash Fork..... | 7 40 am | Wednesday |
| Flagstaff ..... | 10 15 am | " |
| Albuquerque ... | 10 25 pm | " |
| Las Vegas..... | 4 00 am | Thursday |
| La Junta ..... | 11 50 am | " |
| Denver ..... | 5 00 pm | " |
| Newton ..... | 12 35 am | Friday |
| Kansas City..... | 7 05 am | " |
| Chicago ..... | 9 30 pm | " |

VIA GRAND CANYON ROUTE

New rails, new ties, new ballast, new bridges. No dust. The shortest crossing of the desert and a country that interests by its varied and beautiful scenery. The highest grade of passenger equipment and meals at Harvey's famous dining rooms.

JNO. L. TRUSLOW, Gen. Agent Pass. Dept. San Francisco.
JNO. J. BYRNE, Gen. Pass. Agent, Los Angeles.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov. 30 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.
S. S. "Mariposa," for Australia, Thursday, Dec. 9, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

I. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO. General Agents

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Steamer Pomona, 2 p.m. November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28

For Newport (Los Angeles) and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Nov. 2, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 30 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Harford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles and Redondo (Los Angeles), at 11 a.m. November 4, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 28 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, 10 a.m. the 2d each month

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

The firm of JOE POHEIM is the largest in the United States. Rules for self-measurement and samples of cloth sent free.

201 and 203 Montgomery St., cor. Bush.
844 & 846 Market St. 1110 & 1112 Market St.
SAN FRANCISCO
485 Fourteenth St., Oakland. 603 & 605 K St., Sacramento.
143 South Spring St., Los Angeles.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Gould & Curry Silver Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment ..... | No. 82 |
| Amount per share ..... | 20 cents |
| Levied..... | November 2, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office..... | December 7, 1897 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock..... | December 29, 1897 |

A. K. DURBROW, Secretary.
Office, room 69, Nevada Block, San Francisco

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

ESTATE OF EUDORA A. CHAMBERS (sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers) DECEASED

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, R. C. Chambers, Executor of the will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within ten months after the first publication of this notice, to the said R. C. Chambers, at the law offices of Franklin K. Lane, rooms 201-202 Crocker Building, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

R. C. CHAMBERS,
Executor of the Will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, November [illegible], 1897.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF ROBERT A. ROSE, DECEASED

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at Room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

A. C. FREESE,
Adminis-trator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, October 26th, 1897.

J. D. Sullivan,
Attorney for Administrator.

BEST & BELCHER MINING COMPANY. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the second (2d) day of November, 1897, an assessment (No. 63) of twenty-five cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of December, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless paid before, will be sold on Tuesday the twenty-eighth (28th) day of December, 1897, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. M. JAFFE, Secretary.

Office, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Kentuck Consolidated Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment..... | No. 14 |
| Amount per share ..... | 5 cents |
| Levied ..... | October 27, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office ..... | December 1, 1897 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock..... | December 22, 1897 |

AUG. WATERMAN, Secretary.
Office, room 23, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

Ernst H. Ludwig

CATERER

Supplies Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice
Also Terrapin, Entrees, Luncheons and Dinners, Ice Cream, Cake, etc.

NO. 122 GEARY STREET

Telephone Grant 119

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA
ELECTRICAL WORKS

409 MARKET STREET

THE RUBBER-TIPPED ARROW FAMILY GAME

It is just the thing for amusement; just the thing for discipline; just the thing to help our boys and girls grow up strong, healthy, manly, and womanly. The Game in Bronze costs only 65c. including pistol, arrow, target, and target-holder; in nickel, 90c., all complete.

ELASTIC TIP CO., 735 Market Street,
Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company Pacific Coast
Baltimore Sole Agents

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.
Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY

Price
25 Cents

DR. PARKER'S
COUGH CURE

One dose will stop a cough—it never fails!
ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR IT

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, FIRE TILE, ETC.
GLADDING, McBEAN & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO
WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

When the notorious forger known as "Jim the Penman" (on whose life a play was written some years ago) was transported to Tasmania, he was ushered along with the other malefactors into the office of the governor of the penal settlement, and told to write his name on a form supplied for that purpose. In those days education was not as common as it is in these times, and the official in charge told "Jim" that if he was unable to write, he (the official) would write the name and the forger could add his mark. With a curl of his lip the forger remarked: "If I couldn't write I shouldn't be here, old chap," and proceeded to sign his name, whereupon the astonished functionary was so taken aback that he apologized for his remark.

A lady cyclist, who rides in knickerbockers, tells an amusing story at her own expense. A friend of hers, a well-known physician, employs as coachman an Irishman who, when about the house, assists the servants by attending the door. One day the doctor, on his return from his mid-day round, was informed that some one had called during his absence to see him, and, when he went to the stable, he said to his man, "They tell me, Patrick, that some one called for me. Was it a lady or a gentleman?" "Begorra, sir, you've got me!" was the reply. "The divil a one of me knows which it was! It talked kind of tender-like, and looked sort of mild and quiet, but it wore as nate as pair of knee-pants as a man could wish for!"

Holman Hunt began life as clerk in an auctioneer's office. The windows of the salesroom were made of ground glass, and as he had little to do he spent much of his time in drawing flies upon its roughened surface. A blot of ink sufficed for the body, and some delicate pencil strokes for the wings, and, at a distance, the deception was perfect. Day by day the number increased, and one morning his employer came in, stopped before the window, and exclaimed: "I can't make out how it is. Every day that I come into this room there seems to be more and more flies;" and taking out his handkerchief he attempted to brush them away.

The late Duchess of Teck narrowly escaped marriage with Plon Plon, the gay and rakish cousin of the third Napoleon. The Emperor broached the subject to Palmerston on the occasion of one of the latter's visits to the Tuileries. Free trade was much in the air at the time. "A marriage between Your Majesty's cousin and Princess Mary!" exclaimed Palmerston, "I am afraid it is out of the question. The Prince is somewhat too much of a free trader, and though England may be pleased to see most duties abolished I doubt if she will want to abolish conjugal duties."

At a dinner-party the coachman had come in to help wait on the table. Among the guests was a very deaf old lady. Coachman, in handing vegetables, comes to the deaf party. "Peas, mum?" says Jehu. No answer. "Peas, mum?" (louder) Still no answer from the D. P., but placing her ear-trumpet to her ear, lifts it interrogatively to the man, who, glancing down and seeing the tube, ejaculates: "Well, it's a rum way of taking them, but I suppose she likes it. Here goes!" and down went the peas into the ear trumpet.

A multi-millionaire was invited to dinner at a fashionable house in Belgravia. A number of the "swells" who like to meet multi-millionaires had also been invited. However, Crœsus did not turn up, and, after waiting for more than three-quarters of an hour—such was his importance—the company at last went in to dinner without him. A day or two later the host met the man of wealth. "You had forgotten all about my invitation, I suppose?" he said. "Oh, no," replied the multi-millionaire —"I wasn't 'ungry!"

An English paper tells a story of the Rev. Mr. Watkinson, a Wesleyan preacher. Some time ago he was staying with a good woman who was yearning for the good old times and mourning the degeneracy of modern days and customs. The Wesleyan ministers of the earlier part of this century, she said, rose early, and dear Mr. Wesley was in his study at 4 o'clock in the morning. "It is not to be wondered at," was Mr. Watkinson's dry reply; "were Mrs. Watkinson anything like Mrs. Wesley I should be up at 2 o'clock."

Louis Philippe of France introduced to the Duke of Wellington one of the French marshals whom he had beaten in the Peninsula. The marshal partly turned his back to the Duke, which greatly displeased Louis Philippe, who apoligized to the Duke for his marshal's rudeness. "Forgive him, sire," said the Duke; "I taught him to do that in the Peninsula."

Sterne once declared in regard to the widely respected maxim, de mortius nil nisi bonum, that there was nothing right about it but its Latin. This view was evidenty shared by a certain Edinburgh minister, who, being asked to preach the funeral sermon of a miserly brother cleric, chose as his text the words, "And the beggar died."

A local preacher, being anxious to interview Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, called at his house, but was informed by the servant-maid that the great preacher was engaged. "Tell him," said the caller, "that the servant of the Lord wishes to see him." "Ah," replied Mr. Spurgeon, "tell the servant of the Lord I am engaged with his Master."

A late instance of the Irish humor is an Oxford tutor's letter of condolence to a bereaved parent. The tutor wrote: "I am sincerly grieved to hear the sad news of your son's death. But I must inform you he would have had to go down in any case, as he had failed to satisfy the examiners in classical Moderations."

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION

IN

THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

Hotel Rafael

SAN RAFAEL, CAL.

The Sanitarium, Winter and Summer, of the Pacific Coast

FIFTY MINUTES FROM SAN FRANCISCO

Magnificent Scenery and Drives. The thermometer averages for the winter months 64 degrees, excelling that of the famed Mentone, France.

Headquarters of the San Rafael Hunt-Club and Tennis Tournaments

R. H. WARFIELD CO.
(Incorporated) Proprietors

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.
PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO
HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

The best people from everywhere, bent on business or pleasure, when in New York, stop at

The St. Denis

The cuisine and comforts of the hotel have become so well known that its name is now a household word in thousands of homes in this country and Europe

Central Location
Broadway and Eleventh Street
Opposite Grace Church
New York

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME
CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

Thanksgiving! Users of tobacco everywhere are rejoicing over the big increase in the size of the five-cent piece of

Piper Heidsieck

PLUG TOBACCO (Champagne Flavor)

Size of plug increased 40 per cent.—nearly half as large again as formerly—improved quality. If you want the biggest bargain in tobacco you ever bought, ask your tobacconist for one of the new five-cent pieces.

THE WAVE

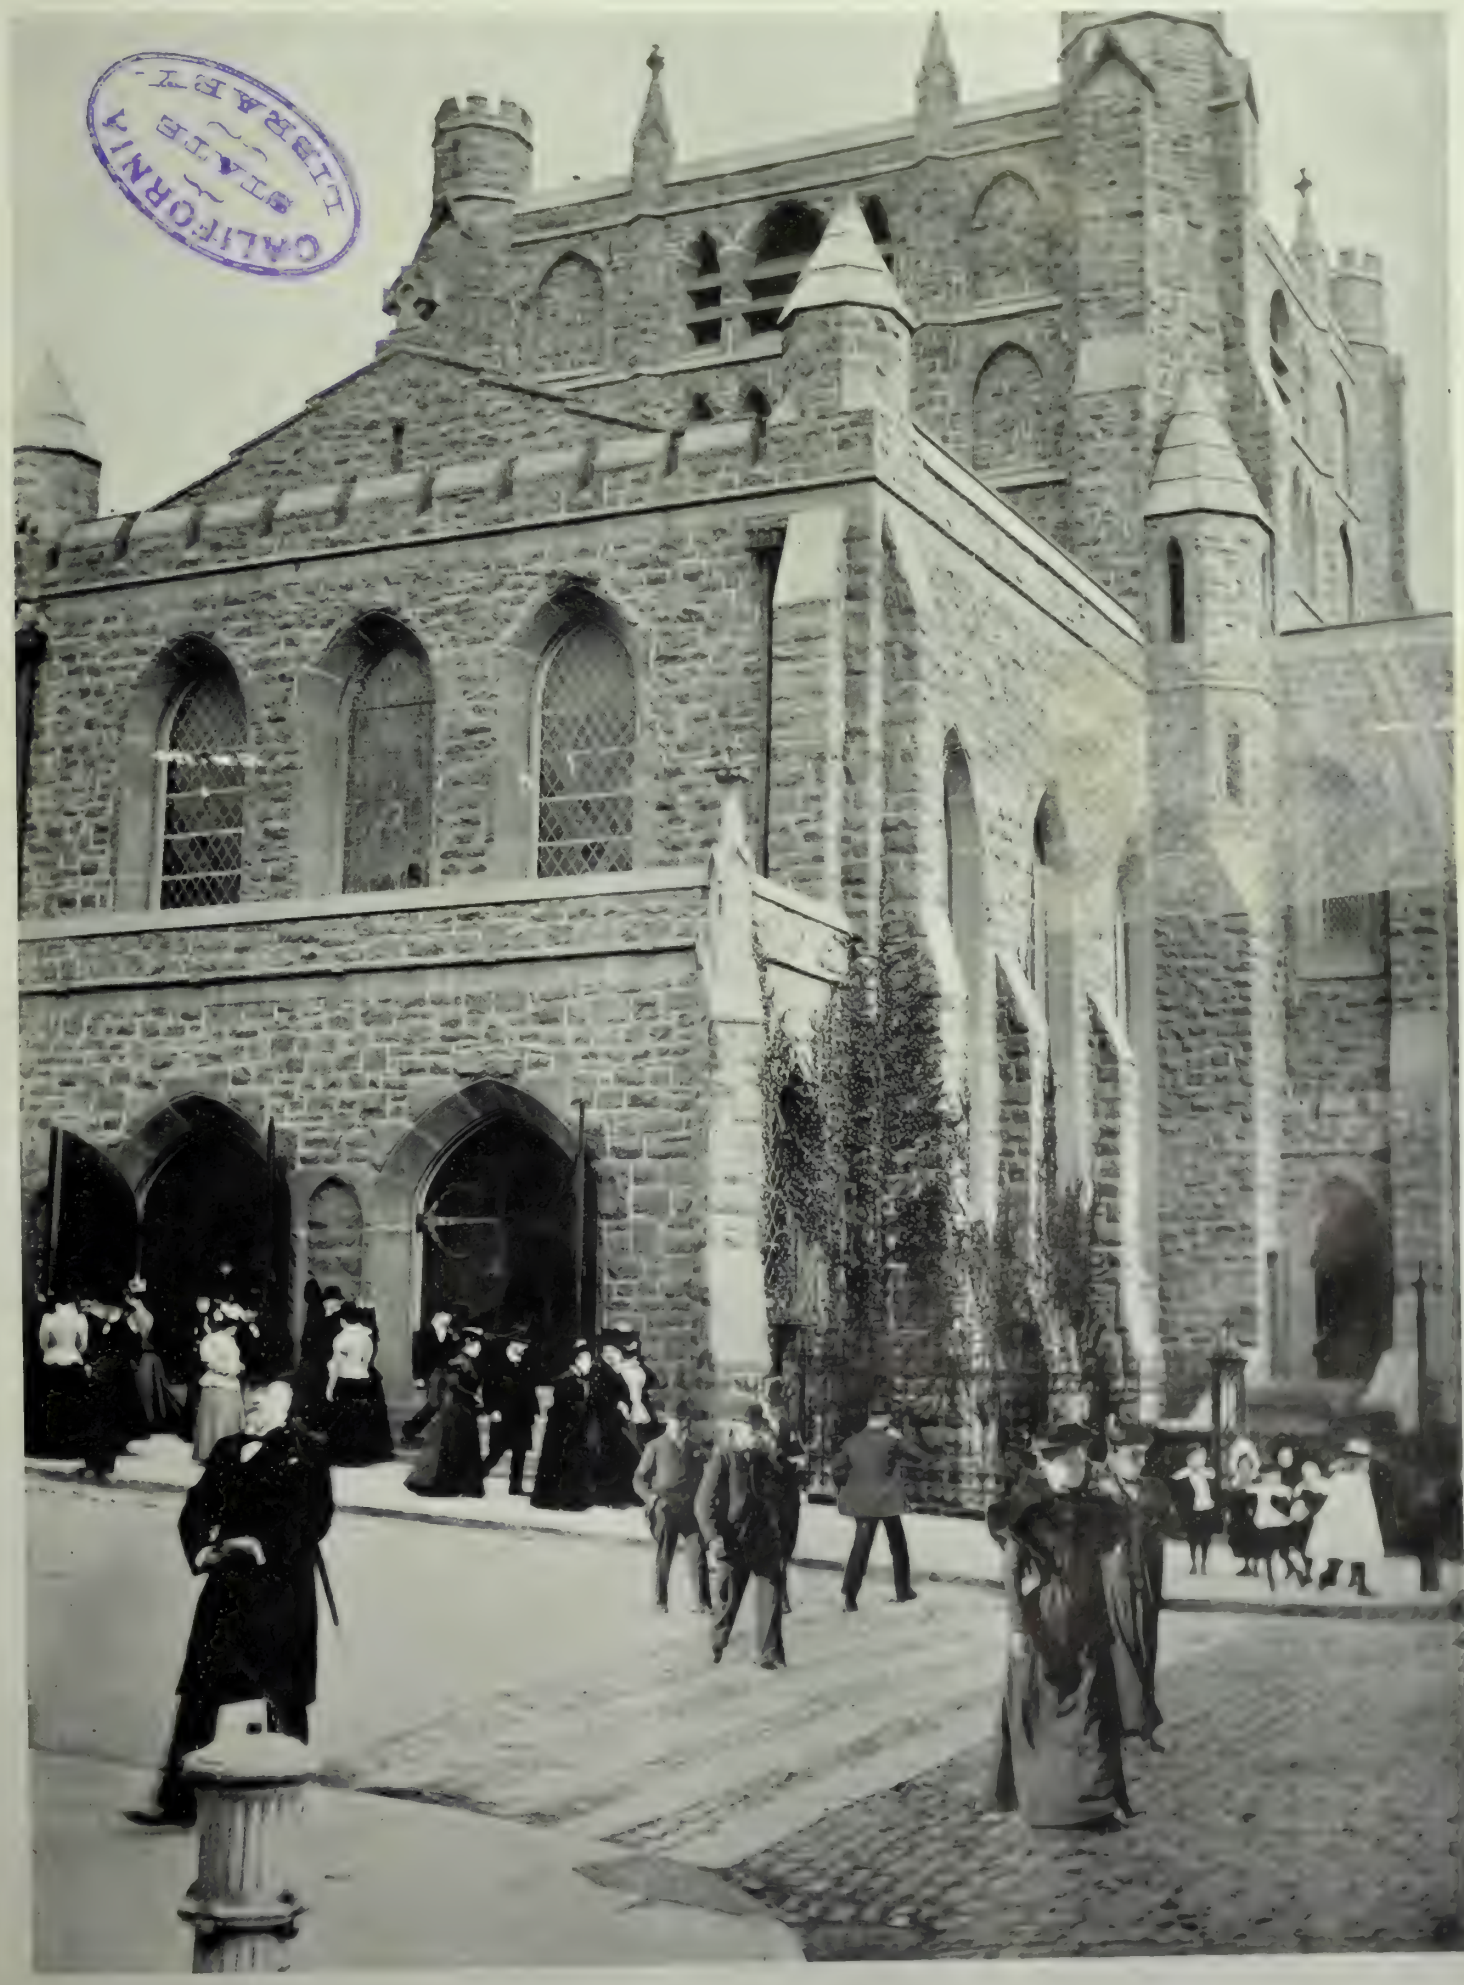
VOL. XVI. No. 48 SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 27, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY



AFTER THANKSGIVING SERVICE AT TRINITY CHURCH

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, NOVEMBER 28, 1897

CONTENTS

Editorials ..... 2
Japan According to Hearn, by Bernard Moses ..... 3
Henry James' Latest Novel; by William Henry Hudson ..... 3
The End of the Act; by Frank Norris ..... 3
Things and People, by Boswell Jr ..... 3 5
Cultivation of Pineapples, by Sarah Comstock ..... 5
The Isabella Regina, by Frank Norris ..... 6
Dolls at the Doll Show; photos by the Peters Studio ..... 7
The Art Exhibit at the Hopkins Institute ..... 8
Marchesi's Memories; a review by C ..... 9
A Debutante's Diary ..... 10
The Theatres ..... 11
The New "City of Paris" ..... 11–12
Amateur Athletics; by Robert Porter ..... 13
Turf Topics; by Benedict ..... 14
Finance and Trade ..... 14
New Stories Re-Told ..... 16

ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Sportsman's Edition of The Wave will be published next week. It will be a first-rate paper, illustrating the Country Club, Miramonte Club, Olympic Gun Club and other institutions, and otherwise will be full of scenes and pictures of hunting and fishing as both are practised in California. The letter press, consisting of stories and articles on duck shooting, fishing and kindred sports, is contributed by the cleverest writers in San Francisco.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

The annual report of the Post Master General, which will be submitted to Congress next month, has already (at least in part) been given to the newspapers for publication. He warmly advocates the establishment of postal savings banks, and attempts to support his position by arguments which, with all due respect for his official position, demand some review when seen from a California standpoint, or any other remote from the money centers of the East.

The statement that many millions of dollars are secreted because of want of confidence in securities obtainable and in existing institutions, is an assertion as to California not supported by evidence. The only hoarding of late years was during the Presidential election of 1896, and then through fear that the United States Government would make silver coin a legal tender for all amounts. Before meeting with success in soliciting deposits for its postal savings banks the proposing depositors will require that the Government give satisfactory assurance that it will repay in gold coin, and as it hesitates to so stipulate in respect to its bonds it is more than doubtful whether it will so contract as regards deposits. There has never been any fear in this State that individuals or institutions would of their own volition, repudiate their gold contracts whether expressed or implied, but the same confidence is not had in the Government of the United States, nor can it be had while nearly one half of the voters of the nation at every election record themselves as in favor of free coinage of silver, with the attendant conditions that it shall be legal tender for all amounts and under all circumstances. People die suddenly and without preparation in California as elsewhere, but probate proceedings in case of their estates do not disclose moneys on hand or secreted to any extent. The various kinds of banks, savings and commercial, hold in the aggregate individual deposits to amount to $206,481,600. As the population of the State is only 1,500,000 this gives $137 for each man, woman and child, Chinamen and other supposed non-depositors included. This large average deposit does not imply want of confidence in monetary institutions in this locality.

The remarks relative to the formation of the habit of saving, and the instilling of the feeling of patriotism in the minds of the people, are childish in their simplicity and have a goody-goody twang; they announce in substance a discovery that "saving" is the secret of wealth, ignoring the fact that Dr. Franklin wrote the "Prompter" and edited "Poor Richard's Almanac," and that a republican form of government is not now a first experiment, and that the United States of America has a history. But all these things are of minor importance; they discourage postal savings banks, but are not themselves objections to their formation.

The Postmaster-General mentions that postal savings banks have been successfully operated in foreign countries, but ignores the fact that their success is due to the facilities the governments have for investing the depositors' funds in the national debt obligations known as "consols" in England and "rentes" in France, with which in America we have nothing to correspond. That postal savings bank funds can not be invested in the debt obligations of the national government is admitted when it is said, that for investment "bonds of States, counties and municipalities and real estate furnish an illimitable field." This is suggestive—let us think of it. Who is to buy the bonds? Who is to make the loans on real estate acting for the government? Doubtless those duties will be performed by a commission and a place on that commission will be the best gift at the disposal of the administration for the time being. The presidency of the United States, with its beggarly salary of $50,000, will be at a discount, for the position of commissioner will be worth twice that amount. Not only this, but the commission will have the election of the President; with the placing of $500,000,000, or even much less in its hands, the commission will have the power to control elections in all doubtful States, and it will not fail to exercise this power if composed of politicians, and of whom else may it be expected to be composed. Assuming that men could be found who would handle the money honestly and impartially, there would still remain the fact that the commission would have funds to invest only when money is plenty and bonds consequently high, and that to meet demands it will be compelled to sell securities when times are hard and bonds low, a loss resulting on every investment made.

Still the most serious objection remains. By inference all deposits will be sent to Washington, and will be invested from thence, or from money centers in the East, and of necessity the investments will be in great measure local. In other words, money will be gathered up in the outlying sections of the country where it is scarce and is much needed, to be transferred to points where there is already an excess, realizing the passage of Scripture which says: "To him that hath it shall be given and from him who hath not shall be taken even that which he hath." Shall the money centers already plethoric be further congested, and shall the extremities now and always in need be drained of what little they have of the life blood of commerce?

This is what is suggested—let the people consider the proposition.

THE CHARTER QUESTION.

The Examiner has attempted, in its own way, to answer the open letter addressed to Mayor Phelan, which appeared in these columns last week. The gist of The Wave's letter may be succinctly stated:

1st. San Francisco needs a new charter.

2d. A charter simply favoring civil service and honest and economical government could only be objectionable to dishonest men.

3d. The majority of San Francisco's voters being honest such a charter would be adopted by an overwhelming majority.

4th. A charter attacking property rights, intended to punish corporations, laden down with strange and evil provisions tending toward socialism, would be defeated, because it would repel all honest men who give thought to the problem of government, or who have interests that would suffer by such attack.

The Wave took the position that it would be far more practical, infinitely more politic and more decent, for the framers of the charter, in the interests of good government, not to imperil the fate of the instrument by loading it down with obnoxious provisions, offensive to honest men.

The inference to be drawn from the Examiner's editorial is, that it believes it is much better to indulge in these innovations and take the chances. That rather than have a certainty of good government, it is wiser to endeavor to catch the support of the Populist and Socialist by permitting them to incorporate some of their wild theories in our fundamental law. This has been tried before, and charters have been defeated before. Such will be the fate of the present charter, unless wise and more politic counsel prevail. It is a "toss up," however, which side of this controversy is being most brutally mangled and butchered—the proponents, as represented by their journals, or the opponents' side represented otherwise.

GRANT ON PROTECTION

The New York World of recent date publishes an interview with Ulysses S. Grant Jr., of San Diego, on "prosperity and protection," in which are embodied some utterances that will be echoed with approval by a large majority of the voters of America. Mr. Grant says:

"We protect the goods that are manufactured, but we must extend the principle further and protect the men and women whose toil and skill produce the goods. Not only American industries, but the American industrious must be benefitted; otherwise protection is only a mockery to those who labor, while to the manufacturer it is a never failing source of wealth."

Mr. Grant's distinguished father also qualified his protectionism. What the son offers as his opinion, sets forth in very plain terms a conclusion that has been forcing itself upon the American people. The manufacturers certainly, under present arrangements, enjoy unusual advantages over labor itself. The manufacturer purchases his labor in a free trade market, and disposes of the product of that labor in a protected market. He may draw upon the hives of Europe for his craftsmen, and may, too, if he chooses, to reduce the wage scale to the European level. There is no "tariff" on labor, no "protection" against the incoming of the foreign craftsman; but in the "article" manufactured we exhaust our protective energies. The interview further reports Mr. Grant as not favoring the modern trusts and as declaring:

"If then modern industrial giants are diverting the benefits of protection which were intended for all, we must stop it. The Republican party should not rest under the charge of legislating for the benefit of the trusts. It should inquire into this charge, and, if it is true, the wrong should be righted."

It is very probable this question will be brought into greater prominence during the coming session of Congress, and that the Republican party will purge itself of the charge to which the gentleman refers. The opponents of protection have ever urged that it operated to create trusts and to concentrate immense wealth in the hands of the few. It is a healthy and a cheering sign that men high up in party ranks are giving this subject their serious consideration.

The closing lines of Mr. Grant's interview are significant. "The doctrine of protection," said he, "is intended to sustain life in American industries that are weak and struggling for existence. Beyond that point, considerations of revenue and the welfare of the masses only should move us."

FOOTBALL FATALITIES.

The annual protest against football brutality has again made its appearance, and the New York World has adduced three columns of statistics of the killed and maimed in support of its statement that the game is the most deadly known. Eight dead, two hundred and eighty-six wounded is the record for the season in America, says the World. At first sight the figures seem rather appalling. But it may well be asked, on the other hand, if any advantages have been gained to offset the list of casualties. When Lexington was fought, a man or two was killed and quite a number wounded, yet Independent America was the direct result. History can tabulate in figures quite as accurate as those of the World the actual loss in dead and wounded of that battle, but we haven't as yet invented a system of reckoning with which to calculate what was gained thereby. It is easy to estimate the casualties in a season of football, but unfortunately the advantages attained are abstract qualities not reducible to figures. The casualties affect scattered individuals all over the country, the advantages are applicable only to the race of young men in general. And these advantages are practically inestimable. More than any sport yet invented, football demands obedience to the captain of the team, courage in the execution of his orders, judgment to determine when the play called for is to be modified or even entirely changed, intelligence acting with lightning rapidity, coolness that must steady the man in the midst of the most intense excitement, high physical qualifications of endurance, and—during the months of preparation—abstinence, temperance and rigid sobriety. Best of all, perhaps, it fosters and encourages what tacticians call esprit de corps, a certain enthusiasm for impersonal objects, an adherence and loyalty to abstract unselfish ideas, perhaps the highest emotion of which man is capable. For it must be remembered that football is the most unprofessional sport that exists. The men composing the teams undergo months of terrific hardship, and at times actual suffering, without hope or even thought of ultimate material recompense, working solely for the "honor" of the thing. Courage, discipline, obedience, intelligence, the power of accurate thought in the midst of great excitement, and patriotism are precisely the qualities demanded of the soldier—let us say of the general. The strength of a nation is in its young men. We have not yet got beyond the fighting period of civilization, we Anglo-Saxons. Who can say, with absolute certainty, how soon we may be obliged to call these same young men of the lime-lined gridiron to our frontiers and seacoasts, and set them there, with their eyes upon their rifle sights to play the game in very deadly earnest. Wellington said the battle of Waterloo was won upon the playing-fields of Eton. There are plenty Waterloos yet unfought, and when their day comes the general who can command the greatest number of strong and enduring young men, possessing the qualities of courage, obedience, discipline, intelligence and patriotism, is going to win out in the end. Just as surely as the captain of a strong, obedient, well disciplined and intelligent eleven will make his touchdown.

That the list of killed and wounded in this season's football is so large is, of course, deplorable, and it is yet an undecided question whether or not the elimination of mass plays and the sudden concentration of a number of men upon a single point would not be a marked improvement. The piling up on a runner after "down" has been called, should be, beyond doubt, severely penalized by the umpire. But it must be remembered that the essential of football is its roughness; to eliminate that feature would be also to eliminate the incentive for courage, discipline and obedience, which rather than touchdowns, are the ends to be obtained.

There are many who clamor for the "open" English game as less brutal than the American-Rugby contest. The actual appearance of the English game, all running and kicking, would lead the spectator to believe that its danger had been reduced to a minimum. The facts of the case do not, however, bear out this theory; for in England during the season of '96 there were no less than twenty-one players killed upon the field.

JAPAN ACCORDING TO HEARN.

By BERNARD MOSES.

The leaders of the westernizing movement in Japan seem to conceive of the civilization of Europe and America as consisting chiefly of modern science and machinery; and with this conception their attempts to copy this civilization lead to the development of an extremely practical spirit. In some instances they are so thoroughly absorbed in revolutionizing the physical characteristics of their national life, that, for the time being, they appear to be given over to the baldest form of materialism. An exeellent antidote for the impression made by these phases of Japanese life resulting from imitation of the West may be found in the writings of Lafcadio Hearn. He is an orientalized European. He comes to Japanese civilization as one comes to a new religion. His zeal is the zeal of a new convert, and he interprets his observations under a rare enthusiasm for things Japanese. His latest book, called "Gleanings in Buddha-Fields," contains striking illustrations of the writer's strength, and also illustrations of his weakness.

When he writes of real things, as in "Notes of a Trip to Kyoto," or in the sketch entitled "In Osaka," everything he touches becomes idealized. Under his hand nothing remains commonplace. The streets, the bridges, and the canals of Osaka may not have appeared in reality to be extraordinary, yet after reading these pages the traveler will be likely to regret that his visit in that city was not longer. Mr. Hearn has evidently adopted Japan without qualifications. His interest in the people and their surroundings is always awake, and his judgments are tempered with an active sympathy; and it is not merely the Japan of history and tradition that attracts him, and that is illumined by his glowing fancy. Even the commercial traveler, the newest product of modern social conditions, is exalted and idealized. According to Mr. Hearn, "he is dressed with the most correct taste in the latest and best mode; he can talk to you equally well in French, German or English; he is perfectly courteous, but able to adapt himself to the most diverse characters; he knows Europe; and he can give you extraordinary information about parts of the far East which you have visited, and also about other parts of which you do not even know the names. As for Japan, he is familiar with the special products of every district, their comparative merits, their history. His face is pleasing—nose straight or slightly aquiline—mouth veiled by a heavy black moustache; the eyelids alone giving you some right to suppose that you are conversing with an Oriental. Such is one type of the Osaka commercial traveler of 1896. "Should you meet the same man in his own city, you would probably find him in Japanese costume—dressed as only a man of fine taste can learn how to dress, and looking rather like a Spaniard or Italian in disguise than a Japanese." Evidently the Japanese commercial traveler is not often encountered by the tourist in Japan.

In spite of the growth of industry under modern conditions in Japan, Mr. Hearn finds that old Japan is not rapidly disappearing, and that "it cannot disappear within at least another hundred years." And this conclusion accords with his evident sentiments; with his wish that the civilization of Japan and all its ancient traditions and aspirations may abide, not merely because of the romantic element in its history, but because, in his view, it contains solutions for the future. He is impressed with "the vastness of the Buddhist concept of the universe," and with the thought that Buddhism has "not offered itself to humanity as a saving creed for one inhabited world, but as the religion of 'innumerable hundreds of thousands of myriads of kotis of worlds.' And the modern scientific revelation of stellar evolution and dissolution then seemed to me, and still seems, like a prodigious confirmation of certain Buddhist theories of cosmical law." The man of science to-day, he says, "is obliged to consider the relation of our own petty sphere to the great swarming of suns and systems as no more than the relation of a single noctiluca to the phosphorescence of the sea. By its creed the Oriental intellect has been better prepared than the Occidental to accept this tremendous revelation, not as a wisdom that increaseth sorrow, but as a wisdom to quicken faith. And I cannot but think that out of the certain future union of Western knowledge with Eastern thought there must eventually proceed a neo-Buddhism inheriting all the strength of science, yet spiritually able to recompense the seeker after truth."

In the essay on "Nirvana," Mr. Hearn clearly distances his reader. Here are fifty-five pages of words neatly arranged in the order approved by grammarians; but when we have read them, we recognize how profoundly true is the statement made by certain other Buddhists, that "Nirvana" may not be comprehended except by the initiated. Yet we have here another attempt to explain by logical processes an affirmation of the Oriental speculative imagination, which in its sublime flight rises to regions into which the plodding logical thought of the Westerner can hardly enter. But this book, like Mr. Hearn's writing generally, is quite worthy of attention for its excellent form, and for its fine appreciation of a civilization whose spirit is passing.

(Gleanings in Buddha Fields, by Lafcardio Hearn. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., publishers.)

HENRY JAMES' LATEST NOVEL.

By WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

If the ideal which Henry James set before himself in writing What Maisie Knew (H. S. Stone & Co.), was to show that he could be at once prodigiously clever and prodigiously dull, the book must be pronounced a very remarkable achievement. At first, indeed, we were almost inclined to regard it as a huge practical joke—say, an attempt to find out just how much a long-suffering public will accept in the way of the unnecessary, the trivial, and the tiresome, provided only it is guaranteed by the name of some writer of established reputation. But Mr. James is far too serious in his conception of the novel, if not in his treatment of life, to indulge in that kind of unseemly jest. Wherefore, we concluded that the only way to account for the existence of such a volume, curious compound of the brilliant and the tedious, is by recourse to the great Jacobite Theory of Fiction. Like The Spoils of Poynton, only, unfortunately, on a yet larger scale, What Maisie Knew is simply a fine example of that art of How not to tell a Story which is not worth Telling, in which Mr. James has now for some years past shown himself so admirable a master.

The theme of the book may be given in a few words. Maisie is a child who has not, in Heine's phrase, been as careful as she might have been in the choice of her parents. Her father (according to her mother) is "beastly"; her mother (according to her father) is a "nasty horrid pig"; and though these connubial courtesies are inspired by irritation, they go far in each case towards hitting the mark. These delightful and pleasantly-spoken people get divorced at the beginning of the story, and by compromise between the litigants, it is arranged that Maisie shall live with each of them "in rotation for six months at a time." In this way she becomes the bearer of many charming messages between the ex-husband and the ex-wife. In course of time the father marries the child's new governess, and the mother marries a man about town. But even these fresh relationships prove unstable. For after a number of minor flirtations, Maisie's mother's husband elopes with Maisie's father's wife! What Maisie herself gets to know under such circumstances, may be easily imagined; what becomes of her in the last complication will be discovered by the patient reader when he reaches the four hundred and seventieth page. It needs only to be noted that Mr. James tells this sordid and entirely uninteresting tale after a fashion that by this time is only too familiar. Now we have pages of elaborate analysis, in which every mood, thought, feeling is dissected with the most wearisome minuteness; and now we come, as it were accidently, upon scraps of jerky conversation, in which important items of information are conveyed by broken sentences, disjointed phrases and the merest innuendo. To make matters worse, the style is to the last degree intricate and involved; there is not a paragraph in the book that gives us temporary rest from its labored cleverness.

The characters themselves have nothing of the flesh and blood of common humanity. One and all, with the possible exception of Mrs. Wix, who is sometimes realizable and rather amusing, they belong to world of the shadowy and unsubstantial. Mr. James has made his greatest effort with Maisie, and there, naturally enough, his failure is most complete—naturally enough, we say, for how should we expect him to understand a child's mind, or to reveal its play of thought and feeling with the methods he has chosen to adopt? As it is, we cordially agree with Mrs. Wix—Maisie is "too unspeakable."

Of course, the story does not really end—that would be against the Jacobite theory; end the book does, at length, and we are duly thankful. Intellectually brilliant it doubtless is; its ingenuity is often amazing. But our final impression in laying it aside with a sigh of relief is, that its brilliancy, its ingenuity are, after all, wasted. It is with regret that we say this, for we greatly admire much of the author's earlier work. Our only satisfaction is in feeling that, if we cannot now hope to go back to the Americans and Roderick Hudsons of the past, we may at least believe that in What Maisie Knew Mr. James has really done his worst.

("What Maisie Knew," by Henry James. H. S. Stone & Co., Chicago, publishers.)

THE END OF THE ACT.

By FRANK NORRIS.

The house was crowded to the doors. There was no longer any standing-room, and many were even sitting on the steps of the aisles. In the boxes the gentlemen were standing up behind the chairs of large plain ladies in showy toilets and diamonds. The atmosphere was heavy with the smell of gas, of plush upholstery, of wilting bouquets and of sachet. A fine vapor, as of the visible exhalations of many breaths, pervaded the house, blurring the lowered lights and dimming the splendor of the great glass chandelier.

It was warm to suffocation, a dry initating warmth that perspiration did not relieve, while the air itself was stale and close as though fouled by being breathed over and over again. In the topmost gallery, banked with tiers of watching faces, the heat must have been unbearable.

The only movement perceptible throughout the audience was the swaying of gay colored fans like the balancing of butterflies about to light. Occasionally there would be a vast rustling, like the sound of wind in a forest, as the holders of librettos turned the leaves simultaneously.

The orchestra thundered. The French horns snarling, the first violins wailing in unison, while all the bows went up and down together like parts of a well-regulated machine. The kettledrums rolled sonorously at exact intervals, and now and then one heard the tinkling of a harp like the pattering of raindrops between peals of thunder. The leader swayed from side to side in his place beating time with his baton, his hand and his head.

On the stage the act was drawing to a close. There had just been a duel. The baritone lay stretched upon the floor at left center, his sword fallen at some paces from him. On the left of the scene, front stood the tenor who had killed him, singing in his highest register, very red in the face, continuously striking his hand upon his breast and pointing with his sword at his fallen enemy. Next him, on the extreme left, was his friend the basso, in high leather boots, growling from time to time during a sustained chord, "Mon honneur et ma foi." In the center of the stage, the soprano, the star, the prima donna, chanted a fervid appeal to the tenor, who cried, "Jamais, Jamais!" striking his breast and pointing with his sword. The soprano cried, "Ah mon Dieu, ayez pitie dn moi!" Her confidante, the mezzo soprano, came to her support, repeating her words with an impersonal meaning—"ayez pitie d'elle!" "Mon honneur et ma foi," growled the basso. The contralto, dressed as a boy, turned toward the audience on the extreme right, bringing out her notes with a wrench and a twist of her body and neck, and intoning, "Ah, maheureuse! mon Dieu, ayez pitie d'elle!"

The leader of the chorus, costumed as the captain of the watch, leaned over the dead baritone and sang, "Il est mort, il est mort, mon Dieu, ayez pitie de lui." The soldiers of the watch were huddled together immediately back of him. They wore tin helmets much too large, and green peplons, and repeated his words continually.

The chorus itself was made up of citizens of the town; it was in a semi-circle at the back of the stage—the men on one side the women on the other. They made all their gestures together and chanted without ceasing, "O horreur, O mystere! Il est mort, mon Dieu, ayez pitie de nous!"

"Edgardo," cried the soprano.

"Jamais, Jamais," echoed the tenor, striking his breast and pointing with his sword.

"O mystere," chanted the chorus, while the basso struck his hand upon his sword hilt growling, "Mon honneur et ma foi!"

The orchestra redoubled. The finale began; all the pieces of the orchestra, all the voices on the stage commenced over again very loud. They all took a step forward, and the rhythm became more rapid till it reached a climax where the soprano's voice jumped to a C in alt, holding it long enough for the basso to thunder, "Mon honneur et ma foi" twice. Then they all struck the attitudes for the closing tableau, and in one last burst of music sang altogether, "Mon Dieu, ayez pitie de moi," and "de nous," and "de lui." Then the orchestra closed with a long roll of the kettle drums, and the soprano fainted into the arms of her confidate. The curtain fell.

There was a roar of applause. The gallery whistled and stamped. Everyone relaxed his or her position, drawing in a long breath, looking about them. There was a general stir; the lights in the great glass chandelier, clicked and blazed up, and a murmur of conversation arose. The footlights were lowered, and the orchestra left their places and disappeared underneath the stage, leaving the audience with the convictiou that they had gone out after beer. All over the house one heard the shrill voices of boys crying out: "Op'ra books—books for the op'ra—words and music for the op'ra."

Throughout the boxes a great coming and going took place, and a interchange of visits. The gentlemen out in the foyer, stood about in groups, or walked up and down smoking cigarettes, often pausing in front of the big floral piece, that was to be given to the soprano, at the end of her "great scene," in the fourth act.

There was a little titter of an electric bell. The curtain was about to go up, and a great rush for seats began. The orchestra was coming back and tuning up. They sent up a prolonged medly of sounds, little minor chirps and cries from the violins, liquid runs and mellow gurgles from the oboes and wood-wind instruments, and an occasional deep-toned purring from the bass-viols, a bell rang faintly from behind the wings, the house lights sank and the footlights blazed up. The leader tapped with his baton; a great silence fell upon the house, while here and there one heard an energetic "Sh! Sh!" The fourth act was about to begin.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The Christmas number of The Wave, will be devoted to illustrating "Cosmopolitan California," and will endeavor to convey an impression of what Robert Louis Stevenson meant by calling San Francisco the "smelting pot of the races." The life of the foreign population of our city will be cleverly suggested by photographs, and the cover will be after a design by George H. Piper, sculptor of the Stevenson fountain in the Plaza.

***

The annual football contest undoubtedly adds to the gaiety of the town. On Thanksgiving-day one sees along the streets of San Francisco the brightest and most representative gathering of the youth of California—scores of the prettiest and most charming maidens imaginable, wearing the cardinal of Stanford or the blue and gold of Berkeley, and hundreds of young men in their best Sunday clothes, whose faces beam with expectation and the anticipation of excitement. The aspect of the crowd gives the casual observer his best impression of the upgrowing generation of native sons and daughters—surely as comely a generation as the world can show. Is it the climate, or the result of the blending of races, that is to be thanked for the bountiful and beautiful physical endowment with which our boys and girls are blessed?

***

Everything continues to point to a most successful racing season in San Francisco this winter, and it is most gratifying to hear the complimentary expressions of opinion of Eastern visitors upon the way in which our Turf affairs are handled and the completeness of our racecourses at Ingleside and Oakland. At the former place the charming clubhouse should be an attraction to society, and I understand that the Directors and Secretary Fred Green intend to spare no effort to make things as pleasant for visitors as possible. The drive out to Ingleside is really delightful, and carriage-folk should certainly take the road in that direction when the races are on and gather at the Club rendezvous to watch the sport. The new steeplechase course will be a great addition and afford opportunities for variety in the contests. People used to take more interest in the sport of racing for the pleasure and excitement that the running, apart from the gambling, is capable of affording, and with the greatly improved conditions that now exist there should be a return to the spirit of former times. This is noticable in the East, and, as we are well in the van of progress in racing matters in California, society here should not be backward in stamping good sport, in which first-class horses are participating, with its approval.

***

Though it is said Sam Rainey lacks the magnetism of his old colleague Buckley, there must be some fascination about the man to have seduced Auditor Broderick from the paths of political virtue. Until this summer, Broderick rejoiced in an enviable reputation for devotion to the public service. Though not insensible to the value of popularity he had the manner and attitude of an upright official whose purpose and privilege it was to serve faithfully the city. But he has listened to the siren temptings of the Democratic boss, and seems to have cast his fortunes with the push, and in consequence he has fallen out of the ranks of the faithful, and his name will never again do to conjure with in a Non-Partisan convention. The Auditor was never elected because he was Broderick, but because the electors believed him an honest man. Now his conduct in the matter of auditing the salaries of the County Clerk's office is indubitable proof that he has departed from the standard of the people and enlisted under the banner of the bosses. With the idea of making a grandstand play he sent men to Mr. Phelan assuring him that the extra salary demands of the County Clerk were illegal and need not be paid, if the proper order came to him from the Mayor. Mr. Curry had pledged himself to run his office for $6,000 per month, and was exceeding the allowance by $4,500. The law under which the extra

Mrs. J. Hubert Voss
From the portraite by J. Hubert Voss amount was paid, he was assured, was unconstitutional However, when the Mayor proceeded to take the fellow at his word, the Auditor declined to do his duty, protesting that if the constitutionality of the matter was to be tested someone else should take the responsibility. And this is the man who had been termed the "watchdog of the treasury."

***

The presence in San Francisco of J. Hubert Vos, the eminent Dutch artist and his beautiful Hawaiian bride, has had both journalistic and social recognition. The portrait of Mrs. Vos that hangs in Vickery's gallery affords evidence that the skill of her husband has not been overestimated, for it is a fine rendering of an admirable subject. It is often the case that commonplace prettiness backed by social prestige is dubbed beauty, but there is no question of the rank of Mrs. Kaikilani Graham of Honolulu. She is superbly tall, imposing, yet graceful, and the face seems to suggest a most interesting blending of types and nationalities. Certainly, she is the handsomest woman of Hawaiian extraction I have ever seen. Hubert Vos has achieved prominence in Europe as a portrait painter and originally came to America as Art Commissioner from Holland to the World's Fair. He has rendered the young Queen of the Netherlands on canvas and has been knighted by way of recognition of his talent. A large dinner was given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Vos at the Red Room of the Bohemian Club last week and they are being very generally entertained prior to their departure for Honolulu.

***

The Bohemian Club is to the front again as an encourager of local talent. This is as it should be, for there is hardly an artist of prominence in the city who is not an "owl." In the early days of December the club's quarters on Post street are to be transformed into a temporary art gallery, and all the painters of San Francisco will be invited to compete for a prize of two hundred dollars. There are to be two ladies' days during the exhibit, upon which the members are permitted to invite a limited number of ladies. Altogether the affair promises to be quite an event. The prize is to be awarded, not by a committee, but by a vote of the whole club, though whether this franchise is to be extended to the visiting "lady friends" of the members has not yet been decided. All the clever men will have specimens of their handiwork upon the walls, and the exhibit promises to be a treat of unusual attractiveness.

***

The merits of the picture exhibition at the Hopkins Institute are directly dealt with elsewhere, but this is the proper place to mention the presumption of a certain Jules Mersfelder. The canvases of Mersfelder have been given space and opportunity in the exhibition to which their merits or originality do not entitle them. In fact their presence is an impertinence, inasmuch as they are copies of pictures in the gallery of Irving M. Scott. The large canvas in the main gallery is almost a replica of Keith's "Oaks," and the inspiration of a second in the conservatory is drawn from another famous work. That the artist has chosen excellent models is unquestionable, but what right has he to exhibit with his signature compositions whose motifs he has appropriated? In fact the idea and manner of both canvases are stolen and the distinction accorded them in the Institute is the consecration of a theft. An interesting question of artistic ethics is here involved—should the association hang such pictures? Is it not encouraging Mersfelder, who seems to have a certain talent, to further depravities? Certainly it is unfair to Keith whose compositions are thus misused.

***

Mersfelder's mothods of projection are characterized by a supreme audacity. He has been a daring adventurer in the field of art and has resorted to extraordinary subterfuges to persuade customers to his studio. Not so long ago this gay young gentleman wrote to Irving M. Scott, a letter surcharged with pathos and famine, in which he declared himself on the verge of suicide. Indeed the manner of his proposed taking off was described in detail, and of course he attributed all his misfortunes to the brutal indifference of this community, to art and its disciples. Mr. Scott, much moved, rushed to Keith with the baleful missive, explaining he could not bear to go alone to survey the scene of tragedy. Keith put on his hat, and together they sought Mersfelder's studio. The gentleman, nattily attired in a velveteen coat, was lolling in an arm chair; the air was loaded with tobacco smoke; a fire burned brightly enough in the grate, and the atmosphere was most comfortable. With a fine indifference, Mersfelder greeted them, and, without an allusion to his alleged straits, proceeded to show off his pictures. Really it was magnificent cheek, but imagine a man with that audacity being able to paint.

***

Apropos of art, there is an impression among the painters that the Hopkin's Institute is not a grand picture market. The term "impression," is used advisedly, for it seems a certainty that but few canvases displayed there are disposed of. This is not the fault of Secretary Martin, whose heart is in the cause, nor yet of the directors—in fact it is hard to say where the failure lies, save with the public. Our millionaires do purchase pictures from the art stores—why not from the studios? Wherefore not of the Hopkins house? I suppose it is purely a matter of salesmanship, this business of selling canvases. The successful dealer must proclaim loudly and emphatically, the value of the portrait or landscape, for in the absence of violent endorsement, the purchaser is not impressed.

***

When J. J. Gottlob retired from the service of Manager Leavitt of the Bush-Street Theatre, half a decade ago, there succeeded him a quiet, blonde young man who looked rather juvenile for the responsibility. But Mr. Broadhurst seemed to know what he wanted, speedily made friends and had many regrets expressed over his departure for fresh fields. Now he returns to San Francisco a successful playwright, having in the four and a half years that have elapsed since his departure from this region, written "The Speculator," which Thomas Q. Seabrooke has been playing in for two seasons, "The Wrong Mr. Wright," in which Roland Reed has scored such a success, and "What Happened to Jones," which has already had a twelve weeks' run in New York. Mr. Broadhurst is ambitious, likes California, and believes there is more available literary and dramatic material on the Coast than in the East. He is at work on an idea that he believes offers the basis of a serious play, and it is to write it he is in San Francisco. Otherwise, he is clever and quick-witted, with a very keen sense of humor, as becomes a man who has produced so many farces, and looks preposterously young to have scored two New York successes.

***

Really our Chinese fellow citizens find it difficult to keep the peace. It seems the Consul has almost given up hope of controling the warring clans, and has dismissed his special policemen, because they failed to locate the murderers of the priest of the Temple of the King of the City. I presume it will be necessary to discover other and more able sleuths for the task, for I cannot imagine a Chinese consul lacking a corps of guardians. If the diplomatic powers that be in Chinatown are really troubled by prevailing conditions, they will undoubtedly begin the infliction of vicarious punishment on the friends and relatives of the malcontents in China—a proceeding antagonistic to our Western sense of justice, but most effective to the Oriental. They know how to punish obstreperous Mongolians in the Empire, as the accompanying cut—the interior of a Shanghai prison—shows. The position enforced by the neck decoration is most uneviable.

Punishing Chinese in Shaghai

***

The Presidio is to be bounded by a stone wall—a stout and salient structure meant to exclude unwarranted trespassers, and keep in unruly soldiers. It is no light task constructing a masonry protection to the great reservation, and there has been a new scanning of lines and surveys, so it may be run just right. The process brought to light a curious discrepancy between the maps by two eminent engineers, who had been entrusted, at different times, with the laying out of the property. Both knew their business, but the results were different, though each had started his lines for the same place. The conflict was explained, however, when an ancient cannon was dug up close to the base. Its iron mass had deflected the magnetic needles in the surveyors' compasses—hence the trouble.

***

Hitherto it has been the younger masculine generation of California who, turning their faces eastward, have attained the success denied to them in their native land. This week's budget of news, however, chronicles the good fortune of two California women in reaching and holding the ear of the public. Miss Geraldine Bonner is the last to have joined the procession of bright spirits who have journeyed from San Francisco to New York. Even before her arrival Miss Bonner is reported to have been offered more work than she could conveniently handle. Lippincott's and Harper's Magazines have opened their exclusive pages to her, and it may not be long before he name may appear in the ranks of the Century's contributors. That Miss Bonner has not wholly severed her connection with California publications we may infer from her last two very able articles in this city's Argonaut.

***

The other California girl whose name, or at least pseudonym, is now before the public, conceals her identity behind the stage name of Lee Ford. Miss Leila Burton is, however, well known in this city—more, however, as a debutante of society than of the drama. "Her First Appearance" took place in the charity play of "Caste" at the California Theatre last spring. Miss Burton assumed the role of the leading female character, and acquitted herself with a brilliancy that surprised her audience and argues well for her future career as a professional. She will, we shrewdly suspect, find her "niche" in the interpretation of emotional parts. Miss Burton is under the supervision, if not the actual management, of Mr. Bouvier of the Baldwin Theatre, while Mrs. Frances Edgerton fills the position of chaperone and leading lady. The young actress' debut took place on Tuesday night of this week at Portland, Oregon, Miss Burton appearing as Sadie in "The Late Mr. Castello," and from all accounts seems to have made an unqualified success. It is the intention of her management, as soon as this success is assured, to star Miss Burton in San Francisco and the East. Miss Burton's family are well known in this city, her sister, Miss Kathro, being one of the season's debutantes, and her father, Colonel George H. Burton, is Inspector-General of the Pacific District United States Army. The cut represents Miss Burton in her debut-role of "Sadie" in the "Late Mr. Castello."

***

Quite an affair this Doll Show given by the Doctors' Daughters in the maple room of the Palace Hotel. Being the first we have had in San Francisco it ranks as an original idea and one—to judge by the numbers that are in attendance daily—that has turned out to be quite a card. It has assumed the importance of a "function." One sees there people that one knows; the same people that would have foregathered at the Horse Show had it been held this year. Now that they have taken our horses from us, we must perforce go back to first principles—and to dolls. The dolls are really very prettily and smartly gowned. The Emporium, Mme. Baer and Mme. Leuenberg, have carried off the more important prizes, but before such an array of toilets and "effects" the judges must have been hard put to it to decide. There is a class for dolls dressed by children, costume dolls that are the Midway Plaisance of the show.

***

An ominous coincidence has followed upon the death of Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper. When the news of Mrs. Cooper's tragic ending became known in the East her two sisters at once came on to San Francisco to attend the funeral and to take charge of the affairs of Mrs. Cooper and her daughter, Hattie. They remained here for some time, and were the recipients of much attention on the part of the Century Club. Some time ago one of the ladies was called East by the death of her husband, leaving her sister, Mrs. Skilton, behind. But a short time ago Mrs. Skilton received a dispatch announcing the dangerous illness of her husband, and urging her immediate return. Mrs. Skilton left the city at once, and arrived at her home in the East just in time for her husband's funeral.

***

What uncanny power is it that influences the government in favor of Special Agent Thrasher, who tried so hard to convict O. M. Welburn of embezzlement? He has just secured the suspension of three deputies in the Internal Revenue office, because they failed to substantiate the evidence of his very accomodating witness, Dillard. As I have explained before, the attack against Welburn was an effort to conceal the inside history of the Norton suicide, and the criminal carelessness of both Deputy Loupe and Special Agent Thomas, who had participated in the poker games in which much of the cashier's ill-gotten gains were dissipated.

LOUIS JAMES IN "A CAVALIER OF FRANCE." TO BE PRODUCED NEXT WEEK AT THE COLUMBIA

An irascible man, Thrasher found his scheme blocked, and, in order to succeed. suborned the services of Dillard with a raise of salary and a promise of permanent employment. This man was ready to swear anything, and did, but his pliancy was so obvious that its object was defeated, and Welburn was acquitted. Furious, because of defeat, Thrasher demanded from Collector Lynch, the dismissal of the deputies who had not perjured themselves. Of course the modest request was refused, whereupon, the special Agent wrote to the Department and temporarily succeeds. The whole affair is most undignified and places the Government in a false position. The sooner Secretary Gage, whose policy is ever opposed to such high-handed proceedings, hears of the disreputable and unjust actions of his agent, the better for the character of the Department.

***

San Francisco has long been considered as one of the best cities for sports of all kinds in the world. Lately we have seen a phenomenal revival of pugilism, and by the time these lines are public the great 'varsity football game will have been fought and won. Among other sports that are exciting more and more attention every week is that of swimming, and no doubt the construction of the Lurline, and, notably, the enormous Sutro Baths, has had much to do with the awakening of the acquatic spirit. Sutro Baths are invaded every Sunday by an army of swimmers and bathers, while the Lurline draws a numerous clientele throughout the entire week. Swimming-clubs have also started up and appear to be in a flourishing condition. To be noted among these clubs are the "Lurline," the "Dolphin," the "Golden Gate," the "Triangle," and the "California" swimming clubs—the latter professional. These organizations are much interested. in a swimming contest to decide the American championship for a quarter of a mile between H. F. Brewer, who already holds the American championship, and E. B. Stolle, whose best time for the distance is six minutes and thirty-four seconds. The match which is to be held at the Lurline Baths on the sixteenth of December promises to be exciting and spirited.

BOSWELL, JR.

The demand for bachelor apartments in New York during the past year has been on the increase so much that several new buildings have been specially constructed for the purpose. The big hotels are also making special offers for the patronage; one of them has set aside 300 rooms on two floors which are to be given over to unmarried men at a price remarkably low in view of the luxury and convenience, which, by the way, includes a valet service. The boarding house industry has been seriously affected by the change, but whether it will continue permanently or not is a matter for conjecture.

Mr. Fletcher is a very earnest exponent of a kind of Christian Science, a believer in auto-hypnotism. His style is marred by coined words like "fear thought," used in an attempt to separate "worry" from "forethought;" and "egociation" as an antithesis of egotism. He considers that "appreciation" is a word of greatest importance, and should mean the brightest form of intelligence, and makes a statement to which few will agree—that even the Lord's Prayer can be epitomized within the prayer: Father teach Thou us Appreciation. His theories about the eradication of fear, anger, envy, jealousy, etc., have long been fully known to the world. They are in the beautiful rules for conduct which the Rosicrucians followed. Mr. Fletcher's book is superior to some upon the same theme, but his gospel is presented in far more attractive form in the works of W. F. Evans, in Prentice Mulford's White Cross series of pamphlets; and in Drummond's essays.

Mr. Fletcher gives us some striking phrases as: Altruism is a powerful magnet; good men are true as steel. A crusade against fearthought would, within one generation, make asylums unnecessary. Forethought invites success; fearthought invites failure. Pessimism is poison. But he uses offensive captions, such as "Don't Be a Sewer," "Thou Shalt Not Strike a Woman," and "I Can't Not Do It," and there is less excuse for the inelegance since he seems aware of it. The Appendix A., by Dr. William H. Holcomb, is entertaining. He says the body is the mind translated into flesh and blood. At this time of a yellow fever epidemic in New Orleans, it is interesting to read of a time when there were supposed to be innumerable evidences of the non-contagion of yellow fever which strangely enough have now about ceased to exist, and suggests that the public and the professional mind may have been so hypnotized by repeated and violent asseverations that a non-contagious has been transformed into a contagious disease. He advocates mental and moral sanitation, but we have long heard the gist of it in the old Irish ballad about "Take it aisy, an' all will go well if your heart's in the right place!" It is all summed up in seven words by Solomon "As a man thinketh, so is he."

OUR LATEST PRODUCT

Successful Cultivation of the Pineapple at Los Angeles.

Mr. Finney and his turnip are an old story. "And it grew, and it grew." As for Mr. Rapp and his pineapples—"and they grew, and they grew."

There is something new under the sun. Which being interpreted, means that J. B. Rapp, of Colegrove, is just marketing the first of a new California product. Five years ago he brought a few pineapple plants from Florida and set them cleverly in a sandy corner of one of his cherished acres, and told them to knuckle down and get to work. Then he cultivated tenderly and irrigated diligently and looked for results. But months swept by and results came not, and Mr. Rapp stood puzzled in the midst of his contrary crew and stroked his beard in doubt. They remained contrary for four mortal years. Then they gave in like sensible pineapples and bore fruit. Yesterday when I arrived at the farm this pioneer of a new industry had just left for the city with a basket of big pines which would bring him from 25 to 60 cents apiece. Now let the Hawaiian producers tremble and Florida still more, for home industry without the risk of frosts will be a dangerous competitor.

If Mr. Rapp's theory be correct, then all that made his plants so slow in bearing was the process of acclimatization through which they were passing during their first years in this new soil. Now, the plants which he has slipped from his older ones, are prompt in responding to cultivation, and begin bearing within three months. It must have been a red letter day to the patient old German when he saw the first pink bud nestling in the heart of the sprawling shrubs. At present he has almost one quarter of an acre devoted to the experiment. His place lies a few miles to the west of Los Angeles, on the first hint of a sunshiny, sea-blown slope, where the air is the cleanest air that blows, and good with the smell of lemon blossoms. The ground is sandy and apparently uncompromising, but this soil is said to be what the young strangers like, and here they bristle and spread and multiply in right wholesome fashion, bidding fair to be fruitful and replenish the earth all in good season.

The first sign of fruition is shown when the tiny bud begins to unfold down in the midst of the great spikey leaves. This grows straight up, and in due course develops into a longish head, shaped like the mature fruit. Blossoms soon break out all over it, and dainty little blossoms they are, more like wee pointed tongues than ordinary flowers, and gowned in a Frenchy shade of mauve. You men do not quite comprendre? Never mind. There are some things that men need not know. Mrs. Rapp creased her big German-clean apron and displayed them proudly. Then she took me on further, to where the flowers, which, by the way, have a curious habit of blooming a deep purple in hot weather and a very pale shade in the cold, had dried away, and left the shrivelled scales that we know on the marketed fruit. The bunch of spikes springs forth at the top and the pineapple is a miniature of what it will be when ready to eat. It is slow of development, however. The youngest fruit that I saw will not be ripe before next spring, and about six months is allowed for the full growth, from bud to ripening. As soon as the pine has matured and been plucked, the mother plant dies away, leaving the young suckers at the sides which will bear later on. These may be planted apart and so a new growth started. About a third of the whole space which Mr. Rapp has devoted to his experiment is set out with this new growth. The tops, too, will take root and grow.

Several varities are being tried and all are now yielding. The Sugar Loaf flourishes a tremendously long stem and boasts of the best flavored fruit. The Smooth Cayenne is brought from Honolulu and is the only variety without stickers set along the edge of the leaves to warn off the unwary. Black Jamaica is here, and Red Spanish won me above all, with the tint of autumn leaves thawing its severity. This bears the smallest fruit, but is the most flourishing. Its products market for 25 cents at wholesale, the dealers making about ten cents profit on the handling. Smooth Cayenne and Sugar Loaf bring as high a price as 50 or 60 cents when at their best.

The pineapple plant is about 2 feet high, in both California and Florida. Mr. Rapp has set his out in rows five feet apart, the plants within the row separated by three feet, but in future he is only going to leave four feet between the rows, judging that this will give them ample space to feed. Until now, the enterprise has been purely experimental, but this year, with pineapples on all the plants, in every stage of development (for the bearing knows no season, but goes on throughout the year), the planner of it all is laying schemes galore. Twelve months hence he will have a whole level acre and a half planted to pineapples, and then, good luck to you, Mr. Rapp! If the fruit is as sweet and the price not more dear, then we are ready, one and all, to patronize home industry.

SARAH COMSTOCK.

Los Angeles, November 13th, 1897.

The latest theory of sleep connects the phenomenon with the nerve cells. It was supposed once that they were continuous and formed a permanent line of communication for ideas to pass over. Now it is said that they are only contiguous; that they connect one with another by means of prolongations. Sometimes they contract and draw in their prolongations, and then they are shut off and isolated. That is sleep. Sometimes a few of the nerve cells remain connected and exchange ideas; that is what dreams are. When you're awake they're all connected, and as you go to sleep they contract and shut off the current.

Emperor William of Germany is devoting much of his time to the study of the Russian language. The letter which he wrote to the Czar during the latter's stay at Darmtadt was in excellent Russian.

THE PINEAPPLE PLANTATION AT COLEGROVE

The Isabella Regina.

BY FRANK NORRIS.

The rear coach of a passenger train between any city and any [illegible] suburb.

CHARACTERS.

Alfred. Angelina. A Conductor. A Train Boy.

Angelina: How far are we from the city, Alfred?

Alfred: I don't know. We must cross the bay first. We go as far as Rockport on the train, you know, and we take the ferry for the city there. We're not far from Rockport now (looking out the window), be there in about twenty minutes.

Train Boy (in a Gregorian chant): Cigars-cigarettes-chewing-gum-'n-tabacco.

Alfred: Here, boy. Give me an Isabella Regina—I say Angelina, you don't mind if I buy a cigar do you—Sidney Spence told me this boy sold a cigar I musn't fail to try. Of course I won't smoke now.

Angelina: Why of course I don't mind, Alfred. It was only cigarettes you promised me about.

Alfred: I won't buy one if you say not.

Angelina: But I want you should, I love to see you happy.

Alfred: My angel. (To the boy.) Two for a quarter?

Boy: Twenty-five cents straight. (Alfred gives him twenty-five cents, and puts the cigar in his upper vest pocket).

Alfred (proudly): Angelina I haven't smoked a cigarette in a week, and you know I can get twenty-five cigarettes for what I pay for one cigar.

Angelina (with enthusiasm): You are heroic; you are noble, Alfred.

Alfred (magnificently): Pooh!

The Conductor: Tickets.

Angelina: Tickets, Alfred.

Alfred: You forget, we are traveling on a pass, Angelina.

Angelina: That's so, I had forgotten. Don't it make you feel grand to travel on a pass, Alfred, just as though you were a Personage.

Alfred (with superb indifference): Not a bit.

Angelina (gazing at him with admiration): That's because you're so used to it.

Alfred (with nonchallance): I suppose so, perhaps; I never think much about it.

The Conductor (near at hand): Tickets. (Alfred hands him the pass with exquisite unconcern, yawning and looking out of the window.)

The Conductor: You must sign this pass, sir.

Alfred (biting his yawn in two and turning to the conductor in some confusion): What, I—I thought I did pass the sign, I mean sign the——

The Conductor coldly): Well, you didn't. Sign in ink—don't use your pencil

Alfred (helplessly): But I haven't any ink. (The conductor silently hands him his fountain pen.)

Angelina: How can you sign, Alfred, when the car shakes so.

Alfred: I don't believe I can.

Angelina: It will be all jiggelty, like that signature on the Declaration of Independence. Don't you remember, the one that's so shaky, I can't recall the name. Was it Hopkins or Hancock? it's dreadfully jiggelty. There was a fac simile of the Declaration of Independence on the wall at the seminary, and Miss Mix used to tell us that Mr. Hopkins—or Mr. Hancock's hand shook so because he was afraid of the British. I can't remember whether it was Hopkins or Hancock. (To the conductor.) Do you remember.

The Conductor: What!

Alfred (handing him the pass): There you are. (The conductor takes up the pass and is moving away.)

Alfred: Hey there, conductor. (The conductor pauses.) You didn't give us any ferry tickets. I thought you always gave passengers tickets for the ferry, when you took up their railroad tickets. You always have before.

The Conductor (loftily): We only give ferry tickets to passengers travelling at regular transportation rates, we don't give 'em to holders of passes. (Moves on crying "Tickets!")

Alfred (excitedly): But I say—here—hey there conductor.

Angelina: What's the matter Alfred. (Alfred gasps, turns pale and rolls his eyes wildly.) Alfred, my own boy, what is it. You are ill. Oh, I said you shouldn't eat so much of that terrapin stew.

Alfred (fumbling rapidly in one pocket after another): Nothing, nothing, I—I—I (miserably) I'm afraid I haven't any money.

Angelina (blankly): Oh!

Alfred (distracted): How are we going to get across the bay to the city. We'll be at Rockport in a few moments. I gave my last change to the train boy for that Isabella Regina. I thought our pass was good to the city. Angelina, we are lost. I haven't a cent.

Angelina: Nor I. And I made you get that cigar. It's I that have brought you to this. Oh! Alfred, it's all my fault.

Alfred (bravely): No, I am the one to blame, I, only.

Angelina: No, no. It's only your heroism that says that. It was all on my account.

Alfred: I won't allow you to say that Angelina.

Angelina: But you wouldn't have bought the cigar if I hadn't made you. I insisted. You see if you had got cigarettes yesterday instead of your after-dinner cigar you would have got twenty-five cigarettes for what you paid for that one cigar and you might have had a few cigarettes left by now and wouldn't have had to buy that Isabella Regina cigar and-then-you-would-have-had-a-quarter-left-and-we-could-have-got-over-to-the-city—and, oh! I'm so unhappy. (Chokes back a sob.)

Alfred (wildly): Angelina you break my heart, stop, I'll throw myself from the train in another moment.

Angelina (clutching him hysterically): Alfred, you shall not. Calm yourself. Oh, what's to become of us now. (Alfred starts suddenly as an idea occurs to him, his pallor increasing.)

Alfred (with terrible calmness): And this next boat in the last to-day.

Angelina: What do you mean.

Alfred (still with horrible calmness): If we don't get this next boat, there is none other we can get till to-morrow morning, and we'll be obliged to stay over in Rockport all night.

Angelina (repressing a shriek): Alfred don't say it. It can't be true. What's to become of me. Everybody knows we came away together to spend the day out of town, and, if we stay away all night—why—why—oh, what is going to become of us now. This is—this must be some horrible dream.

Alfred (in desperation): And all for the want of a quarter. I shall go insane in another minute.

Angelina: Oh! I know I shall.

Alfred (looking about him): we must get a quarter.

Angelina: There's that old gentleman across the aisle, Suppose you go to him. You could ask him to accomodate you with twenty-five cents, and you could give him your note.

Alfred (wildly): Ha, ha, my note for sixty days. What's the interest on twenty-five cents for sixty days.

Angelina: May be you could sell him something. I know (clapping her hands), sell him the cigar. The Isabella Regina.

Alfred (with enthsiasm): Saved me again, Angelina; you

"The Singing Nymph"
A Miniature by Miss Edgerly
Photographed by Arnold Genthe.

are my good angel. (Rising.) I'm going to try. Wish me God-speed, Angelina. (They clasp hands.)

Angelina: I know you will succeed.

Alfred: I go. (He approaches the old gentleman, and engages him in a few moments interview, unheard by Angelina.)

Alfred (returning): Crushed! He don't smoke.

Angelina: What did he say.

Alfred: Said he was the third vice-president of the Anti-Nicotine League.

Angelina: We're lost.

The Brakeman (opening the forward car door with a yell): Next staishn's Bra-rah-rah! (Remainder unintelligible.)

Alfred: We are almost at Rockport, what can be done.

Angelina: Can't we hire a boat and row across the bay?

Alfred: And how would we pay the hire, I should like to know.

Angelina: If I only had some jewels to give a boatman. Just like they do in novels! Don't you remember that poem:

"A chieftain to the highlands bound
Cried boatman do not tarry,
And I'll give thee a silver crown
To row us o'er the ferry."

We had it to scan at the seminary, and "tarry" and "ferry" don't rhyme, nor "bound" and "crown." I never thought of that before.

Alfred: But what's to be done. (The train whistles for Rockport and begins to slow down; the passengers collect shawl-straps and satchels; the conductor reappears.)

Angelina: Here's the conductor's Alfred. Let's appeal to the conductor. Tell him you haven't enough money to get across the bay with, and ask him for tickets and tell him you'll send him the money to-morrow.

Alfred: He never would relent. Didn't you notice what a frigid brutal manner he had. He's just in the railroad's employ, and paid to collect fares. It's nothing to him that we can't get across the bay. He is a minion; what the newspapers call "the tool of the corporation."

Angelina: I'll talk to him. I'll throw myself upon his—

Alfred (severely): Angelina!

Angelina: —his mercy.

Alfred: No, I'll face him.

Angelena: Not alone, Alfred. I'll be at your side. (The train stops with a backward jerk and a prolonged hiss of relaxed air brakes. The other passengers leave the car. Angelina and Alfred approach the conductor.)

Alfred (in a low tone to Angelina): I—think I'm a little afraid of him; he acted like such a bear about the pass.

Angelina, Be brave, Alfred.

Alfred (to the conductor, assuming a careless tone and speaking very loud): I say, about those tickets across the ferry; I find myself in a very embarrassing situation (explains at length).

Angelina: And this is the last boat to-day, and—and—we're not—we're going to be married but—

The Conductor (easily): Why, that's all right (handing Alfred the tickets), 'might happen to anybody.

Angelina (fervidly): Oh! thank you so much. It's very kind of you.

Alfred (loftily as he pockets the tickets): I told you, Angelina, that I would fix it some how.

Angelina: Yes, Alfred, I should have known that I could have relied upon you.

The Conductor: Better hurry up you'll miss the boat.

Angelina (to the conductor, as she and Alfred move away): Thank you, again, so very much.

Alfred; He was a brick after all, wasn't he?

Angelina: He was a gentleman, Alfred.

Alfred (turning back): Wait a minute. I have an idea. (Approaches the conductor and offers him the Isabella Regina.) Have a cigar, sir.

The Conductor: Thanks, I will.

ART ASSOCIATION EXHIBIT

Fall Work of the Local Artists on View at the Hopkins House.

The exhibit of the Art Association at the Hopkins Institute is a little disappointing this year. The average is good, but one looks in vain for those few canvases that in former exhibits startled one by some point of unusual excellence, or exceptional felicity of subject and treatment. We make this statement even while bearing in mind the fact that many of the pictures are part of a loan exhibit, and as such ought to stand far above the display of local talent.

In the loan exhibit the most striking canvases are De Forrest Brush's "Indian and Lilly," Siddon Mowbray's black and white illustrations, and the military composition of Detaiele's—No. 20 on the catalogue. The color and detail in Mr. Brush's picture are really admirable, and the yellow leggins of the figure form an excelle it note in the arrangement. The face of the Indian does not impress one forcibly and hardly seems to be a portrait. You feel as though the artist had painted it entirely from imagination, not from life. It is too much like the typical Indian to be like any one particular Indian. Siddon Mowbray's illustrations were done in the time when a wood engraving was still a means of reproducing artists' magazine work, and are sober, serious and extremely conscientious efforts, devoid of any brilliancy, but accurately drawn and carefully studied. There is this same lack of brilliancy and invention in the Detaille of the exhibit. It is little more than a minute study of uniforms of the first Empire, and the Napoleon astride of a chair seems absolutely out of character. It is one of those pictures which neither succeed nor fail, for the reason that they do not attempt anything. "Abel" (No. 118) is, however, a rather fine failure, and as such, infinitely superior to the tame mediocrity of the Detaille. There is an effort here to arrive somewhere—the artist has set a goal for himself. There is a good deal of Henner in the blurred treatment of the shadows, but even our own Charles Peters can handle moonlight better. The figure of Abel in comparison with that of the woman is absurdly large. Aitkins, Lucia Matthews, Fred Yates, Keith, Inez Bates and Douglas Tilden represent the "local talent," while Miss Edgerly has on the walls a miniature on porcelain entitled "The Singing Nymph," which is one of the most beautiful subjects conceivable. The miniature is a positive gem, and will, no doubt, find its way into some collector's gallery before long. It is a pity that the head should be a little out of drawing. One is forced to admit that the tilting back of the head would have narrowed the forehead to a greater extent than is seen in Miss Edgerly's picture. Yates shows some strongly-painted portraits, executed in a style that suggests Bonnat. There is a swing and movement about Mr. Yates' brush work that is exhiliarating—almost breathless—while his likenesses, as for instance, that of Mr. Horace Hill, are life-like in the extreme. Aitkins is not up to his standard of last year, though his "Live Oaks" is a very fetching bit of work. Keith shows a huge landscape in the style of the French school of the early part of this century — vigorous and breezy. The sky, however, near the horizon is altogether too deep in tone. Lucia Matthews has some pastels done in a "poster" manner that are admirable and full of promise. Nos. 190 and 191 are especially charming. The full length portrait that Mr. Greenbaum exhibits, and that is here reproduced, is a strong sober piece of work. Mr. Greenbaum was fortunate in the matter of models. The young lady's face is expressive and unusual, almost too much so for fin de siecle costuming.

JUSTIN STURGIS.

Lord Salisbury emerged from the shades of silence with the Lord Mayor's banquet, and has added to his opportunities since in delivering himself on public affairs. Some of the leading London journals have followed by urging him to drop the reins at the Foreign Office, others going still further and advising the country to seek a new Prime Minister. In consequence, the more or less veracious London correspondents of the daily journals in this country have proclaimed approaching confusion in Conservative circles. It is not unreasonable to assume that Lord Salisbury's capacity for work is not so great as it was, but his influence and judgment are probably unimpaired, and this is the main consideration so far as his party is concerned. Persons who are not familiar with the process of government and the administration of its various departments in Great Britain are apt to lose sight of the fact that the men who handle the business of the country are the permanent under-secretaries. In matters of policy, of course, direction is given by the responsible Ministers, but in foreign affairs especially the subordinate hands control the procedure. When the outside public read the effusions of Dilke, Ashmead-Bartlett and that ilk, they are apt to think that these men know it all, but if they could have five minutes conversation with the under-secretaries of the departments charged with the affairs that are under discussion, they would probably change their opinions. Have we not our own Senator Morgan? Whatever may be said, with only partial light on the subjects of late most debated, Lord Salisbury is entitled to credit for having preserved the peace of Europe this summer, and surely that is something worthy of a statesman. Should he succeed, with the co-operation of Lord Elgin, the Viceroy of India, in effectually subduing the turbulent tribes on the northern frontier, and strengthening the alliance with the Ameer of Afghanistan, besides recovering the Soudan finally for Egypt, all of which looks at present extremely probable, he will have rendered invaluable service to his country. The late howl against the Premier probably takes rise in Radical hate and inside party jealousy, and should not be mistaken for the feeling of the nation.

Bulgaria carries the principles of protection to the point of ordering every person in receipt of a government salary to wear clothes and shoes of native material and manufacture only.

The prize bride—by Mme. Baer

The best calling costume

A tailor-made doll

A swell reception-dress—by Miss M. Switzer

At a garden-party

The prize ball gown—by Mme. Leuenberger

Robed for an afternoon wedding
by Mrs. E. M. Solly

A smart ball-gown

The prize baby chstume

Ready for her walk

DOLLS AT THE DOLL SHOW

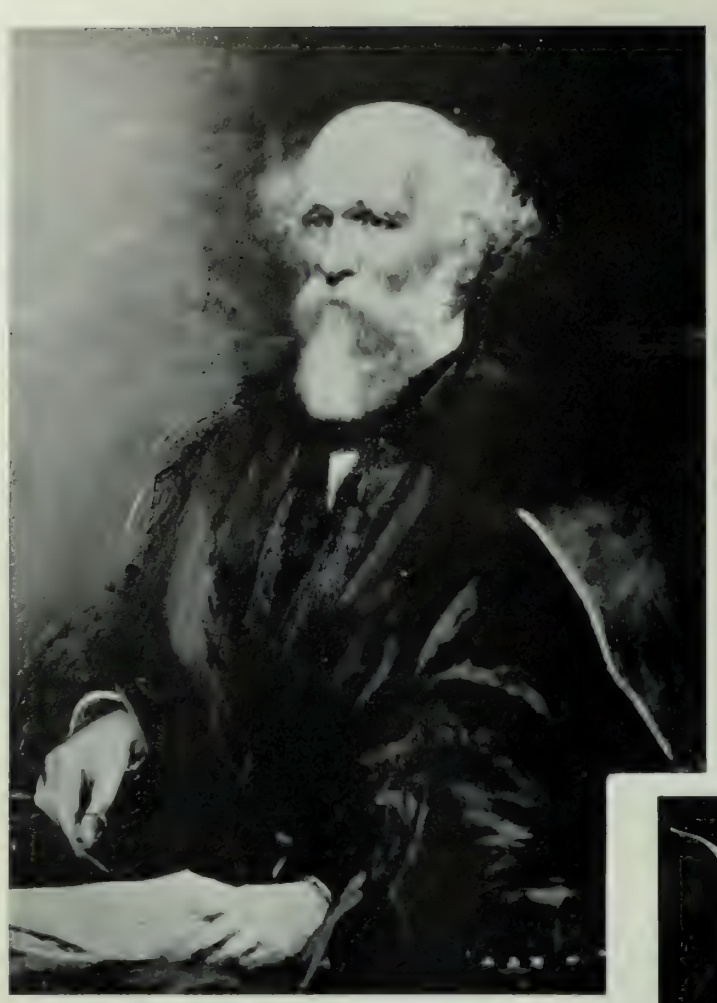
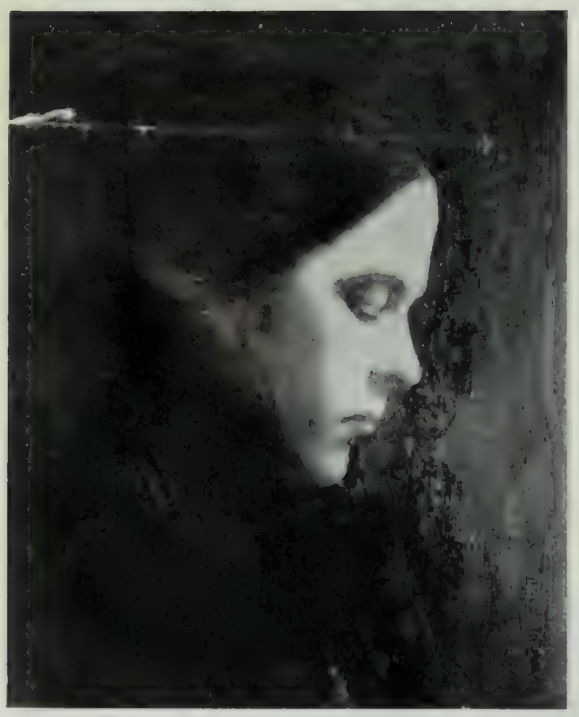
Photos by the Peters Studio





1. Professor Joseph La Conte, William Keith. 2. Landscape at Monterey; J. Stanton. 3. A Head; C. C. Judson. 4. The figure of the Phelan Monument; Douglas Tilden. 5. Portrait; Jos. Greenbaum. 6. "The First Sorrow;" A. F. Matthews. Little Red Riding-hood; Fred Yates.

THE AUTUMN EXHIBITION AT THE HOPKINS INSTITUTE

Photographs by Theodore Solomons

MARCHESI'S MEMORIES

Famous Pupils of a Noted Teacher — Melba's Debut.

The writing of reminisences is an art by itself. One can imagine Henry James would excel at delineating exactly, analytically and graphically the characteristics of his contemporaries, but the majority of men and women to whom it is given to know celebrities are quite incapable of telling anyone else about them. It is easy and fashionable to deride the taste of J. A. Froude, who refrained from editing the sarcastic flings of Thomas Carlyle at his associates, but the book of memories which resulted is a priceless work. Albert Vandam, who wrote An Englishman in Paris, has mastered the trick of conveying to the reader the character and personality of his subjects. One must be intimate and gossipy and yet not intrusive, but it is the fear of the latter accusation which prevents men like Dean Farrar from telling us about their friends the things which really make the difference.

Here is Madame Marchesi, the instructor of the most famous singers of the last quarter of a century—she who taught Ilma de Murska, Gerster, Emma Nevada, Calve, Melba and Eames—certainly no one ever had better material for memoirs, but really the book is a very decorous autobiography with no flavor of intimacy and but little of personality. Marchesi and Music (Harper & Brothers), is really valuable because of the exposition of the art of singing it contains. She contrasts the methods of instruction in vogue fifty years ago with the system of to-day, and tells of her own experience with Garcia, who was also the instructor of Jenny Lind. It seems that the great Swedish cantatrice did not make a very favorable impression. Garcia said: "After I had tried her voice I said to her, 'Madamoiselle, you have an originality of style which requires training, but either your voice is worn or you never had one.'"

He told her to rest a few weeks and suggested that she listen to the lessons of Nissen, her countrywoman, who was then his pupil. There was a great improvement when next she sang and Jenny Lind proved Garcia's most attentive scholar. He never had to explain anything twice to her, but the famous shake in "Lucia" cost her infinite trouble and many tears.

After graduating with distinction, Marchesi, then Fraulein Mathilde Graumann set forth to conquer the world as a concert singer, winning en tour an enviable success. She married, went to innumerable important houses, met all the musical celebrities, but while the narative tells us all about her doings, there is little that may be quoted for its intimacy. Finally, tiring of travelling and its triumphs, she settled in Vienna as teacher of singing at the Conservatory. There is much to interest the musician at this stage of the book because she enters into details as to her method. Here Ilma di Murska came to her—the Hungarian nightingale—who, when she entered the conservatory, had a sweet, flexible and high soprano voice and also two children. A most eccentric young lady, Ilma insisted on bringing to rehearsal a large Newfoundland dog, and indulged in excesses which undoubtedly shortened her life and career. This was later, however. Gabrielle Krauss, one of the most famous of prima donnas, formed her style with Marchesi. She was delicate, pale and timid but conquered her shyness and was at last known as "La Rachale Chantant." But there is not a familiar touch in either of these sketches. Our author is more interesting about Etelka Gerster, introduced her by a director of the conservatoire, who had heard the girl sing in a private house in Kaschau, Hungary, and had been much struck with her voice. She was a fair, smiling maiden and her gift was evident. Marchesi did everything for her but says the beautiful high notes which were afterward so much admired, her shakes, cadences and delivery were gained by her pupil's tremendous perseverance. Gerster made her debut in 1873 and in 1874, Patti came to Vienna and conquered the city by her delightful singing. The cantatrice was invited to visit Marchesi's studio, and came there on the great teacher's birthday. The rooms were full of flowers, and the diva was surprised at the quantities of beautiful blossoms. At the piano sat Marchesi giving Gerster a lesson. Patti had caught the notes of the girl's voice and begged her to sing something. Etelka, after same hesitation, rendered delightfully the cavatina from "Linda," winning praise from the diva for her fine delivery and the charm of her mezza voce. She advised her to steer courageously for her goal, but who would then have supposed that the two would make an operatic tour together in America, and that Gerster would become the successful rival of the great singer. After winning all the prizes at the Conservatoire, the young girl sang before Verdi and then went to Paris to play Ophelia in Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." Strange to say all sorts of difficulties were placed in her way, the result being that she retired and went to Madrid to succeed Nilsson. Alas, it was a sad experience. "Rigoletto" was the opera, and at the rehearsal, the young diva had won golden opinions. But when she appeared, there was a chorus of hisses and yells—"Nilsson! Nilsson! we want Nilsson!" the audience shouted. The poor debutante trembled and nearly fainted, but there was no choice for her. She sang the part through and retired. Subsequently, through a friend of Marchesi's, she was invited to sing at court, and there made a great success. The rest of her career was most happy and in the course of years she retired to a beautiful country place near Bolonga. Here she has a mansion in the midst of a beautiful park, on a hill covered with vines and cornfields, the little river Reno skirting the edges of the property.

Madame Marchesi again left Vienna and finally settled in Paris, where she has since lived and brought out so many wonderful artists. Of those who are especially famous is Emma Calve, whom Marchesi first met in '82 through a letter from Gevaert, director of the Brussells Conservatoire. She was a pretty, dark-eyed girl, but her voice had been almost ruined by improper training and overwork. This was in 1882. She rested for a few months and then began her studies. After two years she was engaged by the Italian Opera Company and made her debut in "Aben Hamet." Then she joined the Opera Comique, where she remained till '86. At this period she was still timid and rarely did herself full justice. Since then Calve has become one of the greatest singers of the day. As her letter to Marchesi shows she is grateful to the teacher who had made her success possible and freely admits her debt.

The most interesting and perhaps the most famous of Marchesi's pupils are Melba and Emma Eames. Melba, her instructor says, is to-day "without a rival on the lyric stage. As a vocalist she more resembles a bird than a human creature, and it is impossible to conceive anything more musical or more flexible than her marvelous voice which is as clear as a silver bell. I am only repeating after the critics that as regards taste, style or realization this pupil of mine is superior to any living singer." Melba is a Melbourne girl, and when but six years of age, sang "Coming Thro' the Rye" at a charity concert. Her mother, a wise woman, never let her sing for fear of straining her voice, but the girl learned the piano, organ and violin. She was married at sixteen to a son of Sir Charles Armstrong but there were difficulties and she returned to her father's home. Her lovely voice attracted attention and she was advised to go to Paris to Marchesi. The latter recognized the remarkable qualities of the Australian girl's voice and at once put her to work. She became one of the most industrious and pliant of scholars, and before her graduation had signed a three-year's engagement with Maurice Strakosch, which his death cancelled.

Emma Eames, it seems, was born in China, and never saw her parents home, Boston, until she had arrived at the age of eight years. She began to study with Marchesi in 1886, and worked steadily until 1889, when Gounod engaged her as Juliet in his new opera. The circumstances of her debut are these: Gounod met M. Marchesi and told him he was looking for a Juliet. "Has your wife one among her pupils? If so, bring her to me. I shall be at home to-morrow at eleven," he said.

Next day Marchesi and the young American went to Gounod's house in the Place Malesherbes. The family had assembled to listen. Miss Eames sang several songs from the opera and the great composer was delighted. "Here, indeed, is my Juliet," he declared. Then he commenced to rehearse her at once, he singing and playing the part of Romeo. She was engaged in February and in March, 1889, made her debut on the stage of the Paris Grand Opera House—an unprecedented honor.

Our Sibyl Sanderson is also a pupil of the great teacher. On her arrival in Paris, years ago, she was presented to Marchesi, who tried her voice. "Your voice has not been properly brought out," she said. "I cannot take you in hand unless you consent to study at least two years with me." Miss Sanderson was in a hurry. "Oh, that's too long. I have no time to lose." Massenet took charge of her, brought her out in "Esclarmonde," but on her return to Paris in 1890, Marchesi, at the composer's request, took charge of her career, with happy results, as Sanderson shows, in an epistolary acknowledgments of her debt. C.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

$2,000.00

Schilling's Best baking-powder is soda and cream of tartar, and nothing else.

Oh, yes—lots of know-how; and that's the main point, after all.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send, free of charge, to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

Mount Vernon Pure Rye.

Distillery bottling, square bottles only. The public appreciate a good article when they can get it. Sold by all first-class dealers.

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 Post St.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY'S NEW BOOKS

Third Edition, Just Ready

OF

Alfred, Lord Tennyson

A MEMOIR

By His Son

Two Volumes. Price $10.00 net.
Fourth edition in preparation

Hamilton W. Mabie writes: "With rare judgment his biographer has set in their proper places a very considerable mass of poetry hitherto unpublished . . . There is also to be found in these pages a mass of literary opinion, comment, and judgment of the highest value. In a word, Tennyson's biography reflects and transmits the richness of his life. It reports and conserves so much of his verse, his talk, his expression of every sort, that it must be regarded as essentially his own production, and therefore as forming an integral part of his complete work.—The Outlook.

"A matter of extraordinary interest," begins the [illegible] "is the publication of"

The Letters of Elizabeth Barrett Browning

EDITED BY

FREDERIC G. KENYON

With Portraits and Other Illustrations. Uniform with Tennyson. 8 vols. $5.00

FIRST EDITION is in the hands of the booksellers

SECOND EDITION ready Nov. 30th

"In the pair of wonderful volumes published by the Macmillans, there is a true life-poem, an expression of a personality sound and sweet and wholesome, rounded and healthful . . . The 'Letters' are very well edited, with discrimination, reserve and taste. Never since the publication of the 'Letters of Agassiz' has there been a nobler revelation of character in a biographical volume.—Boston Transcript.

Mr. Crawford's New Novel of Life in Italy

COMPLETING HIS FAMOUS SARACINESCA SERIES

Two Volumes, Cloth Extra, Price $2.00

CORLEONE

FIRST EDITION
All sold out

SECOND EDITION
All sold out

"Mr. Crawford has written no greater novel than 'Corleone.' The plot of this story of the MAFIA is tremendous in its close-woven unity, its swift succession of dramatic climaxes, and the amazing crescendo of cumulative effects that sweeps the interest irresistibly on to the very end.—The Tribune, Chicago.

CORLEONE

THIRD EDITION
In the hands of the booksellers

FOURTH EDITION
In preparation

"One of the strongest and finest romances that Mr. Crawford ever conceived . . . It is by far the most stirring and dramatic of all the author's Italian novels . . . The plot is a masterly one, bringing at almost every page a fresh surprise, keeping the reader in suspense to the very end.—The Times, New York

Birdcraft

A Field Book of Two Hundred Song, Game and Water Birds

BY

MABEL O. WRIGHT

New Edition, 8vo. Linen, $2.50

New Edition, illustrated by
LOUIS AGASSIZ FUERTES

"Even if this volume were devoid of illustrations, it would be welcome as an addition to English literature. It is more than an accurate and comprehensive description of all the birds one is likely to find in an extended search . . . The reader is told how to name the birds that flit by him, how to identify them by families, how to select them by an easy key, . . . so that neither bird nor observer need go astray for want of full information." The Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia.

Yankee Ships and Yankee Sailors

Tales of the War of 1812

BY JAMES BARNES

Cloth, Crown 8vo., $1.50

With Thirteen Illustrations specially drawn for the book by CARLETON T. CHAPMAN and RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM

A Treasure for the Boy's Bookshelf

The old time sailor has been placed on board his ship again, and around incidents that are historical the author has woven short narratives in a breezy, attractive style. There are to be found in them the names of old sailor heroes, of famous ships, and of battles bravely fought if not always won.

SEND FOR THE NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE ISSUED BY

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

66 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

Where shall I begin this week, dearest Diary? Shall I just attack the multitudinous teas, or give you the smaller events as a sort of appetiser, as it were? On Friday, Leila went to Mrs. Ed. Dimond's luncheon, at the 'Varsity Club; then we both went to the Newhall tea—each was sufficiently smart, neither on the especially elaborate order. In the evening I went with Arthur to the second meeting of the Friday Fortnightly. Edna Hopkins led the German with Bobbie Eyre, and managed admirably. I like the Hopkins girls—they are so well-bred, and not in the slightest degree gauche. Let me see whom I especially admired among the girls? Well, Annie Voorhies looked very pretty, and of course, I received my just meed of praise. Lillie Follis, also, looked well—she is the most uncertain of all the girls,

Miss Charlotte Ellinwood
Who made her social debut at the Ellinwood ball with regard to appearance—sometimes she is stunningly handsome, and again she just misses being plain. Helen Thomas pleased me too.

On Saturday there were teas interminable. I received at the Hopkins'. It was a really swell tea, almost a function—lines of carriages simply baricaded the street during the hours of the reception. Edna wore a perfectly stunning frock, which I must describe in detail. It was of white satin, covered with pink muslin, veiled in chiffon. The underskirt of the pink was pleated, and over it fell a skirt of sun-pleated chiffon—a ruffle was arranged all round the bottom. The waist was of the pink, with yoke edged with jeweled trimmings. A short half puff fell over the antique Florentine sleeve. Her sash was of La France pink Roman silk, edged with fringe. The girls who received were Carrie Taylor, in pink; Miriam and Francis Moore, in pale blue; Margaret Salisbury, in white; Therese Morgan, in white; Alice Hager, in white corded silk (a stunning gown), finished with turquoise-blue velvet. The house looked pretty, but I did not especialy admire the decorations. There was a conglomeration of different hued flowers which lacked harmony. The dinner afterwards was one of the jolliest—so informal—and we had ever so much fun. Oh, you should have seen the lovely brooch Mrs. Hopkins gave Edna as a souvenir of her first appearance. A big pansy of diamonds with a ruby in the center. Huber played during the whole affair. Mamma and Leila took in the other teas—the Carrolls and the Bruces. Leila said she enjoyed Gertie Carroll's tea surprisingly well. Leila is terrifically blase about teas, and has to be dragged to them. Gertie wore a lovely gown of pink and white silk, wonderfully built, with endless varied effects—an importation that Elizabeth brought her from Paris Ebizabeth Whittier was in a pale blue, and looked very sweet. Mrs. Carroll wore black velvet with jeweled trimmings. Lillie Follis, who assisted, was in white. They had hordes of men there, and Leila said she thought that they seemed to enjoy the festivities more, if possible, than even the debutantes. Walter Martin was among them, looking proud of his title of "King of the Brownies." They also went to the Bruce's tea. Bertie Bruce, Charlotte Ellinwood, Bernice Drown were in white. Bertie carried a lovely bunch of red roses.

On Sunday a number of the boys came in and we discussed things in general and the belle of the season particularly. They told me many home truths and advised me what not to do. Let me see what I remember—I must appear to feel complimented when they flatter me; I must not say smart things or be pert; I must not seem too shocked at anything, and whatever happens should not show embarassment. Dear me! Then I must be agreeable to all the bores and not allow any man to "rush" me. One chap said patronizingly, "Your sole deficiency, if I may call it such, Miss Cricket, is that you are too natural. Be a little more like other people." Is not that dreadful—a nice boy, too. Aunt Sybil agrees with him but Papa says he only hopes I shall always remain his wild, hoyden daughter. I am afraid I can't change and honestly, Diary dear, I adore myself just as I am.

On Monday I made several duty calls, and on Tuesday morning went out to the Golf Links to practice. We girls are becoming quite enthusiastic. Bessie Ames, Elinor and Therese Morgan, Ethel Patton, Minnie Houghton and I are the most constant in our attendance. I am not an expert, in fact, none of us do particularly well. Minnie Houghton, so far, is easily the best player and uses her club quite skillfully. It is lovely out at the grounds, though, with the gorgeous view of the ocean and the faint echo from the Presidio band is wafted over when the wind is in the right direction. In the afternoon I made more calls, then early in the evening went to the Doll Show at the Palace. It was an awfully pretty sight and the dollies made me wish I were a child once more instead of a blooming debutante with aspirations towards belledom. The Maple Room was simply crammed with people all in their best bibs and tuckers. I must tell you about some of the dolls—Mme. Baer's bride would have been my choice. Such a dream of beauty with clothes fit for a princess. Mme. Luenberger's prize doll was also excellently gowned and the Emporium doll was too sweet. Miss Blair was delighted with the success of the show. The voting was in charge of Mrs. Stow Ballard, Miss Alice Owen, Mrs. Judge Slack and Miss Spinney. I hear that Mrs. Joe Tobin bought the pretty tailor-made doll, and Mr. Thomas Williams bought Mme. Luenberger's ball doll.

After I went to the Ellinwoods and had a capital time. The house was hidden under stacks of flowers and greens. Charlotte never looked half so well as she did in her frock of white satin covered with white tulle and bunches of lilies of the valley on her shoulder. Mrs. Ellinwood wore a yellow gown and, in spite of her delicate health, seemed bright and cheerful. Charlotte was assisted in receiving by Ethel Keeney, Leontine Blakeman and Emma Butler. Ethel wore a charming frock of white with blue ribbons. Leontine was in a creamish pink silk veiled in gauze and trimmed with roses. Mamie Polhemus wore a chic frock of striped silk, Florence Josselyn was in pale blue, and Marie Wells in pink silk. During the evening the older people paid their devoirs and at ten o'clock the dancing was started. There were simply swarms of men, who floated around seeking partners and half the time finding none. The girls had really a capital time. The affair was kept up until the wee sma' hours.

On Wednesday I went to Bernie Drown's luncheon at the 'Varsity Club. This was her third this season. She has invited a series of her friends—I like the idea so much, it is eminently preferable to a tea, and one really meets the girls. Then to Julia Crocker's wedding. It was a very small one—only a few of the intimate friends were invited as well as the relations. The decorations were delightfully arranged and Huber's orchestra made the air melodious. But the presents! The house looked as if Shreve's had simply been poured in and stored there. I have never seen handsomer gifts. Henry Crocker gave a chest of silver, Mrs. Van Fleet every imaginable thing in cut glass, a complete set. Then Mrs. Pope gave solid silver ice cream set in the new rose pattern, and Mrs. George Pope a terrapin set. George Pope was best man and Annie Buckbee bridesmaid. It was a lively wedding, and Julia seemed ever so happy. They have gone to New York for their bridal trip.

In the evening I helped Miss Jennie Blair at the Doll Show. Marie Wells, Lillie Follis, Marie Oge and I were at her booth. Emily Carolan, the Hopkins, the Morgans and Carol Crockett assisted Mrs. Fred Tallant. We had splendid fun as you can fancy.

On Thursday I had a day of it—phew! I can hardly think of it now calmly and quietly. We went to the football game, of course. Everyone in town was there. All the girls and men in a most excited condition—wearing either the blue and gold or the red. We simply shrieked ourselves hoarse, and when either appeared to have the advantage, we lost all sense of decorum and positively howled with glee—or sorrow as the case might be. Then, afterwards, home to dress for Fred Greenwood's dinner at the Bohemian Club. There were about thirty of us invited, and we all appeared in force. The dinner took place in the red room. That finishes my doings for this week. Let me see what is there in the future. On Friday Mamie Polhemus' tea, with a dinner later, to "we us," who receive with her. The usual crowd—Ethel Keeney, Marie Wells, Leontine Blakeman, Kathro Burton and Bessie Ames. Then on Saturday the Thornton reception followed by a dinner to thirty. The Salisburys, Therese Morgan, Leontine Blakeman and Ethel are among those to receive with Helen. Next Monday the first meeting of the Monday Evening Dancing Class. On Tuesday Mrs. Mountford Wilson is to give a tea; on Saturday week Mrs. Mark Requa and Mrs. Oscar Fitzalen Long announce an afternoon reception. That is the extent of my news, save that our dear Mr. Wiltsee has gone East. He is only to be away ten days, however, so we are not so low spirited as we might be. Oh, I forgot Ed Greenway is to have a big theatre party on Wednesday, and Edith McBean on Saturday to the Columbia in honor of Edna Hopkins. So now adieu for a sennight.

Your adorable, MISS CRICKET.

* *

The exhibition of needlework and laces in aid of the Associated Charities, to be held in the Maple Room of the Palace, December 2d, 3d. and 4th., is already receiving considerable attention. Aside from its charitable purpose, the affair will be interesting because of the nature and variety of the exhibit, all sorts of handsome laces and finely-wrought linen being entered for display. The exhibit will be given under noted patronage, and, as the support of society is assured, the event will be something out of the ordinary.

A very swell function, was the football cotilion given by Mr. and Mrs. I. Strassberger at the Verein, on Friday evening, in honor of the first appearance of their daughter. Mr. Strassberger is the President of the San Francisco Verein. The German was an immensely pretty one, all the figures being typical of the movements on the gridiron—the decorations carried out the same idea. Footballs, tin horns and similar emblems, were placed round the room, and the colors of Stanford and Berkeley were used everywhere. Mrs. Strassberger wore a stunning gown of lavender striped silk covered with embroidered mousseline de soie. The waist was trimmed in real lace and chinchilla: Miss Strassberger was simply gowned in white. Among the handsomest of the girls I noted Miss Elsie Hecht in nile green silk covered with mousseline de soie, spangled in gold and emeralds—the waist was similarly embroidered with green, white and gold, with shell trimming arranged round the corsage. The skirt had ruffles round the bottom and a front piece of shell trimming. Miss C. Sachs, also, looked very effective in a gown of pink and mousseline with accordion pleated ruffle, graduating round the bottom of the skirt. The apron was embroidered in pink periwinkles. The waist was similarily embroidered, but in the center of each periwinkle was placed a dew drop—a band of satin round the waist and flounce of graduated monsseline finished this costume.

Miss Bachmann looked really lovely in nile-green silk covered with chiffon. The skirt was draped on one side with panel of accordion-pleated mousseline. The waist was of chiffon covered with dew drops—with broad velvet band of pearls and rhinestones round the corsage. A girdle of velvet surrounded the waist. The favors were horns and bonbons for the girls, and football pins for the men. Miss Strassberger and Mr. Marco Hellman led the German.

A capital affair was the dinner dance given to Miss Alice Greenwald by her mother last week. The tables were charmingly arrayed, and later about eighty young people danced. The Greenwald home is one of the swellest on Van Ness avenue, the rooms being most artistically arrayed. But then Willis Polk and Bruce Porter architected and decorated it, so what would you have otherwise.

A quiet, though very pretty wedding, was that of Miss Annie Lawler, daughter of Dr. Lawler, and Mr. Walter Wells. Miss Lawlor is a very pretty girl, with brown eyes and brilliant coloring. She made her debut last winter. Mr. Wells is a son of Mrs. Emma Wells, and a very enterprising young business man. Mr. and Mrs. Wells have gone to Honolulu for the winter.

The engagement is announced of Oliver M. Morosco and Miss Annie C. Cockrell. Mr. Morosco, who is treasurer of the Grand Opera House, is unusually popular both in and out of business circles. Miss Cockrell, the granddaughter of Senator Cockrell of Missouri, is a handsome brunette, and possesses quite a name in church and society circles as a vocalist and pianist of no little proficiency. The ceremony will take place Wednesday, December 15th, at the Church of the Advent.

* *

Oakland is still stagnating, the events of interest appearing merely on the edges of the horizon. There is the Saturday Evening Dancing Class on the 27th, the Berkeley Cotillion on Wednesday of next week, and the Requa reception on Saturday. I hear that great are the expectations with regard to the Berkeley dances. They are to be smart to a degree and quite the "red letter" occasions of the year. All the maidens are to appear in fresh toilettes.

At last a little enthusiasm has been evolved

Miss Clara Hamilton
Who made her debut at the Hamilton tea

in the direction of card clubs, etc. I hear of two new societies for the purpose of whist playing. The In and Out Whist Club, an organization composed of Oaklanders and those living in the suburbs. The members are young married couples, and have capital times. The last meeting was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Egbert Stone near San Leandro. Another whist club composed of women has been arranged; it is known as the Wheelock Club, and the members are, from the most part, skillful players among the Oakland ladies. The meeting of last week was held at Mrs. O. A. Chase's home. The Girls' Club of Twenty-one met at the home of Miss Mary Whitney on Tuesday afternoon. The young people played whist, Miss Lillian Downey of Berkeley carrying off the prize. Miss Violet Whitney is to leave Oakland next week for London where she will pass six months with her aunt.

One of the most enjoyable events in Oakland last week was the Kipling afternoon at the Ebell Club. Mrs. Cockroft presided, and the afternoon was passed in discussing the characteristics of Rudyard Kipling and his place in English literature. Mrs. Burchard, Mrs. Kate Bulkely and Mrs. Howard Bray read extracts from the author's works. The morality and art creed of Kipling were treated by Miss Grace Musser and Miss Elsie Lee.

A few luncheons of minor importance were given during the week. Mrs. W. H. Stanley entertained Mrs. J. W. Summers at a violet luncheon on Wednesday prior to her departure for Fresno. About twenty young married people were invited. Another violet luncheon was given by Mrs. Fred Merritt in East Oakland on Saturday. Among those invited were Miss Flora Sedgwick, Mrs. Dargee, Mrs. Will Meek and others. The dancing party given by Miss Julia Leigh, at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Frank Adams, was quite the jolliest affair of the season. Miss Leigh was assisted in receiving by Miss Abbie Clift, Miss Olive Middleton, Miss Kate Chabot, Miss Taft and several other of the debutantes. Among the prettiest of the girls were Miss Lohse, Miss Olive Middleton and Miss Kate Chabot.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Miller are still at the Yosemite on their honeymoon. Mr. Gordon Stolp is in Chicago. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Prather has gone to Santa Rosa. Miss Bernice Macdonald left on Tuesday for Europe, where she anticipates spending some time visiting the various points of interest.

MUSIC

An Analysis of the Music and Orchestration of Puccini's "Manon."

Contrasting "La Boheme" with the second work of Puccini given here the result leaves a strong feeling of preference for the musical setting of the story of so-called bohemian life. More ambition suspires from "Manon Lescaut" in libretto and orchestrating, especially in the orchestration, and there is an evident striving after reaching at less occasional, deeper emotions. But the similarity of tawdry personalities illustrated with music, mainly fainting into poignant langour, hold good in each case. An absence of ethic purpose of any kind is in all the personages. Bedaubed with roccoco and typically stagy-French virtue, sustained in the nature of vehement posing, the figures in "Manon Lescaut" have no chance of a sympathetic reception. The heroine herself is libretted out of the pale of grace, frailty in opera is scarcely remarkable, but convicted of unsuccessful attempt at theft and no amount of orchestrating will rehabilitate an unhappy death into dignity. To have conveyed a grandeur of terror and agony into the death of this impenitent Magdalene would have stamped Puccini as a great tragic master. The plan of the libretto intended this in a fribbling way, but the composer's individuality and inspiration apparently could not rise higher than some pathos and the finely felt poignant sentiment of doomed attachment most tenderly expressed in "La Boheme."

Of that atmosphere of higher realism never lifted from "La Boheme" there appears, on a first hearing, only fleeting breaths in "Manon." Wherever dolorous love sentiment is to be delivered the composer becomes true, voice, part and orchestration emerge into charity; but no opera can be built up on this talent alone. Tosti, the ballad-writer, has this side of expressiveness developed to a mania by the way. When dramatic music of a fierce or strident quality is to be made, this composer uses the Wagnerian manner degenerated into sound color of the brass foundry boiler factory type. Intended to arrest, this kind of tone painting becomes almost ludicrous, and strongly supports the view that this libretto was scored and orchestrated with skill, perhaps, but no gripping emotional conviction.

"La Boheme," with its delightful score, carries distinct sincerity throughout, "Manon Lescaut" impresses the methods of its creator and the lack of genuine inspiration. Many a worked-up scene with music modulating to unrelated keys, in the same breath chromatic and enharmonic, besprinkled with plenteous piquant consecutive fifths and octaves, all proving a certain genius, but giving evidence that real musical emotion was absent, display the heterogenious style of modern art, and its falling away from the golden purity and richness of the divine masterpieces of the earlier time. Perpetual novelties of harmonic treatment, of orchestral color, end in making a miniature effect, not at all happily contrasted with wobbly blares of brass. Likewise the excessive strain after musical formlessness adds to the general feeling of incoherent emotionalism, evidently a prize point, so inducive to a sense of that jaded strife, which is outside the realm of high-purposed art. In grafting on the

Dr. G. A Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents
Sold only at 102 Eddy street

end-of-the-century-bizarre music to the elderly French romance a certain ill-starred struggle arises, another bar still to any possible unity. Nothing in the least congenial to French art is observable in the style of Puccini, being distinctively of the sensuous Italian type. Of the construction of the opera the last two acts were the strongest, though apparently capable of compression. Manon's death became tedious and the prison scene suffered from the same ailment. The orchestral intermezzo arrives, as a whole, at the highest point of sincerity and completeness attained by the composer in this work, and the number is orchestrated with the felicity belonging to this master's equipment. For the most part the voices take up that musical narrative, touched with tender or languid passion, which never breaks into robust, self-confessed, absolute melody but which ever veils the genuine features of the best beloved of music's charms.—melody.

Should fate, or the hard usage Signorina Montanari subjects her voice to, deprive her of that gift, she appears to have in her the best power of an actress. Natural, quiet, simple in gesture, yet without restraint, her dramatic pictures of Manon Lescaut and, above all, of Mimi are something to be remembered here, where the acting in opera is mere rant and fustion. What Sembrich in an interview vouches for, that there are no singing masters of value in Italy must be true, judging from the efforts of this company. How this same Signorina Montanari escaped being a real singer with so much voice and talent is a mystery not explained in any other way. The misguided efforts of Agostini, the unfortunate tenor who was worked to death during the season here, were likewise a drain upon the sympathies of those interested in the real art of singing.

LESLEY MARTIN.

THE THEATRES

A Fine Melodrama at Morosco's — Mysticism at the Orpheum.

Mysticism is reigning supreme at the Orpheum this week with much satisfaction as the result. Servais Leroy is a clever master of legerdemain and his box trick is startling, to say the least. Marie Katherine von Zieber, operatic vocalist, is very smartly gowned and sings several selections in an admirable manner with better execution than enunciation. Harry Edson and his dog Doc are very well received and give a clever exhibition of the combined capabilities of man and beast. The Morris trained ponies are still in popular favor as are also A. O. Duncan and the Biograph.

The quality of melodrama is not strained in "The Great Diamond Robbery," nor is that of its production at Morosco's. The play's motive has been used many a time before, but the manner of its presentation is novel and agreeable, and some of the lines, especially Mother Rosenbaum's, are good in particular. The honors of the piece belong to Mr. Pascoe, Miss Hall, and Miss Atwood, with a goodly share for Mr. Stevens. Mr. Pascoe as Dick Brumage is versatile and effective, and Miss Hall as Mrs. Bulford plays the adventuress strikingly well, and wears some very smart gowns. She looks remarkably handsome in the last act. Miss Atwood's Mother Rosenbaum is really dramatic and well sustained, even comparison with Janauschek, the original of the part, detracting little or nothing from her work. Manager Morosco deserves a word of commendation for his enterprise in securing this play, a stroke of policy the virtue of which too few San Franciscans are sufficiently aware.

Mrs. Pacheco's merry farce, "Incog," is given at the Alcazar this week in a mirthful and satisfactory manner. The piece is of the sort that will always receive popular attention, even with only a fairly good company. As the Alcazar people are more than fairly good, their performance may be said to be generally good and even throughout. Wright Huntington has an easy manner that fits well in the lines of Tom Stanhope, and with Wallace Shaw as the General, takes first place in critical consideration.

H. S. K.

* *

DRAMATIC NOTES

Next Thursday afternoon will see the first concert of the San Francisco Symphony Society, at the Tivoli. Herr Scheel has chosen, wisely, a programme made up of Raff's "Im Walde" Symphony, "Phaeton" Symphonic Poem by Saint-Saens, Goldmarks "Sakuntala" Overture and the "Midsummer Night's Dream," Scherzo of Mendelssohn. All these numbers have been given here, and with the magnetism of Herr Scheel's personality to carry it along, the performance should be of the best, as there are gathered together all the best local orchestral players. In the way the seats were sold, a rare display of enthusiasm was shown bespeaking the best interest and support the community is capable of.

With the assistance of Mesdames Keesing and Langstroth, Misses Ella McCloskey and Rose Broderic, Mr. Fleishman and Mr. Landsberger the programme of Dr. A. G. Regansburger's benefit concert, for December 8th, promises especial interest. Likewise the assistance of the Press Club quartette, Messrs. Frank Coffin and Homer Henley and Mr. Adelstein the lutist, adds great strength to an array of the best local ability. Dr. Regansburger's gratuitious service for a number of years, deserves this acknowledgment before his departure for Alaska, and it is to be hoped a large audience will testify its appreciation.

The Oakland Charity Company which has been recently reorganized, will present Augustin Daly's comedy "Love in Harness" at the Macdonough Theatre, Friday and Saturday evenings, December 10th and 11th, for the benefit of the Reliance Club. Beaux and belles of Oakland and San Francisco are in the cast, and from all reports, the performance promises to be an agreeable entertainment. Socially, the affair is likely to be as notable as any of its predecessors, the smart set already showing many indications of interest.

The Orpheum announces four new attractions for next week. Of these the most notable is the Vesuviana Quartette, direct from Naples, the members of which are all singers of European reputation. The novelty of the bill is Fordyce and his musical puppets. Stanley and Jackson, comedy artists, produce their sketch "Before the Ball," and O. K. Sato, the juggling comedian, gives a clever grotesque performance.

Louis James opens at the Columbia Monday evening in his new play "A Cavalier of France." The piece is by Espy Williams, and is written in a romantic vein, the scene occurring in the time of Catherine de Medici—a period full of adventure and interesting romance. These dramatic possibilities are happily arranged in "A Cavalier of France," forming well connected scenes, exciting situations and strong dramatic climaxes.

Following "In Gay New York," which terminates its Baldwin engagement Sunday evening, December 6th, the Italian Opera Company, now at the California, will commence a two weeks engagement, presenting the great works of Verdi and Puccini. The opening opera is to be "La Boheme." During the season regular Baldwin prices will prevail.

The end of "The Geisha" comes next week at the Tivoli, the fiftieth and final performance taking place Sunday evening, December 5th, with appropriate celebration. "Rip Van Winkle" will follow for a brief run, after which we are to be treated to the Christmas spectacle "The Tales of Mother Goose," written by Edwin Stevens, with music by Max Hirschfeld.

The recently organized Orpheus Musical Club, comprising 125 musicians, will give a grand symphony concert under the direction of Fritz Scheel at the Columbia, Thursday afternoon, December 9th. A feature of the programme will be the symphony "Rustic Wedding" by Carl Goldmark.

Next week's play at Morosco's will be "On the Mississippi," a typical Southern melodrama by William Haworth, author of "The Ensign." The plot of the piece is connected with the famous Ku Klux and its final dismemberment effected by the hero, played by W. H. Pascoe, after many and varied adventures.

The Italian Company presents "Manon Lescaut." at the California this evening and tomorrow (Sunday) evening closes the season with a good lyric and orchestral concert.

Owing to its great success "Incog" will be continued at the Alcazar for another week. Nat Goodwin's comedy, "The Nominee," is announced as the next attraction.

Coming musical attractions to this city are Mme. Sembrich, the famous soprano, and the celebrated Italian Banda Rossa.

The next musical evening at Byron Mauzy Hall occurs Thursday, Dec. 2d, under the direction of Willard J. Batchelder.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

The Royal is the highest grade baking powder known. Actual tests show it goes one-third further than any other brand.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

After Long Days.

After long days of love in loneliness,
I move among the ghosts of dead delight,
Here where we kissed good-bye in dumb distress,
Parted and passed into the gathering night.

After long days the music of her feet
Comes floating down the old familiar ways;
Not all the flutes in Lydia were so sweet,
Nor pipes in Arcady, after long days

I see her starry eyes, and in her curls
The golden sea that beats about her brow,
I see the sunbeams sport like Nereus' girls,
I see the glad blood in her cheeks; and now

Her soft arms clip me with a strong caress,
Her soft lips thrill me with one tenderest kiss,
After long days of love in loneliness,
Who would not part a while to meet like this?

Pall Mall Gazette

New Journalism.

Sixty-nine pages of rubbish,
Twenty-two pages of rot,
Forty-six pages of scandal vile,
Served to us piping hot.

Seventeen hundred pictures—
Death, disease and despair—
Lies and fakes and fakes and lies
Stuck in 'most everywhere.

Thirty-four sad comic pages,
Printed in reds, greens and blues;
Thousands of items we don't care to read,
But only two columns of news.

—George Totten Smith in Life.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

THE CITY OF PARIS

The Big Dry Goods Concern, and the Men Who Control It.

It is not generally known and appreciated, that San Francisco can boast of a dry goods store that, though not as large from a point of view of ground covered as the mammoth institutions of the Bon Marche and Magazin du Louvre is, nevertheless, easily comparable with these historic houses in the richness of its its materials, the freshness of its styles and patterns and the brilliancy of its novelties.

The "City of Paris" is quite one of San Francisco's institutions, and since it has moved into its new quarters on the corner of Geary and Stockton streets, is really one of the sights of the city. The building is an admirably built pile of steel and granite and constructed especially for the "City of Paris," and to meet the needs and demands of so large a business as is handled by that firm. It occupies a fifty varae lot on the corner of Geary street fronting on Union Square, and its seven stories are built around an interior well, in true Parisian style, so that all the departments are perfectly supplied with light.

Mr. Gaston Verdier, president of the company, personally superintended the construction of the interior of the store, and a glance at the highly finished mahogany counters, fittings, etc., will afford ample demonstration of Mr. Verdier's judgment and good taste. The lighting is, of course, done by electricity, and is up to date in every detail. Mr. Verdier located the silk department in the "light well," where the more costly and brilliant fabrics are on display and sale, and the effect produced is a confusion of rich coloring that, under the strong over-head light, is almost dazzling. In connection with the silk department is the dark room, an original idea on the part of the management, where customers may view silks and satins by artificial light. Another departure from the ordinary, has been the construction of a boudoir for lady customers. The appartment is beautifully furnished, and a maid is always in attendance. It is a capital place at which to make appointments.

The great store is under the management of Mr. Gaston Verdier, President of the Company, who resides permanently in Paris, in order to be on the spot when the newest and best fabrics and fashions are produced. Mr. Verdier also has his own silk manufactory in France. Mr. Geo. Moreau, vice-president, acts as the company's representative in New York, whence he makes semi-annual trips to Europe, while Mr. Rainey is the business manager of the San Francisco branch of the concern. Mr. Rainey, however, is constantly traveling between this city, New York and Paris, in order to be in constant touch with the other heads of the institution.

The first floor above the great store is devoted to the dressmaking establishment where some of the most fetching toilets, and stunning tailor-made gowns, worn in San Francisco, are fabricated, and we are given to understand that one of the best and most thoroughly equipped millinery establishments in the United States, is soon to be added to the other departments.

The business office of the "City of Paris," is in itself as large as many a small-sized store. It occupies half the width of the main floor, and is enclosed by elaborate and artistic grill work of mahoghany and latticed brass finishings. This department is under the supervision of Mr. Julius Hay and Mrs. I. Hynes, the secretary of the company.

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

The music of Huber's Del Monte Orchestra adds greatly to the success of all entertainments. Telephone [illegible] or Benjamin Curtaz, Main [illegible].

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

A Delicious After-Dinner Cordial

A MOST WONDERFUL TONIC

A NERVE AND BLOOD REGENERATOR

No Drugs — Not an Excitant

Recommended by leading physicians as the most effective and pleasant tonic on the market for nervous and stomach troubles

F. A. HABER

Manager the [illegible]

CITY OF PARIS...

DRY GOODS COMPANY

NEW ART DEPARTMENT

IS NOW OPEN AND READY FOR BUSINESS

EVERY ARTICLE NEW AND FRESH!

STAMPED LINENS STAMPED PILLOWS BATTENBERG SCARFS
EMBROIDERED TEA CLOTHS
EMBROIDERED HANDKERCHIEF BOXES EMBROIDERED VEIL CASES

Brainerd & Armstrong's Embroidery Silks

STAMPING AND EMBROIDERY MADE ON DEMAND
NOVELTIES IN FANCY WORK NEW IDEAS
A LARGE LINE OF COLORED LINENS
TRIMMED WORK BASKETS

LESSONS GIVEN IN EMBROIDERY

ON EXHIBITION

Artistic Bronze, New Bronze and Gilt Statuary
Cloisonne Vases and Lamps
Bohemian Crystal Ware
French Clocks and Lamps
Parisian Lamp Shades

City of Paris Dry Goods Co.

SOUTHEAST CORNER STOCKTON AND GEARY STS., UNION SQUARE

Country Orders Promptly Attended to.

The Parlor on the Geary Street Front

For Silks and Fancy Goods

Some Swell Costumes

A General View from the South East Corner

Lay Figures in the Window

Among Cloaks and Suits

Housekeeping Goods and Supplies

INTERIOR VIEWS IN THE NEW "CITY OF PARIS"

Suppose You Had An Aeolian!

Suppose you could have in your home an orchestra and when you wanted music you had but to make a request and it would be immediately complied with. Suppose, too (as long as we are only supposing it does not matter how improbable we are), that this orchestra could play any piece of music ever composed without waiting to study or practice it. If you wanted a programme of operatic music you had only to mention the particular selections you wished to hear and they would be promptly rendered.

Suppose you had some friends spending the evening and wished to dance. Your orchestra could play waltzes, lancers, two-steps and polkas, with such perfect time and rythm that the pleasures of dancing would be immeasurably increased. Suppose you were alone and your mood called for some particular piece—some old-time favorite—very likely you would have your own conception of the manner in which it should be played. Suppose you found that you could conduct this remarkable orchestra yourself—direct its playing according to your own ideas and wishes.

And, finally, suppose the playing of this orchestra was exceptionally fine—so good, indeed, that great musicians, such as Paderewski, De Reszke, Nordica, Campanini and others equally as famous had hired it to entertain them with its playing; so good that people of wealth and culture everywhere sought it for their homes—people with means sufficient to enable them to enjoy all that is best in art and music and all the pleasures and recreations that money can purchase.

Suppose we tell you that you can have this orchestra in your home; that you can have music at any or all times, and that you can, yourself, play any piece of music ever composed, even if you, literally, "cannot tell one note from another."

The possession of an AEOLIAN will do all this. It will do infinitely more—it will entertain and instruct every member of the family, from the youngest to the oldest. Each can play it for himself or herself.

It will bring into the home music never performed except by large and well-drilled orchestras. It will familiarize you with all the great works of the old masters, and enable you to keep in touch with and enjoy the best music of the day. It is the greatest of all musical educators and the most practical of all home instruments. You can purchase a good AEOLIAN for $75 This instrument is the Princess. We publish a special catalogue of it. Other styles up to $750. Aeolian Orchestrelles from $1500 to $2500. Aeolian Pipe Organs and Pipe Orchestras from $2500 upwards.

KOHLER & CHASE, 28 and 30 O'Farrell street, San Francisco, sole agents for the Pacific States.

Saves Time, Money, and Temper!

MADE IN CALIFORNIA!

SEND FOR SAMPLE

Office, 307 Sacramento St., San Francisco

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY

Price 25 Cents DR. PARKER'S COUGH CURE

One dose will stop a cough—it never fails!

ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR IT

AMATEUR ATHLETICS

A Contrast of Methods in the Two University Football Teams.

No matter what the out come of Thursday's game may be California does not deserve to win. In fact, only justice would be done if the blue and gold were crushed under a score much greater than that of last year's ignominious disaster. A contrast between the spirit evidenced by the student bodies of the two colleges can bring nothing but dismay to any thinking alumnus of California.

The magnificent support afforded the team and its coach at Palo Alto, culminated in a grand football rally, a meeting where hundreds of enthusiastic supporters of the eleven gave their enthusiasm full sway. If there was a man of the Cardinal team who did not gain strength, determination and zeal to do his mightiest for victory, he was less than human. Every man became an embodiment, a personification of the college spirit. His power to work and dare and endure was infinitely more, now that a thousand of his fellows by word and deed had proclaimed him the guardian and defender of the college honor. Compared to this strong, manly policy how petty and mean seem the bickerings and bitterness that developed at California.

To such an extent did this spirit show itself that the eleven had to be taken away from the discouraging, disintegrating atmosphere of the Campus. Will California never learn? Will they always persist in the unmanly folly that year after year brings them face to face with defeat? What possible chance to crush a common enemy has a nation of warring clans? What chance, save perhaps blind luck, can California, with her policy of senseless critical contention, have against the united policy that gives Stanford her winning elevens. Every year since intercollegiate ball has been played the same trouble has cropped out at Berkeley. Some player, assuming himself to be the greatest player in the college, has proclaimed the inefficiency and partiality of the coach. And every year a numerous body among the students has taken up the battle for the malcontents, and spread far and wide that the college had no confidence in the coach. When they had not one excuse they found another, till every one has come to expect California to make her coach and captain scapegoats for the poor showing that an eleven, confronted by such a lack of college spirit, must almost inevitably make.

Shortcomings Frank Butterworth may have shown while coaching California, but certainly the constant nasty criticisms directed at his work did not help to strengthen his hands or make it possible for him to get the loyal devotion that a coach should have from his men.

They do things differently at Palo Alto. It is not many years ago that a coach there proved himself a great deal more incapable than Butterworth could possibly be, and much less of a gentleman. No one heard his name lauded about as Butterworth's was last year. None of the nasty, petty insinuations were spread abroad to rob him of influence and power among his men. Wise heads in the faculty got a grip on the young man and kept him to his coaching as well as could be. Then all the competent graduates were requisitioned, and how they worked. When Thanksgiving-day came and a game that a full season's competent coaching would have made the cardinal's, became a tie, there were no recriminations or accusations for the coach. He was sent home, and everyone went to work the next year to repair the damage his neglect had done.

One would think that California would realize, especially with last year's lesson so lately given, that no coach can do the eleven or himself justice unless the college give him undivided support. Yet the treatment accorded Mr. Nott has been, to say the least, very unfair. After the game last year California was very humble and very determined. They were swamped, and worse, their three best men were to go. Oh, well, make the best of a bad situation. If only they could find some one to take hold and give them an eleven that would not be beaten worse than 20—0 how fortunate they would be.

Wisdom, through some inadvertence, was allowed to creep into the football councils and Nott was given charge of the coaching while Haskell was elected captain. In about ten months, though, the bitterness of defeat had gone and the old California folly began to appear. Haskell, one of the bravest football men California has had for some time, was deposed from the captaincy, and deposed by an athletic committee against the wishes of the coach. In fact the coach was ignored in the matter. No doubt Haskell had faults and grave ones but a wise policy would have pointed them out to him and aided in their correction rather than to change captains in mid season.

The probable fact is that fraternity and anti-fraternity politics was at the bottom of the whole matter, and has been responsible for a great deal of talk about dissatisfaction among the men that existed only when lighted by personalities and fanned to heat by college politics.

When California learns that success will come only when some one is allowed to formulate a definite policy and receives the loyal and unquestioning support of every man in college, faculty and student she will have an even chance to beat Stanford with regularity.

Football is above all sports the supremest expression of a college community's social life. This dry rot of unreasoning criticism is spread through the whole college fabric. Were it not for this pernicious habit, men who know nothing of football would not presume to criticise Mr. Nott, and demand that the grandstand player replace a man that the coaches experienced eye choose as the better.

Men who have no idea of the policy and general plan of play the coach has in mind would be laughed off the Campus if they began to criticise and question the coach's ability, and hissed off for villifying him. The college, having put its football interests for a season in one man's hands has no right to criticise that man until his policy has been thoroughly tested by a full season's work. When the game is over criticisms are in order, but before that every college man ought to be working shoulder to shoulder with the man chosen to lead. It is every man's duty to see that the coach has every opportunity to make whatever plans his judgment may dictate as effective as possible.

* *

The sincerity of the Olympic Club in its new stand for amateurism, has had a decided confirmation during the past few weeks. Under the aggressive leadership of Howard Taylor a boxing tournament has been arranged. The proposal to offer $75 prizes was made to the board, coupled with the argument that boxers could be induced to compete for trophies of less value. Mr. Taylor took the stand that the club should offer nothing of greater value than the amateur rules allowed. At the same time saying that in such a course lay the club's only chance to find if there were any bona fide amateur boxers. The board of directors warmly supported him in his position. It must be gratifiying to all sportsmen to know that the list of entries is a large one made up of many competent boxers who will look on the prizes they may win as trophies of contest and not as so much value to be made into cash at the earliest opportunity.

ROBERT PORTER.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters

How's This?

We [illegible] One Hundred Dollars reward for any case of Catarrh that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.

We, the undersigned, have known F. J. Cheney for the last [illegible] years, and believe him perfectly honorable in all business transactions, and financially able to carry out any obligations made by their firm.

West & Truax, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.
Walding, Kinnan & Marvin, Wholesale Druggists, Toledo.

Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. Testimonials sent free Price 75c. per bottle. Sold by all druggists.

During the Parnell period in Ireland a home ruler was haranguing on English terrorism, and after drawing a horrid picture of babies speared on the points of bayonets, etc., he concluded: "If that's your civilization you may keep it. I call it most improper."

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. Far particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush

Among the many great Financial Corporations on the Pacific Coast, none rank higher than the

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.

Its Agents are found throughout America, and its Record for Prompt and Equitable Settlement of All Honest Losses is Firmly Established

D. J. STAPLES, President — WM. J. DUTTON, Vice-President — B. FAYMONVILLE, 2d V.-Pres., Sec'y
J. B. LEVISON, Marine Sec'y — LOUIS WEINMANN, Asst. Sec'y — STEPHEN D. IVES, General Agent

The German Savings and Loan Society
526 California St., S. F.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Guarantee Capital and Surplus | - | $2,040,201 66 |
| Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash | - | 1,000,000 00 |
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | 27,730,247 45 |

OFFICERS
President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS
B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union
532 CALIFORNIA ST.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | $22,885,377 |
| Paid Up Capital and Surplus | - | 1,594,503 |

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS
GEORGE W. BEAVER — ROBERT WATT
THOMAS MAGEE — GEO. C. BOARDMAN
W. C. B. DE FREMERY — DANIEL E. MARTIN
ALBERT MILLER — GEO. A. STORY
E. B. POND

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate and Farms and Farming Lands in the country.
No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid Up Capital | $250,000 |
| Cash Reserve Fund | 25,000 |

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. — HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.
We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by [illegible]
Capital Paid Up $[illegible] Surplus to Policy-Holders $[illegible]
ROBT. H. MCDONALD, Manager

CONNECTICUT
FIRE INS. CO.
OF HARTFORD
Assets, $3,300,000. BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager.
COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
501 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.
OF ERFURT, GERMANY
Capital $2,250,000 — Assets $10,984,248
PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

The Lion Fire Insurance Co. Limited of London
Total Cash Assets in United States [illegible]
The Imperial Insurance Co. Limited of London
Established on Pacific Coast in 1865
WM. J. LANDERS, Resident Manager
PACIFIC COAST BRANCH
205-207 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Cal

Don't Borrow a Home!
BUY IT Your rent payments for the borrowed home will do it through the end of the
CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California
WM. CORBIN, Secretary and Gen'l Manager
Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco

REMOVAL
Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .
W. L. GREENBAUM,
of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at
128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,
Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

SOHMER PIANOS BYRON MAUZY AGENT 308-314 Post Street, S. F.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

GET THE GENUINE ARTICLE!

Walter Baker & Co.'s

Breakfast COCOA

Trade-Mark.

Pure, Delicious, Nutritious.

Costs Less than ONE CENT a cup.

Be sure that the package bears our Trade-Mark.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

(Established 1780) Dorchester, Mass.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS

NOTICE MAKE THIS Stewart Hartshorn LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

PACIFIC COAST JOCKEY CLUB

INGLESIDE TRACK

Racing from Monday, November 29th, to Saturday, December 11th, inclusive

Five or more races daily, rain or shine

First race at 2 p.m.

S. P. R. R. Trains 12:45 and 1:15 p.m. daily. Leave Third-street station, stopping at Valencia street. Returning immediately after the last race.

Electric Car Lines — Kearny and Mission-street cars every 3 minutes, direct to track without change. Fillmore-street cars transfer each way.

F. H. GREEN, Secretary. S. N. ANDROUS, President.

California Jockey Club

OAKLAND TRACK

Winter Meeting 1897-8, beginning Monday, November 15th.

Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

Five or more races each day. Races start at 2:15 p.m. sharp.

Ferry leaves San Francisco at 12 m., 12:30, 1:00, 1:30, 2:00, 2.30 and 3:00 p.m., connecting with trains stopping at entrance to track. Buy your tickets to Shell-Mound. Returning trains leave the track at 4:15 and 4:45 p.m., and immediately after the last race.

R. B. MILROY, Secretary. T. H. WILLIAMS JR., President.

Thoroughbred Sales

Friday, November 26th

YEARLINGS, ALSO STALLION

Imp. Cyrus

From PALO ALTO STOCK FARM, at 7:30 p.m.

Occidental Horse Exchange

Friday and Saturday, Nov. 26th and 27th

Three and Two-Year-Olds from Santa Anita Stud

Property of E. J. BALDWIN, Esq., at 12:30 p.m. at grounds of

California Jockey Club, Oakland

Wednesday, December 8th, YEARLINGS BY THE GREAT MORELLO, property of I. B. Chase, Esq. at 12:30 p.m. at grounds of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club, Ingleside.

For Catalogues, apply to

KILLIP & CO.

Livestock Auctioneers, 11 Montgomery St., S. F.

REMOVAL

The business office of

The Daily Report

Has been moved from

238 Montgomery Street, to

630 MARKET ST.

Near Kearny

Book Bargains

FOR THIRTY DAYS, AT

H. R. WILLIS'

107 MONTGOMERY STREET

Baldwin Theatre

AL. HAYMAN & CO. (Inc.) . . . . . Proprietors

To-Night, Sunday Night and All Next Week

Last Performances! And there's only a few of them left! Klaw & Erlanger's Big Burlesque Extravaganza

IN GAY NEW YORK

Last performance Sunday, Dec. 5th

Monday, December 6th, LA BOHEME

Columbia Theatre

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers

Two Weeks, commencing Monday, Nov. 22d

Engagement of the Distinguished Actor, MR. LOUIS JAMES

Entire first week—the Brilliant Pictorial Romantic Drama

A CAVALIER OF FRANCE

Complete Scenic Production!

Repertoire for second week announced later

Prices—25c, 50c, 75c, $1.00

Coming, A MILK WHITE FLAG

Orpheum

Week beginning Monday, Nov. 29th

American Debut of THE VESUVIANA QUARTETTE, Direct from San Carlos Opera House, Naples

FORDYCE and his Marvelous Musical Puppets

STANLEY & JACKSON, Comedy Sketch Artists

O. K. SATO, Comic Juggler

THE AMERICAN BIOGRAPH—Sensational New Views

SERVAIS LE ROY, Europe's Greatest Illusionist

MORRIS' TRAINED PONIES

HARRY EDSON AND HIS DOG "DOC"

Reserved Seats 25c.; Balcony 10c.; Opera Chairs and Box Seats 10c. Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday.

Tivoli Opera House

MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager

Every Evening at 8 sharp

Last Night of the Charming Japanese Musical Comedy

THE GEISHA

Superb Cast! Beautiful Scenery! Correct Costumes!

Good-bye to the dear little Jappys-Japs-Jappys

Monday, December 6th, Planquette's Opera Comique

RIP VAN WINKLE

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : : : Lessee and Proprietor

MARK THALL, Manager.

Week commencing November 29th

Last week of Mrs. Romaluda Pacheco's Comical Farce

INCOG

THE HIT OF THE SEASON!

Never before at our prices — 15c., 25c., 35c. and 50c.

Seats may be had by Telephone Main 254 or at box office six days in advance

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last four performances of The Great Diamond Robbery

Monday, November 29th, Ninth Week of the Eminent Eastern Actor, W. H. PASCOE, in the Great Sensational Melodrama

"ON THE MISSISSIPPI"

Scenes from the South!

Original Piccaninies in Dances and Specialties in the Great Floating Theatre Scene

Great Breakaway Bridge Scene!

Evg. Prices 10 25 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE—Extra

SAN FRANCISCO SYMPHONY SOCIETY

FRITZ SCHEEL, Director

ALBERT MARKS, Manager

FIRST CONCERT

Thursday Afternoon, Dec. 2d, at 3:15

1. Im Walde Symphonie ..... Raff
2. Overture, "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
3. Scherzo aus, "Der Sommernachts Traum" ..... Mendelssohn
4. Phaeton Symphonisdhe Dichtung..... Saint-Saens

Seats on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's until Wednesday evening, December 1st, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bath houses, billiard tables, brewers, book binders, candymakers, canners, dyers flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.

TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST

BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

TURF TOPICS

The Oakland Races — Organization of Breeders and Ownes.

The racing at Oakland has continued to meet with popular favor, though so far only a few of the best class of horses have sported colors. The track has been in very fast condition, the penalty for which is likely to be sore understandings in the case of many animals.

Since last report Judge Denny, this season a well-trained horse, has equalled the coast record of 1:53 for 1⅛ miles, carrying 104 lbs. and winning handily, with imp. Trance 99 lbs. second and Installator 118 lbs third. The same day Bliss Rucker redeemed himself somewhat by carrying 108 lbs. to victory over six furlongs, the only runner-up being Free Lady 108 lbs.

The following day the other Salvator two-year-old in the Burns & Waterhouse stable, Colonel Dan, who has been so unreliable an exponent of speed hitherto, scored a win in the hands of his stable boy in quite easy fashion. and created a jockey. Lord Marmion 103 lbs. beat a lot of ten that, with the exception of the Morello youngster El Moro 113 lbs., were not of much account. In the all-aged purse of six furlongs the two-year-old Fonsovannah 101 lbs. cleverly defeated Libertine 121 lbs. in 1:14, a result that was in no small measure due to the well-timed run of Clawson in the latter part of the stretch, when H. Shields was taking things somewhat easy on the old horse.

On Saturday the mile race for three-year-olds and upwards showed four only on the card, of which Senator Bland and Buck Massie, 112 lbs. each, alone commanded notice, Grady 112 lbs. and Mercutio 108 lbs. being practically friendless. Buck Massie had the entire confidence of those who have seen him perform in the East, while that part of the crowd who knew something of the Senator's prowess in Montana did not hesitate to support him. Buck Massie took up the running and kept a good lead for half the journey, when Senator Bland ranged alongside him, soon after which the son of Hanover gave evidence of having shot his bolt, and the Montana horse finished the remainder of the journey at his leisure, Buck Massie keeping second to the end and finishing three lengths in front of Grady. Time, 1:41½. Senator Bland gave every sign of fitness, but the same cannot be said of Buck Massie. In the 1⅛ miles selling race, Clawson waited at the tail of seven others of moderate pretensions and bringing Don Clarencio, 90 lbs., up with a rush when he reached the straight scored a win by a clear couple of lengths.

The second Oakland week began with fair fields, but no improvement in class. Free Lady and El Moro both won in two-year-old events quite easily, and St. Calatine likewise in the race for two-year-old fillies. This is a big, loosely-built mare that will not stand much more racing at her present age, and as she has undoubted galloping ability, it should pay to put her aside until she has furnished a little more.

On Tuesday the overnight rain had made the track sloppy, but the fields were good on the whole, though lacking quality. Colonel Dan, ridden by Meany again, scored another win over six furlongs in all-aged selling purse, the runner up being Spunwell, who was giving him 5 lbs. and took some beating.

Wednesday afforded fair sport, the Owners Handicap, 1¼ miles, being the feature of the programme. The entries were Senator Bland, 97 lbs., Satsuma, 97 lbs., Ostler Joe, 85 lbs. and Judge Denny, 85 lbs. As the barrier went up to an even line Ostler Joe and Judge Denny went out in front, the latter hugging the rail round the first turn. Well into the back stretch Senator Bland moved up and by the time the half-mile post had been reached was in command and lying down to work in fine form, with Judge Denny in immediate attendance until entering the straight. At this point Satsuma made a bold effort to reach the chestnut, but without avail, and the latter had no difficulty in catching the judge's eyes first past the post with nearly a length to spare. Satsuma second and Judge Denny third, three lengths behind. Time, 2.08. The track had a wet and sloppy surface, but the footing being firm was but little slow. Still the time made was excellent and the Senator convinced every one that he is fully as good a horse as his admirers claimed. Of course the weights carried by the horses were but feathers, but there is little reason to doubt that in Senator Bland Mr. Marcus Daly has bred a really good horse with speed and staying qualities. It is to be hoped he will thereby be encouraged to uphold his interest in the turf, which seems latterly to have rather lessened.

In an all-aged mile event the two-year-olds Plan, 84 lbs., and Fonsovannah, 87 lbs., had matters to themselves and the former scored the trick, though swerving three or four times badly under the whip in the straight. Clawson claimed a foul and Fonsovannah certainly suffered in the run in, but the objection was not sustained. Morinel, 100 lbs., made a clever win by a neck in the two-year-old fillies race of six furlongs, the St. Carlo filly, Tiger Lily, 107 lbs., being second.

---

Turf circles have been considerably agitated during the past week by a very unfortunate outcome of the formation of a new association to represent the owners and breeders of California. Ill-feeling and misunderstanding ensued between the new organization and the California Jockey Club authorities, resulting in Mr. Charles Boots, the leader in connection with the new undertaking, being compelled to vacate his stalls at Oakland. The trouble is now quiescent, but the incident is a cause for deep regret to men who realize that the cause of sport is injured by dissensions amongst those who have most to gain by the maintenance of good feeling on all sides. Mr. Boots has a large measure of public sympathy as a man who races for sport and never bets, while at the same time it is felt that the racing associations which have given hostages to fortune and sunk large sums in making racing on an extensive scale possible in this State, must not have their interests jeopardised. Ih that case the whole fabric would fall to the ground. If the owners will proceed amicably with the with the Jockey Clubs, organization should be convenient and beneficial, but in Turf affairs, anywhere and at any time, internrl quarrels are always disastrous to the cause.

---

Mr. Charles Kerr's yearlings from the Antrim Stock Farm sold very poorly as compared with previous seasons, eighteen head realizing an average of $170 only.

---

While these columns are in the press the sale of Mr. E. J. Baldwin's two and three-year-olds from Santa Anita is in progress, to be continued to-day at the Oakland track, and on Wednesday, December 8th, there will be six yearlings by Morello, the property of Mr. J. B. Chase, put up for auction at Ingleside by Messrs. Killip & Co. The plan of selling racing stock at the tracks would seem to be a good one to follow, at least it proves so elsewhere.

---

Some of the Eastern journals have mixed things rather in their Horse Show illustrations. Even the reliable Spirit of the Times has transposed the hackney and French coach stallions, while Harpers's Weekly entitles a picture of what looks like a young Shire horse, "First Prize Hackney Stallion, Royal Standard." It may be mentioned that Royal Standard was awarded the champion prize at the Chicago Horse Show for champion coach stallion of all breeds, thus securing a victary for the hackneys over the French and German coach stallions, the best of which in the country were exhibited against him.

---

Comfrey, the three-year-old winner of the Cambridgeshire this year, and who started eleven times during the season, winning nine times, second once and third once, is a remarkable instance of successful inbreeding. His sire Despair is by See Saw and his dam St. Frida is by Cylinder, a son of See Saw.

BENEDICT.

FINANCE AND TRADE

The Bond and Share Market — Grain Notes.

Wednesday Evening.

The current week having been broken by the Thanksgiving holiday, our notes will be brief.

In the bond market prices rule higher than ever. Southern Pacific of Arizona have advanced to 100½ to 101, for the first time in many years. The tendency of first-class securities, generally, continues upward.

Gas stocks have fluctuated considerably, from fear of opposition from a new company, but so far the rumors have not been traced to a reliable source. For the moment stocks seem firmer.

In Bank shares nothing is doing. Prices are very firm. A few shares of Anglo-Californian have been sold at 55½, 55¾, which seems a low basis. Savings Banks show further strength, and German have been bid for at 1530.

Market-street Railway touched 52½, but have since relapsed to 51¾ bid, the sudden jump having brought out realising orders.

In Sugar stocks, Hutchinson is strong at 35 to 35½, owing to rumors of an increased dividend. Hawaiian have sold at 24.

In the Grain market wheat has considerably improved its status, and local quotations are assuming a nearer approach to a parity with values in other centers. The advance since last report has been considerable, and December No. 1, at the close of business to-day, was dealt in at 1.46½, with the outlook decidedly favorable.

A Cough, Cold or Sore Throat requires immediate attention. Brown's Bronchial Troches will invariably give relief.

Only Sixty Miles Away.

The nearness of Byron Hot Springs to San Francisco makes it most convenient for business men who are run down and in need of rest. They can run up there for a few days at a time to have the benefit of the climate and the mineral waters, and still be in close connection with their business. The natural warm mineral-water bathing-tank remains as popular as ever. Only three hours' ride.

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles. Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Sir Charles Dilke, though a radical, is prone to say hard things about his compatriots. Between Sir Vernon Harcourt and himself there was a passage at arms recently in which the leader of the Liberals upbraided Sir Charles for his desertion of the party. "Call it a party," Dilke replied. "It reminds me of nothing so much as a collection of molluscs lying on the seashore waiting for the tide to flow in on them."

Fine Display of Art Goods.

S. & G. Gump, 113 Geary street, have just begun to show their European importations for this season, and invite their patrons and the public to view the many fine and interesting noveltses received and unpacked so far.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F
Telephone 305

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Steamer Pomona, 2 p.m. November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28

For Newport (Los Angeles) and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Nov. 2, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 30 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Harford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles and Redondo (Los Angeles), at 11 a.m. November 4, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 28 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, 10 a.m. the 2d each month

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov. 30 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates.

S. S. "Mariposa," for Australia, Thursday, Dec. 9, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

I. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO. General Agents

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

The firm of JOE POHEIM is the largest in the United States. Rules for self-measurement and samples of cloth sent free.

201 and 203 Montgomery St., cor. Bush.
844 & 846 Market St. 1110 & 1112 Market St
SAN FRANCISCO.
485 Fourteenth St., Oakland. 603 & 605 K St., Sacramento.
143 South Spring St., Los Angeles.

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE
Belcher Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment | No. 87 |
| Amount per share | 25 cents |
| Levied | November 2, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office | December 24, 1897 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock | January 14, 1898 |

C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.
Office, room 35, 3d floor, Mills Bldg., San Francisco

ASSESSMENT NOTICE
Gould & Curry Silver Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment | No. 82 |
| Amount per share | 20 cents |
| Levied | November 2, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office | December 7, 1897 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock | December 29, 1897 |

A. K. DURBROW, Secretary.
Office, room 69, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

ESTATE OF EUDORA A. CHAMBERS (sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers) DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, R. C. Chambers, Executor of the will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within ten months after the first publication of this notice, to the said R. C. Chambers, at the law offices of Franklin K. Lane, rooms 201-202 Crocker Building, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

R. C. CHAMBERS,
Executor of the Will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, November 2, 1897.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF ROBERT A. ROSE, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at Room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

A. C. FREESE,
Administrator of the Estate of Robert A. Rose Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, October 26th, 1897.

J. D. Sullivan,
Attorney for Administrator.

BEST & BELCHER MINING COMPANY. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the second (2d) day of November, 1897, an assessment (No. 87) of twenty-five cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of December, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless paid before, will be sold on Tuesday the twenty-eighth (28th) day of December, 1897, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. M. JAFFE, Secretary.

Office, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE
Kentuck Consolidated Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment | No. 14 |
| Amount per share | 5 cents |
| Levied | October 27, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office | December 1, 1897 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock | December 22, 1897 |

AUG. WATERMAN, Secretary.
Office, room 23, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

A LARGE BENGAL TIGER TO MATCH THE CELEBRATED LION.

A large engraving of a tiger, in colors, from the renowned picture of the famous animal-painter, Rosa Bonheur, has been engraved at great expense to order for Charles Lyons, the London Tailor. Can be had at either of his three stores, at the nominal price of 10 cents; by mail 20 cents. Free to customers.

721 Market Street
302 Kearny Street
1212-1214 Market Street

Landseer's celebrated picture of the Lion can also be had at the same price.

THE RUBBER-TIPPED ARROW FAMILY GAME

It is just the thing for amusement; just the thing for discipline; just the thing to help our boys and girls grow up strong, healthy, manly, and womanly. The Game in Bronze costs only 65c. including pistol, arrow, target, and target-holder; in nickel, 90c., all complete.

ELASTIC TIP CO., 735 Market Street,
Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. ALSO .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore — Murphy, Grant & Co. Pacific Coast Sole Agents

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.
Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI
24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.
Telephone Main 5697.

FRANKLIN K. LANE G. WHITFIELD [illegible]

LANE & LANE
Attorneys and Counselors
Room 202
Crocker Building, San Francisco

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.
41 Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, PIPE, TILE, ETC.
GLADDING, McBEAN & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO.
WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Mons. Blanc, founder of the Casino at Monte Carlo, though immensely wealthy, was very close in small affairs. He never played but once. It was on a very hot day, and his wife demanded that he buy her a parasol. They went to a store and she selected one that cost $16, which, with a disgusted gesture he paid. That afternoon when the Casino opened, M. Blanc appeared and placed $2 on the red, at one of the treute et quarante tables. He won, pocketed his winnings and left the original stake on the table. For a second time he won and had got his $16 back. Not content he wagered again, but lost, then doubled his stake and won again, and then set about playing for the two louis he was behind. He played and lost, broke a thousand-franc note, then wrote a check and finally when the last deal was called M. Blanc seized his yellow cane and started for home. There he found his wife playing "patience" with a pack of cards, the offending parasol lying on the table. "Madam," said the old gentleman, "do you know what that thing has cost me?" Mais oui, mon ami. "It cost you $16." "Madame," rejoined he, "you are mistaken, I have just paid the bill—$18,000. That is all."

In the Tennyson memoirs there is a story about a friend of the poet—an Irishman named Edward Fitzgerald, the specialist of whose humor it was that the more comical were his words the more solemn his face became. After a large evening party at Tennyson's, a number of the guests remained to smoke and talk, among them a gentleman celebrated for his passion for titles. On this occasion he exceeded himself. All his talk was of the rich and great. "Yesterday, when I was riding with my friend, the Duke of——;" "On Tuesday last the Marquis of —— remarked to me." It went on for a long time; the party listened, some amused, some bored. Edward Fitzgerald was the first to rise. He lighted a candle, passed out of the room, stood still with the lock of the door in his hand, and looked back. He could change his countenance into anything he pleased. It had then exchanged in a moment its usual merry look for one of profound, nay hopeless, dejection. Slowly and sadly he spoke: "I once knew a lord too, but he is dead!" Slowly, sadly, he withdrew, closing the door amid a roar of laughter.

While it is considered smart in England to captain or colonel a militia regiment, there is no honor attaching to the rank and file of that service. Its members are drawn from the scum of the population. Apropos of this, a story is told of a couple of detectives from Scotland Yard, who appealed to the commanding officer of a regiment for permission to attend his inspection of the corps, as they had reason to believe that a criminal for whom they were searching had taken refuge in its ranks. The colonel readily complied, and told the two detectives to follow him up and down the line. They eyed each man narrowly, and finally stopped with a rather puzzled expression on their faces at the extreme end of the right wing before an elderly man with several stripes of long service and good conduct on his arm. "Why, surely," whispered the colonel, "you have got nothing against that man He is one of the veterans of the regiment. What makes you look at him so hard?" "Why, sir," replied one of the detectives, "it is just because he is the only man in the entire regiment whom we don't happen to know."

Frank Daniels is telling a story about a minister who was in constant terror of his barber, who occasionally got so badly intoxicated that he was not fit for shaving any one. The minister went to the barber's chair in fear and trembling. One day when the "tonsorial artist" was a little more nervously drunk than usual he made a slip and cut the divine's cheek badly. "There! my dear sir," shouted the minister, as he jumped out of the chair, "Now you see the effect of drink!" "Yes," said the barber, "it is apt to make the skin tender."

While Mark Twain was ill in London a few months ago a report that he had died was circulated. It spread to America and reached Charles Dudley Warner in Hartford, Conn. Mr. Warner immediately cabled to London to find out whether it was really so. The cablegram in some way came directly into the humorist's hands and he forthwith cabled the following reply: "Reports of my death greatly exaggerated."

A Scotch hotel-keeper, at whose house Tennyson had stayed, was asked—"Do you ken who you had wi' you t'other night?" "Na," was the hotel-keeper's reply; "but he was a shentleman." "It was Tennyson, the poet!" "An' wha' may he be?" "Oh, he is a writer o' verses, sich as ye see i' the papers!" "Noo, to think o' that! Jeest a pooblic writer, and I gied him ma best bed-room!"

Once when Whittier the poet was visiting the home of Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer in Boston, a woman forced her way to him, and, clasping both his hands in hers, exclaimed: "Mr. Whittier, this is the supreme moment of my life!" Whittier stood first on one foot and then on the other, withdrew his hands and clasped them behind his back, and replied, prosaically, "Is it?"

Sir George Harvey, the English artist, used to tell as his favorite story of one Scotchman meeting an old man, who was a friend of his, and saying to him: "I hear ye're to be married." "Yes," was the reply, "I wanted to have somebody to close my een." "Well, said the first Scotchman, "I tried thot, an' I had mine opened."

The late Archbishop Tait had a large and kindly tolerance for human stupidity. A bore had written him a series of letters in regard to some question of church discipline, to which for some time the archbishop did not reply. Finally he turned them over to his secretary and said: "Tell the fellow he is an ass—but say so kindly."

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION
IN
THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

Ernst H. Ludwig
CATERER
Supplies Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice
Also Terrapin, Entrees, Luncheons and Dinners, Ice Cream, Cake, etc.
NO. 122 GEARY STREET
Telephone Grant 119

The best people from everywhere, bent on business or pleasure, when in New York, stop at
The St. Denis
The cuisine and comforts of the hotel have become so well known that its name is now a household word in thousands of homes in this country and Europe
Central Location
Broadway and Eleventh Street
Opposite Grace Church
New York

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of
Artificial Stone in all its branches
Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty
Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention
A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED
OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

United States Laundry
Office 1004 Market St.
TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

The Hotel Richelieu
N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.
PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO
HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

The Only Secret in connection with
PIPER HEIDSIECK
Plug Tobacco

is the Champagne Flavor. Wherever chewing tobacco is known the Piper Heidsieck brand stands for all that is best. Don't be a stranger to it—you want the best—and the New Five-Cent Piece is enlarged 40 per cent.—quality remains the same. Ask for it.

THE WAVE

SPORTSMAN'S NUMBER

SMITH & WESSON REVOLVERS

WILL BEAR THE CLOSEST EXAMINATION.

FOR MECHANICAL SKILL, STRENGTH ACCURACY AND PENETRATION THEY ARE UNEXCELLED.

Catalogues exhaustively describing the twelve newest styles sent free on application.

SMITH & WESSON SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

"E. C." POWDER

The Standard - The World Over

An absolutely safe smokeless powder.
Always the same.
Highest velocity, combined with lowest breech pressure.
"E. C." will not pit your gun barrel nor deteriorate in damp climate.
Gunmakers advise the use of "E. C." over any other nitro powder.

IT IS SAFE

YELLOWSTONE

THE BEST IS THE CHEAPEST

HUNTER RYE

The Purest Type of American Gentleman's Whiskey for Home and Club Use : : :

CHRISTY & WISE

SOLE AGENTS

212 SANSOME STREET SAN FRANCISCO

THE WAVE

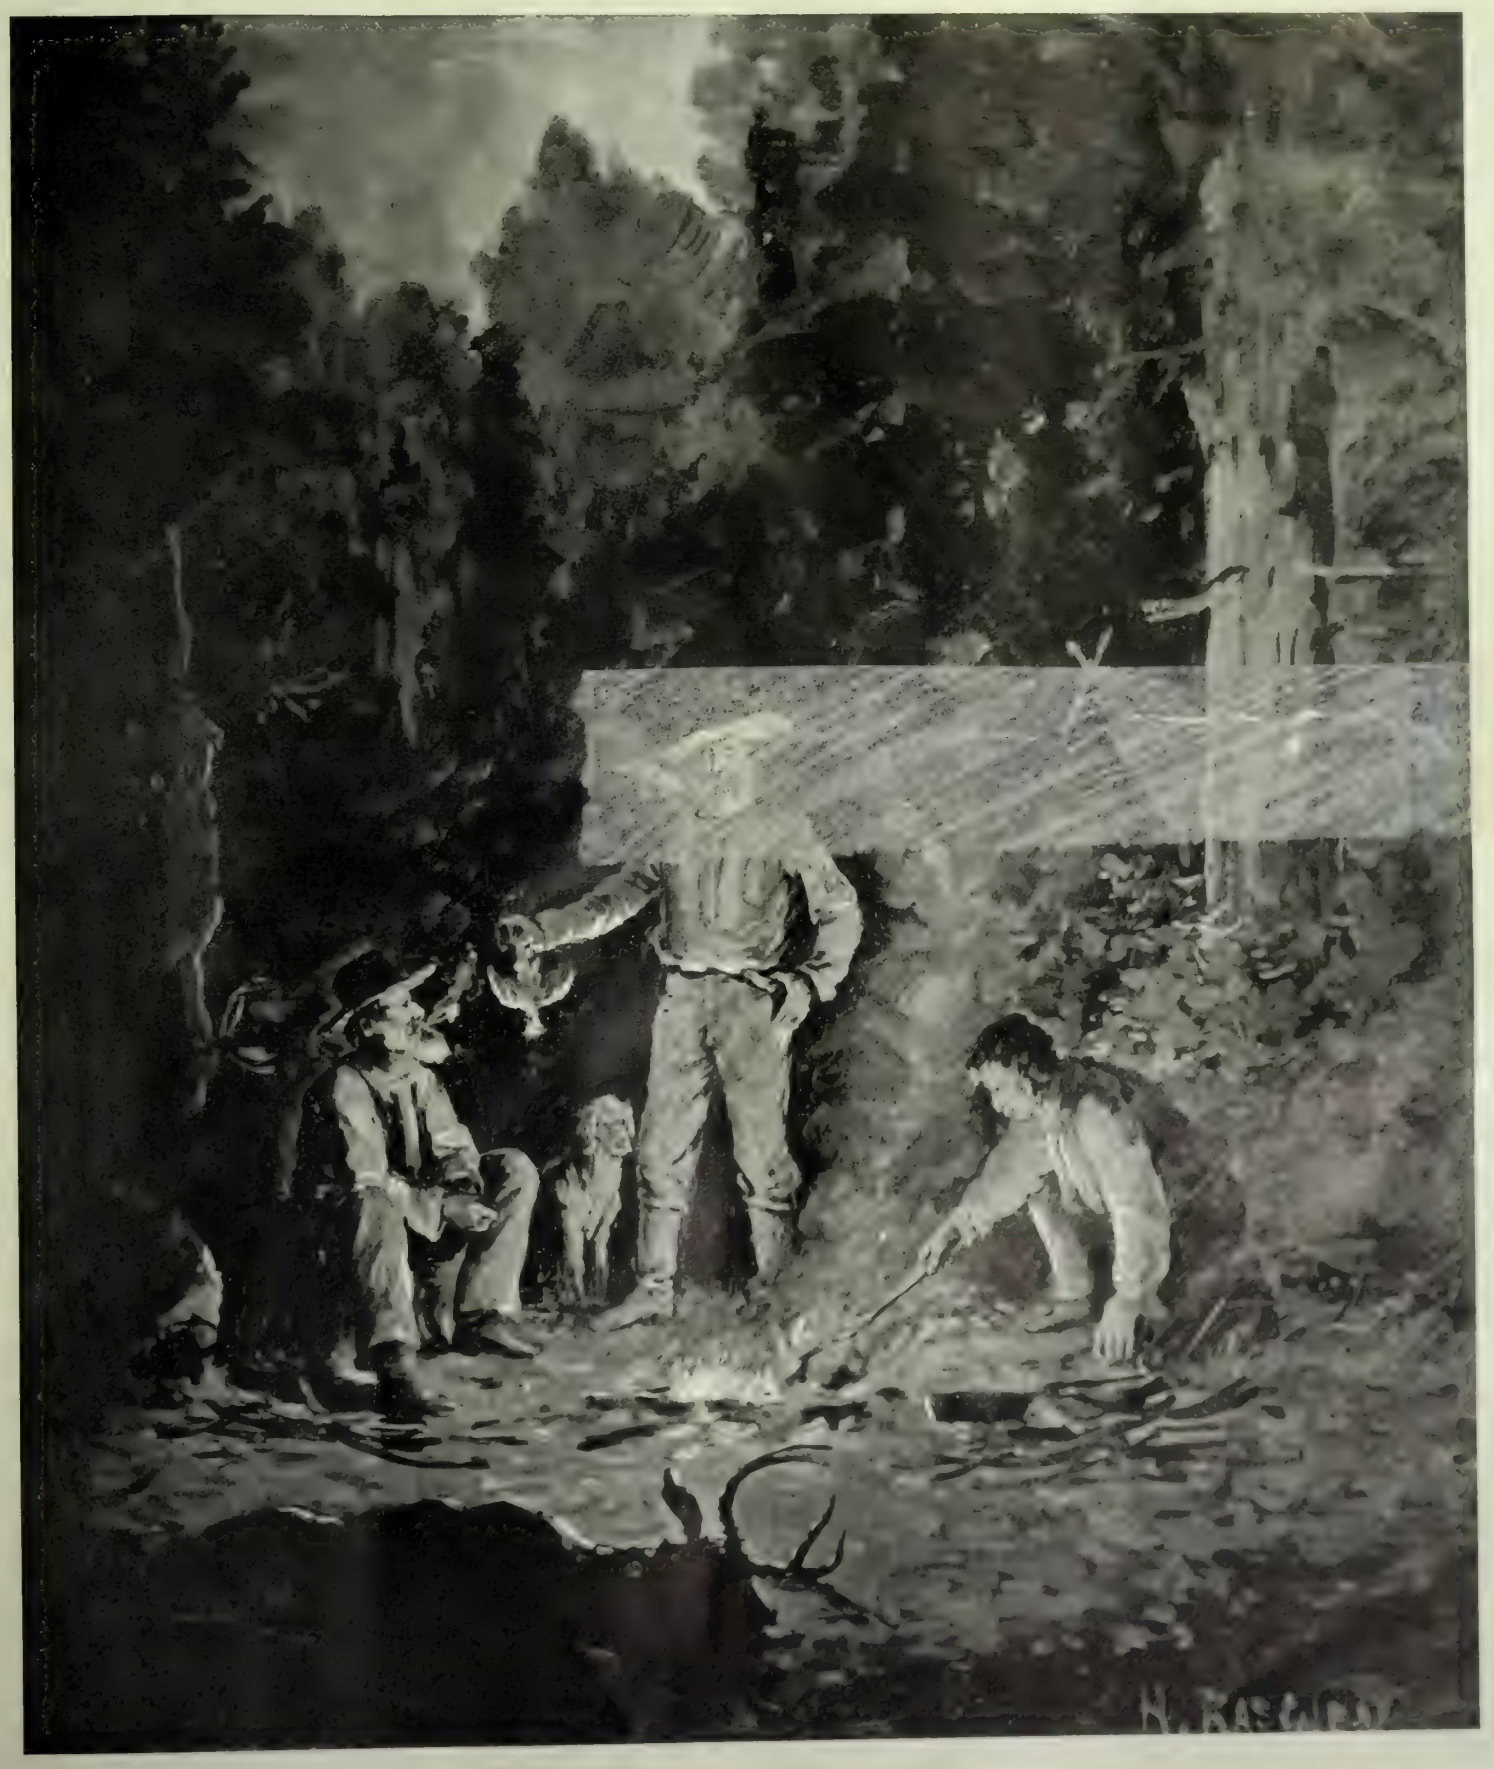
VOL. XVI. No. 49 SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 4, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS



A HUNTERS' CAMP IN THE REDWOODS

By H. Raschen

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 4, 1897

CONTENTS

Ducks and Hunters, by M. J. G ..... 2
A Great Preserve, by G. L. B. ..... 2
Fishing in Monterey Bay, by Charles W. Hibbard ..... 3
Hunting for Deer, by Carl Purdy ..... 3
The Mira Monte Club, by F. N ..... 3 4
The Tale of a Duck Hunt, by Dan O Connell ..... 5
The Olympic Gun Club, by Merton C. Allen ..... 6
The Verona Kennels ..... 7
The Domain of the Country Club ..... 8 9
A Group of Famous Dogs ..... 10
Thanksgiving at the Almshouse ..... 11
A Debutante's Diary ..... 14
Turf Topics; by Benedict ..... 15
Finance and Trade ..... 15
The Theatres ..... 16

The Christmas Edition of The Wave will be one of the most original and characteristic publications ever made in California. Eschewing all stereotyped scenic effects, it will present at least eight full pages of photographs representing the home life of the various nationalities that have adopted California as their home. The set will make an admirable exhibit of that city which Stevenson called "a vast smelting-pot of races and metals," and the pictures are quite the cleverest ever caught of the subjects. The cover, a beautiful design in four colors, is by George H. Piper, sculptor of the Stevenson Monument.

THE SPORTSMAN'S EDITION.

To-day The Wave appears in a new dress—for the moment—a rough outing dress, involving leggins, canvas shooting-coats, game bags, or wading boots, creels, and the like. We go a-gunning up and down the California coast, less for sport than for the entertainment of the sportsman himself. It is our [illegible]n time to time, to make such excursions out of the [illegible]nd rut of our policy hitherto, and get a smell of the open and a touch of green earth outside the city.

Sport and sporting in California is a recent growth, due, one is strongly inclined to believe, to the influence of the two great universities hard by. If one pauses to consider the difference between the young man of 1887 and his prototype of to-day, one cannot but note the difference and observe that it is for the better. The change comes of indulgence in outdoor sports—that much is said and signed. The city has now and is still gaining the reputation of being the best sporting town in the world—limiting the term "sport" to the amateur variety, of course—the sport for the sport's sake. Climate has much to do with this. There is no day in the year when a man may not shoot something or fish something within six hours' travel from the City Hall, and where else between the five oceans can horses be raced the year round? You may have an early breakfast to-morrow morning in the heart of the residence quarter of the town, not out of sound of the rumble of the cable cars, and before noon, if only luck be with you, you may be playing a two-pound trout, or flushing a flock of quail, or landing a three-foot salmon, or stalking a four-prong deer, or even winging a noble canvasback. Practically, there is sport from one year's end to another, for when the season for one kind of game closes that for another opens.

DUCKS AND HUNTERS

Habits of the Speedy Sprig and the Cautious Canvasback.

The shooting of wild duck, I hold to be one of the most pleasurable of outdoor pastimes, provided birds are fairly plentiful and weather conditions favorable. It's a good sportsman who has learned to stop a teal duck traveling down the wind and in a hurry to reach his destination. There are hundreds of sportsmen on this coast who can accomplish that trick nine times out of ten, while on the other hand there are thousands who go shooting day after day in the season and have repeatedly missed such shots simply because they were too slow in shooting and neglected to allow for distance and speed. The teal and Black Jack are lightning travelers when they are on a journey, and they are more frequently missed by hunters than any bird that flies.

In duck shooting, opportunities for all manner of shooting are afforded, and as a rule the men who are good calculators of distance and speed return with the heaviest bags. It often happens that a sprig duck, when about to drop into some favorite pond is missed by the best of shots. The reason for this is that the hunter, unless he be an expert in duck hunting, will shoot either over or under the bird and says things unfit for publication when the bird sails away without loss of a feather. A sprig, when just about to alight, has a peculiar up and down motion. It will pause for an instant, then drop, then ascend, pause again and finally fall with a splash.

The tyro will generally shoot about the time the bird is in the act of either ascending or descending with the result that a miss is scored. In leaving a pond on detecting danger near at hand, the sprig will often escape from the cleverest marksman, for instead of winging off left or right, as is the case with most ducks when frightened, the long-necked pin-tail rises apparently straight, but with each beat of the wings he drops backward and the inexperienced hunter too often makes allowance over the bird. The most successful way of shooting a sprig—that is when the bird is ascending from the water with his breast toward the hunter—is to shoot directly "on." Readers can try this and report results.

The royal canvasback is another representative of the family of broad bills that will deceive good shots at times. When the Northern invader is in a hurry for his diving ground he fairly bores the atmosphere, traveling at the rate of 125 miles per hour. The bird does not appear to be moving so fast, in fact a butter-ball flying in the lead of a "can" would appear to be traveling with twice the speed of the king of ducks, but in a race of a mile the "can" would win by half the distance. The canvasback, I repeat, is frequently missed because the shooter does not "lead" the bird enough. A fast-flying "can" distant 40 yards from the gun should be lead at least nine feet, and in making even this allowance the wind is not to be considered.

But the royal "can" has his idiosyncrasies. At times he is the stupidest of birds and can be easily bagged again and again. At other times, however, you will find his lordship cunning as an old fox and almost impossible of capture. It is a beautiful picture to see a flock of "cans" when they are high in the air and journeying to some distant feeding ground, wheel on seeing the decoys in open water, circle two or three times over the inanimate birds and then shoot down and into the pond like so many bullets.

Market hunters never think of such a thing as shooting into a flock when the birds drop in the water. They either wait until the "cans" cluster after inspecting their locality and then fire into the band or remain quiet until the celery-eaters commence diving, picking them off one by one as the birds come to the surface.

This is not, by any means, a sportsmanlike way of shooting birds, but the market hunter gives very little attention to that consideration. It is quantity and quality that he is after.

Market shooting is prohibited by ordinance in several counties of this State and there is no doubt that in the very near future the sportsmen of every county will arrive at the wise conclusion that if they intend to protect the game of their respective localities from the grasp of the pot hunter, they must interest themselves with their supervisors looking to the protection of such game by an ordinance that will prevent shipment out of the county.

The market shooter does not enrich any county, while on the other hand visiting sportsmen spend thousands of dollars during the shooting and fishing seasons wherever they can enjoy favorite conditions.

Of course, the county which has been visited by market hunters for any number of seasons has no game. Its people must not, therefore, expect to see sportsmen nor their money during the game shooting season.

But notwithstanding the great slaughter of birds by market hunters year after year, local sportsmen should not imagine that the growing scarcity of wild ducks in the bay marshes is occasioned altogether by so-called market shooting.

The opening up of the great plains country between Merced and Bakersfield by the farmers has had much to do with this scarcity of ducks in such marshes as are within easy reach of local sportsmen. Generally after the first good rainfall, when the young grain puts in an appearance, wild ducks depart from the marshes near the bay for the open country in the Southern parts of the State. There they can enjoy perfect quiet and good feeding in the immense grain fields, large parts of which are washed or even inundated by the overflow from irrigating ditches.

It was because of this growing scarcity of wild ducks that sportsmen have banded together and have leased large tracts of marsh lands patrolled by game-keepers, much to the chagrin of local hunters who were shut out from the enjoyment of a favorite sport. For a period lasting four seasons the so-called preserve clubs of the Suisun marshes were harassed by poachers, who entered the preserves on all sides and killed game in open defiance of the law. Several warm debates between keepers and poachers resulted, but with the exception of the death of one keeper, who was shot by a market hunter near Suisun about four years ago, nothing of a serious nature has occurred.

The club members have had many hunters arrested, and many a long and tiresome battle before the courts has ensued. The poachers won the first important victory in the Supreme Court of Solano County, before Judge Buckles, but when an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of this State, the trespassers found to their sorrow that some of the Supreme Court Judges were members of preserve clubs and of course favored "preserves" of all kinds. The poachers finally retreated in good order; they gave up the fight and followed in the footsteps of the sportsmen by forming clubs and leasing grounds, over which they are now shooting without interference.

The market hunters, however, on seeing that their occupation was about to suffer, took time by the forelock and leased some of the very best quail and duck shooting lands in the Southern counties, thereby shutting out the local sportsmen of the towns. This ruse aroused the anger and ill-will of the country sportsmen and the latter have labored long to "oust" the market hunters, and so effectual were their efforts that the Supervisors of the counties where the hunters have located, passed ordinances preventing the shipment of game out of the county.

It is difficult to imagine how the war between the market hunters and the sportsmen of the interior towns will end. The hunters are determined now to fight every inch of ground. They say that they have a perfect right to prevent any person from trespassing on the lands leased by them and that the local ordinances preventing the shipment of game out of the county are undoubtedly unconstitutional.

At any rate the local markets are glutted with game of all kinds, which proves beyond question that the market hunters are not idle. Tons of wild game are dumped into the bay by the commission merchants during the hunting season, and for two reasons viz., first, because the demand for game is sometimes so small that the merchants, when they are overstocked, cannot dispose of the birds at popular prices, and rather than sell them to the poor at a small consideration, or send them to some of the charitable institutions of this city, they unload the game into the bay. Besides this the market hunters ship game to the markets sometimes in such poor condition that the birds are unfit for table use and, of course, they are consigned to the bay.

There is no question that market hunting is injurious to the game interests of this State, and should be stopped if possible. The men who shoot for market are generally of the undesirable element who shun manual labor. The sooner they are compelled to earn their own living in legitimate manner the better it will be for the country at large.

In conclusion I will say that it would be to good advantage if all market hunting were forbidden by law. Following this would come the abolishing of preserves. Let every man who goes into the marshes for pleasure have equal rights. So long as he conducts himself like a gentleman he should not be denied the opportunity of shooting wild ducks wherever he finds them.

M. J. G.

A GREAT PRESERVE

The Magnificent Hunting Territory of the Country Club.

Bounded by the Pacific Ocean and Tomales Bay on three sides, and with its eastern border skirted by the pretty stream known as Olema Creek, there lies in Marin County, five and thirty miles from the city, a principality of 76,000 acres, belonging to the Old Shafter and Howard families, tenanted by the Country Club and dedicated to sport. By nature a preserve abounding with wild game and fish, systematic protection is now afforded to the indigenous species and additions have been made as opportunity has offered of other sorts, which, it is hoped, will, under careful propagation, increase and multiply.

To describe the beauties of this vast estate would need the pen of a Muir and the poetic soul of a Kipling. The wild romantic glens revelling in a wealth of creeper, vine, fern, and every description of flower by way of undergrowth, with giant oaks, pines and laurels towering overhead; the gorges of Bear Valley, with their abrupt and precipitous sides, seem to defy the assaults of man, and suggest ideal haunts for the wary game; and yet the territory is as thoroughly overlooked and patrolled from a game preservation point of view as any deer forest or moor in Scotland. It was in the year 1890 that certain members of the Pacific Union Club interested in shooting and fishing took steps to form a separate institution for sporting purposes, and secured the shooting and fishing privileges of the Shafter and Howard ranches for the new organization, which was formed as the Country Club. Plans were at once made for the accommodation of members visiting the Marin County preserve in search of sport, and a pretty and comfortable clubhouse was built and suitably fitted up, many improvements and additions having been made since, rendering it a thoroughly agreeable place of residence. The house, with its kennels and outbuildings, is situated on the divide in the centre of Bear Valley, and affords the most charming views over the surrounding country. The membership of the club is limited to 100, the list being a full one at all times, and the house will accommodate thirty persons at least.

The angling capabilities of the club property are practically unlimited, for, in addition to seven natural lakes varying from five to sixty acres each in extent, there are a number of beautiful streams already well-stocked with trout. These natural advantages can be greatly added to by the construction of dams and reservoirs as means are available.

As all sportsmen are aware, the quail of California is, of the feathered tribe that inhabits this Coast, the bird that affords the best sport to the expert hunter, and in the interior of Marin County the quail is found in the greatest abundance. Ducks and snipe thrive in the marshes, while deer roam through the woods of the Country Club's domain. That it may not be supposed that the members take delight in nothing that will not furnish material for satisfying the desire of man to kill, it should be mentioned that they have stocked their estate with some of the choicest wild song birds of Europe, and their keepers are instructed to do everything in their power to protect both these and the native species, so far with results that have been most satifactory.

It would be impossible to conceive of anything more delightful to the blase battuc marksman of older countries, who has bred in him a taste for genuine sport, than the privilege of stalking the natural coverts and mountain sides of the Country Club's estate in search of wild game. And while enjoying the advantages that would be before him in the way of making a bag to compensate him for his toil he would have the assurance of practically all the comforts and enjoyments which an old-world country house so liberally affords. At the clubhouse good cheer and all the resources of civilization are at the disposal of members and their guests, with society as congenial and jolly as any sportsman could wish for. The pleasure of social life are no small part of the Country Club's attractions and from the day of its birth its shooting contests at Del Monte and elsewhere in the State have been famous for the entertainment they have afforded and the high standard of skill in marksmanship exhibited by its members. Of late years the members have devoted themselves with more and more assiduity to the sport afforded by their preserves, where the continued protection of the game has greatly tended to improve their opportunities.

Of Country Club life, with the scenes and surroundings amidst which the sportsman spends his days and nights, the accompanying sketches will serve to give the reader a fair idea, but of the surpassing beauties of nature, their infinite charm and variety, neither pen nor camera can give any adequate description. Among the show spots is one that is perhaps unique. It is where a thousand feet or more above the sea there nestles a placid lake like one vast opal, the depths of which have never yet been plumbed, for below the heaving waters of the ocean form its bed. A narrow gulch opens from this lake to the sea, and through its portals flock myriads of gulls to disport themselves on the bosom of the lake during the day, nightfall or the coming of strangers driving them seaward to where may be their homes. The true sportsman is ever a lover of nature, and while such institutions as the Country Club exist and thrive that instinct will have endless opportunity for development.

FISHING IN MONTEREY BAY

A Great Body of Water Which Swarms With Food Fish.

The Bay of Monterey, lying almost directly south of, and one hundred miles distant from San Francisco, divides the counties of Monterey and Santa Cruz, and is, in many respects, entirely unlike any other body of water to be found up the length of the Pacific coast.

Its protected location insures to it a climate that is practically one continual summer, and its sheltered waters are rarely troubled by any invading wind, and even when, outside, the waves are dashing high over Point Loma.

Although its shores blossom with a tropical verdure, seemingly out of place in northern climates, and its scenic beauties are elsewhere unsurpassed, it is from the standpoint of the icthyologist, that it proves most remarkable.

In its blue waters, rich in abundance of food, are found more varieties of fish than in any other body of water on the shores of the Pacific. As some scientist has aptly said: "Monterey Bay is the meeting ground, the rendezvous of the finny tribe; the northern limit of the southern and the southern limit of the northern fishes. From the tiny "Goby" to the giant whale they are found, in every variety of form and color, and in numbers as countless as the sands over which they swim.

There is for the scientist, fish that are strange and rare; for the epicure, those that are toothsome, and for the sportsman, those that are as gamey as the most sportsmanlike angler could wish for. Size, gameness and edibility are seldom seen together, but this rare combination is found in Ininnat, the finest of the salmon species, and one of the best known, and most numerous, in the bay of Monterey.

These magnificent fish, with their silvery irridescent hues and pink delicious flesh, several times each year, come in from the ocean to the shallower waters of the bay, where they rest and bask in the quiet of the harbor, and fatten upon anchovies, sardines and other varieties of small fish, that fall a prey to their greater speed. Their appearance is usually preceded by the arrival of immense schools of sardines, whose numbers are often sufficient to blacken the water over an area of many acres. Directly upon their track, the salmon follow with appetites that seem unapeasable. Hovering upon the outskirts of the sardine school, they dash into it again and again. Sometimes the smaller fish thus preyed upon, seek safety by settling far down toward the bottom, sometimes towards the surface, where they may be seen by thousands leaping from the water. At times, however, the school moves shoreward, where its impetus carries it far up the beach. In this event, a receding wave often leaves thousands upon thousands of sardines wriggling on the tide mark, and only a certain number are rescued by the next incoming breaker. No matter in what direction the sardines attempt to escape the attacks of their pitiless enemies, the result is disaster. Forced upon the shore, they are maimed and bruised by the rocks, and left to die upon the beach. Seeking fancied security on the surface, they prove shining marks for ten thousand sea gulls hovering over the water. Looking for safety in the depths, they meet their fate in the yawning mouths of various monsters that lurk among the rocks below.

At these times the most interesting and attractive sport is offered to the angling enthusiast, as the salmon will now bite freely if the lure used be the sardine of which he is so fond. The sardine must be freshly caught and placed upon a hook having a swivel attachment, so that when drawn through the water it revolves with great rapidity. Just why a salmon can be induced to choose this particular sardine when millions are in sight in every direction, seems utterly unexplainable; but the fact remains that they do, and during a good salmon run no limit can be placed on the number which may be taken by one properly equipped with tackle and patience.

Above all, the tackle must be strong, for a thirty-five pound salmon at the end of three hundred feet of line is capable of as wicked a fight as the most skillful angler cares to engage in. Fishing is always done from boats here, and the necessity for a skilled oarsman is, of course, indispensable when a salmon is "struck." To a city man unaccustomed to exercise this necessity is made apparent at once, for in trolling for salmon the boat must be sent through the water hours at a time at a high rate of speed, and to flabby muscles is impossible. Besides this, there are shoals and other dangers to be avoided, known only to one well acquainted with the surroundings.

There are dozens of nets, the property of the market fisherman, scattered in all directions, which must be cleared; first, for safety to the net and secondly because of the annoyance consequent upon fouling them with the hook. Nor will it do to cross the wake of another craft, for this means tangling of the tackle and if not actual warefare, at least, an expression of language unfit for publication.

The "strike" of a salmon is unlike that of most large fish. It is more like a "tug" at the line, and for a moment he apparently yields to the speed of your boat, as if undecided what course to pursue. This undecision, however, is but momentary, for the salmon, suddenly realizing his danger, jerks viciously at the line. Here comes a frantic rush that sets the reel "a tune," a slackening of the line and from the crest of a following wave there is a swirl of foam, and your prize leaps high in the air, his broad sides flashing like silver, as he angrilly shakes his huge head in a vain endeavor to dislodge the hook.

To successfully bring to gaff a thirty pound salmon, requires not only the highest skill, but strength as well, for the constant strain upon the rod continuously for half an hour, leaves one at the end of that time trembling from very weakness.

The long wharf in the quaint old town of Monterey is a scene of great animation and interest when a "salmon run is on." The sides of the wharf are lined and dotted with patient anglers intent upon securing anchovies, sardines or other small fish for bait or food, while throngs of visitors wander up and down watching the fun. Thousands of sea birds are always on the wing, while occasionally, a hundred feet above your head, an awkward pelican labors slowly by; but as you watch him there is a sudden change, his keen eye has sighted breakfast in the wave below. With set wings and long neck extended, he drops through space with the speed of meteor. He is all grace now, and cuts the water clean as a knife, leaving scarcely a ripple as he disappears beneath the surface. His high and skillful dive is invariably successful, yet he is not always fortunate in being allowed to enjoy the prize, for his reappearance is a signal for an attack from scores of gulls who bury him completely from sight, and often succeed in robbing him of the well earned morsel. The sea gulls, whose plumage is a combination of soft drabs and greys, are everywhere; wheeling and circling through the air in graceful curves, floating calmly upon the gently rolling water, poising upon the edge of some unused boat or floating while they rest as motionless as decoys.

Scores of boats are skimming over the bay in every direction, propelled by the long, powerful, sweeping strokes of the boatman, while a salmon line attached to either oar trails out far behind. These are the hand lines of professional fishermen, who disdain the use of a rod. Away out toward the heads for miles distant the bay is dotted with all varieties of crafts, their occupants bent on the capture of the salmon, either for pleasure or the market.

All that has been said of the fishing at Monterey is equally true of Santa Cruz, Soquel and Capitola. All have their champions and their imaginary advantages, but there is probably little to choose in favor of one or the other. Admittedly there disadvantages and drawbacks to the pleasure of salmon fishing as there are to all other pleasures, as for instance, the necessity for rising at a most unseemly hour, a sudden and unexpected gale, or an attack of "Mal de Mer," but these possibilities are of little concern to the true sportsman who loves sport for sport's sake.

CHAS. W. HIBBARD.

THE MIRA MONTE CLUB

Where the City's Younger Sportsmen Hunt Duck, Deer and Quail.

About two years ago three or four of the younger men of San Francisco, finding their tastes ran to out-of-door sports with the rod and gun rather than to to indoor city ciub life, conceived the idea of forming a country club and acquiring property for the purpose of preserving game and fish for the benefit of the members. The idea of having a bachelors' club in the country, where one could go and seek rest from the whirl of the busy city, as well as the whirl of the ballroom, was a novel idea.

The conclusion of the whole matter was the Mira Monte Club, organized in the summer of 1895, and composed of the following named members: Jas. B. Burdell, president; H. B. Houghton, vice-president; Nat. Wilson, secretary and manager; W. R. Whittier, Edward Pringle. George Martin, James Follis, Milton Latham, Laurie Adams, W. Fairbanks, W. K. Hill, F. A. Wickersham, F. A. Greenwood, J. Downey Harvey, A. H. Whitney and Doctor Galen Burdell (honorary).

The last named gentleman made the club not only possible, but prosperous, by very generously leasing, for a term of years some fifteen thousand acres of admirable duck, quail and deer country at Burdell Station, on the line of the S. F. and N. P. Railway, about 35 miles from the city. Of these acres 2000 are marsh, in which are situated the duck ponds and snipe patches. The balance is upland and is covered with oak, chaparral and fern. The quail are thick in here and it is no unusual thing to start up a buck or doe in the more isolated corners. However, the deer are not now as plentiful as the Miramonte Club intends they shall be, and as yet the members are limited to two deer per season. Fishing, as well, is more of a hope than a reality at Miramonte. However, the tract is seamed with waterways and in the higher grounds there are veritable mountain streams where trout would thrive. The management of the club are now considering this question and the streams are to be stocked with McCloud and Eastern trout.

The clubhouse is located on a knoll covered with live oak about half a mile from the station. There are no better appointed bachelor quarters within a radius of a hundred miles of the city than those afforded by the Mira Monte clubhouse, and quite a feature of the life of the place is the occurrence of house parties made up to pass a day and a night at the club. The house is built in an admirable Spanish style, one story in height and flanked with deep wings. The interior is divided into the huge living-room, dining-room, kitchen, billiard room, and twelve bedrooms for the use of members. At the lower end of the "Island" the club has erected its stables and kennels. There is no occasion or necessity for the maintenance of any regular pack by the club and these kennels merely serve for the accommodation of game dogs of the individual members. Here also are kept the floats, the four launches and half dozen ducking boats for the members' use.

The location of the Mira Monte preserves is such they enjoy a blessed immunity from the poacher and nefarious pot-hunter and market hunter. On all sides their land is either inaccessible of approach, or is protected by the tracts of the Olympic Gun Club and the Petaluma Gun Club.

Twice a year the club holds a competitive shoot open only to members. The first, which occurs in June, is a clay pigeon shoot for the club medal. The other shoot is rather unique and is held in February. It is a shoot for all manner of pests, from the blue jay to the wild cat that destroy or drive out the legitimate game. Points are given on certain birds and animals, so many for a hawk, so many for a wild cat. The club divides into two parties and that party scoring the highest number of points is treated to what the daily papers call "an elaborate menu." Altogether the Mira Monte Club is a capital organization, and in the matter of amusement and recreation (principles upon which it was founded), has attained results far beyond the organizers' fondest hopes.

F. N.

The height of luxurious traveling has been reached by the Czar and Czarina. The Empress's private car is upholstered in pale blue satin. The electric lamps are all in the form of lilies, and it contains writing and tea-tables made of mother-of-pearl. The nursery is the next apartment, and is as comfortable and handsome as the same rooms in any of the Czar's palaces. There are dining-rooms and drawing-rooms and several sleeping apartments; in fact, this train is a miniature palace. The wheels are covered with indiarubber tires.

The editor of the Volkswacht, of Breslau, who commented upon the frequency of railroad accidents in Germany, has been indicted for "insulting" Herr Thielen, the Minister of Public Works.

HUNTING FOR DEER

A Fourth of July Experience in the San Hedrin Mountains.

It was the afternoon of the third of July [illegible] our party of four which had left Ukiah the day before [illegible] unloading a spring wagon at Box Springs on the [illegible] high up on the sides of the San Hedrin. There were four of us, and not a tenderfoot in the crowd. All had hunted the deer and roughed it often before.

Mendocino County on a July day is not a refrigerator, and the shade of a fine oak by the spring was enjoyed as Will and I built a camp fire and got a late dinner, while Jim and Charlie threw the pack-saddles on [illegible] and began to get an outfit, which had been curtailed as much as possible at the start, in shape for a pack over a hard trail. There were, of course, our rifles and hunting-knives, and blankets, a coffee pot and frying pan, a round of tin plates, cups, spoons and forks, a good supply of salt, pepper, sugar and bread, and flour to make flapjacks when it was gone. As for the rest, there was coffee and bacon—for what old hunter could disassociate deer liver from bacon? and sometimes—well, sometimes one doesn't get the deer.

San Hedrin is one of the highest of Mendocino's mountain ranges, and rises fully five thousand feet above the ocean, and only seven hundred feet less above Ukiah, which is faintly visible thirty miles away.

A few miles over a rough trail through chapparal, Will guiding, brought us to a beautiful pine opening, surrounded by heavy brush, with abundant feed, and near the upper side an ice-cold spring gushing out from the mountain side and rushing down in a little rill to join the Eel River miles below. To be sure, the slope was a little steep to make a bed stay where you put it, but pine needles make a fair mattress, and we could not complain of our camp. Evening was at hand and all hurried to unload and stake the horses out, and then each took his rifle for a short hunt before supper. I went below camp into the chemise, and saw a deer, but it was too dusky, and I missed. Charlie was luckier in another direction, and when we gathered into camp as the daylight faded away a young buck hung from a bush, and deer's liver and bacon, and coffee and bread, with abundant gravy, formed a supper not too hearty, but we slept well.

A man who would still hunt deer in July cannot sleep late, and long before daylight we were up and off breakfastless. The party scattered, and as the light broke over Snow Mountain in the east, I could have been seen toiling up a steep trail near the top of the Rocky Ridge of San Hedrin, trying my best to keep up with Will Thomas, who is a very racehorse on a mountain. I am a pretty fast walker myself, and being a trifle over six feet, cannot plead shortness of legs, but Gavin McNab, the San Francisco attorney, and Thomas, are the two men I could never keep up with. As it was I could only keep him in sight until he turned a ridge. Just as the sun rose I heard the crack of his rifle, then another shot far below, then Will again, and a third rifle opened far to the right. Evidently the boys were in it and I wasn't. I made a run to catch up to Thomas, inspirited by the repeated popping of Winchesters, and when I gained a high point I saw him seated on the edge of a cliff, and could see the smoke of his rifle, followed by the sharp crack as he fired time and again at something which I could not see on the debris at the foot of the cliff.

Just then a big buck who had been sunning himself in a patch of chemise, rose up majestically to see what all the to-do was about, at a distance of about two hundred yards on the next point, and I began to take part in the Fourth of July celebration. My first shot hit him, and he jumped, and I continued to pump lead as he went over the brush. He stopped heavily on a rocky point, and a last lucky shot sent him tumbling and rolling down the steep rocky hill until he lodged at the foot below, and all this while below and to the right the boys were cracking away as if ammunition were no object, and Will still sat to the left popping away, and at last I saw the cause.

Every hunter knows how hard it is to shoot down a steep place. He had sighted a deer at long range at the bottom of this mass of debris which had broken from the great cliff. At each shot, the deer, hearing the bullet whistle above him, had done a few jumps up the hill, and by the time my deer was dispatched, which took less time than the writing of it has taken, his buck, by gradual procession, was at the foot of the cliff, when a last shot sent him tumbling back down the slope horns over heels. I went over to where Thomas was, and as we stood congratulating ourselves on our luck, he stopped suddenly and fell to his knee, and the next I knew a third buck went tumbling down the talus to the left, and still we heard the cheerful crack of the Winchester to the right. By the time we had hung our three in the shade and got to camp, we were well primed for a late breakfast. We found the other boys in camp, and our morning's work figured up nine bucks.

A feast on venison had been well earned, and was thoroughly enjoyed. We had had our fun, and now came the hard work. Thomas and I took two horses and went for our deer. It was late before we reached the top of the cliff, and dusky as we went down its precipitous sides. By the time the deer were cut and sacked it was dark, and I will not soon forget how we felt for a foothold on that steep cliff in the dark that night, knowing that a misstep might mean serious injury or death, nor the breath of relief as we stood at the top. Late in the evening we made camp at a fine spring on the north side of the mountain, and rolled ourselves in our blankets. Deer were started in the morning, but we had enough, and resisted the temptation. The next day or so were spent in jerking the venison over improvised scaffolds, and we returned to Ukiah well satisfied with our hunt.

CARL PURDY.

Two peers carry on the trade of milkmen in London, and there is also a titled fruiterer. He is no other than the Earl of Harrington, who keeps a shop at the Trafalgar Square end of Whitehall. His lordship's name is not up, but he acknowledges the connection by calling the establishment "Elvaston," after his castle in Derbyshire.

All the typographical work and engraving in this edition, including designs, color plates and half tones were made at the establishment of The Wave, 24 Montgomery street. The printing was executed at the press of the E. D. Taylor Co., and the color-printing of the cover by Brunt.

THE MIRA MONTE CLUB PRESERVES

1. At the Traps. 2. View in Living Room. 3. Some of the Members. 4. Front of the Club House. 5. Approach from the Marsh. 6. At the Waterfront.

DUCK-HUNTING ON THE MARSHES

Photos by Bushnell

The Tale of a Duck Hunt.

By DAN O'CONNELL.

On the northern boundary of the preserves of the Tamalpais Club, and close to the seaward flank of the old mountain, lies a pond, weedy and sheltered, and much beloved by the tempest-tossed duck. Here, when the winds are high, and the surf is loud, they settle down among the long reeds, and hold noisy converse close under the sloppy banks. The pond would be called a mere by a poet or a professor, and by the sportsman, a place admirably suited for the assassination of the mallard and canvasback, if one does not mind the discomfort of a camp in the willows close by, or a very early drive from one of the club's tents on the Bear Brush ridge.

My friend and I chose the former, and with a cart, well provisioned, made an early start from "Victor's," that spot on the San Rafael road dear to all sportsmen. Victor himself has departed for the happy hunting grounds, but the "Hunter's Resort" still goes on, and Billy Brown, the gaunt yet handsome phantom of the hills, still holds his wigwam within its confines.

It seems an uncomfortable matter to camp out on a November night, but it all depends upon the way in which it is done. Now, the first thing is plenty of covers. Then a small bag of shavings for kindlings, will save some trouble and profanity when the wood is damp. There is no necessity of bothering about a coffee pot. Fill a couple of stone Vichy bottles with good strong coffee, made in the house and sweetened to taste. Those may be heated at any time in the camp fire, for the stone bottle will not crack, and if hot water should be required for any other purpose, such as the toddy direction, the stone bottle will be found much more convenient, because less bulky than the kettle. The rubber blanket at this season, is almost indispensable, and a woolen cap to draw over one's ears at night will save a snuffle in the morning.

It was almost dusk when "my pal and me" took the horse from the cart and prepared for the evening meal, close to the surf-beaten shores of the willows, that beach where, in summer, young women campers take ankle baths in the waves.

We soon had a blazing fire, and on the coals a broad fryingpan well lined with bacon grease. It does not do to be too epicurean in camp, but a dish of browned onions does most nobly garnish a broiled steak, and, by the beard of the prophet! inspires a gentle craving for the red coin of the country.

"Worthy descendant of Commins the great of the sea girt Tramore," I said, "mark you yon gaunt shadow. It is a coyote, Francis, and he sniffs that steak which, in the reposeful content of a plenteous dinner, we have forgotten to tree." And as we strung it up the sly robber gave a prolonged howl and bark as he scampered off, and cursed us right roundly in the coyote dialect. Lulled by the soothing sob of the sea, which, in a sort of runic rhyme, kept time with the snoring of one of the party, we slept by the great camp fire, for wood is plenty and easy to procure in those latitudes.

But he who would shoot the duck must be up betimes, so we had our stone bottles in the embers long before aurora of the rosy fingers trifled with the gates of the dawn. A raw egg with a dash of vinegar salt and pepper is a most excellent stomachic for an early riser. Then, perhaps, though it sounds sinful, about half a pannikin of water stoutly laced with smoky Scotch does much to mellow the beginning of the day.

As the eastern horizon was barred out by the big mountain,

FORWARD CAST BY W. D. MANSFIELD
Who has the world's record for fly-casting

we could detect only in the zenith the gray hand of morning. Then we were sitting by the pond, well hidden by the ledge, with our decoys bobbing about in the most natural and guileless manner ten yards ahead of us. The whistling rush of the first flight keys up the duck hunter finely. Too dark to hold on those rapid, ghost-like visions, he bobs hither and thither, not daring to possibly mar the entire sport of the morning by a useless and ineffectual shot. So the rule prevails, and it is a good one, not to shoot as long as you can see the flash of your gun or, in other words, to wait until the morning light is broad and clear.

Whist! whist! and a noble pack of mallard are upon us. I see the muzzle of Frank's gun on the other shore of the pond, and just as the birds are circling down to make a companionable meal with our decoys, we let them have it. Again before they can clear the pond, we give them the other barrels, and mark the result of six ounces of No. 6 shot, so quickly and honestly distributed. Only three birds, and one only winged, so I give him the coup, as he is fluttering toward the bank. No time to collect our birds now, for here comes a brace of "cans," greasy and delicious rascals, bent on some fresh weeds for breakfast. They steer my way, and holding well ahead, I let go at the drake and make a clean miss. Whew! I had hoped to catch them both in the same shot, but Frank has tumbled one, and delivered an ineffectual barrel at the other as it speeds seaward. We have barely time to reload, ere that "can" again returns, faithful fellow, seeking his mate. This time I am more fortunate, and the true lover's soul is sped to that duck's paradise where the close season lasts through all eternity.

A flock of green winged teal pelt in upon us like rocks, and we give them a hot reception. Only one, to four barrels. St. Hubert, what big spaces lie about a flock of teal. I spy a solitary mallard hurrying inland on some important business. He is high up and would be called well out of range. But we have not had a shot for ten minutes, so I hold four feet ahead of him, and whack an ounce of No. 5 shot after him. He stops, and with neck outstretched points upward in a straight line. Then there is a pause for a second, and he falls like a stone thirty yards behind me. Curiosity to note the reason for this strange proceeding leads me to retrieve him at once. There is but one wound on him, a single pellet had passed through the eye, and sent him rocketing like a pheasant. I treasure this experience as a proof that there is always a chance to score even in the longest shots. I get back to my blind in time to pay my compliments to a flock of widgeon, five of which drop to our united fire. And now the birds come in slower, and we grow miserly in dealing with them. No more wild shots, nothing but the dead sure things will tempt us. Up rises the bold glowing sun over the crest of Tamalpais, and our sport is over. How looks the bag? Thirty birds to our two guns—not a hoggish bag, but quite enough for one morning. And what a breakfast. A brace of cold baked quail, which have been stuffed with forcemeat and mushrooms, lamb chops on the coals, a panful of onions and potatoes fried together, and a bottle of dry fragrant sauterne to prepare the palate for a generous cup of black coffee and an unctuous, gum-tickling cigar. Peace be to the shades of our victims. Their plump bodies make a pleasing picutre surveyed through the smoke of the weed of Cuba.

James Knox Taylor, recently appointed Supervising Architect of the Treasury, is a native of Illinois and about forty years of age. He began his career in St. Paul as an apprentice in the office of E. P. Bashford, later entering the Boston Polytechnic. Associated with Cass Gilbert, of St. Paul, he planned and built some of the finest buildings in that city. Mr. Taylor left St. Paul to become the partner of Mr. Boyden of Philadelphia, with whom he continued until he entered the Supervising Architect's office about four years ago.

PARLORS IN THE HOME OF THE OLYMPIC GUN CLUB

THE OLYMPIC GUN CLUB

Evolution of a Successful Shooting Organization.

The shooting fraternity in California is well represented by clubs in various parts of the State. Conspicuous among organizations of this character, is the Olympic Gun Club of this city. The reputation of this institution has, within a few years, extended to all parts of the United States. As a shooting organization it stands preeminent at the top in California. On its roll of membership are to be found the names of many of the most noted shots of the West. Within the past week wonderful records have been made by J. S. Fanning, a member of the club, who is now shooting in the far East.

The real strength of the Olympic Gun Club lies in the fact that it is something more than a mere trap-shooting organization. Through a magnificent club house and numerous entertainments, it appeals to its members on the social side of their natures. The social element includes many men prominent in business and professional life, who, while they never shoot, take a warm interest in the club, and follow closely the work of its shooting members before the traps.

The Olympic Gun Club has attained its present notable position through a mild process of evolution. It first came into existence as a part of the Olympic Athletic Club. The original shooting body in the Olympic Club was called the Olympic Trap Shooters. It was organized in June, 1894, and maintained an entire existence during that season. With the close of trap shooting for the year, interest in the club was suffered to wane and dissolution followed.

The Olympic Gun Club of to-day sprang from the ashes of the first failure. It was formally organized in March, 1895, and the following officers were elected at that time: President, Harlowe H. White, Secretary-Treasurer, S. G. Severn; Captain, Phil B. Bekeart; Executive Committee, M. C. Allen, H. C. Golcher and G. H. T. Jackson. During the trap season of 1895 regular club shoots were held monthly under the auspices of Captain P. B. Bekeart. The championship medal for the year was won by Clarence Naumann, still one of the club's cracks, and the second medal was captured by President White.

In the summer of 1895 members of the Olympic Gun Club conceived the idea that the interests of trap shooting would be greatly advanced through the organization of a State association of gun clubs. A meeting was promptly called and the result was the organization of the California Inanimate Target Association, which now includes gun clubs from every section of the State where the sport of trap shooting has gained a hold. The Inanimate Target Association was a success from the start. It is the largest purely shooting organization in the world, and enjoys the distinction of having held the biggest blue rock tournaments on record. The Olympic Gun Club was honored by the selection of M. C. Allen, one of its members, as first president of the State association. Mr. Allen has held the office ever since and his club has been otherwise prominent in the association. As the result of five tournaments, the Olympics have won in six-man team competition, the Overland Monthly trophy three times, and the club championship trophy twice. The Overland trophy is now the permanent property of the Olympics, and another victory will confer permanent ownership of the championship emblem.

The success of Olympic shooters has not been confined to State shoots. Otto Feuctner now wears a medal given him by the club as a reward for breaking 96 blue rocks out of 100. Another medal was presented to J. S. Fanning for the establishment of a coast record of 72 consecutive breaks. Clarence Haight is the present champion of the California Wing Club. Olympic members have also been prominently to the fore in State live bird shoots, and within a few weeks past J. S. Fanning has made in the East live bird scores which entitle him to rank with the leading experts of the country.

STATE CHAMPIONSHIP OLYMPIC GUN CLUB TEAM, STOCKTON MAY 31, 1896.

The organization of the Olympic Gun Club underwent a decided change immediately following the San Jose tournament of October, 1896. Up to that time the organization had been continued as a part of the Olympic Athletic Club. For various reasons it was deemed advisable to sever connections with the parent body and to establish the gun club as an entirely separate and distinct organization. This course was followed, and within thirty days the club had leased a handsomely appointed clubhouse at 1309 Van Ness avenue. Within a month the membership had increased from forty to over one hundred and fifty. The clubhouse became a center of shooting interest and activity, and prospered from the start. Trap shooting grounds were laid out at Ingleside, grounds which in matter of location and equipment are not excelled anywhere in the country. During the past year the club grounds have been the scene of many notable shooting events both at live birds and blue rocks. Even greater activity is promised for the season which is to open next spring and continue until the advent of game shooting in the fall.

Some idea of the beauties of the Olympic clubhouse may be gathered from the accompanying illustrations. The place is elegantly furnished and the parlors constitute one of the most attractive clubhouse interiors in the city. Opportunities for entertainment and social enjoyment are unlimited, and the entire establishment is pervaded by an atmosphere of sportsmanship and goodfellowship which constitutes its chief charm.

During the winter the club house will be the scene of entertainments of various characters. The first of the series was held last night and proved a great success. Card, billiard and pool tournaments are in prospect. A duck preserve was leased early in the season, and in course of time the club expects to have ground where the members can enjoy quail and deer hunting.

The progress of this club during the past year, has been little short of wonderful. It has proved a strong factor in the advancement of shooting interest, and seems destined to exercise a still stronger influence for good in the future. The present officers of the club are as follows: President, Harlow H. White; Recording and Corresponding Secretary, M. C. Allen; Financial Secretary, C. F. Grant; Treasurer, A. A. Borlini; Directors, W. J. Owens, Clarence Haight, E. T. Allen, C. W. Hibbard.

MERTON C. ALLEN.

TROPHIES WON BY OLYMPIC GUN CLUB TEAMS

NOTED DOGS

Antecedents and Achievements of Certain Aristocratic Canines.

Every sportsman knows how rich are the kennels of California in fine dogs. The several dog shows have revealed the resources of the State in that particular, and made known to the world the fact that we in this western region have as much reason to boast of possessing fine canine stock as to vaunt the ownership of the best breeds of horses. There is not space to detail here the history of the Dog in California, but only to mention the characteristics and descent of certain fine dogs represented on page 7.

Minnie E., the property of Mr. P. A. Williams, is a promising bitch, black and white in color—in this respect almost the counterpart of her sire, Emin Pasha. a dog known to all leashmen, and progenitor of many of the very best puppies now in the slips. Her dam was Valley Queen. Minnie E. has already achieved distinction by carrying off when only eight months old the first special prize, over all greyhound puppies, at the San Francisco Kennel Club's Bench Show this spring.

Imp. Woodcote Venom is the property of S. Christenson, and was sired by Amphion II., a full brother of Champion Grand Pride; dam Kit, one of the greatest producing dams in England. Woodcote Venom has achieved great distinction at the various bench shows since his arrival in California, and has defeated the best bull terriers in the west At the Oakland Bench Show the dog was given first place in the open class and was awarded the gold medal offered for the best bull terrier. At the San Francisco Show Woodcote Venom took the handsome cup offered by Dr. F. W. D'Evelyn for the best bull terrier, dog or bitch. He has also won first prizes at San Jose and Stockton. Besides, he has six winnings to his credit in England where he was shown as a yearling. The progeny of Woodcote Venom bid fair to become as famous as their noted sire.

A beautiful dog is Belle, an English setter, white, black and tan, with whose assistance Mr. F. W. Van Sicklen does his hunting. Belle is by Reed's Dick, and her dam was Coleman's imp. Flora, is about seven years old, and is the dam of Davis' Belle, and Rudolph's Dick R. She is an excellent shooting dog, of kind disposition and is highly prized by her owner. She was bred and trained by Victor Guerineau of Manzanita Station, Marin county.

Regloo, Jr., the property of Dr. W. R. Cluness, Jr., is by Regloo out of Victoria Alton, and was whelped December, 19, 1895. Though not yet two years old, he has been shown several times on the bench with the following record: 1st, puppy, Stockton, 1896; 1st, novice, San Jose, 1897; 2d, open, San Jose, 1897; special, best California bred, San Jose, 1897; 1st, open, Oakland, 1897. He is a deep orange color with black and white markings, stand 34½ inches at the shoulders, and weighs 186 pounds.

Champion Silver Plate has a most remarkable series of winnings, and is pronounced the most typical English setter bred on the Pacific Slope. Her owner is Sam'l F. Hughes, who has every reason to be proud of her record. Champion Silver Plate is lemon and white in marking, and is bred on excellent blood lines—sire Fred W., dam Champion Countess Noble. She was 1st, puppy, at Los Angeles in '93; won the Hermann Oelrichs gold medal in '96; 1st, open, Stockton, '96; 1st; Open, Oakland, '96; 1st, Challenge, at Sacramento, San Jose and Stockton, '97—a most enviable record, without considering her several winnings prior to '96 which were equally notable.

Saddle Bags is a typical pointer, an excellent shooting bitch of nice disposition. She was sired by Duke of Vernon, dam Hornell Bess, and was whelped in October, '91, and is the dam of the great Speedy. famous for her field trial runnings in Australia and New Zealand. Saddle

THE BILLIARD ROOM

Bags is the property of H. Alexander Colvin, is liver and white in color, and won the second prize at the P. K. C., 1896.

Defender is really a notable dog, and has been pronounced by no less an authority than the Amerecan Field by far the best terrier on the bench. He is the property of Dr. Fred W. D'Evelyn, is a splendid worker, combining the best blood of the most noted winning terriers for many generations. Among his winnings are 1st, puppy, Crystal Palace, London, '96; 2d, open, Crystal Palace; 3d, limit, Birmingham, '95; 3d, open, and 1st, novice, Oakland, '96. Defender was whelped December, '94—sire Russley Sting, dam Gyp.

A splendid specimen of the Irish water spaniel is Dan C., the property of Joseph W. Salz, who imported him from Canada. His sire was Musha, dam Shellia, and he is pronounced by the best judges one of the finest dogs of his class in America. Dan C. has quite a considerable list of winnings both in Canada and in California, including first in special S. F. K. C. Bench Show, '97.

George P. won the greatest Derby ever held on the Pacific Coast, being victorious over Countess Noble, Jim P., Doc P., Johanna and many others, equally well known. He is the property of Mr. J. Downey Harvey, and is a very high class dog. George P. comes of excellent stock, imported from Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, and bred by W. R. Pape, the famous gunmaker. His sire is Old Black Joe, dam Black Bess, and in addition to his victory at the great P. C. Field Trials in '93, was second in F. T. class S. F. K. C., '97—a decidedly brilliant record.

In the field trials of 1895 there was a prolonged contest over the merits of Nimrod and Alex. Hamilton's Glenbeigh Jr. and finally, precedence was given the former. The points of the two dogs diverged so slightly that the decision was not rendered until two hours after the heat, and the general opinion was that a tie would have worked no injustice to either dog. Glenbeigh Jr., sire Glenbeigh, dam Lady Max, is a very stylish, fresh rangy pointer of the heavy weight class, and is among the "top notchers" of the coast among Field Trial dogs. He came second in the trials of '95 and '96 in San Francisco, and scored second also in the Pacific Coast Trials of '95, a most excellent record.

Glenbeigh is the property of Howard Vernon, and is a very high class Field Trial dog. He is exceptionally fast, stylish, a great ranger, quite biddable and possesses a good nose and lots of bird sense. Though not a bench winner, Glenbeigh has achieved distinction at field trials, having won the All Age Stake at the Pacific Coost Trials at Salinas in '93, came second in the All Age Stake, Kennel Club Trials in '92, and first in Prize Pointer Puppy Stakes, National Field Trials in '91. Glenbeigh is by Grouse V., dam Rita.

One of the most interesting features of the Country Club preserves is the Cocker Kennel, the property of that enthusiastic sportsman, Mr. Frederick R. Webster. The prowess of Mr. Webster at the traps is well known, and it is highly appropriate that he should appreciate the dog. This feeling he has evinced by the erection at the club of a magnificent kennel which is now populated by about forty cockers. At the head of this array is King Bee, sire Robin, dam Woodstock Nellie, both decendants of Famous Obo, through Champion Obo and Obo Jr. Right worthily does King Bee bear himself among his distinguished descendants, for the majority of the occupants of the kennel are his progeny—a living testimonial of his greatness as a sire and progenitor. As to the appearance of this distinguished cocker, a glance at page 7 shows King Bee as he appears in life.

NOTE.—For the excellent photographs of the dogs on page 10 we are indebted to the Marceau Studio and the Bushnell Studio.

THE VERONA KENNELS

A Veritable Paradise for Dogs in Mill Valley.

There are possibly larger kennels in the United States than the "Verona," but there are certainly none that are better equipped and more carefully appointed. These kennels are situated about forty miles from San Francisco, on the Niles division of the S. P. railroad, and are owned by Mrs. Phœbe Hearst and Mr. J. E. de Ruyter. It is not necessary to affirm that the kennels are not professional in in any sense of the word, and the dogs are never sold for profit. Mrs. Hearst has a fancy for thoroughbred dogs, and Mr. de Ruyter is an enthusiastic sportsman.

It's a good thing to be a canine at the Verona kennels. The house itself is a large, two-story affair, built expressly for the harboring of blood. The floor is of asphalt, and the walls, to the height of some three or four feet, are coated with the same substance. There is no speck or trace of dirtiness visible, and, if the biblical proverb be true, Verona is the godliets of localities. Each dog has his own particular and especial kennel, which he knows and affects, never, under any circumstances, making the mistake of entering that of his neighbor. He sleeps upon a canvas bed, four inches above the asphalt, which can be removed whenever the kennels are washed. The dogs are not fed in their kennels, but enjoy the privilege of a big dining-room, semi-circular in form, and with a radius of nearly twenty feet. The floor here is asphalt, as well, and is provided with drains. Besides this, one is shown the hospital, the drug-room, the bath-room and the quarantine-room, where the distemper cases are "isolated." There is even a convalescing-room, flooded with sunlight and especially warmed. Around the house are the yards, each one provided with a bath, where, during the day, the setters, pointers and collies, that make up the population of the kennels, live and have their being.

The younger dogs are exercised and broken to the gun, in what is called the exercising yard, close by. It is great sport for the youngsters, and a dog's first day in the "yard" must be, from a canine point of view, as notable an event as a boy's first day at school. There are three broods of quail in the yard, which is some 150 feet square and thickly covered with brush. These quail are used chiefly to train the puppies, and accustom them to the game.

The great dog of the Verona Kennels, and the head of what is called the English Setter department, is known almost the world round, wherever game is shot over dogs. His name is Iroquois Chief, and as yet is comparatively young. His pedigree, however, is longer than many a continental baron's. Countess K. is another famous English setter almost as well known as the Chief. She is the pet of the place and alone of all the dogs has the freedom of the house. Iroquois Chief is by Antonio out of Can Can, who was by Count Noble out of Belle Lloyd, who was a daughter of the great Gladstone. Antonio himself was a descendant of Gladstone through the bitch Juno, so that the Chief's lineage is beyond fear and beyond reproach. Every one of five of his sires—bar two—have been winners in field trials, and Iroquois Chief himself won the Monongahela All-Age Cup last year.

SOME NOTABLE HUNTING DOGS. WICKLOW, FLORA, FLOSS AND ALEX C.

Countess K. is by Dan Gladstone (Gladstone–Sue) out of Flosine, by Carl R. (Leicester–Dart). She won third place in the Pacific Coast field trials, and second place in this year's field trial at the San Francisco Show.

The Scotch collies are another feature of the kennels, but as yet their breeding has not been of long enough duration to attain such splendid results as in the case of the setters. Champion St. Claire Laddie is the head of the stud, and was bred by the celebrated fancier Lieutenant Robert Peel of England. With such a start and with such favorable conditions of soil, climate and financial backing, there seems to be nothing in the way of the realization of the hopes of the owners of the Verona Kennels, i. e., to make their establishment finest of its kind outside of Europe.

THE VERONA KENNELS

---

The shawl of shawls belongs to the Duchess of Northumberland. It formerly belonged to Charles X, of France, and was manufactured entirely from the skins of Persian cats. Many thousands of cats' skins were utilize, and the weaving occupied some years. The shawl measures eight yards square, but is so fine that it can be compressed into the space of a large coffee-cup.

---

At the invitation of the Sultan, the New York Herald has sent a commission to Turkey to investigate the condition of the Armenian Christians. The commission consists of Rev. Dr. Hepworth, who writes the sermons for the Herald's Sunday issue, and an assistant familiar with the East, and they are to have the support and solicitude of the Sultan.

---

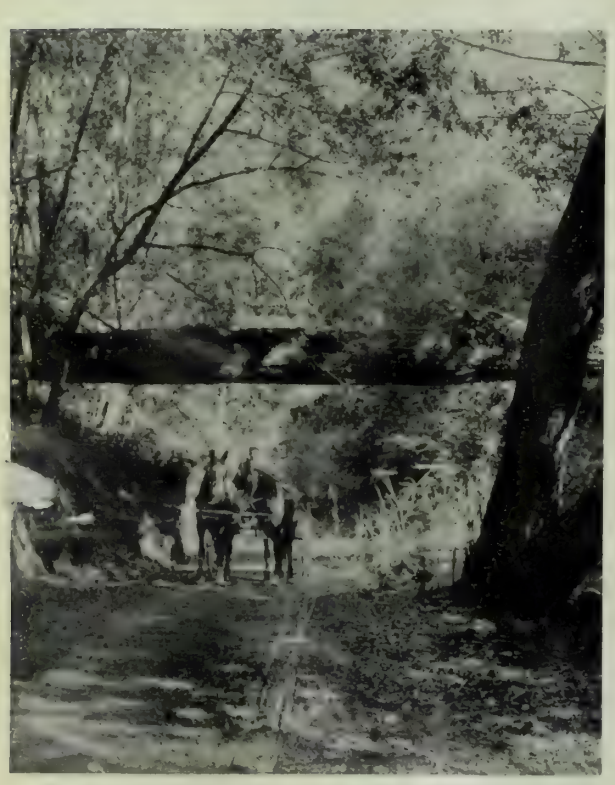
Asparagus causes asthma, according to Dr. Deschamps of Paris, and must be added to the list, that contains roses, musk, tea, ipecacuanha, cats, fried fish, oats, malt and rice dust, feathers, and wool.

---

M. Zola is embarrassed in the trivial details of his daily life by a host of superstitious fears and a belief in good and evil omens. While most people regard thirteen as unlucky, to M. Zola seventeen, or any combination of figures that foots up to that amount, is filled with dire portent.

A Group of Important Puppies

Hunting Duck on the Point Reyes Marshes



On the Road through Bear Valley

A Duck Hunter

Ths Club's Coast Line

Feeding Time at the Kennels

THE DOMAIN OF

Photos by

Dogs and Game

or Quail

A Successful Shot

The Country Clubhouse

President Oxnard and Party Starting on a Hunt

HE COUNTRY CLUB

rles Weidner

A GROUP OF FAMOUS DOGS

See page 6

1. Minnie E. 2. Champion Glenbeigh. 3. Imp. Woodcote Venom. 4. Champion Silver Plate. 5. Glenbeigh Jr. 6. Regloo Jr. 7. George P. 8. Defender. 9. Saddle Bags. 10. King Bee. 11. Dan C. 12. Belle.

Photos by Marceau, and Bushnell

Pensioners Sunning Themselves

The Men's Dining Room

The New Laundry, installed by the Troy Laundry Machinery Co

The Mysteries of the Cuisine

An Impression of the Buildings

The Old Ladies' Dining

Handling the Mince Pies

THANKSGIVING AT THE ALMSHOUSE

FLY-CASTING

A Sport That Requires Accuracy, Delicacy and Grace.

There is no sport known that requires greater accuracy, finer delicacy and more perfect grace, than the casting flies. The expert flycaster is to the ordinary fisherman, what Ysaye is to the county-fair fiddler. The object to be obtained, is the deception of any unusually alert, wary, timid and sensitive fish. The tackle now provided by the best sporting firms of the country, is of an almost gossamer fineness and lightness, the best long-distance casters, use a rod eleven feet in length and weighing about six ounces. The line is braided silk, double tapered, and the gut leader between seven and nine feet long. To handle tackle such as this, a man must, of necessity, be skillful. There is no such thing as a successful bungler in trout fishing. The clumsy man is pre-ordained, by the nature of things, to a light creel. The clever, highly-trained angler, who has perfect command over rod and reel, and who can drop a fly on the surface of a pool fifty feet away, without splashing, and can make the fly, and not the line, first reach the water, will catch trout in any country of the world.

There are no hard and fast rules as to the manner of casting a fly. The best local flycasters each have different methods. Some, there are, who favor a whole arm and over-head cast; the body moving but very little from the perpendicular. Others cling to a side cast, with a forearm and wrist movement. However, the champion long-distance caster of the world, Mr. Mansfield, of this city, puts his whole body into play, when casting or retrieving the fly. The best discription of Mr. Mansfield's method, would fall short of the impression conveyed by the snap-shot photograph of him, in action, as published in this issue. The power and energy of his style is splendid. In casting this thread of line and pinch of down, Mr. Mansfield uses the same energy as Hickock, of Yale, might have displayed in his best days of putting the shot. It is small wonder he holds the world's record. All flycasters have, of course, their own favorite theories, but hold in common with Mr. Mansfield that in the forward cast the rod is held perfectly horizontal, to avoid friction of the line against the guides, and in the back cast, the tip of the rod is never lower that an angle of forty-five degrees.

BACK CAST BY W. D. MANSFIELD

A flycaster may be judged from three points of view. He may cast merely for length, or for distance and accuracy, or, if he be a consummate master of his art—for it is no less—he may cast for accuracy and delicacy. In distance casting, the tackle employed has already been noticed. When casting for distance and accuracy, in a competition, buoys are fixed at 50, 55 and 60 feet from a platform on which the casters stand, and as long as a man drops his fly nearer to one of these buoys than the other competitors, nothing more is demanded of him. He may cast in a manner that would frighten a grampus or fail to deceive a bullhead.

So long as delicacy is not a factor in casting competitions, they are of little benefit to the angler. What is called "dry fly casting" for accuracy and delicacy is the contest that makes the most imperative demands upon the angler's skill, demands that include strength of wrist and arm, nicety in judgment of distance, calculations for wind, and, above all, exactness and perfect control of the muscles of the wrist and hand. The tackle is a 5½ oz. rod, light tapered line and gut leaders nine feet in length. When casting in this event the expert stands balanced and naturally on both feet, though sometimes, especially in the case of long forward cast, the feet are spread and a position assumed not unlike that of a fencer "lunging." Little by little he lengthens his cast, when his fly touches the water it does so before the line, falling as lightly as a falling thistledown. Should he allow his fly to splash or his line to touch the water so many points are counted against him. In "retrieving," that is in drawing the fly from the water, there must be no ripple made, the fly must rise as would a natural fly, without a splash, otherwise the caster is again penalized. To retrieve properly the expert fly fisherman gently lifts his tip before swinging back his rod, drawing rather than snapping his fly towards him. To cause the fly to touch the water before the line he will, if you observe him closely, raise his tip just before the fly touches the surface. It is the most difficult feat in fly fishing to do this at precisely the right moment and with precisely enough action. In order that the fly may strike the water gently and without a splash the caster, if he knows his art, never aims directly at the spot where he wishes his fly to alight, but rather a yard or so over it, allowing the bit of feather to float down of its own weight.

DR. E. N. LOWRY

Take Care

of yourself or some day you will have to be cared for. You must get out of this climate to a more equable one occasionally, to keep yourself well. Byron Hot Springs offers the best of the Flycasters' Club chance imaginable—in the foothills, out of the fog, mist and wind. There you will find the best Mineral Springs on the Coast. Excellent for blood, skin and stomach troubles—for external and internal use and without a rival.

H. G. GOLCHER

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars—free.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.
Sold by druggists, 75c.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

The Royal is the highest grade baking powder known. Actual tests show it goes one-third further than any other brand.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

THE
Old Government
THE PERFECTION OF WHISKY
MATURED AND BOTTLED IN BOND
THE U.S. GOVERNMENT
guarantees the age and purity
We guarantee the quality unexcelled
FOR SALE BY PRINCIPAL DEALERS.
William Wolff & Co.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
DISTRIBUTORS.

WELCOME
AT SANTA CLAUS'
NEW HOME
The Emporium and Golden Rule Bazaar
San Francisco, Calif.
Grandest Christmas Displays You've Ever Seen.

Referee's Sale

Wednesday, Dec. 15th

At 12 o'clock m.

At the Salesrooms of G. H. Umbsen & Co.
14 MONTGOMERY ST.

We will sell by order of Gustave H. Umbsen, Referee of the Estate of Thomas Mootry Jr., three properties of the Estate, as follows:

First — S. W. corner of Hayes and Gough streets; improvements consist of stores, flats, and houses, bringing in a total monthly rental of $278; lot 65x120 feet, fronting on three streets

Second — S. E. corner of Page and Octavia streets; improvements bringing in a total monthly rental of $67; lot 27:6x120 feet to Hickory avenue; three frontages.

Third—S. W. corner of Bay and Dupont streets; improvements renting for $57 per month; lot 89:6x113 feet.

For further particulars, catalogues, etc., inquire at the office of G. H. UMBSEN & CO., Auctioneers, 14 Montgomery street.

BREEN BROS.
COAL MERCHANTS
128 O'Farrell St., cor. Powell
Dealers in Wood and Charcoal
Genuine Wellington Coal a Specialty
Orders Promptly Delivered Telephone Red 1581

United States Laundry
Office 1004 Market St.
TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

HOFFMAN CAFE
W. J. SULLIVAN, Proprietor.
LUNCH, GRILL AND WINE ROOMS
Half a block below Palace Hotel, S. F.
FINE GOODS A SPECIALTY
Merchants' Hot Lunch from 11 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. An extra spread served on all holidays. Merchants' Lunch served in Ladies' Cafe and Grill, 11 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. Oysters, English chops, steaks, and all delicacies a specialty.
Private apartments for ladies or ladies with escorts
FINEST CAFE IN AMERICA
Open all night.

Ernst H. Ludwig
CATERER
Supplies Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice
Also Terrapin, Entrees, Luncheons and Dinners, Ice Cream, Cake, etc.
NO. 122 GEARY STREET
Telephone Grant 119

REMOVAL!
THE BUSINESS OFFICE
OF THE
DAILY REPORT
Has been moved from 238 Montgomery Street, to
630 MARKET ST.
Near Kearny

Thoroughbred Sale!
Wednesday, Dec. 8th
YEARLINGS
BY THE GREAT
MORELLO
Property of I. B. CHASE, ESQ.
At 12:30 p.m. at grounds of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club, Ingleside.
For Catalogues, apply to
KILLIP & CO.
Livestock Auctioneers, 11 Montgomery St., S. F.

BAJA CALIFORNIA
DAMIANA BITTERS
"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular)
NABER, ALPS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention
A QUIET HOME
CENTRALLY LOCATED
OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

The Hotel Richelieu
N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.
PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO
HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE NAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 POST ST.

Suppose You Had An Aeolian!

Suppose yon could have in your home an orchestra and when you wanted music you had but to make a request and it would be immediately complied with. Suppose, too (as long as we are only supposing it does not matter how improbable we are), that this orchestra could play any piece of music ever composed without waiting to study or practice it. If you wanted a programme of operatic music you had only to mention the particular selections you wished to hear and they would be promptly rendered.

Suppose you had some friends spending the evening and wished to dance. Your orchestra could play waltzes, lancers, two-steps and polkas, with such perfect time and rythm that the pleasures of dancing would be immeasurably increased. Suppose you were alone and your mood called for some particular piece—some old-time favorite—very likely you would have your own conception of the manner in which it should be played. Suppose you found that you could conduct this remarkable orchestra yourself—direct its playing according to your own ideas and wishes.

And, finally, suppose the playing of this orchestra was exceptionally fine—so good, indeed, that great musicians, such as Paderewski, De Reszke, Nordica, Campanini and others equally as famous had hired it to entertain them with its playing; so good that people of wealth and culture everywhere sought it for their homes—people with means sufficient to enable them to enjoy all that is best in art and music and all the pleasures and recreations that money can purchase.

Suppose we tell you that you can have this orchestra in your home; that you can have music at any or all times, and that you can, yourself, play any piece of music ever composed, even if you, literally, "cannot tell one note from another."

The possession of an AEOLIAN will do all this. It will do infinitely more—it will entertain and instruct every member of the family, from the youngest to the oldest. Each can play it for himself or herself.

It will bring into the home music never performed except by large and well-drilled orchestras. It will familiarize you with all the great works of the old masters, and enable you to keep in touch with and enjoy the best music of the day. It is the greatest of all musical educators and the most practical of all home instruments. You can purchase a good AEOLIAN for $75 This instrument is the Princess. We publish a special catalogue of it. Other styles up to $750. Aeolian Orchestrelles from $1500 to $2500. Aeolian Pipe Organs and Pipe Orchestras from $2500 upwards.

KOHLER & CHASE, 28 and 30 O'Farrell street, Saa Francisco, sole agents for the Pacific States.

Saves Time, Money, and Temper!

MADE IN CALIFORNIA!

SEND FOR SAMPLE

Office, 307 Sacramento St., San Francisco

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY

Price 25 Cents

DR. PARKER'S COUGH CURE

One dose will stop a cough—it never fails!

ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR IT

DEER AND DUCK CLUBS

A Brief Account of the Tamalpais and Teal Clubs.

About ten years ago, when Mr. Throgmorton was in possession of the land that extends from Richardson's bay to the ocean, to shoot a quail without permission upon this tract, was considered a high crime and misdemeanor. There was no railroad to Mill Valley then, and deer were shot in the swamp below the house of Roger McGee. Now the Tamalpais Sporting Club has leased the big ranch, and has made out of it an ideal shooting and fishing preserve. To tell an eastern man that within an hour's journey of San Francisco he could shoot wild deer, would astonish him not a little. Yet such is the case. Nor is it necessary to travel to the slopes of the Tamalpais mountains to accomplish this feat. Deer are shot in the gulches to the southward, and have been seen even within the city limits of Sausalito.

John Berger is now president of the club, whose membership does not exceed fifty. There is no attempt at display, and all the funds of the association are devoted to the preservation of game and fish. A pond, fed from the stream that takes its rise in a mountain gorge, is positively the most "sporty" piece of water in the State. In high tides grilse can make their way into this pond, and thus it gives both winter and summer fishing. Steelheads of over ten pounds have been taken in this most productive sheet of water. There is not much "sporty" fishing to be had there, but the patient plodder, at almost any season of the year, may rely upon a fair basket.

The shooting of quail over these preserves is always good in the season. It is hard work, for the hillsides are steep, and when the birds are at all wild, and must be followed from one canyon to another, the hunter who wants to make a big bag, must be sound of wind and sure of foot. With the exception of the pond by the willows on the northeast of the preserve, there is not much duck shooting to be looked for. Deer and quail are really the staple of the Tamalpais Club.

One of the oldest, and certainly the best managed duck shooting clubs in the vicinity of San Francisco is the Teal Club on the Suisun marshes. The officers of the club this year are Charles Josselyn, president; Downey Harvey, Herman Oelrichs, Fred Webster, Aleck Hamilton, Fred Sharon and Baron Von Shroeder. The Teal Club has purchased the 1250 acres on which it shoots, and is therefore clear of all law suits regarding trespass, etc.

The members have spent over $25,000 in making ponds and canals and planting the wild celery, so dear to the canvasback. The club's station is the Drawbridge, Suisun Marshes, and the clubhouse formally stood close by this drawbridge. Recently, however, it has been moved further into the marsh, and considerale money has been expended in making it comfortable. This club has a very efficient staff of keepers, who lighten the burden of getting into the blinds before daybreak. Canals are cut from pond to pond, and after a substantial breakfast, seated in a light canoe, the hunter is poled by the keeper to his destination. The birds are always flying at the Teal Club, and the average bag is twenty-five birds to the gun.

DAN O'CONNELL.

A Great Institution.

The development of home industries is today deemed of all other considerations the most important for the welfare of this State, and it has become the duty of everyone who can contribute to their extension to exert himself to the utmost. For its age there is no commonwealth in the Union that can show greater progress in the art of literature and the mechanical processes allied thereto than California. Amongst the concerns engaged in the latter field, none is of more importance than the American Type Founders Company, whose extensive works are equipped with the highest grade of machines used in modern type foundries, its offices and show-rooms being at 403-4 Sansome street, in this city. The type now used for the purposes of this journal was recently supplied by that company, and is made by it from the celebrated copper alloy metal, which is unsurpassed for durability and perfection of finish. Readers of this paper will doubtless have noticed the greatly improved appearance of the Wave during the last couple of months, a result that has been obtained by the use of an improved quality of paper and the clear and elegant type furnished by the American Type Founders Company. Essentially a home industry concern, the largest of the kind on the coast, employing upwards of 100 hands, and enjoying every facility for transacting its business to the best advantage, it is in a position to fill the orders of its customers in a manner calculated to afford entire satisfaction.

Splendid Array of Artistic Beauty.

One of the daintiest effects shown this year in calendars is that of the California wildflowers in colors. This was brought out exclusively by Cooper & Co., the Market-street stationers, who have made an extra effort this year, and have succeeded in getting together the largest variety of cards and calendars that have ever been shown on the coast. All the leading publishers of the East are well represented, and some very elaborate as well as simple and delicate designs are mingled together, making an array of artistic beauty seldom seen.

The music of Huber's Del Monte Orchestra adds greatly to the success of all entertainments. Telephone, care of Benjamin Curtaz, Main 1247.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents
Sold only at 102 Eddy street

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send, free of charge, to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

Fine Display of Art Goods.

S. & G. Gump, 113 Geary street, have just begun to show their European importations for this season, and invite their patrons and the public to view the many fine and interesting noveltses received and unpacked so far.

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles. Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. For particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

Among the many great Financial Corporations on the Pacific Coast, none rank higher than the

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.

Its Agents are found throughout America, and its Record for Prompt and Equitable Settlement of All Honest Losses is Firmly Established

D. J. STAPLES, President — WM. J. DUTTON, Vice-President — B. FAYMONVILLE, 2d V.-Pres., Sec'y
J. B. LEVISON, Marine Sec'y — LOUIS WEINMANN, Asst. Sec'y — STEPHEN D. IVES, General Agent

PIPER HEIDSIECK PLUG TOBACCO

CHAMPAGNE FLAVOR

Be sure to get the ENLARGED

New Five Cent Piece

(The size of the five-cent piece of Piper Heidsieck Tobacco has been enlarged forty per cent. Reduced cost of production permits this increase—quality and flavor better than ever.)

SATISFACTORY TO THE EYE AND EAR

BYRON MAUZY PIANOS
308-314 POST ST.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

My principal thought, Diary dear, since Thanksgiving has been—what a marvelous escape we had on that momentous occasion. We were, luckily, so near the entrance that our exit was merely a matter of a moment. But the others! I can hardly bear to think of how awful it might have been—what a tragedy was narrowly averted. Some of the girls were panic stricken. Poor Helen Thomas had hysterics. Mrs. Selfridge fainted and had to be carried out. Genevieve Goad had a very narrow escape, but her escort, with true chivalry, held up his arms and kept the weight of the boards from falling on her. The lads looked, as they tumbled through the roof, like peanuts falling out of an overloaded bag. From that moment our interest in the game ceased. O! Diary dear, it was a shocking walk over, and I almost felt like discarding the blue and gold. Arthur, too, is quite disgusted, and says the boys had better devote their time to croquet and challenge the members of the Old Ladies' Home to a game. I wish the boys minded defeat more, but they seem to applaud themselves for bearing it so philosophically. Poor Mrs. Atherton is still laid up from her injuries, and is dreadfully cut up and bruised—some wretched panic-stricken creatures threw her off her feet against the bench in front. But it is best not to dwell upon it.

Thanksgiving this year was fraught with sorrow for many of us. Poor Mamie Polhemus returned from the game to meet death on the doorstep. Her mother and father had driven out to order flowers for her tea, and on the way home, in the carriage, poor Mr. Polhemus breathed his last. It was doubly sad when one thinks of all her pleasant anticipations so cruelly nipped in the bud. It made me miserable, and then to see in some of the papers reports of her tea which never took place, side by side with the death notice of her father.

But enough of the sad side of life, let us once more return to our frivolities. On Saturday, of course, I received at Helen Thornton's tea, and had a capital time. Mrs. Thornton looked so stunning in grey taffeta, and her sister, Mrs. McLean Martin, looked splendid in black and white. Helen wore an exquisite frock, a combination of white and pink. There were no furbelows about the tea. Few decorations and no music, and yet we all agreed that it was essentially smart in every particular. The dinner was, generally, conceded to have been the prettiest yet given. The table was covered with baby roses, which were scattered over the cloth, and intertwined with broad bands of satin ribbon. I enjoyed every moment of it. The men were awfully nice. Mr. Hussey particularly so. You know he is on the Oregon, and left for the North on Thursday morning. We girls are simply prostrated with grief over his departure. He is quite handsome, has big baby blue eyes and a Vandyke beard—I always admire men with Vandyke beards, they would positively make a streetsweeper look distinguished. Then Mr. Hussey had a pretty way of complimenting all the girls—would speak odes to our eyebrows instead of writing them as was formerly the custom. Another man I regret is Mr. Magill of the Oregon; he is such a fine, manly chap, free from any kind of nonsense, the sort of fellow that is worth while cultivating. He would make a good friend, and tell you wholesome but nicely gilded home truths, in a way that would completely fascinate you. I am so sorry the Oregon has gone. I don't think we ever had a ship here whose officers were so thoroughly likable, so truly hospitable, and on Wednesday afternoon, when I went to say farewell, I nearly wept.

On Monday night I had my first experience of the Monday Evening Dancing Class. You know it met in Golden Gate Hall and we had a blissful time. I wore my loveliest frock, and found each of the debutantes was robed similarly. I never met a nicer lot of men—all clubmen, none of the extremely youthful order. I was so pleased, especially when I found myself just as popular as I have been with the boys. The Dibblees, the Taylor boys and Harry Stetson are among those I like best, and Nat Wilson is tremendously funny and keeps one in a perfect gale of merriment. Of the debutantes, who by the way were not particularly well represented, I noted Leontine Blakeman, Therese Morgan and Ethel Keeney looking especially well. Ethel wore a fetching frock of white silk and chiffon which was excellently cut. Therese Morgan wore a gown I should really like to have owned. It was of pink taffeta silk covered in some soft gold spangled gauze, and looked like the petals of a rose. Carrie Taylor looked very well in white. Mollie Thomas made an effective picture in black and Alice Hoffmann never looked more striking than she did in her gown of palest blue, charmingly fashioned. The supper was excellent and we girls did the fullest justice to it by going out several times during the evening. I really think the Monday Evenings are going to be my favorite parties. The lady patronesses are so agreeable, and every one seems to take the trouble to give us girls a good time. On Tuesday we all went to Mrs. Mountford Wilson's tea. It was strictly a ladies' gathering, not the shadow of a man appearing during the afternoon. The house was prettily decorated and the gowns worn by some of the matrons were perfectly lovely. Mrs. Mountford Wilson wore blue taffeta, Mrs. Russell a stunning costume of figured silk. Among the girls who received were the Carolans, Carrie Taylor, the Hopkins girls and Caro Crockett.

Then on Wednesday morning I went to a meeting of the King's Daughters. You know a few of us girls are to have a fair in about two weeks at the Century Club. Ethel Lincoln, Ella Morgan, Helen and Bertha Smith, Sophia Coleman, Eleanor Wood and a few others are getting it up. We are going to sell the things not at the usual "fair" rates, but really cheap, so expect to do well. It is for our beds at the Children's Hospital, you know. Another exhibition and sale of work I am tremendously interested in is the Lace Show that is now on and finishes this evening, in the Maple Room at the Palace. It is quite as fashionable as the Doll Show, and the goods for sale are really beautiful. Then there is an exhibition of old Japanese embroideries and pictures. A number of us girls are to pour tea on this occasion. On Wednesday evening I went to Mr. Greenway's dinner. It was a red affair and the table decorations were in excellent taste. There were about twenty-four of us chaperoned by Mrs. Ed Schmiedell. The Hopkins girls, Lillie Follis, Therese Morgan, Gertie Carroll, Mollie Thomas, Edith McBean and Frances Moore; the Dibblees, Gus Taylor, Harry Stetson, Larry Van Winkle, Southard Hoffmann and Harry Poett were the men. I sat next Harry Poett, and he took advantage of my debutantish stage to "jolly" me the whole time. He caused me at first a few qualms, but Arthur's education has stood me in good stead and by the end of the dinner I think I was a little bit ahead of him. He looks like a cherub, but it is not only his satanic majesty that assumes a pleasing shape.

This is rather an off week with regard to entertainments. The debutantes are now nearly all introduced successfully. Gertie Palmer is the last of those whose events are in the future. She is to come out on Saturday.

Poor Elise Clark, I fear, will not be able to make her appearance at all. She is so ill. I am sorry, as I am sure she would have been among the favorites. She has become a prey to eurasthenia, and has to be absolutely quiet.

Next Friday Ella Goodall is to give a luncheon in honor of Mrs. Whittier. Among her guests are Mrs. Knowles, Gertie Carroll, Ella and Therese Morgan and Mary Belle Gwin. On Saturday Mrs. Gaston Ashe, Mrs. Mark Requa and Mrs. Long and Mrs. George Palmer give teas. There is also the Junior Farce, so we shall have a full day of it. Nex week on Tuesday Helen Hopkins gives a debutantes' luncheon and Mrs. Chauncey Winslow a tea in honor of Mrs. Jones of Santa Monica. I hear that the Cinderella dances or the Wednights are to rival everything ever given. Few girls have thus far received cards. I hear they are chiefly for the benefit of the young married people. I am one of the lucky ones, however. The first is to take place December 22d. And so goodbye. Your own MISS CRICKET.

P. S.—I find, Diary dear, on looking over my confidences that I have omitted to mention one or two items of considerable interest. On Tuesday evening Mr. Patterson gave a very jolly theatre party and supper to Miss Leontine Blakeman. Several of us were invited and had a fine time. Mr. Patterson, you know, is a recent arrival from the East, and at present is stationed at the Presidio. He is an awfully nice chap and all of the girls are falling victims to his unnumbered charms. Like all nice men, however, he is about to leave for San Diego. I don't know what we debutantes will do now that our favorite men are all departing. The Terpsichoreans give their first party on Wednesday next at Native Sons' Hall. We expect to have the best kind of a time and hope to make this club the most popular of all. Mrs. Keeney, Mrs. Blakeman, Mrs. Alvord, Mrs. Thornton, Mrs. Carroll, Mrs. Joe Tobin, Mrs. Bruce and Mrs. Patton are the patronesses. They are all enthusiastic, and we have sent out 170 invitations, so shall have a nice number for dancing. The Presidio hops from now on will take place on the second and fourth Tuesdays of each month instead of on Fridays as has hitherto been the custom. Mrs. Wm. Whittier is to give a big dance on December 15th. Was I not stupid to forget so much, but I suppose sorrow over the departure of the Oregon has befuddled my brain.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Fries gave a rather unique entertainment recently. It was called a "Gala Night in Monte Carlo." The whole house was arranged to represent the famous gambling resort at Monaco, with the roulette tables rouge-et-noir games and others. It was a capital affair. About fifty people we invited. Miss Elsie Hecht, a sister of Mrs. Fries, was the guest of honor.

A Mystic Romance.

In Kentucky lived fair Jessie
Falconer, a matron ready
In the household and the garden,
F. F. V., slim-fingered, steady.

John Gray loved the handsome Jessie,
Pedagogue was he and haughty,
Read Mort d'Arthur, had ideals,
And he would do nothing naughty.

Brave was John as any hero,
Quick of eye and strong of muscle;
Fought an editor and panther
In a rough-and-tumble tussle.

Long he tried to ease the heartache,
Strove in vain against his mania,
Wed at last another woman
In the State of Pennsylvania.

Jessie heard the news with sadness,
But in sorrow did not languish,
Sold some land and built a mansion,
Wore fine clothes and checked her anguish.

In the choir unseen these lovers
Now with skill their gold harps handle,
While ideals round them glitter,
Here a lighthouse, there a candle.

Nashville Banner.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

TURKEY AT THE ALMSHOUSE

A Generous Thanksgiving Spread for the City's Pensioners.

Up in the pretty hills that gather the waters of the big reservoir, where the air is pungent from neighboring eucalyptus forests, the bright sun melted the mist very early on Thanksgiving morning and disclosed an animated scene. Little old fellows and old big fellows were hobbling about, washing faded coats that had seen handsome days, renovating scarfs and mending shirts. Little and big old ladies were busy with their mending and their prattle, and in the kitchens the bustle was incessant. Everyone looked cheerful and even merry. Among the 976 inmates of an institution in where, presumably, only the unsuccessful and resourceless seek asylum, it would, indeed, be strange if there were not many in whom cheerlessness and discontent had become chronic. Yet even these, if one might judge, were not altogether untouched by the gladness of the air and the infectious spirit of the holiday. And if the heart of the public pensioner is touched on Thanksgivingday that he is not homeless and shelterless, how much greater must be his satisfaction at the prospect of such a dinner as was in preparation. Rumor might indeed have had it that that there were but 100 turkey ready for roasting, when the fact is that there were exactly 135. It might also have been unknown, save to the initiated of the kitchens, that there was cranberry sauce galore; fresh vegetables were in abundance, and more mince pies than would be needed to shingle the roof of the big new barn that Capt. Reddy has in contemplation. But that a Thanksgiuing dinner and a good one was in progress—that knowledge was the property of every one of the 976, and one might read in the general air of pleased anticipation that beamed in the faces of the little and big old fellows and the little and big old ladies.

A YOUTHFUL SPORTSMAN
PHIL. BEKEART JR.

The old folks who had nothing to do were out in the sun, on the long benches that line the spacious gardens and open areas in the rear of the buildings. These outbuildings, by the way, have lately been taking on quite a different air under the energetic hand of Superintendent Reddy. The old laundry has been replaced by a fine new one with modern machinery made by the Troy Laundry Company. The walls are of stone quarried from the neighboring hills by the little old men. Give them time enough, and these veterans of every craft will build anything, and in utilizing their moderate labor, the Superintendent not only improves the institution at the smallest expense to the city, but furnishes much needed congenial occupation and recreation to the little old men.

You should see the fire brigade drill. Formerly there was little or no provision against a conflagration. Now, water in large mains is available, and a hose and hydrant system recently put in by Miller, Sloss & Scott, enabling the brigade to buckle with any ordinary fire. It would never do to trust those trembling fingers to make the important connection between hose and hydrant. But the trained brigade is prepared to do the coupling with the celerity of a squad of the fire department. One of the greatest dangers—a frightful calamity, indeed—has been arrested for all time at the Almshouse.

But to the dinner. It came, and it came speedily. There is a chef in each of the two big kitchens and his assistants are all little old men. The were cutting bread and filling pitchers of milk, and carrying mince pies from the pantries to the tables, where they were cut in generous slices. Then the tables were set and the steaming portions set at each place—a dinner fit for a king. And, by the way, I must not forget to mention that the William Cluff Company furnished all the groceries for the dinner.

The little old ladies were waiting outside of the ladies' dining-room—for the men eat in two other rooms. These old ladies are ladies—most of them, well bred and decorous, and they tried very hard to look non chalant, just as if the odor of cranberry and turkey was not already in their nostrils. Still, when the door was opened by a smiling domestic, there was very little time lost in filling up the room. Occasionally a member of the second table would get in by mistake and have to go out again, which she always did very courageously. By eleven o'clock the men's dining-room was filled, and by half-past the ladies were trying their teeth—efficient and otherwise—on wings and wishbones. It is a delightful room that ladies' dining-room. The tables are long and the chairs comfortable, and the sun pours in from the south and touches the thin gray hair on many a bowed head to crown of silver. Just a few in the infirmary could not come in, but, if one might judge from the laden trays that passed through from the kitchen, these poor woman who suffer under illness as well as indigence were not forgotten.

The Frog.

Once on a time and in a place
Conductive to malaria
There lived a member of the race
Of Rana Temporaria.
Or, more concisely still, a frog
Inhabited a certain bog.

A bull of Brobdingnagian size,
Too proud for condescension,
One morning chanced to cast his eyes
Upon the frog I mention,
And, being to the manner born,
Surveyed him with a lofty scorn.

Perceiving which, the bactrian's frame
With anger was inflated,
Till, growing larger, he became
Egregiously elated,
For inspiration's sudden spell
Had pointed out a way to swell.

"Ha! he!" he proudly cried, "a fig
For this, your mammoth torso!
For I shall shortly be as big
As you or even more so!"
To which magniloquential gush
His bullship simply answered "Tush!"

Alas! the frog's success was slight,
Which really was a wonder,
In view of how with all his might
He strove to grow rotunder;
And, standing patiently the while,
The bull displayed a quiet smile.

But ah, the frog tried once too oft,
And, doing so, he busted—
Whereat the bull discreetly coughed
And moved away disgusted.
As well he might, considering
The wretched taste that marked the thing.

—Guy Wetmore Carryl, in Life.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

$2,000.00

Maybe you won't like Schilling's Best tea and baking-powder.

Maybe you will. Money back if you don't.

The Christmas furniture here ready to be looked at when you are ready to look.

You are welcome to look.

Plenty of time to buy later.

Learn where to buy now.

All our prices are marked in plain figures — look at your leisure. Salesmen will not disturb you nor press you to buy.

We've just issued a little booklet about enameled beds. It's free. Call when passing, or drop a postal

California Furniture Company

(N. P. COLE & CO.)
117-123 Geary St.

METROPOLITAN TEMPLE

Next Thursday Evening, December 9th.

ONLY RECITAL IN SAN FRANCISCO

MR. ALFRED A. FARLAND

Banjo Virtuoso

In conjunction with Prof. Chas. F. Graeber's Banjo, Mandolin and Guitar Orchestra

RESERVED SEATS . . 75 CENTS

On sale at Kohler & Chase's Music House, 28 O'Farrell street, on and after Tuesday, Dec. 7th.

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bathhouses, billiard tables, brewers, bookbinders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.

TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST

BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

NEW BOOKS AND BOOK BARGAINS

AT

H. R. WILLIS'

107 MONTGOMERY STREET

TURF TOPICS

A Review of the Last Days at Oakland and the First at Ingleside.

A noticeable feature of the new season, is the poor representation obtained in the early stake events. On Thanksgiving-day, in the Athenian Club Cup, $1,500, 2¼ miles, at Oakland, only five starters came to the post. Wheel of Fortune, 105 lbs., ridden by H. Martin, annexing the plunder without much difficulty, in the slow time of 4:07. Marquise, 96 lbs., was second. Charlie Rief, 83 lbs., Wawona, 96 lbs. and Don Clarencia, 80 lbs., making no show in the running.

On the concluding day, at Oakland, the, Naglee Selling Stakes, $1,250, seven furlongs, brought six to the post, and furnished an exciting finish with Double Quick, 100 lbs., wedged in between the Burns & Waterhouse couple, Shasta Water, 94 lbs. and Colonel Wheeler, 99 lbs. The two last ran first and second, in the order named, with a short head only between them, and Atkin & Lottridge's horse the same distance behind Colonel Wheeler. The two St. Carlo fillies, St. Calatine, 112 lbs. and Tiger Lilly, 105 lbs., showed their heels to three others, in what could hardly be styled a race, at six furlongs, the strongly fancied Punter, 112 lbs., failing to travel in their company for the last half of the distance. In a five-furlong scramble for two-year-olds, Free Lady, 105 lbs., downed eleven others, of which Sir William, at the same weight, alone gave her any trouble.

The first fortnight at Oakland, produced an excellent attendance throughout, and on Thanksgiving-day it was said the numbers were the highest on record. The railway mismanagement of the crowd on the occasion at the ferries, is certainly entitled to the distinction of a record.

Monday last saw the renewal of the Ingleside meeting on a slightly heavy track and with Starter Caldwell instructed to dispense with the recall flag. The day's programme was promising as to class. Magnet was pulled out, although with a doubtful leg, and managed to get home, giving lumps of weight away to an indifferent lot. Fonsovannah once more scored a triumph over Morellito, this time in a mile at even weight, and Souffle, 106 lbs., got home just in front of McLight, 107 lbs., in a 1 1-16 mile race, Marquise struggling in gamely but a head behind the latter. The last mentioned good little mare looks jaded to what she was at the beginning of the season, and it was a sickening sight to see her flogged up to the barrier by the starter's assistant.

Tuesday was spoiled by fog and the running in some of the races was only partially visible. Wednesday showed a great improvement, and a good card was varied with a 1½ miles hurdle race, which Captain Piersal well ridden by Tim Murphy and served by his light weight and and good style of going took in good form, Our Climate, 137 lbs., of ten others being the only one to make a race with him. The Presidio Stakes, $1000, 1⅛ miles, with five runners only, was won somewhat easily by Shasta Water, though Horatio, 108 lbs., ran well and gamely. Sam Hildreth's George Lee, 105 lbs., won at seven furlongs in a pretty fair field of two-year-olds.

To-day the new steeplechase course is to be used for the first time and promises to be a source of sport during the winter.

BENEDICT.

FINANCE AND TRADE

Thursday Evening.

The prevailing tone in business circles is not by any means as buoyant as that of a month or so ago, but there is a good deal of quiet activity that will produce results when the rush to Alaska begins in the spring. The money market is fairly easy. Silver is strong locally at 59½, its firmness seeming to be due to short supplies; conditions, however, are highly speculative.

All descriptions of bonds command the highest prices known for years; the supply of first class material is giving out and becoming scarcer than ever. We note a sale of 5000 California Street Cable 5 per cent bonds at 115. Market Street Railway 5 per cents are in very good demand and scarce, though these bonds have attained their highest level and will probably be still dearer. Quite a lot of Spring Valley 4 per cents changed hands at 102¼. The most active securities have been those of the Southern Pacific R. R. S. P. of Arizona advanced from 100½ to 102½ during the week and it certainly looks at present as if they will go still higher. S. P. Branch also sold at an advance and are scarce.

In the stock section of the market Spring Valley Water is firm at 99⅝ bid. Gas holdings are barely steady. In Gas and Electric a sale at 95xd was recorded and more are offering at the same figure.

Nothing is doing in Bank shares of any description, though the firmness previously reported still continues.

Market Street R. R. shares still fluctuate between 51 and 52, sales having been made at the latter figure. We are told the earnings of the lines are very satisfactory and the stock looks like being very popular in future.

Alaska Packers drooped on rumors of a big block of stock being in the market. We can ascertain no real reason for the weakness and there will no doubt be an early recovery.

Sugar stocks have been selling at somewhat lower rates, owing to realization orders in anticipation of the impending meeting of Congress. A fluctuating market may be looked for while the annexation question is in debate, just as the course of the proceeding affects the public mind.

The Most Simple and Safe Remedy for a Cough or Throat Trouble is Brown's Bronchial Troches." They possess real merit.

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

CITY OF PARIS

DRY GOODS COMPANY

GLOVES! GLOVES!

Ladies' Two-Clasp Fine Kid Gloves, all shades, $1.00 pair

Ladies' Two-Clasp Pique Gloves, all shades, $1.00 pair

Ladies' One-Button Heavy English Walking Gloves, "Dent Cut," English Reds, $1.00 pair

Children's Two-Clasp Pique Emb'y Kid Gloves, $1.00 pair

Ladies' Fleece-Lined Kid Gloves, $1.00 and $1.25 pair

Children's Winter Gloves, 50c. and 85c. pair

PERFUMERIES

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| ROGER & GALLET | PINAUD'S | LUBIN'S | DELETTREZ |
| RIVERS' | SIMON | GUERLAIN | COUDRAY |
| RICHARD HUDNUT | DR. PIERRE | CROWN | FAY |

RIVERS' AND HUDNUT'S BY THE OUNCE BOTTLE

COUNTRY ORDERS SOLICITED AND PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO

PACIFIC COAST JOCKEY CLUB

INGLESIDE TRACK

Racing from Monday, November 29th, to Saturday, December 11th, inclusive

Five or more races daily, rain or shine

First race at 2 p.m.

S. P. R. R. Trains 12:45 and 1:15 p.m. daily. Leave Third-street station, stopping at Valencia street. Returning immediately after the last race.

Electric Car Lines. Kearny and Mission street cars every 3 minutes, direct to track without change. Fillmore-street cars transfer each way.

F. H. GREEN, Secretary. S. N. ANDROUS, President.

Baldwin Theatre

AL. HAYMAN & CO. (Inc.) . . Proprietors

Sunday Night. Last Performance

IN GAY NEW YORK

Monday, Dec. 6th. Limited Season. Big Productions

Italian Grand Opera Co.

Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday Evenings and Saturday Matinee. LA BOHEME

Thursday and Saturday Evenings. OTELLO

Week of Dec. 13th. "Aida," Manon Lescaut, etc.

Regular Baldwin Theatre Prices

Columbia Theatre

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers

Second Week

MR. LOUIS JAMES

| | |
|---|---|
| Monday and Friday Evenings | Othello |
| Tuesday and Saturday Evenings | Spartacus |
| Wednesday Evening | A Cavalier of France |
| Thursday and Sunday Evenings | Julius Cæsar |
| Saturday Matinee | Julius Cæsar |

Complete Scenic Productions. Regular Prices.

Coming, "A Milk White Flag."

Orpheum

Week beginning Monday, Dec. 7th

Direct from the Cirque Salamonski, Moscow, Russia

SIX PICHANIS SISTERS, The Most Sensational Lady Acrobats in the World

Direct from her Vienna triumphs, CZITA, the Phenomenal Gypsy Violin Virtuoso

PAULINETTA PIQUO, Champion Gymnasts

DE FILIPPIS, Eccentric Dancers

SERVAIS LE ROY, the Sensational Illusionist

VESUVIANO QUARTETTE, the Great Musical Success

STANLEY & JACKSON, OLCOTT & KENNY, O. K. SATO

Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House

MISS JENNIE KELLING Proprietress and Manager

To begin Monday, Dec. 6th

Superb Production of Planquette's Opera Comique

Rip Van Winkle

Cast includes Edwin Stevens, John L. Kelly, Thos. C. Leary, Robert Dunbar, Phil Branson, Tillie Salinger, Florence Wood, Lena Hall, Georgie Cooper, Little Claire Fox, Master Jack Robertson

Commencing Tuesday, Dec. 14th

Our Holiday Success MOTHER GOOSE

The Most Perfect Production ever presented

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

BELASCO & MAYER Lessees and Proprietors

MISS CRAIG Manager

Week of December 6, Sardou's Great Political Comedy Success

THE NOMINEE

First appearance of MR. FREDERICK PAULDING

Prices, 15c., 25c., 35c., 50c. Reserved

Matinee Saturday

Next, "Will She Divorce Him." Special Scenery!

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALLACE MORGAN Sole Lessee and Manager

Last four performances of On the Mississippi

Commencing Monday, Thursday and Saturday performances of the Great American Navy Drama, by Charles T. Vincent

"OLD GLORY"

A Story of "Our Boys" Blue Jackets in Chile

Thrilling Patriotic Situations, Great Spectacular Effects, introducing the U. S. S. "Baltimore," the Assassination Scene and the Destruction of the Insurgent Transport of Valparaiso. Good Comedy! A Strong Cast!

Usual Prices. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

C. WEIDNER

Commercial Photographer

121 POST STREET

Photographs of All Descriptions taken to order

Kodak Developing and Printing

A LARGE BENGAL TIGER TO MATCH THE CELEBRATED LION.

A large engraving of a tiger, in colors, from the renowned picture of the famous animal-painter, Rosa Bonheur, has been engraved at great expense to order for Charles Lyons, the London Tailor. Can be had at either of his three stores, at the nominal price of 10 cents; by mail 20 cents. Free to customers.

721 Market Street
302 Kearny Street
1212-1214 Market Street

Landseer's celebrated picture of the Lion can also be had at the same price.

THE RUBBER-TIPPED ARROW FAMILY GAME

It is just the thing for amusement; just the thing for discipline; just the thing to help our boys and girls grow up strong, healthy, manly, and womanly. The Game in Bronze costs only 65c. including pistol, arrow, target, and target-holder; in nickel, 90c., all complete.

ELASTIC TIP CO., 735 Market Street, Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. Pacific Coast Sole Agents

Beware of Imitations
This is a fac simile of the package

Genuine Diamond "L" Tea
Pure and Uncolored

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.
208 California St., S. F.
For sale by all grocers

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin.
Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.
Telephone Main 5697.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

MR. H. B. PASMORE

Having just finished a special course in Singing with Mr. William Shakespeare of London, will resume teaching August 26th.

1424 Washington Street.

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

THE THEATRES

Louis James as a Cavalier—Colored Melodrama at Morosco's.

One naturally expects an overflow of intrigue when the De Medicis figure as arch villains. But in the play Mr. Louis James is presenting this week, the author was evidently not satisfied that even a Medici could plan rapidly enough to meet Mr. James' facility as a good angel. Even when every character is supplied with an individual plot or mystery, as the omnipotent Cavalier of France, Mr. James finds plenty of time for wooing, after he has raveled out the tangled webs of villiany, spread to enmesh himself and friends.

Mr. James has a certain robust virility, that has won him reputation as an actor of heroic parts. His is the strength that swings a broadsword, rather than the agility that wields the rapier, and cavaliers of France were never broadswordsmen. He is always sincere and forceful, but he lacks the fire and devil—the Salvinism—that might lift his part far above the ordinary, for the author has put many good lines into the mouths of his people. It is true that by substituting quantity for quality of intrigue, Mr. Smith has made his play pure melodrama, but into his melodrama he has written not a little true beauty and pure wit.

The supporting company is better than usual. If Miss Emerson develops as her simple, convincing work promises, we will have an actress of rare ability. Among the men Mr. Johnstone as the King, and Mr. Gardiner as Chicot the Jester, gave their parts a finish that did much to make the performance a pleasure to the audience.

Mrs. Wells, as the plotting Queen mother, was regal in carriage and bearing. In her acting she lived up to the character, but the lady's sweet, and almost saintly face, seemed sadly out of place on the shoulders of Catherine De Medicis. R. P.

* *

The original pickaninnies are lending much life to "On The Mississippi," this week's play at Morosco's. The lively youngsters sing and gambol about in the most approved Southern fashion, lighting up somewhat a rather gloomy drama. Other features of the piece are the Ku Klux Klan, an interrupted lynching bee, and an exciting jail break. W. H. Pascoe as Grant Sherwood is well enough, but would be much better if he knew his lines. Maud Edna Hall has little to do, but does it acceptably in a black trained dress and a long black boa.

* *

The new features at the Orpheum are furnished by Fordyce with his group of playing and singing puppets, an extremely clever exposition, O. K. Sato, the juggler, who is both smart and comic in action, and what is billed as the "musical sensation of Europe," the Vesuviana Quartette, of which all that need be said is that their performance is hardly likely to become the musical sensatiou of San Francisco. The efforts of Servais Le Roy, the magician, continue to be well received, and the trick ponies are still an immense success.

* *

DRAMATIC NOTES

The fiftieth and last performance of "The Geisha" will be appropriately celebrated at the Tivoli to-morrow (Sunday) evening. Monday "Rip Van Winkle," Planquette's romantic opera, will be given. As the piece has been in rehearsal for some time an agreeable performance may be expected. Edwin Stevens will appear as Rip, one of his best characters. The opera is on for only a limited run, as the Christmas spectacle, "The Tales of Mother Goose," is due for the holidays.

The Orpheum has a number of new people for next week. The six Picchianis Sisters, who head the list, are said to be the most sensational lady acrobats in the world. They come from the Cirque Salamonski, Moscow, Czita, the great gypsy violinist, is another novelty, and still another are Paulinetti and Piquo, character gymnasts. The De Fillipis, eccentric dancers, who will be remembered pleasantly, complete the number.

Louis James commences his second and last week at the Columbia, Monday evening, with "Othello"; Tuesday and Saturday "Spartacus" will be given, Wednesday, "A Cavalier of France," Friday, a repetition of "Othello," Thursday and Sunday evening and Saturday matinee, "Julius Caesar." The Lincoln Monument League Fund will benefit on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. Hoyt's "A Milk White Flag" will be the next attraction.

The Italian Opera Company begins a supplementary season at the Baldwin, Monday evening, with "La Boheme," which will be repeated Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday evenings and at the Saturday matinee. "Otello" is announced for Thursday and Saturday evenings. During the second week productions are to be given of "Manon Lescaut," "Ernani" and "Aida." No advance in admission is to be made.

The concert of the Orpheus Musical Club, under the direction of Fritz Scheel at the Columbia Thursday afternoon, promises to be of exceptional interest. The programme consists of Goldmark's symphony "Rustic Wedding," overture to "Mignon," Saint Saen's "Danse Macabre," Wagner's "Albumlatt" and the Liszt-Muller-Bergham "Rhapsodie."

Patriotism will run rampant at Morosco's next week in the production of the naval melodrama "Old Glory." The scene is in Chile during the anti-American agitation some years ago, and the navy in question is represented by the "Baltimore."

The Frawley Company will open at the California for two weeks commencing December 20th, presenting among other plays "An International Match."

For next week the Alcazar announces a revival of Nat Goodwin's great comedy, "The Nominee." As the piece is well suited to the Alcazar people a satisfactory performance may be expected.

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION

IN

THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

NAPA SODA SPRINGS

THE HOME OF NAPA SODA WATER

California is well known as the best producer of fast horses, pretty women and good wine in the United States. Also, is she celebrated for the number and excellence of her Mineral Springs. Of these

NAPA SODA IS THE PRINCE!

It is a purely natural mineral water—palatable and popular, being clear, sparkling, and of a pleasant, grateful taste, as well as being a keen appetizer. Universally recommended by the medical fraternity, and being, besides, a pure healthy drink, a refreshing beverage, and an invigorating tonic. It has been extensively used, and with universal success, as a cure for Bladder, Liver and Kidney Diseases, Indigestion, General Debility and Nervous Prostration. It is the greatest corrective ever discovered for excessive eating or drinking. In cases of emaciation and debility, an increased nutrition of the body is the result of the use of this water. Its components are so perfectly united by Nature that for a health-giving and grateful beverage this water surpasses any other mineral water in use. A Napa Soda Lemonade is the perfection of luxurious drink for old or young, male or female.

SOBER UP ON NAPA SODA!

This water is bottled and sold just as it flows, pure and unadulterated, from Nature's laboratory, with all her sparkling freshness still upon it.

Steamers, Saloons, Hotels and Families promptly served from

Office, 147 New Montgomery Street, San Francisco

THE "SELBY" FACTORY

Has the Only { PERFECT CRIMPER / WAD SORTER

Loads Smokeless Powders to Order

Will load any safe and practicable combination "to order," in case lots of five hundred
(One load, one size of shot, one kind of powder.)

Has Special Shells, Special Wads, Nine Accurate Automatic Loading Machines

Selby Crimp doesn't loosen in transportation

"PACIFIC SMOKELESS" Cartridges are loaded in 2¾-inch "Smokeless" or "Leader" Shells, with best possible wadding. Quality can't be excelled. Prices moderate.

Ask your dealers for Selby Cartridges and you will get Reliable Goods at Reasonable Prices

GUN IMPLEMENTS : BICYCLE SUNDRIES

The Bridgeport Gun Implement Co.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Loading and Cleaning Implements for Guns, Rifles and Revolvers

Forstner Augur Bits, Bicycle Lanterns, Saddles, Pedals, Lantern Brackets, Bicycle Stands, Toe Clips, etc.

Pacific Coast Agency, 425-427 MARKET STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Catalogues on application. W. A. SEAVER, MANAGER

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. November 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Steamer Pomona, 2 p.m. November 3, 8, 12 16, 20, 24, 29; December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28.

For Newport (Los Angeles) and Way Ports, 9 a.m. Nov. 2, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 30 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Harford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles and Redondo (Los Angeles), at 11 a.m. November 4, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 28 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, 10 a.m. the 2d each month

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Nov. 30 1897, at 2 p.m. Special party rates

S. S. "Mariposa," for Australia, Thursday, Dec. 9, 1897, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO General Agents

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF EUDORA A. CHAMBERS (sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers) DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, R. C. Chambers, Executor of the will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within ten months after the first publication of this notice, to the said R. C. Chambers, at the law offices of Franklin K. Lane, rooms 201-202 Crocker Building, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

R. C. CHAMBERS,
Executor of the Will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco. November 5, 1897.

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, PIPE, TILE, ETC. — GLADDING, McBEAN & CO. SAN FRANCISCO. WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

BEST & BELCHER MINING COMPANY– Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the second (2d) day of November, 1897, an assessment (No. 63) of twenty-five cents (25c.) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of December, 1897, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless paid before, will be sold on Tuesday the twenty-eighth (28th) day of December, 1897, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. M. JAFFE, Secretary.

Office, room 33, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery street, San Francisco. California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Kentuck Consolidated Mining Company

Assessment.....No. 14
Amount per share .....5 cents
Levied .....October 27, 1897
Delinquent in office .....December 1, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock.....December 22, 1897

AUG. WATERMAN, Secretary.
Office, room 23, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Belcher Mining Company

Assessment.....No. 57
Amount per share .....20 cents
Levied.....November 20, 1897
Delinvent in office.....December 24, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock.....January 14, 1897

C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.
Office, room 35, 3d floor, Mills blg., San Francisco.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Gould & Curry Silver Mining Company

Assessment.....No. 82
Amount per share .....20 cents
Levied.....November 2, 1897
Delinquent in office.....December 7, 1897
Day of sale of delinquent stock.....December 29, 1897

A. K. DURBROW, Secretary.
Office, room 69, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F
Telephone 305

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Guarantee Capital and Surplus | - | $2,040,201 66 |
| Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash | - | 1,000,000 00 |
| Deposits December 31, 1896 | - | 27,730,247 45 |

OFFICERS
President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS
B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N Walter and N Ohlandt
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

Deposits December 11, 1896.....$22,885,377
Paid Up Capital and Surplus..... 1,594,503

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice Pres
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier

DIRECTORS
George W. Beaver, Robert Watt, Thomas Magee, George C. Boardman, W. C. B. de Fremery, Daniel E. Martin, Albert Miller, George Tasheira, E. B. Pond

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country. No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 POST STREET

Below Kearny Mechanics Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.

Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.

When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A D 1720
Capital Paid Up, $3,446,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $5,980,251

ROBERT DICKSON Manager

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Paid Up Capital . . . | $250,000 |
| Cash Reserve Fund . . . | 25,000 |

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

CONNECTICUT

FIRE INS. CO

OF HARTFORD

Assets $5,... BENJAMIN J SMITH Manager

COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
501 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

Don't Borrow a Home!

BUY IT Your rent payments for the borrowed home will do it through the aid of the

CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California

WM. CORBIN, Secretary and Gen. Manager
Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF DUNCAN B. McMILLAN DECEASED

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Duncan B. McMillan, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at Room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

A. C. FREESE,
Administrator of the Estate of Duncan B. McMillan, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, November 29, 1897.

J. D. SULLIVAN,
Attorney for Administrator.

CLABROUGH, GOLCHER & CO.

CARRY THE LARGEST STOCK

—SPORTSMEN'S SUPPLIES

GUNS, FISHING TACKLE

SPORTING GOODS

538 MARKET STREET, (Hobart Building) San Francisco

BRUNT COLOR PRESS, 535 CLAY ST., S. F.

THE WAVE

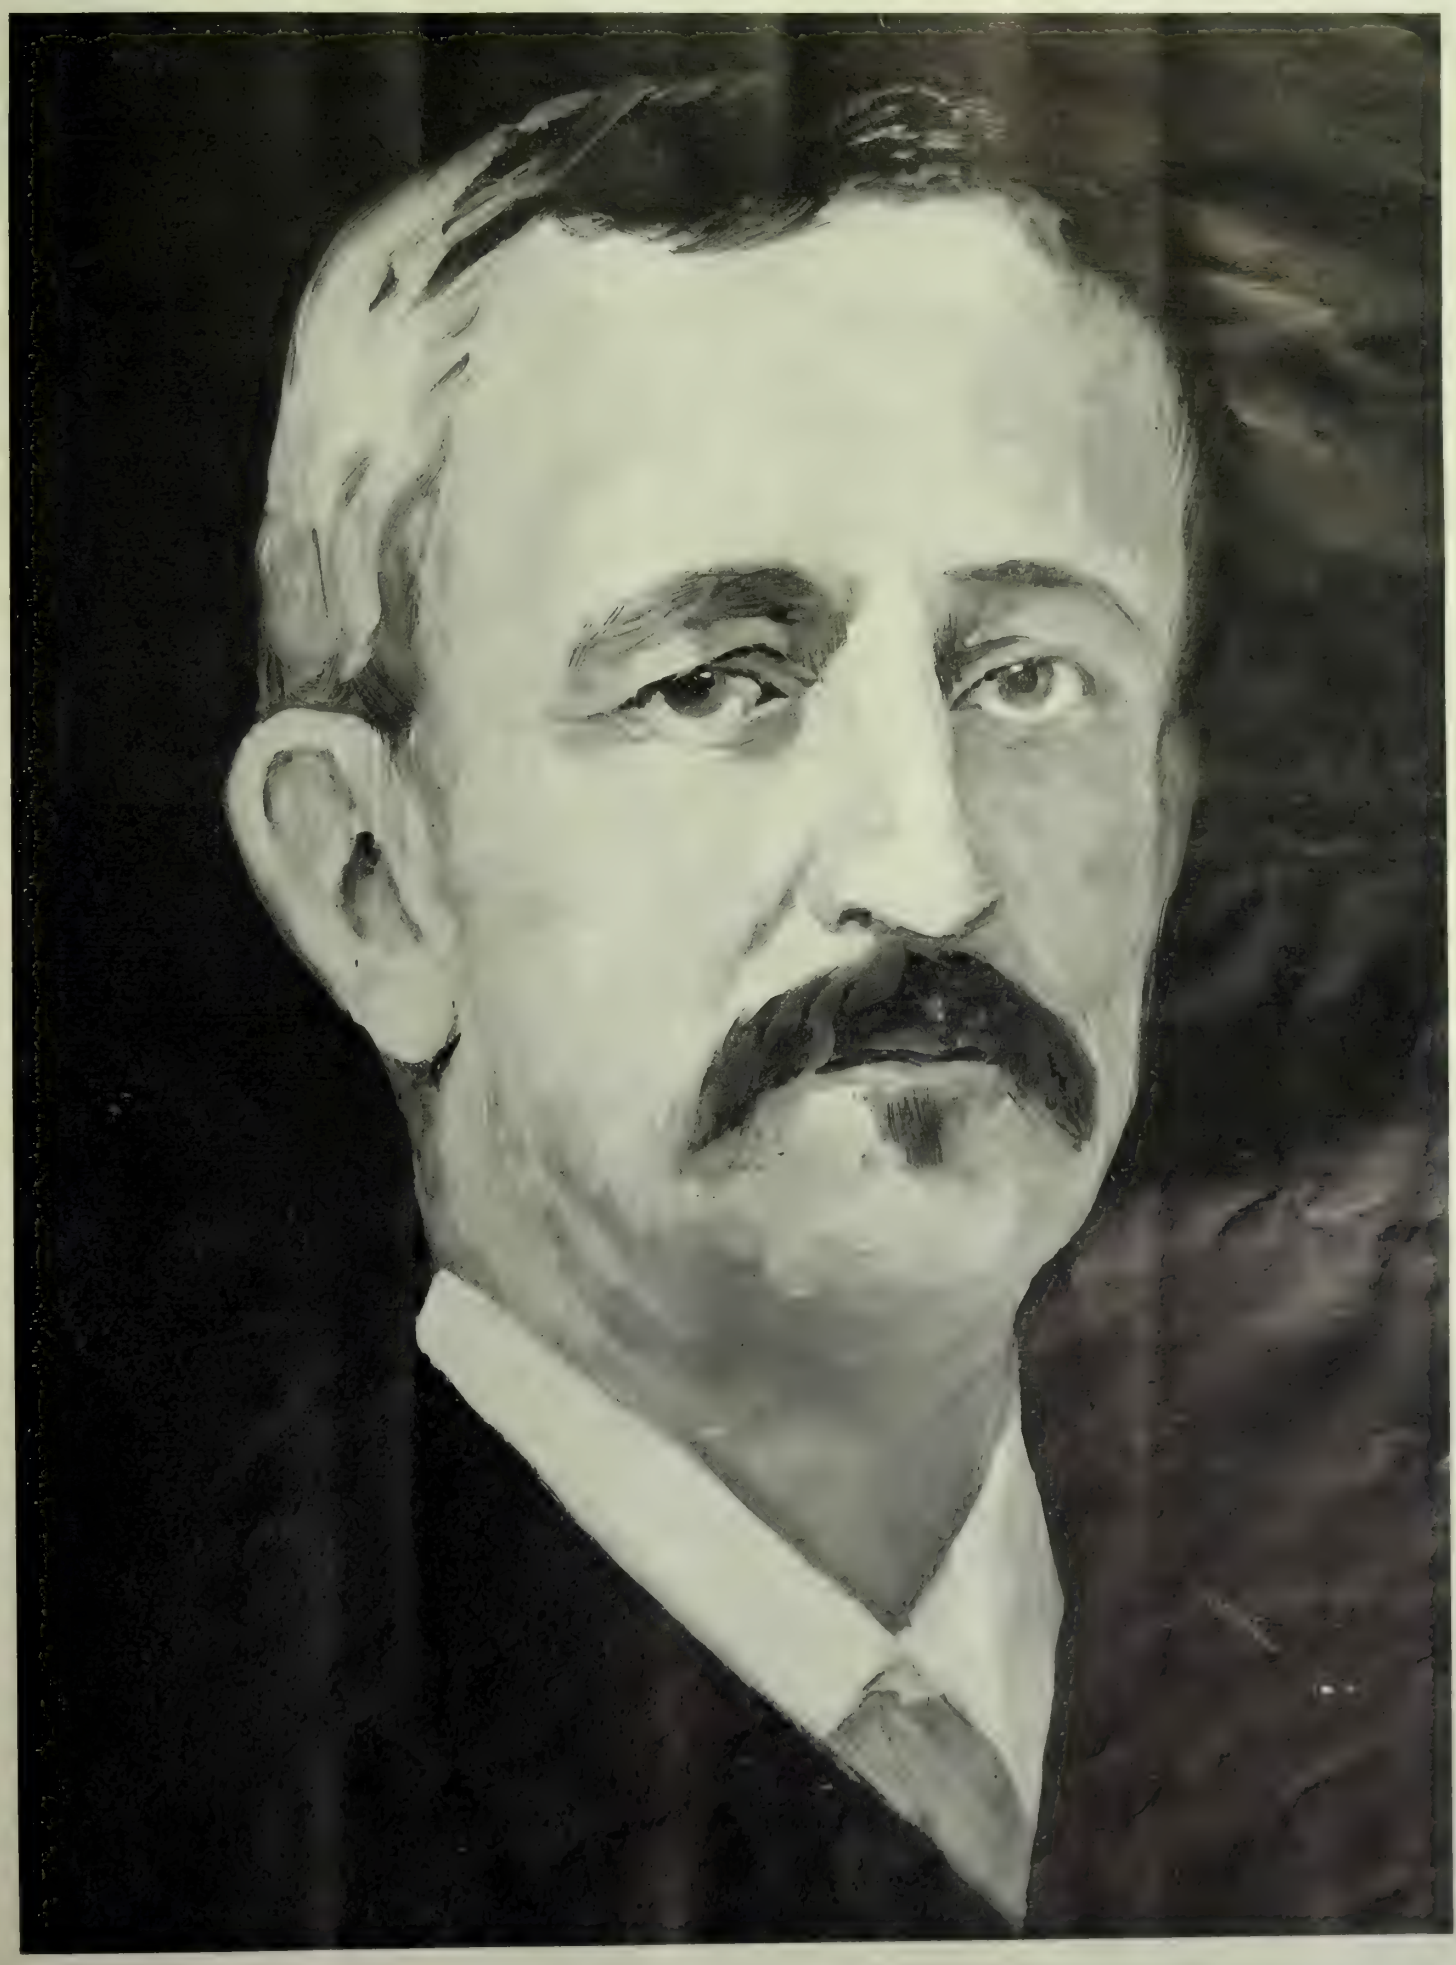
VOL. XVI. No. 50 SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 11. 1897 PRICE 10 CTS



GENERAL THOMAS H. HUBBARD

Recently Elected First Vice-President of the Southern Pacific Company

From a study by J. D. Strong

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 11, 1897

CONTENTS

Editorials ..... 2
Professor Hudson's Essays; by John Bonner ..... 3
The Spain of To-day ..... 3
Who Shall Bear the Standard? by Arthur Pillsbury ..... 3
The Libraries of San Francisco ..... 4-5
Things and People; by Boswell Jr. ..... 6-7
Clancy's Reign of Terror in South Park ..... 7
Holiday Literature; by F. N. ..... 8
American Life: a Review ..... 9
A Debutante's Diary ..... 10
The Theatres ..... 11
The Christmas Magazines ..... 12
The "First Born" in London ..... 13
Turf Topics; by Benedict ..... 14
Finance and Trade ..... 14
New Stories Re-Told ..... 16

HAPPINESS BY CONQUEST.

There is a man named Horace Fletcher who has written a queer little book called Happiness as Found in Forethought Minus Fearthought. He calls Fearthought the self-imposed or self-permitted suggestion of inferiority. He says that a sense of one's inferiority will poison one's happiness, will make one un-happy. This, instead of actual trouble, Mr. Fletcher says, is the cause of unhappiness, for trouble in his philosophy does not exist. "Fearthought of trouble is as near as one ever gets to the condition, for the reason that whatever has come has ceased to exist, except in the memory." But how about happiness then, for happiness when it comes has ceased to exist, except in the memory. We suppose that Mr. Fletcher would hurdle that obstacle by retorting that anticipation and remembrance of happiness is happiness, all the happiness that one can get on this side of the hole-in-the-ground.

There is something in this Fletcher theory when you stop and think about it a moment. The difficulty is that Happiness is not a constant quantity. It all depends upon your point of view, on your temperament, on your condition. One man's idea of happiness may mean a good wife, another man's may mean a beef-steak. Or the same man may have a different idea of Happiness at different times. To-day it may be a good wife. Cast him away upon a desert island, or "concentrate" him in an interior Cuban village and in a week he will entertain pronounced views as to that beef-steak.

We are all scrambling along after Happiness, when you come to that, and it's curious that after some seven or eight thousand years of the scramble we should have no more definite idea of what Happiness is or means. And if we attained Happiness we should be unhappy that we could attain nothing further. It is a queer situation. "Hopeful determination," says Horace Fletcher, "will go far in the way of procuring Happiness" But the words Hope and Determination imply the overcoming of certain things, certain obstacles, certain *un*happinesses. One is inclined to believe that that is more nearly the right idea, that Happiness is overcoming rather than attaining. One can never attain and yet be happy, but there are plenty of chances of overcoming things. One never can quite exhaust them. One is often led to speculate if even the Octogenarian, brought to his last bed, with the hole-in-the-ground none too far distant, has not some idea of overcoming the enemy that has the grip of him, of recovery from that particular illness anyway. At least he has the chance of trying.

With an idea so vague as Happiness, and with so many billion of men and women entered for the scramble, it is hard to make formulas upon the matter that will fit everywhere. One believes "to overcome" will apply. One even hazards a further step—the bigger the thing you overcome, the greater will be your happiness. This again is relative, of course. Happiness is in a way a colored light, thrown on the stage of the world's action, sometimes illuminating a Hoyt farce, and sometimes a Shakespearean tragedy. There is Happiness, one is bound to admit, even in the successful leading of a paper german, there are obstacles enough to be overcome, as anyone who has tried it can tell you. But when Mr. Andree shall read from his sextant the latitude and longitude of his farthest North—as we all hope he has done already—he, too, in thinking of the obstacles he has overcome, will experience that same feeling which we must call by the same name of Happiness. It is a difference, an enormous difference, but a difference of degree not of kind.

Successful overcoming of obstacles—that's the real fun you can have for your money, nor will anyone admire you so much as for this. The feeblest of us feel a thrill for the successful hero. We like the vicious, wicked determination that suggests the thorough-bred bull dog, we cannot but applaud the fellow who sits down in his closet and thinks and plans a certain action or course of life, and who grips his teeth together and clenches his fist till the knuckles whiten and says, "By God, I'll put it through," and does put it through just as he had planned it. I say we cannot help but admire that fellow, whether he has planned a cotillion or a train robbery or a Congo expedition. But whether we condemn or applaud, whether we put him on a waxed dancing floor, or in the penitentiary, or on a lecture platform, it is all one with him. He has overcome his obstacles. He has known Happiness.

F. N.

A QUESTION OF PROTECTION.

Our able evening contemporary, the Bulletin, resents any reference to our national protection policy that is not surrounded by a gilt frame of eulogistic praise, and adorned with warm, clinging adjectives of approbation.

To declare the Dingley bill perfection, and to say that we have reached the point of governmental policy that needs no mending or amending, is to offer ourselves up to well merited ridicule and criticism that may not be readily answered. The Wave has not, as our contemporary declares, charged that our "protection policy was iniquitous because employers of labor were permitted to purchase labor in the cheapest market and sell their goods in a market made higher by protection." We merely mildly pointed out that this was the fact, and it is the fact, the Bulletin to the contrary notwithstanding. We also pointed out that the manufacturers and proprietors of protected industries were and are to-day, availing themselves of the "unprotected" condition of labor; and were and are drawing upon the cheap labor of Europe for their craftsmen, their operators and their miners. These two statements are beyond disputing. They are plain facts, known to the world, and no amount of sophistry will cure the vice or lessen its evil.

Our argument was not directed against protection so much as it was toward increasing its efficiency. Properly applied, properly guarded, we have no quarrel with the shibboleth that runs "Protection to American Industries," but we do incline very strongly toward the amendment which Mr. U. S. Grant Jr. suggests "Protection to American Industries and protection to the American Industrious." But the Bulletin says:

"The argument against protection was sound to the extent to which it was based upon facts. If the employers were permitted to purchase labor in the cheapest market and sell the product of labor in the higher protected market, the protection policy would be unjust to the laborer. His services would be exposed to the severest competition, while the goods he consumed would be increased in price by the protection afforded the producer."

This is an exact statement of the condition of affairs as they really exist to-day, to mend which we urge further legislation for the protection to American labor itself. The mere fact that a St. Louis labor union has declared against the proposed restriction of immigration, does not lessen the necessity for the application of the remedy. The wrong is with us nevertheless, and the Republican party should not hesitate to perform a solemn duty. As well might the physician hesitate to administer some world recognized specific, because his patient did not believe it would effect a cure of his complaint. The labor union of St. Louis may have been made up of Populists or Democrats anxious to perpetuate evils that may be charged up against the party of Protection. In any event their vote upon this question stamps them as being sadly lacking in a true knowledge of their true interests.

---

The election of General Thos. H. Hubbard to the first and George Crocker to the second vice-presidency of the Southern Pacific Company marks the result in corporate affairs of the lamentable death of Chas. F. Crocker. While no special significance is to be attached to the elevation of General Hubbard from the office of second vice-president to that of first, or the succession of Mr. Crocker to the second vice-presidency, yet the subject is one of common interest and the personality and appearance of General Hubbard has been but inadequately dealt with by the daily press. General Hubbard comes of sterling American stock, and has a record sufficient to excite admiration. He is the youngest and only surviving son of John Hubbard, who was twice Governor of Maine, and is a graduate of Bowdoin College. In the year 1861 he was admitted to practise in New York, but at the outbreak of the war, entered the Union Army as Adjutant of the 25th Regiment of Maine Volunteer Infantry, in which capacity he saw considerable service in Virginia. After the expiration of his term of service he returned to Maine and recruited and reorganized the 30th Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry. As Lieutenant-Colonel of this Regiment he served in the Red River Campaign, participating in all of its battles. He was mentioned with especial commendation by Admiral Porter for his services at Alexandria, which resulted in the saving of a fleet of Federal gunboats at that port, was commissioned Colonel of his Regiment in May, '64, and was mustered in as Colonel in June of the same year. Under General Sheridan he served in the Shenandoah Valley Campaign, and subsequently in Savannah, Georgia. Notably a brave and efficient officer, he distinguished himself in every position in which he was placed. After the close of the war, General Hubbard resumed the practice of his profession in New York City, where his ability and character have won him a leading position at the bar. As a lawyer he is strong, able and competent, highly accomplished, and deeply read, a man whose identity stands for all that is honorable and upright in the legal profession.

---

("Happiness" by Horace Eletcher. H. S. Stone & Co., Chicago.)

WHO SHALL BEAR THE STANDARD?

BY ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY.

The probable Democratic candidate for Governor of California is already before the people. He has put himself in nomination, moved that nominations do close, and that the nomination of himself by himself be made unanimous. The motion will probably carry, and James G. Maguire will no doubt receive the Gubernatorial nomination of the Democratic party of California without opposition. There is no quarrel to be picked because of this proceeding. It is well to recognize that Judge Maguire is a man of ability of a certain kind, that he is popular with the people, and will be a hard man to beat—with the exception of Stephen M. White, the hardest that the Democrats could put up.

It will deepen the interest of Republicans to state that there are evidences to show that, back of Judge Maguire and in co-partnership with him in a purpose to carry this State for at least the head of the Democratic ticket in next year's election, there is as desperate a gang of political ruffians as ever marred the methods or blackened the fame of any commonwealth—a gang who are every one of them fighters, afraid of nothing, and who will scruple at nothing in order to gain their end. Some of these are alleged Republicans, though the allegation is not true. They are boodlers, who know no principles and no party as they know no religion and no God.

Three years ago the Republican party was confronted by this same gang, and the gang was victorious in all that it contended for—the Gubernatorial office,—but in that campaign the Republican party was handicapped by being handed over to the indiscreet custody of a San Francisco boss, a misfortune that is not likely to befall the party again until the memories of its members fail and the humiliation of having sacrified a respectable but chestnutty candidate has been forgotten.

Next year's campaign is likely to prove of more than State importance. The existence of a Republican majority in the United States Senate is likely to hinge upon the event and only Heaven knows what eventually may not hinge upon the existence of a Republican majority in the United States Senate.

The Republicans of California should plan to win the next campain, and it is not now too soon to plan or too soon to begin to work in accordance with a plan in order to win. It will not be a walk-over, no matter who is the standard-bearer. Affirmative legislation on the currency question is likely to characterize the coming session of Congress, and after affirmative legislation there is apt to be a revulsion of popular feeling, and, in American politics, a tidal wave toward the negative of the controversy. Action and reaction tend to produce this result, and only a positive and paramount Republican educational force can overcome the tendency. These facts are not recited with the view of producing a scare, but party patriotism will sanction neither the underestimation of the voting strength nor the advantage of position of the party in opposition.

The rank and file of the Republican party ought to choose the Gubernatorial candidate, but until the Australian ballot system, or something akin to it, has been adapted to the use of State conventions, there will exist no adeqate mechanism for ascertaining the preferences of the rank and file of any party, and the product of a State convention will be in the future, what it has been in the past—the result of conscienceless trafficking for nominations for local candidates without regard to popular will, an equitable distribution of offices as regards locality, or the well-being of State or party.

It would seem that the exigency calls for a conference, in executive session, of the best men in the Republican party in California, a conference of say one hundred men selected with due regard to character and geographical distribution, who, before attending, should take the pains to inform themselves as to the state of feeling of the people at home. Such a conference was held at the opening of the last campaign and gentlemen who came some hundreds of miles to learn what their opinions ought to be on questions of National policy went away enlightened. Had that conference been held six months earlier it would have prevented the party getting into an equivocal position on the silver question and would have saved speakers the nautiation of publicly dieting on crow.

These conferees should be men of character and not mere politicians. The mere politician has no opinions in advance of issue joined, and, not having studied public questions for an hour, if he ventures opinions he generally finds himself baying on the wrong scent. These are they to whom the party owes all its confusions, all its humiliations, all its defeats. Their space will be more valuable than their presence.

This conference should be held early in the coming year, in San Francisco, and a half dozen patriotic Republicans should join in calling it and in preparing a place in which it can be held.

---

The new carriages entered in the New York Horse Show are simpler in color than those of last year, and display a leaning toward old patterns. The cabriolet has the front seat lower and the lines plain and sweeping, and differs further from previous patterns in its decoration, which is less gaudy, being jet black with light trimmings. Favorite colors in broughams are dark green and dark blue, flashy shades not being seen. High colors are still used in shooting carts and traps of that class, and red and yellow are as popular as ever. Large breaks, mountain wagons and four-in-hand traps are much as they were last season, many of them painted in high colors. The glass side wagonette omnibus is growing in favor, and also the open 'bus for four persons, the pattern being lower than formerly, and the vehicle looking compact and comfortable. The lack of display and the leaning toward plainness may be seen in harnesses as well as vehicles. The new designs differ from last year's only in the style of stitching, in place of yellow, blue and white stitching only black being used. Silver was in vogue almost exclusively last year, but this season there has been a reaction in favor of brass.

PROFESSOR HUDSON'S ESSAYS

BY JOHN BONNER.

Prof. Hudson, though a young man, has made himself well known to all lovers of English literature by his lectures and magazine articles. He knows his English library well, and it is to his guidance that many of our people owe their acquaintance with old English fiction and old English verse. The volume now before one contains papers on old London with dear old Pepys strutting round in his three-cornered hat, which may not be altogether new to the well informed; but the paper on Mrs. Behn and Mrs. Manley contains information which is both interesting and novel to any but bookworms. They are a very curious pair of ladies.

WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON

They flourished in the interval between Madame de Seudery and the Earl of Orrery. Mrs. Behn's own life is a romance in which blood and thunder are blended with la belle galanterie. She was the daughter of a British officer, who, when she was sixteen, was appointed Governor of Surinam, and took her with him to his principality. Her baptismal name was Aphra; among her intimates, she was known as the divine Astraea. Her father died at sea, and the fair Aphra would have been a derelict, but for a native prince who took her under his protection. How old she was then, we have no means of knowing, nor are we informed how long the affair lasted. We are told that the prince's name was Oroonoko, and that he was not by any means a negro; we are also informed that her relations with him were strictly platonic, which goes without saying. It seems that she left him before she was twenty, and returned to London, where she married a Dutch merchant named Behn; as to whom she significantly remarks that "they are mistaken who imagine that a Dutchman cannot love." Tender as his affection may have been, he died when his wife was twenty-five, and the fair Aphra then appears among the fair and frail consolers of Charles the Second.

He did not make her a duchess, as he had a way of doing with the mistresses of his heart, but he made her a court spy, a calling for which she well adapted by her wit and beauty and keen intellect. She went to Antwerp, and spied upon Admiral de Ruyter, who, after a season of rapture, declared that he could stand one rival, but when it came to three, he would draw the line. The bluff Hollander turned his back on her, and she went back to England, where she found a king who thought less of a pretty woman than of a sergeant of cavalry. Then Aphra fell back on the refuge of the destitute—literature. She wrote plays, poetry and novels—being as fecund as Lope de Vega, and far more immoral. Observation of the British public convinced her that they like pepper in their literary meat, and she gave it to them, being able to draw upon a much larger experience than Wycherley had at command.

Her novels, of which there were a flood, showed fancy and a sense of the picturesque; but they were all flavored by the same sauce piquante. Yet they were read at the time by ladies of the best society and the highest culture. It has always been a question whether women who listened to the play of Wycherley and Farquhar could be virtuous; and the question is still unanswered. Mrs. Behn put a still harder strain on the delicacy of her female hearers or readers. Professor Hudson says that Mrs. Behn makes "mere physical appetite, the passion which rages like a fury from hell, the point of all her stories; she centers their entire interest in the gratification of this passion." She is "always ready to indulge in scenes of the utmost coarseness and pictures of the most revolting brutality." Yet her books were read, and her plays witnessed in an age which saw the publication of Paradise Lost, and the Battle of Bothwell Bridge. Are we to infer that in the seventeenth century women in England were all bad, or were divided into two classes—the refined, modest, and pure-minded, and the companions of Sir John Falstaff?

Mrs. Appra Behn stands alone. France, Italy and Spain have all produced licentious writers; they are producing them still, but it is not easy to recall the name of one female writer of any age in these countries whose works might have been prohibited by the police. Professor Hudson reproduced an anecdote of Walter Scott's, in which he makes a grand-aunt of his confess that in her youth she heard Appra Behn's novels read aloud for the amusement of large circles consisting of the first and most creditable society in London. Evidently Mrs. Behn knew her public and knew what they wanted. The amazing thing is that there should have been such a public in an age which produced Winthrop's diary, and the letters of Mrs. Hutchinson and Roger Williams.

The restoration was a foul period, as even the reader of Pepys must perceive; but when we read the sentence passed on Mrs. Behn by an impartial critic like Professor Hudson, we are compelled to suspect that it was even fouler than we supposed. There was broad talk in the days of Marguerite of Navarre, but not of the Heptameron nor of its many mitations, could a critic say, as Mr. Hudson does, that it describes woman as uniformly salacious, taking no interest in writings which are not descriptions of the gratification of animal passion.

---

The first shipment of ripe oranges to the East this year was sent from Coviana, Los Angeles County. Porterville has had the distinction for several years, but this season was beaten by almost one week.

---

("Idle Hours in a Library" by W. H. Hudson. Wm. Doxey, publisher.)

THE SPAIN OF TODAY

A Glimpse Into the Wheels and Springs of Madrid Politics.

That history repeats itself is in itself a repetition that has become stale with usage, yet the saying applies neatly to the situation that is rapidly being prepared by the people and government of Spain. Senor Sagasta and the Queen Regent are to-day looking into the resurrected and double headed spectre that confronted Napoleon Le Petit in the spring of '70. Foreign war or domestic insurrection? That is the question the spectre asks. Napoleon chose the former alternative with Sedan, and the Metz surrender as the result. Will Sagasta defy augury?—go counter to precedent? He is devotedly attached to the Queen and the little King, and is prepared to go to extremes to save the dynasty. Insurrection is rife from the Pyrennees to Gibraltar—a foreign war is the only thing to avert it. War with whom? The United States would be glad to know.

THE KING OF SPAIN

The situation in Spain is grave enough, complicated enough, to have taxed the capabilities of the late James G. Blaine. Spain ceased to grow, as one might say, about five hundred years ago. The people are thoroughly mediæval in their institutions, their opinions, and above all, in their religious convictions. Fancy a political party pledging itself to re-establish the inquisition! Yet that is the promise made by the leaders of the Carlists. But the contradictions and inconsistencies of the Spanish people are legion. In Spain the nobility are the democrats and the middle classes the aristocrats, while the great body of the people are completely under the domination of the Carlist priests, and cast their votes according to their instructions. Under ordinary circumstances the middle class is the support and mainstay of the government. But in Spain it is precisely this middle class that foments discord, opposes authorities, attacks the government and overthrows ministries.

A child is on the throne of Spain under the regency of a woman, while the real power of the kingdom is in the clergy's hands—a priest, a child, and a woman. One asks where are the men, the statesmen, the politicians, the party leaders? They are to be found in the drawing-rooms and boudoirs of the women of Madrid, the Madrilenes (a class notoriously dissolute) and completely under their pernicious influence. These carpet politicians, these statesmen of the teacup, know little and care less as to what goes on outside of Spain, or even outside Madrid. When the son of Don Carlos visited Spain some two years ago he was able to spend three months in the southern part of the kingdom traveling from the chateau of one adherent to another without the knowledge of his movements reaching the ears of the government until long after his departure.

No country in Europe, that is to say, no country in the world, is so ruled by feminine influence as is Spain at the present day, Cabinets are formed and dissolved, ministries overthrown, policies dictated, administrations thwarted, to suit the caprice or to satisfy the petty spite of some great lady of Madrid's Haute Societe. That the Queen Regent is unpopular with the Madrilenes is a point to be noted and considered. Perhaps in all Spain she is the one woman who is possessed of political intelligence and foresight, whose breadth of view commands a prospect never attained by the petty intriguers who surround her. Senor Sagasta, who is Spain's nearest approach to a statesman, is her devoted friend, and, as before stated, is ready to preserve the throne to her dynasty at all hazards, even at the terrible risk of war with the United States.

But Sagasta is unsupported. Senor Moret is the only man of the present ministry upon whom he can place the least reliance, and he is a visionary, clinging to the belief that political problems can be solved and financial situations coped with by clever articles in periodicals and journals. The whole status of the government can be summed up in one word—weak! Spain is weak financially, weak politically, and deplorably weak (where she should be strongest, if she is bent on war with the United States), in her military organization. The army is discontented, uneasy, and frequently on the point of actual mutiny. Advancement and preferment are attained as often as not by positive and unconcealed disloyalty to the government whom the soldiers are pledged to support. Officers are promoted by favor, and not by service. Our friend, the late Captain-General, returning home after a career of the most brilliant and conspicuous mismanagement, corruption and defeat, but with an increased bank account of $125,000, is perhaps a fair type.

It may be asked if the Queen-Regent, with all her intelligence and largeness of view, is blind to this state of affairs. She, more than any one else, is in a position to judge. One asks if there has been any indication on her part of her knowledge of approaching calamity. If she has ever acted as though she were preparing to "stand from under," in the event of a smashup?

A few months ago a special messenger, returning from London to Madrid, was attacked and robbed in the vicinity of Irun. In his dispatch-bag were found envelopes addressed to the Queen of Spain by the Bank of England. These envelopes contained receipts signed by the Bank for a greater portion of the Queen's jewels and her personal fortune in bonds and securities to the amount of $2,000,000.

SPENCER MASTERS.

Madrid, November 8, 1897.

---

The Interstate Commerce Commission has issued its usual abstract of statistics of railways for the year ending June, 1897.

The total railway mileage of the United States is shown to be 182,776.63 miles, an increase of 2,119.16 miles, of which California is credited with 202.05 miles. In the hands of receivers are 151 roads representing a mileage of 30,475.39 miles. To operate the entire railway mileage of America there are employed 35,950 locomotives. The number of cars of all classes in service aggregate 1,297,649.

The number of men employed in the railway service amounts to 826,620. The aggregate amount of wages and salaries paid was $468,824,531.00 or 60.65 per cent of the total operating expenses.

The amount of railway capital on June 30, 1896, was $10,566,865,771, which, assigned on a mileage basis, shows a capital of $59,610 per mile of line. These figures do not include current liabilities which would increase the amount per mile to $63,068.00. These figures rather dispute the charge that our local railway concerns are capitalized and mortgaged beyond the average.

On the side of passenger traffic the showing is most interesting. The number of passengers carried during the year was 511,772,737. The number of passengers killed was 181, and the number injured 2,873. The figures show a marked decrease in passenger business.

Freight business however shows an increase and amounted to 765,891,385 tons, an increase of 69,130,214 tons.

The amount of gross earnings after deducting operating expenses was $377,180,332. The income from other sources, mainly from leases and investments, was $129,024,731, making a total income of over five hundred and six million dollars. The net income available for dividends and surplus, however, amounts only to about eighty-nine and a half millions. The cost of transportation in American railways is much lower than in Europe. A comparison of rates obtained from another but quite as reliable source, results very favorably to the American railroads, and even the abused Pullman company service is much cheaper than similar service in Europe.

The following table is interesting.

New York to St. Paul, 1,314 miles, 40 hours, $31.50 railway fare, $7 sleeper fare; New York to Denver, 1937 miles, 64 hours, $48.75, $11; Paris to Constantinople, 1,857 miles, 56 hours, $71, $28; Paris to St. Petersburg, 1,600 miles, 59 hours, $56, $25; Calais to Brindisi, 1,380 miles, 56 hours, $66, $26; New York to Omaha, 1,400 miles, 41 hours, $32.75, $7.50; Paris to Lisbon, 1,175, 48 hours, $48, $22; New York to Chicago, 960 miles, 27 hours, $20, $5; Leipsic to Rome, 945 miles, 35 hours, $44, $15; Washington to Chicago, 921 miles, 24 hours, $18, $5; Ostend to Vienna, 821 miles, 29 hours, $33, $10; Paris to Madrid, 810 miles, 28 hours, $34, $15; Paris to Vienna, 790 miles, 26 hours, $30, $7.50; Washington to Jacksonville, 760 miles, 20 hours, $21, $5; Paris to Rome, 775 miles, 34 hours, $33, $10; Paris to Berlin, 663 miles, 20 hours, $24, $8; Paris to Frankfort 375 miles, 15 hours, $10, $5.

---

The number of hats vacant in the Sacred College of Cardinals is reckoned at twelve, and it becomes a sort of necessity to appoint new members to the cardinalate. Four Italian prelates are named as likely to be promoted on this occasion; two of these, at least, are regarded as certain. These are Monsignor Francesco della Volpe and Monsignor Agostino Ciasca. The former is majordomo to His Holiness; the latter, secretary of the Congregation of Propaganda Fide. Both may be said to have been for a considerable time in the position which generally ends in the cardinalate. The other Italian prelates mentioned as likely to receive the red hat at the next consistory are the archbishops of Turin and Naples.

---

Ten Eastern capitalists have bought a tract of 8000 acres in Colusa County for the purpose of cultivating beets. A sugar refinery of 400 tons daily capacity is to be erected. It is claimed that in a few years' time enough sugar will be produced on the Pacific Coast to ship in such large quantities to Chicago and other Western points as to reduce rates and compete successfully with the trust refineries.

A VIEW OF SOUTH PARK (see page 7)

In the Mercantile Library

Doorway of the Mercantile Library

Reading Room of the Mechanics Library

In the Mechanics Library

THE MAIN HALL

CHILDREN'S READING ROOM

UPSTAIRS READING ROOM

THE FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY

SAN FRANCISCO'S LIBRARIES

Three Institutions That Supply Books and Reading.

That San Francisco is well equipped with library facilities was the conviction of Mr. Jellison, the librarian of the Mechanics' Library of this city, after an inspection of the libraries of the large Eastern cities. Though the work of our local dilettante may not be appreciated as some—principally the dilettante—aver; though we may be a "jay town" in our mistreatment of the wandering minstrel, nevertheless we may lay the flattering unction to our souls that Culture lives and moves and has vigorous being in the metropolis of the West; for the city's generous suffrage, and nothing else, has permitted the growth of three large and splendidly equipped libraries, such as would do credit to any recognized centers of civilization, art and letters. We not only read as many novels per man or per woman, but we peruse as many periodicals, burn midnight oil over as many philosophical disquisitions and scientific treatises, and finger as many maps, diagrams and patent reports, as Boston, New York and even Chicago.

Nor are the advantages, which our libraries offer, monopolized by the more favored classes of our population, for the Free Public Library has a much larger patronage than either of the others. During the last year there were considerably over half a million books used, while in the Mechanics' Library there were but 167,000 volumes issued.

The Free Public Library is the especial blessing of the poor and the unemployed, though all classes of our people are members, and find access to its well filled shelves occasionally necessary. The children go to the Free Library after school; men and women with plenty of time and little to do throng its cheerful reading rooms at all hours. Young authors who, while they may not live in the traditional garret, could not afford the dues of the subscription libraries, study and ponder and write, and the world of literature and art and invention will ultimately be the richer for the privilege these enjoy. Our residents of the last decade will remember the ill-lighted, draughty hall above the old California Theatre on Bush Street where the Free Library had its home for many a year. And ill-lighted and draughty was old Mr, Perkins, its librarian at that time—a man of gruff forbidding personality, and of small patience with the little tads who borrowed from him Oliver Optic, Castleman and Alger. Then the library moved to the Larkin street wing of the New City Hall and, soon after, to its present fine quarters on the McAllister street side of the same edifice. Here the arrangements are in every way modern and convenient. Since Mr. Cheney resigned to assume charge of the Newberry Library of Chicago, taking with him, by the way, his assistant Mr. Rudolph, who was the inventer of the remarkably efficient system of cataloguing now in vogue, his place has been taken by Mr. George T. Clark. Mr. J. Lichtenstein, who is his assistant, has a special fitness for the work. The Free Library has now nearly 76,000 volumes, about 8,800 of which are on the shelves of the Free Branch Libraries which have been established in those parts where they may be expected to do the most good.

The Mechanics' Library is perhaps the best known, the largest and the most popular of the several proprietary or subscription libraries of the city. Organized in 1854 on a liberal educational plan, it has steadily grown till, at the present day, it occupies a leading place among the proprietary libraries of the United States. Its volumes number some 75,000, these include, besides the American Reports, a full set of the British Patent Reports. The holding of annual fairs by the Institute has been a means of recruiting its membership, but no more so than the policy of freedom of access to all its books—and as a result very few are stolen—the splendid system of lectures and classes in the fine and technical arts which has been in vogue for many years, and the practice of keeping closely in touch and studiously catering to the wishes of its members. An instance of this are the changes in the arrangement of the rooms which were made a few years ago. One of these changes seemed not to meet with approval, whereupon at great pains a vote was taken, the fact disproved, and the reading room was again elevated to the lighter upper floor of the building.

At the present time the Mercantile Library is the third library in San Francisco, if we average such elements as external appearance, number of volumes, members and popularity. In some respects, however, it might well be considered the first library of the city. Its externals are unmeasurably superior to those of the other libraries, occupying as it does its own mansion of statley and classic style, situated at the intersection of the two driving avenues of the city, and housing its rare collection of works in a single square chamber richly furnished and ideally lighted. The Mercantile Library, too, is more than a library. It is an historical monument of San Francisco. It represents to our modern era, the perpetuation of that romantic time when the birth and growth on the sand hills of Yerba Buena, of a center of civilization and culture, was the fond work of a handful of pioneers. The Mercantile Library has fallen from its high estate in a worldly sense. Its existence with a depleted membership and under the handicap of a remote location, is not an easy one to maintain. Some years ago an effort was made to bring about its amalgamation with one or the other of the two more prosperous institutions, but the sentiment, the almost filial fidelity of its members, antagonized and defeated the plan. So, having builded for itself a castle befitting its aristocratic antecedents, the proud old Mercantile waits its fate with a sad dignity, believing and trusting still that a prosperous and brilliaut future is in store for its later days.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The Christmas Edition of The Wave will be one of the most original and characteristic publications ever made in California. Eschewing all stereotyped scenic effects, it will present at least eight full pages of photographs representing the home life of the various nationalities that have adopted California as their home. The set will make an admirable exhibit of that city which Stevenson called "a vast smelting-pot of races and metals," and the pictures are quite the cleverest ever caught of the subjects. The cover, a beautiful design in four colors, is by George H. Piper, sculptor of the Stevenson Monument.

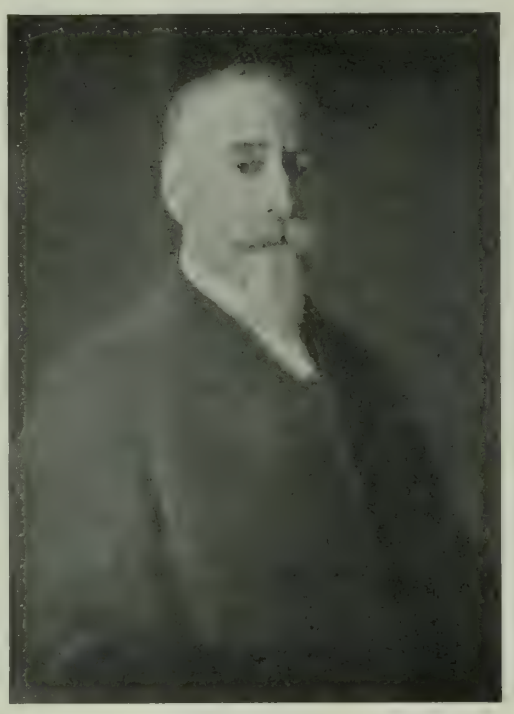
Apropos of the literary tone which pervades our issue of this week, it may be well to speculate briefly on the "clerk at the desk" in the prominent circulating libraries of this and other cities as a factor in the disseminating of the popularity of a certain book and a moulder of literary taste in a community such as this. It is instructive and—more or less—edifying to stand for half an hour at a corner of his desk any day in the week between the hours of eleven and half-past twelve. A never ending procession of girls and young women file before the autocrat asking invariably one of these questions: "What's something new?" "Tell me something good?" "Which of these books is the best?" The answer is given with an assurance that admits of no controversy or hesitation. Of course, the demand is for fiction and the young woman departs with the autocrat's choice under arm, serenely persuaded that she has something good and "new," and quite the best thing going. The "clerk at the desk" might be said to exert an influence in the feminine community second to none; "what he says goes." If he says a book is black, she says it is good. If the oracle proclaims the same book white, she says it is better. He is the maker and creator of taste. Why not play upon her weakness and his power. Why do not some of the enterprising publishers

GEORGE CROCKER
Recently elected Second Vice-President Southern Pacific Co.

—or authors for that matter—tip the autocrat a twenty or so to boom their particular novel. Young doctors are known to tip hotel clerks in this fashion. Why not "see" the autocrat of the public library desk in the matter of popularizing your "novel" or "collection" of short stories. There is perhaps, an idea here. It would be "American enterprise" surely.

***

Inspiring reports travel back to us from the work of Les Jeunes now in New York. As far as can be learned not



GENERAL HOWELLS
From the painting by Jos. D. Strong in the Bohemian Club exhibit one of the younger literary set has gone from San Francisco to Manhattan that has not promptly found his or her niche, or at least a place to stand on and cry their little message. They cried it out here in their native city, it would seem, but a cry from the West to the East does not carry far. It was the voice of one crying in the wilderness. Now that the Jeunes have been elevated to their several niches in New York we are beginning to hear them—better, we are beginning to listen to them. Miss Geraldine Bonner, so I am told, is to have a story in the Christmas Harper's and Burgess contributes beautiful little yarns to the holiday St. Nicholas and to Life. By the way, I understand that the Enfant Terrible which the "Lark man" publishes jointly with Oliver Herford has made its appearance, and rather more than justifies expectations. It is a four page weekly, full of nonsense on distinctly French, or rather Parisian lines.

***

Every now and then one hears a good deal of talk about the younger literateurs of San Francisco and their circles and their successes in the East or even in London. But there is not much said of our middlemen in the matter of literature, to wit, our publishers, at least, not as much as should be. Doxey, Robertson, Dodge, have all of them published editions of story books, pamphlets, essays, poems and Xmas books, etc. Robertson and Dodge have just recently put out some Xmas calendars that for printing, binding, quality of paper and downright clever artistic drawings are quite as much up to date as the most critical could desire. Doxey, of course, is the best of all, The Itinerant House from the "Sign of the Lark" was as fine a piece of bookmaking as anything that Houghton-Mifflin could produce, and Prof. Hudson's book was no less beautifully bound. Whatever the California authors may say of their native public, they surely can find no fault with the way the native publishers dress the children of their fancy.

***

It is said that Archibald Clavering Gunter owed the success of Mr. Barnes of New York largely to his own cleverness and to a ruse played upon a New York book dealer who was enterprising. Mr. Gunther published the book at first at his own expense, with the result that he soon had an enormous quantity left on his hands. In his dilemma and seeking to create a demand for the copies, he wrote letters to various bookdealers in and about New York asking for copies of the book in the name of fictitious purchasers. Soon the local supply was exhausted, and the small dealers turned to one of the larger book firms in New York asking for a fresh lot. This dealer in turn wrote to Mr. Gunther and rebuested him to forward a certain number. "Will you take all I have," answered the author. The dealer inadvertently replied that he would. Promptly the next morning a dray backed up to the curb in front of the dealer's store and a thousand copies of Mr. Barnes of New York were left in his place. To get out of what he believed to be a bad bargain the bookdealer made almost Herculean efforts to push and advertise the book in order to get the enormous stock off his hands. He induced a demand for Mr. Gunther's novel. The book began to sell. It, and its successors have been selling ever since.

***

Quite an assembly of the city's notables foregathered in the rooms of the Bohemian Club on Wednesday and Saturday of this week to view the exhibition of the work of the city's painters. The club has ever been a patron of art and the artists acknowledged the patronage and the implied obligation by a display of canvasses that quite took away the breath. The Hopkins house has never called out better work than that which now hangs upon the walls of the clubmen's Post street home. Huber's orchestra was on hand on both days, and on Saturday a lunch was served. All the "fashionable element" presented themselves as well for the sake of seeing the club as for seeing the pictures. The crush Saturday afternoon was monumental, and in the parlance of the advance agent, "hundreds failed of admittance." It is to be hoped that the Bohemian Club will follow up the lead so auspiciously opened, for more people of "class who buy" would attend a club exhibit than one held at the Hopkins house. An unusually large per cent of pictures bore the white label of "sold." Indeed, I am told that Charles Rollo Peters—who has made quite an enviable hit with his moonlights—sold every picture he exhibited.

***

The prize offered by the Bohemian Club in its exhibition of the work of local artists has not yet been decided at the time of this writing. However, in our opinion Charles Rollo Peters should stand the best chance of winning. We even venture to predict that he will win. His moonlights have been easily the feature, not to say sensation, of the exhibit, and it was around them that the crowds of visitors on Wednesday and Saturday was the densest. Mr. Peters, as everyone knows by now, has made a specialty of painting moonlight scenes in and around the old town of Monterey. So successful has Mr. Peters been in his efforts that the noise of his fame has reached across the seas to London. He has had a call from one of the biggest of London dealers, and is soon to transport himself and his moonlights to the English capital. The dealer has assured him of a great hit, and will give him a special exhibition. I hope and thoroughly believe that Mr. Peters will have a great vogue in London where the clamor is always after "some new thing." His work certainly is original, and his "After the Gringo Came" and "Chez Nous" are perhaps two of the best canvases ever done west of the Mississippi. By the way, here is a chance for the amateur and the collector before he leaves. Mr. Peters intends to dispose of a collection of curios, chiefly Napoleonic in character, which he will place on exhibition at some convenient and central downtown locality. I have seen this wonderful collection, and I can assure the amateur that it is quite worthy of any musee of the continent.

***

Almost every Californian, and certainly every San Franciscan for two generations, knows and loves "Uncle George" Bromley. Few of us here, however, know his brother, "Ike" Bromley, who is, in the affections of New York clubmen, what "Uucle George" is to Bohemia. Like his California brother, "Ike" is a wit of the first order. The other day, at a meeting of the Yale Club of New York, he delivered an address on "Individuals," and during the course of his remarks referred to a well-known American more celebrated for his large fortune and gorgeous wardrobe than anything else, whom we will call "Brown of Bridgeport." "And now," said Ike, "we come to Brown of Bridgeport. Like the lilies of the field, he toileth not, and he very seldom spun; and Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like Brown of Bridgeport——and I pause to remark that it was exceedingly creditable to Solomon!"

***

The election of George Crocker to the second vice-presidency of the Southern Pacific is generally commented on as a distinction fittingly conferred. There is no question but that he will prove a valuable factor in the counsels of the great corporation. He is quick-witted, decisive and capable, and has inherited much of that uncompromising vigor of character which distinguished his father. Mr. Crocker is interested in affairs generally, is ambitious and positive, and undoubtedly will be heard from in the future.

***

There has been a veritable renaissance at Burlingame of late, a revival of the interest in out-of-door sports, and the clubhouse and grounds are filled with an unwonted throng of members. Golf has suddenly become the great attraction and the links are thronged from day to day with enthusiastic golfers, and the vocabulary of the club bristles with such technicalities as "stimmie," "cleek," "niblick" and "putting green." The hounds are in fine fettle at present and have been had out over the course on several occasions. Two meets have already been held—one at San Mateo in front of Mr. Hobart's house, and another at Millbrae. The third is to be held next Saturday at Burlingame itself. Each Saturday and Wednesday the polo teams try conclusions on the great field near the railroad. Altogether Burlingame is just now one of the largest and jolliest of California's winter outing places.

***

The condition of affairs now prevailing in the Pacific-Union Club is unfortunate, to say the least. Though the project to move the institution to Van Ness avenue has twice been carried, and though bonds to pay for a handsome new building were liberally subscribed for, the Board of Directors,

THE BASKET MAN: BY SOLLY WALTER
From "California Chinese Calendar"
Copyright, 1897, by A. M. Robertson

setting the will of the majority at naught, refused to take action, and now the scheme has fallen by the wayside. Its supporters are tired of its advocacy and have lost interest in the institution, and its opponents, having won, are apparently satisfied with their success. Between chagrin and fatuity the club languishes. It must seek fresh quarters a year hence or take a ten years lease, which no one wants. No decision has been arrived at, and the membership list which numbered six hundred, has fallen to about three hundred and fifty. What is worse, both the University and Bohemian Clubs are drawing from the parent institution its younger and more progressive members, and nowadays you rarely see more than a corporal's guard in the big sitting room of the institution. Indeed, the directors have ordered the dining-room closed and meals are served in the breakfast-room. Heavens, how the glory of the institution has departed. It is not so long ago that membership in the P. U. was a mark of high social distinction, when it was the afternoon gathering place of the jeunesse dore, where there used to gather at dinner every night a coterie of chosen spirits, who discussed the vintages of clarets and the bouquets of hock with all the airs and graces of connoisseurdom. But many of this old crowd have gone the way of all flesh—the others grown tired of the familiar auspices, seek their pleasures elsewhere. There is room for a solid, conservative club here, for just such a club as the Pacific-Union used to be before it began to grow old and tired and sleepy. Mayhap a process of revival might be accomplished by some active, vigorous president, but it seems improbable, to judge by past failures, that a veritably energetic man would be given a free hand by the several cliques to work out a new destiny for the institution.

***

Many races make up California, and innumerable are the varieties of life that prevail within our boundaries. George Dougherty, a Trinity college man, who has rccently come to San Francisco, after a protracted sojourn in the upper ranches of Mendocino county, has many a story of the populace of that region, which he declares consists of the undefeated wing of Lee's army, which had retired from the conflict after Appomatox, and without bowing its neck to the yoke of the North, had taken bullock carts and come West, settling among the redwoods. Dougherty, who had long been out of work and was ready and willing to turn his hand or brain to aught that came, found in a Ukiah paper, an advertisement for a teacher to take charge of a newly created

A Nimble Duo

Two blithesome maidens who figure in "A Milk White Flag" at the Columbia little red school house, in a distant corner of the county. He sent in an application and was invited to meet the committee, and after a long and toilsome journey found himself in an up-country saloon, confronted by a set of grave and reverned grangers, plentifully be-chin-whiskered and all alive to the dignity of their commission. Dougherty states his business, and the spokesman began to interrogate him. "What kind of larnin' do ye teach?" he asked, and "where did ye have yer schoolin'."

"Trinity College, Dublin," was the reply. "An' I guess I can teach your boys and girls, as much reading and writing, 'rithmetic and geography as they need know."

There was a pause. The spokesman looked at his associates and then rather suspiciously at the applicant.

"You say you teach 'gography?' do you teach round or flat."

For a moment Dougherty was non-plussed. He was silent. Then struck by the stolid seriousness of the committee as it waited nervously for an answer, he realized what they meant.

"Gentlemen," he said, "in a matter of that kind of course I'd defer to the wishes of the committee."

"That was in '95," adds Dougherty, "and for two years past, I've taught in Mendocino connty that the earth is flat.

***

Rather a good mot, is that which is going the rounds of mesdames of the Century club. It is a mot just touched with enough asperity to give it the piquant taste demanded by such wits as are to be found by the score within the arcanum on Sutter street. It happened, so I am told, during the course of a committee meeting, and was precipitated by the remark of one of the "prominent members" who bangs her hair, and rejoices in the double distinction of being the daughter of her father and the wife of an ex-president of the State University—quite a personage in fact. I believe the lady in question remarked, with a mildly apologetic air, at the conclusion of a paper she had read. "My! If I keep on at this rate, I actually believe I will deceive you ladies into believing that I am a bright woman." What must have been the good soul's concern, when, instead of the fervid protestations she had hoped to provoke, a muffling silence ensued, broken only by one of the ladies—known, I think, in educational circles—who exclaimed sweetly: "My dear Mrs. ———, please don't allow your conscience to trouble you on that head. You've never deceived me for an instant. The "retort courteous," with a vengeance.

***

The Heathen Chinee is peculiar. Mr. Bret Harte discovered him long ago. But his vagaries and peculiarities are ever new. More especially in the Christianized than in the unregenerate sample. One of the ladies of Berkeley, the wife of a judge, once prominent, is happy—or otherwise—in the service of the former type, a harmless imbecile, who sings, in shrillest falsetto, "Pull for the Shore Sailor," while baking the bread, and renders "There Were Ninety and Nine," while preparing the lyonnaise potatoes. We are to suppose that his Christianity "comes out strong," on special occasions, and at times of unusual excitement. The following story, whose authenticity is like Cæsar's wife, happened but a week or so hence. The judge's wife was the hostess at what the society reporters elect to call an "elaborate dinner." The Chinaman, who occupied himself with the lady's gastronomic welfare, was bidden to do his best, and did, in fact, respond nobly to the call—too nobly, in fact, for, being evidently of that stripe of Christian who believes in putting his religion into the trivial affairs of every-day life, Ah Sing made, and caused to be served at desert, a frosted cake upon which was traced in raised letters of pink paste a beautifully lettered edition of the Lord's Prayer. But the hostess was equal to the occasion, and showed herself a thoroughbred even if she could not forsee the potentialities in a Christianized Chinaman. The cake was sliced and served. One can guess, however, that it proved something of a damper upon the post prandial gaiety of the occasion. Imagine feeding upon a quadrant of jelly cake with such fragmentary inscriptions—like slabs from an ancient tomb—as "Lead us not into temptation," or "Forgive us our trespasses," or—rather appropriate this—"Give us this day our daily bread."

***

It is a conceded fact that the worth of a new mining district is at first overestimated, and that afterwards, by a natural reaction, often ridiculously underestimated. It now transpires that the disquieting reports brought back from Peru by certain American prospectors, have been somewhat too somberly colored. The fact is, that there is gold and plenty of it to be mined in the Carabaya district of Peru, though not in such fabulous quantities as at first intimated. This much, however, is certain, that under existing conditions—such as the difficulty of evea reaching the district, the want of communication, and the vexatious impositions of the Peruvian government, Carabaya is no place for individual prospectors unbacked by capital. The mines cannot be properly worked until the introduction of machinery, and no machinery can be introduced until roads are built. The trouble in reaching the district may not be overlooked. Three days by rail, four by muleback and two on foot, through a rocky and often dangerous country, is something more than a pleasure trip. Comparatively speaking, the country is not opened up at all, though veins and deposits exist everywhere, and not a river runs that does no contain gold. The country is not favorable for prospecting, as it is thickly covered with forest trees. Nearly every class of wood exists from ironwood to mahogany, but as the wood has to be sawn by hand they are as yet of little use. There is no fever in the country, but the danger element is occasionally supplied by the "Cunchos," a certain tribe of the Indians, who have been known to attack and massacre isolated parties. The miners are all Indians, and it may be put the other way, about, that the Indians are all miners. For coarse gold they are very expert, but lose nearly all of the finer ore. A peculiarity of the Carabaya mines is that they all need timbering, and the vein proper is enclosed in a casing of decomposed slate, very difficult and slippery to handle, which, also, usually contains gold. The climate, however, is exceeingly good, the rainfall heavy, the temperature varying from 70 to 90 degrees Fahr. in the shade, in the daytime, and 100 to 130 degrees in the sun. Articles of food have to be carried in on the backs of Indians. As game is scarce, dried potatoes and dried sheep's flesh appear to be the staples.

***

President Jordan of Stanford has been recently talking to the students of his college in a rather manly, straight-from-the-shoulder fashion. He has spoken to them about drinking and their frequenting saloons. But we have yet to hear some official reprimand from the Berkeley faculty in the matter of the behavior, or outrageous misbehavior, of a band of young gentlemen from the U. C., members of one of the fraternites that fosters and encourages its reputation for sportiness, exclusiveness and general rapidity in the manner of its living. These fellows presented themselves at the intercollegiate football game, on Thanksgivingday, in a half intoxicated condition, which they were at some pains to modify, by speedily becoming wholly, entirely and irretrievably intoxicated. They drank from flasks, did these gay and debonair gentlemen, and when the flasks were emptied, gayly and debonnairly threw them out upon the grounds. One of them became so extremely drunk that he tried to sit in places where there were no seats left, and was mishandled by a girl's escort and thrust forth into the space in front and in full view of the bleachers, an edifying and instructive spectacle for gods and men. However, I am slow to believe that this sort of thing is customary among the U. C. boys, and am sure that it is condemned and deplored by the better fraternities and better men.

***

A rather good joke is going the rounds of the clubmen o town, having Mr. Dobberton, the sculptor, for its principal character. In Willis Polk's diningroom, in the house on Russian Hill, there is, over the mantlepiece, an inscription in German, to the effect that the moon cares not however loud the dog bays. Was Kummertz den Mond daez die hunde bellen. At a dinner lately given by the young architect, a discussion arose as to the proper translation of the inscription. While the discussion was at its height, Dobberton entered, hurriedly, in the capacity of belated guest, and was appealed to in chorus for his opinion. The good man was not a little excited at the medley of voices, and hastened to respond without reflection: "What's die matter mit der moon dat die dog should park?"

BOSWELL JR.

KEEP OFF THE GRASS!

CLANCY'S REIGN OF TERROR IN SOUTH PARK

South Park, as everyone knows, is between Second and Third and Bryant and Brannan streets in this city. It is some aspect in wealth, and along its center for nearly the length of the block lies a park from which the locality takes its name. Years ago this was an aristocratic neighborhood. The houses are the substantial, though small, mansions of that day, with their curved facades, their odd balustrades and porticos and a rueful suggestion of vanished prosperity. The park is still hedged by a real stone coping; and its trees are older and sweeter of shade than those of the newer and more pretentious plazas of the city. But principally, the grass grows not less green than it did when it was pressed by feet of men and women who are now grandparents. Its flowers are, perhaps, more plebeian than formerly, but they are as fresh as ever, and the sun shines gayly on the park in spite of the smoke of the near-by factories and shops that drove away the older residents.

It would appear to the average observer of kindly disposition as a blessed and fortunate circumstance that since the removal of these older inhabitants their residences on either side of the pretty little park have come to be occupied by the humbler toilers who constitute the population of the district south of Market street. That in the mansions of the old-time rich, the new-time mechanics, laborers and shopkeepers of the city live and rear their numerous children. The nearness of the houses to a place of grass and flowers and sunshine would—to any one unacquainted with the habits of one Clancy—seem a true beneficence. But Clancy, who is a foreigner, and fond of exercising the petty "autority" delegated to him, at once dispels this humane illusion. Clancy is the keeper of the park. He cuts the grass, waters the flowers, and especially, he throws a shillalah of formidable girth at all those juveniles who walk upon the turf. Sometimes Mr. Clancy is absent, and the more adventurous of the children play at will in the park. But the timid ones are perpetually haunted by a dread of Clancy's stick, and no amount of persuasion can tempt them to leave the adjacent gutters which as a playground in the only alternative of the park.

The fact of the matter is, that here, where if anywhere in the city of San Francisco, the little children have need of a playground, such makeshift for nature as a park and the pitiful blessing of a little sunshine, is denied them. Suppose they trampled the grass and picked the flowers, what harm would be done? Suppose that Clancy had to work a trifle harder in consequence. He would at least save the exertion he now puts forth when he throws his cruel stick. If the city of San Francisco can afford to maintain a Golden Gate Park, where all who will may roam over the grass, it seems not unreasonable that it should permit the children of Third street to indulge in the dissipation of romping on the grass in South Park.

Prominently attractive among the brilliant array of Christmas novelty books is Cupid's Game of Hearts, published by the Dodge Book [illegible]. The story is told by letters, newspaper clippings and a telegram, so admirably reproduced, that it is hard not to believe in their genuiness. It is a pleasant, sprightly tale, involving a bogus count, a ruined capitalist and, of course, a young man and a girl, of the stalwart American type. It makes most delightful reading [illegible] assembly of Christmas gifts. The illustrations are by Stella Alys Wittram, and are full of dash and what the French call chic.

---

At a bazaar in Windsor in aid of the Royal Albert Institute, Princess Christian sold photographs of Queen Victoria, signed with Her Majesty's autograph, for $5 each. The stock was sold out in a few minutes, whereupon the Princess remarked: "I do not see why we should not petition mamma for some more." A messenger was then dispatched to the castle and the Queen supplied more signed photographs of herself. Her Majesty continued doing so during the three days which the bazaar lasted, and even then the demand for her photographs was not satisfied.

Bismarck has of late grown moody and seclusive, to such an extent that even his own family can hold but little communication with him. He has refused to follow his physician's advice to winter in Egypt as the only way to obtain relief from his neuralgia. Gladstone's temperament is in direct opposition. He is cheerful, contented and unmindful of worldly troubles, and, according to Lord Roseberry, who recently visited both statesmen, has five more years of life in him than his German contemporary.

The Maker of Pipe Bowls, by Sally Walter
From "California Chinese Calendar"
Copyright, 1897, by A. M. Robertson

HOLIDAY LITERATURE

The Chinese and California Girl Calendars —Remington's Great Sketches.

There comes to hand a batch of Christmas calendars, artist's publications, almanacs and an alphabet, all of them of an excellence that astounds you.

The best local people first. Solly Walter strikes the Chinese note, in a calendar illustrated by pen pictures of Chinese life, that are very fetching. Mr. Walter has had wit enough to see the possibilities in the life nearest to hand, and has caught it, and reproduced it in his calendar, with a fidelity and appreciativeness that is bound to make his effort successful. One would especially recommend his calendar to eastern folk—did it need recommendation. The little sketches and drawings are of the intimate life and daily customs of the San Francisco Mongol, as we see him, and as perhaps he is seen nowhere else. Mr. Walter is a careful and accurate draughtsman as well as an artist, and his calendar is bound to be popular. That the public have appreciated the effort we may infer from the enormous sale, and from the fact that the publisher, A. M. Robertson, reports that the first edition is already exhausted.

A CHINESE MERCHANT: From "California Chinese Calendar"
Copyright, 1897, by A. M. Robertson.

Solly Walter has long been before the public of San Francisco, as an illustrator and a maker of pen and inks, but in her calendar, Gertrude Partington makes what is really her first bow to the Western world. She will bow to the world—The World—east of the Mississippi, before long. So much is said and signed, if the drawings in the "California Girl Calendar" are an earnest of her work. There is a touch of Remington—Frederick the Great—in her drawings, and, indeed, I remember when I first saw the cover picture of the hunting girl, I looked for F. R.'s cachet in the corner. The hunting girl is capital, even though one questions the great size of the horse's shoulder in comparison with the rest of his anatomy. Upon reflection, I cannot remember a single California illustrator, not even Peixotto, who has done any better figure work than this, unless it be, perhaps, Guy Rose. Best, and most exhilarating of all, Miss Partington is free from the influence of Gibson. In that, alone, she is to be congratulated. Again, Miss Partington knows how to draw a pretty girl, and that's a gift quite independent of all technical skill—a gift of which even such men as Kenyon Cox and Will Low are lamentably destitute. With all the accuracy of the drawing, and the freedom and security of the pen-movement, it's a very dear and lovable face underneath the old slouch hat, and the same is applicable to nearly every girl in the book.

Kemble has a "Coon Calendar" which, despite the greater fame of the man, is, to my notion, infinitely less pleasing than that of Miss Partington. It's a colored affair, published by R. H. Russel of New York, and will sell, no doubt, largely by reason of Mr. Kemble's previous reputation. Mr. Kemble's humor is too obvious, too direct to be very funny.

R. H. Russell & Son published two Christmas picture books: "An Alphabet" and "An Almanac of Twelve Sports." Both are illustrated by William Nicholson, and the "Sports" has verses, by Kipling, to face each page. Both are thoroughly artificial, and strain hard after effect, but the result is pleasing. Mr. Nicholson has touched a new note in the jaded gamut of poster art. His style is the style of the Japanese sketch artist, with a suggestion from wierd, mad Blake — heavy shadows that are one with the background, and dwindle gracefully and suddenly in fine, curved, sweeping butlines. There is a certain originality, or, rather, bizarre effect in the drawings, and the color schemes are beyond praise. One has to hold the page at arm's length, however, to get the proper effect. The verses by Kipling are written in a vein of pungent grim humor, the one on boating being especially fine.

Copyright, 1897, by Dodge Book and Stalationery Co.

THE CO-ED

FROM "THE CALIFORNIA GIRL CALENDAR," BY GERTRUDE PARTINGTON

But one keeps Remington's "drawings" to the last for the sake of the final word. There is only one Remington—Frederick the Great—as one elects to call him, and there never will be another. Fresh from these stunning pages one is tempted to place him even above Gibson, though comparisons between the men are impossible. The drawings make one feel rather proud of being American and western. You would like to open the book before the eyes of your French friends in Paris, or your English chums in London. The drawings make a panorama of the brutal, unleashed, splendid life that goes thundering along from Idaho to Texas. The life of the broncho-buster, the Indian, the half-breed and the soldier—brave, vigorous and finely American. And the drama of these pictures! "The Charge of Roman Nose," for instance. The "Fight Over a Water Hole," with its hit horses—the one so horribly, stiffly dead, and the other broken-backed and floundering. There is not a picture that is not crammed to the margin with action or suggestion, and there is many an oil "painting" on the walls of European galleries, that has not the pathos and feeling and truth of the 12x8 halftone reproduction that closes the volume, "The Twilight of the Indian." Remington's horses should be accorded a place in the world's art, beyond the mere transitory popularity of magazine illustration. Perhaps no artist that ever lived understands horse action so well as this American illustrator of ours; and, as for character, one has only to compare them with the stuffed, melodramatic lay figures of Rosa Bonheur to note how absolutely true they are, how thoroughly faithful to nature, how indisputably equine.

FROM DRAWINGS BY FREDERIC REMINGTON

"A MISDEAL"

Copyright, 1897, by R. H. Russell.

AMERICAN LIFE

As Rendered in the Latest Novels by W. D. Howells and Brander Matthews.

If one were to classify types of American literature—though the "classifying of types" is a hateful business at best—one would be tempted to some such arrangement as this: I. Fiction. Class A.—All American fiction writers less W. D. Howells. Class B.—W. D. Howells less all American fiction writers. One would even hesitate at classifying the "Dean" as a writer of literature at all. There should be some new name for an effort like An Open-Eyed Conspiracy, "a transcript of real life" might do, but one is bothered as to terms just as Mr. March was bothered to accurately define the architecture of the pavilion in the opening of The Conspiracy. The title is misleading; the word "conspiracy" might lead the unhowelized reader to forsee something of plot; but the "Dean's" latest transcript (?) of life is plotted about as much as a multiplication table. It is not even written—it's struck off in the hit or miss way, which with Mr. Howells never misses. One is is inclined to like An Open-Eyed Conspiracy better than The Epic of the Jay, The Landlord of the Lion's Head. Continuity of action, that is, things happening day by day, is always desirable in Mr. Howell's kind of novel. When one has to jump a week or two, or a month or two, or a year or two, between chapters, one demands the impetus of a violent and headstrong "plot" to carry one over the break. There were a good many of these jumps in The Landlord of the Lion's Head, and the reader, running as he read, arrived at the end fagged as a hurdler at the tape. But An Open-Eyed Conspiracy entices one along with beautiful evenness, the events—or rather, since we are dealing with Howells—the incidents of one chapter-end run over into the beginning of the next chapter; there ls no pause, no break, no intervals of time longer than absolutely necessary for the characters to go to bed. The "conspiracy" had to be short. This sort of thing cannot be kept up for more than a couple of hundred of rather heavily-laden, deeply-margined pages. It is really a long short story—or, if you prefer it, a short long story—a little segment, as one might say, nipped delicately out of the round of life, but with certain suggested radii—in the way of moralizing and philosophizing—that run back into the centre and heart of things, charming, suggestive, but geometrically true.

The character in The Open Eyed Conspiracy that pleases one most most is Mrs. March. The "Dean" created the American wife—of the kind that have been long married, the middle-aged American wife, Mrs. March is delightful, deliciously inconsistent, bossing her husband till she bewilders him into the sorriest scrapes and then immediately placing the whole burden of responsibility upon his shoulders. If the affair of Mr. Kendricks and Miss Gage had resulted disastrously, Mr. March would—naturally—have been to blame. The merit of its successful and charming consummation was—with equal naturalness—assumed by Mrs. March. Mr. March's whimsical and good-humored toleration of his wife's vagaries is—after the characterization of the lady herself—one of the best features of the book.

As a picture of American life at the end of the nineteenth century, the little story is veritably historic. It is real without vividness, interesting without violence, picturesque without dramatic effect. The "Dean" is too much of the bon bourgeois to take any pleasure in "scenes." The nearest approach to a "scene" is the hop given at the big hotel, where Mr. March, with ludicrous remissness in his capacity of chaperone, allows Kendricks and Miss Gage to dance together the whole evening, and afterwards connives with them shamelessly to doctor the young lady's dance card with the names of fictitious "partners" in order to deceive Mrs. March.

It is the custom of reviewers at this point to conclude their critique by a paragraph of summaries beginning wtth the words, "On the whole Mr. Howell's book," etc., etc., asserting that "it would be unfair to the author to tell the story of the plot" (just as if the reviewer had any such intent), and concluding with a little flourish of rhetoric to the effect that the "book must be read to be appreciated" (as though possibly it might be appreciated without being read). But there is no story in the Open Eyed Conspiracy. It is merely a few connected incidents of life at an American watering place, terminating in an engagement between a young fellow from New York—a very human, ordinary sort of young New Yorker, not at all like the howling aristocrats of Mr. Davis that make one feel uneasy and commonplace and obtuse—and a young American girl from a small town on the Atlantic seaboard. The situation is as old as Saratoga itself; the manner of its treatment is all Mr. Howells.

(An Open Eyed Conspiracy: Harper & Bros.)

* *

Professor Brander Matthews is out with a fresh lot of short stories under the rather feeble title Outlines in Local Color. They are supposed to represent certain phases of Manhattan life, and the characters and scenes vary from the kind of people to be seen at the Horse Show, and who figure in the best story in the book Men, Women and Horses, to the servants who afford the reader A Glimpse of the Under World.

But the stories are lamentably superficial. They might happen equally in Paris, Chicago or Johannesburg. Outlines they are, without doubt, with a certain amount of color (color in the literary sense of the word is not difficult of attainment by even a tyro). But the color is distinctively not localized, except in the tale already mentioned that envolves the New York Horse Show. Mr. Matthews is a looker on, he is not an observer. Possibly the fault lies with the title and not with the stories. The word "local" is what offends. Mr. Matthews calls for our consideration of New York life, thunders and trumpets for it. Of the twelve stories that make up the collection, seven, barring the names of the streets, localities and public buildings, could happen in any large city the world round.

There is the reek of the Manhattan asphalt in even Mr. Harding Davis' yarns and a reflected glitter of electrics, that is New York to the life. Even if R. H. D. had laid the scene in Vienna we would not believe him. It is easy to see that effect for which Mr. Matthews is striving—brief little snapshots of the big city's life, to be read and considered as a whole like a series of pictures in a cinematograph. They are phases of New York life no doubt, these Outlines, but they are not significant phases. The story A Letter of Farewell, for instance, has no reason or excuse for being. It shows nothing, it points nothing, it gives no new light upon an old situation, nor is it a new situation seen in a new light. The story is a fair sample of those that make up the volume. In the Watches of the Night could have been told in half the space with double the effect, while The Vigil of McDowell Tutro impressess one merely with its falseness to probability. Men, Women and Horses, though slight as to motif, is the most convincing and pleasing story of the lot. A cleverer writer than Mr. Matthews would, however, have concealed the point of the story till the very last paragraph.

The illustrations by Smedley, as we remember them in the larger compass of the magazines were capital. Their reproductions on the smaller pages of the novel are about as bad as any we have seen in this year's crop of new books.

(Outlines in Local Color: Harper & Bros.)

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

THE YOSEMITE IN VERSE.

From our stand point it is difficult to form an honest estimate of The Voice of the Valley (Wm. Doxey, publisher). As his compatriots in the East have done before him, and are still doing, the author has gone forth to commune with nature, and has given voice to his sensations. The poem is purely Oriental in conception, and is not governed by any known rules of prosody. We find a series of utterances, exclamatory in character, without continuity, and clearly the result of an ecstatic condition. That Yone Noguchi sees with a poet's eyes, and feels with a poet's heart is evident. He sings as the wind sings, and the wonder is that he could do it at all in the Anglo-Saxon tongue. In no sense artistic, his unwonted forms of expression will attract attention, and perhaps excite admiration. Walt Whitman essayed the same role, and strange to say, found an audience on two continents.

As a piece of book-making, The Voice of the Valley certainly deserves the highest commendation, though that is conferred when it is said that it maintains the high typographical standard which Mr. Wm. Doxey has set in previous publications. Here are a few of the opening lines of the first poem:

O thunderous opening of the unseen gate solemn Heaven's Eternal Court!
Behold, clouds, tenants of the sky, sweep down from the Heavens unto a secret palace under the Earth!—
Aye, mighty Yosemite!—a glorious troop of the un-suffering souls of gods
Marches on with battle-sound against the unknown castle of Hell!—
Aye, a divine message of Heaven unto Earth—the darksome house of mortals—to awake!
Hark—the heart-broken cry of a great Soul!—

BOOK NOTES

The first of the "Just So" stories by Rudyard Kipling is begun in the December St. Nicholas. The illustrations are by O. Herford. Ruth McEnery Stuart contributes 'An Old-Time Christmas Gift," a tale of slavery days, and Frank R. Stockton continues his pirate series. "The Court Jesters of England," by Amelia Wofford, is an interesting historical sketch, and two new serials of special interest to boys are "The Lakerin Athletic Club," by Rupert Hughes, and "Two Biddicut Boys," by J. T. Trowbridge.

The Christmas Ladies' Home Journal issues a supplement, "The Lost Chord," the only correct version of that song ever published in this country. Lilian Bell continues her English papers, and a new series touching upon Washington official life is commenced. Mary E. Wilkins contributes a New England sketch, and Hamlin Garland the first installment of a new story, "The Doctor."

The hero of God's Foundling, by A. J. Dawson (D. Appleton & Co.) is a young man with glinting fair hair. He is twenty-three, a medical student, and in more ways than one is agreeable and acceptable. The foundling in question is a young woman who is unfortunately orphaned shortly before the first chapter. She naturally dresses in black, and appropriately carries about a pale but charming face. She falls in love with the aforementioned medico, who returns the affection, but before things terminate happily the course of love runs rather rough. All this is ordinary enough, but the telling of it is bright and interesting.

The title of The Lost Gold of the Montezumas, by W. O. Stoddard (J. B. Lippincott Company), suggests adventure, the illustrations continue the idea, but in the realization of it in the tale one leaps all ordinary bounds. It is literally steeped in adventure, fairly reeking with Indians, and bowie knives and Spanish doubloons. The Alamo figures prominently, and a number of now historical characters, Crockett, Bowie, Houston and Santa Anna. The balance of the cast is well filled with Mexicans, Indians, Americans and half-breeds. All these people get together with different degrees of affection and as a result rather lively times ensue. The book is essentialy for boys, and, as it is good as any of Mr. Stoddard's preceding works, it may be set down as a success.

Mary Hartwell Catherwood has made The Days of Jeanne D'Arc (The Century Company), an interesting narration of the trials and triumphs of the Maid of Orleans. Mrs. Catherwood has versed herself pretty thoroughly in the ways and times of the maid by travel as well as by study and research. The result of all this laudable endeavor is exhibited in the book, which makes a pleasant, smooth and agreeable piece of work. Mrs. Catherwood makes her Joan a pathetic as well as a heroic figure, capable of exciting love as well as popular affection. She has also written the book in modern English, for which discretion much commendation is due.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

BARNATO'S BUSINESS ABILITY

The Great Fortune Achieved by Him in Stock Speculation.

The late Barney Barnato was really in his way a great man. He had a splendid mind for finance, and could conceive and execute a great plan in the broadest lines. One of his business principles was that every enterprise in which he engaged should be made to produce a profit, never consenting to set off the loss on one undertaking against the gain on another. From the very beginning Barnato exhibited in his operations in Kimberley an immense capacity for work and unceasing vigilance. When the first breathings came to Kimberley of the Transvaal gold discoveries, he betook himself to the spot, and, convinced that gold was there, bought up all the likely ground, until the holdings of his firm became, and still remain, the largest on the Rand.

To his marvelous business instinct Barnato added an immense capacity for figures and a genius for the Stock Exchange, which made him the most important operator in Kaffirs, until no one could bring out a new venture, no matter how good it might be, without his help to make the market, and in every good thing that was floated he had to be considered and consulted, and finally let in, to secure his help. This resulted, as he frankly admitted, in his making more money by aiding or frustrating the plans of others—operations in which he never appeared at all—than by the long years of unremitting attention to his own projects. In acquiring his fortune it was not a question of luck with Barney, but unsparing, unceasing toil devoted to every detail of his business—an unique power of concentration and a marvelous grasp of detail. In all his mining or industrial operations there was not a single feature of the working, a single apparatus or process used, with which he was not perfectly familiar. This intimate knowledge stood him in good stead, for in Johannesburg and in London, when angrily denounced by speculators suffering under apparent loss, his intelligent explanations of conditions always resulted in a withdrawal of charges and a renewed vote of confidence.

With increasing work the strain upon him became more intense. One morning, after a breakfast with several financiers, the talk turned to general topics, and finally to boxing. Suddenly turning to one of his guests, Mr. Barnato gripped his arm fiercely and said: "D'ye know what would do me good? Twenty minutes with the gloves every morning. But I can't do it now. I have hardly time to live." A few days later, and with as sudden an interruption, he said: "D'ye know, there is one thing I don't like? I never felt my work too much for me before. I could come home, leave it all behind me, go to bed and forget it. I can't now. I go to bed with it, sleep with it, dream of it, and wake up with it. I don't like it, I tell you."

Barnato was [illegible] studying men in their hours of relaxation and knowing what everyone else was doing. He never met a man without analyzing [illegible] as to what extent they might benefit the interest of his firm, and he never [illegible] anything else he desired to remember.

But in all his ventures and social relaxations he lived a life of appalling solitude and loneliness. Barney made friends with men that he might use them for his own interests, not for personal pleasure, and in return he never expected nor could he realize, that any man would look differently upon himself. To him all mankind were [illegible] chessmen for his game of life, and leeches who would suck what they could from him and hang wherever possible.

Had he lived longer the awful solitude would have worn away. It had commenced to disappear with the birth of his two children, by whom the later years of his life had been brightened.

The music of Huber's Del Monte Orchestra adds greatly to the success of all entertainments. Telephone, care of Benjamin Curtaz, Main 1247.

The registered trade-mark, "The Cat and Barrel Band," of Boord & Son, London, has been in constant use by them since 1851 on their Boord's Old Tom Gin and Orange Bitters. All persons found printing or using the same will be duly proceeded against by their agents, Messrs. Charles Meinecke & Co.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send, free of charge, to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p m

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

Two Leading Gifts

Cupid's Game With Hearts

$1.50

This is one of the most unique books of the season. The sale has been so great that four editions have been sold within three months. The book consists of a clever collection of letters and documents, with over seventeen charming illustrations by a leading artist. It makes a beautiful gift. Bound in white and gold. Price $1.50.

California Girl Calendar

50c.

The "California Girl Calendar," by Gertrude Partington, is without question the leading calendar of the year. The sale of this beautiful collection of drawings by California's leading artist has been really phenomenal.

Town Talk says: "Gertrude Partington's pen and ink sketches deserve to rank with Gibson and Wenzell's American Girls."

DODGE BOOK AND STATIONERY CO.

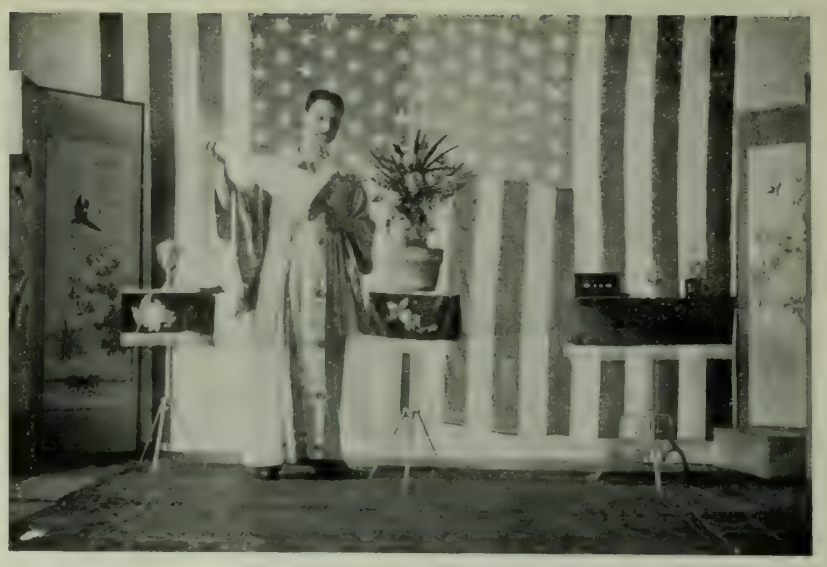
112 POST STREET SAN FRANCISCO

THE SANTA CLAUS SHOW



THE HINDOO MAGICIAN GROWING FLOWERS FROM SEED

HOLIDAY ENTERTAINMENTS AT THE EMPORIUM AND GOLDEN RULE BAZAAR

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

This, Diary dear, is the month of balls—Terpsichore reigns supreme from now until the end of January. Let me see. This week we have two big dances—the Terpsichorians, on Wednesday, which I shall describe later, and the first Assembly, on Friday. Between you and me, dear Diary, I am terrorized at the thought of the Assembly. I don't know how it is, but nearly all of us debutantes feel nervous about it—Leila says she was exactly the same when she came out. I suppose it must be that because, in a way, so much depends upon one's success there—it is like running the gauntlet—If you are a belle there, your laurel crown cannot be torn from you—and if a failure, your social grave is dug. I am going to wear a poem of a frock, and that augurs a battle half won. The days of the Familiar quotations about "beauty unadorned" and "youth" and all that sort of thing, passed into oblivion when the debutante took her stand as a social factor. It is only King Cophetua who ever made a beggar into a princess, and I am sure he regretted the fact but once—and that was for the remainder of his life.

I, myself, realize what a disadvantage girls labor under who have not had a grandmother, even here, where some of us have already forgotten whether we are genuine F. F. V.'s or merely quadruple plate. I wish, however, that we girls had more real friendship, one for the other. It is surprising what a thin veneer of politeness covers our real feelings. Positively, some of the girls would cheerfully consign their former schoolmates to a social oblivion more Cimmerian in its darkness than Hades is supposed to be. I do not understand the feeling, myself, but suppose I am so certain of my own position that I cannot fancy it being asssailed, in any way, and besides I am sufficiently attractive to float or sink without let or hindrance from either party. Several of the mothers are most ardent partisans, and instead of advising their daughters to be charitable, or at least neutral, urge them on to snub the other set. The most amusing part of it all is, that no two of either crowd will agree on which of the others shall be ostracised. You go to one house and find that this girl is positively gushed over, while her friends are left out. In another house this maiden is voted anathema, and two or three others receive an ovation. But enough of this gossip. If the girls would only realize that each is her own worst enemy, and that in union lies not strength, possibly, but certainly the most pleasure they would not so frequently condemn where they should condone. As for the mothers—well, surely they are old enough to have learned the becomingness of Charity. I wonder how many have plucked the motes from their own eyes before seeking the beam in their sisters.

Now for the fun of the week. On Saturday I went to several of the teas. I first went to the Requa-Long reception, at Piedmont. It was a very smart affair with numberless Oaklanders there. 'Busses took us to and from the cars. Mrs. Mark Requa and Mrs. Long were assisted by Ethel Moore, Nina Pringle, Luita Booth, Jessie Glascock, Ella Morgan and Belle Mhoon. From there, I went to Mrs. George Palmer's tea at which she introduced Gertrude. It was a jolly affair, and the rooms were positively packed with men and maids anxious to congratulate Gertie. She looked charming in a soft, white organdie trimmed with lace. May Palmer also looked well in pink veiled in chiffon. She was assisted by Reed Hutchins in white, Bertie Bruce and several others. From there I went to Mrs. Gaston Ashe's reception. Mrs. Ashe was assisted in receiving by Mrs. Will Ashe, Mrs. Harry Durbrow, Marie Wells, Leontine Blakeman, Ethel Keeney and Genevieve Peters of Stockton. All the girls wore white frocks and looked ever so pretty. Mrs. Ashe was also in white. Mrs. Will Ashe in grey silk. The decorations were red berries, which gave an air of Christmas to the festivity. There were surprisingly few men, and those of the older crowd. By the way, I thought Princess Poniatowski looked positively stunning in a gown of black velvet, with big picture hat covered in plumes.

On Monday night I went to Helen Hopkins dinner and had great fun. I sat by Larry Van Winkle, who amused me vastly by his tremendous information about things and styles. He criticised the form of everything, from the cut of the girls slippers to the lines of their profiles, and I was highly entertained. I like Larry, too. It's fine to get his ideas about what actually constitutes "good form." It is very few men who make an effort to be really correct about such things, and really he is quite instructive. Only he cannot bear to be interrupted when he is launched on the subject. The others at the dinner were the Hoffmanns, Lillie Follis, Caro Crockett and Edith McBean, Mr. Berry, Harry Stetson, Nat Wilson and Southard Hoffmann. On Tuesday Edna Hopkins gave us girls a luncheon, and we had a deliciously gossippy time, and tore all our dearest friends to tatters. The table was so pretty—what one might call a symphony in green and white. Gertie Carroll, Lillie Follis, Addie Murphy, Florence De Long, Margaret Salisbury, Therese Morgan, Helen Thomas and Miss Cadwalder were there. I am getting over my dislike to girls luncheons. They lack the responsibility of a dinner where one has to be more or less agreeable, but at a luncheon one rather shines by reason of one's ability to say sharp things about people. On Tuesday afternoon I went to Mrs. Chauncey Winslow's tea. It was smart to a degree. The music was excellent, the decorations charming, but, alas, the inclemency of the weather kept two-thirds of the guests from putting in an appearance and materially affected the success of the affair. Mrs. Winslow looked so well, too, in a pink gown. Mrs. Jones of Santa Monica wore pale grey brocade and pearls and diamonds—most effective jewelry. Mrs. Oxnard was in blue taffeta and black and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels in pink. The girls who assisted were Laura McKinstry, the Misses Sprague, Alice and May Hoffmann, Ella and Therese Morgan and Della Davidson. On Wednesday afternoon I received at Helen Thomas' tea, which was a pretty affair. No men were bidden, but we girls looked lovely, so that they missed a "beauty show." Daisy Van Ness, Therese Morgan Edna and Helen Hopkins and Mary Belle Gwen assisted Helen. In the evening we all went to the Terpsichorean dance.

I cannot tell you what a capital time I had at the Terpsichoreans' first party. It was simply an enchanting dance and the girls all looked lovely. It would have been difficult for even the least attractive maiden to have been a wallflower as the men were in the majority, and that to a great extent. The hall is fine, large and commodious, so nothing prevented our all dancing without treading on one another's toes or tearing our frocks to pieces. The Native Sons' Hall is prettily decorated so it was left in its natural state save for a few palms and potted plants which were placed in the musicians' stand. All of us appeared early as the music stopped at twelve sharp, and we wanted to have as much fun as possible. Who looked the prettiest? Well it is hard to say. Alice Hoffman was lovely in pale blue silk and chiffon; Mary Belle Gwin made a pleasing picture in cerise colored silk; I thought Marie Wells looked charming in pure white silk trimmed with rings of ribbon; Leontine Blakeman wore an exquisite pink gown which became her excellently well, and Ethel Keeney was even more attractive than usual in yellow. Muriel Atherton was especially admired. She wore white silk with steel trimmings and looked bonny. I admired Marie Oge so much, she was sweetly gowned in white organdie and lace; Charlotte Ellinwood wore a pretty gown of white liberty silk. The Terpsichoreans were received by Mrs. Thornton, who looked awfully well in pale gray brocade, Mrs. Keeney, who wore white brocade embroidered in roses, and Mrs. Blakeman in mauve brocade and jet. And so our first Terpsichorean is over, and it was as successful as its best wishers could have hoped. I only wish it were still in the future. I always like to have my particularly bright red letter days in anticipation.

On Thursday Mrs. Russell Wilson gave a dinner to about sixteen of us. It was immensely smart, and I felt especially elated as Bobbie Eyre took me in. That is really a great honor, for Bobbie has assumed great importance this season, and his attentions are bestowed as a species of social "hall mark." Some of the girls whom he has not taken up are furious, and actually declare Bobbie regards himself too seriously and call him "Airy Eyre," but it's pure jealousy. I really think, Diary dear, that a man who goes round so much as Bobbie does, has a right to assume the airs of a connoisseur—especially as he approves me. But while I'm on the subject of popular men I often wonder why more of the fellows do not follow in the footsteps of George De Long, who is really the most popular man in society. He listens to a girl when she is talking the most drivelling idiocy as if the fate of a nation hung on her words. One cannot help admiring him too as he is manly, plucky and not in the least bit of a snob.

On Friday night there is the Assembly. Saturday is an off day. I can't think of a thing that is to take place on that day. By the way, Alf Clement gave a big theatre party to Morosco's on Monday with supper afterwards. Next Monday Mrs. Henry T. Scott gives a dinner-dance to Edna Hopkins. There are to be eighteen at the dinner and about forty at the dance—all the younger crowd. Then on Wednesday she is to give another to her niece Mabel Champion, to which Leila has been invited. Then Mrs. Morgan gives a married ladies' luncheon in honor of Mrs. Jones of Santa Monica on Wednesday. The Stubbs girls give a tea on Thursday. Minnie Houghton is to give a dinner to Mr. De Haven prior to the Assembly on Friday. I hear of several other dinners for Friday—the only debutante one, however, is Gertie Carroll's.

The cards are also out for Marie Messer's dance and tableaux on the 20th. I wonder when the Tevis ball is to come off? Poor Susie Blanding has been out of it all this winter. She has been taking the rest cure for the last two months. Mrs. Tevis, too, is far from well and actually dreads the thought of the ball. I wish I could persuade papa to give one, but Leila has to have her house furnished and is always coming to him for money, and there is her wedding, so poor little Cricket has to eat out her heart in patience. And so adieu.

Yours ever, MISS CRICKET.

* *

Mrs. Charles G. Lathrop gave a charming children's fete at her home on California street, early in the week, in honor of her daughter, Miss Hermine Lathrop. The decorations were in green and Christmas berries, making a pretty holiday effect. About forty little ones enjoyed the entertainment which consisted of games, dancing and a dainty supper. Mrs. Lathrop was assisted in receiving by Mrs. Jane L. Stanford, Mrs. A. F. Wedman, Mrs. Frederick McWilliams, Mrs. Maroni and Mrs. Trevor.

The event of last week in Oakland was the Requa-Long reception on Saturday last. There were about two hundred and fifty invited. The house was massed in chrysanthemums and ferns. Those who assisted in receiving were Miss Pringle, Miss Booth, Miss Moore, Miss Glascock, Miss Herrick, Mrs. Geo. McNear, Miss Watt and Miss Annie Miller. During the afternoon many of the guests wandered through the grounds and admired the flowers.

Few brides have received as much attention as is now being accorded to Mrs. Harry East Miller. Ever since returning from her honeymoon she has been the recipient of teas, dinners and luncheons. On Thursday, Miss Juliet Garber gave a pretty little luncheon to the bride and bridesmaids at her home in Berkeley.

At present there is vast enthusiasm over the Golf Club started by Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Smith of East Oakland. Several meetings have already been held, and Mr. Edson Adams has offered the use of his grounds for the Links. Among those who are taking a vital interest in the affair are Mr. and Mrs. Moffitt, Mrs. Pedar Sather, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. McNear Jr., Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Edson Adams, Mr. and Mrs. Taft and others.

An event of much interest is the wedding of Mr. John Adams and Miss Tiny Haskell. Miss Haskell is a San Francisco girl, and is bright, attractive and clever. Her style of beauty is rather of the gypsy type, for she is slender, graceful, dark and piquante. Mr. Adams is a brother of Mr. Edson Adams, and is a fine business man. He is also much interested in horseflesh. The wedding is to take place at St. Luke's Church on the 16th.

The Macdonough Theatre was crowded to the very doors on Saturday, it being the occasion of the Junior Farce. The programme was an interesting one. It opened with a little curtain-raiser that was amusing, especially to the college boys and girls. The farce which followed, however, was farther reaching, and did not require an audience of friends to make it a success. Mr. Harold Symmes has proved his ability to write a really amusing composition. The dialogue was crisp and smart—the situations amusing. The boys and girls who took part also deserve commendation. Mr. Donnell covered himself with glory, and his appearance was the signal for wild applause. Mr. Durbrow appeared as natural as possible. Miss Tirrell, as the heroine, carried off the honors of the occasion. She looked pretty and graceful, had charming frocks and seemed as easy on the stage as if she had been born there. She delivered her lines, too, in excellent style, and enunciated with almost professional distinctness. Miss Simpson sustained her part well, and made an effective society woman.

There are many events in the future, chiefest among them, a dancing party by Mr. and Mrs. Van Loebensell on Friday evening in honor of Miss Craig and a card party at Mrs. Folgers on Tuesday.

The first meeting of the Berkeley Cotillion Club even exceeded the anticipations of its best wishes. There were about two hundred people present. The ballroom was decorated in palms and ferns. Among the girls whom I especially noted were Miss Florence Green, Miss Marie Rose Deane, Miss Smith of Claremont, Miss Ethel Moore and Miss Davenport.

Attractions continue to follow hard after one another at the Emporium. The life and gayety of the place are invitable. This week Veruello, a very wizard of Hindoo magic, grows plants and flowers whenever he pleases (while you wait), and does a world of marvelous feats. Santa Claus in Klondike costume smiles invitingly on the children, while the Venetian Ladies' Orchestra from the Orpheum nightly discourses melody in the rotunda.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's. 235 Bush street.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

California Books Suitable for Eastern Friends

WM. DOXEY

Publisher of The Lark and Other Good Things.

631 MARKET ST.

At the Sign of The Lark.

THE LARK, Books I and II

With table of contents, etc.; bound in canvas, with cover design of Piping Fawn and Pan Pipes painted by hand. Price, $3 each book.

And The Lark, you will wonder how you lived without it.—Boston Transcript.

The Lark's warblings have run like wildfire over the country, and are household rhymes now.—Chicago Times-Herald.

Everything in The Lark is clever.—Boston Commonwealth.

The faddists have produced some extraordinary things in the way of literature, but nothing more freakish has made its appearance in the last half century than The Lark.—New York Critic.

Every line in it is well worth perusal.—Jersey City Chronicle.

The Wild Flowers of California—

Their Names, Haunts and Habits

By Mary Elizabeth Parsons. Illustrated by Margaret Warriner Buck. 150 full-page illustrations. 450 pages, crown 8vo, bound buckram, suitable cover design, $2.00 net; 6 plates colored by hand and bound in white and gold, $3.00; full leather, $4 00; full leather decorated, $5.00.

A beautiful and comprehensive work, the first ever published in California.—Sunday Journal, Toledo.

This is the first time the story of the profuse and beautiful flora of California has ever been attempted and the work is well done.—Colorado Spring Gazette.

A book in which California should take a pride.—Sacramento Bee.

Sonnets of Jose Maria De Heredia.

Done into English by Edward Robeson Taylor. Beautifully printed on Dickinson Batchworth Deckle paper, foolscap 4to; artistically bound half vellum; edition limited to 400 numbered copies. $2.50.

Heredia is a master of the sonnet which he writes with that absolute perfection which no one not trained in the French verse making could reach.—San Francisco Chronicle.

New Book of Verse by the Homeless Snail.

The Voice of the Valley.

By Yone Noguchi, author of "Seen and Unseen." With introduction by Charles Warren Stoddard, and frontispiece after a painting by William Keith. 60 pages, foolscap 8vo, 75 cents.

Extract From Introduction.—Noguchi is a word-builder of startling originality and power. * * There are passages in his poems as lofty and abrupt as the precipitous walls of the valley he adores.

Mr. Doxey is to bring out a new book by the Homeless Snail entitled THE VOICE OF THE VALLEY. Clearly Mr. Doxey is living up to his shop The Sign of the Lark, which is saying a good deal.

Idle Hours in a Library.

By William Henry Hudson, Professor of English Literature, Stanford University. Author of "The Philosophy of Herbert Spencer," "Studies in Interpretation," etc. 250 pages, printed on Dickinson St. Albans laid paper, foolscap 8vo, cloth, gilt top, $1.25.

Contents: Samuel Pepys and His Diary; London in Shakespeare's Time; Two Novelists of the Restoration; The Bohemians of the Latin Quarter.

Idle Hours will delight the general reader and have distinct value for the student of literature.—San Jose Mercury.

The Missions of California—

Their Establishment, Progress and Decay.

By Laura Bride Powers. Numerous illustrations, with striking cover design by Florence Lundborg, crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, $1.25; full leather decorated, $3.00.

If this volume is not read with pleasure by thousands of Americans the spirit of romance must be dead among us.—Boston Journal.

It is in all the most compact history of the missions ever given to the reading public—Sacramento Record-Union.

So much taste has been displayed by Mr. Doxey in getting up this elegant specimen of the bookmaker's art that his Sign of the Lark promises some day to rival the famous Bodley Head of John Lane.—San Francisco Call.

Coming as it does from the Sign of the Lark it is almost needless to say that the volume is well printed and handsomely bound.—Brooklyn Times.

THE THEATRES

Plays of the Week, and How They Were Presented.

After the storm comes the lull, and so at the Tivoli, where "Rip Van Winkle" has followed "The Geisha." The audience has stayed out doors, and, although nearly all the public favorites are on the stage, the piece fails to draw. Perhaps the manner of its staging is the strong point; certainly the personnel of the chorus is not, and with few more people in the seats than behind the footlights, the effect is little else but melancholy. Stevens as Rip, the village lout, falls sadly short of the conception, but in later years, after his sleep, is a passable ancient. Leary as the innkeeper is good, though we thought his Anglo-Dutch at times showed a trace of the pigeon-English he has been cultivating for some weeks past. Tillie Sallinger was a pleasing Gretchen, and Edith Hall, as Kathrina, was sprighlly and in place. But the redeeming feature of a dreary representation taken altogether was O Mimosa San—we should say Florence Wolcott—as the Meenie Van Winkle of the second period. She looked as pretty as need be and sang likewise. Arthur Boyce, in the role of a spirit in the Kaatskills, afforded a welcome relief in his singing to the general want of harmony in the operatic efforts, and Phil Branson made a fair burgomaster. From no point of view, however, can the revival of Rip Van Winkle at the Tivoli be deemed anything but a failure.

Miss Maud Jeffries
The clever actress who accompanied Wilson Barrett to Australia.

* *

The five Picchiannis Sisters and their big brother, at the Orpheum, are six healthy, well-muscled young people, who, aside from their clever tumbling, are quite amusing in their affected by-play. Their act is well executed but possesses more merit than novelty. Czita, the violinist, is rather a calm zingara, as peaceful and gracious as a winter moon. Her eyes are dreams, and her dark hair tumbles over her embroidered back, right ripplingly. Her costume is pretty and her playing pleases the audience. The De Phillipis are delightful dancers—the madame in particular—she is deliciously piquant and Parisian—pierouetting about in a most sylphlike manner. The bolero is good and the French solo as well, but the Cuban affair is too obviously a bid for public approval, little of which it manages to receive. The De Phillipis should leave shoddiness alone and pay more attention to their art.

* *

The coming of Frederick Paulding will aid substantially the fortunes of the Alcazar. Mr. Paulding's ability and experience are good qualities in a stage manager, and, better still, in an actor, and as Mr. Paulding is to assume both positions in the Alcazar company, well balanced performances may be expected. "The Nominee" is coming off this week in a rather lively manner. Wright Huntington plays Jack Medford on his own lines and according to his own lights, both of which are finely illuminative. Mr. Paulding's Leopold Bunyon is a good bit of work. Mrs. F. M Bates plays a mother-in-law of the real stage sort and gives her lines with considerable energy.

* *

The fires of patriotism are well looked to at Morosco's this week. "Old Glory" is an American piece of the most pronounced nature, literally teeming with stars and sentiment, eagles and bravado. Through four whole acts old glory flutters with increasing credit, and finally, at the apotheosis, gracefully descends in benediction upon the united lovers. The scenery is good—the plaza at Valparaiso, in particular making a pretty picture.

Saves Time, Money, and Temper!

MADE IN CALIFORNIA!

SEND FOR SAMPLE

Office, 307 Sacramento St., San Francisco

DRAMATIC NOTES

For to-morrow (Sunday) evening at the Baldwin, the Italian Opera Company announces a special programme consisting of "Cavalleria Rusticana," the 3d act of "La Boheme," 4th act of "Trovatore" and several symphony numbers by the orchestra. The second week commences Monday with "Manon Lescaut," which will be repeated at the Saturday matinee. Tuesday "Trovatore" will be given, Wednesday "Ernani," Thursday and Friday "Aida," and Saturday a miscellaneous programme, including the new Italian opera, "The Little Hayden," its first production in this country.

Hoyt's "A Milk White Flag" comes to the Columbia Monday evening, and for two weeks will flutter to the gratification of the Hoyt-loving public. The piece is well in the lead among its peculiar kind, and is more or less breezy from beginning to end with infectuous humor and catchy melodies. The company includes John W. Dunn, George Tallman, Mary Marble, Lansing Rowan and Lillian Dane. "At Gay Coney Island" comes next.

Mme. Sofia Scalchi appears in concert at the California, Tuesday evening, Dec. 14th. The programme will include an act each from "Trovatore" and "Martha," given with all the stage accessories. Mme. Scalchi will be supported by Mlle. Marie Toulinguet, late of the Mapleson Company; Signor Guarini, tenor, Signor Achille Alberti, baritone, Mlle. Marie Du Bedat, mezz-soprano, and Signor Gallia, pianist.

Fritz Scheel is arranging an exceptionally fine programme for the second symphony concert which comes off at the Tivoli Thursday afternoon, December 16th. Among the numbers to be given are the overture to Euryanthe, Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, C Minor, Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Gotterdammerung" and Bacchanale from Saint Saen's "Samson and Delilah."

John Kernell, of the one time popular Kernell Brothers, makes his appearance next week at the Orpheum. Mr. Kernell has a bountiful supply of new songs and funnyisms. Another feature will be Prof. Ed Doherty's Canine Circus, a collection of ten cleverly trained poodles. Czita, the violinist, is retained, also Paulinnetti and Piquo, the six Picchianis Sisters, the Vesuviana Quartette and Servais Le Roy.

Mr. Thomas Magee will talk upon his adventures in the Klondyke at Native Sons' Hall, next Tuesday evening, Dec. 14th, for the benefit of the Mercantile Library. Mr. Magee has had some interesting experiences in the North and his telling of them should attract a large audience. As the library itself is worthy of much consideration, financial and otherwise, the affair promises to be very well patronized.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

The Royal is the highest grade baking powder known. Actual tests show it goes one-third further than any other brand.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

Mr. Otto Bendix, assisted by Mr. Guilio Minetti, gives his third recital at Byron Mauzy Hall, Tuesday evening, Dec. 14th. Cesar Franck's Sonata for Piano and Violin is down on the programme, also Liszt's Sonata in B Minor and Saint Saens' Introduction and Rondo.

Preliminary to its Eastern tour, the Frawley Company will play two weeks at the California commencing Dec. 20th. "An International Match" will be given, also "The Railroad of Love" and "Shenandoah."

A play of much interest will be given next week at the Alcazar in "Will She Divorce Him." Matrimony is the motive of the piece, and in its different phases the question is given much consideration.

Next week at Morosco's the comedy-drama "Bootle's Baby" will be given an elaborate production. The cast includes Mr. Pascoe as "Bootles," Miss Hall, the heroine, and Miss Atwood, Bella.

"Rip Van Winkle" will be continued at the Tivoli until next Saturday evening, when it will make way for the holiday spectacle, "Mother Goose" or "The Strange Adventures of Jack and Jill."

Mr. C. P. Neilson's exhibition of sketches at his Alameda studio closes next Thursday. The affair has been very well attended, the pictures receiving much favorable attention.

A Christmas Suggestion

Monogram seals in dainty Dresden designs are to be seen in great variety at the stationary store of Cooper & Co., on Market street. For the holiday these make an acceptable gift, and engraved with the monogram are extremely

AT SLOANE'S

Artistic Furniture

Embracing hundreds of pretty and unique pieces that make appropriate Christmas Gifts.

Carpet Department

Have constantly in stock an immense line in all grades, including the choicest selections of the latest designs in Wiltons, Axminsters, Moquettes, Body and Tapestry Brussels.

Special attention is drawn to this department, where customers can buy goods DIRECT FROM THE MANUFACTURERS.

Drapery Fabrics

We have a large variety of interesting stuffs, both plain and figured, for wall hangings and draperies.

Lace Curtains

Among our choicest and latest novelties are some exceedingly fine values in Brussels, Irish Point and Nottinghams.

Stock many times greater than can be found elsewhere on the coast.

We invite inspection of goods and comparison of prices.

W. & J. SLOANE & CO.

Nos. 641-643-645-647 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

CHRISTMAS MAGAZINES

Covers That are Merely Coverings — Lew Wallace's Blank Poem.

To commence with, the covers of the Christmas magazines are inartistic. Harper's and the Century are done in two colors and are both unsatisfactory. Even the Ladies' Home Journal, which ordinarily presents itself in kaleidoscopic array at this time of the year, emerges in most commonplace garb. Wherefore this dullness? Surely the enterprise of Editor Bok is not to become less significant; wherefore should the guiding spirit of Harper's preserve all the beauties of art merely for the decoration of Lew Wallace's poem. Hast read "The Wooing of Malkatoon"? One gathers an unpleasant impression that the author is attempting to out-Arnold Sir Edwin. The quality of the verse is journalistic; it lacks distinction and all those virtues of thought and diction, which make "Sohrab and Rustum," for instance, a great poem. In the description of the lovely daughter of the dervish, there is no touch of eloquence, and one asks why, after Othman had seen the maiden's face.

> Above a fallen veil, a gleam of white
> Made whiter by the blackness of the hour
> Through which it shone.

Why he required "the throbbing of his heart" to know "her beautiful"? However, the Orient and Wallace have their own mysterious ways of stating simple facts. Not unnaturally, Richard Harding Davis' contribution follows the verse of Ben Hur. He is really most entertaining, is Mr. Davis; it is capital stuff. The description maintains the proper level of newspaper eloquence—brilliant at times, but facile, particularly clear but quite undistinguished. And yet, I doubt if anyone has written a better account of the great celebration. It is far ahead of this writer's article about the Russian coronation. Mr. Caton Woodville's pictures, however, are poor extracts from the fine photographs of the great show—far below the Harper standard. Apropos of pictures, why has Mr. Siddons Mowbray made his "Annunciation" angel so hopelessly plain? She is a large, high-waisted Juno, who looks as if her limbs have been pinned into place. Palpably her wings are too small. However, the text was not inspiring, for if ever a Christmas poem bore evidence of being written to order, it is "Annunciation," by Harriet P. Spofford. "Spanish John" arrives at its conclusion in this number, and will emerge next in book form. It is a spirited narrative, far above the average adventure tale. Owen Wister in "Destiny at Drybone," attempts too much in grafting the death and funeral of Mrs. Lusk, on the romance of Lin, McLean. That episode overmasters the plot, and is rendered with less art than this writer has accustomed us to look for. He fails to give the impression of reality, though I've not the slightest doubt the facts are absolute.

The December Century is an excellent number, and the pictures, especially the frontispiece, and the portrait of Mrs. Siddons, engraved by Timothy Cole, are a delight. The "Merry Christmas in the Tenements" article, which is the piece de resistance, has any number of clever illustrations in it, done by Jay Hambidge. The editors have a treasure trove in "Tennyson and his friends at Freshwater"—that excellent excuse for pictures which a memoir affords—photographs of Freshwater, together with the Home Farm and all the surroundings of the poet's manor. The accompanying reading matter is thoroughly entertaining for all who care for reminisence. There are more "Gallops," brief, clever stories of the hunting set at Westchester, New York, I presume, capitally turned — indeed, the best society stories since Van Bibber's, only infinitely more natural. The second installment of Mrs. Burton Harrison's story "Good Americans," is equal to its predecessor. The plot brings one deep into the ranks of the social elect of Gotham and introduces two most fascinating young women, a collection of important matrons, and a certain rising attorney who is suddenly introduced into society. Really, this lady's Afternoon-Tea Novels are ever so much better than those of Julien Gordon's, her pre-eminent competitor. She has a fluency of style and a breezy enjoyment in the personalities of her creations which Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger has never caught.

By the way, some of the best current criticism of fiction is to be found in the Atlantic's department "Notable Recent Novels." The department in Harper's is pure puffery—here the publications of Houghton, Mifflin & Co., proprietors of the magazine, are subjected to the same form of truth-telling that is dealt out to the books of Macmillan and Appleton. Thoroughly just and accurate are the estimates of Captains Courageous, St. Ives, Hugh Wynne, though Davis' novel is let down rather too pleasantly for its deserts. The Chap Book's critiques are especially entertaining, though they often err on the side of flippancy. Though its editor is sometimes blind to a merit, the unpardonable sin of praising a poor book in never committed. I was much amused in the December issue, with a delightful notice of Professor Henry Thurston Peck's book of essays. That pretentious person is at full length in the Cosmopolitan, and is as injudicious as ever. While stigmatizing the sins of the daily press in publishing scandals, he keeps hinting, throughout his article, at big stories which the good taste of journalists had kept out of type. Another smart essayist, Zangwill, is in both the Atlantic and Cosmopolitan—in the latter booming his co-religionist Max Nordau, whose last novel he declares an epic. In the former, he presents a species of composite photograph of Heine in his declining days, "From a Mattress Grave," expressing in the imaginary conversation manner, disputed impressions of the poet's individuality. A clever piece of work but rather machine-made in its effect.

The types of essay furnished the Atlantic by such men as Henry G. Chapman, J. S. Tunison and Francis Walker to the Century make good reading and are excellently put together. They have an air of original research, and a conciseness of statement that are refreshing.

Apropos of the Cosmopolitan—the War of the Worlds, the brilliant story by H. G. Wells, is ended. The men from Mars succumb to the attacks of earthly bacteria, which their systems do not enable them to withstand, and fortunately for humanity they collapse. Certainly this tale is the most powerful imaginative flight Wells has made since the Time Machine. Indeed, this work has a more vital quality of interest. Otherwise the Cosmopolitan is pictures. The process department seems to have triumphed over the literary. A set of pretty French actresses are made the excuse for an article on "The Well Dressed Woman"; a series of views of Tiflis, Sebastapool and the Steppes furnishes a contribution on "Russian Humanity." The war with Spain gets in all the ships of the American navy. Really, Mr. Walker, this is an uncommonly cheap method of editing a magazine.

C.

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

$2,000.00

Cream of tartar and soda—nothing else.

Schilling's Best baking-powder.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

A Model

resort for an invalid or convalescent, amid the most charming surroundings is the hotel at Byron Hot Springs (cottages if you prefer) all modern in structure, built especially for the comfort of the invalid, nearly everything on the first floor—and the Baths and Mineral Waters possess the most perfect curative qualities. The Baths are connected with the hotel by covered walks—no danger of exposure after a bath—all the springs are within easy access.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars—free.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.
Sold by druggists, 75c.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

The best French claret for connoisseurs can be had at reasonable prices, direct from the large vineyards of Chateau d'Arsac. Far particulars, address Jules F. Pages, 1316 O'Farrell street.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 Post St.

SAN FRANCISCO VIEW BOOK
Just Issued. Price 50c.
Containing sixteen pages of fine half-tone illustrations, showing all the principal places in and about the city. For sending East or to Europe as a Christmas remembrance it has no equal.
PUBLISHED BY
EDW. H. MITCHELL
(Successor to Dodge Bros.)
225 POST ST., S. F.
Large size containing 32 pages, price $1, also ready.

NEW BOOKS
CHRISTMAS BOOKS
H. R. WILLIS'
107 MONTGOMERY STREET

GET THE GENUINE ARTICLE!
Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast COCOA

Trade-Mark.
Pure, Delicious, Nutritious.
Costs Less than ONE CENT a cup.
Be sure that the package bears our Trade-Mark.
Walter Baker & Co. Limited,
(Established 1780) Dorchester, Mass.

A LARGE BENGAL TIGER TO MATCH THE CELEBRATED LION.
A large engraving of a tiger, in colors, from the renowned picture of the famous animal-painter, Rosa Bonheur, has been engraved at great expense to order for Charles Lyons, the London Tailor. Can be had at either of his three stores, at the nominal price of 10 cents; by mail 20 cents. Free to customers.
721 Market Street
302 Kearny Street
1212-1214 Market Street
Landseer's celebrated picture of the Lion can also be had at the same price.

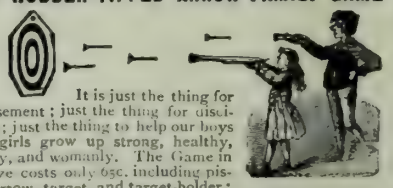
MEDICATED CERATE... An Incomparable Face Food
It preserves, purifies, refines, and permanently beautifies the complexion. and makes the skin soft, smooth, and fine grained, keeps it from becoming dry, withered, wrinkled or freckled. It invigorates and nourishes the lax and shrunken tissues, fills out sunken lines, makes the flesh firm, removes wrinkles, cures tan, sunburn, pimples, hives, etc. A perfect application before using powder. Endorsed by eminent physicians. Price, 50c. and $1. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Trial pot and sample of face powder, 10c. Free at office—room 324, Phelan Building, 806 Market Street.

MRS. M. J. BUTLER, Dermatologist.

Ernst H. Ludwig
CATERER
Supplies Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice
Also Terrapin, Entrees, Luncheons and Dinners, Ice Cream, Cake, etc.
NO. 122 GEARY STREET
Telephone Grant 119

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of
Artificial Stone in all its branches
Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty
Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

Referee's Sale
Wednesday, Dec. 15th
At 12 o'clock m.
At the Salesrooms of G. H. Umbsen & Co.
14 MONTGOMERY ST.
We will sell by order of Gustave H. Umbsen, Referee of the Estate of Thomas Mootry Jr., three properties of the Estate, as follows:
First — S. W. corner of Hayes and Gough streets; improvements consist of stores, flats, and houses, bringing in a total monthly rental of $278; lot 65x120 feet, fronting on three streets
Second — S. E. corner of Page and Octavia streets; improvements bringing in a total monthly rental of $67; lot 27:6x120 feet to Hickory avenue; three frontages.
Third—S. W. corner of Bay and Dupont streets; improvements renting for $57 per month; lot 89:6x113 feet.
For further particulars, catalogues, etc., inquire at the office of G. H. UMBSEN & CO., Auctioneers, 14 Montgomery street.

THE RUBBER-TIPPED ARROW FAMILY GAME


It is just the thing for amusement; just the thing for discipline; just the thing to help our boys and girls grow up strong, healthy, manly, and womanly. The Game in Bronze costs only 65c. including pistol, arrow, target, and target-holder; in nickel, 90c., all complete.
ELASTIC TIP CO., 735 Market Street,
Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties.

BAJA CALIFORNIA
DAMIANA BITTERS
"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)
NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

BREEN BROS.
COAL MERCHANTS
128 O'Farrell St., cor. Powell
Dealers in Wood and Charcoal
Genuine Wellington Coal a Specialty
Orders Promptly Delivered Telephone Red 1581

SATISFACTORY TO THE EYE AND EAR
BYRON MAUZY PIANOS
308-314 POST ST.

THE

KNABE PIANOS

GRAND AND UPRIGHT

The Best Instruments of America!

Eugen D'Albert's Testimonial.

(Translation.)

During my sojourn here I had frequent opportunities to make myself acquainted with the Knabe pianos, and from fullest conviction I declare them to be the best instruments of America. Should I return for artistic purposes (which may be the case very soon), I shall most certainly use the pianos of this celebrated make. I give this testimonial with pleasure, voluntarily, and entirely unsolicited for by the house of Knabe. EUGEN D'ALBERT.
New York, May 16, 1890.

That Herr D'Albert's judgment as to the superior merits of the Knabe pianos was confirmed by further experience, appears from the following letter:

Eugen D'Albert to Wm. Knabe & Co.

(After his concert tour, 1892)

After having played two months continuously on the Knabe pianos, having used them exclusively on my concert tour just finished, it is a pleasure to me to be able to confirm my opinion, expressed two years ago, declaring them the best instruments of America—the experience I now have had with these instruments has only increased my admiration for them. EUGEN D'ALBERT.
New York. May 16, 1892.

KOHLER & CHASE, Agents

Everything in the Music Line — High Grade Goods and Low Prices

28 & 30 O'FARRELL STREET, S. F.

BEAUTIFUL

Holiday Goods

AT

S. & G. GUMP

ART STORE

113 GEARY STREET

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works. Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY

Price 25 Cents

DR. PARKER'S COUGH CURE

One dose will stop a cough—it never fails!
ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR IT

"THE FIRST BORN"

A Correspondent Describes Its First Night in a London Theatre.

A race across the Atlantic to see which company would first produce its Oriental play in London, was much advertised in the papers, and when, a few days later, an announcement was made that the "Cat and the Cherub" was to open at the Lyric Theatre on October 31st Powers' friends thought it was all over with his piece, for it was not to arrive until the 31st and would open at rather an unknown theatre — the Globe — off the Strand, on the first of November.

I went there, Saturday, to see how the seats were going, and found they had all been sold, and that a number of Chinese from the Legation had taken places. Monday morning I again went down there to see if the company had arrived. Chinese lanterns were being hung in the foyer, the orchestra was practicing Chinese music, and the actors were having their solitary rehearsal. The scenery lay around in a semi-detached condition, and there were heaps of Chinese placards, hats and baskets piled promiscuously in every available resting-place. But in the face of all this confusion the company preserved its coolness. One would think from the air of Mr. Powers and Miss Buckley and the rest that a first night in the biggest city in the world was a trifle of no consideration whatever — that their play had already won world-wide reputation. As I made my exit through the lobby I heard the box-office manager say to one of his assistants:

"Put a sign out, "No tickets for to-night in any part of the house." This was indeed encouraging. After explaining elaborately to a struggling super that a sliced potato is the best thing to put in the Chinese lantern before inserting the candle, to guard against the paper taking fire, I walked down the Strand. All along I met sandwich-men with placards advertising "The First Born." So London had every chance to know about what was going to happen.

The hour had come. Those who had been unfortunate enough to dine early witnessed an impossible curtain-raiser called "A Night Session"— a most suggestive and inartistic piece of nonsense. Clang! clang! clang! went the Chinese gong. Then a steady stream of men began to arrive, and rapidly the house filled up. Then the fish-horn commenced, and more clang-clang of the gong. Curious sounds, strange voices, rent the air, and then the curtain was drawn up, to display a huge piece of Chinese embroidery displaying great gilt dragons — once again clang, clang, clang — the embroidery disappeared, and, lo! the first scene — the street scene in Chinatown. It brought up an intense memory of the Alcazar, and for a moment I imagined myself back again in San Francisco. It is unnecessary to describe the staging, with which you are familiar, but when an English audience becomes as enthusiastic as these people did tonight, one feels confident of the merit of the performance. Upon the death of little Chan Toy the shouts of applause were almost deafening, and even after the curtain had been raised the third time the applause still continued.

More clanging and an intermezzo of Chinese music signalized the final act. One catches more of the real atmosphere of Chinatown in this scene, because it really gives us the Chinese swing to it, showing them as we see them. The air was heavy with the odor of the punk — and that in itself quite produces a Bartlett Alley feeling. It was a strong and sentimental scene, and the nervous tension of the audience demonstrated how great its interest was. At the appearance of Man Low Yek and his hasty death, a thrill went through the spectators, but as Chang Wong held him up at the alley door and greeted the officer who passed, there were but few except those who knew the Chinese at home who could appreciate the apathetic and cool manner of the murderer. Again the curtain fell and there resounded a burst of applause deeper and louder than I ever thought an English audience would accord an American company. Mr. Powers was recalled several times, also Miss Buckley, who had quite won even the dramatic critics. Mr. Powers was too tired to make a speech, but his manager came out to thank the people in his and Mr. Frohman's name.

Such was the reception tendered to "The First Born" in London. KATRIONA.

Our correspondent's impressions as to the success of "The First Born" were not outborne by the results. It was withdrawn after a week's run. The critics seem to have preferred "The Cat and the Cherub," Chester B. Fernald's sneaky adaptation. Clement Scott of the Daily Telegraph says: "In 'The Cat and the Cherub' we had drama; in 'The First Born' we have detail . . . It was Chinatown in a London fog," etc. The Morning Post pronounces the play a success, but does not enter into a discussion of its merits. It praises the "splendid acting of Francis Powers and Miss May Buckley." The critic of the Standard considers there is more tragic tension in 'The Cat and the Cherub,' but states the play could not have been better acted. George Bernard Shaw in the Saturday Review says the plays are nothing but "Wilkie Collins fiction disguised in pigtail and petticoats." He thus defines the separate merits of the two: "'The Cat and the Cherub,' which claims to be the original, is much the more academic of the two. It is a formal play, with comparatively pretentious acting parts, and the local color is blended into the dramatic business in the most approved literary manner. In 'The First Born' there is comparatively no art at all. We see the affair as we see a street row, with all the incidents of the Chinese slum going on independently — vulgar, busy, incongruous, irrelevant, indifferent — just as we see them in a London slum whilst the policemen is adjusting some tragedy at the corner."

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

Among the many great Financial Corporations on the Pacific Coast, none rank higher than the

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.

Its Agents are found throughout America, and its Record for Prompt and Equitable Settlement of All Honest Losses is Firmly Established

D. J. STAPLES, President — WM. J. DUTTON, Vice-President — B. FAYMONVILLE, 2d V.-Pres., Sec'y
J. B. LEVISON, Marine Sec'y — LOUIS WEISMANN, Asst. Sec'y — STEPHEN D. IVES, General Agent

CITY OF PARIS

DRY GOODS COMPANY

USEFUL CHRISTMAS GIFTS!

6 ft. x 6 ft. EIDERDOWN COMFORTER made of a fine quality of French Sateen, figured on both sides, $5 each.

6 ft. x 6 ft. EIDERDOWN COMFORTER, French Sateen on one side and Silk on the other, $10 each.

6 ft. x 6 ft. EIDERDOWN COMFORTER, covered on both sides with a high grade of Figured Silk, $12.50 each.

☞ The above lines are positively down proof

80x90 SUPERFINE AUSTRALIAN WOOL WHITE BLANKET, with fancy jacquard border, $13.50 each.

2 yards x 2½ yards WHITE DOUBLE DAMASK TABLE CLOTH and one dozen three-quarter NAPKINS to match, $6.50 set.

9-4 x 10-4 WHITE HEMSTITCHED TABLE CLOTH, with one dozen Hemstitched NAPKINS, $7 set.

8 x 10 COLORED LUNCHEON AND TEA SETS, fringed in old gold, delft blue, salmon, etc., $3.75 set.

8 x 10 COLORED LUNCHEON AND TEA SETS, hemmed, in above colors, $7.50 set.

VIENNA TABLE COVERS—a novelty. 8-4 square $2; 8-10 $2.75.

City of Paris Dry Goods Co.

SOUTHEAST CORNER GEARY AND STOCKTON STS., UNION SQUARE

☞ Mail Orders Carefully and Promptly Filled

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 POST STREET

Below Kearny — Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAMES D. PHELAN, President.
GEORGE A. STORY, Cashier.
S. G. MURPHY. JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on deposits.

Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.

When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

Paid Up Capital . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . 25,000

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. — HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued.

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

CONNECTICUT

FIRE INS. CO

OF HARTFORD

Assets $3,300,000 — BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager

COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco

501 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 — Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT

204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco

VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

Guarantee Capital and Surplus . . $2,000,000 00
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash . . 1,000,000 00
Deposits December 31, 1897 . . 22,740,247 48

OFFICERS

President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Second Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEO. TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS

B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt.
Attorney — W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

Deposits December 31, 1897 . . $[illegible]
Paid Up Capital and Surplus . . [illegible]

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. — J. B. FOND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

DIRECTORS

George W. Beaver, Robert Watt, Thomas Magee, George C. Boardman, W. C. B. de Fremery, Daniel E. Martin, Albert Miller, George Tasheira, J. B. Fond.

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country. No charges or bonus for pass book or entrance fee.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A.D. 1720

Capital Paid Up $1,[illegible] — Assets $[illegible]
Surplus to Policy-Holders, $3,980,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

Don't Borrow a Home!

BUY IT Your rent payments for the borrowed-home will do it through the end of the

CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California

WM. CORBIN, Secretary and Gen. Manager.
Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE
Stewart Hartshorn LABEL AND CO.
THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

California Jockey Club
OAKLAND TRACK
Winter Meeting 1897-8, beginning Monday, December 13th.
Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday.
Five or more races each day. Races start at 2:15 p.m. sharp.
Ferry leaves San Francisco at 12 m., 12:30, 1:00, 1:30, 2:00, 2.30 and 3:00 p.m., connecting with trains stopping at entrance to track. Buy your tickets to Shell-Mound. Returning trains leave the track at 4:15 and 4:45 p.m., and immediately after the last race.
R. B. MILROY, Secretary. T. H. WILLIAMS JR. President.

PACIFIC COAST JOCKEY CLUB
INGLESIDE TRACK
Racing from Monday, November 29th, to Saturday, December 11th, inclusive
Five or more races daily, rain or shine
First race at 2 p.m.
S. P. R. R. Trains 12:45 and 1:15 p.m. daily. Leave Third-street station, stopping at Valencia street. Returning immediately after the last race.
Electric Car Lines — Kearny and Mission-street cars every 3 minutes, direct to track without change. Fillmore-street cars transfer each way.
F. H. GREEN, Secretary. S. N. ANDROUS, President.

Columbia Theatre
FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers
Our Great Holiday Attraction!
Two Weeks, commencing Monday, Dec. 13th
Matinees Saturday Only Hoyt's Best—the Big Show
A Milk White Flag
Produced in the same manner as at Hoyt's Theatre, New York, with all the scenery, properties, costumes, and a full brass band on the stage!
A Grand Production! Fifty People in the Cast!
Dec. 27th, "At Gay Coney Island"

Orpheum
Week beginning Monday, Dec. 13th
PROF. DOHERTY'S CANINE CIRCUS, introducing Ten Beautiful Snow White Poodles
JOHN KERNELL, America's Foremost Irish Singing and Talking Comedian
MLLE. PEPITA DELARA, Chanteuse Eccentrique
THE SIX PICCHIANI SISTERS, Sensational Acrobats
CZITA, the Violin Virtuoso
PAULINNETTI & PIQUO, Character Gymnasts
THE DE FILIPPIS, Eccentric Dancers
SERVAIS LE ROY, Illusionist and Magician
VESUVIANO OPERATIC QUARTETTE in new repertoire
Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House
MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager
This Evening, Superb Production of Planquette's Opera-Comique
RIP VAN WINKLE
Great Cast! Beautiful Scenery! Correct Costumes!
Commencing Saturday Evening, Dec. 18th
Our Holiday Spectacle
MOTHER GOOSE, or the Strange Adventures of Jack and Jill. The Most Perfect Home Production Ever Attempted!
Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre
FRED BELASCO : : : Lessee and Proprietor
MARK THALL, Manager.
Monday Night, December 13th, 68th Week of the Alcazar Company—First time in this city of Clinton Stewart's Comedy Satire
"WILL SHE DIVORCE HIM"
Elaborate Scenery! Unique Stage Settings!
Popular Prices—Reserved—15c., 25c., 35c. and 50c.
Phone Main 254
Monday, Dec. 20th, Grand Holiday Attraction
The Girl I Left Behind Me

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager
Last four performances of Old Glory
Monday, December 13th. Elaborate Production of the Charming Society Comedy-Drama
BOOTLE'S BABY
By F. H. Gassaway, author of "The Dandy Fifth"
Strong Cast! Beautiful Costumes and Uniforms! New Scenic, Mechanical and Electrical Effects! Tender Pathos, Romance, Crisp Comedy
Evg. Prices, 10, 25, 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

SAN FRANCISCO SYMPHONY SOCIETY
FRITZ SCHEEL, Musical Director
SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT
TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE
Thursday, December 16th, at 3:20 p.m.
The Programme will include the Fifth Symphony—Beethoven; Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from Gotterdammerung—Wagner; and Bacchanale (aereal ballet) Samson and Delilah—Saint-Saens.
Prices, including Reserved Seats, $1.50, $1, 75c.
Seats on sale at Tivoli commencing Monday, Dec. 13

TURF TOPICS

Ingleside Racing—Success of the Gate Without a Flag.

The glorious weather we have been having was broken by heavy rains in the early part of the week, which, though invaluable to the country, were against comfortable training and racing operations.

The new-comers W. B. Jennings & Co. annexed a couple of purses in succession on Thursday week with Miss Lynah and imp. Tripping, the latter a racy-looking three-year-old by Saraband. This was her initial appearance, and in a race at 1⅛ miles, with 100 lbs. up and Clawson in the saddle, she just outfinished Satsuma, 112 lbs., on the post in 1.55, Judge Denny, 107 lbs., several lengths behind. The fast Islington filly Novia spread-eagled a field of fourteen maiden two-year-olds at 5½ furlongs, and Dr. Sharp, another smart two-year-old, picked up an all-aged purse cleverly at five furlongs.

The next day Spunwell, getting away nicely with Plan, others in somewhat ragged fashion, picked up an all-aged purse, and in an event for two-year-olds at seven furlongs the two St. Carlo youngsters, St. Calatine and Count of Flanders, had the finish to themselves, Fonsovannah, who landed third, running a disappointing race.

Saturday last furnished excellent sport with a large attendance, no doubt encouraged to some extent by the first steeplechase fixture on the new inside course. The race was run over the short course up and down hill, 130 feet less than two miles, with fifteen obstacles, all of the same type, close-planked fences with brush at the top, the full height about 4 ft. 9 in. Seven horses of all sorts put in an appearance, but only three negotiated the entire distance, the others being done with early in the proceedings. Silverado, ridden in good form by Alf Stanford, won easily from Mestor, Reno getting home about 150 yards behind the latter. The display showed that this style of contest is not much understood by Western horses and horsemen, but judging from the excited interest of the spectators it should be a good draw fsr the gate. There are lots of horses here that, if properly schooled and put to the business, will be far more in place than in trying to catch the judge's eye in flat races.

The Rancho del Paso stakes, $1500, 1¼ miles, brought only three runners to the post out of an original entry of forty, namely, Senator Bland, 115 lbs., Judge Denny, 107 lbs., and imp. Tripping, 93 lbs., and truly the unexpected happened. The first named was an odds-on favorite, the English-bred mare, Tripping, a good second favorite, and the black Fonso horse an outsider running for the benefit of the small bettors who like to punt on such chances. The Senator and Tripping made the running at a fast pace, neck and neck for the first mile and a quarter, Piggott lying back six to eight lengths with Judge Denny. At that point the last-named found his opportunity, and quickening his pace but slightly, soon brought the others back to him. On entering the straight the race was practically over and the Judge finished up in a comfortable hand gallop with some ten lengths to spare, Tripping taking socond place. Time, 3.04½. It seems to me that there was a good deal to be learnt from this race, first and foremost that condition and style of going were insufficiently studied in estimating the chances of the competitors. In these respects Judge Denny outclassed his opponents, so far as my judgment goes. He has an easy, collected way of moving that gives him a great advantage, especially over a distance of ground. In the next place, the best horse in the world may be beaten if he sets out to make an end-to-end race; this has been proven over and over again. And amongst other things the condition that suffices a speedy horse for a short cut will not get him home on a long route, and that this fact is too often overlooked by our trainers, who set over-much store on the qualty of their charges.

On the same day we saw the worthy Magnet dumped on this last rock in a mile race cleverly won by imp. Trance, the latter since ruled off with her trainer Dan Halliday for in-and-out running. Magnet is utterly unfit for racing in point of soundness and condition and sobbed his protests bitterly after the finish. What spite has his owner against this good horse to be forcing him to try and draw oat-money with a weak fore-tendon and a fat inside? Surely the horse is entitled to a happier existence.

Monday gave us a really good day's sport. In the mile race for a $500 purse of five runners a ridiculous exhibition was made of the good filly St. Calatine, carrying the feather weight of 77 lbs. and with an undeniable chance of scoring the trick. She was rushed to the front and completely settled in the first half mile so, that by the time the turn for the stretch had to be made Satsuma, 112 lbs., overhauled her without difficulty. Well into the stretch The Roman, 103 lbs., made a bold bid for victory, but could never quite get up, and the former gained the verdict by half a length in the fast time, for a rather cuppy track, of 1:40. Mr. Boots is certainly unlucky with The Roman, a high class horse that is so often only just beaten. The Pontico colt Dr. Sharp scored a fresh bracket with top weight 115 lbs., 7 lbs. more than anything else, in a race over five furlongs with a field of eleven, and is undoubtedly one of the best two-year-olds now running here.

Tuesday was the only bad day in the way of weather we have had this season. Rey el Santa Anita, the American Derby winner, exported to and now returned from England, was pulled out of a mile race against an inferior lot of horses, and, with little disadvantage in the way of weight, refused to do better than run second. Novia scored again for Mr. M. F. Tarpey in a six-furlong sprint, beating ten others, of which several have shown speed.

Wednesday we had a rather heavy track and the fields were comparatively small. That very smart little racehorse Count of Flanders showed his heels all the way over seven furlongs to half a dozen others, of which Fonsovannah again performed disappointingly. Lucky Dog reveled in the soft going, but ran none too kindly at the finish of 1 1-16 miles, though nothing had been able to get to him. The Palace Hotel Stakes, a steeplechase over the full course of 2½ miles, not 4 miles as nearly all the papers stated, was a farce and practically nothing more than a feeble attempt to school horses. Mr. Corrigan's Sam Tate, ridden by Hueston, made the trip with one mistake only, by which his rider was for the moment brought to the ground, and was declared the winner. There is a wide field open for horses that can and will jump and men able to pilot them over a country, to earn some money.

It is gratifying to note the successful starting of Mr. Caldwell during the present Ingleside meeting effected by the gate alone, unhampered by a recall flag. The result seems to have satisfied even those who clamored for the flag so persistently that the gate alone is the right system. It would be better for horses and jockeys if the same practice were followed at both our tracks.

The California Jockey Club has added to its popularity by announcing that until further notice the daily purses at the Oakland track, exclusive of special stakes, will average at least $400. Scratchieg forfeits will also be divided between second and third horses at the rate of 60 and 40 per cent respectively.

The recent sale of yearlings from the late Simeon G. Reed's Oneonta Stud, realized an average of $350 per head, the best prices paid being $900 apiece for two by imp. Duncombe and imp. Watercress, respectively.

The small consignment of yearlings from Mr. J. B. Chase's farm, in which five sired by Morello are included, will be put up for auction at Ingleside to-day.

The Burns' Handicap, $10,000, the largest stake offered on this Coast, has closed with 87 entries.

BENEDICT.

Calendars in High Art.

The Christmas Cards, and especially Calendars for this year, far excel the productions of seasons past, and artists everywhere have competed for honors as well as the rich prizes offered for new and original effects. The consequence manifests itself in the vast display to be seen at Cooper's, No. 746 Market street, where small, delicate cards of the amateur are mingled with the works of celebrated artists.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

FINANCE AND TRADE

Thursday Evening.

In business circles the tone is dull for the time of the year with no great improvement looked for this side of Christmas. The late term of suspense preceding the delivery of the President's message to Congress, has been followed by a renewal of activity in the stock markets of New York and London, and a higher range of values has been established in all the leading lines of stock. The money market remains unchanged, the sentiment expressed by Mr. McKinley on currency matters meeting with the tacit approval of the financial powers. Silver is weak at the moment and after advancing to 60 has now receded to 58, in consequence of the announcement that the Government of India are to resume their sale of exchange in London.

In the local bond market there is no lessening of the demand for first-class issues and the scarcity continues. Southern Pacific Railway of Arizona 6 percents, have followed the course we predicted, and closed to-day at 104 to 105- With the coupon due next month they still seem cheap. Other Southern Pacific issues are also higher.

In the stock market Spring Valley Water has been dealt in at 100 and is in good demand.

Gas and Electric seem to have touched bottom at 95, and there seems to be no credence given to the rumored opposition previously referred to.

Market-Street R. R. has moved up as high as 52⅝.

In Sugar stocks there have been lively fluctuations as looked for, with numerous transactions, especially to-day. Hutchinson sold up to 39¾, Hawaiian at 23¾ to 27¾. The latter has been listed in New York and an active market is likely to follow. The supply oi all sugar stocks is very limited and if buying orders come in prices must go higher.

In the grain market, wheat has sagged in consequence of the advance of freights from 29 to 35 shillings, a large proportion of the available tonnage having been engaged for the Oregon crop. With any decline in the cost of shipping, business would once more become lively at this port. In the meantime, December No. 1 is quoted at 1.40.

Singers and Artists Generally are users of "Brown's Bronchial Troches" for Hoarseness and Throat Troubles. They afford instant relief.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

Holiday Books

Books are the most eminently proper Christmas Gifts—they are the one thing that can be given to any friend with perfect propriety. We have the largest and most completely stocked bookstore in the West—there are few larger in the world. Books gathered from the leading publishers especially for the holiday trade form at least one-half of this great stock. Books for grown people, books for children—any book that is published. Here are a few:

BARGAINS IN FINE BINDINGS

English and Scottish Ballads
4 vols., half calf, $12; our price $6.00.

Dumas: Count of Monte Cristo

Hugo: Les Miserables
Editions de Luxe with 400 illustrations by eminent French artists; sq. 8 vo.; cloth, uncut edges; 5 vols. $12.50 set; our price $6.25 set.

Lamb's Works
5 vols.; ¾ levant; Armstrong publisher; $15; our price $7.50.

Hugo: Les Miserables
5 vols.; half calf, $13.50; our price $6.75.

Hugo: Les Miserables
4 vols.; ¾ Morroco; Crowell publisher; $20; our price $10.

Irving's Works
8 vols.; half calf; Crowell publisher; $20; our price $10.

Pepys Diary and Correspondence
10 vols.; edition limited to 150 copies; on Holland paper; half levant; $100; our prices $50.

Poe's Works
6 vols.; ¾ levant; Armstrong publisher; $24; our price $12.

Strickland's Queen of England
Bohn Edition; 6 vols.; half calf, $18: our price $12

Cervantes' Don Quixote
4 vols.; large paper edition, limited to 50 copies. De Vinne press. $30.00; our price $20.

Hugo Works
15 vols.; illustrated, half Morroco, $52.50; our price $26.25.

Eliot's Works
Editton de Luxe, limited to 500 copies: cloth; uncut edges; illustrated with photo etchings; 12 vols., $72; our price $36.

Dickens' Work
30 vols.; cloth; Royal 8 vo. Chapman & Hall publishers. $75.00; our price $45.

Eliot's Works
20 vols.; full calf; Blackwood & Sons, publishers. $95.00; our price $47.50.

Holiday Gift Books and Calendars at 10 per ct. below publishers' prices

SPECIAL FOR THE YOUNG

Five Hundred Sets ST. NICHOLAS for 1897, bound in two volumes—published at $4.00—our price, $3.10 per set

Five Hundred HENTY BOOKS, ten titles, 50 cents each.

Christmas books for Children, in pasteboard covers, will also be found in Toy Department Second Floor.

The Emporium and Golden Rule Bazaar
CALIFORNIA'S LARGEST... AMERICA'S GRANDEST STORE...
ALL MARKET STREET CARS PASS THE MAIN ENTRANCE
San Francisco. Calif.

Buy your medical friend some of the late Medical Works for Christmas. We carry the only stock on coast.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

PACIFIC

TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

NEW RATE

NEW RATE

FOR

RESIDENCE Telephone Service!

Individual Service on One Pair of Line
Long-Distance Telephone, either PORTABLE STAND or WALL-SET

Per Month $5.50 Per Month

NO CHARGE FOR SWITCHING

TO TAKE EFFECT JANUARY 1, 1898

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf San Francisco for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. December 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. December 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Steamer Pomona, 2 p. m. December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28; January 1, 5, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 31.

For Newport (Los Angeles) and Way Ports, 9 a. m. December 4, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 28 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Harford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, and Redondo (Los Angeles), at 11 a. m. December 2, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 30 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, 10 a. m. the 2d each month.

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing.

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.
General Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Dec. 28 at 2 p.m. Special party rates.

S. S. "Mariposa," for Australia, Thursday, Dec. 9 at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St
Freight Office 327 Market St

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO. General Agents

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

ESTATE OF EUDORA A. CHAMBERS [illegible] known as Eudora T. Chambers) DECEASED

[illegible] Chambers, Executor of the will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased, to the creditors of and all [illegible] having claims against said deceased [illegible] them with the necessary [illegible] months after the first [illegible] the said R. C. Chambers [illegible] lin K. Lane, rooms 201-[illegible] same being his place for th[illegible] ness of the said Estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California

R. C. CHAMBERS,
Executor of the Will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased

Dated at San [illegible]

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

ESTATE OF DUNCAN B. McMILLAN [illegible]

[illegible] Millan, [illegible] the said Administrator [illegible] ing, corner of [illegible] the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California

[illegible]
Administrator of the Estate of Duncan B. McMillan [illegible]

Dated at San Francisco, [illegible]

[illegible]
Attorney for Administrator

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Belcher Mining Company

Assessment ... [illegible]
Amount per share [illegible]
[illegible]
Delinquent in office [illegible]
[illegible]

[illegible]
Office, room 35, 3d floor, Mills blg., San Francisco

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Occidental Consolidated Mining Co.

[illegible]
Delinquent in office [illegible]
Day of sale of delinquent stock [illegible]

A. K. DURBROW, Secretary.
[illegible]

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Alta Silver Mining Company

Assessment ..... No. 58
Amount per share ..... 10 cents
Levied ..... December [illegible]
Delinquent in office ..... January [illegible]
Day of sale of delinquent stock ..... January [illegible]

J. E. JACOBUS, Secretary.
Office, room 33, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

Every woman wants her home to be pretty; every pretty thing you add to it makes both you and home dearer to her.

There's a hint in the picture —two, in fact!

The desk is a splendid creation in the richest quarter-sawed oak.

Boldly carved on the lid are two snarling griffin-heads, and below the drawer in the base is a shelf for a few preferred books.

Besides desks there are dressing tables and cheval mirrors and fancy chairs and tea tables — all as Christmassy as holly berries.

California Furniture Company

(N. P. COLE & CO.)
117-123 Geary St.

Carpets
Rugs
Mattings

COTTON SAIL DUCKS
22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard
ALSO
Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company Baltimore
Pacific Coast Sole Agents

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS
Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin. Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.
S. STROZYNSKI
24 GEARY ST.
The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable.
Telephone Main 5697.

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, PIPE, TILE, ETC.
GLADDING, McBEAN & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO.
WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

An Irishman was hauling water in barrels from a small river to supply the inhabitants of the village, which was not provided with waterworks. As he halted at the top of the bank to give a "blow" before proceeding to peddle the water, a gentleman of the inquisitive type rode up, and after passing the time of the day, asked: "How long have been hauling water for the village, my good man?" "Tin years or more, sor," was the reply. "Ah! And how many loads do you make a day?" "From tin to fifteen, accordin' to the weather, sor." "Yes? Now I have one for you, Pat," said the gentleman, laughing. "How much water have you hauled altogether?" The Irishman jerked his thumb in the direction of the river, at the same time giving his team the hint to start, and replied: "All he water that yez don't see there now, sor."

May Irwin tells s good story about crossing the Atlantic once with a lonesome-looking young man, of whom it was whispered among the passengers that he was a bridegroom. He kept to himself throughout the voyage, and it was assumed that the bride remained in her stateroom because of illness. The general curiosity became strong concerning the hidden lady, and a committee of ladies was appointed to call on her. They found the young man alone and disconsolate in his stateroom. The leader of the committee said: "You are a bridegroom, we believe?" "Yes; I was married last week." "Where is your wife?" "Oh, she didn't come along. We found that we didn't have money enough for both of us to take a trip to Europe, so I am making the voyage alone, and, to tell the truth, I am a little lonesome."

When Andrew D. White was our Minister to Germany nearly twenty years ago he received a mandatory epistle from an old lady living in the West, who enclosed in her letter four pieces of white linen, each some six inches square. "We are going to give a fair in our church," she wrote, "and I am making an autograph quilt. I want you to get the autographs of the Emperor, the Empress, the Crown Prince and Bismarck, and tell them to be very careful not to write too near the edge of the squares, as a seam has to be allowed for putting them together."

A gentle and affectionate clubman, who came home at rather an unearthly hour the other night, was asked by his wife what time it was. "Half past eleven, my dear." As he spoke the timepiece rang out three o'clock. "What's that?" said the justly indignant wife. "Coming in at this unearthly hour, and then telling a story about it!" The clubman sighed. "To think," he cried, with upraised hands, "you'd believe that little five-dollar French clock before you would the word of your own faithful husband!"

A highly respectable lady, of Episcopalian tendencies, who lives on Pacific Avenue, was informed by her cook that she proposed to get married. "I hope, Mary, you have given the matter serious consideration?" "Oh, I have, ma'am, was the earnest reply. "I've been to two fortune-tellers and a clairvoyant, and looked in a sign-book, and dreamed on a lock of his hair, and been to one of those asterologers, and to a meejum, and they all tell me to go ahead, ma'am. I ain't one to marry reckless like, ma'am!"

A clergyman in the West Country had two curates, one a comparatively old one, the other very young. With the former he had not been able to work agreeably; and on being invited to another living, he accepted it, and took the young curate with him. Naturally there was a farewell sermon, and we can imagine the feelings of the curate who was to be left behind when he heard the text given out, "Abide ye here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship."

The late Dean Vaughan, eminent among English clergymen, had been preparing some colored clergymen for mission work, and asked them to dine with him in the Temple. On that day Mrs. Vaughan waited an hour in the drawing-room for her guests, but none came. At last she mentioned to the butler that it was very odd. "Yes, ma'am," he replied, "and what's odder still, I've done nothing all the evening but turn Christy minstrels away from the door."

A clergyman, famous for his begging abilities, was once catechising a Sunday-school. When comparing himself — the pastor of a church — to a shepherd, and his congregation to the sheep, he put the following question to the children: "What does the shepherd do for the sheep?" To the amusement of those present a small boy in the front row piped out: "Shears them!"

There was a good deal of amusement at one time at the expense of Wellman, the Yankee Arctic explorer, over the disingenuous remark of his wife, who, being asked when the report came of the loss of the expedition, whether she was not uneasy, replied, "Oh, no, not at all. Mr. Wellman told me not to worry over any such reports, as he would be very likely to start them himself as an advertisement."

Alphonse Daudet, who is the most happily married of French authors, is noted for obtaining much of his material from life. After a very sentimental and dramatic scene with his wife one day, he remarked, "This seems, my dear, like a chapter that has slipped out of a novel." "It is more likely, Alphonse," she replied, "to form a chapter that will slip into one."

Lord Alvaney, a wit of the Regency, and Beau Brummel were enemies. When told that Brummel had fled to Boulogne to avoid the prosecution of the Jews who were suing him for debt, Alvaney remarked: "Brummel has done quite right to be off; it was Solomon's judgment."

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION
IN
THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

CRESTA BLANCA WINES
AWARDED THREE HIGHEST AWARDS AT
THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION
OF SIX MEDALS AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA
Cresta Blanca Wines
OBTAINED THREE
WETMORE-BOWEN CO.
140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention
A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED
OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

The Hotel Richelieu
N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.
PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO
HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

United States Laundry
Office 1004 Market St.
TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

REPORTER—"That politician wouldn't talk to me. He refused to open his mouth."
CITY EDITOR—"Why didn't you offer him a chew of Piper Heidsieck? That would open it."

Piper Heidsieck Plug Tobacco is the chew for every one who wants the best. Ask for the Large New Five-Cent Piece of

PIPER HEIDSIECK
PLUG TOBACCO
(CHAMPAGNE FLAVOR)

SOHMER PIANOS
BYRON MAUZY
AGENT
308-314 Post Street, S. F.

THE WAVE

VOL. XVI. No. 52 SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 25, 1897 PRICE 10 CTS

PICTURESQUE OLD AGE

FROM A PHOTOGRAPHIC STUDY BY MARCEAU

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday at The Wave Building, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

Entered at the Post Office as second-class matter.

Subscription: Per year, $3.00; six months, $1.50; three months, 75 cents. Foreign subscription (countries in postal union) $5.00 per year. Sample copies free on application.

The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Company, 210 Post street; east of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Company, New York.

The Wave is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

For advertising rates and on all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address The Wave, 24 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY
PROPRIETORS

SAN FRANCISCO, DECEMBER 25, 1897

CONTENTS

| | |
|---|---|
| Editorials | 2 |
| Things and People; by Boswell Jr. | 3-4 |
| "A Dream Fulfilled"; by Elizabeth Knight Tompkins | 4 |
| Scenes at the Melbourne Cup Meeting | 5 |
| Scenes at the McCloud River Salmon Hatchery | 6 |
| Uncle Sam's Babies | 7 |
| Racing in Australia; by G. L. B. | 7 |
| Music; by Leslie Martin | 7 |
| Views of the Sanitary Reduction Works | 8 |
| Tod Sloan in England; by Benedict | 9 |
| A Debutante's Diary | 10 |
| The Theatres | 10 |
| Mons. Le Roy Explains; by Justin Sturgis | 12 |
| Reviews in Brief | 12 |
| "An Elopement"; a Story from the French | 13 |
| Turf Topics; by Benedict | 14 |
| Finance and Trade | 14 |
| New Stories Re-Told | 16 |

THE LAST CALL.

On Monday next the voters of San Francisco will be called on to discharge again the highest and most important duty that devolves upon them as citizens of this city. In a country in which the sovereignty is vested in the people themselves the highest exercise of that sovereignty is shown in the enactment of the fundamental laws by which the people establish the methods and means by which they are to govern themselves. The Constitution of the United States is the direct act and ordinance of the people of the United States, and to the provisions of that Constitution every other act and instrument of government throughout the entire nation must conform. The Constitution of our State is the direct expression of the sovereign will of the people of the State, and every detail of the State Government must be devised in accordance with and in obedience to that expression of the people's will. So in the smaller, but not less important, field of municipal affairs the sovereign will of the citizens of the municipality ought to be looked for from any popular system of municipal government.

The citizens of San Francisco are about to choose from among themselves fifteem men to whom shall be confided the duty of expressing, in the form of a new charter for the city, what they believe to be the desires of the people for a better municipal government. The first duty of a good citizen at this time is to do all that it lies in him to do to secure the choice of fifteen honest and competent men for that work. It is of very small importance what may be the several opinions of these fifteen men on the questions of the tariff or the currency, or on any other questions which can be discussed and determined only in the national legislature. Such questions have no relevancy to the duty which will be confided to the fifteen chosen Freeholders. But it is of very great importance that the men chosen should be acquainted with the conditions which make it impossible to secure an honest and responsible government under our present organic act, that they should be sufficiently clear-sighted to devise means of eliminating those conditions without imposing others equally destructive of the desired end, and that they should be honest in their effort to secure for the people what the people undoubtedly want. No man can fulfill these conditions who has ever participated in or profited by the corrupt practices of the rings and bosses whose rule has so long disgraced our city. No man can be trusted to make an honest effort to put an end to such corrupt practices who is willing to accept the confidence and support of the very rings and bosses who have been guilty of them, and whose first and most natural desire is to provide for their continuance.

We believe that the honest people of San Francisco are a great majority of the whole, and we believe that a charter honestly framed for the sole purpose of providing an efficient, economical and progressive government for our city will receive their overwhelming support. We believe that if a charter is submitted to them which is really an instrument of government and not a mass of detailed legislation; which distributes the municipal powers among the several independent, but responsible departments of a symmetrical government, without attempting to anticipate and provide for the petty details of routine administration; which places in separate hands the duty of raising and apportioning the public revenues and the duty of expending them as appropriated; that provides that responsibility for the misuse of power shall be clear and inevitable, and, finally, that makes no distinctions between classes of citizens, by inviting assaults on the accumulations of industry or by appeals to the greed of the unthrifty—such a charter, we confidently believe, will be ratified by a majority against which all the powers of political darkness will find themselves powerless.

The first and most important duty is to secure the choice of fifteen capable and honest Freeholders at the election on Monday. The ordinary municipal election compares in importance with the coming election as a change of a servant or two compares with the building of a new house and the setting up of a new household. If we cannot have good Freeholders chosen at this election we may as well give over all hope of getting a good charter to submit to the people. With no other desire than to improve every chance of improving the result, after careful examination of the candidates before the people, The Wave submits to its readers this list selected from both tickets as worthy of their suffrages:

| | |
|---|---|
| Jerome A. Anderson. | Rueben Lloyd. |
| Joseph Britton. | John Nightingale Jr. |
| James Butler. | John C. Nobmann. |
| H. N. Clement. | Joseph O'Connor. |
| A. Comte Jr. | Lipmann Sachs. |
| Joseph D. Grant. | Edward R. Taylor. |
| L. R. Ellert. | C. B. Stone. |
| Isidor Gutte. | W. M. Pierson. |

SCENE MOUNTING OF THE FUTURE.

Suggestions from a laic and his opinions may not always be devoid of value nor deficient in interest to the initiated in any of the professions or arts, fine or otherwise. For it is often permitted to the layman to stand often far enough off from the production of his more deeply versed brother to judge of general effects, unhampered by consideration of detail and untramelled by the limitations of technicalities whose value—though the initiated would probably deny this—is often disproportionately exaggerated. In a recent speech at a dramatists' dinner in London, Henry Arthur Jones remarked:

I have been watching real life for more than thirty years, and it has never offered me any one single scene that could be put on the stage. The drama can never be like real life, chiefly because the playwright has to concentrate all his action within the merest fraction of the time that would be taken in real life, and because he has to concentrate all his action in a few small definite stationary scenes. The necessity of concentrating his action brings the dramatist every moment into contact with the thousand inessential facts and worthless trivialities which are the adjuncts of real life everywhere and at all times. There is no way of representing these trivialities on the stage; they have no place there; they merely bore the spectator and take away the time and patience which he is ready to give to weightier matters. Notwithstanding the impossibilities for the dramatist to imitate real life, he should, of course, give an illusion of real life, and the art of creating this illusion is the art of the dramatist.

As the stage—using the word in its narrowest, most literal and material sense—as the stage is now constructed and set, the restrictions upon portraying real life realistically, as defined by Mr. Jones, are, no doubt of great force. However, one is oftentimes inclined to wonder if a day is ever coming which shall witness and inaugurate a New Drama and a New Stage, a sort of revolution in stage mounting. As matters stand now the mounting of plays—even of the very best, are absurdly disappointing, canvas flats representing solid stone, that wobble at a touch, doors that open only one way, landscapes and ploughed fields that bulge and billow in a draught of air, absurd arrangement of artificial lights, hard wooden floors, resounding hollowly to the tread, doing duty for grass plots and solid earth. The veriest tyro, the most ignorant backwoodsmen would not for an instant be deceived by the most carefully mounted scene in all Bernhardt's repertoire. He is not even expected to be deceived. Then why should it be done at all? Scenic effect is not all necessary to the interest of a play. The greatest dramas ever written, "Œdipus Tyrannos," "Hamlet," "The Cid" and so many others, dispensed with everything but the veriest essentials. The front of a temple or palace, with three doors, sufficied for Sophocles. Signs and placards were all that Shakespeare depended upon. Corneille managed with scarcely more than a raised platform. Fancy Corneille, Shakespeare and the Greek in the pit of a modern theatre. It is not improbable that the first criticism of latter-day methods from the lips of the ancient masters would be to the effect that the clumsiness of the mounting (pretending so much and falling so wretchedly short) distracted attention from the action of the play itself, was more—much more—of a hindrance than a help. Half measures are bad measures, and sometimes are ludicrous enough. L'Africaine as performed at the Paris Opera, contains one scene in which Vasco da Gama puts his ship about. The effect is stupendous, sailors hauling and chanting at the ropes—the helm hard over—the yards swinging around—the bowsprit describing an arc on the horizon. The whole superstructure of the imitation ship moves around, masts, cabin, rails and all. The deck, that is to say the floor of the stage, is absolutely stationary. Vasco da Gama on the bridge turns with the turning ship, his crew, like so many Casabiancas, are rooted to the moveless deck. The effect intended to be sublime, is only ridiculous.

When Patti and her opera troupe appeared for "positively the last time" in this city, the operas of "Trovatore" and "Aida" were given on succeeding nights in the order named. The same scenery was used for both operas. The identical Gothic flats and wings that had represented a feudal hall in "Trovatore" were made to do duty for the throne room in the prehistoric Egyptian palace of "Aida."

A system and theory of mounting plays that can permit such monstrous incongruities to overcome us like a summer cloud without our special mention is manifestly wrong. Do away with the present idea of scene setting entirely, return to the simplicity of the Periclesian Greeks, or develop a new system.

It would not do merely to change the mounting of plays. The style of play must adapt itself to a change as well. One ventures to predict that the next century will see a new theater, wherein the principles of panoramic art will be applied to scene painting. There will be no footlights, but instead a powerful overhead light and lesser side lights. The back or the stage will be shaped (for outdoor scenes), like the inside of a dome, the audience will sit farther from the stage itself, grass mats will take the place of green baize, and the wings so arranged that the spectators at the side of the house will be unable to see around them. A new style of play will come into vogue that will be nearer to real life in just such proportion as the novels of to-day are nearer to it than those of the last century. The melodramatic, even the mildly dramatic, will decline—the tendency has alway been in that direction—and things will happen on the stage—Henry Arthur Jones to the contrary—exactly as they have happened in real life, as they do now in Howell's novels. Either this, or we shall burn our painted flats, discharge our property men, tear up our costumes and return to the pure, chaste unadorment of the classical, where the action is everything and the scenery n'

ERNEST RENAN.

By WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

The year which is now fast drawing to a close h been remarkable for its contributions to the higher a-ture; indeed, I am inclined to think that, when its inal accounts are made up, we shall find it to have been c i the whole, so far as English and American letters are concerned, a rather poor and unprofitable one. But it is memorable for several noteworthy achievements in biography, and among them, for the recently-published Life of Ernest Renan (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) by Madame James Darmesteter, better known probably to English readers under her maiden name—A. Mary I. Robinson. This is an admirable piece of work, and may be cordially recommended to those who desire to know, as a living personality, one of the most fascinating, and at the same time enigmatical figures of our time.

For it is not a mere biography in the ordinary restricted sense of the word—not simply a record of outward happenings and results, digested into chronological sequence. It is, after Sainte-Beuve's manner, a "portrait." Biographical details are given; events have their due place. But when we close the book, we know something more about the man than that he lived thus and died thus — succeeded here, failed there. We are left with the strongest sense of his wonderful genius and individuality, and, turning to his works, find ourselves the better able to answer the two questions which, it has been well said, we have a right, in such cases, to put: first, "How was this mind formed and what was the genesis of the thought it expressed?" and secondly, "What lasting and fruitful element has it contributed to its generation and those which come after?" And these questions, as James Darmesteter (the late lamented husband of the writer of this book) once said, have special interest for the student of Renan, because of the strange complexities of his character, the apparent contradictions of his thought, and the enormous influence exerted by him over the intellectual life of his age.

Renan used to speak of himself as a kind of hippogriff, belonging to no race of mortal herds. He meant that in his nature were blended the Latin and the Celt. Born in Treguier, in the Cotes du Nord, of a family of sailors, he was "as Breton as Merlin himself," with the dreamy qualities, the subtle melancholy, the superstitious bias, of his race. Almost certainly he exaggerated his debt to a Celtic ancestry, Madame Darmesteter avers. Perhaps so. But we may doubt whether he went far wrong in declaring that to his education among simple priests and simpler peasant-folk he owed something at least of his marvelous power "of reviving spiritual conditions different from those of our own day." "In order to comprehend a religion," he was wont to say, "we must have believed it—and have left it." For a time he loved the Catholicism of his forefathers—so different from what he was presently to find in the brilliant world of Paris—with a fervor and devotion which seemed to make the priesthood his ultimate destiny. And when the crisis in his life came, and he was swept out of the Church, though then the Irish side of his character came uppermost and his keen, ruthless logical faculty asserted itself, he remained always at heart very near indeed to his boyish faith. The idealist within him was never killed by the skeptic, the poet by the scientist, the Celt by the Latin. He left the Church, not as Lamennais before him had left it, in storm and anger; he left it in all kindliness of feeling, because, while it still possessed his heart, it no longer mastered his reason. We may make what we will of Renan's late work on the Origins of Christianity and the History of the People of Israel. We are free to differ from his special conclusions, and to criticise the methods he employed. But we cannot fail to see that in coming in this way upon certain circumstances in his life, we get close to one of the great elemental factors of his power. We are accustomed to say that, perhaps supreme among the stylists and artists of his time, Renan is able to rehabilitate the past for us, to revivify long departed conditions of culture, by his literary skill, and by that alone. Of a surety, the literary skill counts much—who can read a dozen of his pages and doubt it? But James Darmesteter adds another illuminating consideration when he says: "When he wrote the history of past beliefs, he had only to interrogate himself to find again in his own consciousness the secret of their nature and their power."

For many readers, who concern themselves only in a casual way with the development of thought, Renan's name is practically synonymous with dilettante skepticism. Skeptic he of course was, in the strictest sense; for he was a man of advanced judgment, perhaps too much afraid of taking sides, too prone to put a question-work everywhere. But his life had nothing of the dilettante about it. His vast and accurate scholarship—that scholarship of the German savant which underlies even his most delicate and fascinating work—would suffice to show this, even if we had not, as fortunately we now have, the record of a life full of strenuous exertion and ceaseless and varied activity, of duty bravely done, and discouragement and sorrow nobly borne. He died at his post, still in harness in spite of the ravages of long disease. "I have done my work," he said to his wife; "I die happy." And again: "It is the most natural thing in the world to die. Let us accept the laws of the Universe. The heavens and the earth remain." These are not the words of the dilettante—of the trifler who has idled through life, indifferent to its realities and its responsibilities.

An error of somewhat different character, arising not from entire ignorance, but from superficial reading of Renan's works, is to be found in the oft-repeated assertion that for him, as for some other great teachers of our time, science was the whole of life. The explanation of this misconception probably lies in the fact that his constant emphasis was not upon the good, but upon the True. Veritatem dilexi are the words engraved upon his tomb, and they sum up the inspiring aims and purposes of his long career. "When the scientific sense awoke in him," says James Darmesteter, "and he beheld the world of history transfigured by it, he was dazzled by it, and the influence lasted throughout his life." But it is a grave mistake to suppose that he, therefore, ever lost or neglected the exquisite moral sense which had been nurtured by his early training and environment. It was part of his seeming inconsistency of thought, that he chose so often to express his stoical ethics in the phraseology of Epicurus. But of him there remained, when all was said, one certain thing only in a world of uncertainties—Duty. Good is good, evil is evil—that antithesis was never touched by his skepticism; that for him was the one fundamental and everlasting fact of human life.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

A positive flurry of excitement has gone through the city on the occasion of the publication of the address by the Golden Jubilee Committee, and San Francisco is suddenly wakening to the excellence and magnitude of the celebration of the semi-centenial anniversary of Marshall's discovery of gold. Already the designs for the floats which are to be such a prominent feature of the street parade have been decided upon. These designs are to be emblematical or commemorative of such historic ideas and subjects as the raising the flag at Monterey, the discovery of gold, missions, a pioneer train, the aborigines, navigators, civilization, agriculture, etc. A mining exhibit is promised, which is to be the largest ever seen in the State, and elaborate are preparations now under way to make that promise good, Mine-owners have especially interested themselves in the exhibit and are endeavoring not only to show actual plants of mining machinery in full operation but also to surround the plants with appropriate acessories, properties and even painted scenery in order to emphasize realistic effects. One of the most interesting exhibits will be made by the Risdon Iron Work. This is no less than a lake of quicksilver in which iron anchors and cannon balls will be floating. The North Bloomfield Mining Company intend to have a section of their mine reproduced exactly, with drifts, pumps and giants working full steam ahead, while another and especially timely exhibit will be a model of the Chilcoot Pass and a relief of the country around the head waters of the Yukon. Arrangements have also been made to secure a large number of curios and relics of the early days of California's mining boom. Taking it by and large, the Jubilee is to be a notable and noteworthy event and an admirable reminder of the fact that in her brief career as Territory and State California has contributed $1,500,000,000 to the world's wealth in precious metal alone.

***

Among the politicians there is a solitary topic of interest—the forthcoming Freeholders' election. Monday is the important day, and the result will prove more than most people imagine. The contest is clearly one between all reputable citizens and the bosses. If the business men and manufacturers have that respect for their real interests which their fervent protestations might seem to convey, they will see to it the Charter Convention's Freeholders are supported. On the other ticket, it is true, are some excellent men, such as Joseph D. Grant, Reuben Lloyd, C. B. Stone and William Pierson, but they cannot leaven their accompaniments or sanctify the auspices of their nomination. That the "push" element will rally at the polls may be depended on—it is with them a case of bread and butter, but will the business man, the great merchant, the wealthy manufacturer rise to the emergency and see to it that their employees record their votes. If the campaign has developed a sense of the tremendous importance of the election, then there will be a big vote, and the "push" ticket will surely be defeated. If "down town" maintains its pristine indifference and the politicians and their friends alone vote, the result will be the victory of Rainey, Curry & Co. It is really their ticket against the field, because no voter will take their nominees for choice. The campaign has discredited them sufficiently for that. Besides this, the composition of the Charter ticket shows keen political foresight and a shrewd sense of local values and relationships. At least nine of its members have considerable individual strength and the prestige of former service. They are a body of very respectable and conservative citizens, who may be trusted to make a charter acceptable to the great body of our citizens. It will have to be a noxious instrument to fail of passage, for the community is tired of present conditions.

***

Though the charter campaign has been a late fight, considerable of energy has been developed at the last. The best kind of campaign literature has been circulated, and the forcible representation which the Examiner and the Bulletin are making daily must tell on their readers. Though the Call is behind the "push" ticket, its fight on their behalf is neither vigorous nor intelligent. It is handicapped, of course, by the fact that the Merchants' Association supports the Charter Convention, and that organization is composed of the advertising forces of the city. The Chronicle's support is of the most lukewarm character for a variety of political reasons. and the Post seems to favor the Charter nominees as against the "fusionists." At all events there is no great confidence among the politicians, and it will not surprise me to hear that the followers of Rainey & Curry have voted for Charter nominees. That Martin Kelly can deliver his army of followers under the circumstances now existing is highly improbable, and their tendency will be to oppose the Curry forces. Considering all the contingencies, the prospect for the Charter ticket is by no means as hopeless as some people would have us believe.

***

One cannot but think regretfully of the downfall of Auditor Broderick. The Non-Partisan indorsement and the independent Republican vote "north of Market street" elected him last winter, for "south of Market street" rallied strong for Deane. Yet he is now "lined up" with the boss forces, and has deliberately and publicly allied himself with those interests which the community believes alien to good government. He can never again be elected, because the "push" have no use for him personally, and, after this, he cannot command the support of the respectable voter. So he will have to retire, or will be ignominiously defeated. Mr. Creswell has certainly lost prestige in the same connection, though the current impression accords him more honor than it does Mr. Broderick, because he is a man of agreeable personality and a zealous official. As for the Grand Jury report, that was sheer nonsense. The City and County Attorney's work has rarely been in better shape, and never before has it been handled with half the zeal and ability of the present administration. It is to be presumed that both Broderick and Creswell yielded to certain influences, and would have acted otherwise had the pressure been less. No clever political boss will ever put his connections in the invidious position of deciding against the people. It destroys their usefulness by making them objects of suspicion. The whole affair with the journalistic comments thereon, has aroused an impression that someone is trying to steal something, and that has kindled the people whose indifference might otherwise have been depended upon. No abuse of power by an Election Commission has ever succeeded in San Francisco, and as long as the love of a square game holds out here, it never will.

***

Though there is a certain joy in knowing about things, there is a compensating dis-satisfaction when the standard is not maintained. Take the musician, for instance, who derives an exquisite pleasure from well-attuned harmonies—dissonance is a torture to his highly educated ear. For the epicure whose taste has been trained to the appreciation of subtle flavors, a poorly cooked entrée becomes a tragedy. It is equally true that the musician who delights in the mysteries of Schumann has a profound contempt for the lover of Sousa, and the epicure regards as a savage he who prefers boiled beef to a canvas-back. Apropos of the group of disappointments peculiar to gourmets rather a good story was told me. A very discriminating gentleman, who had been a member of the Hasty Pudding Club when District Attorney Barnes was its president, and who owns a million, a chef and a cellar, consigned to Mr. Barnes a young friend who was coming to San Francisco for the holidays. It was a reasonable assumption that the friend knew of the delicate mysteries of the table, and Mr. Barnes prepared accordingly. He invited the young man to a late breakfast at the club, and called the steward into consultation as to the rarities which might be placed before this most particular guest. There were phesants, which were oredered, an antique sauterne, and then, quoted the functionary with much impressment: "By the way, we have just had in a dozen eccrevisse, the delicious fresh-water eccrevisse from Oregon. You ought to have them, too." Of course, they were pre-empted and special directions given for their preparation. The guest came—a bright, healthy young fellow, who had been seeing some cowboy life in Arizona, and together they strolled in to breakfast. There was an oyster cocktail first, then the eccrivisse. The presumtive connoissuer gazed curiously at his plate, experimented with his fork, and then remarked:

"I say, Barnes, how do you eat these d——d crabs, anyway?"

***

The Bohemian Club celebrated the advent of Christmas tide by jinks, low, high and others, that I hear were of particular and notable merit. The sire of the High Jinks was Mr. Wm. Sproule, the club's president. M. A. Newell assumed the responsibility of the "Jinks that were low," and H. J. Stewart discharged the duties of musical directorship. Interspersed with the speeches of the High Jinks were vocal numbers by Donald Graham, Thomas Rickard and Frank Coffin. Mr. James E. Runcie closed the programme by an address that I am told was quite the event of the evening. The Low Jinks was an uproarious farce written on the "First Born" and called, of course, "The Second Born." S. A. Cloman, H. W. Dimond, J. E. J. Archibald and George de Long, made the "world a little better and happier" for the nonce in their interpretation of the roles of Dr. Po Lo. Lee Shore (wife of Bum Long), Hop On (a mush bowl mender), and Men Low Park (a merchant). The programme in itself was an achievement, and rejoiced in such an array of names as High See, Sing Low, Way Bill and Get Sum. The mounting for the farce was excellent and, but for the smaller size of the stage, one could easily have fancied one's self back in the Alcazar building during the run of Powers'—now world-renowned—drama.

***

The revival of the interest in swimming as an amateur sport has been the cause, or perhaps the effect, of an interesting contest recently held at the Lurline Baths in this city. The contest was a quarter mile race between H. F. Brewer and E. B. Stolle for the championship of America, and was held under the auspices of the Pacific Coast Amateur Athletic Association. Brewer held the previous record at 6:23 3-5, which was the [illegible] (though 5 57 has been done with the tide in England). In the recent contest Mr. Brewer beat out Stolle handily, winning by 70 feet, the time being 5:45. Brewer, champion [illegible] now reputed in America, is but nineteen years old, and weighs 160 pounds in his swimming trunks. Indoor swimming is becoming more and more [illegible] but until the waters of the bay and ocean become very sensibly moderated in temperature, there will be little surf or bay bathing indulged in.

***

Up at the Hopkins Institute is a canvas of the celebrated French painter, Bourgougne, (known also in connection with his designs for the Sevres work), which has not received the attention it should deserve as a matter of course. The work itself is a study of peonies displayed in a vase. Besides having striking photomatric quality in rendering light, the color contrasts are done with extreme fidelity making valuable a subject in itself somewhat slight. Raised out of the category of useless flower pieces, this is a real work of art and possessing a dignity of its own. Doctor Bazet is the owner.

***

The Post's contention that only a millionaire newspaperman could afford to produce such editions as the Christmas Examiner and the "New Era" Call is not well founded. There must have been at least $20,000 of special business in the latter paper, and the Monarch had a most prosperous appearance. Indeed, its advertising columns made a showing calculated to satisfy Mr. Hearst, and large enough, I imagine, to offset the cost of the color printing which does not come so high as the uninitiated believe. From the typographical and picturesque point of view it was the best holiday number the Examiner has produced since it began making a feature of colors. The front page was a beauty, and worthy a heavier quality of paper. However, I was disappointed in the prize yarn, and Bierce was not at his best. Of the poems, that of Alice Rix was the most poetic, and Gertrude Atherton's Round Valley effect seemed the smartest tale in the number. There must have been a dearth of available fiction when the editors had to use such a slight sketch as that of Justin McCarthy's—which was not worth the paper it was printed upon. The decorative art throughout the supplement, however, was far ahead of the literary quality, and herein lay its inferiority to the "New Era" Call which no one will have time to read, but which really contains some excellent ideas. In fact, it was most creditably edited, and, outside its fiction, which is infinitely worse than the Examiner's, it is well worth keeping. The articles about California industries by Henry Muller, Claus Spreckels, Horace Davis, Clarence Wetmore, J. W. Kerr and Henry Crocker, come from authorities on the subjects treated, and are worth preservation. The "New San Francisco," the pages on our commerce and industries are full of good information, and, besides, are set out in exceedingly swagger style, the decorations being clever, if a trifle architectural. I am speaking of the special features, of course—of the pages up to 26—the rest of the number is advertising and local news. The colored cover seems to have been crudely printed and, considering the quality of the paper used, the half-tone of the building are unnecessarily bad. The other half-tones through the number are even less successful, that of the Spreckels mansion being so black that it gave no impression of the magnificent interior. However, it is impossible to obtain results with these engravings unless a highly calendered paper is used. On the whole, the "New Era" was a fine paper and really hard to excel.

***

Just of what a Christmas number should consist is purely a matter of opinion. Ought it to have what is called a Christmas flavor?—holly and red berry decorations, Santa Claus in colors, snowflakes, stockings and misletoe boughs? Or, should it be merely a compendium of stories and pictures to be read during the leisure days that follow the great anniversary? We all know that Christmas has become rather a celebration than a commemoration—it is the harvest feast of the year rather than the Christian's holy day. The present feature of it is just the opportunity to make glad the hearts of our own or someone else's children, and to repay with books or gifts the obligations which our friends have conferred on us through the twelve months that have gone by. But, it is of Christmas journals that I have to write—we have had an infliction of them in town here, besides the invasion from England and from the East. I have turned over the leaves of the whole category of them, but, thus far, the stories of the English numbers are unread—at least by the writer. Experience has shown him they are seldom worth perusal. Tales written to order and with an enforced Christmas flavor, bear all the marks of their manufacture and lack both the sprightliness of inspiration and the briskness of movement which distinguishes the "contributed" from the "ordered" story. However, it is safe to assume Figaro's yarns are worth the price, and Black and White generally has a choice story of adventure. The Sketch set non't look brilliant, but Town Topics offers half a dozen rattling yarns, well up to its flamboyant standard. Life is rather conventional, and its cover is by no means a notable production. However, Gelett Burgess' story is quite good, though not equal to the delightful fairy tale he contributed to the St. Nicholas, and the Mayer pictures are capital. I shall remember the number for Droch's witty characterization of Quo Vadis as a compound of Barnum's circus, the Seeley dinner and the Bradley-Martin ball. That is a gem and quite the best criticism of this much-belauded tale. As for my local contemporaries—they have clung to their ancient idols and given California scenery ad nauseam. The same old landscapes stare at us out of their foolishly decorated pages, and one languidly wonders why these editors fail to scheme out a new idea. Surely the Yosemite, Big Trees, Boulder Creek and the scenery of San Francisco, the Sierras and Marin County have been sufficiently reproduced to have earned the privilege of exemption from Christmas numbers.

***

Opinion seems to be divided as to whether the much-boomed Enfant Terrible promised by Oliver Herford and Gelett Burgess will ever appear or not. No paper ever got better free advertising, not even the Lark, whose coy modesty made it friends all over the United States. The latest papers to take this "Terrible Infant" seriously are the London Sketch and the Academy. I am told that a dummy of the first number has, however, actually been prepared by R. H. Russell, the New York publisher, who has been so successful with Gibson's, Remington's and Nicholson's books, and that John Lane is to have the English rights. The first number of the Infant will contain a satire in Bab Ballady verse, entitled the "Bohemians of Boston," a skit on the League of the White Rose, the latest fad of the ultra-Anglomaniacs, to which Jacobite organization Bliss Carman, Herbert Stone, Miss Louise Imogen Guiney, Ralph Adams Cram and others belong. Of the Infant's "Orchid Club" it is said that:

> "Fitz-Willieboy was so blase
> He burned a Transcript up one day!"

and the climax of the poem shows how

> "Fitz-Willieboy M'Flubadub,
> The Regent of the Orchid's Club,
> Had written on the window-sill,
> This awful legend—'Beacon H—ll!"

There is promised, also, the excruciating story of the "Winchester Repeating Hen," whose terrible title promises much. The sheet is to be about the size of Life and set in large French type. The "Rules of the Nursery" outline the policy of the Governors (and Governesses.) No one, not duly elected an Honorary Infant is to be allowed to contribute, except upon payment of the regular rates ($10 per column), and other regulations will make the Infant, like the Lark, sui generis. Meanwhile the ingenious governors are flooding the country with stories of Oliver Herford's wit. Perhaps the best one that has come out of late is the retort of that typical "Minister's Son," when he was accosted by an enthusiastic acquintance and slapped gayly on the back. Sir Oliver looked up in his gentle, near-sighted way and replied: "Excuse me. I don't know your name, sir, but your manners are very familiar."

***

Apropos of the Lark I hear that John Lane has recently ordered one hundred copies to be sold in England, where it is beginning to be found out, and his New York agent is buying up copies of the first volume, now almost out of print. "Les Jeunes" held a reunion last week in Mr. Burgess' rooms, to bid farewell to Bruce Porter, who has just sailed for England, whence he is to go to Southern France to work. At the Lark dinner were also Bliss Carman, Oliver Herford, Ernest and Mrs. Peixotto, Miss J. W. Tompkins, Miss Geraldine Bonner and Miss Carolyn Wells, the clever "Princess Perilla" of the whilom "Bird." There was talk of organizing an Omar Khayyam Club to meet in the Wilderness of New York, to whose monthly feast each member is to bring Verses, a Bough, a Loaf of Bread, a Jug of Wine and, not the least attractive auxiliary, one Thou "to sing beside" him! John Lane has promised to publish the Rubaiyat there read, in booklets. Mr. Porter Garnett, a San Francisco Omar-fiend, whose Glose (one of the few ever written in English) is to be found in Mosher's Symposium, In Praise of Omar, was elected a member of the Club.

***

The body of William Guldensuppe, the murdered New York bath-rubber, after lying seven months in pickle and exhibited to two juries last week received an imposing funeral in New York. These interesting remains lay in state in an undertaker's shop on Broadway, and were viewed by a crowd of between ten and twelve thousand persons. On the pillow of the white satin-lined casket reposed a photograph of the missing head, and the other quarters of the body, which had been dissected by Mrs. Nack's saw, were dressed and collected in the most elaborate style of the embalmer's art. There were more spectators than at the funeral of Henry George. An interesting detail of the funeral procession of the latter was the fact that among the pall-bearers of the great socialist were five multi-millionaires who marched alongside the catafalque many blocks to the tune of "La Marseillaise!" evidently unconscious of the double significance of the occasion.

***

We are debonair on occasion, it seems, among certain members of the faculty at the U. C. and Stanford University. Men of the world quotha, drinkers of the blood of the grape viveurs, terrible fellows amongst the women. Oh, my? We give dinners to one another, it appears, where we do off the pedagogal cap and gown and do on the rakish beaver and the necktie of a thousand glittering strands. Faut ouvrir l'oeil alors, when we "get together amongst ourselves" and put the unaccustomed cigarette in the exact middle of our lips and forget to expectorate, and quaff the foaming breaker of Napa soda, and deny not the soft impeachment when we are joked about our conquests of feminine hearts. Fancy now! It is told that such a merry rout of roisterers foregathered last week around the dinner table of a certain club of this city. Some of the faculty of Berkeley were dining professors from Stanford, and all was merry as a married belle. The popping of the Napa soda corks was as the discharge of musketry, and the blue haze of cigarettes hung in the air like the smoke of battle. Not Don Juan and his boon companions banqueting before a raid upon a nunnery were more terrible than these rakish professors of Berkeley and Stanford. Feasting, Napa soda and song beguiled the passing hours until black coffee was served. Then it would appear that as a post-prandial relaxation two of the merrier of the younger professors, feeling their youthful blood run high, addressed themselves to the shaking of dice —for love, merely, just to see who would throw the highest figure, There were no stakes. These gay Lotharios, of jaded nerves and lost illusions, disdained such a trifling stimulus. They shook dice for fun. It was awful, but it was true. To them while thus engrossed came Professor Bradley of the U. C., world-worn, world-weary veteran of a thousand classrooms, who knows the sham glitter of the bauble, the brief effervescence of the bubble and the hollowness of strange sins, and he, putting an arm round each of the bacchanalian dicers, oe'r heated with Napa soda, sagely wagged his head at them and murmured with a sad smile, "Jeunesse doré; jeunesse doré."

***

Of a far different mould from those wild dare devils of the higher departments of the universities mentioned above is the Herr Professor Albin Putzker, captain-general of the German department at the State University. The sentiment and romance of the German fairly seethes and bubbles in and around the Herr Professor. The very atmosphere about him is cloyed and sweet, not to say sticky, like the air around the doors of a candy store. In calling the roll of his classes it is a little plaisanterie on the Professor's part to employ German prefixes of address before each name, Herr so and so and Fraulein such a one. Unfortunately the cosmopolitan mixture of races—and of names—that is so marked in California, occasionally interfere and sadly destroy what one might call the unities in the little joke of the Herr Professor's. There are those of Italian extraction in the German classroom, and eke those of Celtic lineage, to so pronounced extent that the jocose Professor is forced to the incongruity of calling for recitations from Fraulein Fitzpatrick and Herr Baccigalupi. There is even a legend amongst U. C. students to the effect that on one occasion (being something excitable by nature and not always sure of his Anglo-Saxon compounds) the Herr Professor addressed the lady student in question as Fraulein Patzfitrick. The story goes that the Fraulein lingered after the dismissal of the class to make certain inquiries about her work of the Herr Professor. This disposed of, the tactful head of the German department smiled his affablest and enquired suddenly, "Fraulein Fitzpatrick, were you aefer in loaf." The Fraulein is upon record as having responded that her nearest approach to that beatitude was a childish amour for a lithograph portrait of James G. Blaine. "But," observed the Fraulein, "I learned afterwards to admire him, but not to love him." The Herr Professor was speechless for a moment. Then he launched the following phrase, which surely ought to be preserved to posterity. With an impressive gesture and in great excitement the Herr Professor cried: "Fraulein Patsfitrick, I would rather bee myselluf und bee loafed, than bee Meest'r Blaine und bee admire-ed."

BOSWELL JR.

A Dream Fulfilled

BY ELIZABETH KNIGHT TOMPKINS.

Edith!"

"Yes." An unnatural note in her voice responded to the meaning in his. That "Edith" had conveyed much more than a mere form of address. Besides, it was the first time for nine years that he had called her by her name, and some long-disused chord vibrated at his intonation of the familiar syllables. He hesitated; then continued:

"We can never be friends if we ignore the past as we have tacitly agreed to do these last three months."

"I know that," she answered quietly in her usual voice.

"There are too many 'keep off the grasses' now. If we once talked it all out, things would fall into their proper places and we should no longer be afraid of going where we weren't intended to go. What do you think?" after a minute, as Edith did not reply.

"The question, in my mind, is whether it is worth the pain," she said presently, in a low voice.

"Is my friendship so little then—or the pain so great?"

"I should like to be friends with you, Harold," she went on, evading a direct answer. "I have not many friends and I find myself very much in sympathy with you; but—" Here she stopped.

"But?" he inquired. She bent her head over the fire.

'It was all very real to me once," she said at length, "and, to tell the truth, I am a little afraid to touch those old places even now."

"You have not forgiven me yet." This was an assertion, not a question.

"You are mistaken. I have, utterly and entirely. I realized years ago that you were not in the least to blame. In fact, it was only my vanity that ever resented it—my resason never did—though I confess I tried to make it. I knew it was all my fault. I only wish I were angry at you. It would give me more hope," she broke off with more feeling in her voice than she had heretofore shown.

"Hope of what?"

"That I still have it in me to feel something of what I once did."

"In one sense it was your own fault," Harold went on, taking up the question at a different place. "I would have married you if you would have let me, and I have no doubt that we should have been very happy together after a little."

"If I had not died in the interim. Simple affection in return for what I gave you! You spoke without thinking."

"Yes, I spoke without thinking," he repeated. "I might have grown to love you, though," he added after a second.

"You never would have," she asserted with decision. "I had shown you all that was best of me in the first week that we were engaged; and after the novelty of knowing that I loved you had worn off, I only bored you. No," she continued, stopping Harold's protest with a movement of her hand, "it is perfectly true. I do not blame you in the least. I would have bored my present self if I had known myself then. I was so crude, so ignorant, so intense, so undeveloped in every direction but one. I should have made you dislike me in time because I could not have helped being perverse and exacting. After I realized, as I did in a few days, though it was some time before I would acknowledge it to myself—after I had realized that what I had taken for love on your part was simply a momentary response to your discovery of my love for you, the little self-confidence I had left me, and I was wholly at your mercy."

Harold rose from his chair and walked across the room and back, taking up his stand by the mantelpiece.

"You speak as if you had loved me very much," he said. "But you never showed it to me, not even that first time, when I found you crying. I was conscious of it, but more through intuition than anything else. One or two little caresses were the most I ever got."

"Oh, the poor little thing!" Edith exclaimed, in self-pity. "I was so shy and so ignorant! It used to frighten me to death to have you kiss me, and yet, I was always longing to have you 'scare me again.' Do you know, it excited me so that it used to make me sick from head to foot to have you put your arm around me. If you had loved me, I should have soon learned to be responsive, but I discovered the truth so piteously soon."

"Edith," Harold began, slowly, "I haven't any right to say this to you—forgive me for it—but you must have suffered terribly at the end if you felt like that. I give you my word, I had no idea it was so serious. I supposed that it was a girl's fancy, and that you would get over it quickly, you were so young. And nobody knew about it except your mother. I wouldn't have let you release me if circumstances had been different."

"Do you want to know just what I felt for you?" she asked in a low, intense voice. He nodded his head, but did not speak. Edith leaned back in her chair and looked up at him where he stood.

"You were my life, my God, my religion. I gave you everything I had given me to give. I have never had even a fancy for another man. My love for you died hard, but when it went, it took with it all my capacity for intense feeling of any kind." He put his hand over his eyes as if to shield them from the light of the fire.

"It is quite dead?"

"Yes, quite dead. Of course, there is something that separates you from other men for me. There always will be. I have a sincere feeling of friendship for you, the growth of the last few months, but that is all."

"I cannot tell you how this hurts me, not only on account of what you have suffered, but because of what I have missed."

"You missed nothing that you would have valued. My love for you was too intense, too unproportioned, to bring happiness to anyone. I was proud, but I knew perfectly well that my love would have made a doormat of my pride for you to wipe your feet on. No man could stand such adoration and not be made a tyrant."

"Not if he loved the woman equally well?"

"He couldn't have. Women who can command love never do love like that."

"Nor men," he responded with a sigh. He sat down again in the big leather chair beside hers, and reaching over, took her hand in both his.

"Forgive me, for I knew not what I did," he murmured.

"Don't mind, Harold," she said gently. "It was a great experience, and I am glad that it happened to me. Everything in my inner life that is worth having has come to me through that. Even at the time when I used to get out of bed and lie on the cold floor with the agony of it, I would not have given it up for all the happiness in the world—never for one second."

"But if it has kept you from marrying, from having love returned as well as given in your life, Edith? There must have been many others who have wanted you."

"No; there has never been but one. I suppose I could have had others, but I have taken so little interest that they couldn't find anything in me to love. I have had men friends, of course, but we talked of books and problems, and they never, one of them, have seen the human, the emotional side of me, or even known that there was one to see. I am afraid there is not any longer," she added.

"But that one? Do you know—it is ridiculous—but I feel jealous of him."

"Do you remember that little poem of Alice Meynell's, about the one man whom she lets come near enough to her to be refused.

> 'My sacred Nay
> Was never cheapened by the way.'

Well, I tried to love one man, with this result. I couldn't, but we are still friends."

"Do I know him?"

"I shall not tell you. Yes, I am sorry not to have any love in my life. I often long for children of my own, but less and lees intensely all the time. I am horribly blase, Harold. Pity me if you want to. I don't mind it from you."

"Edith, dear, listen to me. I have never forgotten you all these years. You whom I did not love were remembered while women whom I have loved have been forgotten. It is inexplicable, but true. I have often wondered about you of late years, about what kind of a women you had grown to be. I knew you had never married. I felt sure that you had become a fine woman, but what I never suspected was that you had become the woman of my dreams. How is it that you have all the virtues, all the faults even, that I like best."

"It is very natural," Edith answered with a tremulous smile. "You talked to me a great deal about your ideal woman, and I suppose it helped to turn me in that direction."

"I never once suspected that I should meet you to love you," Harold went on. "It is a long time since I have loved a woman," he added pensively.

"And you love me now?"

"I do—not as you loved me—one doesn't at my age—but deeply and strongly."

How strange!" Edith said musingly. "To have the dreams of one's youth come true in this way! How many of those nights when I couldn't stay in bed were soothed by dreams of your coming to love me. I used to plan how I would tell you that it was too late and heap scorn upon you—at least, I did sometimes. But all the time I knew in my heart that I should do something very different."

"Is the scorn coming now?" Harold asked laying his cheek on the hand which he still held.

"Oh, I stopped planning that part years ago. It is true that it is too late, though. Oh, the pity of it! To have it come now when I don't want it, when all the best years of my life have been spent in an agony of longing for it. Oh, Harold, how could you make me suffer so!" She drew the one he held away and, burying her face in both hands, began to cry quietly. Harold got up and sat down on the broad arm of the chair, putting his arm around her.

"Is it quite true that you do not want it?" he asked. "Edith," he said brokenly when she did not answer. "My dearest girl, it is not too late. You could not feel it all as you do if you did not love me yet. It shall be the work of my life to make it all up to you."

She let her head sink back on his shoulder with a sigh of content.

Every fall the Great Salt Lake is several feet lower than in the spring, but this year the line is two feet below the average. The water itself is said to be losing its saline nature and is rapidly turning into an inland sea of fresh water. This is accounted for by the clogging of the salt springs on the north end of the lake, and the continual enlarging of the fresh water springs in other points along the shore. Another peculiar change that has taken place in the lake is the gradual upheaval of the bottom. In recent years its greatest depth has not exceeded forty feet, while the average depth is only from twelve to twenty. Fifty years ago the bottom could not be sounded in places.

THE MELBOURNE CUP MEETING, 1897, OF THE VICTORIA RACING CLUB

1. Crowd on the course after the Melbourne Cup—winner's number up. 2. Gaulus (Gozo-Industry, by Musket), winner of the Melbourne Cup—Steve Callmer, jockey. 3. Caulfield Cup finish—Amberite wins. 4. V. R. C. Stewards—Lord Brassey, Governor of Victoria, with his arm in a sling. 5. Melbourne Cup finish—Gaulus wins. 6. Weighing-in after the race for the Melbourne Cup, Gaulus first, and his full brother, The Grafter, second. 7. First run past for the Melbourne Cup. 8. Hurdle Race on Oaks Day. 9. Amberite, by Carbine, winner of the Caulfield Cup.

"Expressing" Eggs and Milt

An Opening in the Rack

The Barrier Across the Stream

Farmers Carrying Away the Fish After Spawn-Taking

The Stripping Platform

Gates in the Barrier

SCENES AT THE M'CLOUD RIVER HATCHERY DURING THE SPAWN-TAKING SEASON

UNCLE SAM'S BABIES

A Day Spent at the Salmon-Hatchery on the McCloud River.

An interesting place this Government Salmon Hatchery at Baird Station, California, and most interesting are the sights to be seen there at this time of the year. They are taking the eggs from the fish now and the whole process of the operation, from the time the big fifteen or twenty pounder is seined till the moment when stripped of eggs or milt, as the case may be, he or she is tossed back into the stream a bewildered, terrified, thrashing fury of scales and fins, is as unique a spectacle as one would care to see. This hatchery, one of the most important salmon hatcheries in the world, is situated on the McCloud River, in Shasta County.

We were up early in the morning. It was cold and gray and rather dismal, and we stood shivering on the bank while the seive was being set. Out from the "stripping platform" across the stream stretched the rack that blocked the progress of the upgoing salmon. It was a simple affair of cleats, with intervals wide enough to permit the passage of "grilse" only. The pool lay very quiet and gray in the early morning light, smooth as a billiard table. Not a fin cut the surface, never a fish "broke," the water was without a ripple. One looked down into its depths and searched in vain for any slow-moving indistinct shadow, with waving fins and gleaming flanks. It was impossible to imagine that close at hand, between those two banks where the river talked and talked incessantly, deep down there in grey water were lying the great fish, the king of the game that swims—tremendous ruddy fellows, crested and scaled like warriors, fighters, as all sportsmen know, very bulldogs for courage and pluck and downright ferocity.

There was a great pile of brushwood on the shore. Somebody touched it off, and in a few moments we were warming ourselves at a huge bon-fire that laid a path of red and gold across the stream. Meanwhile the boats had gone to the far side of the pool, setting the net. The signal was given to haul in and the windlass began to groan and lament. Slowly the line of corks contracted, drawing up to the stripping platform where by now we were all collected watching for the first sign of fish. The semi-circle of corks grew smaller and smaller and still no sign. The pool might have been a swimming tank for all the evidence of life given by the fish. The windlass yelled like a lost spirit. It was cold and gray and very desolate in the early morning light. The circle narrowed still further, then suddenly and without warning I saw one of the most thrilling sights in Nature. The "break" of a twenty-pound salmon, the single sudden leap, clear of the water, the flanks all flashing, the fins raised, the great flange of the tail flipping from the still, smooth water like the paddle of a side-wheeler. Up into that gray morning light he went turning in mid-air with a grand curve, as it were the sweep of a scimitar from a cloud of smoke. then down again in a churn of foam and chasing ripples. The heart leaped with his spring, it was as exhilirating as a charge of cavalry. The morning was no longer desolate. Suddenly another scimitar slashed through, then another and another, the whole pool was alive with a score, with fifty, with a hundred flashing blades, and the noise of the troubled water was like a little cataract. Then as the net drew in and in we could see them beneath the surface, see the red bodies of them coming and going by the hundreds, panic-stricken and furious. It was a thing to see and remember and tell of. No man could have stood there on that stripping platform and watched it and not have become thence forward a confirmed and hopeless angler.

The net was hauled up till the space it enclosed was one writhing, quivering mass of fish, and the dipping began. Men with dip nets ladled out the twenty-pounders with as little unconcern as though they were fingerlings. The males and females were sorted in reference to their "ripeness," "ripeness" being understood as readiness to spawn. The "ripe" males were tossed into one of the live boxes and the "ripe" females into another, while those who were not yet "ripe" were deposited in still a third. How the handlers of the fish knew the difference I could not discover, they seemed to go upon a general indefinable appearance, that was neither shape, size nor color, but they never made any mistakes. When the boxes were full the egg taking began.

A salmon was dipped from the pen and handed to the spawn-taker. It was a splendid, solidly built female that looked capable of splintering the toughest rod "Murphy" ever made. She thrashed and fought and quivered like a colt in the snubbing pen, as two men heavily gloved seized her, the one by the head and the other by the tail. A little pan containing about a pint of water was set ready. Then the "stripper" came between the handlers and as the salmon was held over the pan "expressed" the spawn from her by pressing downward upon the abdomen. Meanwhile a male salmon had been similarly handled, and as the eggs from the female ran out into the spawning-pan, the "milt" was pressed from the male and the two—spawn and milt—fell into the spawning-pan simultaneously. A third man took the pan and stirred the contents with a long feather, mixing eggs and milt together.

The spawn once taken the male salmon was returned to the pen, to be used day after day until his milt was exhausted. But it was all over with the female. A few moments afterward she had given up her spawn, she was dead and thrown out upon the river bank. By evening there were over a hundred female salmon on the bank. These were given away to the farmers and villagers of the neighborhood, who came down to the river in buckboards and gigs.

The eggs and milt were gently stirred with a feather in the spawning pan as they were expressed from the fish, and the pan was then placed upon a shelf under a dark curtain, where it remained for about a minute and a half, when the contents were poured into an iron bucket full of water, the eggs being placed therein before adhesion took place. Next came the process of washing the eggs, after which they were ready to be carried to the hatchery. The hatchery is a series of narrow troughs, into which are fitted wire baskets to permit a stream of fresh water to pass over the eggs continously. In about three weeks, so I was told, the eyes of the young salmon appear from the egg, then the tail, and in a short while the new-born salmon is strong enough to keep his head to the current.

The certain monotony of taking the spawn was relieved toward the end of the afternoon in rather pronounced fashion. A fifty-pounder—quite the largest fish I ever remember to have seen—made his appearance in the net. A magnificent fellow, quivering with rage and terror, lashing about with his tail till three men gave over the effort to keep him still long enough to "express" his milt. They were obliged to strait-jacket him, as though he were a "dangerous" case in an asylum. A huge hollow trough—provided for just such unmanageable cases—was brought out and the big fellow was buckled into it, but it took more than one trial to master him. It was heart-breaking to know that eventually he would be thrown back into the river. Once a fish such as he has been captured it seems almost a crime to permit his escape. You would like to have had him stuffed, or his head preserved and affixed over your mantelpiece as a refutation of mendacity.

ARNOLD MELDRUM

RACING IN AUSTRALIA

The Melbourne Cup an Event That Commands Intense Interest.

It is recorded of an Irishman that when asked to describe the chief characteristic of the people of Erin, he said they were the most cardrivingest nation in the world. Probably if an Australian had to specify the leading feature in the character of the colonists he would say, and say truly, that they are the most horseracingest people on the face of the earth. A village school boy in England on being asked what were the races that had dominated "the right little, tight little isle" since the invasion of the Romans, replied, "Epsom, Ascot, Newmarket and Doncaster." We know that race characteristics are not eliminated by change of sky, and with all the advantages the climate and general surrounings of life in the colonies have to offer to people who will devote themselves to sport it is not surprising that it flourishes in Australia and New Zealand in a marvelous way. We see plenty of racing here in California, but never anything for enthusiasm that can approach the Australian side of racecourse life.

The great event of the year is the Melbourne Cup, for which people congregate together from all the different colonies, and, indeed, travelers from all parts of the world endeavor to arrange their peregrinations so that they will reach Melbourne at the time of the great gathering. The Flemington racecourse is by many considered the finest property of its kind in the world, and with a crowd of something like 200,000 people present on Cup Day, from the Governor of the colony down to the humblest member of society, it is a sight that cannot be matched anywhere else. The course is located in a natural amphitheatre, a hill rising back of the grand stand, and affording a perfect view of the whole ground. Special trains and steamers, in fact, all kinds of special transportation, are brought into requisition for the occasion. Ladies don their best frocks, imported from Paris to a great extent, and every clerk and shop girl who has the price of a new hat or bonnet and enough to buy a ticket swells the crush that day. The entire week is one constant round of festivities, to which the leading papers devote space for elaborate decriptions, some of them issuing special supplements containing, among other things, pages and pages detailing the toilets of the ladies at Flemington and at the fancy dress ball at Government House.

On another page will be found a series of pictures illustrating the race for the Melbourne Cup this year, run on November 2d, and regarding which we have been able to obtain the following information. The meeting of the Victoria Racing Club began on Monday, November 1st, with the cup fixed for the second day. Twenty-nine horses went to the post, the value of the stake being £3,000, and the distance two miles. While there were a few horses of high class among the runners, the quality generally was not considered quite up to the average. The position of favoritism was held by an imported English horse, Positano, 5 years, 105 lbs., and though he was known to be short of work, some of the best judges considered the race a gift for him.

The race was not run at a break-neck pace, the leaders pulling hard as the stand was passed the first time round, but along the back stretch the rate of going was quickened considerably, and for the rest of the journey fully sustained the reputation of the race for good time. Two hundred yards from home The Grafter, 4 years, 105 lbs., was in command and looking like the winner, when his stable companion and full brother (who had been nearly last at one time) (Gaulus, 6 years, 106 lbs.) drew up on him and a great struggle ensued. The Grafter held on under severe punishment, but Gaulus would not be denied, and secured the verdict by a head, the three-year-old Aurum, with the heavy impost of 118 lbs., being third four lengths away. Time, 3:31. Steve Callinan, the jockey who rode the winner, is but a lad, being only twenty years of age. He has been a successful rider in the colonies for some time past, and has now steered Gaulus to victory on four occasions.

Mr. W. Forrester, the owner of both first and second, is a popular turfman in the colonies, who has hitherto not had the best of luck, having twice before run second for the Melbourne Cup, once with Rhonda and in 1890 with Highborn, a horse of high character, which if the writer remembers rightly, was imported by Lord William Beresford to India and won the Viceroy's Cup at Calcutta, the great event of the year in that part of Queen Victoria's realm. Gaulus started at 14 to 1, Aurum 20 to 1 and The Grafter 33 to 1, and Mr. Forrester, who won about £10,000 by the victory of the first-named, would have been a much larger winner had The Grafter got his head first past the post. Gaulus and The Grafter are by Gozo, a son of Wild Oats by Wild Dayrell, their dam Industry by Musket, out of Pearl Ash by Lord Clifden, and both were trained by Noah Beal, who has handled the Warwick Farm horses for many years, though Mr. Forrester manages his own stable.

Had Aurum, a son of Trenton, won he would have covered himself with glory, but he has made a grand name for himself in a succession of duels with Amberite, the son of Carbine, whose excellent picture is also presented herewith. The respective merits of Aurum and Amberite, both grandsons of Musket, have been the topic of the sporting world in the antipodes of late, but the former seems to have the most friends. He was recently sold to Mrs. Langtry, and has probably been shipped to England by this time. A colonial sporting paper well remarks that is the place for him, as the value of a good horse there is five times what it is in Australia. Aurum's owner, Mr. W. R. Wilson, came all the way from [illegible] on purpose to see his great colt run, but was unfortunately laid up and could not be present. He was consoled in a measure by winning the Oaks on the following Thursday with Bravo, a daughter of Trenton, also bred by him.

Nadejda, the Commonwealth Oaks, the winner of the Melbourne Cup, [illegible] now in England doing well, and is expected to be ready to tackle for the celebrations at Ascot next summer. The photographs published herein are from the gallery of Messrs. Wall Brothers, St. Kilda. G. L. B.

MUSIC

The Afternoon Symphony Performance Scalchi's Magnetism.

With such an attentive and solid audience as gathered at the Tivoli in evidence, it might be held that San Francisco is really interested in the serious and enduring side of music. Nothing [illegible] the head of "Light" music entered the programme. As to novelty, the Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah," was the absolutely new number, and arrived at some efficience in giving a dash of the non-classical to the scheme of the numbers Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Euryanthe Overature and two Wagner numbers made up the other material, not at all the kind to regale the popular appetite with. So that the sustained interest in the carrying out of the plan proved sincerity and a leaning to the dignified. If there was no special enthusiasm evoked there was at least absorbing interest.

The great C Minor Symphony has been given many times, and perhaps under better auspices, as far as the make-up of the band itself is concerned, especially as to the strings, and Herr Scheel, himself, has indicated more intense effects and a broader sympathy with the work itself; but the beauty and splendor of such music is not to be dimmed by a lax performance. Ethic grandeur and sensuous and noble charm never found more convincing voice then here, where the human sympathies are touched in the turn of every phase. The real Beethoven music makes other masters of the modern school suffer in comparison. Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," from Gotterdamerung, coming directly after the symphony suffered considerably, and as music, made an impression of things turgid, colorful and purposely incoherent. Not to be anti-Wagnerian, the Tanhauser Overture has done immense service to the musical world and the programme-makers, but its freshness is departed, and not to hear this work would be of benefit. Every novelist has used this overture in describing opera at least once, every orchestra has blustered over it until all the ideas are become obvious and the melody a weariness to the ear.

Saint Saens' Bacchanale was a number developing that quality of interest belonging to a composer of the "indefatigable" class, and probably fitted to give distinction to the dramatic action. Herr Scheel's band was under better control in this number.

Once again has Madame Scalchi, in singing for a local audience, expressed that rare personal magnetism, a quality which outlasts gifts of voice and specific talent. In her finest singing days that singer owed as much to her own power of attraction as to her superb voice. Great as was that vocal gift, it was never coupled with astonishing command over the resources of vocal art. Ten years ago, from a technical standard, Madame Scalchi's singing was less effective than it is now, although there was voice enough and to spare. On Tuesday night, with but a remnant of what her organ had been, this Italian singer was more interesting, from an intelligent point of view, than in the days when she, by sheer natural endowment, divided the applause with Adelina Patti. Always the same volubility, the same facility in using the open voice, made the principal feature of Mme. Scalchi's singing. But there was always the same peculiar color of chest and medium voice, touched with a dark and faintly brassy tint—so attractive to some ears. A certain aplomb and a distinctive sense of humor very rare in the eternal feminine, coming with a gracious tact of iniative, make up part of a real nature, fitted to hold the admiration of the public. Returning to Madame Scalchi, her playing of the role of Nancy in the act given was filled with as delightful a quality as ever.

No distinctive personality was associated with Madame Scalchi. Mademoiselle Toulinquet sang in good American Italian displaying one of those hard, open voices, not yet worn and partially flexible, but without a ray of emotion or musical imagination. The other members of the company disdained to rise in this variou styles above the morasses of the commonplace.

LESLEY MARTIN.

The Czarina of all the Russias is now considered to be one of the most gorgeously gowned women in all the courts of Europe. Yet it is a well-known fact that when she first made her appearance in St. Petersburg as wife of the Czarewitch she was criticized by the grand ladies of the most magnificent court in the world for the peculiar plainness of her ball, dinner and reception gowns. Alexandra was unpopular with the female portion of the court at best, and never an opportunity of humiliating her was allowed to pass where it could be taken advantage of without the offenders being discovered ben entendu. A story has come from all this. Alexandra was from an impoverished German kingdom where charity, nevertheless, was indulged in to some extent. On one occasion, a few weeks after her marriage, she sent out letters to the grend dames of St. Petersburg informing them that they would confer a special favor upon her if they would contribute some warm clothing towards the maintenance of a number of poor families in which she was interested. For answer Alexandra received as gifts three magnificent dresses, court, ball and carriage costumes. As at that time she was dressing with the most unostentatious simplicity, the insult was unmistakable. Alexandra had the dresses sold and gave the proceeds to the poor. Nothing was said, but a week later she appeared at a diplomatic dinner attired in perfect taste, but with almost barbaric luxury. Ever since that occasion she has maintained the reputation of being the most beautifully dressed consort in Europe.

SANITARY REDUCTION

How the Refuse of San Francisco is Incinerated.

A man named Victor Hugo said once that Paris threw some fifty or sixty million francs into the sea yearly, and he meant by this that the sweepings of the city were in a sense munera pulveris, and we all remember Mr. Bunyan's man with the muck rake, looking for gold in the pile of straw and offal.

A great city is subject to precisely the same laws and does many things in precisely the same way as a human being. We know the human body sloughs off appreciable quantities of dry scarf skin, dandruff and the like continually. A city does the same. This city does.

Far off beyond the railroad tracks, where Eighth street widens out into hideous vacant lots, blotted and spotted with soap factories and tallow chandleries, are what is known as the Sanitary Reduction Works. On your way down to your office in the morning, at almost every other block, you go wide round a dripping grisly cart, with an Italian driver on the seat, and you try not to breathe too hard through your nose until you get well away. Scavenger's carts these are, and they take the place of pores and ducts in the hide of the town. There are some three or four hundred of these carts that go the rounds of the street day after day, gathering offal, ashes, rags, bottles, sacks, dead cats and dogs, debris, cinders, tin cans, every imaginable and unimaginable description of castaway things, and carting them down the length of Eighth street, past the place where the football games are played and on across the railroad tracks and into those vague, hideous regions where the tallest chimney west of the Rocky Mountains grows out of the soil like a gigantic pine.

The reduction works are a private enterprise. There are thirty-seven furnaces burning night and day. Twenty-nine consuming the "heavy" and eight—called "auxiliary"—consuming the "light" garbage. "Heavy" garbage is all organic matter. The "light" is made up largely of tin cans, rags, ashes, etc. Anyone who may so desire can load a wagon with debris and bring it to the works, the works charging 20 cents per cubic yard at the gate for burning the stuff. But by far the greater number of carts are driven by Italians who have regular routes, and who, by the way, make very good money in the business. One is told that many of them are even property holders. "Light" garbage is burnt separately from the heavy, and the wagons dump according to the character of their loads. Once dumped, the stuff is picked over. The Italians—no other nationality, it seems, will do the work—pick over the heaps, by hand, largely, and such stuff as bottles, cans and jugs are treated separately. In such quantities tin is valuable and solder is not so very much below silver in price. Then there is the brass, then there is the copper, then there is the iron, melted and run into "pigs." There is no difficulty in selling such metal at good market figures.

THE SANITARY REDUCTION WORKS

Views of the great establishment on lower Eighth street where the refuse of San Francisco is destroyed.

At first it is hard believe what advantage there is to be gained from a cart full of nasty rotting vegetables, and old fuzzy bones, and melon rinds and mashed fruit that reeks to Heaven. But when the stuff is burned it makes the best fertilizer known to agriculture. So that nothing is really lost or need ever be lost. What comes out of the earth goes into it again and so on to infinity. It is the dust to dust theory over again, only made practical and immensely profitable.

Five hundred tons is the figure of San Francisco's daily refuse and garbage. The sweat, as one might say, of the city in its exertion of one day's toil. Five hundred tons of perspiration. It is Gargantua over again and outdone. Five hundred a day is is 156,000 tons a year, counting 312 working days to the year. For there is never any pause, Sundays are like week days, and the crews work in two gangs, one for the day and the other for the night, so the thirty-six furnaces are always burning. Perhaps one would wonder at this point as to the enormous quantities of coal and fuel used to fire these ceaselessly burning furnaces. The company does not pay one nickel for its coal; its fuel is at hand and inexhaustable; it has a constantly renewed supply of five hundred tons of refuse daily upon which to draw, which is consumed at the rate of 20 cents per ton. Refuse is good fuel, admirable even when once you have noted the tremendous draught that can be created at the base of the enormous chimney. Eight pounds to the square inch is the amount of the pressure, and when a furnace door is opened one can hear the air sucking in through the cracks of the building toward the open mouth of the furnace making a roaring noise like a gale in a vessel's rigging. The electric plant which is connected with the works and that furnishes the light by which the night work is carried on, is also run by the same means.

The force of men all told is between 80 and 100. They are divided up into firemen, feeders and pickers. The firemen are almost all Americans, the poker men and pickers Italians to a man. The poker man's duty consists merely in feeding the refuse into the hoppers of the furnaces, but the pickers are counted upon to sort the heaps. It often falls to the lot of this latter class of help to come across more than one article of value, perhaps of even very great value, a lost watch, perhaps, a bill, a diamond ring. There is absolutely no limit upon the variety of the wagon's contents. The picker-boss is supposed to report all such finds to the management, and a little later, when the works are running more smoothly, a "lost and found" department will be organized. This in time will be quite a feature of the place, and one of the most interesting exhibits imaginable could be made from the city's dumps. When you come to think of it, it is almost inevitable that every small article lost within the confines of the city will sooner or later find its way to the refuse heaps.

Dead cats and dogs as a matter of course take their last ride in the scavenger's cart and are accorded honorable cremation at the hands of the company, but occasionally when the carts are dumped "a live cat" terribly excited fights its way out of the cloud of dust and ashes, while the same load may contain an oil painting not illy done and in a fair state of preservation, as attested by one or two that are shown on the walls of the works and that have been rescued as brands from the burning, as one might say.

The reduction works of San Francisco are the largest in the world (it now represents over $150,000 invested), and covers a greater area than any others that have hitherto been erected. The process is known as the Thackeray patent incinerating and fertilizing system, and was invented by Charles Thackeray of this city. The fact that Mr. L. R. Ellert and his associates had the business foresight to see potential fortunes in a city's refuse is perhaps the most interesting feature of the whole affair.

---

Wherever two or three were gathered together in Germany last week in obvious enjoyment of a joke, says the Saturday Review, it was safe to conclude that they had got serreptitious copy of the suppressed number of Kladderdatsch, with Brandt's cartoon illustrative of the effects of the Emperor's last army speech on the great soldiers of the past. The German Punch represented Alexander, Leonidas and Napoleon in the nether regions having a laugh over a copy of the National Zeitung, containing the wonderful declaration that only a good Christian could be a brave soldier or could fulfill his duties to his king. The devil enjoys the fun as well as his guests, and in the background "der alte Fritz" is hobbling up with a look in his eye that bodes no good to his babbling Imperial successsr if he ever comes within reach of the terrible crutch. Kladderadatsch has been very bold lately, but this was too much, and so for a couple of days the police were out in swarms, seizing all visible copies of the offending sheet in cafes and reading-rooms. Bismarck in his fighting days often seized whole editions of newspapers, but then he was respected and feared by nine-tenths of the nation. What is the use of seizing comic papers when nine-tenths of the nation is laughing at you already?

---

M. Brunetiere's recent interview with the Pope, according to the Paris Figaro lasted about three quarters of an hour. It is said that while His Holiness received the French critic cordially, there was a certain reserve manifested, on account of M. Brunetiere's impressions—rather too vivid in the Pope's estimation—of the democratic tendencies of the Catholic Church in America. He is said to have listened to the Frenchman much more than he spoke, and left the audience with the impression that M. Brunetiere would profit spiritually from it and put it to the best use.

TOD SLOAN IN ENGLAND

Remarkable Success of the Great American Light-weight Jockey.

Perhaps the most striking feature of international sport during the now closing year has been the sensational achievements of the American jockey, Tod Sloan, just at the latter part of the racing season in England. Previously a jockey or two from this side had put in an appearance on English courses, with the result that anything but a favorable impression had been created of American syle and ability in handling horses in a race. When, therefore, Sloan arrived on the scene nothing very different was expected, and early opinions on his horsemanship, derived from seeing him in an exercise gallop or two at Newmarket, were not at all flattering. This might naturally have been looked for, Sloan's seat and manner of handling a horse being so entirely different to the long-settled methods practiced in the old country, and which are conformed to by all skillful horsemen, there at all events. That the reports regarding Sloan, which became public on his first arrival, were sometimes rather lacking in accuracy may be inferred from the fact that my files of a leading sporting journal show a protest was entered at his being described in some of the papers as "a black." It is a popular belief there that all American jockeys are "blacks," only the well-informed being aware that nowadays a colored rider is the exception on the American turf. The existence of old pictures chiefly contributes to this idea, confirmed by the fact that Sims, who preceded Sloan, was a colored boy. The career of Sloan is probably better known to most readers than to myself, but I may mention that, although not a Californian, he first made his mark in this State, where he is as well known and liked as in any part of the United States. Until he began to land winners at the old Bay District Track some three years ago he had scarcely been heard of. That Sloan personally should have met with appreciation in England is not in the least surprising to those who are acquainted with life there. The people are always ready to recognize talent, no matter to what nationality it belongs, especially when set off by correctness of deportment and a tone of behavior that implies self-respect. All those who have any acquaintance with the subject of my sketch are fully aware that for his walk in life he is a shining light in these respects. Making every allowance for the tales of Sloan's position in the English sporting world being much exaggerated, there is not the least doubt that he has been a most creditable representative of his country, not only as a jockey, but also as a private individual.

TOD SLOAN
Elite, photo

But the point to get at now is how and why Sloan proved so successful in winning races in which he rode. In order to satisfy myself with sufficient conclusiveness as to this it would be necessary to have a detailed account of each race to refer to, but I am sorry to say this data is not at present within my reach. In its absence I am inclined to believe that in a great measure his superior work may be attributed to the exercise of certain faculties which he enjoys by natural endowment and has developed so as to be of service to him in his chosen profession. The most striking characteristics of Sloan's performances in the saddle have always appeared to me to be his light hands and exceptional alertness at the post, enabling him to produce the right impression on his mount, whereby in very many instances he has his horse well set and comfortably in his stride before other jockeys around him have got fairly going. This promptitude of thought and action on his part may further be observed during the course of a race, and when combined with a knowledge of pace, which he undoubtedly possesses in a marked degree, it is not difficult to understand that a rider so equipped is in a position to give points to most of his competitors—really clever jockeys being the exception. And here, I take leave to say, is where I think lies the strong point of the American when compared with the Britisher, speaking generally, not only in jockeyship, but in every field in which the two contend. Any advantage to be gained by quickness of thought and action will as a rule rest with the American.

Everyone who has had any experience of racing in England knows that it is by no means usual for races to be run at top speed from end to end, as they are for the most part in this country, and the result is that many a horse subjected to waiting orders passes the post in the ruck, when, if his jockey had been allowed to go to the front while he could, the result would probably have been entirely different. When Sloan began to ride in England it was for American stables only, the owners of which in all probability adopted the system of making the running from the beginning, instead of reserving their horses for strong finishes, of which they may or may not prove capable, as is too frequently the English practice. In this respect also, if my assumption be correct, Sloan's experience stood him in good stead. Even his greatest supporters do not maintain that his style of riding conduces to the best results in a bruising finish on an animal that is nearly all out and dropping to pieces, for then only a man who can sit right down, use his legs, and lift his horse stride by stride can produce the required effect. I do not say that Sloan is altogether incapable of achieving this, because on a few occasions I have seen him do it wonderfully well, considering the peculiar manner in which he squats on a horse's shoulders; but more often than not, when his horse has ceased running free, he is completely at a loss. In finishing (the most essential part of the art of jockeyship), he is deficient. I should not be at all surprised, however, if when we see him in the saddle here again, he shows us that he has picked up a wrinkle or two under this head, although he is represented as saying he has found he had nothing to learn from English jockeys. Still no one, clever or experienced as he may be, is ever fully educated in horse matters, and I have too high an opinion of Tod's ability and common sense to believe he is of the contrary opinion.

Being able to recall the feats of many first-class men in the pigskin, amongst them Fordham, Custance, Grimshaw, John Osborne, Wells, Tom French (the most finished horseman I ever saw), Fred Archer and Tom Cannon—all leaders of old and but few now living—Charles Wood, Mornington Cannon, Watts, and Tom Loates, of modern days on the English turf, I do not deem myself unqualified to form a judgment on how best to ride a determined finish. The most remarkable piece of work in this respect that I can call to mind was when Formosa won the St. Leger at Doncaster (it is too long ago to mention the year). I then saw Fordham lift the mare in her last stride on the post a distance apparently equivalent to at least two of her strides just previously. Could this be done by a rider sitting, as Sloan was described by a competent judge in England, on a horse's neck, whispering into his left ear and dragging the animal along after him? If not, Paul Jones would have got the verdict that day. I remember the occasion the more vividly because the cleverest horse-watcher at Newmarket had named the first three horses to me on the morning of the race.

I do not think it will be hazarding much to guess that Tod Sloan's head-piece has been the prime factor in his success. Even assuming that he was well served in the matter of mounts, he has shown astounding cleverness in riding to victory on courses with which he had no acquaintance and entirely different to anything he was accustomed to. In fact, it is amusing to think that he turned this very circumstance to account when he won a two-year-old handicap at Northampton. The course takes a bend for the last 400 yards, and Tod, who was on the rails to the left, instead of keeping the usual route round the curve, took a bee line, and caught the judge's eye first past the post about the middle of the track, forcing those who were close on his right to pull round inside and do the best they could. These tactics are not admissible in England, and an objection was raised, but overruled. The opinion was generally expressed that had an English jockey adopted the same manoeuvre he would have been disqualified.

To sum up, I think that Sloan's performances in England should have an invaluable teaching for those concerned with racing there, and set them thinking whether the average English jockey does not need sharpening up a bit. That the brain-power of the best English jockeys is not superior to, if the equal of the American, as represented by Tod Sloan, seems hardly to admit of question. Of course, in many instances it has been a case of a man riding against boys, and a man who has been riding races pretty nearly the whole year through for some time past, which has given him great experience. But if horsemanship, as exemplified in seat and style, has to be determined, I cannot subscribe to the belief that Sloan has made a discovery in race-riding beyond the ken of the generations of fine horsemen that the British turf has produced. Let us hope, however, that he will still further emulate the deeds of Chifney and Custance, and one day get astride his Pegasus in the fields of authorship. His turf and social experiences on two continents should be entertaining reading for his many admirers. Greater wonders the celebrated American lightweight has already accomplished, for, as an English journal (I think it was the Daily Telegraph) cleverly put it, who would have thought when Dickens published his American Notes that a Yankee jockey would ride Little Dorritt in the colors of the future King of England?

BENEDICT.

---

An extraordinary example of the efficacy of the thumb impression method of identification has happened in Bengal. Some months ago the manager of a tea garden in the Dooars was brutally murdered, the murderer getting clean away, as the crime was not discovered until some time after its commission. For some time the police were at fault, until it was discovered that the murderer, in rummaging among some papers of the deceased, had smudged a Bengali atlas with his thumb. The atlas was forwarded to the Bureau, where the thumb impressions of criminals are kept, when it was discovered that the impression on the atlas corresponded with the thumb recorded of a noted criminal then at large. The man was arrested on this evidence, and other evidence subsequently accumulated to connect him with the crime.

---

The wheat king of the world resides in Argentina. He is an Italian emigrant, named Guazone, and his broad acres are situated in the south of the province of Beunos Ayres. His crop occupies an area of 66,270 acres. He numbers his workmen by the thousand, and each one receives a certain share of the profits. When his season's crop is harvested he fills over 3,000 railway trucks with the grain.

---

The ladies' dinner of the New York Vagabond Club was bewildering in its anomalies. It was a Christmas dinner, but the chairman was not a Christian, but a Hebrew rejoicing in the memories of the Ghetto. Mr. Zangwill made a brilliant speech, with some slashing passages on the Little Englander line.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

You know, Diary dear, what an advocate I have always been on the question of large families. How I have raved about the pleasures of a vast household of young people. Have I not often dilated upon the diversions they might have among themselves? But, alas, Diary dear, like too many of my theories, when put into practice the large family is a snare—a delusion—a fatal error, in fact, a willful tempting of a too beneficent Providence. These sentiments sound treasonable at Christmastide, when the large family is proverbially at its best. The truth is, however, that they are merely seasonable. Papa is, as you know, the head of his family, at least is point of wealth, which is our way of measuring things nowadays. So at holiday times all the relations assemble under one rooftree. Phew! Then the fun begins. The men are right enough; they go down town and keep out of mischief—or if they do otherwise, we are none the wiser. But the women! Aunt Hilda is the worst. A gentle, patient sort of a creature who seems to be apologizing all the time for existing. But the shots she fires at dear mamma. The comments she makes on the housekeeping, the reckless extravagance of the servants! I positively believe she examines the hooks in the closets to see if they are kept bright aud shining. There is also Aunt Elizabeth who appears to think mamma has usurped her place in papa's affections. The wallows over that man and condoles with him about everything. Then the cousins! I have had to conceal all my pretty frocks, they are so keen on trying them on, and, as for my jewelry, the moment I heard of their arrival I hurried with it to a safe deposit.

Why do one's aunts and uncles ever marry? Or if they must, what do they mean by inflicting their undesirable offspring on their unsuspecting relatives. For my own part I think the tie of relationship should begin and end in the family. No aunts, uncles nor cousins for me. One father and mother, a couple of brothers, and perhaps (but I shall not insist on this) a sister. Some girls seem to like their sisters. But Leila! She is enough to put one out of conceit with the whole genus. I labored under the delusion that I was moderately pretty until Aunt Sophia arrived with her trio of graces. Since then my sun has set.

"I suppose, dear, that with her pretty gowns you make Cricket look passable at parties. Dress is a wonderful beautifier," I heard her say to Mamma the other day when she imagined I was not listening. And that patronizing air of her's!

And her own gawky girls, whom she insists are aristocratic and distinguished looking! Well, I shall lose my temper if I contine; only really, Diary, dear, I told Mamma that I should be civil to them in the house, but if she wished to keep me a member of her household she would not ask me to be seen in the street with them!

What have I been doing? Nothing hardly—in comparison with other weeks. Shopping chiefly, with occasional dances, theatre-parties and luncheons thrown in. On Friday I went to the Fortnightly Dancing Class. It was exceedingly well attended, and I don't think I ever saw the girls looking prettier. I like the simple way they dress, too. The organdie frocks are so girlish and sweet-looking. Who were the prettiest? Well, there are several of the girls I admire. Annie Voorhies looked really bewitching; she carries herself well, too, and is a great favorite. Fannie Baldwin is always attractive. Margaret Salisbury is not only pretty, but is well poised and delightfully independent. Max McNutt led the german and did not especially distinguish himself. The figures were at fault, or something, but in some of them we were most amusingly tangled up. Allen Wright should always manage them, I think—he is especially adapted for organizing things and engineers them very successfully. On Saturday afternoon I assisted to receive at Bernice Landers' tea. It was quite the best arranged event of the season. The Occidental Hotel parlors were as if the Christmas fairy had touched them with her magic wand. The decorations of holly and berries were exquisitively arranged. The floor was canvassed and the rooms lighted with myriads of tiny red lanterns, which were strung from one side to the other. Mrs. and Miss Landers were assisted in receiving by Mrs. Fred Tallant and Mrs. Stone. Bernice looked very well in white silk. She carried a big bouquet of American Beauty roses. The street in front of the hotel was literally lined with carriages, which to my mind establishes the importance of a function. Of course everyone was there. I noted the Stubbs girls, the Morgans, Davidsons, Clara Hamilton, etc. Then Oakland was also well represented.

On Saturday evening I went to Muriel Atherton's theatre party at the Columbia. There were thirty of us invited and we had a capital time. As a hostess, Muriel is a decided success, and acts more like a belle with several seasons' experience than an unsophisticated debutante. The "tea" crowd was there in force. Oh, and there was such a pretty girl, Miss Camp, (a niece of Walter Camp, the eminent Harvard football coach). She is bright and intelligent, too, and has pleasing manners. Of course, she is an Eastern girl, and I must admit, dear Diary, when it is a question of manners we Californians may learn much from our Atlantic sisters. The social faux pas some of us girls make, in a more critical community would be fatal. I notice this especially at dances. You know since programmes have been consigned to the masses it is no longer the "correct"thing to engage more than one or two dances ahead. In New York the girls never do it. But here—I have simply been convulsed with merriment to see the men scrambling for their dances and treating a girl as if she were a football. It is not respectful, for the appearance of the thing alone. I cannot fancy how the girls enjoy having men literally tear them from the grasp of their fellows. But to return to Muriel's theatre party. After the play we were taken in carriages to the 'Varsity Club, where supper was served. The table looked very swell, indeed, such gorgeous roses and violets, and every one was in excellent form. On Sunday I went driving with my relations in the morning after church, and then returned home to attend my "Levee." I had stacks of callers as uaual. You know Mr. McCaleb—well, he comes regularly every Sunday, and amuses me very much. It is not so much what he says, but his delightfully superior air. Some of the girls say he patronizes, but I'm sure he does not intend to—it's only his way, you know. Anyway, I think he dresses admirably, and I do think a man ought to take some thought of his clothes. I always notice how he is arranged and talk to Arthur about

MISS JANE WHITBECK
of the "Gay Coney Island" Company at the Columbia next week

it. Another thoroughly pleasant characteristic about Mr. McCaleb is his fondness for practical jokes, and the girls have consequently to consider his invitations before accepting. You know he invited several of us to a theatre party and said the carriage would call at 7:45. Well, we all dressed, but neither carriage nor Mr. McCaleb arrived. A few days later he rang us up and asked us how we had enjoyed his little joke! In my opinion he has an unusual sense of humor and I try to appreciate it. Another of our men has departed. Mr. Williams has gone to South Africa and several of us are weeping our eyes out. He played checkers remarkably well and used to spend whole evenings doing little else. I heard a rather amusing experience of one of the girls. She was passing a house on California street, where resided a certain fair one in whom he had developed an interest. The blind was up and there was a light in the drawing room. She said to the crowd who accompanied her:

"I shall run up and tap on the window."

She ran up but did not tap. At a table sat a man and a maid gazing with the utmost seriousness at a checkerboard. She rejoined her friends; they went to the theatre and to supper and returned. The light was still in the window, and the Eve-like young person's curiosity caused her once more to ascend the steps. The same man and maid in exactly the position she left them four hours before! Can devotion further go? And now he is on his way to South Africa, and checkers delight her no more.

I hear, Diary dear, of at least four engagements to be announced after Lent. Some of the prettiest of the belles of two seasons ago are to take unto themselves partners, so that means several weddings in the spring. In two or three instances the men have been attentive for a protracted period; in others the attachment is of more recent date. The Martin boys are back; Andrew has quite recovered from his illness and Walter is as chippier as ever. I was so much afraid we would have to have our play without him—the one in aid of the Children's Hospital. The rehearsals take up so time, but the result will fully justify its expenditure, I fancy. There are to be a series of scenes from American history—from the time of the Pilgrim Fathers up to our own day. Mrs. Grant, Mrs. W. P. Shaw, Mrs. H. P. Miller, Mrs. Bothin, Mrs. Dickinson, Mrs. Fonda, Mrs. Harrington and Miss Hoffman are in charge of the scenes. I think our one under Miss Hoffman will be quite the prettiest of all. It is to represent the ball of peace which Washington gave after the war. We are to dance the minuet in costume, and have already managed to overcome all the difficulties of curtsies and steps. The girls who will take part are Mrs. Whittier, Gertie Carroll, Therese Morgan, May and Eva Moody, Bernie Drown, May Hoffman and Mrs. Bain. The men are Larry Van Winkle, Mr. Duperu, Mr. Greenwood, Clarence Follis, Ray Sherman, Percy King, Ben Holladay and Mr. Veeder. We are to have our next rehearsal at the California Theatre. Ella Goodall and Marguerite Jolliffe are in Mrs. Bothin and Mrs. Oxnard's scene—which represents the Civil War. Marguerite is a nun and Ella a flower girl. Mrs. Merrill has the Fresh Air Excursions, with myriads of children—the little Merrils, Deanes and my little cousins all take part. The dresses are to be simply gorgeous.

On Monday I went to Fannie Baldwin's luncheon at the 'Varsity Club. It was eminently enjoyable and not at all stiff. A number of last year's buds and a sprinkling of this were present. In the evening we went to Marie Messer's party. It was too charming for words. Bessie Ames, Ethel Patton, and I agreed we had the time of our lives there. The tableaux were well arranged. Muriel Atherton made a stunning picture. She fascinates me, that girl does, and is so picturesque. Addie Dibble, too, looked awfully well. She is tall and slim and made a very effective tableau. But Marie was the belle of the occasion. We had a blissful time the entire evening, and I wish Marie's debut were still to be anticipated. The pictures were wonderfully well thought out, and Mrs. Messer deserves many congratulations upon the success of the affair. Marie is the sweetest sort of girl, and when she dances one really realizes what is meant by the "poetry of motion."

On Tuesday evening I went to rehearsal as usual. On Wednesday, rested all day, to be fresh for the Cinderella in the evening. I wore a lovely gown there, and Mamma says I never looked better. It was the truly smart dance of the season—all the Menlo Park people were in full force—the Macondrays, Athertons, Eyres, Rathbones, Josselyns, etc. There were but few of the debutantes. Muriel Atherton was there, of course, and the Hopkinses. The Moore girls looked exceedingly well. But I never have seen in my short debutantish experience so many of the young matrons. Mrs. George Howard looked fetching as ever. The gowning, too, was in excellent taste. Edith McBean looked very well. I never knew a girl to improve in appearance as she has. You know, when she came out no one thought her pretty. Now she is really handsome I think Gertie Carroll's gown was one of the prettiest at the Cinderellas—it was pink satin covered with baby rosebuds and trimmed with bright green ribbon. She looked very pretty.

The Assembly on Friday evening is to be an awfully swell affair. All of us girls have the most charming of fancy frocks. Mr. Greenway is going to introduce all sorts of quaint new figures. I am going as a Cricket, Ethel Keeney is to be Carmen, Marie Wells a girl of the First Empire, Therese Morgan is to wear a Louis Quatorze costume, Gertie Carroll a French shepherdess—but I shall tell you all the rest next week.

On Saturday the Hoopers are to give their usual Christmas party at the Occidental Hotel. Mrs. Hooper is to be assisted by Mrs. Jouett in receiving. That is all this week, Diary dear, and I fear my confidences are rather lacking in interest. Next week, too, promises to be dull.

Your own MISS CRICKET.

P. S.—I fear I am becoming more essentially feminine each week, Diary dear, for I generally have to add my most important items in a postscript. There are two events of paramount interest next week which I entirely omitted to mention. They are balls, too, think of that? The first is a cotillion to be given on the evening of the 29th by Miss Herrin. It is to be a tremendously swell affair—the favors all lovely little trifles from Shreve's. There are only sixty invitations, so Arthur and I deem ourselves rarely lucky to have received a bid. Then we are all going to a house party at Aunt Caroline's in Burlingame for New Year's. There are to be the races and then the ball. It is to be the gathering of all the strictly fashionable element, and not to be there means that you are really not "in it." I am to have a most bewitching toilet for that occasion. And now again adieu.

Your sportive CRICKET.

* *

An event of considerable interest is the engagement of John S. Maxwell, of the First National Bank of San Francisco, and Miss Freda Cox of Sacramento. Miss Cox is a daughter of the Hon. Fred Cox, of the California State Bank of Sacramento, and one of the very wealthy citizens of the State. She is an interesting girl and a general favorite. Mr. Maxwell is a promising young business man. The date of the wedding has not yet been fixed but will probably take place in the latter part of January.

An engagement of much interest is that of Miss Rebecca Jennings (generally known as Sister Jennys) and Colonel Jefferson Doolittle. Miss Jernings is a charming girl and a general favorite. She is petite and blonde. Miss Jennings is a daughter of the late James H. Jennings. Colonel Doolittle is a very prominent mining man, and a director of the State Mining Bureau. The marriage is to be celebrated early in February.

Mrs. Joseph Moody entertained the various chapters of the Daughters of the Revolution, Colonial Dames and Descendants of Colonial Governors on Saturday afternoon. It was the anniversary of Washington's Farewell to his Generals at Francis' Tavern, then the Delomicos of New York City. The house was decorated with palms and ferns, and the portrait of Thomas Jefferson by Rembrandt, painted in 1779, was wreathed in autumn leaves. Mrs. Moody was assisted in receiving by her daughters, Misses Eda, Mae and Eva Moody, and Mrs. Bancroft, Mrs. Cretien, Mrs. T. Hopkins, Mrs. Elwood Brown and Miss Alberta Bancroft. An interesting program was given, after which refreshments were served.

An Idea tor a Holidav Gift.

Pretty shades in note papers, with monogram in delicate water-colors, make one of the most desirable gifts imaginable. Messrs. Cooper & Co., the art stationers, excel in this respect, and reliance can be placed in all orders of this character.

The music of Huber's Del Monte Orchestra adds greatly to the success of all entertainments. Telephone, care of Benjamin Curtaz, Main 1247.

For Irritation of the Throat caused by cold or use of the voice, "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are exceedingly beneficial.

Holiday neckwear and hosiery at J. W. Carmany's, 25 Kearny street. Shirts to order.

THE THEATRES

Passing Comment on Contemporary Performances.

The Frawleys have made peculiarly their own plays of the morning-room, of the drawing-room and of the library, to say nothing of the conservatory and the garden. They seem to be more at home in the doings of the elect than in anything else, all of which betokens, not limited possibilities, but rather a gravitation to one particular standard, which should not be the exclusive aim of our local organization. This week they are fairly reveling at the California in "The Railroad of Love." Frank Worthing and Blanche Bates as Lieutenant Everett and Cousin Val give their lines easily and naturally, their work in the third act being especially good. Miss Bates wears some rather pretty gowns. Harry Corson Clarke gets all the humor possible out of his part, and Elenor Robson as Vina is amiable and attractive. Another pleasing figure is Effie Bond as the maid.

* *

The Tivoli is coming to the front rather gaily this week with "Mother Goose" and her varied adventures, and those of her different children. The main interest in the piece is the stage-setting and the dancing. Both are above the Tivoli average. The transformation scene at the end is fine enough to keep the audience seated until the fall of the curtain, which is sufficient recommendation. Edith Hall is Jill, in a short skirt and a big hat, and finds time between looking bright and pretty to turn a few cartwheels and to bring in a ditty about a piece of string. Mr. Stevens makes "Mother Goose" a bit livelier than the illustrious original, but for stage purposes and spectacular ones at that, the impersonation is likely enough an improvement.

* *

"The War of Wealth" at Morosco's gives attention rather to people and affairs of finance than to anybody or anything else. Incidentals are brought in now and then, such as an attempted murder, an explosion, and the breaking of a balcony from which the heaoine falls fifteen feet, but money is the real motive and stimulus of the piece. The scenery is well up to the Morosco standard, and is quite effective. The run on the bank is a good bit of realism. The acting is satisfactory, W. H. Pascoe and Maud Edna Hall acquitting themselves creditably, but the honors belong to Fred Butler, who gives a really clever sketch as the old Colonel.

* *

The Alcazar is making another bid for public favor in "The Girl I Left Behind Me," and manages to receive it, although the acting for a good portion is hardly holding the glass to nature. Wright Huntington, Frank Fanning and Venie Castro are about the most satisfactory in the entire cast, Miss Castro in particular as Fawn Afraid giving a dainty, artistic performance. The scenery is ambitious and well managed, and herein Mr. Paulding, who plays Scar Brow, shows excellent judgment. Miss Foster, as Kate, wears some fetching gowns, and Miss Kingsley, as Wilbur's Ann, is pretty and pleasing. H. S. K.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

Attractive Display for New Years.

The bewildering array of calendars this year presents numerous inducements to purchasers. All the leading publishers are represented by Cooper & Co., of 726 Market street, and many new and novel designs can be seen there exclusively.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist. 806 Market Street

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Rubber heels: Easy walking, no fatigue. At Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

HE MAKES HIS BOW

A SUDDEN CHANGE

DISAPPEARANCE OF A CANE

SERVAIS LE ROY AT THE ORPHEUM
Marceau, photo

Mons. Le Roy Explains

AN INTERVIEW BY JUSTIN STURGIS.

I talked to Servais Le Roy in his tiniest of dressing-rooms with the Xmas ballet thumping and shuffling mysteriously just overhead, and the orchestra braying out a waltz step a hundred miles away. Mr. Le Roy is the sleight-of-hand man now at the Orpheum, and, though it sounds irrelevant just here, he has a wife who is one of the prettiest little women I have ever seen. A manager of the the theatre loomed in the back ground—if there could be said to exist such a thing in so small a box—and lent an official atmosphere to the affair.

Interviewing is either a new business with the conjurer or else he is immensely clever at it. He began by opening a bottle of Moet and Chandon, and I began by asking him about the most effective tricks.

"The tendency is," he said "to less and less machinery, less and less pharaphanalia."

There can be "tendencies" then in conjuring as well as in—literature, let us say.

"Herrmann," said Le Roy, "was, of course, a great entertainer, a better entertainer than conjurer, especially in his last years. But he used the "trap-door" and "trick tables" and that sort of thing. It's all gone out of date now."

"And what takes its place."

"The man who has no more machinery about him than just the clothes he has on."

"Then the 'tendency' must cease to 'tend' after a certain fixed point."

"Naturally."

Still one has one's doubts. If you have seen Le Roy's turn you will remember that one of his tricks is the removal of his trousers. But it is accomplished in the sense of de bas en haut, and the amneities are preserved.

"No," says he, "the best conjurer is the man who can be most independent of his properties, who can do his little tricks in the very heart of the audience and fool them. Almost any one—if he has big enough and complicated enough machinery—can conjure well enough. But it is not cleverness. The machine does it all. The man goes for nothing."

A little later when we were talking of palming things, Le Roy gave me an illustration of what he meant. He took up a pack of cards (they were not trick cards either) and holding them in one hand stroked them with the other and made whatever card he wished come to the surface. I could have touched his hands from where I sat, but as for explanations I might as well have been miles away.

Le Roy was a little bitter in the matter of the article and illustrations on palming that was contributed to one of the local Sunday papers by the younger Herrmann recently. At first I thought of "professional jealousy," but it was not that.

"Palming with the thumb down, is clumsy palming at best," said Le Roy. "It's old style and don't deceive at all. Herrmann palms that way, as the illustrations showed. But tenez——"

He picked the cards up again and palmed one after another with the thumb raised and the fingers extended, till the cards seemed to dissolve and melt into each other on the face of the deck.

Then Mme. Le Roy said:

"It was very unprofessional to describe the manner of doing tricks. Of course, it can't hurt conjurers of assured position, but it would hurt plenty of struggling young beginners—some that have families to support, too."

"I don't see," hazarded the interviewer, "why it could not affect the big men as well."

"It don't, though," said Le Roy. "Once when we performed in London, a fellow did a burlesque conjuring act the same night. He came before us on the programme, too. Even he did some of my tricks, and exposed them—"

"But," broke in his wife, "we have seldom played to a more enthusiastic audience than we had that same night."

Le Roy has performed almost everywhere. In Tangiers, where he gave an exhibition in a local theatre before the consuls and foreign colonists, the gallery was crowded with Arabs, some who had their camels waiting for them in the street outside. The Arabs, he says sat stolid in their places until he was done with the trick where he "disappears" Madame Le Roy. Then one big Arab jumped up with a whoop, and made for the door. In three minutes the gallery was stampeded clean. Not an Arab was left. Le Roy has no great admiration for the magicians, fakirs and conjurers of the half-civilized countries. He said as much, and it occurred to me to ask him what explanation he had of the well known trick of the Mango Tree as achieved by the Indian fakirs—a trick that justified the Psychical Research Society in the dispatching of an investigation committee. This committee brought back an elaborate, ingenious and most far-fetched explanation of the trick. Le Roy laughs at it.

"The thing is simple enough. I've seen it done a dozen times."

"And how does the fakir do it."

"Simply buries a tree in that spot beforehand, and pulls it up through the sand little by little each time he raises the cloth."

It is curious that no one has ever thought of this explanation before.

MME. LE ROY IN SPANISH COSTUME
Marceau, photo

DRAMATIC NOTES

For next week the Orpheum announces four new numbers. Of these the great novelty will be Mlle. Rowbello, sand paintress, from Drury Lane, London, who is said to excell all others in her particular line. Another feature is De Marce Felix's trained ponies and educated Baboon, who give a very funny imitation circus. The Elinore Sisters, character change artists, come from Tony Pastor's where they have been successful. Musical Dale in his specialties completes the number of new people. Others on the bill are the Three Avolos, Caroline Hull, Ophelita and the grand ballet, "The Birth of the Pearl."

At Morosco's next week "Uncle Tom's Cabin," will be revived with all its old-time glory of bloodhounds, breaking ice and escaping slaves. Will H. Bray has been engaged to play Uncle Tom and sweet little Baby Ruth will impersonate Eva. There will be a clever trick donkey for Lawyer Marks, colored jubilee singers, negro specialties and all the other requites of the popular play.

The Baldwin reopens Monday evening for the winter season with Stuart Robson in "The Jucklins." The piece, which is a sort of dramitization by Augustus Thomas of Opie Reed's novel of the same name, is said to furnish Mr. Robson with opportunities for good work. The scene is in North Carolina. Mr. Robson will be supported by Thomas A. Wise, Edwin Holt, Lida McMillan, Edna Brothers and Mrs. Robson.

Matthews and Bulger, the comediaus and song-writers, open at the Columbia Monday evening in their new comedy, "At Gay Coney Island. The piece is said to be all the title suggests, a lively arrangement of songs, comedy and specialties. The company numbers among others Jose De Witt, the violinist, and Jane Whitbeck, the original "Pas-Ma-La" girl.

The programme of the second Symphony Concert, which comes off at the Tivoli next Thursday afternoon, December 30th, will include Schumann's Symphonie in D minor, No. 4, Delibes' Suite, "Sylvia," Varspiel from "Lohengrin," and Overture to "William Tell."

The Frawley Company commences its second week at the California Monday evening, presenting another Daly piece, "An International Match." As the play has not been seen here for some years it will be somewhat in the nature of a novelty. Frank Worthing will play Cline and Blanche Bates, Doris.

Miss Villa Whitney White, the soprano who will shortly give two recitals at the California, has a number of German classic and folk songs which she is said to sing with charming effect.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

The Royal is the highest grade baking powder known. Actual tests show it goes one-third further than any other brand.

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

CHESTERFIELD '98

Advice to a Nephew About to Go to San Jose.

My Dear Nephew—I send you out to my aunts, and pray my counsels be your guide to you[illegible] honored and respected among [illegible] by your contemporaries, and held up as a model of virtue by admiring posterity.

First of all—Never do unto others the good [illegible] expect to your own advantage, were they to do it unto you.

When [illegible] an assault upon your neighbors purse or valuables, be careful that no policeman be in sight. (If he lives in San Francisco there will be no necessity for the above advice, as the policeman is always elsewhere.)

Never swear falsely if there be danger of the perjury being discovered, or unless it be well, very well, paid for.

Never risk your own money in uncertain speculations; rather risk somebody else's by becoming the agent of some anonymous society [illegible] by having a seat in the stock exchange.

If you should be the administrator of some one's estate, the evil-minded and envious will say that you became rich at your ward's expense—therefore do not allow them to calumniate you.

The ways by which Providence leads men to fortune are numberless; but the easiest way is the one that leads your hands to your neighbor's pockets.

Truth offends; be therefore careful of the feelings of others and you will always be popular.

Never forget a note—for when it falls due the irregularity is likely to be discovered, unless before its maturity you leave for a tour in Enoville (Canada).

When you bestow ten cents in charity, be sure you compensate yourself a hundred-fold in the next business contract you engage in; because it is written he who giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord, at the rate of 100 per cent, ten cents, therefore, becomes ten dollars.

Should your neighbor smite you on one cheek, and you think you may have need of him some day, turn to him the other as the gospel advises. But, on the contrary, if you think he will never be of any use to you, give him a ponderous coup de pied where it comes easiest.

Never forget that bread baked in the devil's oven is always most savory.

Do not live by the sweat of your brow—recollect that a neglected perspiration may result in a cold. This may conduct you to your grave, which you must visit the last.

L. D. VENTURA.

The Trickster.

With trembling lips and tear wet cheeks
A gentle child for shelter seeks.
A pleasing, sad-eyed, little chit he;
"Pray, master," cries he, "in thy breast
Let a poor, harmless infant rest."
"Thy name?" I ask. He answers, "Pity."

"Sweet Pity, welcome guest thou art!"
I cry and open wide my breast.
When lo! my wets thy better shelter
I look, and, freed from Pity's guise,
I see a boy with laughing eyes
'Tis Love himself I've given shelter.

Life, Parts Love in Life

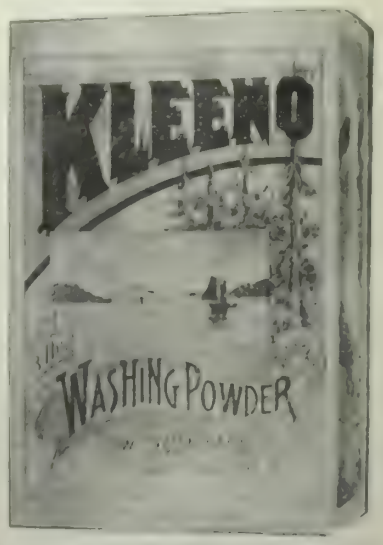
GERMEA

The Ideal Breakfast Dish

Saves Time, Money, and Temper!



MADE IN CALIFORNIA!

SEND FOR SAMPLE

Office, 307 Sacramento St., San Francisco

REVIEWS IN BRIEF

Crisp Comment on New Books, Christmas and Otherwise.

There are some twenty or twenty-five books on the reviewer's table this week, every one of them new and still crisp from the press. They are the usual crop of Christmas fiction that comes with the holly and the mistletoe, growing on the Xmas tree, as it were. Many of them are bad, a few are good, and the rank and file even worse than bad, i. e., passable, with no good errors and no bad graces—the books that do not fail because they do not attempt. One wonders why they were ever written. One marvels how an author could write a book or novel of any kind without enthusiasm — how he could fail to warm to his work. There is pleasure in a fine failure. Mr. Nansen did not reach the Pole, nor did John Jones, who remained at home. The difference is that Nansen made the attempt.

The first book on the pile is Sixty and Six—edited by Will M. Clemens and published by The New Amsterdam Book Company of New York. The idea of Sixty and Six is very good, but the book itself is disappointing. It is a collection of sixty-six very short paragraphs—Mr. Clemens calls them "chips"—most of them tell a story, so-called. The only drawback about the stories is that they are not good. They are not interesting, and they fail to make a point. Stories told in such short space as this must be pungent and forcible, or they have no excuse for existing, and in all the sixty-six thus edited by Mr. Clemens I can find not one that might not as well have been left untold. The book is neither good nor bad—its simply fails, and fails flatly, dully, of its own inertia.

I am not sure that Mr. W. F. Anstey has not created a new type in the person of Babtoo Hurry Bungsho, the native Indian law-student residing in London. Mr. Anstey makes this amusing person tell of himself and his own adventures. His name gives the title to the book and the Appleton Publishing Company give the book to the public. It's merely London life seen through the spectacles of the Anglicized Indian. The best part of the humor is the curious mixture (Latin quotations, misquotations, mixed quotations, obsolete words, up-to-date slang, extraordinary compounds and misplaced words) which make up the speech of the Baboo, and which is very natural and plausible. As for instance, where he speaks of the "hardihood" of his bicycle seat, and his undergoing "total abstinence" from his umbrella in the "vestibulum" of the Royal Academy, or his exclamation at the birthplace of Shakespeare, "It was here that the Swan of Avon was hatched!" Mr. Anstey's book is a fair specimen of English humor, which finds amusement in ludicrousness rather than in wit and which delights less in a pun than in the fall of a stout gentleman on a slippery pavement.

Never was there more lovable man surely than Eugene Field, and never surely has he written anything more lovable than Lullaby Land (Charles Scribner & Sons, New York, and John Lane, London). Lullaby Land is a collection of charming little song-poems, to be crooned, for the most part, at the cradle-side and the bed-side. Not all are lullabies. The best one of the book, to our grown-up notion, is "The Duel" between the gingham dog and the calico cat; but as the poems were written for little tots—or as Mr. Field would say—tads, one has no right to express an opinion. That the little tads will be delighted with the cradle songs is a foregone conclusion. We venture to predict that the book will gain a wide popularity and a large circulation among those who are still in their years of indiscretion.

But not all the children are young. There are some men who follow a circle and after a certain lapse of time return to the ways and walks of the children. Doc Sifers was no doubt of this stripe—Doc Sifers, whose Rubaiyat by James Whitcomb Riley, is published by The Century Company. "Doc" is the country physician par excellence. No other village doctor can be created or imagined by fiction writers that will not now be referred to Mr. Riley's poem. Also it is true that in a way all stories and character studies of the country doctor seem now to have been leading up the odd, gentle, impractical, kindly old fellow, who drives his two-wheeled chaise through the pages of Mr. Riley's last poem. The dialect-painting of the Doctor is a fitting companion to the much-loved Parson of Goldsmith's Deserted Village. It is as though we all knew "Doc" Sifers; he is to be found in almost every village in the land. His goodness of heart and devotion to duty have long been a favorite theme of the story-teller; and now that a popular verse-maker has let his memory and imagination play about the homely character, it has become more winsome, as well as more lasting, than it was before.

The Appleton Company have just published a book by James Barnes that reminds one of the saying anent marriage, "No family should be without it." No American household surely should be without Mr. Barnes' story of the Life of Commodore Bainbridge. We are all too apt to forget the fact that the naval war of 1812 by the young United States against our ancient and hereditary foe was one of the most brilliant, daring and successful struggles ever undertaken. In almost every action between English and American ships the latter showed themselves manned by better sailors, commanded by more able officers, handled in more seamanlike fashion and fought with more conspicuous gallantry. That these sea-fights were a boundless humiliation and aggravation to the mistress of the seas is amply attested by copies of the London papers of the years of 1812-13-14. Bainbridge was one of the most conspicuous and heroic figures of the war. The story of his career by Mr. Barnes has all the fascination of a romance, and cannot but make every good American thrill with pride when he recalls the fact that he belongs to the only country that has ever fought England to an ignominious standstill on her own element.

White Man's Africa, by Poultney Bigelow, is the collected series of papers on South Africa that have been running in Harper's Magazine, and that are now gathered into book form by the same firm. Mr. Bigelow is not a graceful writer, and he has none of those little tricks and charms of style that make Mr. Davis' books of travel so immensely popular. Bigelow may be defined as a journalist of the better sort, seeking to give information rather than record impressions. The personal element is eleminated entirely from White Man's Africa, but, perhaps, for that reason, the book gains in value in another direction. It is plain, straightforward, unadorned. The best chapter is, no doubt, that in which Mr. Bigelow explains the feeling of the Dutch towards England and the causes that have led to it. In his estimation the Great Trek was a critical point in the history of English colonization, only second in importance to the battle of Lexington. The outrageous injustice on the part of England in refusing to allow the Boers to retain possession of their cattle and wagons, which, after desperate fighting, they had retaken from the plundering Matabele, is a fair sample of this treatment as cited by Mr. Bigelow. The book, taken as a whole, is quite the clearest statement of the condition of South Africa that has yet came under public notice.

A more appropriate and more interesting Xmas present could not be made to a boy than the bound volume of Harper's Round Table. There are 1270 pages full of just such reading and pictures as the American boy delights in. The stories—continued and serial—are clean, manly and spirited, and the illustrations are quite up to the mark set by the Big Four. There is quite a year's uninterrupted reading in the volume of 1897—and more, for the average boy will re-read its stories a second time and a third.

Everyone who has gone to school or bought coffee has heard of Java, but not until Eliza Ruhama Scidmore visited the Island (one of the most populous and productive in the world) has there been any serious attempt to "write it up." Miss Scidmore's Java, the Garden of the East (The Century Company) fills an actual want on the part of all lovers of travel and of the literature of travel. The author has gone through the island with a keen eye for the picturesque, an artistic appreciation of the beautiful, a certain feeling for humor, and a witty and vivacious pen. There is evidence of much studious research in the pages of the book, but it is indirect, and information is cleverly imparted hardly before the reader is aware. The whole world must be, in a sense, in the author's debt, for her impressions de voyage in a hitherto untried field field not only create a desire to follow in her footsteps, but act as a charming and accurate guide for all future travelers to that strange, tropical island. It is quite possible, besides, that Miss Scidmore has contributed a work of real and lasting worth to the artistic world in calling its attention to the exquisite and almost forgotten art of such temples as Boro Boedor and Brambanam in the interior of the island. N.

The Wondrous

cures of many diseases which have been made at Byron Hot Springs this year would fill the paper. Rheumatism, blood and skin troubles and even Bright's disease, being a few of the hundreds of ills yielding easily to the treatment. The Mineral Spring Water and the Baths are remarkable for the alleviation and cure of disease which they daily perform. Hundreds of patients testify gratefully to restored health and renewed life, procured solely through these marvelous waters.

THE NEW BOOKS
AS ISSUED
AT
ROBERTSON'S
126 Post St.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

GET THE GENUINE ARTICLE!

Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast COCOA

Trade-Mark.

Pure, Delicious, Nutritious.

Costs Less than ONE CENT a cup.

Be sure that the package bears our Trade-Mark.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,
(Established 1780) Dorchester, Mass.

AUNT ABBEY'S ROLLED OATS — ONE MINUTE PANCAKE MEAL

Telephone Main 1055

Frank B. Peterson & Co.

IMPORTERS, : WHOLESALE : GROCERS

And Dealers in Cigars, Tobacco and Provisions

30 and 32 California Street, - San Francisco, Cal.

HOPS AND DRIED FRUIT A SPECIALTY

A CHRISTMAS GIFT!

Harmless
Rubber-Tipped
Arrow Game. HEAPS OF FUN!
2,000,000 Sold.
Best Parlor Game Made.
Popular Throughout the Civilized World.
If your dealer hasn't it send us mail order.
Price of Game complete — Harmless Pistol, Target, 3 Rubber-Tipped Arrows, post-paid, $1
BIG DISCOUNT TO AGENTS.
ELASTIC TIP CO., 370 Atlantic Ave., BOSTON, MASS.
116 Lake St., Chicago. 736 Market St., San Francisco.

Ernst H. Ludwig
CATERER
Supplies Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice
Also Terrapin, Entrees, Luncheons and Dinners, Ice Cream, Cake, etc.
NO. 122 GEARY STREET
Telephone Grant 119

CHICKERING PIANOS
For 75 Years Standard of the World
88,000 IN USE
SOLD ON EASY TERMS
BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents
16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY
Price 25 Cents
DR. PARKER'S COUGH CURE
One dose will stop a cough—it never fails!
Ask Your Druggist For It

DR. WARD'S
MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS
Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin. Price, One Dollar.
Ward Medical Co., 380 Dearbon Street, Chicago

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, PIPE, TILE, ETC.
GLADDING, McBEAN & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO.
WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

MEDICATED CERATE... An Incomparable Face Food

It preserves, purifies, refines, and permanently beautifies the complexion, and makes the skin soft, smooth, and fine grained, keeps it from becoming dry, withered, wrinkled or freckled. It invigorates and nourishes the lax and shrunken tissues, fills out sunken lines, makes the flesh firm, removes wrinkles, cures tan, sunburn, pimples, hives, etc. A perfect application before using powder. Endorsed by eminent physicians. Price, 50c. and $1. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Trial pot and sample of face powder, 10c. Free at office—room 324, Phelan Building, 806 Market Street.
MRS. M. J. BUTLER, Dermatologist.

ELECTRIC..
Supplies
Construction
Repairs
CALIFORNIA
ELECTRICAL WORKS
409 MARKET STREET

BREEN BROS.
COAL MERCHANTS
128 O'Farrell St., cor. Powell
Dealers in Wood and Charcoal
Genuine Wellington Coal a Specialty
Orders Promptly Delivered Telephone Red 1581

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies
30 miles from S. F. Location healthful and beautiful. Established 1895. Advantages the best. Expenses low. For catalogue, address H. C. Ingram, Irvington, Cal.

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael
Classical, Literary, Scientific and Commercial Courses. Regular Army Officer detailed by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of
Artificial Stone in all its branches
Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty
Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

SOHMER PIANOS
BYRON MAUZY
AGENT
308-314 Post Street, S. F.

An Elopement.

By Ferdinand Bloch

"Hello, you here again, Lieutenant?"

"Yes, General."

"Have you come here to ask me a second time for my daughter? I refused you yesterday and I refuse you to-day, that's certain."

"Then you wish, sir, to have Mlle. Hermance die an old maid?"

"My affair, not yours' Lieutenant."

"Passons de cela. I have come, General, to ask your advice."

"You've got to ask for something always it appears. Well?"

"Well, I am in love with a little girl——"

"Encore—you are in love with all little girls it seems to me. How absurd. Never mind, go on."

"I have asked her in marriage. Her parents refuse me."

"And why?"

"They don't say."

"Idiots; don't try to defend them. They are idiots if they can't or won't tell you why. What! a young officer like you—rich—good name—in line of promotion—and give you no reasons. Idiots, I tell you."

"Aren't they."

"Aha! If I were in your place!"

"You would do——"

"What I have done. Listen."

"Listen to this little tale and profit by the same—if you can. I was 25 years of age, and a Lieutenant, as you are now. One ovening at a ball I noticed an exquisitely beautiful girl, waltzed with her, adored her and told her so—proposed, was accepted. Father was there—big, bourgeois, smelling of pork, hideous, yellow—hideous as his daughter was lovely. After the waltz I returned Mademoiselle to her corner, went up to the old fellow, her father, drew him into an angle of the wall, and said:

"'Sir, I have not the honor of knowing you, but I am Bauperthois, of the 229th of the line 25 years of age, 16,000 livres income, son of the late Colonel of the same name, hope in time to wear the five galons of the Colonel, and—I love your daughter.'"

"Very flattered," says the beast, but I have not as yet thought of giving my daughter in marriage. I must have time to think it over."

"How long?"

"Some days?"

"I'll give you ten minutes."

"Ten minutes. You're crazy!"

"In ten minutes I'll come for your answer," and I hurried off without giving him time to respond.

Ten minutes later I returned.

"Sir," said the beast, "your insistence is flattering, and if you will honor me with a call in about a week, you may have an answer."

"A week," I exclaimed. "You give me a week's notice like a valet. It's charming. You won't answer me before a week."

"Impossible."

"Six days then—you last chance."

"No, sir."

"C'est tres bein."

Two hours later I had eloped with the daughter, and the next day her father, informed of the affair, consented to call me his son-in-law.

"Voila, my dear lientenant, that is how we act when we wear epaulets. Don't stop here looking at me like a tortise. Get along with you and elope with the girl."

"But——"

"'Tention, by the left flank—a-r-r-rche!"

"Then you advice, General, is to act——"

"At once"

"And if her father is obstinate."

"You're talking drivel. The girl will be compromised. The father can't refuse."

"My cause will be won?"

"Parbleu!"

"I would be wrong to hesitate another second, I see."

"Of course you would."

"That's your sincere opinion."

"Without the least doubt."

"Well, then, General, I've done it."

"Done what?"

"Eloped with Mademoiselle Hermance, your daughter."

"My daughter! You have ——, you,——my daughter!"

"You just told me to."

"Yes—but not with mine."

"However, sir, you were married under the same circumstances."

"But I didn't ask the advice of my future father-in-law.

"I beg you to notice, sir, that I ran off with mademoiselle before asking your advice."

"Eufin, monsieur, where is my daughter."

"With my mother, General, at home."

"And have you acted honestly with her."

"General!"

"Bien, I'll give you ten minutes to bring my daughter back to me and eight days to publish the bans."

"General, this generosity——"

"Rot! my generosity! And you booby, with tears in your eyes, pah! Get along with you, and bring me your wife instantly, son-in-law."

—Translated from the French by Frank Norris.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

When are you going to use Schilling's Best baking-powder and tea?

Your money back if you don't like it.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

BOOK NOTES

The Traveler for December comes out with a very pretty cover picture entitled "A Christmas Reverie," otherwise Miss Gladys Wallis. Walter J. Kenyon has an article on house boats, and Lillian Ferguson a sketch "Christmas in California Homes." The Tourist continues his Oriental talk, and Elaine Hollis holds forth on "Angling as a Pastime for Women." An interesting article is "Three Decades of the Drama," a few reminiscences of Mrs. F. M. Bates. The theatre and society have their usual bright notices, and the illustrations are well beyond the average.

Lippincott's Magazine for November contains a complete story by John Strange Winter entitled "The Price of a Wife." The tale is very much in the author's usual vein and is as interesting as any of its predecessors. J. C. De Leon contributes "The Day of Dialect," a well written sketch, and Fred Perry Powers "Government by Gentlemen." Ella Higginson has a poem, Frances Courtenay Baylor a short sketch "On Small Courtesies." Eva A. Madden writes of "Novelists as Costumers," and Adeline Knapp a Hawaiian incident, "For His Own People."

A recent addition to California literature is Aila, by Kate Thomas, published by William Doxey. The theme of the story is love and ambition, ordinary enough, but the method of treating it is rather out of the passing. Miss Thomas has brought into her story some clever and original ideas and has succeeded in developing them agreeably and with much dramatic effect. The characters are well drawn and carry themselves consistently to the end, notably Dr. Nina Rostraver, a lady physician with a penchant for killing off the incurable. Aila, the heroine, is a lovable, spirited young woman with a dash of Spanish blood which probably accounts for the spirit. A pleasing feature of the tale is its California coloring, which, by the way, has the rare charm of being true to nature.

Kate Thomas

Notable in the array of work from the hands of the younger artists of San Francisco are the sketches of Chinatown done in pen and ink by Mr. J. O. Brubaker of this city. Mr. Brubaker is a careful observer as well as a clever draughtsman, and is bound to attract attention to his work in time. His little sketch of the alley back of the Chinese theatre—St. Louis Place—is quite as clever as many vignettes and tail pieces to be seen in the Eastern magazines.

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles. Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars—free.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.

Sold by druggists, 75c.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimuoant has saved many a human life. The famlus old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and eat.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

Among the many great Financial Corporations on the Pacific Coast, none rank higher than the

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.

Its Agents are found throughout America and its Record for Prompt and Equitable Settlement of All Honest Losses is Firmly Established

D. J. Staples, President — Wm. J. Dutton, Vice-President — B. Faymonville, 2d V.-Pres. and Sec'y
J. B. Levison, Marine Sec'y — Louis Weinmann, Asst. Sec'y — Stephen D. Ives, General Agent

NEW YORK

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

JOHN A. McCALL, President.

COMPARISON FOR FIVE YEARS

1891-1896

| | Dec. 31, 1891 | Dec. 31, 1896 | Gain in 5 years |
|---|---|---|---|
| Assets | $125,947,290 | $187,176,406 | $61,229,116 |
| Surplus | 15,141,023 | 26,657,332 | 11,516,309 |
| Income | 31,854,194 | 39,139,558 | 7,285,364 |
| Dividends of Year to Policy-Holders | 1,260,340 | 2,165,269 | 904,929 |
| Number of Policy-Holders | 182,803 | 299,785 | 116,982 |
| Insurance in Force—Premiums Paid | $575,689,649 | $826,816,648 | $251,126,999 |

CHAS. A. McLANE, Agency Director

MILLS BUILDING, SAN FRANCISCO

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 POST STREET

Below Kearny — Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAMES D. PHELAN, President.
GEORGE A. STORY, Cashier.
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on deposits.

Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.

When opening accounts, send signature.

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

Paid Up Capital . . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . . 25,000

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. — HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

CONNECTICUT

FIRE INS. CO.

OF HARTFORD

Assets, $3,300,000. — BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager

COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
501 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 — Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT

204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco

VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

Guarantee Capital and Surplus - $2,040,803 66
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash - 1,000,000 00
Deposits December 31, 1896 - - 27,710,247 45

OFFICERS

President, B. A. Becker
First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer
Second Vice-President, H. Horstmann
Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt
Assistant Cashier, Wm. Herrmann
Secretary, George Tourny
Assistant Secretary, A. H. Muller

DIRECTORS

B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST.

Deposits June 30, 1896 — $22,168,372
Paid Up Capital and Surplus — 1,614,134

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. — E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

DIRECTORS

George W. Beaver, Robert Watt, W. A. Magee, George C. Boardman, W. C. B. de Fremery, Daniel E. Martin, Albert Miller, George Tasheira, E. B. Pond

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country. No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A.D. 1726

Capital Paid Up, $3,446,100 — Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders $5,180,281

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager.

Don't Borrow a Home!

BUY IT — Your rent payments for the borrowed home will do it through the aid of the

CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California

WM. CORBIN, Secretary and Gen. Manager.
Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco

Baldwin Theatre

Friedlander, Gottlob & Co., Lessees and Managers
Two Weeks
Beginning Monday, December 27th

MR. STUART ROBSON

And His Admirable Company
Presenting Augustus Thomas' New Comedy-Drama

THE JUCKLINS

Suggested by Opie Read's novel

Monday, Jan. 3d, Last week of Stuart Robson

California Theatre

Friedlander, Gottlob & Co., Lessees and Managers
To-night and Sunday, Last Times
SHENANDOAH
Beginning Next Monday. Second and Last Week

THE FRAWLEY CO.

Presenting Every Evening and Saturday Matinee
Augustin Daly's Comedy

An International Match

Staged with the same careful attention which marks all of the Frawley productions

Columbia Theatre

Friedlander, Gottlob & Co., Lessees and Managers

Two Weeks, beginning Dec. 27th
First time in San Francisco — the Real Funny Stars
MATHEWS & BULGER
In the far-famed farcical fete

AT GAY CONEY ISLAND

It is to laugh, and you do laugh.—New York Journal. . The lines are bright and the situations laughable.—Herald. . Fun, without vulgarity.—Times.
Coming—Jolly Nellie McHenry.

Orpheum

Week beginning Monday, Dec. 27th

Another Sensation DE MARCE FELIX, assisted by two Horses and a Baboon
MLLE. ROMBELLO, Sand Modeler
MUSICAL DALE, Grotesque Comedian
ELINORE SISTERS, Character Artists
THE THREE AVOLOS, Novelty Acrobats
CAROLINE HULL. Triple-voiced Vocalist
OPHELITA, Chic Character Dancer
Grand Spectacular Ballet, The Birth of the Pearl. 36 Coryphees and 3 Premiere Danseuse
Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House

MRS ERNESTINE KRELING : Proprietor and Manager

This Evening!
Our Holiday Spectacle—A Positive Novelty!
Help It Along!

MOTHER GOOSE

Or, The Strange Adventures of Jack and Jill

Great Cast! Grand Ballets!
Superb Specialties! Gorgeous Scenery!
Concluding with the Magnificent Tranformation
Our Childhood's Fancies. A treat for everyone
A Happy New Year to All!

Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre

FRED BELASCO : : : Lessee and Proprietor
MARK THALL, Manager.

A cast of fifty people
Genuine holiday treat
Realism in every scene
Each climax is a beautiful picture
All the scenes are new in
THE GIRL I LEFT BEHIND ME
Secure your seats—avoid the rush
Houses crowded nightly
One of the finest ever produced
Will run another week

Usual prices 15, 25, 33, 50c., Reserved. Phone Main 254

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

WALTER MOROSCO : : : Sole Lessee and Manager

Last four performances of The War of Wealth
Commencing Monday, Dec. 27th, Grand Revival of the Pathetic Comedy-Drama

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN

Special engagement of everybody's favorite, Will H. Bray in the role of Uncle Tom. Maud Edna Hall as Topsy. Baby Ruth as Little Eva. Balance of company in a strong cast. Ferocious Bloodhounds! Trick Donkey! Colored Jubilee Singers! Grand Apotheosis of The Gates Ajar.
Grand Matinee New Year's Day

Evg. Prices, 10, 25 50c. Matinees Saturday and Sunday

SAN FRANCISCO SYMPHONY SOCIETY

FRITZ SCHEEL, Musical Director

THIRD CONCERT

Tivoli Opera House, Thursday, Dec. 15, at 3:15

PROGRAMME

1. Overture. "Egmont".....Beethoven
2. Symphonie D moll.....Schumann
3. Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
4. Vorspiel, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
5. Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini

Prices, including Reserved Seat, $1.50, $1.00 and 75c.
Seats on sale at the Tivoli Opera House, commencing Monday, Dec. 27th

TURF TOPICS

Racing at Oakland — The Best Yearling Sale of the Season.

Towards the end of last week the weather became settled again and the short spell of wet has been followed by bright days and frosty nights. The Oakland track has once more become fast, and many of the events have brought out unusully large fields.

Saturday last furnished an excellent day's sport. In a seven-furlongs race for two-year-old fillies a field of five went to the post, quality being represented by St. Calatine, 115 lbs., Napamax, 110 lbs., and Martha II. 100 lbs. The first-named shewed an improved appearance since last seen out, the second, who ran in bar plates, seemed hardly herself, and Martha II. was admitted by her owner to have hardly done well of late in the stable. Ridiculous odds were laid on Napamax on the strength of her victory over St. Calatine in the match at even weights a few weeks ago, which for reasons partly explained at the time, was not a reliable test of the respective galloping abilities of these fillies. On this occasion the St. Carlo filly assumed command from the start, Napamax lying second until nearly home, when Martha II. drew up and passed the former with a strong run that carried her within a length of St. Calatine as the judges' stand was passed. Time, 1:27. Thus St. Calatine must be considered the best two-year-old filly to-day in California. The Burlingame Stakes, $1,000, one mile, brought out a field meagre in members, though good in quality. Four only sported silk—Senator Blaud, 122 lbs., Buckwa, 119 lbs., Altamax, 106 lbs., and Bliss Rucker, 87 lbs.—the two last-named representing the Burns & Waterhouse stable. The two-year-old Bliss Rucker made all the running, and won handily by four lengths in 1:40. Altamax, who had held the other two safe all the way, finishing about the same distance in front of Buckwa, and Senator Bland being unable to travel in any kind of form for more than half the distance. Buckwa showed a dash of his natural speed on the back stretch, and when he gets a bit stronger than he looks just now may return to something like the fine form he was in here last season. Senator Bland was certainly off, both in appearance and style of going, and, by the way, his action is never of the most desirable kind. Altamax in point of condition looked grand, but I fancy his fetlock joints give his trainer a good deal of anxiety. The winner has greatly improved since he returned from the East. The day's proceedings were brought to a close by a rattling three-horse finish in a six-furlongs sprint, Yankee Doodle, 110 lbs., Break o' Day, 102 lbs., and Midas, 106 lbs., being placed in this order by the judges, with little or nothing separating them.

On Monday Salvado, 107 lbs., a Rancho del Paso bred horse by Salvator out of the imported mare Oran by Bend Or, won a race of 1 1-16 miles with little difficulty in the fast time of 1:46¼, notwithstanding that he was forced out wide in the stretch by H. Martin on Bernardillo, 106 lbs., who finished up second. Two successive two-year-old sprints were landed by St. Cuthbert and Tiger Lily, both the produce of St. Carlo, a timely advertisement of that sire's merits, were such needed, seeing that his yearlings were to be sold the same evening.

On Tuesday Buckwa, carrying 115 lbs., won at 1 1-16 miles in the quick time of 1.46½, Grady, 114 lbs., being a good second, after having had considerable difficulty in getting through until well into the stretch. The two-year-old Marmion ran very fast in a 5½ furlongs sprint, for which a pretty good field of seven went to the post, and won with ease.

The chief feature of the card for Christmas Day at Oakland will be the Flood Handicap, 1½ miles. It is to be hoped the Southern Pacific Railway will make better traffic arrangements for the crowd that may be expected to go across the bay that afternoon than they did on Thanksgiving Day, when the crush was dangerous, and no attempt whatever was made by the railway authorities to regulate things at the ferry.

The coming fortnight at Ingleside should provide some interesting sport, and the Pacific Coast Jockey Club intends making special efforts to attract society to the races.

It is most gratifying to be able to record the successful sale of Mr. W. O'B. Macdonough's small but select consignment of yearlings, fillies and geldings, ten by St. Carlo and one colt by imp. Watercress, at the Occidental Horse Exchange on the 20th inst. The ten St. Carlos averaged $980, and the Watercress colt made $850. The highest price, $2500, was for St. Kristine by St. Carlo out of imp. Kissing Crust, dam of Orestes, now dead, the first native son of imp. Ormonde. This filly was bought by James Coffey, who also took the filly Violence by St. Carlo out of the imp. Sir Modred mare Anarchy for $1600, and another filly by the same sire out of the Hanover mare Sloe for $1250, these being the highest priced lots in the sale. This is one of the best results obtained in America this year, and should put fresh heart into breeders of the best class of stock from winning strains.

I am informed on good authority that the report which appeared in a morning paper to the effect that the yearlings purchased by Mr. Coffey will be raced by Prince Poniatowski is unfounded. The Prince does not intend to race in America.

The Pacific Coast Trotting Horse Breeders' Association held a meeting on Tuesday, at which, after the election of officers for the ensuing season had been disposed of, several suggestions in the line of progress were considered and favorably entertained. The most important of these, perhaps, were the institution of single dashes, instead of heat races, and the employment of professional starter and judges. A very proper recommendation was made that the use of hobbles in pacing races should be prohibited. There is no doubt of the need for infusing new life into the sport of harness racing, if it is to retain the favor of the public.

BENEDICT.

FINANCE AND TRADE

Wednesday Evening.

The general trade position continues to be highly satisfaciory, and there is a seasonable increase in the volume of business being transacted locally. In financial centres the money market presents a strong appearance, and in New York especially rates for money at call have visibly hardened, having a tendency to check any speculative movement in stocks.

As we go to press in the early part of the week, owing to the Xmas holidays, a report on the local stock market will not appear in this issue.

New Designs in Dresden.

The many dainty designs in seals this season offer many suggestions for the holidays. These make an acceptable gift when engraved with the monogram, and can be seen in large variety at Cooper's stationery store on Market street.

Consumption Cured.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send, free of charge, to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. Noyes, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

"Scotch and Soda" is the fashionable drink in the East at present, and is fast becoming the fad out here. With a good quailty of whisky, such as the "White Horse Cellar" Scotch Whisky, it makes one of the most pleasant and cooling drinks we have tried, and is sure to make a hit.

CITY OF PARIS

DRY GOODS CO.

LACE DEPARTMENT

NEW AND SEASONABLE

The New Lace Scarf, in Net, Chiffon, and Mousselaine de Soie, and Lace Applique, 75c. to $5.00 each.

Oriental Feather Boas, 18 to 72 inches, $3.00 to $24.00 each.

Real Duchesse Lace Handkerchiefs, $1.00 to $25.00 each.

Novelties in Lace and Chiffon Jabots, Fronts and Bows, $2.50 to $5.00 each.

All widths and colors in Shirred and Plaited Liberty, for draping.

Real Duchesse and Point Laces and Flouncings.

Novelties in Fans, $1.00 to $30.00 each.

City of Paris Dry Goods Co.

S. E. Corner of Geary and Stockton Streets
UNION SQUARE
Prompt attention to Country Orders

LADIES!!!!

Before buying anywhere else, if you want to be astonished, come and look at my windows and see marked the biggest bargains in Jackets, Suits, Fur Capes, Silk Waists, Feather Boas, etc.

Terrific reductions during the holidays.

OPEN EVERY NIGHT.

ARMAND CAILLEAU

Corner of Geary Street and Grant Avenue

BOOKS ENGRAVED CARDS
H. R. WILLIS'
107 MONTGOMERY STREET

In the front rank of advertising directors of the Pacific Coast, there are none so well-pnown and so often prominently before the public as Charles H. Lombard and Charles H. Farrell, composing the firm of Lombard & Co. Directing the advertising of over fifty of San Francisco's leading business houses, and numbering among their clients firms reaching from Seattle to San Diego, and as far east as Denver, they are called upon in the course of each year to expend vast sums of money entrusted to their judgment. They have introduced wideawake and up-to-date ideas in advertising—they are aggressive and progressive, and a recognized success.

CHAS. H. FARRELL CHAS. H. LOMBARD

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING IN THE UNITED STATES. A book of two hundred pages, containing a catalogue of about six thousand newspapers, being all that are credited by the American Newspaper Directory (December edition for 1897) with having regular issues of 1,000 copies or more. Also separate State maps of each and every State of the American Union, naming those towns only in which there are issued newspapers having more than 1,000 circulation. This book (issued December 15, 1897), will be sent, postage paid, to any address, on receipt of one dollar. Address The Geo. P. Rowell Advertising Co., 10 Spruce Street, New York.

French and Italian Instruction

By PROF. L. D. VENTURA, late of Boston
Formerly secretary to Tomasso Salvini

University endorsement, and highest references on application. Class and Private Lessons. Address by mail, 727 Gough street, between Golden Gate avenue and McAllister.

PACIFIC COAST JOCKEY CLUB

INGLESIDE TRACK

Racing from Monday, December 27th, to Saturday, January 9th, inclusive
Five or more races daily, rain or shine
First race at 2 p.m.

S. P. R. R. Trains 12:45 and 1:15 p.m. daily. Leave Third-street station, stopping at Valencia street. Returning immediately after the last race.
Electric Car Lines—Kearny and Mission-street cars every 3 minutes, direct to track without change. Fillmore-street cars transfer each way.

F. H. GREEN, Secretary. S. N. ANDROUS, President.

California Jockey Club

OAKLAND TRACK

Winter Meeting 1897-8, beginning Monday, December 13th.

Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday.
Five or more races each day. Races start at 2:15 p.m. sharp.

Ferry leaves San Francisco at 12 m., 12:30, 1:00, 1:30, 2:00, 2.30 and 3:00 p.m., connecting with trains stopping at entrance to track. Buy your tickets to Shell-Mound. Returning trains leave the track at 4:15 and 4:45 p.m., and immediately after the last race.

R. B. MILROY, Secretary. T. H. WILLIAMS JR. President.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

Steamers leave Broadway wharf, San Francisco, for ports in Alaska 9 a. m. December 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound Ports, 9 a. m. December 2, 7, 12, 17, 22, 27 and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Steamer Pomona, 2 p. m. December 3, 7, 11, 15, 20, 24, 28; January 1, 5, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 31.

For Newport (Los Angeles) and Way Ports, 9 a. m. December 4, 8, 12, 16, 20, 24, 28 and every fourth day thereafter.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Harford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles, and Redondo (Los Angeles), at 11 a. m. December 2, 6, 10, 14, 18, 22, 26, 30 and every fourth day thereafter.

For Ports in Mexico, 10 a. m. the 2d each month.

The company reserves the right to change, without previous notice, steamers, sailing dates and hours of sailing.

Ticket Office: Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.

General Agents,

No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

S. S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, Dec. 28 at 2 p.m. Special party rates.

S. S. "Moana," for Australia, Thursday, Jan. 6th, at 2 p.m. Line to Coolgardie, Australia, and Capetown, South Africa.

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO General Agents

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF DUNCAN B. McMILLAN, DECEASED

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Duncan B. McMillan, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at Room 35, Chronicle Building, corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

A. C. FREESE,
Administrator of the Estate of Duncan B. McMillan, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, November 29, 1897.

J. D. SULLIVAN,
Attorney for Administrator.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—THE GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, 526 California street. For the half year ending December 31, 1897, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four and twenty-six hundredths (4.26) per cent per annum on term deposits, and three and fifty-five hundredths (3.55) per cent per annum on ordinary deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Monday, January 3, 1898. GEO. TOURNY, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—SAN FRANCISCO SAVINGS UNION, 532 California street, corner Webb. For the half year ending with the 31st of December, 1897, a dividend has been declared at the rate per annum of four and two tenths (4.2) per cent on term deposits, and three and five tenths (3.5) per cent on ordinary deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Monday, January 3, 1898.

LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

BULLION MINING COMPANY—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the seventeenth (17th) day of December, 1897, an assessment (No. 51) of five cents (5c.) per share, was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, room 11, 331 Pine street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-first (21st) day of January, 1898, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the twelfth (12th) day of February, 1898, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with the costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors. R. R. GRAYSON, Secretary.

Office, room 11, 331 Pine street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Belcher Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment | No. 57 |
| Amount per share | 20 cents |
| Levied | November 20, 1897 |
| Delinvent in office | December 24, 1897 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock | January 14, 1897 |

C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.

Office, room 35, 3d floor, Mills blg., San Francisco.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Occidental Consolidated Mining Co.

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment | No. 29 |
| Amount per share | 10 cents |
| Levied | December 7, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office | January 11, 1898 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock | February 1, 1898 |

A. K. DURBROW, Secretary.

Office, room 69, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Alta Silver Mining Company

| | |
|---|---|
| Assessment | No. 58 |
| Amount per share | 10 cents |
| Levied | December 3, 1897 |
| Delinquent in office | January 7, 1898 |
| Day of sale of delinquent stock | January 28, 1898 |

J. E. JACOBUS, Secretary.

Office, room 33, Nevada Block, San Francisco.

A. K. DAGGETT

Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty

NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F.
Telephone 305

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

The firm of JOE POHEIM is the largest [illegible] in the United States. Rules for self-measurement and samples of cloth sent free.

201 and 203 Montgomery St., cor. Bush.
844 & 846 Market St. 1110 & 1112 Market St.
SAN FRANCISCO
485 Fourteenth St., Oakland. 603 & 605 K St., Sacramento.
143 South Spring St., Los Angeles.

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

Brushes For barbers, bakers, bootblacks, bath houses, billiard tables, brewers, book binders, candymakers, canners, dyers, flour mills, foundries, laundries, paperhangers, printers, painters, shoe factories, stablemen, tar roofers, tanners, tailors, etc.

BUCHANAN BROS.

TEL. 5610 609 SACRAMENTO ST

BRUSH MANUFACTURERS

THE LATEST STYLES IN

CHOICE WOOLENS

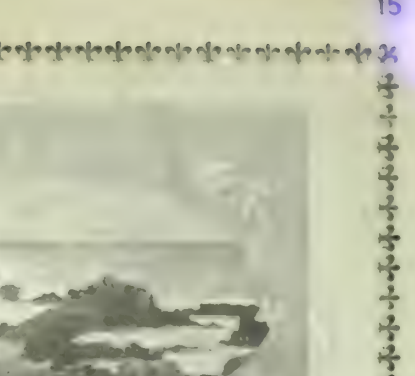
H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

623 Market St. (up stairs) opp. Palace Hotel

Bicycle and Golf Suits



BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NAHER, ALLES & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

CHARLES P. LANE C. WHITTELL LANE

LANE & LANE

Attorneys and Counselors

Room 212
Crocker Building, San Francisco

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

Some Facts About AEOLIANS And Some Prices

Aeolians suitable for parlors or music-rooms cost from $75 up to $1,500.

The $75 Aeolian, the Princess, is an excellent instrument, and since its first introduction last winter nearly five hundred have been made and sold. Its tone is good, and its size renders it available for use in places where there is not sufficient room for one of the larger styles.

Style 1450, price $350, is an Aeolian designed to meet the demand for an Aeolian of fine tone and action. Attractively cased, that can be bought on moderate terms of payment. We sell Style 1450 on deferred payments, at $10 per month.

The Aeolian Grand, price $750, is our standard instrument. This is the style most favored by musicians because of its wonderfully orchestral tone. We have supplied Aeolian Grands to Paderewski, the De Reszkes, Nordica, and others.

Our latest and best instlument is the Aeolian Orchestrelle. Its distinguishing feature is its tone. It is constructed on the celebrated Vocalian principle, by which system each different reed is enclosed in a separate cell, and the tones are qualified by tubes of different shapes and sizes. All traces of the coarse, raw quality of the ordinary reed are entirely removed and a richness and purity is obtained only equalled by a pipe; in fact, many of the tones are so like those produced from pipes that even experts are deceived by them. The price of this instrument is $1,500.

We have for rental a few Style 1500, price $500. The terms are $15 for the first month, and $10 for each subsequent month.

KOHLER & CHASE

28 & 30 O'FARRELL ST., S. F.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

. . ALSO . .

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. . . Pacific Coast Sole Agents

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Among the assets of the Jersey Lily is a ranch near Carson, Nevada, sold by Sam Davis of the Carson Appeal. Sam was on the train which brought Mrs. Langtry and her company to San Francisco and they struck up an acquaintance. He told her about the ranch and she intimated a desire to purchase. Still she had not made up her mind and Sam was worried for fear the deal might not go through. So one night he went to the stage door of the old California, and, owing to his editorial position, was admitted without question. He waited until Mrs. Langtry took up her position as the statue of Galatea, and then, calling three stage hands to witness, he whispered from the wings to her: "If you hear me wink the eye which is further from the audience." Galatea winked. That established Davis' case. "Now, if you don't want to buy the southwest quarter section for $8,000 shake your head," he said. Galatea, the marble statue, with the eyes of the audience, was, of course, immovable. "All right," said Davis, cheerfully. "I and these witnesses understand that you want it at that figure." The next day he gave her the deeds and took her good money. She probably might have made a contention in court, but she decided that such diplomacy deserved recognition, and so accepted the situation.

Sir Aubrey de Vere, grandfather of the poet, had a strong affection for the poor Irish, and always helped them when in trouble. A young man was tried for murder, having killed a member of a rival faction in a faction fight. The judge, reluctant to sentence him to death, on account of his youth, turned to him and said, "Is there any one in court who could speak as to your character?" The youth looked round the court, and then said sadly, "There is no man here, my lord, that I know." At that Sir Aubrey entered the courtroom and determined to help the prisoner. He called out, "You are a queer boy that don't know a friend when you see him." The boy was quick-witted; he answered, "Oh, then, it is myself that is proud to see your honor here this day!" "Well," said the judge, "Sir Vere, since you know that boy, will you tell us what you know of him?" "I will, my lord, said Sir Aubrey, "and what I can tell you is this, that from the very first day that ever I saw him to this minute I never knew anything of him that was not good." The boy escaped being hanged.

Charles Mathews was well known among his friends and admirers for his remarkable powers of rapid imitation and characterization off the stage as well as on. He was invited once with his manager and two others to dine with a citizen, who, though he carried on a pawn-brokering business, was an amusing fellow. It seems he kept but one assistant, and during the dinner hour the host was called out of the dining-parlor at the back of the shop to attend a customer, Mathews, altering his hair, turning up his collar and putting on another man's hat—of course with suitable change of countenance—took a large silver gravy-spoon from the table, ran into the street, and entering one of the little boxes that universally shield one customer from another at pawnbrokers' counters, pledged to his unsuspecting host his own piece of plate, and returned to his place at table as the pawnbroker re-entered the room.

Herr Scheel tells of a conscientious cornet player in one of his orchestras who gave an unexpected rendering of a well-known passage. "Let's have that over again," requested Scheel, surprised at hearing a note which was not in the score. The note was sounded again and again. "What are you playing," he asked at last. "I am blaying what am on ze paper," said the cornet player, "I blay vat is before me." "Let me have a look." The part was handed to the conductor. "Why you idiot," he roared, "can't you see that this is a dead fly?" "I don't care," was the answer, "he was there, and I blayed him."

Dean Hale tells of Archbishop Tait, who, when preaching once at the Chapel Royal, was much perplexed by the conduct of the verger, who, at the close of the sermon, opened the door of the pulpit and suddenly closed it with all his force, so that the noise rang through the building. "He informed me in a whisper," reports the bishop, "that his Grace the Duke of Wellington was asleep, and that, not liking to touch him, they adopted this method of rousing him from his slumber." This ingenious simulation of a bombardment never failed to stir the old warrior.

General Sherman was once a patient of the late Dr, Bliss. The Doctor had been treating him for some time, when one day the General said: "Doctor, I don't seem to be getting any better, for all your medicine." "Well, General," replied the Doctor, jocosely, "perhaps you had better take Shakespeare's advice and throw physic to the dogs." "I would, Doctor, replied the sick man, as he turned his head on the piilow—"I would, but there are a number of valuable dogs in the neighborhood."

Joaquin Miller's handwriting defies detection. He goes quite often to a certain house is Oakland, and the family there is acquainted with the peculiarities of his chirography. A fly had fallen into the inkstand, and the small boy of the family rescued it and dropped it on a piece of paper. After watching it intently for a while, he called to his mother: "Here's a fly, mamma, that writes just like Joaquin Miller."

Professor Corfield was lecturing to some students on hygiene at South Kensington a few years ago, when a student from the provinces asked him how he—the student—could safe-guard himself in drinking London water. The Professor rather startled him by replying, "First boil it, then filter it, and, after that—drink beer."

MATCHLESS IN EVERY FEATURE

THE CONSENSUS OF OPINION REGARDING

The Ladies' Grill-Room

OF

The Palace

Direct Entrance from Market Street. Open Until Midnight.

BROOKLYN HOTEL 208-212 Bush St. San Francisco Cal.

Conducted on Both American and European Plan.

This favorite hotel, located in the best and most central portion of the city, is under the experienced management of CHARLES MONTGOMERY, and is as good, if not the best Family and Business Men's Hotel in San Francisco. Electric lights and electric return call bells in rooms. Board and Room (American Plan) per day, $1.50, $1.25 and $1.00. European Plan (choice rooms) per day, 50c. to $1. Choice Family Rooms for two persons. $1. Guests taking rooms on European Plan plan get their Single Meals for 25c. Free coach to and from hotel.

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.

PRINCIPAL AND FINEST FAMILY HOTEL OF SAN FRANCISCO

HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

A LARGE BENGAL TIGER TO MATCH THE CELEBRATED LION.

A large engraving of a tiger, in colors, from the renowned picture of the famous animal-painter, Rosa Bonheur, has been engraved at great expense to order for Charles Lyons, the London Tailor. Can be had at either of his three stores, at the nominal price of 10 cents: by mail 20 cents. Free to customers.

721 Market Street
302 Kearny Street
1212-1214 Market Street

Landseer's celebrated picture of the Lion can also be had at the same price.

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS

Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & works. Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1571

Look!

Have you seen it?
The new Five-Cent Piece of

PIPER HEIDSIECK

PLUG TOBACCO

(CHAMPAGNE FLAVOR)

Increased 40 per cent. in size and improved in quality. Ask your tobacconist to show you one of the NEW pieces—the biggest bargain for the money you ever saw. Try it and be convinced.

CHRISTMAS
WAVE
SAN FRANCISCO 1897

laska Commercial Company

DIRECT ROUTE

rom San Francisco to Dawson

—AND—

ALASKA GOLD FIELDS!

For particulars, apply to

LASKA COMMERCIAL COMPANY

310 Sansome Street, San Francisco

---

THE

San Francisco National Bank

SUCCESSORS TO

THE SATHER BANKING CO.

SAN FRANCISCO

CAPITAL - FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS

OFFICERS

JAMES K. WILSON, President. E. A. BRUGUIERE, Vice-President.
L. I. COWGILL, Cashier.

DIRECTORS

D. J. STAPLES, WILLIAM PIERCE JOHNSON, GEORGE A. POPE,
E. A. BRUGUIERE, ED. G. LUKENS, CHARLES C. JUDSON.

Sells bills and telegraph exchange on Hanover & Chase National Banks, New York; Drexel & Co., Philadelphia; National Bank of the Commonwealth, Boston.

Makes collections in all parts of the United States. Issues letters of credit on Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co., London; Messrs. Morgan, Harjes & Co., Paris; which are exchangable for traveler's credits, available in all parts of the world. Also draws exchange on London, Paris, Hamburg, Cologne, Berlin, Bremen, Cassel, Frankfort-on-Main, Leipsic, Stuttgart, Basel.

---

SUN Insurance Office OF LONDON

187 Years of Active Business

OLDEST PURELY FIRE INSURANCE OFFICE IN THE WORLD

| | |
|---|---|
| Capital . . | $12,500,000 |
| Cash Assets . . | 11,009,450 |
| Net Surplus . . | 8,000,000 |

UNLIMITED LIABILITY OF SHAREHOLEERS

Pacific Department, 420 California Street, San Francisco

W. J. CALLINGHAM, Gen. Agent
LESLIE A. WRIGHT, Asst. Gen. Agent

ACIFIC DEPARTMENT EMBRACES CALIFORNIA, NEVADA, UTAH, COLORADO, WYOMING, NEW MEXICO. ARIZONA, OREGON, WASHINGTON, IDAHO, MONTANA, HAWAIIAN ISLANDS AND ALASKA

---

AACHEN AND MUNICH Fire Insurance Co. of Germany

Capital, $2,250,000. Assets, $6,544,972. Surplus, $2,343,063

HANOVER Fire Insurance Co. of New York

Capital, $1,000,000. Assets, $2,750,000. Surplus, $500,000

CESAR BERTHEAU, Manager
HERBERT FOLGER, Assistant Manager

423 California Street - San Francisco

---

Use Only

WELLINGTON COAL

Best for Family Use

FOR SALE BY ALL RELIABLE DEALERS

THE SIREN

From the painting by Fred Yates.

Your Old Men Shall Dream Dreams

By GERALDINE BONNER.

Jeremiah Byrne in his early manhood had the fortune to marry a good woman, with whom he spent fifteen years of poverty and happiness. Jeremiah Byrne in middle life had the misfortune to fall under the spell of a bad woman and was brought to wreck.

During the earlier part of the fifteen years that belonged to his wife he had been very poor. They had had a bitter struggle, and had battled hand to hand with poverty—not the easy-going, shabby-genteel poverty of Eastern cities, but the genuine, nipping poverty of the educated poor in San Francisco. Toward the end of the fifteen years Jeremiah Byrne's luck had changed, and slowly at first, then with ever-increasing rapidity, he began to make money. At forty-five he found himself a rich man with a wife still charming, though faded from past hardships, two children, a comfortable home and a wearing incumbrance in the shape of a guilty conscience.

The woman who was not good never could forgive the woman who was good. That goodness was an eternal reproach and insult, an ever-rankling grievance. It irritated the woman who was not good to a point where discretion and prudence were forgotten. Jeremiah Byrne's infatuation, which at first had been secret and shamefaced, became open for all men to see. Most people saw it long before Mrs. Byrne, and, for a long time after she did, in the agonized bewilderment of the knowledge, she pretended not to see it. This was not what the woman who was not good intended at all. She had obtained a divorce from her husband, and she determined that Mrs. Jeremiah Byrne must follow her example. Possessed by this idea she set herself to work to force Mrs. Jeremiah Byrne into the divorce courts.

It took her over a year to do this, and during that time she had the assistance of Jeremiah Byrne to drive his wife out of her home. Two souls with but a single thought, and that thought the crushing and subduing of a third may generally be relied upon to succeed, especially when the the aggressors are unscrupulous and merciless, and the aggressed is simple, unsuspecting and helpless. The pressure brought upon Mrs, Jeremiah Byrne to force her into seeking a divorce from her husband would have broken a more resolute spirit than hers. At the end of a year and a half her resistance was beaten out and the divorce obtained. Mrs. Byrne was granted a fair income, and her husband, to salve a sore conscience, gave over to his children two houses which brought in good rents. The mother retained the care and custody of the children, a boy of twelve and a girl of fourteen. This did not cause the father any pain, as he did not wish to be reproached by their presence, or bothered by their care. With these two Mrs Byrne crept away and hid herself in a suburb across the Bay. Mr. Byrne kept quiet for two months and then married the lady who had ensnared his middle-aged affections.

This person; installed as the second Mrs. Jeremiah Byrne, the wife of a gentleman of means and standing in local political circles, resolved to wipe off all blots which might be found upon her tarnished 'scutcheon, live down all records of her too lively past, and become an esteemed member of society, and most punctilious and particular of dignified matrons. Respectability was to be her hobby. Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi, was not more vigorously severe on all moral lapses, all smirched reputations than Mrs. Jeremiah Byrne, second. She resolved to set out as a very dragon of propriety, whose main business in the scheme of creation was to ferret out any damaging story that might stain the past of those persons to whom an unsuspecting society gave harbor and refuge.

But to have the world see and understand what a real passion for respectability she had developed, it would be necessary to become a member of that exclusive society in which Mrs. Byrne desired to play the part of an instrument of public weal whose business it was to expose whited sepulchers and detect frauds. To pry into the inner life of rich and respectable people, to see the wheels of fashionable existence go round, to be invited to good houses and eat the salt of the wealthy and well-bred became the dream of her life. And why should it not be realized! She was a married woman, rich enough to buy people's toleration with dinners and dances and theatre tickets. If society would close its doors to her because she had no entrance ticket as a member of that close corporation, she would pay her way in. Mrs. Jeremiah Byrne had a great belief in the sovereign power of money. If she had heard that fashionable people went there, she would have been satisfied that she could have bought her way into Heaven.

So, confident in the power of her marriage and her money, Mrs. Byrne set about becoming a prominent person of importance and consideration. She made Jeremiah move from the little house that his first wife had thought so luxurious into a newly-elaborated gim-crack mansion on California street, with numerous bay windows and filagreed wooden trimmings. Here she kept two men servants and a maid, and furnished the long, narrow drawing rooms in a dazzling combination of gilding and plush. She started a carriage with a coachman in fawn-colored livery and gilt buttons, and went driving every afternoon with her card-case in her hand, returning before dinner with the exhausted air of a woman who had been discharging her social obligations. She had a "Day" and a parlor-maid in a cap to open the door to the distinguished visitors, and a great many very brilliant house-gowns to wear when she was receiving.

Then, too, in her character of a matron of unassailable present, whatever envious scandalmongers might say of her past, she was always devoted to Jeremiah. Every Saturday and Sunday afternoon they drove to the park together in his buggy, a pair of slender-limbed, long-tailed trotters whirling them over the smooth, red road. Jeremiah, in his big frieze coat, which strained at the buttons, looked a burly, middle-aged, Irish Californian. His tight-mouthed face, the upper lip smooth shaven, was shadowed by the peak of his soft hat which he wore drawn low over his eyes. He was always silent and engrossed while driving.

His wife, however, was talkative, and amused him with highly-flavored anecdote and gossip about the people they passed. She was generally good tempered on these occasions, for the foot passengers stared at her, and the admiring glances of the common herd delighted Mrs. Jeremiah Bryne. The saunterers, looking up at this pair whirling behind their fleet-footed horses, caught a glimpse of a woman approaching forty, rather fat, her flushed face thickly powdered till it looked unhealthy, purplish white, her dark eyes, full and having a somewhat glassy suggestion in their sinister, slow stare, her glossy yellow hair cut and curled in infantile rings about her face, her deeply-tinted cheeks emerging from high velvet and furred collars that rolled up nearly to her ears.

Yet despite all the luxury of the new menage, the willingness of Mrs. Jeremiah Byrne to spend money and entertain with profuse splendor, the people to be entertained did not present themselves with the eager precipitancy to be desired. Mrs. Byrne's "Day" was not patronized, and while the mistress of the house sat alone in a superb creation of silk and lace in the long, empty drawing-room, the white-capped maid yawned in the pantry, waiting to show in the visitors who never came.

To her dinners and parties Mrs. Byrne could manage to beguile guests, but these were not of the class that she desired in the role of Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi. People came—divorced women with queer records, impoverished teachers of music and painting who excused themselves for frequenting such company by the assurance that their art required them to make incursions into Bohemia, inferior journalists who reported Mrs. Byrne's entertainments with flowery wealth of language, men who would go anywhere for a good dinner, and warmed their famished stomachs with Jeremiah Byrne's fine wines, unkempt foreigners, with long hair and soiled linen, who fancied they were seeing American life and manners, and a few innocent, fourth-class respectabilities, who thought Mrs. Byrne was a queen of society and much preferred an evening in her brilliant salons when the talk was gay and the dinner toothsome, to their own dreary evening gathering round a leathery steak and a dish of boiled potatoes.

But this was not according to Mrs. Byrne's ambitions, and, as the months went by and the world of fashion did not come knocking at her door, the expectant amiability which had distinguished her during the early days of her marriage, slowly departed. Her outbreaks of temper were at first infrequent. There were many cheerful evenings when Mrs. Byrne, in a sumptuous dress, diamond rings plentifully displayed on her thick fingers, diamond earrings in her ears, diamond pins in the meshes of her golden curls and coils, sat at her end of the dinner table and with good-humored, uninterrupted fluency, regaled her lord with that day's gathering of gossip.

Now and then, however, there were evenings when the household realized that things had not gone well with Mrs. Jeremiah Byrne. The pet skye terrier felt it in the high crys of execration directed toward him and the kick administered in his well-covered ribs. The servants felt it in the shrill note of shrewish fault-finding, which followed them from bedroom to parlor, to kitchen and cellar. But most of all did Jeremiah Bryne feel it. He saw it in the thickly powdered visage of his consort, when, on his return from business, he met her in the hall, and the sight of her made him quail and cower.

When they sat down to dinner the presence of that scowling face at the other end of the table took the spirit and heart out of Jeremiah Byrne. His fellow-men would not have recognized him, for he was at best a rough-mannered, loud-voiced sort of man. Now he was docile and timidly deprecating. He asked with the solicitude of a lover about the health and welfare of his wife. Her short and surly answers—at times lengthened by an acidulous comment on the absurdity of Mr. Byrne affecting a pretended interest in her well-being—did not appear to discourage him. He made conversation—that scandal-spiced conversation to which Mrs. Byrne so seriously inclined, but even this did not dispel the cloud upon his oompanion's brow. Finally he would say in the piping tones of fawning conciliation:

"Well, little girlie, it seems to me you're pretty quiet this evening. What's wrong?"

To this the little girlie would reply with extreme ferocity that if Mr. Byrne had a single ray of affection for her he would try to soothe her troubled spirit, aud not aggravate her by asking idiotic questions. Then, in an even-rising crescendo, would follow a disertation on Mr. Byrne's generally brutal treatment of his second wife. By means of some very complicated and subtle reasoning it would be shown that Mr. Byrne was directly responsible for the social slights offered Mrs. Byrne. After this the lady, her wrath even gaining in shrillness of tone and force of adjective, would veer off and begin a vigorous attack on the first Mrs. Byrne, who had formed a cabal against her and was seeking to ruin her absolutely. Mr. Byrne's feeble protests were quite drowned, and he sat silent, staring down at his dinner with sick apathy. The servants in the kitchen stood about silently listening, and mightily enjoying the strife. They did not care which was the victor, but they took a sportsmanlike interest in the fray.

In the course of the three years following his second marriage the outside world noticed but little change in Jeremiah Byrne. It was in the fourth year from this event that a mishap overtook him which changed the whole current of his life and transformed him into an old man. Without warning or preparation, Fortune, that had so long smiled on him, suddenly frowned. In one dizzying revolution of her wheel Jeremiah Byrne came to financial wreck. His collapse was sudden and complete. The money with which his second wife was to conquer society and be respectable upon vanished like dew on the grass.

It came upon them suddenly, and stupefied them in the sweeping directness of the calamity. To both of these two poverty was the most acutely detestable ill that life could inflict. There was still enough money to render them meagrely comfortable, but meagre comfort is not prodigal luxury. Four years of French gowns and good dinners and choice wines and costly jewelry had not fitted the second Mrs. Jeremiah Byrne for a life of ill-made woolen wrappers, cheap flats, one overworked servant and four-bit Zinfandel.

During the moving and the hiring and fitting-out of the little flat in that unfashionable quarter of the city which is known among the vulgar as "Cow Hollow," Mrs. Byrne was too much occupied to have time for indulging her temper. But when the flurry and excitement was over, and life had shaken itself down in the new, narrow groove, when the remains of her fine wardrobe began to look shabby and frayed, and the slip-shod servant woman was boldly impudent and enunciated some rankling home-truths; when the wretchedly cooked dinner was partaken of opposite a silent, broken-down man, with neither courage or heart left in him, then Mrs. Byrne's never very tightly fettered temper broke its bonds, and rampant in its rasped irritability, crushed and ground the terrified household into cowering silence.

A year of this life broke down Jeremiah Byrne completely. His former friends supposed his loss of fortune had worked the transformation, and went about saying that "the poor old boy had lost his grip." Mrs. Byrne caught the expression, and, liking it, sounded it constantly for her husband's delectation. She was also fond of expatiating to him on her poverty, of refusing to go out with him because of the ragged condition of her wardrobe, of deploring the coarsened aspect of her once fat, white hands. She felt very bitterly that he had not picked himself up again and remade his fortune. The first wife had had fully five years of plenty; she had had only three. This thought filled her with a gnawing envy.

One day, while walking on Montgomery street, in the pretense of being still a man of business, Jeremiah Byrne saw a vision, a vision of his old life. A woman, a lad and a young girl advanced up the street together, and this young girl seemed to be his first wife as she had been in the days when he had courted her. He stood staring for a moment in stupified bewilderment, then crept into a doorway, and from this point of vantage watched them as they approached.

He knew them by this time—his wife and two children. They advanced, walking rapidly, the two younger ones laughing and talking. It was only five years since he had seen them, but they had changed almost past recognition. His wife had passed into a saddened middle age. The youth of the [illegible] was stamped on her faded face. But the children had blossomed into a splendid youth, full of vigor and a brilliant prophecy. Their clear eyes swept him with an unrecognizing gaze, bright with lingering laughter and all-conquering hope. The girl was as her mother had been, feature for feature. As she passed him by, fresh as a rose in her gracious youth, it was like a vision from another life—a life which had passed away for all time.

Jeremiah Byrne emerged from the doorway and stood looking after them, staring blankly through the glare of afternoon. Men jostled him, but being "a poor devil who had lost his grip," he was getting used to this and paid no heed. With a motionless glance he followed the three figures down the street until they had passed out of sight, then turned, and with hanging hands and vacant eyes walked away.

That evening at dinner he found his wife more than usually bitter. She had quarreled with the servant, and had been threatened with a lawsuit by her dressmaker, and the woman in the flat below, a poor music teacher, had refused to respond to her friendly advances. The rasped spirit of Mrs. Byrne seethed with anger. Through dinner she was spasmodically fierce, throwing into the heavy silence an occasional remark, which she hoped would provoke Jeremiah to a show of hostility, when she might vent the full venom of her spleen upon him. But Jeremiah was silent, wrapt in some dull memory which made him imperious to her thrusts. Finally, as they sat drearily over the remnants of the ill-cooked feast, she made a last effort, and broke out violently into that subject which to her was ever fraught with a secret smarting pain—the first Mrs. Byrne.

Then Jeremiah raised his head, and for the first and last time spoke out all the misery within him. The vision of that afternoon had rekindled a flash of fire in his deadened heart, and he spoke with the energy of hatred and despair. With the realization of all she had done burnt into his brain, he gave full vent to his passion, and the voice of his accusing indignation was fierce and hopeless. It was a terrible indictment, and Mrs. Byrne heard him out, sitting white and still.

That was the last flicker of the candle, however. It was Jeremiah Byrne's last revolt. In one white-hot moment of unbearable bitterness he had slipped his bonds. Then the old habit of fear and submission settled back upon him, and rebellion was swamped forever in waves of hopeless inertia.

MISSION SAN JUAN CAPISTRANO

Where No Man Pursueth

By W. S. B.

John Renton stood in the living room of his flat and gazed around him. It was half-past eight in the evening. He had sent his servant across the bay on a manufactured errand, and he was alone—but not for long—for he was waiting—waiting for the woman who filled his life with fragrance, none the less sweet because she bloomed in another's gardens, and to-night she was coming. Already he seemed to hear her light footsteps upon the stairs, her swift touch upon the electric bell, when he would open quickly the door, and the next moment she would be in his arms, her cheeks cold with the breath of the night wind, but her lips warm as her throbbing heart, half triumphant, wholly in love, wholly his—and alone.

She had written to him that she would come at nine. Her husband, she said, had been suddenly called out of town and the evening was her own. Her loving husband who idolized her, but—he was sixty and she was twenty-four. Renton was thirty-five and her husband's partner in literary work. For twelve years now they had collaborated in plays, and success for long had been theirs. No drama was so sought by managers, none so eagerly expected by the public, as one of those that bore the cachet of Palgrave and Renton. This very night two of their plays were in process of presentation at rival theatres on the avenue, and at both every seat had been long before sold. Palgrave was already rich. Renton rapidly growing so. Renton knew that everything he had was due to Palgrave, and that Palgrave loved him as a son—with a love second only to that he lavished upon Madelaine. He knew that every law of honor and of civilization called upon him in trumpet tones to respect the home of his collaborator, his benefactor, his best and dearest friend. Hundreds of resolutions he had made, only to break them all. How often in the silence of the night, as he lay awake, his head and heart pulsing with the realization of his moral degredation, he had determined to end this affair suddenly and forever. Determined it with all the strength of a nature naturally forceful and healthy. But the next view of Madeline was enough to swing the pendulum back again. The turn of her head, the glisten of her eye, the fragrance of her hair, the touch of her hand in a moment destroyed every resolution; the carefully rehearshed speech of cold and moral platitudes vanished into the inarticulate murmers of love, and all his passions called from deep unto deep. * * * * * *

He had resolved again that to-night would end it at last; but that he must see her to-night, To-night should witness the crowning glory of a passion great as any of the loves of history and to-morrow—it made him shudder to think of it—but to-morrow they should pass from each other's lives forever. To-night should be all his and all her's, to-morrow should belong to the proprieties. So he stood waiting for his friend's wife, and looked around to see that all was prepared for her reception. Always of an educated luxury of taste, Renton, since he had begun have the means to supply it, had indulged his artistic sense to the utmost. The rugs, tapestries, pictures and bronzes were of the rarest—even his working table, where he and Palgrave had often sat late into the night working out some new thought, some dramatic inspiration, was of the most precious Florentine carving. The very knife with which he sharpened a pencil or opened a letter was a gold inlaid and jeweled handled stiletto which in a bygone century had been plunged into the side of a Bourbon Prince. On this table now stood a great vase of jasmine—Madelaine's favorite flower, upon the mantle stood another; roses were everywhere—here a great handful of Souvenirs de Malmaison—there a single glowing American Beauty in an artistic vase.

On an antique sideboard stood a bottle of Tokay—Madelaine liked a sweet wine—together with a silver dish of grapes and a Royal Sevres plate piled with macaroons and marrons glace—for she was delicate in her taste, this Madelaine. She could not deceive her palate, as she did her husband. All was ready, nothing had been forgotten. The stage was set for the entrance of The Queen of Love.

With a sigh, half satisfaction half impatience, Renton looked around the room, and his glance rested on the clock—quarter of nine now. In a few minutes more—ah! by heavens, it was the bell! She had stolen quietly to the door while he was in his reveie, and he had not heard the dear footsteps. To make up for his stupidity he hastens to the door; he throws it open—but it is not Madelaine. A messenger-boy stands there instead, and with professional calmness offers him a note. A glance at the superscription is enough. It is from Madelaine. Something must be wrong, she must be ill, she must be afraid. He tears it open. It is without preface or signature—a mere hasty sctawl an yellow messenger paper, but every unwavering stroke of the pencil shows the deadly heartsick fear that quivered in the writer's hand. It read: "I cannot come. He has returned, and [illegible]. I do not understand. Take care." He read it again—not that he needed to, for every line seemed seared upon his brain. "He goes at once to see you." "Take care." Renton was physically brave enough, but the horror, the defenselessness of his situation and of her's struck him like a blow in the face. He crushed the wretched little note in his hand and leaned against the wall. The door was still open into the street, and a cold wind blew in that made his nerves shiver, though he did not feel it. The messenger regarded him incuriously. "Any answer," he asked. "No," said Reton. "Then sign here," said the messenger, and presented his trip-slip that Renton mechanically signed. The boy turned and walked down the steps. Still mechanically Renton closed the door and stood for a moment in the hall. Then he turned to ascend the short flight of stairs. He had slowly passed up two or three steps when the door bell rang again—a loud, prolonged, insistent peal. Hardly knowing what he did, Renton turned, retraced his steps and opened the door again. As he did so, Palgrave stepped into the hall. Even at this supreme moment mechanism of custom moved within Renton, although somewhat rustily, and he said, with an approach to his natural manner and voice:

"Good evening. Glad to see you."

Palgrave did not look at him or answer, or even remove his hat, but brushed by Renton, and, in silence, but swiftly, mounted the stairs and passed into the sitting-room. In silence Renton followed him. On slow feet he seemed to drag his heavy heart upwards. "Does he suspect—does he know," he asked himself with each step. In the sitting-room he found Palgrave standing, his back to the fire, his hat still on his head.

"Won't you sit down," asked Renton tentatively. He had determined to appear to notice nothing peculiar in the other's manner.

"No," said Palgrave, shortly. "I will not," and he fixed his eyes on Renton with a gloomy stare. "But do you sit dowu. I would rather you reposed while I talk to you. It will take some time." Renton fell into, rather than sat down, in the chair at his writing table. His stomach heaved with a deadly nausea. Was this haggard man with eyes of fire who stared at him so fixedly his patient, studious old friend and fellow workman? Yes, it was he, surely, but transmuted in some terrible crucible. The question, "Does he suspect, does he know," that had been ringing through his head, as the sleighbells of the murdered Jew jangled in the conscience of Matthias, since Palgrave stepped across the threshold seemed to furnish its own answer with a sickening certainty. "He suspects, he knows," and then with the insistence of self-preservation, "My God! what shall I do?"

"I have called, said Palgrave, speaking with intense repression, to consult you about a new play."

Renton almost screamed aloud with sudden relief. "He does not know."

"Yes, and what is it? A comedy, a——"

Palgrave interrupted him. "Do I look like a man who had a comedy in mind? No, sir. My play is a tragedy, dark and terrible."

Again that curious nausea swelled Renton's throat. "The subject?" he asked.

Palgrave regarded him unwinkingly. "The eternal subject," he answered. "My tragedy has but three parts to be filled. The trusting husband, the faithless wife, the false friend." An electric current seems to shoot down Renton's spine, leaving his body as cold as ice. He felt that even his lips were like the lips of the dead. He could scarcely gather them together to articulate. "An old subject, and worn out. Now, I have an idea of a comedy——"

"Stop, sir," fairiy thundered Palgrave." and then with the same repression, "Do not dare to interrupt my thought. I say it shall be a tragedy, and we shall work it out together, you and I. You say it is a worn-out subject. I deny it. It is old, but as I said, eternal. Imagine me as the unhappy husband, imagine Madelaine as the erring wife, imagine—for illustration merely—yourself as the false friend. Imagine the husband—easy-going fool that he is—to have discovered all. Take those for your hypothesis. I have thought all that out. I do not need your assistance for that part of the story. Where my imagination fails is in the revenge that the husband should take upon the lover. It must be no ordinary revenge. It must be terrible, merciless as hell and mysterious as the act of God. A revenge that will make women scream and men turn ghastly. Furnish me with that and we will furnish the world's greatest modern tragedy."

Palgrave never took his eyes off Renton while he was speaking, nor moved from his position. All-knowing as a deity, implacable as fate, he seemed to Renton to read his miserable secret as it writhed in his convulsed soul. In one of the drawers of the table at which he sat was a revolver, a mere toy which he had purchased on account of its beauty, but fully loaded, and within its limitations, deadly. His hand moved toward it. Slowly as it moved Palgrave saw it instantly. In a stride he stood by Renton.

"Sit still," he said, fiercely. "Your movements interrupt my thoughts. What are you reaching for?"

The room reeled around Renton. "I am faint," he muttered.

"Faint," said Palgrave, and looked around the room. "I do not wonder. Look at those flowers, That jasmine is enough to make anyone sick by itself. I had to stop Madelaine from using it in our house. Permit me." He swept the jasmine and the roses into a glowing armful and flung them into the wide fireplace. "Let me give you something to drink—a glass of brandy." He stepped to the sideboard. "What's this? Tokay, grapes, macaroons, marrons? It is no wonder that you are faint if you use such stuff as this. You have a woman's taste, Renton," and he stood frowning at him.

To Renton the room whirled more and more; spasmodically his hand closed on the jeweled dagger of the Bourbons; he half rose from his seat, and then all was darkness. He was aroused by feeling the air cool on his face. He was at his open window, and Palgrave was supporting him.

"You are all right now," said the other more naturally. "Your liver must be in a beastly condition. I will leave you now. Madeline will be expecting me. I will see you to-morrow and talk further with you about my tragedy." He pressed his hat down over his eyes and left the room. As in a dream Renton heard him descend the stairs, open the door, pass through, close it after him, and listened to his steps sounding fainter and fainter down the street. He had gone! In his revulsion of feeling he fell upon his knees.

Thank God! He does not suspect; he does not know."

* * * * * *

That night Renton wrote a short letter to Palgrave. He said his health was more greatly undermined than he had believed. He was a creature of impulse, he was going, then, at once. He would be gone an indefinite period. Palgrave must get another collaborator. Perhaps he would never see him again. Then he left, and the next morning was speeding eastward far from the scene of last night's horror.

* * * * * *

"Curious young man, Renton," said Palgrave next morning to Madelaine. "Given up great prospects to go off like that. They had just finished reading Renton's letter. What do you make of it?"

Madelaine was pouring coffee, but her hand never trembled, though her heart was tolling a requeim for her lost love. She seemed to see her husband sitting a thousand miles away. In a voice that sounded to herself to be small and far off, she answered: "I think, dear, he is going to get married."

"I hope not, sweetheart," said Palgrave, tenderly, "for marriage is a lottery, and and there are few such prizes as you."

And he kissed her on the lips.

COSMOPOLITAN SAN FRANCISCO

The Remarkable Confusion of Races in the City's "Quarter."

In a way San Francisco is not a city—or rather let us say, it is not one city. It is several cities. Make the circuit of these several cities and by the time you have come to the severalth you may say with some considerable degree of truth; "I have seen Peking and have walked the streets of Mexico, have looked on the life of Madrid, have rubbed elbows with Naples and Genoa, glanced in at Yokohama, even—though more remotely, perhaps—have known Paris and Berlin.

What is true of San Francisco is true of California. As yet we, out here, on the fringe of the continent, with the ocean before and the desert behind us, are not a people, we are peoples—agglomerate rather than conglomerate. All up and down the coast from Mexico to Oregon are scattered "little" Italies, "little" Spains, "little" Chinas, and even "little" Russias—settlements, colonies, tiny groups of nationalities flung off from the parent stock, but holding tightly to themselves, unwilling to mix and forever harking back to their native lands.

But it is a rather curious fact that, though the Anglo-Saxons are the great mining peoples, and though the confusien of nations in California is due almost solely to the rush for gold, it is, nevertheless, the Latin and not the German races are in greater evidence among us. Ireland has stopped in New York and Boston and on the Atlantic sea board, and it is hard to coax Germany across the Mississippi.

It is not hard to understand why Mexico should be here, and Spain is readily accounted for. But why the Chinaman? There are two almost iron-clad tendencies against his presence. First, the tendency in obedience to which nations move from East to West, and second, the bred-in-the-bone tendency of the Chinaman to stay where is put, to live and labor and die within a ten mile radius of his birthplace. No nation in the world is more tenacious of the hearthstone than the Mongolian. Yet, of all the foreign colonies in California and San Francisco, none are larger or more distinct than the Chinese. A curious state of affairs when you think about it, and for which you can offer no explanation.

By way of parenthesis—and though they are only apparent by traces of former occupation—think for a moment how narrowly California escaped an influx of the Russians. Somewhere in the interior of Big White Land there must have been a tremendous crowding force along in the middle of the century, crowding the Russians up and up and up on to the shoulder of their country till they slid off and over into Alaska. They spread phenomenally and came steadily southward. There is even record of a clash between them and the early settlers. Sutter's fort, so an old guardian of the place once told me, was built ostensibly against the Indians, but in reality to resist the encroachment of the Russians. The Russian himself has left indications of himself in a block house or two or a fort or two, and even in the geographical names such as the Russian River. But no doubt the Alaskan purchase checked immigration from that quarter.

The aggregation of "little" Mexico, Italy and the like that makes a place for itself in San Francisco lies over on the other side of Chinatown and beyond the Barbary Coast. A good way to reach it is to follow the alleys of Chinatown, beginning at Waverley Place and going on through Spofford Alley and Gamblers' Alley, till you come out near Luna's restaurant. Strike out in any direction from Luna's and in a sense you will travel a thousand miles at every step. The best time to see "The Quarter," as Anglo-Saxon San Francisco has come to call the place, is on a Saturday evening, between seven and eight o'clock, along in August or early September. "All the world" is on the streets at that time, and not a store has its shutters up. The very fruit stalls are open for business.

There is no suggestion of the Anglo Saxon; neither in the speech of the sidewalk strollers, nor in the shop windows, nor in the wording of signs and advertisements; nor, fortunately in the general demeanor and behavior of the people. They are wine-drinkers essentially, and they know how to drink. There must be some—as yet unexplained—connection between malt drinks and truculence. Occasionally—at large intervals—an inhabitant of San Francisco's Quarter knifes or pistols his fellow, but there is no fighting in the Quarter. The Latin is disputatious rather than quarrelsome, and when angry with his brother, with or without cause, prefers unostentatious murder to brutal thumpings, swung chairs and hurled bottles.

Then, too, our Mexicans, Italians and other people of the Quarter, take their pleasure in a different way. It is a grim and significant fact that when the German and the Irishman set about their amusement they go away from their homes. The Irishman, besides, goes away from his wife and children—one is speaking now of the mass of them. He forgathers with individuals of his own sex and disports himself in saloons and bars and the public parks, and his enjoyment is not complete unless he embroils himself in a fight. The German organizes interminable, more or less solemn, "basket picnics" on Sundays, locks up his house and goes "across the bay" for the day. You may see these families coming home by the score on any of the ferry boats late Sunday afternoon. The children's hats are stuck full of oak leaves, and the lunch baskets are crammed with wilted wildflowers.

The Latin inhabitant of San Francisco's Quarter takes his holiday at home. He—or she—lives in the street. Even when indoors the windows are wide open. The doorstep and open windows answer the purposes of the club. They are coigns of vantage where one may see the world go by. The women on the doorstep, the men on the sidewalk and the children in the street, is the arrangement most frequently met with.

On Sundays, the Anglo-Saxon goes to the country, the Latin goes to church and to mass. In the afternoon he amuses himself chez lui, goes to the theater, if he can, and crowds the gallery if there be an opera in town. In the evening he dines with his family at a restaurant, staying there, be it understood, until bedtime. Occasionally you will find him in one of the Bocce courts underneath Telegraph Hill, absorbed in the game, which one is inclined to believe is the stupidest game ever conceived by the mind of man.

Little Japan is more scattered, Yokohama is broken into bits of marquetry and set here and there in San Francisco, in back courts and cul de sacs and streets that have no outlet. The Jap is too eager for Western customs to keep his individuality long. He becomes Americanized as soon as he may. However, he organizes fencing clubs, which seem to be quite a feature of his social life among his fellows. On Sundays these clubs meet, (there is one of them in a court off Geary street, not far from Powell, and another in a small Japanese colony in Prospect Place, off Pine, between Powell and Stockton streets). The Japs get into their native regalia and fence with bamboo swords from dawn to dark. It is a strange idea of amusement, but no stranger than the Celt's love for actual fighting.

And the Chinaman. One leaves him to the last, for the sake of the last word, if ever there can be a last word said of the Chinaman. He is in the city but not of it. His very body must be carried back to Canton after his death, whither his money has gone already. He has brought to San Francisco and implanted here the atmosphere of the Mysterious East, that—short stories and Chinese plays to the contrary—must always remain an unknown, unknowable element o the West. No two races the world round could be more opposite than the Mongolian and Anglo-Saxon that are placed side by side in the streets of this strange city of the Occident. The Saxon is outspoken, the Mongolian indirect; the one is frank, the other secretive; the one is aggressive, the other stealthy; the one fears neither God, man nor the devil, the other is ridden with superstitions; the one is brusque, the other patient to infinity; the one is immoderate, the other self-restrained. But—it is well to remember this—the Chinaman is high-tempered and passionate to a degree, with finely-tempered nerves and much more sensitive temperament that the Westerner would care to give him credit for. His policy of self-repression is deceiving. In every Chinaman there is something of the snake and a good deal of the cat. If one knew him better one would hesitate longer before injuring him. He remembers things. The Presbyterian Mission is all very well, the police force and special detectives are all very well, but we can never know anything of the real Chinaman, can never have any real influence upon him, either to better his moral condition, or punish his crimes. Where else, in what other city in the world, could the Tongs fight with impunity from street to street? Where else would Little Pete have been shot to death in a public place and his murderers escape beyond all hope of capture?

With the Chinaman curiosity is considered a vice—almost a crime. Chinatown in San Francisco is as foreign to us—much more so—than a village in the interior of France or Spain. As a consequence Saxon visitors must be equally foreign in the eyes of the livers in Chinatown. If you went through a hamlet in France or Germany, far enough off the railroad, you would be stared out of countenance. Every doorway and window would be filled after your passage, and the very dogs would bark at your heels. But how is it with the visitor in Chinatown? Get down into the very lowest quarter, where the slave-girls are kept, where the Cantonese live, where Chinatown is most Chinese: Of the hundreds of silently shuffling Chinamen, not one will turn to look at you—they will hardly make way for you. You may go into their shops, their tea houses, their restaurants, their clubs, their temples—almost into their very living rooms—to those thousands of slit-like, slanting eyes you do not so much as exist.

F. N.

Perverted Tales.

EDITED BY FRANK NORRIS

The discovery of California by the editors of the Big Four Magazines of the East has had the lamentable result of crowding from their exalted places, heretofore so secure, a number of the world's most fascinating story-tellers. Their places have been filled from the ranks of that little army of youthful volunteers known as Les Jeunes. As a lamentable result old idols have been overthrown, old gods forgotten, and the children in the market place no longer dance to the tune of the old pipes. Where once the old favorite received a check, he now receives a printed form with veiled reference to availability, guarded allusions to the plans of the editor—and his story. With the view to stemming the perverse tide of popular favor—whose ebb and flow are not reducible to any known law—and, if only for a moment, sounding again the old notes once so compelling, the editors of this paper have secured for publication a few of these rejected tales and here submit them to the public of the West. Their genuineness is as Caesar's wife, and if intional evidence were wanting the opinions of experts in type-writing have been secured, which place their authenticity beyond fear and beyond reproach.

THE 'RICKSHA THAT HAPPENED.

By R————D K————G.

Ching-a-ring-a-ring ching-chaw
Ho, dinkum darkey.—The unedited diary of Bahlamooca Tah.

Jam yesterday and jam to-morrow
But never jam to-day.—Native Proverb.

"Who's all right? Rudyard! Who? Rudyard!" —Barrack-room ballad.

There was a man once—but that's another story. Personally, I do not believe much of this story, however, you may have it for what it is worth, to me it was worth five thousand dollars per thousand words.

A friend of mine, who is a jinricksha down by Benares, told me this tale one hot evening outside the Tiddledtypore gate. In the telling of it he spat reflectively and often into the moat. Chaprassi simpkin peg, as Mrs. Hawkseye says.

Mulligatawney, who is a private soldier and who dines with me at table d'hote on Thursdays, and who shares my box at the opera, says the tale is cheap at a gallon and a half of beer.

"Pwhat nex!" exclaimed Mulligatawney, when he heard it, shifting his quid to the other side of his mouth (we were at table). "It's jaddoo, that's phwat ut is. 'Tis flyin' in the face uv natoor to trifle with such brutil and licenshous soldiery as me and Orf-of-this an' Lear-eyed." Here he stole a silver spoon to hide his emotion. "Choop, sez oi to im." said Mulligatawney, filling himself another jinricksha, "choop, an' he chooped, like ghairun gone clane dal-bat an' Kipiri in hot weather. I waz only a recruity then. But I waz a corpril wanst. I was rejuced aftherwards, but I waz a corpril wanst," and he stared mournfully at the dying embers in the jinricksha.

We are a terrible bad lot out here in Indiana, but we can't help that. Here a man's whole duty is to lie doggo and not help that. Here a man's whole duty is to lie doggo and not ekka more than once a week, and to pray for a war. Also he may keep a jinricksha in his stable if he can afford it. As that wonderful woman, Mrs. Hawkseye, says: "It better to bustee in a jampanni than to have your jinricksha puckarowed." But that's her affair.

Stepterfechit had just come out from home. Now when a man comes out from home, if he is not jinrickshaed at the pier landing, he generally does one of three things (jampanni chorah simpkin bungalow), either he dies with swiftness, which is bad, or lives with swiftness, which is worse or marries, which is the worst of all. "A single man," says my friend Mulligatawney, "is an ornamint to the service." But as Lear-eyed observes, "when a mon is tewed wi' a lass he's lokri in a bunder, nothing but dikh," and he flung himself (seven foot four of British soldier), full length upon his jinricksha.

Stepterfechit knew as much of Life (Life with a big L) as a weaning child, until I, who have seen everything worth seeing, and done everything worth doing, and have known everything worth knowing, from Indian magic to the cleaning of codfish, took him in hand. He began by contradicting his colonel, and went on from that to making love to Mrs. Hawkseye (till that lady told him he was a bungalow, with no more pukaree than a dacoit), and wound up by drinking too much jinricksha at his club.

Now, when a man takes to the jinricksha he is very likely to end at the shroff. So I spoke to the Major. You may hit a marumutta over the head at the beginning of your acquaintance, but you must not soap the tail of a kitten that belongs to a Ryotwary, unless you are prepared to prove it on his front teeth. It takes some men a life time to find this out, but the knowledge is useful. Sempkin peg, do re mi fa, ching-a-ring-a-ring-ching-chaw, but that's another story. We arrived—the Major and I—at Stepterfetchit's dak-bungalow on a red hot evening, when the heat blanketed the world like a hot towel round a swelled head. We nearly killed the jinricksha in getting there, but a mountain bred can gawbry more jhil than you would care to believe.

"Hark!" said the Major. We paused on the threshold and the silence of the Indian twilight gathered us in its hollow palms. We both heard a sound that came from Stepterfetchit's window. It was the ticking of an eight-day clock.

People write and talk lightly of blood running cold and of fear and all that sort of thing, but the real sensation is quite too terrible to be trifled with. As the Major and I heard the ticking of that eight-day clock, it is no lie to say that the bhisti mussick turned shikary in our khitmatgar. We were afraid. The Major entered the bungalow and I followed and salaamed the door behind me.

The jinricksha lay dead on the charpoy in Stepterfetchit's room. Stepterfetchit must have killed it hours before. "We came too late," groaned the Major. We made no attempt to keep from crying—I respected my self for that. But we gathered up the pieces of the jinricksha and sent them to Stepterfetchit's people at Home.

So now you know what I know of the Ricksha that never was.

Stepterfetchit is now a plate-layer somewhere down near Bareilly, on the line of the railroad, where the Kharki water tanks that the Rajah of Bathtub built out of stolen government money, when the commissariat bullock train was puckarowed by Pathans, in the days of the old budmash Mahommud Dinare, and Mulligatawney is away annexing Burmah. When he heard of the affair he said:

"If a punkah is goin' to ayah niver loose your grip, but I waz a corpril wanst, I was rejuced aftherwards," which is manifestly unfair.

Mrs. Hawkseye says that a "jinricksha in the hand gathers no moss"—but that's another story.

THE GREEN STONE OF UNREST.

By S——N CR-- —E.

A Mere Boy stood on a pile of blue stones. His attitude was regardant. The day was seal brown. There was a vermillion valley containing a church. The church's steeple aspired strenuously in a direction tangent to the earth's center. A pale wind mentioned tremendous facts under it's breath with certain effort at concealment to seven not-dwarfed poplars on an un-distant mauve hilltop.

The Mere Boy was a brilliant blue color. The effect of the scene was not un-kaleidoscopic.

After a certain appreciable duration of time the Mere Boy abandoned his regardant demeanor. The strenuously aspiring church steeple no longer projected itself upon his consciousness. He found means to remove himself from the pile of blue stones. He set his face valleyward. He proceeded.

The road was raw umber. There were in it wagon ruts. There were in it pebbles, Naples yellow in color. One was green. The Mere Boy allowed the idea of the green pebble to nick itself into the sharp edge of the disc of his Perception.

"Ah," he said, "a green pebble."

The rather pallid wind communicated another Incomprehensible Fact to the parenchymatous trees. It would appear that the poplars understood.

"Ah," repeated the Mere Boy, "a Green Pebble."

"Sho-o," remarked the wind.

The Mere Boy moved appreciably forward. If there were a thousand men in a procession and nine hundred and ninety-nine should suddenly expire, the one man who was remnant would assume the responsibility of the procession.

The Mere Boy was an abbreviated procession.

The blue Mere Boy transported himself diagonally athwart the larger landscape, printed in four colors, like a poster.

On the uplands were chequered squares made by fields, tilled and otherwise. Cloud-shadows moved from square to square It was as if the Sky and Earth was playing a tremendous game of chess.

By and by the Mere Boy observed an Army of a Million Men. Certain canon, like voluble but non-committal toads with hunched backs, fulminated vast hiccoughs at unimpassioned intervals. Their own invulnerableness was offensive.

An officer of blue serge waved a sword, like a picture in a school history. The non-committal toads pullulated with brief red pimples and swiftly relapsed to impassivity.

The line of the Army of a Million Men obnubilated itself in whiteness as a line of writing is blotted with a new blotter.

"Go teh blazes b'Jimminey," remarked the Mere Boy. "What yeh's shooting fur. They might be people in that field."

He was terrific in his denunciation of such negligence, He debated the question of his ir-removability.

"If I'm goin' teh be shot," he observed; "If I'm goin' teh be shot, b'Jimminy——"

* * * * * * * *

A Thing lay in the little hollow.

The little hollow was green.

The Thing was pulpy white. Its eyes were white. It had blackish-yellow lips. It was beautifully spotted with red, like tomato stains on a rolled napkin.

The yellow sun was dropping on the green plain of the earth, like a twenty-dollar gold piece falling on the baize cloth of a gaming table.

The blue serge officer abruptly discovered the punctured Thing in the Hollow. He was struck with the ir-remediableness of the business.

"Gee," he murmured with interest. "Gee, it's a Mere Boy."

The Mere Boy had been struck with seventy-seven rifle bullets. Seventy had struck him in the chest, seven in the head. He bore close resemblance to the top of a pepper castor.

He was dead.

He was obsolete.

As the blue serge officer bent over him he became aware of a something in the Thing's hand.

It was a green pebble.

"Gee," exclaimed the blue serge officer. "A green pebble, gee."

The large Wind evolved a threnody with reference to the seven un-distant poplars.

A HERO OF TOMATO CAN.

By B——— H———TH.

Mr. Jack Oak-hearse calmly rose from the table and shot the bartender of Tomato Can, because of the objectionable color of his hair. Then Mr. Oak-hearse scratched a match on the sole of his victim's boot, lit a perfumed cigarette and strolled forth into the street of the camp to enjoy the evening air. Mr. Oak-hearse's face was pale and impassive, and stamped with that indefinable hauteur that marks the professional gambler. Tomato Can knew him to be a 'cool, desperate man. The famous Colonel Blue-bottle was reported to have made the remark to Miss Honorine-Sainte-Claire, when that leader of society opened the Pink Assembly at Toad-in-the-Hole, on the other side of the Divide, that he, Colonel Blue-bottle, would be everlastingly "—— ——ed if he didn't believe that that —— ——ed Oak-hearse would open a ——ed jack-pot on a pair of ——ed tens, ——ed if he didn't." To which Miss Ste.-Claire had responded:

"Fancy now."

On this occasion as Mr. Jack Oak-hearse stepped in the cool evening air of the Sierra's from out of the bar of the hotel of Tomato Can, he drew from his breast pocket a dainty manicure set and began to trim and polish his slender, almost feminine finger nails, that had been contaminated with the touch of the greasy cards. Thus occupied he betook himself leisurely down the one street of Tomato Can, languidly dodging an occasional revolver bullet, and stepping daintily over the few unburied corpses that bore mute testimony to the disputatious and controversial nature of the citizens of Tomato Can. He arrived at his hotel and entered his apartments, gently waving aside the half-breed Mexican who attempted to disembowel him on the threshold. The apartment was crudely furnished as befitted the rough and ready character of the town of Tomato Can. The Wilton carpet on the floor was stained with spilt Moet and Chandon. The full-length portrait of Mr. Oak-hearse by Carolus Duran was punctured with bullet marks, while the teak-wood escritoire, inlaid with buhl and jade, was encumbered with bowie knives, spurs and Mexican saddles.

Mr. Oak-hearse's valet brought him the London and Vienna papers. They had been ironed, and scented with orris root, and the sporting articles blue-penciled.

"Bill," said Mr. Oak-hearse, "Bill, I believe I told you to cut out all the offensive advertisements from my papers; I perceive, with some concern, that you have neglected it. Your punishment shall be that you will not brush my silk hat next Sunday morning."

The valet uttered an inarticulate cry and fell lifeless to the floor.

"It's better to stand pat on two pair than to try for a full hand," mused Mr. Oak-hearse, philosophically, and his long lashes drooped wearily over his cold steel-blue eyes, like velvet sheathing a poignard.

A little later the gambler entered the dining-room of the hotel in evening-dress, and wearing his cordon of the Legion of Honor. As he took his accustomed place at the table, he was suddenly aware of a lustrous pair of eyes that looked into his cold gray ones from the other side of the catsup bottle. Like all heroes, Mr. Jack Oak-hearse was not insensible to feminine beauty. He bowed gallantly. The lady flushed. The waiter handed him the menu.

"I will have a caviar sandwich," affirmed the gambler with icy impassivity. The waiter next handed the menu to the lady, who likewise ordered a caviar sandwich.

"There is no more," returned the waiter. "The last one has just been ordered."

Mr. Oak-hearse started, and his pale face became even paler. A preoccupied air came upon him, and the lines of an iron determination settled upon his face. He rose, bowed to the lady, and calmly passed from the dining-room out into the street of the town and took his way toward a wooded gulch hard by.

When the waiter returned with the caviar sandwich he was informed that Mr. Oak-hearse would not dine that night. A triangular note on scented mauve paper was found at the office begging the lady to accept the sandwich from one who had loved not wisely but too many.

But next morning at the head of the gulch on one of the largest pine trees the searchers found an ace of spades (marked) pinned to the bark with a bowie knife. It bore the following, written in pencil with a firm hand:

Here lies the body
of
JOHN OAK-HEARSE,
who was too much of a gentleman to play a
Royal-flush against a Queen-full.

And so, pulseless and cold with a Derringer by his side and a bullet in his brain, though still calm as in life lay he who had been at once the pest and the pride of Tomato Can.

VAN BUBBLE'S STORY.

By R———D H———G D——S.

Young Charding-Davis had been a little unhappy all day long because on that particular morning the valet of his head serving man had made a mistake in the matter of his master's trousers, and it was not until he was breakfasting at Delmonico's some hours later that young Charding-Davis woke to the painful consciousness that he was wearing his serving-man's pants which were made by an unfashionable New York tailor. Young Charding-Davis himself ran over to London in his steam yacht once or twice a week to be fitted, so that the consequences of his serving-man's valet's mistake took away his appetite. The predicament troubled him so that he told the head cook about it, adding anxiously:

"What would you do about these trousers, Wallis?"

"I would keep 'em on, sir," said Wallis, touching his cap respectfully.

"That," said young Charding-Davis, with a sigh of relief, "is a good idea. Thank, you Wallis," Young Charding-Davis was so delighted at the novel suggestion that he tipped Wallis a little more generously than usual.

"Can you recommend a good investment for this," inquired Wallis," as he counted out the tip.

"Make a bid for the Pacific railroads," suggested young Charding-Davis, "or 'arrive' at the Savoy Hotel."

That night he went to dinner at the house of the Girl He Knew, and in honor of the occasion and because he thought it would please the Girl He knew. young Charding-Davis put on a Yale sweater and football knickerbockers and the headdress of feathers he had captured from a Soudanese Arab while acting as war correspondent for an English syndicate. Besides this, he wore some of his decorations and toyed gracefully with a golf-stick. During the dinner, while young Charding-Davis was illustrating a new football trick he had just patented, with the aid of ten champagne bottles and the Girl's pet skye terrier, a great and celebrated English diplomat leaned across the table over the center piece of orchids and live humming birds, and said:

"I say, Davis, tell us how you came by some of your decorations and orders. Most interesting and extraordinary, you know."

Young Charding-Davis tossed the skye-terrier into air, and batted it thoughtfully the length of the room with his golf-stick, after the manner of Heavyflinger of the Harvard base-ball nine. Then he twirled the golf-stick in his fingers as a Zulu induna twirls his assegai—he had learned the trick while shooting elephant on the Zambesi river in South Africa. Then he smiled with becoming modesty as he glanced carelessly at the alarm-clock that hung around his neck, suspended by the blue ribbon of the order of the Pshaw of Persia.

"Really, they are mere trifles," he replied, easily. "I would not have worn them only my serving man insists it is good form. The Cham of Tartary gave me this," he continued, lightly touching a nickel-plated apple-pie that was pinned upon the sweater, "for leaving the country in twenty-four hours, and this chest protector was presented me by the French Legation in Kamschatka for protecting a a chest——but we'll let that pass," he said, enveloping himself with a smile of charming ingenuousness. "This is the badge of the Band of Hope to which I belong. I got this pie-plate from the Grand Mufti for conspicuous egoism in the absence of the enemy, and this Grand Army badge from a pawnbroker for four dollars. Then I have a few swimming medals for swimming across Whirlpool Rapids and a five-cent piece given me by Mr. Sage. I have several showcases full of other medals in my rooms. I'm thinking of giving an exhibition and reception, if I could get some pretty girls to receive with me. I've knocked about a bit, you know, and I pick them up here and there. I've crossed Africa two or three times, and I got up the late Greek war in order to make news for the New York papers, and I'm organizing an insurrection in South America for the benefit of a bankrupt rifle manufacturer who wants to dispose of some arms."

While Charding-Davis had been speaking young Van Bubbles, who was just out of the interior of Uganda, had been absent-mindedly drawing patterns in the tomato catsup he had spilled on the table-cloth.

"When I returned from Africa," he said, "this morning I had a curious experience." He fixed Charding-Davis with his glance for a moment, and then let it wander to a corner of the room and afterward drew it back and tied it to his chair leg. Charding-Davis grew a little pale, but he was too well bred to allow his feelings to overcome him. Young Van Bubbles contined:

"I met an old valet of mine on Fifth avenue, who has recently been engaged by the head serving man of one of wea ing a pair o trousers which seemed to me strangely familiar, and when I spoke to him about the matter, broke down and confessed that he had caused his master's master to exchange trousers with him. You see the point of the story is," concluded young Van Bubbles, untieing his glance, and allowing it to stray toward Charding-Davis, who drove it away with his golf-stick, "that the back-parlor hero wore his valet's trousers to-day.

There was a silence.

"What an extraordinary story," murmured the diplomat.

"Quite so," said the Girl Charding-Davis Knew.

"Of course," added Van Bubbles, "I took the trousers from him. Here they are," he continued, dropping them on the table. "You see they were no more use to him. I thought, perhaps—" and once more his glance crept slealthy toward young Charding-Davis—"you might suggest a way out of the difficulty." He handed the trousers to Charding-Davis, saying: "Keep them, they are a mere trifle, and they may be of some interest to you."

The Girl Charding-Davis Knew saw the point of Van Bubbles' story at once. Charding-Davis tried to catch her eye, but she refused to look at him, and said to her father.

"Why won't he go away; tell him to go away, please."

On the steps outside the house young Charding-Davis reflected what next he should do. He strolled slowly homeward, and, as he came into his rooms, his head serving-man handed him two notes which had arrived in his absence. One was from the Most Beautiful Woman in New York offering him her hand and fortune; the other was written on the back of a ten thousand dollar check, and was from the Editor of the Greatest Paper in the World begging him to accept the vacant throne of the Nyam-Nyam of Khooinooristan in the capacity of Special Correspondent.

"I wonder now," said young Charding-Davis, "which of these offers I shall accept."

AMBROSIA BEER.

By A———E B———E.

Sterling Hallmark was one of the most prominent and enthusiastic members of the Total Abstinence Union of San Francisco. His enthusiasm was not only of the passive description. He took a delight in aiding the police in their raids upon the unlicensed beer halls of the Barbary Coast. He helped them break whisky and brandy flasks, and he himself often opened the spigots of the beer kegs and let the foaming liquid run out upon the sanded floor.

On the night of the thirtieth of February, 1868, Sterling Hallmark led the police in a furious attack upon the "Hole in the Wall," a notorious subteranean dive in the vicinity of Jackson street. The battle was short and decisive. The bartender and his assistants were routed and the victorious assailants turned their attention to the demolition of the unsavory resort. Bottles were broken, brandy flasks smashed, the contents of the decanters emptied. In the midst of the confusion Sterling Hallmark advanced with splendid intrepidity towards a large keg, bearing the inscription Ambrosia Beer, extra pale. He set his hand upon the spigot.

But at that moment a terrific crash rent the air. The frail building, in the cellar of which the "Hole in the Wall" was situated, collapsed because it was necessary it should do so at that precise instant for the purposes of this tale. The crazy edifice fell with a loud clatter and clouds of blinding dust.

When Sterling Hallmark recovered consciousness he was not for the moment aware of what had happened. Then he realized that he was uninjured, but that he was unmovably pinioned beneath a mass of debris, and that something was weighing heavily upon his chest. Looking up and around him he perceived in the dim light a ring of metal protruding from a dark object that lay upon his chest. As his senses adjusted themselves to his environment he saw that the dark object was the keg of Ambrosia Beer, and that the ring of metal was the mouth of the spigot. The mouth of the spigot was directly in the line of his lips and not two inches distant from them. The terrible question that now confronted Sterling Hallmark was this, Had he opened that spigot before the collapse of the building, was the keg full or empty? He now found that by great exertion he could move his right arm so that his fingers could touch and clasp the spigot. A horrible fear came upon Sterling Hallmark drops of cold perspiration bespangled his brow; he tried to cry out, but his voice failed him. His mouth was dry. A horrible thirst tortured him—a thousand fiends seemed shouting to him to open the spigot, unseen hands tugged at his free hand. He raised this hand to cover his eyes from the sight, but as he withdrew it again it dropped upon his breast two inches nearer the fatal spigot. At length the strain became too great to be borne, Sterling Hallmark became desperate. He laughed aloud in almost insenstiate glee.

THE OLD ADOBE IN WICH RAMONA WAS MARRIED

"Ha, Ha!" exclaimed Sterling Hallmark

He reached up and grasped the spigot and turned it with all his strength.

* * * * * *

An hour later when the rescue party wit 1 axes and hatchets found their way into the celler of the "Hole in the Wall," the foremost of them hauled out Sterling Hallmark.

"Thash a' ri' girlsh,' screamed the unfortunate man as his rescuers tried to keep on his feet. "Thash a' ri', I ne'r him feelsh sho 'appy, az-I-do-t'-ni'. Les op'n n'er li'l' bol, girlsh." The patrol wagon was rung for, and the raving inebriate was conveyed to to the City Hall. The ride in the open air, however, had the effect of sobering him. He realized that he, Sterling Hallmark, temperance leader, had been drunk. He also realized that he could not stand the disgrace that would now inevitably follow him through life. He drew his revolver, and ere the policeman who accompanied him could interfere, had sent a bullet crashing through his brain.

* * * * * *

A few moments after the patrol wagon had departed one of the rescue party discovered the keg labelled Ambrosia Beer, that had been rolled from the breast ef Sterling Hallmark. With a few well-directed blows of his ax, he smashed in the head of the keg, and thrust his hand down to the bottom, groping about.

The interior of the keg was full of dust and rusty nail-heads.

"Empty for over a year," he exclaimed, in tones of bitter disappointment.

I CALL ON LADY DOTTY.

FROM THE POLLY PARABLES
BY AN——Y H——PE

Like most women, Lady Dotty is in love with me—a little. Like most men, I am in love wlth Lady Dotty—a great deal.

Last Thursday afternoon at five o'clock, as I was strolling in St. James' Park (you may have remarked that I always stroll—in St. James' Park—on Thursday afternoons) it occurred to me to call on Lady Dotty. I forthwith presented myself at the house (it is by Van Burgh).

After I had waited some five minutes in the drawing-room Lady Dotty appeared.

"But I am not at home," she said on the threshold. "I am not at home, Mr. Carterer."

"Nor am I," I replied.

"And my husband is——"

"At home?"

"At his club."

"The brute," said I, "to leave you alone."

"There are others," she sighed, with half a glance at me.

I had not called in a fortnight.

"I have languished in self-imposed solitude," I murmured with some gallantry.

"Why have you not been to see me in so long.

"My laundress——" I began.

"Your laundress, Mr. Carterer?"

"Refused to relent."

"You poor dear. Tea?"

"You are too kind," said I, with a bow.

"Lady Dotty's maid, a delicious young creature named Negligee, appeared with the tray and smoking cups and vanished.

Lady Dotty handed me my cup.

"Sit down," she ordered.

There was but one chair in the room. I sat down Lady Dotty—also sat down.

"Clarence is a beast," she said.

"Most husbands are."

"Sometimes they are not."

"When?"

"When they are other women's husbands."

"Wives," I remarked, "of other men are no less so."

"Why can't other men's wives marry other women's husbands," suggested Lady Dotty.

"The question is worthy of consideration," said I.

Negligee hurriedly entered at this point of our conversation.

"The husband of Madame," she exclaimed.

"Good heavens," said Lady Dotty.

I took my hat.

"Fly, Mr. Carterer," cried Lady Dotty.

"This way," murmured Negligee. "Follow me." She led me out into the dark hall, where the back stairs were.

"It is rather dark, sir. You were best to give me your hand."

"And my heart," I answered.

Our hands clasped.

It was, as Negligee remarked, rather dark.

The charming creature's face was close to mine.

"Were you ever kissed?" said I, boldly.

"I don't know how to kiss," said Negligee.

"We might put our heads together and find out how," I suggested.

As I say, Negligee is a delicious young creature. But a man never knows the usefulness of his watch until he is without it—to say nothing of his scarfpin.

LITTLE DRAMA OF THE CURBSTONE

A MERRY CHRISTMAS.

This is really the setting forth of a little drama that I did not see—that is with my actual material eyes, and I presume that one should not see little uglinesses at Christmas time, far less pinion them in cold type. However—

It was rather late on the afternoon of the day before Christmas. The streets were crowded, everyone had parcels in their arms. The street lamps had just been lighted. There was a note of gaiety in the air, and a certain exhuberant nimbleness.

Near the corner of a side street I came across a fairly-dressed respectable woman of the middle class, gowned in black, (naturally) bonneted and veiled. In her arms she carried a number of parcels and packages, a doll or two no doubt, to judge from appearancee, a box of lead soldiers (one could fancy them lying on cardboard over a layer of excelsior) and one particular toy that was not wrapped up—a wooden horse, dapple gray, like all wooden horses, with very erect ears and goggle eyes. Just as I passed her, the woman turned up the side street with, I cannot define just what peculiarity of gait and demeanor, that made me turn and watch her. She stopped a moment and leaned her hand upon a bit of iron railing. Then I saw that she was drunk. She moved on almost directly, but stumbled and fell upon the sidewalk, spilling the lead soldiers upon the pavement and breaking the forelegs of the goggle-eyed horse.

JUSTIN STURGIS.

WHEN DREAMS DERIDE

(RONDEAU)

When dreams deride, and Fancy's train
Throngs to enthrone her in the brain;
  When Reason—Ruler of the day—
  Her sober sceptre down doth lay,
And leaves her Regent free to reign:—

The memory builds a wondrous fane,
Her organ rolls its mimic strain,
  And through the past's dim aisles I stray—
    When dreams deride.

Ah, fictioned fabric! it were vain
Thy weird devotions to explain,
  Oft in thy shadowy shrine I pray
  That Sleep might steal my soul away,
Some morn before thy cloister's wane—
    When dreams deride.

LOUIS A. ROBERTSON.

LOVE.

All the peaceful day, the Male's echoed body shadows on the Female's breast—the crystal lake of love.
The Female guards all the secret gates of mirth for the Male.
  Here, lady, hide thine own key of Silence where Anger
  kneels unto Tears.
Fear not, Male whom darkness loves, for the light of Female-
  Beauty drives the night forever from the sinful Sultan!
Thou, Female, Mother of Christ, mould an earthly paradise wherever the Male is a sorrowing Christ.

YONE NOGUCHI.

AN ENCOURAGING SIGN

Public Life Begins to Attract the Best Americans.

Among the most enconraging signs of the times is the attention which certain men who represent the great material interests of the State are beginning to give to political affairs. It is the complaint of foreign critics that our best citizens keep out of politics, and that the high duties and responsibilities of administering the affairs of the nation are entrusted to mercenary professionals, devoid of patriotism, who manipulate the business of government with a single eye to the benefit of their pockets. As long as our leading men refrain from participation in politics, so long will the worst element of the community convert politics to their profit.

SENATOR THOMAS FLINT JR.
Elite, photo

The time is coming, however, when the attitude of the best Americans to governmental affairs will be similar to that which one finds in European countries, where the highest distinction attaches to official life. Then men of the type of Senator Thomas Flint Jr. will be the rule, rather than the exception. It is an honorable ambition which Senator Flint has announced. He desires to be Governor of California, and intends going before the forthcoming Republican convention as a candidate. He will certainly have the support of the best elements in our community, and rightly so. Senator Flint is manager of one of the most extensive fruit and grain ranches in California, situated in San Benito County, near the town of San Juan, his birthplace.

Mr. Flint was born in '58, and was educated at the Golden Gate Academy in Oakland, and later at Dartmouth, where he graduated with the class of '80. On leaving college, Senator Flint undertook the management of the family estate, and proved himself to be a far-sighted business man as well as a clever student. He soon became interested in the politics of the State, with the result that he was elected State Senator from his district. For the last two sessions he has served as president pro tem of the Senate. The degree of distinction that Mr. Flint has attained is not any mere compliment to his wealth or position. He has earned it by his intelligence and good sense as exhibited at Sacramento. He is capable, thoughtful and painstaking, gives his mind to public affairs, has considerable foresight and caution, and would make a most reliable and conservative executive.

Senator Flint is a prominent figure in Masonic circles, and was recently elected Grand Master of California. This is the greatest distinction that can be conferred on a member of the Masonic Order in his own State, and the fact that Senator Flint was elected to this position at the early age of thirty-nine makes his achievement none the less notable.

LIFE AND JOY.

I.

A wayside inn, and two who loved
"Life!" they cried, "and joy!"
(Who poured the wine laughed out and echoed, "Joy!")
Each saw the soul beyond the other's eyes,
And soul to soul cried, "Joy, my comrade, joy."

II.

A drinking space, and silence
Long silence
Purple lipped, with furtive eyes each seeks the other's face;
Then strained and tense the greeting comes,
"Drink! 'Tis well!
Drink! Drink! Forget and laugh!
Laugh! Laugh and drink!"
(Who pours the wine stands by and echoes, "Drink!")

III.

A drinking space, and silence
One long hour,
One dead, leaden, soundless hour.
Then helpless,
Staring eye to eye, with crimson lips,
Hoarse throated,
Each whispers forth across the filthy lees,
Dregs!
Ay, dregs! 'Tis well to drain the chalice dry.
Ay, 'tis well!
Drain! Drain and die! my comrade die!
Come wet your eager lips and drink.
Drink!
(Who pours the wine stands by and laughs a soundless laugh.)

IV.

The nerveless hands relax.
There rings abroad the crash of one more shattered cup,
And he who pours the wine looks up to echo,
"Life, my comrade, life and joy."
And then,
He falls to laughing once again.

ROBERT PORTER.

HEADQUARTERS RANCHO: A SCENE ON THE MILLER-LUX PROPERTY IN KERN COUNTY
Photo by Watkins

THE NEW PRIMARY LAW

BY SENATOR FRED. S. STRATTON.

I have been asked to give some personal observations regarding the enactment at the last session of the Legislature of the new primary election law. I accept this invitation the more willingly because it enables me to disclaim the too great credit which is given me personally for the passage of this law, and further it affords me an opportunity of endeavoring to check the too optomistic hopes which are entertained relative to the practical workings of the measure.

Although I was the author of the bill, and expended energy and time for several months prior to the convening of the Legislature, and afterwards labored to secure the passage of the law, still I was but one of many senators who were interested in the question of better primary election laws, while in the Lower House the bill was carried through by the conscientious and well applied zeal of still others, who were hearty supporters of and interested in good government. And particularly I might mention that Mr. Hart H. North, as chairman of the election committee of the Assembly, was as instrumental in passing the bill there, as I was in securing its prior adoption by the Senate. It has been urged that certain interests must have been inimicable to the bill, and that, therefore, much influence must have been exercised to have secured a victory of this character. This is true. But, if I were called upon to mention the most effective influence in favor of the new primary election law, I would unhesitatingly name the support of the press, which was given to this measure while it was pending in Sacramento. Politicians and even statesmen bend before public opinion. The platform of the Republican party demanded the enactment of a new primary election law, but the measure was supported by editorials from the press regardless of political affiliation. Nearly two thousand bills were introduced in both Houses, of which, fortunately, only about ten per cent became laws, and therefore no great measure could be successfully enacted into a law without cordial support against all opposition, both in the Legislature and from influences without. Certainly the "bosses," so-called, were interested in the matter of this law. I had many conferences with the political manipulators from San Francisco, and while I always profited from their observations, I naturally looked with suspicion on the multitude of their suggestions relative to amendments to the bill.

This new law makes participation in primaries compulsory upon everyone. The regulation and control of primaries is taken away from parties and from County Committees. The election officers must be non-partisan in character, and appointed by the Election Commissioners for the county or city. All primaries are held at the same time and place, and under the same officers. In fact, the primary election is conducted under practically the same regulations and surrounded by all the safeguards and dignified to the plane of a general election. The practical workings of the measure involve but little expense, and, further, the purity of elections law limiting the use of money by candidates is made applicable to primaries. The law is a voluminous one, and I need not go into its provisions in any greater detail. Most of the newspapers unduly eulogize the measure, and the public are very generally led to expect altogether too favorable results. Politics and morality are not to be altogether changed by any law. A step forward and upward, it is true, has been made, but while human nature remains as it is, political parties and factions will strive for power, and those who devote themselves to politics as manipulators or bosses must inevitably be, if not leaders, at least enormous factors in determining any result. We will still have bad methods, bad nominations and bad officials. The public will never be fully satisfied if the public continue to expect somebody other than themselves to reform politics. The new primary election law permits the public to reform matters; it does not and will not in and of itself work a reformation. The remedy is given to the people and placed in their own hands. It is for them to exercise and use it, and with them will rest the decision as to whether a great reform has been made, and as to whether American citizenshisp is, as far as California is concerned, to march forward on a higher plane. In any event there will hereafter be no excuse for the failure or refusal of citizens to participate in primary elections. The day, however, will never come when party bosses will not be great powers, but they must now count upon the general public as active factors, and they will be no longer left untrammeled to manipulate primaries and conventions by default.

Some have criticised the law as going too far; some have criticised it as not going far enough. For my own part I believe that both criticisms are in part just. The law may prove to burdensome in its machinery for the interior of the State and away from centers of population. Therefore as to them, where primary election abuses have not heretofore flourished, the law may be said to go too far. On the other hand, for the metropolis of the State and for other large cities, the law does not, in my opinion, go quite far enough. I will always believe that the greatest reform in primary politics will be secured by the adoption in this State of the Kentucky principle, which has proved efficacious there of registration by party affiliation; that is, all citizens who care to do so, register themselves as affiliated with a certain party, whether Democratic, Republican or otherwise, and only such are thereupon entitled to vote at the respective party primaries of the party with which they register as so affiliating. This feature was originally a part of the bill as introduced by me at Sacramento. The innovation was, however, too pronounced, and received but little support and encouragement from either the press or party managers. I, therefore, compromised by eliminating that provision. I wrote quite generally throughout the State to the leading newspaper men of my acquaintance, urging them to support the new primary election law, and urging, among other things, the adoption of the Kentucky principle. The State, however, could not be at that time sufficiently educated to the advantages of this system.

Feeling, however, that the interior of the State might complain under the burden which this law imposes, I prepared a constitutional amendment, which passed both houses, and which will be submitted to the people at the next general election for their ratification or rejection, whereby for certain purposes and in certain particulars home rule is given to counties. Among other things, each county is permitted by county charter to determine all the detail of its own method for regulating primary elections. I consider this a most important proposition, for the reason that under the present organic law the constitution now provides that all election laws must be general and apply equally all over the State. If the present law proves a boon and a benefit in the centers of population it may be retained there, whereas in sparsely settled counties different primary election methods may be employed as may be determined by them respectively in their county charters.

Meanwhile, under the Constitution as it at present exists, I asked the sacrifice of the Legislative representatives at Sacramento that they should permit this law to be enacted, and its operation tested, and that they should for the benefit of the whole State, permit a primary election to be framed and adopted, which, while possibly onerous to the interior, was absolutely needed in the great cities of the State. Much has been said about the constitutionality of this law. While no one will guarantee in advance the constitutionality of any complicated measure which is original in its character and had never been fully tested in the Courts, still without seeming unduly confident, I may be permitted to state that, in my opinion, and it is an opinion shared in by all with whom I have discussed the principles involved, there is no question as to the entire constitutionality of this new primary election law. I entertain no apprehension whatever as to the ultimate decision of the Supreme Court upon any of the questions involved.

In closing I would add that this law has been termed a reform measure, and I have been designated as a reformer. The law may be one for better government and higher citizenship, but I certainly do not desire to appear as a reformer. This law reflects the sentiment of the State; it was the result of a demand for some such legislation. I became through circumstances and my own inclinations, the instrument, and then only in part, by which the demand of the people in this direction was answered.

1

2

3

4

5

6

THE BYRON MAUZY PIANO WAREROOMS

1. Show Window. 2. Byron Mauzy Piano Rooms. 3. Building. 4. Main Warerooms. 5 Sohmer Upright Piano Room 6 Sohmer Grand Piano Room

FORGOTTEN HISTORY

Judge Waymire's Fight With the Snake Indians.

In such a big country as ours, with a Government so stable and all danger of "foreign complications" eliminated, things can, and do, happen almost unnoticed that with almost every other nation would be shouted from the house tops and trumpted at the street corners.

In the matter of frontier fights—some of them veritable battles—the difference between us and Europeans is singularly noticeable. Wilson and his twenty-one men of the B. B. P. are destroyed on the banks of the Shanghani in Matabeleland, and the event is copy for nearly six months in every journal and weekly illustrated the world round. But to how many Americans is the word "Alamo" suggestive? Dr. Jamieson raids the Transvaal and has a man or two shot, and the affair assumes international importance, and a flying squadron is organized. But "Wounded Knee Creek" and the "Pine Ridge Agency" were but a nine days' story with us. Who commanded the U. S. troops in the business? It's fair betting that you cannot tell.

W. J. Biggy
Bushnell, photo

This forgetfulness of, or rather indifference to, our best men was suggested to me by a recent article in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer relative to ex-Judge James O. Waymire and one of his Indian fights in Oregon in the sixties.

He was teaching school in Oregon when the Civil War broke out. There were some companies of regulars in the county, but they were withdrawn from the frontiers of Oregon, Washington and Idaho and sent East. They had to have men to take their places, for the Indians were very bad. Young Waymire adjourned school and took a good part of the money he had saved up against going to Harvard, bought an equipment, and enlisted as a private soldier in a newly formed cavalry regiment. That was in '61. They made him a Corporal early in '63, and in April of that year he was promoted to Lieutenant. They had some little fun with the Indians that summer, but it was not until along in February of '64 that the real show began. There were some settlements along John Day's river, extending over a length of 100 miles or more. The Indians had been raiding these, cutting up a few settlers, burning houses and acting nasty generally. General Alvord, who commanded the department, thought it was about time to stop it. He ordered Waymire to protect the settlers, and gave him twenty-five men to do it with. He was twenty-one at the time. It was a pretty big order for a boy, one that would now call for a general and a regiment. Alvord had said, "Act on your own judgment." Waymire hadn't any more than got upon the river when he got news that the Indians had jumped a camp near Canyon City, killed six miners and stampeded all the horses they could find. They had gone to the south. No one knew where their winter quarters were. He saw it wasn't any manner of use to attempt to protect the settlers by waiting till the Indians attacked them. The only thing to do was to get after them in their own country. A volunteer company of fifty-four miners was raised, and started in pursuit of the band One of the volunteers was made Captain, and a good Captain he was, too—Joaquin Miller, our poet of the Sierras. That expedition was one of the hardest and roughest ever made. It was through and over the Blue Mountains, covered with snow. Every day it stormed and snowed. The men had no tents, and had to carry every ounce of their supplies on pack animals. When they wanted forage for the horses they dug under the snow to get it. Then when the snow ceased the cold rain began. When the rain quit they had an epidemic of measles. Most discouraging of all, twenty-two of the volunteers backed out and went home, unable or unwilling to endure such hardships. The Lieutenant went on with what was left, marching on week after week. All of a sudden, when least expecting it, he marched right on to an Indian village. They didn't wait to form, but rushed in just as they were. The Indians cut, and left everthing but their horses and arms. It was just before dark. By 3 the next morning the Lieuenant was hot on their trail. He followed them for about 20 miles to the south all that day, and by noon the scouts brought in word that within a quarter of a mile there were about 450 bucks, who wanted to fight so bad it made them sick. To meet them Waymire and Miller had about 50 men. Older men would perhaps have hesitated; but those boys never thought of delay. The show began at once. Why they weren't massacred where they stood is hard to explain. It was one of the hardest fights in the history of Indian warfare. The soldiers lost five men and as many horses. The Indians lost 23 killed and as many wounded. One charge after another was repelled, until it was so dark to see the rifle sights. The little army rested with rifles in hand through the night, or rather laid down on arm, ready to begin next morning. But next morning the Indians were gone. They'd had enough. And after that fight they let the settlers alone for many years. It was for this service, as the Post-Intelligencer says, that Lieutenant Waymire was "mentioned in the dispatches" and complimented by his chief in the general orders. Writing of this same expedition the Adjutant-General of Oregon said:

"The report of Lieutenant Waymire, of Co. D., First Oregon Cavalry, will be found very interesting, and his encounter with the Snake Indians near Harney Lake was undoubtedly the hardest fought battle in which our troops participated, and evinces a coolness and courage on the part of the Lieutenant and soldiers worthy of notice. Should any future occasion call Lieutenant Waymire again to the field I have no doubt he would rank high as a military leader."

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

A New Charter as an Agency for Pure Politics.

Even for an optimist it is hard to feel satisfied with politica conditions in San Francisco. However agreeable it may be to declare that whatever change there has been is for the better, the fact remains that our municipal affairs are in as bad hands as ever before, and their administration throughout is not only weak and inefficient, but corrupt. How long this is to continue is a problem for the tax-payer. As long as we are to be governed under the wretched patchwork which serves as a charter, there can be little improvement. The first reformatory step is—to have a new charter—a simple, practical instrument, devoid of demagogic concessions or socialistic "isms"—a business-like law, under which our city may be ruled economically, intelligently and honestly. That obtained, it is purely a matter of finding good men to take office, and with such an instrument as this, the task should not be difficult.

Of course, it is true that almost any law administered by honest men can be made serve a good purpose, but how much better could such men as Mayor Phelan selected for his Supervisors do under a new charter than with the Consolidation Act. However, we may not yet get a charter, but it is still possible to find good men. For instance, there is ex-Senator Biggy, who was one of Mayor Phelan's appointees and, at the last election, was one of the Supervisors nominated by the Non-Partisan convention. Had he been elected the city would have been much better off, but our citizens, like children, are too often ignorant of their best interests. Senator Biggy is a clever business man, and is at the head of the United States Laundry. He commenced poor, worked his own way and has made a success. His career in the Legislature demonstrated the steadfast calibre of the man, for he withstood all the forms of pressure and influence brought to bear on a legislator, and emerged with an honorable reputation and a fine record. His is the type of man that is needed in municipal affairs, and there will be misgovernment until politics attract the best rather than the worst citizens in the community.

Eugene N. Duprey
Thors, photo

Another man who is giving time and thought to the cause of pure politics is Eugene N. Duprey, who is rather before the public at the moment as attorney for Theodore Durrant. The cause may not engage our sympathies, but it is impossible not to approve the earnestness and persistence of the lawyer battling for his client's life. For some time Mr. Duprey has given much of his time and thought to political affairs, has participated in municipal conventions, has presided at meetings, and has given the party the benefit of his brain and personality. In every instance he has been allied with the honorable element of the party, has fought bossism and political corruption, and deserves the thanks of the community and its gratitude for his labors.

SANTA CLARA COLLEGE.

Santa Clara College is situated in the town of Santa Clara, which is justly celebrated for the beauty of its surrounding scenery, and the mildness and salubrity of its climate. The Southern Pacific and the South Pacific Coast railroads pass through the town.

The College is conducted by the Fathers of the Society of Jesus. They are the successors of the Franciscan Fathers, the pioneers of civilization on this coast, who, as early as 1777, founded the Mission of Santa Clara, and labored zealously to elevate the moral character, and develop the material prosperity of the inhabitants. On the 19th of March, 1851, Santa Clara College was established in the old mission buildings for the purpose of affording to all who might desire it, the means of obtaining a liberal and Christian education. On the 28th of April, 1855, it was chartered with all the rights and privileges of a university.

In subsequent years extensive additions were made to the premises, and now there are seven large buildings, besides others of less importance, enclosed in a quadrangle of nearly ten acres. With most complete and appropriate accommodations in every department, and a full staff of professors, this institution presents uncommon advantages for the moral, mental and physical training of young men and boys.

AN ENTERPRISING CONCERN.

The E. D. Taylor Company, whose shop is located at 23 Stevenson street, San Francisco, is deservedly known as one of the most enterprising and up-to-date concerns engaged in the printing business in this city. Starting in July of 1896, at 523 Mission street, the character and individuality of their work soon attracted the notice of lovers of good printing, and their business developed so rapidly that they were soon compelled to seek more commodious quarters. These they secured at 23 Stevenson street, to which place they moved in May of this year, augmenting the capacity of their plant, at the same time, by the addition of a large Miehle cylinder press and large additions to their composing room. The Wave and other publications are regularly printed at their office. In the past sixty days they have completed some of the largest contracts in printing let this year, including 200,000 almanacs for the Clinton S. Worden Co., the Press Club Souvenir, the Commercial Travelers' Souvenir, the programme and tickets for the Inter-Collegiate football game, several important books for Mr. William Doxey, etc.

It is curious to note, says The Chap-Book, that as the necessity for the establishment of a definite and purposeful foreign policy grows on the people, the quality of our diplomatic service is steadily deteriorating. It is true we have no "Bob" Schenks or "Pat" Egans nowadays, but neither have we any Lowells, Phelpses, Washburnes, or Edwardes Pierreponts. The best that can be said for Mr. Hay is that he is colorless; for General Porter that he is a graceful speaker at dinners. Andrew D. White, although a person of a high order of intelligence, is pettish, quarrelsome and almost hysterical at times—the last man in the world to deal with delicate international questions. Charlemagne Tower is what his name might indicate. General Woodford is a frayed politician who took the Spanish mission after it had been kicked from pillar to post. Mr. Draper is almost unknown, and will be less than a cipher at the Roman court when it becomes known that the secretary of the legation is an ambassador on his own account, accredited by his grace the Archbishop of St. Paul to the papal court. In the East we have fared even worse. Mr. Buck's appointment was a sad blunder. He is a Georgia carpet-bagger whose whole distinction arises from his leadership of the Black Republican vote in two States. He is William Pitt Kellogg or Warmouth slightly amplified. If the activity of the Germans and Russians in China should lead to complications with Japan, we would be delightfully represented in the storm center by a man whose knowledge of diplomacy ends when he has voted forty negroes in a National Convention. As for Mr. Bryan, the new minister to China, he is an amiable young man, and nothing further can be said in his favor. He was a representative in the Illinois Legislature, and is a friend of Congressman Hopkins, in whose district he lives. He will hardly shine in comparison with his predecessor, Mr. Denby, or with the British envoy, Sir Claude M. Macdonald, who, although not yet forty-five, has earned distinction both as soldier and diplomat. He left the army in 1887, and was appointed consul at Zanzibar. Later he became commissioner on the west coast of Africa. His appointment to succeed Sir Nicolas R. O'Conor was generally applauded.

A MAGNIFICENT PROSPECT.

Among the many beautiful residences of San Francisco, none has attracted more attention, both for the artistic elegance of its design and the beauty of its situation, than the one now being erected by Mr. Livingston Jenks, the well-known attorney. It is located on Washington street, north of the Presidio, over which it commands a sweeping view of the bay, with Mount Tamalpais in the distance.

THE OLD FIDDLER

FROM A PHOTOGRAPHIC STUDY BY MARCEAU

A CHINESE FISHING VILLAGE

Life of the Mongolian fishermen, who catch and dry shrimps at San Pedro.

Photographed by Arnold Genthe

PHASES OF CHINESE LIFE

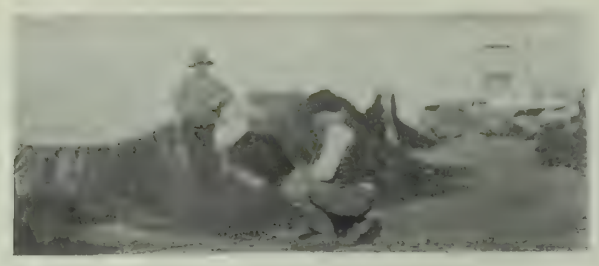
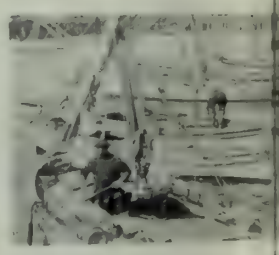
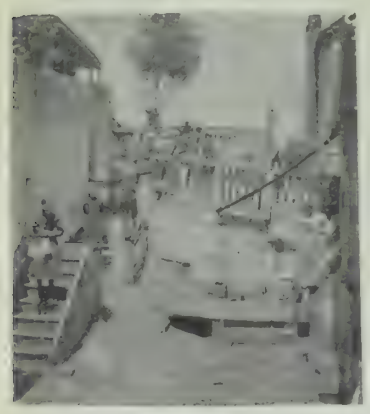
Showing the metal workers, bakers and opium smokers of "Little China"

Photographed by Nielson







SCENES IN TH

LIFE IN LITTLE ITALY, SHOWING ALSO THE ITALIAN VEGETABLE GARDENS, TH

Photographed by Arnold Genthe, N

LATIN QUARTER

CLIFF DWELLINGS ON THE VERGES OF TELEGRAPH HILL, AND FISHERMAN'S WHARF

M. Faucompre, Taber; and W. S. Hochstadter.

VISTAS IN LITTLE MEXICO

Life in the Mexican Colony on the south slopes of Telegraph Hill.

Photographed by Arnold Genthe

STREET LIFE IN CHINATOWN

Photographed by Arnold Genthe

ORIGINAL SETTLERS

Mexican and Indian life in Southern California, being views in Sonora Town, Los Angeles, San Diego, at the home of Ramona, and in the Mojave Desert.

Photographed by Taber

SCENES IN THE PALACE HOTEL

1. Entrance to the Grill Room. 2. The Rotunda. 3. A Vista in the Central Court 4. The Tapestry Room 5. The Ladies' Grill 6. The Palace from Rincon Hill

BUSINESS OFFICE WITH RECEIVING AND DELIVERING DESKS

THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH

Its Web of Wires Extend the World Around.

That familiarity breeds contempt is a saying so familiar that we are in danger of entertaining a contempt for the saying itself. Half a century ago the statement of the fact that by stepping into a certain office we in San Francisco could talk to Paris or to Vienna would have landed the fellow making it in an asylum. But to-day the globe is wrapped in telegraph wire as a boy's baseball is wrapped with string, and continent and city gossip together as so many old maids on a hotel veranda, often about matters no less trivial.

The Pacific Postal Telegraph Company's offices on Market street, in this city, are a never-failing wonder to anyone who has his mind open for impression and suggestion. Inside it rattles and hums and clicks like an army of crickets or like a vast and continuous discharge of tiny rifles, rifles that fire shots that are quite literally "heard around the world." This office is the center of a web of wires so long, so complete, so infinite in their ramifications that even the heads of the company cannot say within three or four thousand miles just how long they are. With their connections it has been estimated that these wires would, if put together in a single line, circle the world eight times.

The sender of a dispatch, let us say, to Durban, on the east coast of South Africa—for even that remote spot can be reached by the Postal Telegraph Company's wire web—steps into the splendid offices on Market street, shining with marble and mahogany and polished brass, writes his message and passes it over the counter. In due course of time the message is put on the wire. The sender of the dispatch can go his way assured that the company will see his message through. One mistake in a thousand chances is, perhaps, a fair average.

San Francisco takes the message and aud flings it across the layers of sand and sage brush to Chicago, and Chicago to New York. Then down it goes under the Atlantic—on the Commercial Cable Company's line with which the Postal Telegraph has connections—under the Atlantic and on to Southampton. Southampton relays it to Funchal, on the Maderia Islands, and a lazy, straw-hatted, white-pantalooned Portugese whips it across the ocean to the equator past the Peak of Teneriffe to the French station on the Senegal coast of Africa. Then relay after relay sends it down the coast. It doubles the Cape of Good Hope, and Cape Town throws it on to Kimberley, and Kimberley—at last—passes it over to Durban. And this about the time the sender of the message is sitting down to supper on the day of the sending.

It would be hard to find a corner of the world which could not be reached by the Postal Telegraph Company. The office is a ganglia, a nerve center on the body of the earth not only for the transmission, but also for the reception of news and messages. Not an important event happens between the five oceans that the reverberation of it is not instantly felt in the Market-street office. Sometimes we are apt to underestimate the value of such a colossal invention as the telegraph. But at a time like this it would be well to try to imagine what we would do if every wire on earth were cut to-morrow, or if even half of them were cut. It would have much the same effect upon the world at large as a stunning blow on the back of the head has upon an individual. It would not be far from paralysis.

Mrs. Wu, the wife of the Chinese Minister at Washington, is of ancient lineage, her pedigree extending further back than that of the Emperor's, and as her gorgeous court costume indicates, is pure Chinese, unadulterated by any admixture of Manchurian blood. She is of equal official rank with her husband, and may upon all occasions enter and leave a room at his side, rather than behind him.

"The Times of India" declares that tea-drinking is the curse of Thibet. "The people," it says, "have such an insatiable craving for the beverage that they will sell their houses, their flocks, their very children to procure it. If ever an apostle appears in Thibet to regenerate the nation he will have to preach a crusade in favor of whisky-drinking in order to wean the inhabitants from the national vice."

THE FACADE OF THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH BUILDING

The consolidation of the Equitable Gas Light Company with the New York and East River company makes the great New York gas trust an accomplished fact, and completes another victory for the Rockefeller-Morgan syndicate. The new organization, which will be known as the New Amsterdam Gas Company, is capitalized for twenty-three million dollars, and will almost practically control the New York gas supply, its only rival being Russell Sage's Standard company.

THE MAIN OPERATING ROOM

JUDGE FOX'S CAREER

A Story of Early Struggles, with Great Success at the End.

When a boy begins to support himself at the age of fourteen years, it is well to put a mark upon him and watch how far he will go. It is very probable that he will go farther than you can see him. The story of the life of Charles Nelson Fox should be told by W. D. Howells. It is essentially American, and is thoroughly typical of a certain phase of American progress. It is much the same kind of life that Lincoln led. Begun in the backwoods, and by sheer force of character, strength of will and power of determination carried on and up, through the phases of school teaching, and law and politics to varying stages of wealth or power or prominence.

Mr. Fox is a type of the American of the better sort, a strong man, intellectually, morally, physically, a man who is not to be repressed by force of circumstances or checked by the inertia of obstacles, a man who "arrives," who "gets there," who succeeds."

A wide—and to most men—an impassible gulf separates a log cabin in the heart of a Michigan forest from the Supreme bench of the State, but long ago Mr. Fox has traversed it. He was born in 1829 in—as stated—the heart of a dense forest in the interior of Michigan, separated from the nearest school-house by a hard tramp of two miles. Until he was fifteen years old Mr. Fox attended this school, working on the outside at the same time, so that his parents were relieved of all burden of his support. At fifteen he made up his mind to go to Ann Arbor University, and did go in fact, working his way, and studying his classics simultaneously till the effort broke him down.

CHARLES N. FOX
Taber, photo

The printing office and the editorial chair figure very largely in the early history of America's big men. Fox started in or started over again as a printer, and in a little while became noted as a country editor. Next came his friendship with General Lewis Cass and an offer of a place at West Point. It was declined and, afterward, regretted. The war came along a few years later, and if Fox had been a West Pointer, but that, as our friend Rudyard says, "would have been another story." However, twice before he was old enough to vote, Fox was offered certain legislative positions, also declined. But later we hear of him serving ex-officio as Mayor of Ann Arbor. The reading of law came after this. In 1856 he was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of Michigan, and in 1857 came to California.

He came to San Mateo county, and almost immediately began to fight the Spring Valley Water Company, who were at that time attempting to get into the county. It was in these cases against the company that he first began to show his great legal ability. The company was blocked and checkmated at every point. They were at a standstill. There was only one thing to do—retain the clever young lawyer on their side. It was done, and at once and without any litigation in the matter whatever, the company secured all the rights it had for so long been fighting to obtain. More than this, Fox so handled the company's relations with its clients and enemies that for twelve years there was not even a suit instituted against them.

His great case was the suit brought by the City of San Francisco against the Spring Valley Water Company in which the issue was the right of the city to tap the company's mains for water during a dry season when a water famine seemed imminent. Fox, acting for the company, fought the claim. Long after the danger was gone the fight was kept up. It lasted for years. But in the end Mr. Fox was splendidly and unequivocally victorious.

AN HONORABLE OFFICIAL

A Brief History of the Life of Assessor Siebe.

There are few pioneers residing in this city who are better or more favorably known than John D. Siebe, the present Assessor for the City and County of San Francisco. Mr. Siebe was born at Hanover, Germany, March 22, 1833, and at the age of sixteen he arrived in New York to make his fortune. The news of the gold discovery in California reached the metropolis, and young Siebe determined to visit the El Dorado, and accordingly took passage on board the pioneer ship "John L. Stephens," for California, arriving in this city in 1852. Instead of going to the mines as he expected to do, Mr. Siebe accepted a position in a business house. One year later, in 1853, being without friends, and possessing little money, he opened business on his own account, at the corner of Sacramento and Stockton streets. He succeeded beyond his own expectations, and in 1856 returned to the fatherland, remaining there about eight months, and marrying during the interval. On his return he entered into the wholesale liquor business at North Beach, and in 1876 the house of Siebe Bros., at the corner of Washington and Sansome streets, was founded. Mr. Plageman was afterward admitted. In commercial circles the house of Siebe Bros. & Plageman stands very high.

Mr. Siebe has been a leading factor in politics for many years. In 1871 he was elected to the Assembly by a large majority, and in 1881 was again returned, being the only Republican elected in the old Ninth District. Despite the most bitter opposition of political enemies at the election of 1890, Mr. Siebe succeeded in being elected by a handsome majority. The confidence of the community in his character and integrity has been shown by his re-election, for he has been Assessor ever since. There have been many fights organized against him; sensational journals have endeavored to obstruct him in the execution of his duty, but he has in each instance held to his own way, and in his sturdy honest fashion, has shown his adversaries that he was right and they wrong. It is not too much to say that John D. Siebe has been the best Assessor the city has ever had, and he can be re-elected as often as he cares to run.

SOHMER PIANOS

The Great Musical Establishment of Byron Mauzy.

The illustrations presented in this number of the magnificent piano warerooms of Byron Mauzy in the Pacific-Union Club Building, Union Square, this city, will be a surprise to many who had no idea that there were any rooms devoted to the sale and display of musical instruments on quite so large a scale outside of New York or Chicago. Mr. Mauzy has been in this building for eleven years past and has each year made improvements that has kept him abreast of the times. The large central room can be turned into a hall with a seating capacity of 500. Many concerts and recitals have been given here during these years, and many who made their debut in this hall are now treading their way to fame and fortune. The chairs are conveniently stowed away underneath the stage.

The various rooms are filled with different makes of pianos, of which Mr. Mauzy is the sole representative. Especially attractive are the two large rooms devoted to the display of the Sohmer piano. The Grand room is complete with Parlor, Baby and Bijou Grands in mahogany and oak cases. The Upright room has cases in mahogany, walnut, birdseye maple and oak, all of the choicest and finest woods. It is needless to add that the Sohmer piano to-day stands in the front ranks of the leading pianos. During the past fifteen years Mr. Mauzy has placed them in the homes of hundreds of our leading families, in public institutions and halls, and with the leading teachers and musicians—no better testimonial of their durability and worth could be asked. The room devoted to the display of the Byron Mauzy Pianos is also an attractive one.

With extensive facilities for manufacturing in New York and 20 years of retail experience in handling all the prominent makes of pianos, Mr. Mauzy is enabled to cull out the strongest points of all these instruments, and combine them in a piano in every way adapted to the use and needs of this climate.

The Byron Mauzy Piano is made on the latest scientific plans, and has all the new improvements. The most beautiful woods are selected for the casings, and these are double cross veneered, with handsome etched and carved panels.

The sounding board is made to produce the fullest volume of tone; the action the latest improved; the hammers of the best felt; the white keys are ivory and the black keys are ebony.

The backs are open and of hard wood, nicely finished. There are three pedals, one of them a muffler, so arranged that a child can practice in the same room without disturbing anyone.

Every piano is warranted for ten years.

The show windows have been made especially attractive for the holidays, and on account of their commodious size, you can find everything from a church organ and grand piano to a mandolin, guitar, banjo, violin, music rolls, cases, etc., displayed there.

Taber in London.

"The past season has seen introduced into London from San Francisco," says London Sketch, "the most perfect development of the photographer's art as yet attained—the Taber bas-relief portraits and pictures, which are to be seen in the Studio, 38 Dover street, Piccadilly. These are a combination of sculpture and photography, attained by a patent process, the rights of which, for the United Kingdon and the whole of Europe, are vested in Mr. Taber. The process consists of making a mould of the figure from the negative, and then covering this mould with the silver-plate proof and pressing it until the picture stands out in the beautiful high-relief which makes it at once so unique and so lifelike. It is then printed on platinum-paper, which gives softness and makes it permanently durable. The process is carried out with equal success in portraits of people and animals, and is also admirable for scenery, as may be seen by a visit to the artistically decorated and luxuriously furnished suites of rooms in Dover street, where visitors are always welcomed and shown numerous examples of these marvels of photography."

By the way, Mr. Taber is expected in San Francisco at the end of the month. Unfortunately, he will not be able to reach here in time for Xmas.

NAPA SODA SPRINGS

THE HOME OF NAPA SODA WATER

California is well known as the best producer of fast horses, pretty women and good wine in the United States. Also, is she celebrated for the number and excellence of her Mineral Springs. Of these

NAPA SODA IS THE PRINCE!

It is a purely natural mineral water—palatable and popular, being clear, sparkling, and of a pleasant, grateful taste, as well as being a keen appetizer. Universally recommended by the medical fraternity, and being, besides, a pure healthy drink, a refreshing beverage, and an invigorating tonic. It has been extensively used, and with universal success, as a cure for Bladder, Liver and Kidney Diseases, Indigestion, General Debility and Nervous Prostration It is the greatest corrective ever discovered for excessive eating or drinking. In cases of emaciation and debility, an increased nutrition of the body is the result of the use of this water. Its components are so perfectly united by Nature that for a health-giving and grateful beverage this water surpasses any other mineral water in use. A Napa Soda Lemonade is the perfection of luxurious drink for old or young, male or female.

SOBER UP ON NAPA SODA!

This water is bottled and sold just as it flows, pure and unadulterated, from Nature's laboratory, with all her sparkling freshness still upon it.

Steamers, Saloons, Hotels and Families promptly served from

Office, 147 New Montgomery Street, San Francisco

---

WENDELL EASTON, President GEORGE EASTON, Vice-President
GEORGE D. EASTON, Secretary
ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK (Ltd.), Treasurer

EASTON ELDRIDGE & CO.
REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND GENERAL AUCTIONEERS.

PRINCIPAL OFFICES

638 Market St., San Francisco, opp. Palace Hotel and 121 South Broadway, Los Angeles

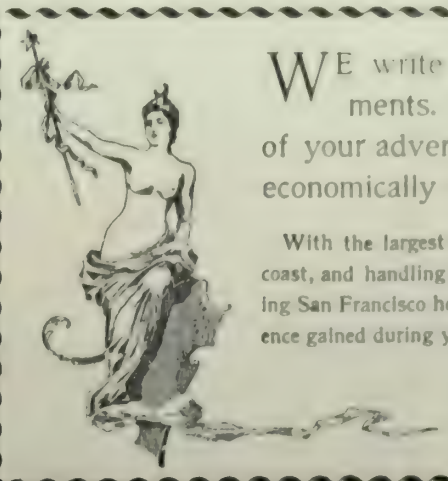
Also at CHINO, SAN DIEGO, MERCED, POMONA, STOCKTON AND WINTERS

Correspondents in every County in the State.

---



WE write and illustrate advertisements. We will take entire charge of your advertising and use your money economically for the best results.

With the largest staff of writers and illustrators on the coast, and handling the advertising of over fifty of the leading San Francisco houses, we offer to advertisers the experience gained during years of successful advertising.

LOMBARD & CO.

20-24 Geary Street, S. F.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

I have come to the conclusion, Diary my dear, that as a debutante I am a failure. It is a sad awakening, after all my visions of social triumphs—but, alas, the fact remains the same. Here it is Christmas already, my first season half gone, and not one proposal worth accepting! Is not that a confession? In my secret heart I am positively disgusted. I have had crushes without number. All the youths have cast their bonbons and bouquets at my feet. I have been rushed by Larry Van Winkle, "Airy Eyre," Harry Stetson and even the Dibblees. But what are these when one is seeking a genuine triumph. Of course, my Sunday afternoons do resemble a Prince of Wales' Levee, and I have not had to buy a solitary bud since I was first introduced, still that sort of attention is merely fragmentary, illusive. I want something tangible. I have watched my admirers closely to find any signs tending towards complete capitulation, but, alas, success has not smiled on my efforts. There is not a man who really considers me as a probable bride.

And what makes it worse I cannot find one whom I should seriously contemplate taking for better or worse, and in matrimony, as I have seen it, the worse usually predominates. When I see my dear gentle father pestered to death by darling mamma, and Aunt Caroline reduced to almost transparent fragility by Uncle Harold, I hesitate about cultivating the most desirable assiduously, and Aunt Sybil, who is an authority on such matters, having been married three times, says that is the only way to catch a husband in these degenerate days. It is sad, and were it not for the feeling of failure to do what is expected of me, I had much rather be a spinster all my days. Think of it! Arthur and I could live in a dear little cottage with cats and rabbits and birds and dogs and have a capital time. He could have all his men friends and I my girls—but, I suppose, they would be crusty old bachelors and old maids then. So what can a poor girl do?

The Assembly, which I had contemplated with so much fear and trembling, turned out a great success. I must say this for Mr. Greenway, he knows how to give a ball. The ball was charming. In the center there was hung a fish-net with myriads of little lanterns depending from it. Then, fan-like effects were arranged in pink and green round the balcony. The musicians were hidden behind a screen of palms and ferns and the floor was covered in canvas. I prefer to dance on a polished floor, but the canvas looks ever so much prettier, and sets off the gowns to advantage. Nearly all the girls were accompanied by their mothers. Mrs. Hopkins looked so stunning in a low-necked gown of some creamy material. I don't think either of the girls will ever make as striking a looking woman as their mother. Mrs. L. L. Baker also looked handsome in severe black. She chaperoned Marie Oge and Marie Wells. Of the younger matrons Mrs. George Howard looked especially well in a yellow gown, with a coronet of diamonds. Mrs. De Ruyter was effective in purple and black. But I don't think we debutantes ever made a better showing than on this occasion. We looked simply beautiful. Which was the belle? I am afraid it is a little early in the game to decide, but—well, anyway, I should be the last to say. I shall tell you what we girls all wore. Leontine Blakeman had a particularly swell frock of white tulle spangled in silver, the waist suggested armor, the spangles being arranged somewhat in the form of a corselet. Marie Wells wore a charming gown of white duchess muslin, spangled in silver with innumerable ruffles. Arthur says "that she pleased him," and higher praise I cannot comprehend. Edna Hopkins wore a sweet little frock; Helen Thomas was in pink striped silk. I thought Helen Thornton's gown in excellent taste—it was of peacock-blue striped silk very deftly fashioned. Marie Oge looked really lovely in pure white silk with Arabic designs in gold. Ethel Keeney's was one of the most striking costumes in the room. It was of white and silver. Therese Morgan was stunning in white tulle, spangled in gold, which harmonized charmingly with her hair. Gertie Carroll wore a lovely frock of some filmy material. I wish she would not wear ribbon round her neck, it spoils the lines, shortening the neck and making the shoulders look square. There were hordes of men, so it would be hard to say which girls were the most popular, although the Terpsichoreans seem to hold the winning colors.

I must say I do like to dance with Southard Hoffmann, he is so sweet and knows so much about things in general. With regard to gowns he is simply an authority second to none, and has so much taste. If only Arthur were like him. Then there is dear Bert Dibblee—he is my special, at present, and is ever so charming to dance with. Bert has a delightful laugh, and would be nearly perfect if he would only talk sense to us girls. I suppose, though, he thinks we prefer sweet nothings—so few men seem to consider it worth their while to converse with us on topics of real interest. The only man I know who does is Harry Houghton, and he is tremendously popular and a first-rate fellow.

But, to return to our pleasures. After the ball we all remained home on Saturday and rested. Then, on Monday, Mrs. H. Scott gave her dinner and dance in honor of Edna Hopkins. It was a very lively affair. About fifty of us were there. The table was decorated in red vines and la France roses, and looked stunning.

On Tuesday Laura McKinstry gave a girls' tea to about twenty of us. Both Leila and I were invited. It was capital fun, as all Laura's affairs are. On Tuesday evening we all went to the hop at the Presidio. It was enjoyable. All the debutantes were there. Charlotte Ellinwood and Gertie Oge looked particularly well. Mrs. Bent never looked better; she wore a perfectly gorgeous gown of white satin. Bernie Drown wore a pretty frock of white organdie, ruffled up to the waist; Grace Sanborn, one of the buds, also looks well. She is tall and striking, and a perfect tailor-made girl. Little Mrs. O'Hearne, the most recent bride at the Presidio, was very pretty in a red and black combination. She has deep brown eyes, and lashes that almost hide them. There were but few civilians present—Mr. De Haven, Mr. Harry Houghton and Mr. Sanborn. Lieutenant Douglas was over from Angel Island (he is one of my chums). Then, on Wednesday, Mamma went to Mrs. Morgan's lunch in honor of Mrs. Senator Jones. It was a particularly smart affair, and some of the gowns of the ladies were really magnificent. Mamma is devoted to Mrs. Jones, and is delighted to hear that she intends spending next winter in San Francisco, when her daughter will make her debut.

On Thursday I went to a big luncheon given by Caro Crockett in honor of Miss Cadwalder, one of the debutantes. There were about twenty of us—the usual crowd. The table was ever so pretty, and we had a fine time. Then I fled away and went to an afternoon dance at Angel Island. About a dozen of us went over, chaperoned by Mrs. Bent and Mrs. Powell. Then we flew back and went to the Tevis and Stubbs teas. After that home arrayed myself in my "satin and orange blossoms," and went to the Stubbs dinner dance, which followed the tea. It was the jolliest affair I have been to this season, and the girls looked radiantly pretty.

On Friday is the Fortnightly, to which I am going; on Saturday a big tea at the Occidental. Mrs. William Landers and Miss Landers are to have a reception there from four to six. It is to be a very smart affair. About five hundred invitations have been issued. They will receive in the parlors, which will be decorated in Christmas berries and greens.

On Saturday evening Muriel Atherton is to give a theatre party to twenty-seven of us. Later supper is to be served at the 'Varsity Club. On Monday Fanny Baldwin is to give a luncheon at the 'Varsity Club. That is the extent of my doings for a week. So wishing those that I love, and especially those that love me, a happy Christmas, I shall say adieu for another sennight.

Your most devoted,
MISS CRICKET.

* *

Oakland society is at last being awakened to a sense of its responsibilities, and the Christmas season is to be a very gay one. There are the usual Christmas family parties. The Miller clan, with its multitudinous offshoots, is to hold high revelry. Then the McKees, Pierces and Watkinsons will have a gathering under their rooftree. Mrs. Norman Lang has come from Portland to be with her mother, Mrs. McKee, for the holidays. Then, on New Year's there is to be a perfect round of pleasure. A big Charity Ball has been arranged for New Year's Eve by a number of prominent society women. Mrs. C. W. Howard, Mrs. Mhoon, Mrs. Folger, Mrs. Requa, Mrs. Garber, Mrs. H. M. A. Miller, Mrs. Pierce and Mrs. Wetherbee are among the patronesses. It is to be given in aid of the Ladies Relief Society. The management is to be entirely in the hands of the younger set, who are to make out the list of invitations, arrange for the catering, etc. About five hundred invitations are to be issued.

On New Year's Day Mrs. Geo. G. Whitrey is to keep open house from two until six. She is to be assisted by Misses Ethel Kittredge, Mary Barker, Florence Starr, Laura and Mona Crellin, Grace Holt, Margaret Knight, Emma Mahoney, Lillian Strong, Elsie McElrath, Louise Simmons and Carrie Ritter. No invitations will be issued, but the friends of the various girls are expected to call and wish them the compliments of the season. Mrs. Whitney anticipates having a real old time New Year, with Mr. and Mrs. Orestes Pierce assisted by a number of the younger people, will also receive on New Year's afternoon.

The Saturday Evening Dancing Club held its regular meeting last week at Reed's Hall. Mr. Ben Bakewell and Miss Genevieve Fore led the German. The figures were pretty, and the young people carried them out in excellent style. Among the prettiest of the girls were Miss Ione Fore, Miss Sallie Quinan and Miss Lillian Strong. The affair was generally conceded to have been the jolliest of the season.

Great are the changes that have taken place in Oakland this year. The Harry Millers now occupy the residence of Mr. Chris. Miller, who, with his children, has returned to his paternal home. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Crellin have purchased the Kimball house, on Jackson street. Mr. and Mrs. Kimball, with their daughters, have gone to San Jose to live.

Of the events of the future Miss Juliet Garber gives a girls' luncheon on Thursday, and Miss Berenice Landers a big tea on Saturday afternoon.

---

The music of Huber's Del Monte Orchestra adds greatly to the success of all entertainments. Telephone, care of Benjamin Curtaz, Main 1247.

---

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

---

Dr. G. A. Danziger, Dentist, 22 Geary street

---

For latest styles in fall neckwear and hosiery J. W. Carmany, 25 Kearny st. Shirts to order.

---

Kelly's Guranteed Corn Cure, 25 cents Sold only at 102 Eddy street

---

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market Street

---

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter St., stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

HOLIDAY GIFTS!

We have in our showrooms an unrivaled assortment of pretty and attractive pieces of Furniture especially suitable for presents, embracing

Tea Tables
Tabourettes
Dressing Tables
Chiffoniers
Parlor and
Music Cabinets

SOLE AGENTS MARKS' ADJUSTABLE FOLDING CHAIRS

A MOST APPROPRIATE CHRISTMAS GIFT

Book Cases
Reception Chairs
Fancy Chairs
Writing Desks
Sofa Cushions
Parlor Tables

JOS. FREDERICKS & CO.

CARPETS, FURNITURE, UPHOLSTERY

649-651 Market Street, - San Francisco, Cal.

M. A. GUNST & CO.

(INCORPORATED)

GENERAL ARTHUR AND LELAND STANFORD Clear Havana Cigars

Special Christmas Cigars, Pipes, Tobaccos, Imported Cigarettes and Smokers' Articles Canes and Umbrellas

Branch Store Baldwin Hotel

203 Kearny Street

The Royal is the highest grade baking powder known. Actual tests show it goes one-third further than any other brand.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
Absolutely Pure

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

TURF TOPICS

The Racing at Ingleside and Oakland—Notes.

That genuine little two-year-old racehorse Count of Flanders, one of the best of St. Carlo's progeny, has been purchased by Mr. T. Ryan, the price being reported as $3,000.

The concluding days of the fortnightly meeting at Ingleside were productive of capital sport, although the track was somewhat heavy, the same condition attaching to the course at Oakland, to which racing was transferred on Monday last.

Yesterday week, in a race of 1¼ miles, the Eastern horse Howard Mann made his debut on this coast carrying 114 lbs., the other runners being Senator Bland, 114 lbs., Wheel of Fortune, 111 lbs., Sweet Favordale, 106 lbs. and Billy McCloskey, 100 lbs., and with the going just in the order that has proved to his liking captured the purse without difficulty. Senator Bland went to the front early in the proceedings, but Holmes having been instructed to keep him in reserve, if he could, never got the Montana champion settled down to work comfortably, with the result that when Howard Mann challenged him just as they were about to enter the stretch, Senator Bland made no show and the winner of the Brooklyn handicap came along and won at his ease in 2.15¼, Sweet Favordale very nearly nipping out Senator Bland for second place. Howard Mann looked in as fine fettle as any horse I have seen out this season and he was judiciously ridden by young Clawson.

Saturday's racing was severely under the weather and a thick fog obscured the two last essays, one of which was the Hobart Stakes $1500, 1¼ miles, for three-year-olds. The form-bookmakers did what they could by placing men at intervals to report all they could see of the running, and their returns showed that Fleur de Lis, 104 lbs., and Altamax, 122 lbs., were the only contenders, the former winning in easy fashion, the latter second, and Personne, 104 lbs., third, four lengths behind Altamax. Time, 2.11½. Both first and second are the get of imp. Maxim and do great credit to the Musket blood. Altamax ran a fine race considering the weight he was giving away and that he was taken a rather long course.

At Oakland on Monday, Montgomery gave the fast Tea Rose III 10 lbs. and outfooted her in a five and a half furlongs spin. Rubicon put in an appearance in the same event and, though backed as if it were a moral for him, ran badly and only got going in the last 100 yards. Roy El Santa Anita sported silk in a mile handicap and again proved a fraud. The horse looks well but goes short and as if he intended to keep out of the racing business. Still, as of old, he may win when least expected. Ostler Joe captured the purse with 112 lbs., the two-year-old Spunwell, 85 lbs., running a good honest colt.

The same afternoon, in a race at 1 1-16 miles, Garland Barr, 107 lbs., won through Piggott riding Clawson, on Double Quick, 105 lbs., pretty nearly off the track. The proceeding was deliberate, repeated more than once in the stretch, and should have been severely punished.

The Burns & Waterhouse stable seem to have struck a fresh streak of luck for two-year-olds, for B. & W., a great big colt by imp. Darebin, has won twice in succession since last report, and Odds On by Torso thrice in the same interval. The latter is uncommonly smart. The stable was beaten, however, in the Racine stakes, $1,000, six furlongs, for two-year-olds, on Wednesday last, Morrelito getting the best of Eddie Jones and Torsida in a hard drive. The same day Valencienne lost his maiden, Count of Flanders won an all-aged purce and Lord Marmion ran second in another race, a fine showing for the progeny of St. Carlo in five events one afternoon.

Mr. Corrigan took Lucky Dog out of a selling race for $1,200 this week. If this horse were retired and put to the stud he ought to get nice stock. In point of breeding, size, shape and make, as well as racing qualities, he has great recommendations.

The sale of Mr. J. B. Chase's small lot of yearlings at Ingleside on Saturday last by Messrs. Killip & Co. resulted in an average of $520 for five head by Morello and $350 for one filly by imp. Mariner. This is the best average obtained at any auction sale this season. At the same time the speedy two-year-old filly Novia, by Imp. Islington, was disposed of for $850.

Fifteen head of yearlings bred by Mr. A. B. Spreckels sold at an average of $230 on Tuesday last, the best prices being $675 for a gelding by imp. Watercress and $605 for a filly by imp. Crighton.

On Monday next the St. Corlo yearlings bred by Mr. W. O'B. Macdonough will be put up for auction at the Occidental Horse Exchange. I looked over these youngsters at the farm early in the month and do not remember ever having seen in California a more level looking lot. Seeing that everything by St. Carlo that has ever started has proved a winner the competition ought to be keen, and buyers should not fail to note that the present offerings are, as a rule, out of a superior class of mares to those which are the dams of the St. Carlo get now racing. A few brood mares are to be sold at the same time.

Foul riding as a practice has been under the special consideration of the Ingleside and Oakland officials, and they have publicly notified their intention to deal with offenders as the circumstance may require, reserving to themselves the right to award positions to horses interfered with as the judges may think proper. Jockeys fouling designedly will be severely treated.

BENEDICT.

Poodle Dog Restaurant, southeast corner of Grant avenue and Bush street. Private dining and banquet rooms. Telephone 429. Blanco & Bruno, proprietors.

FINANCE AND TRADE

Thursday Evening.

With a more settled feeling in political circles since the opening of Congress and indications of present and future prosperity in the railway and iron industries of the country, the trade outlook is most encouraging. Money in New York and London has of late hardened in some measure and the stock markets show marked enhancement in the case of most of the leading lines of investment. Locally silver is weak and little doing.

In the bond market the position remains unchanged, the demand for good bonds still continuing and the supply being exceedingly short. Northern Railway of California 5 per cent have been selling at 101½ to 101¾ to strong purchasers, and an advance may be shortly looked for.

In the stock market Spring Valley are strong at 100. Gas stocks are weaker, owing to fresh rumors of opposition and press attacks. Market Street R. R. is steady.

In the Miscellaneous section the dealings in Sugar stocks have been extensive and quite toe feature of the week. Hutchinson have advanced to 40⅝, the highest price in the history of the company, which has increased the dividend from 30 to 40 cents. This quotation is still offering, but there seem to be but few shares obtainable. Hawaiian sold as high as 29, but have receded to 27⅞, at which figure they are firm. In case of any favorable news with regard to annexation, both of these companies' stocks will take a jump.

In the Grain market Wheat is quiet, buainess being greatly curtailed by the scarcity of tonnage. Any change in this respect would lead to renewed enquiry locally. In the meantime prices are firm, and very many holders in the interior seem disposed to await the result of a better supply of freight.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are a simple and convenient remedy for Brochial Affections and Coughs. Sold only in boxes.

A Christmas Suggestion.

Monogram seals in dainty Dresden designs are to be seen in great variety at the stationary store of Cooper & Co., on Market street. For the holiday these make an acceptable gift, and engraved with the monogram are extremely en regle.

Maison Tortoni French Rotisserie, 111 O'Farrell street. Private dining rooms and banquet hall. S. Constantini, proprietor.

Maillard's Chocolates, half- and one-pound boxes, at Roberts', Polk and Bush.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

Hotel St. Nicholas, corner Market, Hayes, Larkin and Ninth. American or European plan. Ira R. and James H. Doolittle.

For fine custom-made Footwear, go to Dietle's, 235 Bush street.

Auction Sale of Thoroughbreds
ELEVEN YEARLINGS
Ten by St. Carlo, One by Imp. Watercress
AND EIGHT THOROUGHBRED BROOD MARES
Property of W. O'B. MACDONOUGH
AT THE
Occidental Horse Exchange, 225 Tehama St.
MONDAY, DECEMBER 20TH, 1897
Commencing at 7:30 p.m.
WILLIAM FITCH, Auctioneer
WM. G. LAYNG & CO., Proprietors—office 313 Bush st.
Catalogues ready.

DIVIDEND NOTICE—SAN FRANCISCO SAVINGS UNION, 532 California street, corner Webb. For the half year ending with the 31st of December, 1897, a dividend has been declared at the rate per annum of four and two tenths (4.2) per cent on term deposits, and three and five tenths (3.5) per cent on ordinary deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Monday, January 3, 1898.

LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

AUNT ABBEY'S ROLLED O[illegible] ONE MINUTE PANCAKE ME[illegible]
Telephone Main 1055

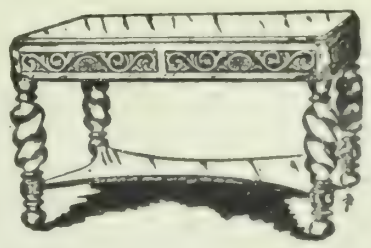
Frank B. Peterson & Co.
IMPORTERS, : WHOLESALE : GROCERS
And Dealers in Cigars, Tobacco and Provisions
30 and 32 California Street, - San Francisco, Cal.
HOPS AND DRIED FRUIT A SPECIALTY

This is our last Christmas talk with you this year.

What shall we say—that "we've the finest stock of gift furniture in town"?

No. We'll leave that for you to say. We'll invite you to see and decide.

These two pictures may suggest something you had not thought of:



Library table.

For the family to enjoy, for friends to admire.

Notice the massive twisted posts and the exquisite hand carving on the drawer-fronts. The drawer handles have tiny settings of mother o' pearl.

It's the fashion these days to have entrance halls as cozy as possible.

Oddly-shaped chairs are helpful furnishings.

The picture shows a peculiar shape that we have in rich old mahogany.

Comfort in the high back, comfort in the spreading arms—more comfort in giving it, at Christmas.

Open every evening till Christmas.

California Furniture Company
(N. P. COLE & CO.)
117-123 Geary St.
Carpets Rugs Mattings

California Jockey Club
OAKLAND TRACK
Winter Meeting [illegible]
Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday,
R. B. MILROY, Secretary. T. H. WILLIAMS Jr. Superintendent

California Theatre
Beginning Next Monday Night Dec. 20th with An Entire Engagement of the Popular Favorites
THE FRAWLEY COMPANY
Presenting on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday Evenings, and Wednesday Matinee
RAILROAD OF LOVE
Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday Evenings and Saturday Matinee, Harrison's Last Success
SHENANDOAH
Monday, Dec. 27th, Last Week of the Brilliant [illegible]

Columbia Theatre
FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO., Lessees and Managers
Only One More Week!
Monday, Dec. 20th, Harris and [illegible]
A Milk White Flag
Presented in a superior manner to the original production!
Magnificent Scenery, Superb Costumes
Fifty People in the Cast—the best ever
Monday [illegible], At Gay Coney Island

Orpheum
Week beginning Monday, Dec. 27th
Ballet Spectacle, The Birth of the Pearl
Matinees Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday

Tivoli Opera House
MRS. ERNESTINE KRELING, Proprietress and Manager
Every Evening, One Hundred Specialists
MOTHER GOOSE
Or, The Strange Adventures of Jack and Jill
Popular Prices : : 25 and 50 cents

Alcazar Theatre
Lessee and Proprietor
MARK THALL, Manager
Commencing Week Monday, Second Regular Matinee of Popular Romance and Effective Drama,
The Girl I Left Behind Me
Matinees Saturday and Sunday

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
WALTER MOROSCO, Sole Lessee and Manager
Last Week but One of Bootle's Baby
Commencing Monday, Dec. 20th, Magnificent Production of the Stupendous Melodrama
THE WAR OF WEALTH
By C. T. Dazey, author of "In Old Kentucky"
Wonderful Stage Effects and Scenic Realism
Grand Christmas Day Matinee
Prices [illegible] Matinees Saturday and Sunday

DIVIDEND NOTICE

Dividend No. 52 (Forty Cents per share) of the HUTCHINSON SUGAR PLANTATION CO., will be payable at the office of the company, 327 Market street, on and after Monday, December 20, 1897. Transfer books will close Tuesday, December 14, 1897, at 3 o'clock p. m.

E. H. SHELDON, Secretary.

Some Facts About AEOLIANS And Some Prices

Aeolians suitable for parlors or music rooms cost from $75 up to $1,500

The $75 Aeolian, the Princess, is an excellent instrument, and since its first introduction last winter nearly five hundred have been made and sold. Its tone is good, and its size renders it available for use in places where there is not sufficient room for one of the larger styles

Style 1450, price $350, is an Aeolian designed to meet the demand for an Aeolian of fine tone and action. Attractively cased, that can be bought on moderate terms of payment. We sell Style 1450 on deferred payments, at $10 per month.

The Aeolian Grand, price $750, is our standard instrument. This is the style most favored by musicians because of its wonderfully orchestral tone. We have supplied Aeolian Grands to Paderewski, the De Reszkes, Nordica, and others.

Our latest and best instlument is the Aeolian Orchestrelle. Its distinguishing feature is its tone. It is constructed on the celebrated Vocalian principle, by which system each different reed is enclosed in a separate cell, and the tones are qualified by tubes of different shapes and sizes. All traces of the coarse, raw quality of the ordinary reed are entirely removed and a richness and purity is obtained only equalled by a pipe; in fact, many of the tones are so like those produced from pipes that even experts are deceived by them. The price of this instrument is $1,500.

We have for rental a few Style 1500, price $500. The terms are $15 for the first month, and $10 for each subsequent month.

KOHLER & CHASE

28 & 30 O'FARRELL ST., S. F.

BEAUTIFUL

Holiday Goods

AT

S. & G. GUMP

ART STORE

113 GEARY STREET

Established since 1872 in San Francisco.

S. STROZYNSKI

24 GEARY ST.

The ladies' leading Hairdresser. All work original. Special attention paid to Children's Haircutting by European artists. Scalp Treatment and Shampooing by a modern process. Prices reasonable

Telephone Main 5697.

THE OCCIDENTAL

Success of a Modern Hotel Under a Progressive Management.

A recent visit to the Occidental has proved that the management continues its system of improvement, both with regard to sanitation and comfort.

During the past year material changes have been made in the interior of the hotel. New suites have been arranged by the tearing down of partitions and additional windows. Even in the smaller rooms stationary washstands with the modern open plumbing have been provided. The Bush-street side of the house is now undergoing a complete renovation, and the rooms that were formerly dark are now as bright and pleasant as any in the building. General satisfaction has been everywhere expressed over the system of telephonic communication by which each room is directly connected with the office. The Occidental is the first hotel in this city to introduce this system, which has been in vogue some little time in the East.

Radical changes have been made in the domestic department of the hotel. The management found that it would require more attention than could be given to it by one housekeeper, and in consequence three capable women have been placed in charge under the supervision of a manager, who also attends to the various interior improvements in the hotel.

The individual comfort of each guest is looked after with care one rarely receives outside of one's own home. Major Hooper sees to it that each and all receive the thousand and one little attentions that make up the luxury of living.

The hotel is in a most prosperous condition; the Australian and colonial trade has made rapid strides in the last year, while the number of permanent guests is steadily increasing. There is no attempt made to draw custom by outward display, the conservative spirit of the management preferring to look for substantial results.

The facilities for entertainment are perfect in every particular. The cuisine and service are excellent, and the parlors and banqueting hall afford ample opportunities for dancing, etc. The lower portion of the building is lighted by both gas and electricity, arranged to suit the convenience of the guests.

The management desires to keep abreast of the times in every particular, and not any one of the newly erected hotels has any advantage over the Occidental, with regard to material comforts.

As a family hotel the Occidental is generally conceded to be unsurpassed. The rooms are so constructed that they may be thrown from small suites into numbers of apartments.

Especial provision has been made for the giving of private dinners, luncheons or receptions, and in these latter days when home entertainment is the exception rather than the rule, the management of the Occidental has arranged numberless affairs of a greater or less degree of magnitude. An efficient corps of assistants is employed to attend to the table decoration, catering, etc., and the whole responsibility is taken off the hands of the hostess.

Major Hooper is now completely restored to health and is able to attend to the most minute details of the management.

The oldest shipping house at Port St. Mary's, Spain, is the well known one of Duff, Gordon & Co., shippers of the Duff-Gordon sherries, the most celebrated of any in the world, being specially noted for their superior qualities of character, style, delicacy and purity.

The Requisite of Ladies of Fashion.

Ladies know the comfort of using good toilet water when taking a bath, and the difficulty of finding preparations that leave an agreeable feeling to the skin with a pleasant odor. To meet the demand for such an article the Pacific Ammonia Bottling Company, of which Mr. George Herrmann is president, supply Greer's Toilet Ammonia, with violet or lavender perfume, which is unexcelled for toilet and bath purposes. This ammonia is rapidly coming into general use by ladies of fashion and all who appreciate the elegancies of life. At the same time its use is beneficial to health, invigorating to a tired body, and refreshing to the senses. The preparation is for sale by all druggists and grocers, and the price has lately been reduced to the very moderate price of 35 cents per bottle.

New Piano House.

The large and elegantly appointed warerooms of the Gardner & Glassell Piano Company, No. 208 Post street, were opened for inspection by the public on December 1st. It would pay those intending to purchase an instrument to call at the above address; they will find, coupled with reasonable prices, the finest and most varied assortment of pianos and organs in the city.

Professor O. A. Lunt wishes to announce that he is now located in his new and beautifully furnished hall, 320 Post street, where he has set Monday evenings at 8 o'clock for adult classes and Saturday at 2 o'clock for juveniles. Private lessons daily from 10:30 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Calendars in High Art.

The Christmas Cards, and especially Calendars for this year, far excel the productions of seasons past, and artists everywhere have competed for honors as well as the rich prizes offered for new and original effects. The consequence manifests itself in the vast display to be seen at Cooper's, No. 746 Market street, where small, delicate cards of the amateur are mingled with the works of celebrated artists.

For health and strength: Damiana Bitters.

THE Management of the PALACE HOTEL announce a

REDUCTION

IN

THE PRICE OF CHAMPAGNE

Hereafter Eastern prices will prevail: Pints $2; Quarts $3.90

ESTABLISHED 1852

Wells Fargo & Co's Bank

SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

Cash Capital and Surplus
$6,250,000

JOHN J VALENTINE . President
HOMER S KING . Manager
H. WADSWORTH . Cashier
F. L. LIPMAN . Assistant Cashier

BRANCHES

NEW YORK : : H. B. Parsons, Cashier
SALT LAKE : : : J. E. Dooly, Cashier
PORTLAND : : R. M. Dooly, Cashier

LONDON BANKERS

Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co.
The Union Bank of London, Limited

STATEMENT OF CONDITION

At close of business July 31, 1897

ASSETS

| | |
|---|---|
| Loans | $6,912,858 47 |
| Bonds, Stocks and Warrants | 1,361,207 15 |
| Real Estate | 1,081,724 99 |
| Furniture and Fixtures | 19,845 29 |
| Miscellaneous Assets | 3,103 50 |
| Due from Banks and Bankers | 391,501 77 |
| Cash | 4,148,588 06 |
| | $12,988,978 03 |

LIABILITIES

| | |
|---|---|
| Capital, paid up | $5,000,000 00 |
| Surplus | 5,750,000 00 |
| Undivided Profits | 688,343 81 |
| Deposits, Banks and Bankers | 1,482,358 26 |
| Deposits, Individual | 4,571,276 56 |
| | $12,988,978 03 |

A General Banking Business Transacted

Domestic and Foreign Exchange Bought and Sold

Travelers' and Commercial Credits Issued available in all parts of the world

Bullion and Mexican Dollars

Collections Made, Promptly and Economically

Accounts Received on Favorable Terms

Correspondents in Europe, Asia, Africa, North America, South America, Australia, Oceanica.

Special Attention Given Mercantile Accounts

CHICKERING PIANOS For 75 Years Standard of the World

88,000 IN USE

SOLD ON EASY TERMS

BENJ. CURTAZ & SON, Sole Agents

16 to 20 O'Farrell Street

Savings and Loan Society

101 Montgomery St., Cor. Sutter

(Formerly 619 Clay Street)

SAN FRANCISCO

The Oldest Incorporated Savings Bank in the State

S. C. BIGELOW.....President
ARTHUR A. SMITH.....Vice President
CYRUS W. CARMANY.....Cashier and Sec'y
EDWIN BONNELL.....Assistant Cashier

DIRECTORS

S. C. Bigelow — Isaac Hyde
Horace Davis — C. R. Goodman
Arthur A. Smith — A. N. Brown
P. B. Woods — R. C. Burr
Willis E. Davis

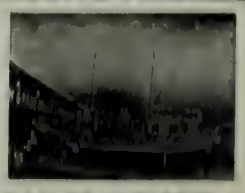
Guarantee Capital, $1,000,000

| | |
|---|---|
| Capital Stock, paid up in Gold Coin | $750,000 |
| Reserve Fund | 175,000 |
| | $925,000 |

Loans made at lowest rates on approved collaterals and on City and Country Real Estate.

Term and Ordinary Deposits received

KLONDYKE BOATS and SLEDS



Or any other style of Boat, Yacht, Steam or Gasoline Launch on hand and built to order....

SAN FRANCISCO LAUNCH CO.

Office & Works, Foot of Stockton St. Phone Red 1871

THE BETH BOOK

A Review of Sarah Grand's New Treatise on Sex.

To be clever enough to write The Beth Book (D. Appleton & Co.) Sarah Grand's last hot treatise on sex, and yet not write it better is strange—almost as strange as this bright woman's amazing heroines. Though not so glittering as the Heavenly Twins which has the brightness of a new tin can, it is a much better piece of work, is sounder, saner, less phantasmagorial. In fact, if she could be induced to give up the abnormal and turn her attention to human nature as it generally is, Sarah Grand could, I believe, write a book of some real literary value. A passion for freaks is the rock upon which she splits. Her books leave an impression similar to that of a freak museum or the side shows at a circus. The reader seldom says delightedly "now that's just like so and so," or "haven't you felt that often," but he does say impatiently, "whoever heard anybody talk like that," and skips a paragraph or two.

In the matter of character studies we are much like children selecting dolls. Given the choice any child will prefer the most ordinary of simpering young lady dolls with hat and muff to the fairest of unfamiliar angels with the best fitting halo ever made. If Sarah Grand could only see this and feel that novelists interest us not so much when they outline the unusual and abnormal as when they throw a flashlight on some human universal trait which we interpret feebly or not at all, so varied is its outward expression. Boileau says that "the mind of man teems with a host of confused ideas and vague half glimpses of the truth"; he says, too, that "we like nothing better than to have one of these ideas well elucidated and clearly presented to us. Without doubt we prefer to read human nature as it is rather than as it might be, for the keenest delight which can come to a reader of books is to have his vague impressions intensified, to find there his half-thought whole and illumined, to find some characteristic of his neighbor (which before he felt rather than knew) standing out clear, in the light of genial analysis.

SARAH GRAND
(From a late photograph.)

It is a poor book which does not make one say, "I have felt this," "I have almost thought that." Emerson says that "in every work of genius we recognize our own rejected thoughts; they come back to us with a sort of alienated majesty." In Sarah Grand's stories we recognize but little; we are in a strange world where the minds and hearts of men are congested, their thoughts and emotions turgid. Sometimes for a minute or two we fancy that one of the minor characters seems pleasingly natural and familiar, but about the time we become a little friendly with him, along comes the heroine, or some other high and mighty superlativeness and put us all out with her gymnastics.

The Beth Book is a distinct advance on the Heavenly Twins from a literary standpoint. We are kept, for the most part, quite comfortably on this earth; true we meet Idala and Angelica—subdued by years and criticism—but only at the end and intermittently. There are several real human beings in the book, for instance Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell, Sammy, Harriet, and that dear old gentlewoman, "Aunt Victoria." Beth herself is interesting, not because of her freakishness, but for her more human and commonplace attributes. Of course, if we believe everything her creator says about her we would not be so fond of her, but we don't, we can't. I for one feel sure that Beth simply could not have choked the pigeon or have said in her infancy, "You can't sing a thing you think it is when a thing comes you can sing it,"—that came from a maturer mind. However, the major part of Beth's remarks in her youth is amusing if improbable. At times the note is forced and some of the best pages spoiled, but the less pretentious bits are very clever pictures of a child's mind. In the period of Beth's girlhood, Sarah Grand breaks away it seems to me, and shows us an altogether different

[illegible]

[illegible] child she was and her manner of speech are suggested here:

[illegible]

"Not at all," Beth answered for herself cheerfully. [illegible]

"May I ask," said Uncle James politely, "by whom you were informed that I had 'bottled things up'?"

"Ah, that would be telling," said Beth and recommenced gobbling her pudding, to the intense relief of some of the party.

[illegible]

Beth finished her pudding, dropped her spoon with a clatter, leaned back in her chair, and sighed with satisfaction. She possessed a horrid fascination for Uncle James. Almost everything she did was an offense to him, yet he could not keep his eyes off her or let her alone.

After a little sparring about the pudding, Uncle James prepares for Lady Benyon's visit.

[illegible]

Beth made no sign.

When Lady Benyon's carriage stopped at the door, Uncle James stood [illegible] on the steps, ready to receive her.

"So glad to see you, mamma," he [illegible] as he handed her out. "Do take my arm."

But the little old lady waved him aside unceremoniously and hobbled in with the brisk stiffness of age.

"Gracious!" she exclaimed when she saw the party arranged in the drawing-room. "You all look as if you were having your [illegible] taken—all except Puck [illegible] in the piano stool."

When Uncle James had manœuvred Lady Benyon into the seat of honor he [illegible] her to take in order to complete the picture, she frankly inspected each member of the group, ending with Beth.

"And who may you be?"

Beth smiled and shrugged her shoulders.

"Why don't you speak?"

Beth made another gesture.

"Goodness," Lady Benyon cried, "is the child an idiot?"

"Beth, answer Lady Benyon directly," Mrs. Caldwell [illegible].

"Uncle James requested mamma to request me not to speak when you were present," Beth explained [illegible].

The old lady burst out laughing. "Well, that's dead," she said. "Requested mamma to request me—why it's James Patten all over. And who may you be, you monkey?"

"Riley said I was one of the little girls the devil put out when he gave up housekeeping," Beth remarked casually.

H. B.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoisseurs.

AT SLOANE'S

HOLIDAY GIFTS....

Odd Pieces of Furniture

ORIENTAL AND DOMESTIC RUGS

Party Novelties in Our Stationery Department

W. & J. SLOANE & CO.

641-643-645-647 Market Street, San Francisco

Pacific Coast Steamship Co.

[illegible]

Ticket Office [illegible]

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.

General Agents

No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

OCEANIC Steamship Company

Hawaii
Samoa
New Zealand
Australia

[illegible]

Ticket Office 114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office 327 Market St.

[illegible] & BROS. [illegible] Agents

Ernst H. Ludwig

CATERER

[illegible]

No. 122 GRANT STREET

[illegible]

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

Curtner Seminary for Young Ladies

[illegible]

Mt. Tamalpais Military Academy, San Rafael

[illegible] by the War Department. Eighth year begins Aug. 11. Arthur Crosby, A.M., Head Master.

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA
ELECTRICAL WORKS

409 MARKET STREET

JOE POHEIM, THE TAILOR

Makes the best fitting clothes at 25 per cent less than any other house on the Pacific Coast. See Prices:

| PANTS TO ORDER | SUITS TO ORDER |
|---|---|
| $3.50 | $10.00 |
| 4.50 | 13.50 |
| 5.00 | 15.50 |
| 6.00 | 17.50 |
| 7.00 | 20.00 |
| 8.00 | 25.00 |
| 9.00 | 30.00 |

[illegible]

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL

SAN FRANCISCO

M. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

The Hotel Richelieu

N. E. Cor. Van Ness and Myrtle Aves.

[illegible]

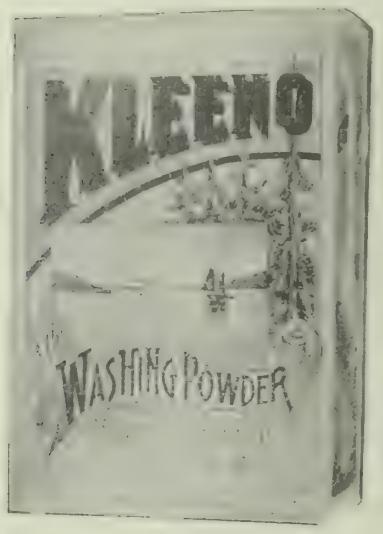
HOTEL RICHELIEU CO.

United States Laundry

Office 1004 Market St.

TELEPHONE SOUTH 420

Saves Time, Money, and Temper!



MADE IN CALIFORNIA!

SEND FOR SAMPLE

Office, 307 Sacramento St., San Francisco

CITY OF PARIS

DRY GOODS CO.

KID GLOVES

We carry a full assortment of the celebrated REYNIER GLOVE FOR LADIES in all shades.

| | |
|---|---|
| Reynier 4-button Kid Emb'y | $1.50 pair |
| Reynier 3-clasp Kid Emb'y | 1.50 pair |
| Reynier 5-button Kid Plain | 1.50 pair |
| Reynier 3-clasp Suede Emb'y | 1.50 pair |
| Reynier 4-button Pique Emb'y | 1.50 pair |
| Reynier 4-button Russian Kid Emb'y | 2.00 pair |

Also Reynier Suede Mousquetaire, in 12, 16, 20 and 24-button length

For the Holidays Purchase a Glove Order

Good for any style or quantity and at any time

CITY OF PARIS DRY GOODS CO.

S. E. Corner of Geary and Stockton Streets Union Square

HOLIDAY BOOKS & OTHER GIFTS

H. R. WILLIS'

107 MONTGOMERY STREET

GEO. GOODMAN Patentee and Manufacturer of

Artificial Stone in all its branches

Schillinger's Patent Sidewalk and Gardenwalk a Specialty

Office, 307 Montgomery St., Nevada Block, S. F.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks

From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. Pacific Coast Sole Agents

DR. WARD'S MAGICAL COMPLEXION TABLETS

Beautifies the skin and the complexion. A positive cure and guaranteed remedy for Pimples, Blackheads, Freckles, Tan, Moles, Redness and Roughness of the Face and Hands, Sallow Complexion, Eczema, Prickly Heat and all other imperfections of the skin. Price, One Dollar.

Ward Medical Co., 350 Dearbon Street, Chicago

French and Italian Instruction

By PROF. L. D. VENTURA, late of Boston

Formerly secretary to Tomasso Salvini

University endorsement, and highest references on application. Class and Private Lessons. Address by mail, 727 Gough street, between Golden Gate avenue and McAllister.

THE THEATRES

"The Milk White Flag" at the Columbia—Prospective Shows.

It has always struck me that Hoyt's "A Milk-White Flag" was not only the most amusing, but in every other way was, and is, the best of all Hoyt's farce comedies. John S. Marble as the undertaker carries off the honors among the comedians at the Columbia this week. Mary Marble as Pony Luce, the orphaned daughter of the contractor, was easily the favorite among the ladies. Miss Marble possesses a thin little voice, but she makes more out of it than many a more gifted songstress, and earns repeated recalls. "A Milk-White Flag" is worth witnessing a second time. The Columbia was well crowded during the week, and the audiences highly appreciative. Many of the people with the original company are with the present combination, and none of the vim or dash of the original is missing.

The Alcazar is making a rather pretentious production this week of Clinton Stewat's "Will She Divorce Him." The piece is a drawing-room scheme, punctuated with problems and comedy, the latter quality bountifully supplied by a couple of garrulous parents-in-law. The problem in question touches on matrimony and its ins and outs, principally the outs. Mr. Stewart handles the subject charmingly, give it a good plot and novel situation, and finally evolves a happy conclusion. Frank Denithorne, who makes his first appearance has good presence and an excellant voice, but is a trifle sticky in movement, a defect he will easily overcome.

* *

DRAMATIC NOTES

The Tivoli announces for this evening the initial production of the holiday spectacle, "Mother Goose; or, The Strange Adventures of Jack and Jill." The piece has been in preparation for several months, and from all accounts ought to prove as popular as any of its predecessors. The book is by Edwin Stevens and the music composed and selected by Max Hirschfield. A number of new ballets have been specially arranged. The cast includes Mr. Stevens as Mother Goose; Miss Hall, Jill; Miss Salinger, Jack; Miss Wolcott, the fairy queen and Mr. Leary the policeman.

At the Baldwin this evening the Italian Opera Company presents the new opera, "The Little Hayden." It is by Cipollini, and will be sung in conjunction with the second act of "Manon Lescaut", and the third and fourth acts of "La Boheme." The farewell performance to-morrow (Sunday) evening will consist of a repetition of "The Little Hayden," "Pagliacci," the third act of "Aida" and special numbers for the orchestra.

The Orpheum presents for next week an unusually attractive holiday bill. A feature will be a ballet spectacle, "The Birth of the Pearl," in which 36 coryphees participate. The new people are the Three Avalos, Australian acrobats; Caroline Hull, descriptive singer; and Ophelita, character dansuese. Professor Doherty's Canine Circus is held over; also, John Kernell, the Six Picchiani Sisters, the De Filippis and Servais Le Roy.

Prior to its eastern trip the Frawley Company plays an engagement of two weeks at the California, commencing Monday evening, opening in "The Railroad of Love," which will be repeated Tuesday and Wednesday. The balance of the week, including Saturday matinee, will be given to "Shenandoah."

The second week of "A Milk-White Flag" commences at the Columbia Monday evening. The next attraction will be the comedians Matthews and Bulger, in the new musical comedy, "At Gay Coney Island."

"The War of Wealth," by C. T. Dazey, author of "In Old Kentucky," is the attraction for next week at Morosco's. The piece is a stirring American drama, taking its characters from the business and financial world.

The last performance of "Unsano-Tokef" by the German-Hebrew Opera Company will be given at the California to-morrow (Sunday) evening.

Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the best of all remedies for Children Teething. 25c. a bottle.

American Crystals Taking the Lead.

In no instance has American manufacture competed more successfully with foregn goods than in the line of glassware. American cut glass has actually taken the lead in this country of Belgian, French and English makes. This was first exemplified at the World's Fair, where Libby, the great American manufacturer, operated a complete factory. Never was a large business so thoroughly exhibited.

Libby's exclusive agents in San Francisco are Nathan, Dohrmann & Co., 122-132 Sutter street, who also carry an immense stock of all American crystals. To exhibit them to advantage, they have added a crystal-room to their establishment, which excels in richness that of any in the country, and one can spend an afternoon advantageously in looking over their wonderful display.

They also carry an extensive line of bronzes, Bohemian ware and china of every description, from the costliest Sevres to the most humble Japanese ornament. There is certainly nothing more acceptable for a holiday gift than something in this line, and Nathan, Dohrmann & Co. take great pleasure in showing them.

THE NEW BOOKS

AS ISSUED AT

ROBERTSON'S

126 POST ST.

BROOKLYN HOTEL 208-212 Bush St. San Francisco Cal.

Conducted on Both American and European Plan.

This favorite hotel, located in the best and most central portion of the city, is under the experienced management of CHARLES MONTGOMERY, and is as good, if not the best Family and Business Men's Hotel in San Francisco. Electric lights and electric return call bells in rooms. Board and Room (American Plan) per day, $1.50, $1.25 and $1.00. European Plan (choice rooms) per day, 50c. to $1. Choice Family Rooms for two persons. $1. Guests taking rooms on European Plan plan get their Single Meals for 25c. Free coach to and from hotel.

City Department Account Department Cashier

LOBBY OF THE NEW OFFICES OF THE ROYAL AND QUEEN INSURANCE COMPANIES

ROYAL AND QUEEN

Two Insurance Companies That are in the Front Rank.

Mr. Rolla V. Watt, Pacific Coast manager of th eRoyal Insurance Company of Liverpool and the Queen Insurance Company of America, has now completely established his headquarters in the new Royal Insurance Building, corner of Pine and Sansome streets. The entire first floor and basement are occupied for the transaction of the large Coast business of the Royal and Queen Insurance companies. The accompanying half-tone will give a fair idea of the elegance of the furnishings, which are in quartered oak and bronze grill—perhaps the most perfectly equipped offices on the coast.

The Pacific Coast department embraces California, Oregon, Washington, Alaska, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, New Mexico and the Hawaiian Islands.

The premium income of the department is about $400,000 per year. The Royal is the greatest fire insurance company in the world, has the largest premium income and an enormous net surplus. The business on this coast has made rapid advances during the past few years.

The Queen Insurance Company of America is under the same management, and is the successor of the old Queen of Liverpool. This company has already taken a leading position among American companies. The Royal and Queen have assets exceeding $52,000,0000.

LADIES!!!!

Before buying anywhere else, if you want to be astonished, come and look at my windows and see marked the biggest bargains in Jackets, Suits, Fur Capes, Silk Waists, Feather Boas, etc.

Terrific reductions during the holidays.

OPEN EVERY NIGHT.

ARMAND CAILLEAU

Corner of Geary Street and Grant Avenue

EAGLESON & CO'S

LARGE STOCK

FINE

Holiday • Goods

POPULAR PRICES....

| | |
|---|---|
| Handkerchiefs | Night Robes |
| Dress Shirts | Fancy Shirts |
| Neck Dress | Suspenders |
| Underwear | Gloves |
| Pajama Suits | Negligee Shirts |
| Sweaters | Umbrellas |

Silk Mufflers, Etc.

SEE WINDOW DISPLAY

748-750 Market Street

Question.—Why is the

MOET & CHANDON

champagne establishment the largest in the world?

Answer.—Ask the connoisseurs.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

ONE POUND
FINEST JAPAN
YOUNG HYSON

L

PACKED FOR
C. ADOLPHE LOW & Co
SAN FRANCISCO
BY
WALSH, HALL & Co
YOKOHAMA

FOR SALE BY

E. L. G. STEELE & CO.

208 California St., San Francisco

A LARGE BENGAL TIGER TO MATCH THE CELEBRATED LION.

A large engraving of a tiger, in colors, from the renowned picture of the famous animal-painter, Rosa Bonheur, has been engraved at great expense to order for Charles Lyons, the London Tailor. Can be had at either of his three stores, at the nominal price of 10 cents; by mail 20 cents. Free to customers.

721 Market Street
302 Kearny Street
1212-1214 Market Street

Landseer's celebrated picture of the Lion can also be had at the same price.

MEDICATED CERATE... AN INCOMPARABLE FACE FOOD

It preserves, purifies, refines, and permanently beautifies the complexion, and makes the skin soft, smooth, and fine grained, keeps it from becoming dry, withered, wrinkled or freckled. It invigorates and nourishes the lax and shrunken tissues, fills out sunken lines, makes the flesh firm, removes wrinkles, cures tan, sunburn, pimples, hives, etc. A perfect application before using powder. Endorsed by eminent physicians. Price, 50c. and $1. Sent by mail on receipt of price. Trial pot and sample of face powder, 10c. Free at office—room 324, Phelan Building, 806 Market Street.

MRS. M. J. BUTLER, Dermatologist.

A SOVEREIGN REMEDY—

Price
25 Cents

DR. PARKER'S
COUGH CURE

One dose will stop a cough—it never fails!
ASK YOUR DRUGGIST FOR IT

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

The highest grade of negro is the private car porter. It was such a negro, young and with many fine mannerisms and some money, who decided to take a trip to Europe. In London he made the acquaintance of several English bred negroes. By these he was shown the sights and introduced into society. One evening he was invited to "sit in" a little poker game. He was well acquainted with the game as played at home, and did not hesitate to play. His limited acquaintance with English money cost him several good pots. At last he got four aces and knew exactly where he was, for four aces have their value the world over. His opponent "skinned" his hand carefully after cards had been "doled" and said: "Ah'll just bet yo' a pound, Mistah Johnsing." "Well," said the American, "Ah don' rightly know how much a pound is, but Ah'll just raise you a ton."

When Lord Brougham was a young and comparatively unknown barrister, he was asked to a dinner at which the Prime Regent presided. Mr. Brougham's hands needed washing. The Regent's keen eyes rested on them. He beckoned to a waiter and gave an order which the man heard with a scared face, and then going out he speedily returned with a ewer full of water, soap, and a towel. He carried them to Brougham, presenting them with the Prince Regent's compliments. The barrister instantly withdrew and never afterward referred to the insult. Years later, when the Prince, now King, tried to divorce his wife, Brougham, as her defender, so vehemently sustained her cause that she triumphed.

At the end of the Long Walk at Windsor, there is a very poor example of sculpture representing George III on horseback, which the habitues refer to as "copper horse." Tennyson was stopping at Windsor with the Queen, and in the afternoon he had gone for a long tramp. Her Majesty asked at dinner if the exertion had not tired him. "Not at all, thank you, ma'am," he replied; "I got a lift back as far as the 'copper horse.'" "What 'copper horse'?" repeated the Queen, in astonished tones. "Why," replied Tennyson, "the 'copper horse' at the end of the Long Walk." "That is not a 'copper horse,'" said Her Majesty, "that's my grandfather."

A certain Protestant minister on taking possession of a new parish asked the clerk if there were any Pusyites in the community. "Naw, sir," said the clerk; "there used to be some, but for the last two years the boys have took all their eggs." This is on a par with the answer of the Georgia "cracker," who replied to a Sunday-school missionary that he did not know whether there were any Presbyterians in the neighborhood or not, "but there was some varmint around which was catching the chickens and lambs.

A colored woman found her way into a Ritualistic church and was given a front seat. During the service, moved by the music of the boys' voices, she began to sway to and fro. The usher rushed up and asked if she was ill. She promptly replied that she was not, but that she felt so queer that she thought she must be "getting religion." "Then," whispered the usher excitedly, "you must get right out of here. This church is no place for that sort of thing!"

Paul Louis Courier, the well-known Frenchman, is a true philosopher. Having been recently assailed with great bitterness by a French professor, he quietly remarked: "I fancy he must be vexed. He called me Jacobin, rebel, plagarist, thief, prisoner, forger, leper and madman, impostor, libeler, a grimacing ragpicker. I gather what he wants to say. He means that he and I are not of the same opinion, and this is only his way of putting it."

The sexton of a certain Scotch country parish was lately much exercised at the appearance of a strange old gentleman, who, when the ceremony was about to begin, took an eartrumpet, in two parts, out of his pocket and began screwing them together. The sexton watched him until the process was completed, and then, going stealthily up, whispered: "Ye mauna play here! If ye dae, I'll turn ye oot!"

The unfortunate objection to soap which was a leading characteristic of Lord Brougham's, was well understood in Parliament. On one occasion he was denouncing a measure in the House, and after exhausting objections, he raised his arms, exclaiming, "Do as you will! I wash my hands of it." "Time you did it!" exclaimed a malicious political opponent.

Professor Drummond once told a story of an officer of an Italian coast-guard who reported to his government a shipwreck in these words: "We saw the wreck, and we attempted to give every assistance possible through the speaking trumpet; notwithstanding which, next morning twenty corpses were washed ashore."

Rev. Dr. Haweis related at a dinner in London the strangest version of the marriage service which had come to his observation. He was officiating at a wedding in Hampshire, and the bride, when it came to her turn, vowed "to 'ave and to 'old from this day fortni't for betterer horse, for richerer power, in siggerness health, to love cherries, and to bay."

All the Year Round

you have comfort, health and pleasure or can get relief from diseases and alleviation of pain in the marvelous curative waters of Byron Hot Springs. In the winter the rainfall is light good hunting all the season, and many of the guests avail themselves of the all-winter sport. The Autumn brings in many of our interior friends who come for recuperation after harvest and get in trim for another seed time.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

Among the many great Financial Corporations on the Pacific Coast, none rank higher than the

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE CO.

Its Agents are found throughout America, and its Record for Prompt and Equitable Settlement of All Honest Losses is Firmly Established

D. J. STAPLES, President — WM. J. DUTTON, Vice-President — R. RAYMOND, 2nd Vice-Pres. and Sec'y
J. B. LEVISON, Marine Sec'y — LOUIS WEINMANN, Asst. Sec'y — STEPHEN D. IVES, General Agent

The German Savings and Loan Society

526 California St., S. F.

Guarantee Capital and Surplus - $2,040,301 66
Capital Actually Paid Up in Cash - 1,000,000 00
Deposits December 31, 1896 - - 27,730,247 45

OFFICERS
President, B. A. BECKER
First Vice-President, DANIEL MEYER
Second Vice-President, H. HORSTMANN
Cashier, A. H. R. SCHMIDT
Assistant Cashier, WM. HERRMANN
Secretary, GEORGE TOURNY
Assistant Secretary, A. H. MULLER

DIRECTORS
B. A. Becker, Daniel Meyer, H. Horstmann, Ign. Steinhart, N. Van Bergen, E. Rhote, H. B. Russ, D. N. Walter and N. Ohlandt
Attorney - W. S. Goodfellow

San Francisco Savings Union

532 CALIFORNIA ST

Deposits June 30, 1896 ..... $22,368,372
Paid Up Capital and Surplus..... 1,614,314

ALBERT MILLER, Pres. E. B. POND, Vice-Pres.
LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

DIRECTORS
George W. Beaver, Robert Watt, W. A. Magee, George C. Boardman, W. C. B. de Fremery, Daniel E. Martin, Albert Miller, George Tasheira, E. B. Pond

Loans upon San Francisco and Oakland Real Estate, and Farms and Farming Lands in the country. No charge is made for pass book or entrance fee.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 POST STREET

Below Kearny — Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
Paid Up Capital, $300,000

JAMES D. PHELAN, President.
GEORGE A. STORY, Cashier.
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on deposits

Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.

When opening accounts, send signature

California Title Insurance and Trust Company

Paid Up Capital . . . . $250,000
Cash Reserve Fund . . . . 25,000

OFFICE, MILLS BUILDING

CHS. PAGE, President. HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secretary and Manager.

Policies of Insurance issued guaranteeing titles to be perfect. Abstracts made and continued

We have money to loan on Real Estate at reasonable rates of interest.

CONNECTICUT
FIRE INS. CO.
OF HARTFORD

Assets $3,[illegible] BENJAMIN J. SMITH, Manager

COLIN M. BOYD,
Agent for San Francisco
501 Montgomery Street

Thuringia Insurance Co.

OF ERFURT, GERMANY

Capital $2,250,000 Assets $10,984,248

PACIFIC COAST DEPARTMENT
204-208 Sansome Street, San Francisco

VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A.D. 1726

Capital [illegible] Assets $[illegible]

Surplus to Policy-Holders, $8,080,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

Don't Borrow a Home!

BUY IT Your rent payments for the next [illegible] will do it through the end of the

CONTINENTAL Building and Loan Ass'n of California

WM. CORBIN, Secretary and Gen. Manager

Home Office, 222 Sansome St., San Francisco

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF EUDORA A. CHAMBERS (sometimes known as Eudora T. Chambers) DECEASED

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, R. C. Chambers, Executor of the will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at the office of Franklin K. Lane, rooms 201-202 Crocker Building, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said Estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

R. C. CHAMBERS,
Executor of the Will of Eudora A. Chambers, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, November [illegible], 1896.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.

ESTATE OF DUNCAN B. McMILLAN, Deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Duncan B. McMillan, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at [illegible], corner of Geary and Kearny streets, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

A. C. FREESE,
Administrator of the Estate of Duncan B. McMillan, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, November [illegible], 1896.

J. D. SULLIVAN,
Attorney for Administrator.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.

Belcher Mining Company

Assessment [illegible] No. [illegible]
Amount per share [illegible] cents
Levied [illegible]
Delinquent in office [illegible]
Day of sale of delinquent stock.....January 14 [illegible]

C. L. PERKINS, Secretary.
Office, room [illegible], Mutual Savings Bank Building, San Francisco.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Occidental Consolidated Mining Co.

Assessment [illegible] No. [illegible]
Amount per share [illegible] cents
Levied ..... December 7, 1896
Delinquent in office [illegible]
Day of sale of delinquent stock [illegible]

A. K. DURBROW, Secretary.
Office, room [illegible], Nevada Block, San Francisco.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Alta Silver Mining Company

Assessment [illegible] No. [illegible]
Amount per share [illegible]
Levied [illegible]
Delinquent in office [illegible]
Day of sale of delinquent stock [illegible]

J. J. DAGGETT, Secretary.
Office, room [illegible], Nevada Block, San Francisco.

BRICK, TERRA COTTA, FIRE PROOFING, PIPE, TILE, ETC.

GLADDING, McBEAN & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO
WORKS: LINCOLN, CAL. VALLEJO, CAL.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. Monte Carlo cannot compare with it. Its seventeen-mile drive is unparalleled for fineness."

When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over. Address GEO. SCHONEWALD, Manager.

Stoves
Ranges
House Furnishing Goods
Metal Pipe
Fittings
Mantels
Tiles
Grates
Artistic Fireplace Trimmings

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.
309 TO 317 MARKET STREET

TUBBS CORDAGE CO.
ESTABLISHED IN 1856
Manufacturers of Cordage and Binder Twine
OF EVERY DESCRIPTION
Office, 607-613 Front Street Factory, Kentucky St., bet. 22d and 23d
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

BAJA CALIFORNIA
DAMIANA BITTERS
"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)
NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

BREEN BROS.
COAL MERCHANTS
128 O'Farrell St., cor. Powell
Dealers in Wood and Charcoal
Genuine Wellington Coal a Specialty
Orders Promptly Delivered Telephone Red 1581

GAS AS A FUEL

The First Use of Gas in San Francisco in the Year 1854.

The "Annals of San Francisco," published in 1854, chronicles many an interesting fact now forgotten. Turning its pages some days ago, I came across an entry dated February 11, 1854: "The city was first lighted by coal gas on the evening of this day. The occasion was celebrated by several hundred citizens at a banquet given by the trustees of the San Francisco Gas Company in the Oriental Hotel. Already, about three miles of pipe were laid. . . At first, only a few principal streets and some of the leading hotels and large mercantile establishments were lighted with gas, but every day the number is increasing. The Metropolitan Theater, a few weeks after this date, adopted the new light. It will, of course, soon become general, and prove a great benefit to the city." En passant I may say the price per thousand feet in that day was $15; coal, $36 to $40 per ton; labor, $6 to $7 per day, and interest 36 per cent per annum.

The chronicler of those days prophesied the general use of the "new light," but he did not dream that the price of gas would ever be reduced by a liberal management to nearly one-tenth the then current price. Nor did he foresee then that the "new light" would also, in short space of time, furnish a "new heat," if one may be pardoned the expression, and that this same coal gas would become one of the cheapest fuels for heating and cooking purposes. Nowadays, in modern houses, in those apartments consecrated to bric-a-brac and fine furniture, coal is never used for heating purposes. The gas-log grate has supplanted it entirely, and the unavoidable dust, smoke and dirt of the open grate no longer settle upon the surrounding articles de vertu to be "grimed in" by too industrtous housemaids.

The individual who has never inquired into the gas-stove question—I mean now gas-stoves for cooking purposes—little dreams of the improvements which have been made in their manufacture. Ovens, water-backs, boilers, everything accompanies the best of them, and everything in the way of cooking may be done upon them; and the secret of their popularity lies in this: The fire is never lit until it is needed, and a match touched to the patent burners produces the requisite heat at once. When the cooking is finished, the expense ceases at once. There is no large fire left there to burn out and waste itself up the chimney. There is absolutely no waste. Now, many people of an economical turn, after adjourning to the sittingroom for the evening, find a fire burning briskly there, with the knowledge that there is another fire going to waste in the kitchen. Adjourning thence to the bed-chamber, there is a chill in the bedroom, a chill in the bathroom, and still all this heat is going to waste below stairs. How different with gas heat! The kitchen fire is turned off when its use has ceased, and transferred to the sittingroom, and from thence to the sleeping or bathroom, long enough to "take the chill off the air." Cleanly comfort has been obtained without a penny of waste, and the problem of cheap, cleanly fuel has been solved.

I suggest that the reader examine into the question. Call at 415 Post street, and look at the large variety of heating and cooking stoves on hand. Don't imagine that you know it all until you have inquired into the cost; then try the experiment. You will thank The Wave for having directed your attention to what will prove a boon to the housewife and a comfort to the household.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portions of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars—free.

F. J. CHENEY & CO., Toledo, O.
Sold by druggists, 75c.

THE RUBBER-TIPPED ARROW FAMILY GAME

It is just the thing for amusement; just the thing for discipline; just the thing to help our boys and girls grow up strong, healthy, manly, and womanly. The Game in Bronze costs only 65c. including pistol, arrow, target, and target-holder; in nickel, 90c., all complete.

ELASTIC TIP CO., 735 Market Street,
Patentees and Manufacturers of Rubber Specialties.

A. K. DAGGETT
Drawing of Deeds and all Legal Papers a specialty
NOTARY PUBLIC
14 Montgomery St., S. F.
Telephone 101

THE NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

Capital Paid Up . . . . . $3,000,000

Surplus and Undivided Profits . . 1740.018

LETTERS OF CREDIT ISSUED, AVAILABLE IN ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD

New York Correspondents: American Exchange National Bank, Importers' and Traders' National Bank
London Bankers: Union Bank of London, Limited. Paris Bankers: Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris

ISAIAS W. HELLMAN . . . . . President
D. B. DAVIDSON . . . . . Cashier
JOHN F. BIGELOW . . . . . Vice-President
GEORGE GRANT . . . . . Assistant Cashier

DIRECTORS

JOHN W. MACKAY, ISAIAS W. HELLMAN, ROBERT WATT, H. L. DODGE, JAMES L. FLOOD, HENRY F. ALLEN, LEVI STRAUSS, JOHN F. BIGELOW, LEWIS GERSTLE, C. DE GUIGNE, D. N. WALTER

THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIA BANK, Ltd.

N. E. CORNER PINE AND SANSOME STREETS

Capital Authorized . . . . $6,000,000
Capital Subscribed . . . . 3,000,000
Capital Paid Up . . . . $1,500,000
Reserve Fund . . . . 700,000

IGN. STEINHART, P. N. LILLIENTHAL, Managers.

A. L. SELIGMAN, Cashier

Head Office: 3 Angels Court, London, E.C. Agents at New York: J. & W. Seligman & Co., 21 Broad St.

FOUNDED 1850 INCORPORATED 1891

TALLANT BANKING CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Authorized Capital, One Million Dollars ✪ Paid in Coin, Five Hundred Thousand Dollars

DIRECTORS

JOHN D. TALLANT.....President
FREDERICK W. TALLANT.....Vice-President
JOHN DEMPSTER McKEE.....Cashier
KIRKHAM WRIGHT.....Secretary
JOSEPH KNOWLAND, WM. E. MICHELL
AUSTIN C. TUBBS, E. T. BRICE
H. E. MONROE

CORRESPONDENTS

J. P. Morgan & Co., New York; J. S. Morgan & Co., London; National Bank of America, Chicago; National Bank of Commerce, Kansas City, Mo. Colorado National Bank, Denver, Col.; Knauth Nachod & Kuhne, New York and Foreign. Also, Correspondents in principal Cities of the Pacific Coast. DRAW EXCHANGES AND ISSUES LETTERS OF CREDIT AVAILABLE IN ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD.

The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society

Incorporated 12th of April, 1859.

OFFICE, CORNER OF McALLISTER AND JONES STREETS, SAN FRANCISCO

The objects for which this Association is formed are, that by its operations the depositor thereof may be able to find a

Secure and Profitable Investment for Small Savings

and that borrowers may have an opportunity of obtainining from it the use of a moderate capital on giving good and sufficient security for the use of the same.

President, JAMES R. KELLY Secretary and Treasurer, ROBERT J. TOBIN Attorney, ALFRED J. TOBIN

Any person can become a depositor of this Society on subscribing to the By-Laws. Deposits can be made from One Dollar upwards. Loans made on security of Real Estate within the City and County.

THE PIONEER COLLEGE
OF THE PACIFIC COAST . . . .

SANTA CLARA COLLEGE

Founded March 19, 1851

NEXT SESSION BEGINS JANUARY 4, 1898

For Further Particulars Apply to . . .

Rev. Joseph W. Riordan, S. J., President

SAN JOSE, CAL.

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

KH75